She half-fell down the steep steps, and made her way as quickly as she could down the slanting passage. She had no torch and had to feel her way in the dark. She wasn't in the least afraid. Only when she trod on a sharp stone with her bare foot did she make a sound.

The other three - Julian, Dick and George - were still sitting crouched together with Timmy in the centre. Julian had been once up to the door that led into the yard and had cautiously peered out to see what was to be seen - but had seen nothing at all except for an old woman hanging out some clothes on a line.

The three had decided to wait till night before they did anything. They thought maybe Timmy might have recovered a little then, and would be of some help in protecting them against Red or Markhoff. They half-dozed, sitting together for warmth, enjoying the heat of Timmy's big body.

Timmy growled! Yes, he actually growled - a thing he hadn't done at all so far. George put a warning hand on him. They all sat up, listening. A voice came to them.

'Julian! Dick! Where are you? I've lost my way!'

'It's Jo!' cried Dick, and switched on his torch at once. 'Here we are, Jo! How did you escape? What's happened?'

'Heaps,' said Jo, and came gladly over to them. 'My, it was dark up in those passages without a torch. Somehow I went the wrong way. That's why I yelled. But I hadn't gone far wrong. Have a sausage roll?'

'What?' cried three hungry voices, and even Timmy lifted his head and began to sniff at the rush basket that Jo carried.

Jo laughed and opened the basket. She handed out all the food and the three of them fell on it like wolves. 'Jo, you're the eighth wonder of the world,' said Dick. 'Is there anything left in the basket?'

'Yes,' said Jo, and took out the enormous key. 'This, look! I locked Red and Jake and Simmy into that tower room, and here's the key. What do you think of that?'

Chapter 23

MARKHOFF GOES HUNTING

George took the big key and looked at it with awe. 'Jo! Is this really the key - and you've locked them all in? Honestly, I think you're a marvel.'

'She is,' said Dick, and to Jo's enormous delight he gave her a sudden quick hug. 'I never knew such a girl in my life. Never. She's got the pluck of twenty!'

'It was easy, really,' said Jo, her eyes shining joyfully in the light of the torch. 'You trust me now, Dick, don't you? You won't be mean to me any more, any of you, will you?'

'Of course not,' said Julian. 'You're our friend for ever!'

'Not George's,' said Jo at once.

'Oh yes you are,' said George. 'I take back every single mean thing I said about you. You're as good as a boy.'

This was the very highest compliment that George could ever pay any girl. Jo beamed and gave George a light punch.

'I did it all for Dick, really,' she said. 'But next time I'll do it for you!'

'Goodness, I hope there won't be a next time,' said George, with a shiver. 'I can't say I enjoyed one single minute of the last few days.'

Timmy suddenly put his head on Jo's knee. She stroked him. 'Look at that!' she said. 'He remembers me. He's better, isn't he, George?'

George carefully removed Timmy's head from Jo's knee to her own. She felt decidedly friendly towards Jo now, but not to the extent of having Timmy put his head on Jo's knee. She patted him. 'Yes, he's better,' she said. 'He ate half the sausage roll I gave him, though he sniffed at it like anything first. I think he knows something has been put into his food and now he's suspicious of it. Good old Timmy.'

They all felt much more lively and cheerful now that they were no longer so dreadfully empty. Julian looked at his watch. 'It's getting on towards evening now,' he said. 'I wonder what all those fellows are doing.'

Three of them were still locked up! No matter how Markhoff had tried to batter in the door, it held. It was old and immensely strong, and the lock held without showing any sign of giving way even an eighth of an inch. Two other men had been called in from the garage to help, but except that the door looked decidedly worse for wear, it stood there just the same, sturdy and unbreakable.

Simmy and Jake watched Red as he walked up and down the tower room like a caged lion. They were glad they were two against one. He seemed like a madman to them as he raged and paced up and down.

Markhoff, outside with the other two men he had brought up to help, was getting very worried. No police had arrived as yet (and wouldn't either, because Joan hadn't been able to tell them anything except that she knew Julian and Dick had gone to see a man called Red - but where he lived she had no idea!).

But Red and Markhoff didn't know this - they felt sure that a police ambush was somewhere nearby. If only they could get away in the helicopter before anything else happened!

'Markhoff! Take Carl and Tom and go down into those underground caves,' ordered Red at last. 'Those children are sure to be there - it's the only place for them to hide. They can't get out of here because the front gate is locked and bolted, and the wall's too high to climb. Get hold of the kids and search them for the key.'

So Markhoff and two burly fellows went downstairs and out of the door. They crossed the yard to the door that led to the caves.

They got down the steep steps and were soon stumbling along the narrow, slanting passage, their nailed boots making a great noise as they went. They hung on to the hand-rail when they came to the difficult stretch of tunnel, and finally came out into the cave that had the hole in the floor.

There was nobody there. The children had heard the noise of the coming men, and had hurriedly swung themselves down through the hole into the cave below.

They ran through into another cave, the sour smelling one where bats lived and slept. Then round the rocky corner into the first cave, the curious oval-shaped one that led out to the ledge of rock overlooking the steep cliff.

'There's nowhere to hide,' groaned Julian. He looked back into the cave. At least it was better in there than out on this ledge, outlined by the daylight. He pulled the others back into the cave, and shone his torch up and down the walls to find some corner that they could squeeze behind.

Half-way up the wall was a shelf of rock. He hoisted George up there, and she dragged Timmy up too. Poor Timmy - he wasn't much use to them; he was still so bemused and so very sleepy. He had growled at the noise made by the coming men, but had dropped his head again almost immediately.

Dick got up beside George. Julian found a jutting-out rock and tried to hide behind it, while Jo lay down in a hole beside one wall and covered herself cleverly with sand. Julian couldn't help thinking how sharp Jo was. She always seemed to know the best thing to do.

But as it happened, Jo was the only one to be discovered! It was quite by accident - Markhoff trod on her. He and the other two men had let themselves down through the hole into the cave below, had then gone into the cave of bats, seen no sign of anyone there, and were now in the cave that led to the cliff.

'Those kids aren't here,' said one of the men. 'They've gone to hide somewhere else. What a horrible place this is - let's go back.'

Markhoff was flashing his torch up and down the walls to see if any of the children were crouching behind a jutting rock - and he trod heavily on Jo's hand. She gave an agonized yell, and Markhoff almost dropped his torch!

In a trice he had pulled the girl out of her bed of sand and was shaking her like a rat. 'This is the one we want!' he said to the others. 'She's got the key. Where is it, you little rat? Give it to me or I'll throw you down the cliff!'

Julian was horrified. He felt quite certain that Markhoff really would throw Jo down the cliff, and he was just about to jump down to help her, when he heard her speak.

'All right. Let me go, you brute. Here's the key! You go and let my Dad out before the police come! I don't want him caught!'

Markhoff gave an exclamation of triumph, and snatched a shining key out of Jo's hand. He gave her a resounding box on the ear.

'You little toad! You can just stay down here with the others, and it'll be a very, very long stay! Do you know what we're going to do? We're going to roll a big rock over the hole in that other cave's roof - and you'll be prisoners!

'You can't escape upwards - and you won't be able to escape downwards. You'll be dashed on the rocks by the sea if you try to swim away. That'll teach you to interfere!'

The other two men guffawed. 'Good idea Mark,' said one. 'They'll all be nicely boxed up here and nobody will know where they are! Come on - we've no time to lose. If Red isn't unlocked soon he'll go mad!'

They made their way into the heart of the cliff again, and the listening children heard their footsteps getting fainter. Finally they ceased altogether, as one by one the men levered themselves up through the hole in the roof of the last cave, and disappeared up the narrow, low-roofed tunnel that led to the courtyard.

Julian came out from his hiding-place, looking grim and rather scared. 'That's done it!' he said. 'If those fellows really do block up that hole - and I bet they have already - it looks as if we're here for keeps! As he said, we can't get up, and we can't escape down - the sea's too rough for us to attempt any swimming, and the cliff's unclimbable above the ledge!'

'I'll go and have a look and see if they have blocked up that hole,' said Dick. 'They may be bluffing.'

But it hadn't been bluff. When Julian and Dick shone their torches on to the hole in the roof, they saw that a great rock was now blocking it up.

They could not get through the hole again. It was impossible to move the rock from below. They went soberly back to the front cave and sat out on the ledge in the light of the sinking sun.

'It's a pity poor Jo was found,' said George. 'And an even greater pity she had to give up the key! Now Red and the others will go free.'

'They won't,' said Jo, surprisingly. 'I didn't give them the key of the tower room. I'd another key with me - the key of the kitchen larder! And I gave them that.'

'Well, I'm blessed!' said Julian, astounded. 'The things you do, Jo! But how on earth did you happen to have the key of the larder?'

Jo told them how she had taken it out and locked herself in when she was having a meal there.

'I had to unlock the door to get out again, of course,' she said. 'And I thought I'd take that key, too, because, who knows? - I might have wanted to get into that larder again and lock myself in with the food!'

'No one will ever get the better of you, Jo,' said Dick with the utmost conviction. 'Never. You're as cute as a bagful of monkeys. So you've still got the right key with you?'

'Yes,' said Jo. 'And Red and my Dad and Jake are still locked up in the tower room!'

'But suddenly a most disagreeable thought struck Dick. 'Wait a bit!' he said. 'What's going to happen when they find they've got the wrong key? They'll be down here again, and my word, what'll happen to us all then!'

Chapter 24

A GRAND SURPRISE

The thought that the men might soon return even angrier than they had been before was most unpleasant.

'As soon as Markhoff tries the key in the door of the tower room he'll find it won't unlock it, and he'll know that Jo has tricked him!' said George.

'And then he'll be in such a fury that he'll tear down here again, and goodness knows what will happen to us!' groaned Julian. 'What shall we do? Hide again?'

'No,' said Dick. 'Let's get out of here and climb down the cliff to the sea. I'd feel safer there than up here in this cave. We might be able to find a better hiding-place down on the rocks in that little cove.'

'It's a pity my boat's smashed,' said George, with a sigh for her lovely boat. 'And, I say - how are we going to get old Timmy down?'

There was a conference about this. Timmy couldn't climb down, that was certain. Jo remembered the rope still hanging down the side of the cliff to the ledges below - the one she had tied there to help Julian and Dick climb up the steep sides of the cliff.

'I know,' she said, her quick mind working hard again. 'You go down first, Julian, then Dick. Then George can go - each of you holding on to the rope as you climb down, in case you fall.'

'Then I'll haul up the rope and tie old Timmy to it, round his waist - and I'll lower him down to you. He's so sleepy still, he won't struggle. He won't even know what's happening!'

'But what about you?' said Dick. 'You'll be last of all. Will you mind? You'll be all alone up on this ledge, with the men coming behind you at any minute.'

'No, I don't mind,' said Jo. 'But let's be quick.'

Julian went down first, glad of the rope to hold to as his feet and hands searched for crevices and cracks. Then came Dick, almost slipping in his anxiety to get down.

Then George climbed down, slowly and anxiously, not at all liking the steep cliff. Once she glanced down to the sea below, and felt sick. She shut her eyes for a moment and clung with one hand to the rope.

It was a dreadful business getting Timmy down. George stood below, anxiously waiting. Jo found it very difficult to tie Timmy safely. He was big and heavy, and didn't like being tied up at all, though he really seemed hardly to know what was going on. At last Jo had got the knots well and securely tied, and called out to the others.

'Here he comes. Watch out that the rope doesn't break. Oh, dear - I wish he wouldn't struggle - now he's bumped himself against the cliff!'

It was not at all a nice experience for poor Timmy. He swung to and fro on the rope as he was slowly let down, and was amazed to find that he was suspended in mid air. Above him Jo panted and puffed.

'Oh, he's so awfully heavy! I hope I shan't have to let go. Look out for him!' she screamed.

The weight was too much for her just at the last, and the rope was let out with rather a rush. Fortunately Timmy was only about six feet up then, and Julian and George managed to catch him as he suddenly descended.

'I'm coming now,' called Jo, and without even holding the rope, or looking at it, she climbed down like a monkey, seeming to find handholds and footholds by magic. The others watched her admiringly. Soon she was standing beside them. George was untying Timmy.

'Thanks awfully, Jo,' said George, looking up gratefully at Jo. 'You're a wonder. Tim must have been frightfully heavy.'

'He was,' said Jo, giving him a pat. 'I nearly dropped him. Well - what's the next move?'

'We'll hunt round this queer little cove a bit and see if there's any place we can hide,' said Julian. 'You go that way, George, and we'll go this.'

They parted, and began to hunt for a hiding-place. As far as Julian and Dick could see there was none at all, at least on the side they were exploring. The sea swept into the cove, swelling and subsiding - and just outside the great waves battered on to the rocks. There was certainly no chance of swimming out.

There was suddenly an excited shriek from George. 'Ju! Come here. Look what I've found!'

They all rushed round to where George was standing, behind a big ledge of rock. She pointed to a great mass of something draped with seaweed.

'A boat! It's covered with seaweed - but it's a boat!'

'It's your boat!' yelled Dick, suddenly, and began to pull the fronds of seaweed madly off the hidden boat. 'Markhoff didn't smash it! It's here, perfectly all right. He couldn't find it - it was hidden so well with seaweed - so he just came back to Red and told him a lie.'

'He didn't smash it!' shouted Jo, and she, too, began to pull away the seaweed. 'It's quite all right - there's nothing wrong with it. He didn't smash it!'

The four children were so tremendously surprised and joyful that they thumped each other ridiculously on the back, and leapt about like mad things. They had their boat after all - George's good, sound boat. They could escape, hip hip hurrah!

A roar from above made them fall silent.

They gazed up, startled. Markhoff and the other two men were on the ledge far above, shouting and shaking their fists.

'You wait till we get you!' yelled Markhoff.

'Quick, quick!' said Julian, urgently, pulling at the boat. 'We've got just a chance. Pull her down to the water, pull hard!'

Markhoff was now coming down the cliff, and Jo wished she had untied the rope before she herself had climbed down, for Markhoff was finding it very useful. She tugged at the boat with the others, wishing it wasn't so heavy.

The boat was almost down to the water when something happened. Timmy, who had been gazing at everything in a most bewildered manner, suddenly slid off the ledge he was on and fell straight into the sea. George gave a scream.

'Oh, Timmy! He's in the water, quick, quick - he's too doped to swim! He'll drown!'

Julian and Dick didn't dare to stop heaving at the boat, because they could see that Markhoff would soon be down beside them. George rushed to Timmy, who was splashing around in the waves, still looking surprised and bemused.

But the water had an amazing effect on him. It was cold and it seemed to bring him to his senses quite suddenly. He became much more lively and swam strongly to the rock off which he had slipped. He clambered out with George's help, barking loudly.

The boat slid into the water, and Julian grabbed at George. 'Come on. In you get. Buck up!'

Jo was in the boat and so was Dick. George, trying to clutch at Timmy, was hauled in, too. Julian took a despairing look at Markhoff, who was almost at the end of the rope, about to jump down. They just wouldn't get off in time!

Timmy suddenly slipped out of George's grasp and tore madly over to the cliff barking warningly. He seemed to be perfectly all right. The sudden coldness of the sea had washed away all his dopeyness and sleepiness. Timmy was himself again!

Markhoff was about five feet above the ledge when he heard Timmy barking. He looked down in horror and saw the big dog trying to jump up at him. He tried to climb up quickly, out of Timmy's reach.

'Woof!' barked Timmy. 'Woof, woof, woof! Grrrrrrr!'

'Look out - he'll have your foot off!' yelled one of the men above on the ledge.

'He's mad - angry - he's savage. Look out Mark!'

Markhoff was looking out! He was terrified. He clambered up another few feet, and then found that Timmy was making runs at the cliff to try and get up after him. He went up a bit further and clung to the rope with one hand, afraid of falling and being pounced on by the furious Timmy.

'Come on, Timmy!' suddenly cried George. 'Come on!'

The four of them had now got the boat on the waves, and if only they had Timmy they could set off and row round the rocks at the cave entrance before Markhoff could possibly reach them.

'Timmy! Timmy!'

Timmy heard, cast a last regretful look at Markhoff's legs, and bounded across to the boat. He leapt right in and stood there, still barking madly.

Markhoff dropped down the rope to the ledge - but he was too late. The boat shot out to the entrance of the cove and rounded it. In half a minute it had disappeared round the rocky corner and was out at sea.

Julian and Dick rowed steadily. George put her arms round Timmy and buried her face in his fur. Jo did the same.

'He's all right again, quite all right,' said George, happily.

'Yes, falling into the cold water did it,' agreed Jo, ruffling up his fur. 'Good old Timmy!'

Timmy was now snuffling about in the bottom of the boat joyfully. He had smelt a lovely smell. Jo wondered what he had found. Then she knew.

'It's the packet of sandwiches we brought with us in the boat and never ate!' she cried. 'Good old Timmy - he's wolfing the lot!'

'Let him!' said Julian, pulling hard at the oars. 'He deserves them all! My word, it's nice to hear his bark again and see his tail wagging.'

And wag it certainly did. It never stopped. The world had come right again for Timmy, he could see and hear properly again, he could bark and caper and jump - and he had his beloved George with him once more.

'Now for home,' said Julian. 'Anne will be pleased to see us. Gosh, what a time we've had!'

Chapter 25
EVERYTHING OKAY

It was getting dark as George's boat came into Kirrin Bay. It had seemed a very long pull indeed, and everyone was tired out. The girls had helped in the rowing when the boys had almost collapsed from exhaustion, and Timmy had cheered everyone up by his sudden high spirits.

'Honestly, his tail hasn't stopped wagging since he got into the boat,' said George. 'He's so pleased to be himself again!'

A small figure was on the beach as they came in, half-lost in the darkness. It was Anne. She called out to them in a trembling voice.

'Is it really you? I've been watching for you all day long! Are you all right?'

'Rather! And we've got George and Timmy, too!' shouted back Dick, as the boat scraped on the shingle. 'We're fine!'

They jumped out, Timmy too, and hauled the boat up the beach. Anne gave a hand, almost crying with joy to have them all again.

'It's bad enough being in the middle of an adventure,' she said, 'but it's much, much worse when you're left out. I'll never be left out again!'

'Woof,' said Timmy, wagging his tail in full agreement. He never wanted to be left out of adventures either!

They all went home - rather slowly, because they were so tired. Joan was on the look-out for them, as she had been all day. She screamed for joy when she saw George. 'George! You've got George at last! Oh, you bad children, you've been away all day and I didn't know where and I've been worried to death. George, are you all right?'

'Yes, thank you,' said George, who felt as if she was about to fall asleep at any moment. 'I just want something to eat before I fall absolutely sound asleep!'

'But where have you been all day? What have you been doing?' cried Joan, as she bustled off to get them a meal.

'I got so worked up I went to the police - and what a silly I felt - I couldn't tell them where you'd gone or anything. All I could say was you'd gone to find a man called Red, and had rowed away in George's boat!'

'The police have been up and down the coast in a motor-boat ever since,' said Anne. 'Trying to spot you, but they couldn't.'

'No. Our boat was well hidden,' said Dick. 'And so were we! So well hidden that I began to think we'd stay hidden for the rest of our lives.'

The telephone bell rang. Julian jumped. 'Oh, good - you've had the telephone mended. I'll go and phone the police when you've answered this call, Joan.'

But it was the police themselves on the telephone, very pleased to hear Joan saying excitedly that all the children were back safely. 'We'll be up in ten minutes,' they said.

In ten minutes' time the five children and Timmy were tucking into a good meal. 'Don't stop,' said the police sergeant, when he came into the room with the constable the children had seen before. 'Just talk while you're eating.'

So they talked. They told about every single thing. First George told a bit, then Jo, then Dick then Julian. At first the sergeant was bewildered, but then the bits of information began to piece themselves together in his mind like a jigsaw puzzle.

'Will my father go to prison?' asked Jo.

'I'm afraid so,' said the sergeant.

'Bad luck, Jo,' said Dick.

'I don't mind,' said Jo. 'I'm better off when he's away - I don't have to do things he tells me then.'

'We'll see if we can't fix you up with a nice home,' said the sergeant kindly. 'You've run wild, Jo - you want looking after.'

'I don't want to go to a Home for Bad Girls,' said Jo, looking scared.

'I shan't let you,' said Dick. 'You're one of the pluckiest kids I've ever known. We'll none of us let you go to a Home. We'll find someone who'll be kind to you someone like - like...'

'Like me,' said Joan, who was listening, and she put her arm round Jo and gave her a squeeze. 'I've got a cousin who'd like a ragamuffin like you - a bad little girl with a very good heart. Don't you fret. We'll look after you.'

'I wouldn't mind living with somebody like you,' said Jo, in an offhand way. 'I wouldn't be mean any more then, and I daresay I wouldn't be bad. I'd like to see Dick and all of you sometimes, though.'

'You will if you're good,' said Dick, with a grin. 'But mind - if I ever hear you've got in at anyone's pantry window again, or anything like that, I'll never see you again!'

Jo grinned. She was very happy. She suddenly remembered something and put her hand into the little rush basket she still carried. She took out an enormous key.

'Here you are,' she said to the sergeant. 'Here's the key to the tower room. I bet Red and the others are still locked up there, ready for you to catch! My, won't they get a shock when you unlock the door and walk in!'

'Quite a lot of people are going to get shocks,' said the sergeant, putting away his very full notebook. 'Miss Georgina, you're lucky to get away unharmed, you and your dog. By the way, we got in touch with a friend of your father's, when we tried to find out about those papers that were stolen. He says your father gave him all his important American papers before he went - so this fellow Red hasn't anything of value at all. He went to all his trouble for nothing.'

'Do you know anything about Red?' asked Julian. 'He seemed a bit mad to me.'

'If he's the fellow we think he is, he's not very sane,' said the sergeant. 'We'll be glad to have him under lock and key - and that man Markhoff too. He's not as clever as Red, but he's dangerous.'

'I hope he hasn't escaped in that helicopter,' said Dick. 'He meant to go tonight.'

'Well, we'll be there in under an hour or so,' said the sergeant. 'I'll just use your telephone, if I may, and set things going.'

Things were certainly set going that night! Cars roared up to Red's house, and the gate was broken in when no one came to open it. The helicopter was still in the yard - but alas! it was on its side, smashed beyond repair. The children were told afterwards that Markhoff and the other two men had tried to set off in it, but there was something wrong - and it had risen some way and then fallen back to the yard.

The old woman was trying to look after the three hurt men, who had crawled from their seats and gone to bathe their cuts and bruises. Markhoff had hurt his head, and showed no fight at all.

'And what about Red?' the sergeant asked Markhoff. 'Is he still locked up?'

'Yes,' said Markhoff, savagely. 'And a good thing, too. You'll have to break that door down with a battering-ram to get him and the others out.'

'Oh no, we shan't,' said the sergeant, and produced the key. Markhoff stared at it.

'That kid!' he said. 'She gave me the key of the larder. Wait till I get her - she'll be sorry.'

'It'll be a long wait, Markhoff,' said the sergeant. 'A long, long wait. We'll have to take you off with us, I'm afraid.'

Red, Simmy and Jake were still locked up, and were mad with rage. But they saw that the game was up, and it wasn't long before all of them were safely tucked away in police cars.

'A very, very nice little haul,' said the sergeant to one of his men. 'Very neat, too - three of them all locked up ready for us!'

'What about that kid, Jo?' said the man. 'She seems a bad lot, and as clever as they make them!'

'She's going to have a chance now,' said the sergeant. 'Everybody has a chance sometimes, and this is hers. She's just about half-and-half. I reckon - half bad and half good. But she'll be all right now she's got a chance!'

Jo was sleeping in Joan's room again. The rest were in their own bedrooms, getting ready for bed. They suddenly didn't feel sleepy any more. Timmy especially was very lively, darting in and out of the rooms, and sending the landing mats sliding about all over the place.

'Timmy! If you jump on my bed again I'll slam the door on you!' threatened Anne. But she didn't, of course. It was so lovely to see old Timmy quite himself once more.

The telephone bell suddenly rang, and made everyone jump.

'Now what's up?' said Julian, and went down in the hall to answer it. A voice spoke in his ear.

'Is that Kirrin 011? This is Telegrams. There is a cable for you, with reply prepaid. I am now going to read it.'

'Go ahead,' said Julian.

'It is from Seville in Spain,' said the voice, 'and reads as follows:

"HERE IS OUR ADDRESS. PLEASE CABLE BACK SAYING IF EVERYTHING ALL RIGHT - UNCLE QUENTIN".'

Julian repeated the message to the others, who had now crowded round him in the hall. 'What reply shall I give?' he asked. 'No good upsetting them now everything is over!'

'Not a bit of good,' said Dick. 'Say what you like!'

'Right!' said Julian, and turned to the telephone again. 'Hallo - here is the reply message, please. Ready?

"HAVING A MOST EXCITING TIME, WITH LOTS OF FUN AND GAMES, EVERYTHING OKAY - JULIAN".'

'Everything okay,' repeated Anne, as they went upstairs to bed once more. 'That's what I like to hear at the end of an adventure. Everything okay.'

THE END

Enid Blyton

THE
FAMOUS
FIVE

FIVE ON A HIKE TOGETHER

ENID BLYTON

FAMOUS FIVE 10

Five On A Hike Together

Contents

| | | |
|----|-------------------------------------|----|
| 1 | A Letter From Julian | 2 |
| 2 | Setting Off | 6 |
| 3 | Across The Countryside | 10 |
| 4 | George Is Worried | 14 |
| 5 | Anne And Dick | 18 |
| 6 | In The Middle Of The Night | 23 |
| 7 | In The Morning | 27 |
| 8 | All Together Again | 31 |
| 9 | Dick Surprises The Others | 35 |
| 10 | An Angry Policeman And A Fine Lunch | 39 |
| 11 | Julian's Idea | 44 |
| 12 | A Hiding Place At Two-Trees | 48 |
| 13 | A Night In The Cellar | 52 |
| 14 | Where Is The 'Saucy Jane'? | 56 |
| 15 | Maggie - And Dirty Dick | 60 |
| 16 | Out On The Raft | 65 |
| 17 | Tit For Tat! | 69 |
| 18 | A Very Exciting Time | 73 |
| 19 | Maggie And Dick Are Annoyed | 77 |
| 20 | In The Moonlight | 81 |
| 21 | The Sack At Last! | 86 |
| 22 | An Exciting Finish | 90 |

Chapter 1
A LETTER FROM JULIAN

'Anne!' shouted George, running after her cousin as she went along to her classroom. 'Anne! I've just been down to the letter board and there's a letter from your brother Julian, I've brought it for you.'

Anne stopped. 'Oh thanks,' she said. 'What can Julian want? He only wrote a few days ago - it's most extraordinary for him to write again so soon. It must be something important.'

'Well, open it and see,' said George. 'Hurry up - I've got a maths class to go to.'

Anne ripped open the envelope. She pulled out a sheet of notepaper and read it quickly. She looked up at George, her eyes shining.

'George! Julian and Dick have got a few days off at our half-term week-end! Somebody's won a wonderful scholarship or something, and the boys have got two days tacked on to a week-end to celebrate! They want us to join them in a hike, and all go off together.'

'What a glorious idea!' said George, 'Good old Julian. I bet he thought of that. Let's read the letter, Anne.'

But before she could read it a mistress came along. 'Georgina! You should be in class - and you too, Anne.'

George scowled. She hated to be called by her full name. She went off without a word. Anne tucked the letter into her pocket and rushed off joyfully. Half-term with her brothers, Julian and Dick - and with George and Timmy the dog. Could anything be better?

She and George talked about it again after morning school. 'We get from Friday morning till Tuesday,' said George. 'The boys are getting the same. What luck! They don't usually have a half-term in the winter term.'

'They can't go home because the painters are in our house,' said Anne. 'That's why I was going home with you, of course. But I'm sure your mother won't mind if we go off with the boys. Your father never likes us in the middle of the term.'

'No, he doesn't,' said George, 'He's always deep in the middle of some wonderful idea, and he hates to be disturbed. It will suit everyone if we go off on a hike.'

'Julian says he will telephone to us tonight and arrange everything,' said Anne. 'I hope it will be a nice fine week-end. It will still be October, so there's a chance of a bit of warm sunshine.'

'The woods will be beautiful,' said George. 'And won't Timmy enjoy himself, Let's go and tell him the news.'

The boarding-school that the two girls were at was one that allowed the children to bring their own pets to school. There were kennels down in the yard for various dogs, and Timmy lived there during term-time. The two girls went to get him.

He heard their footsteps at once and began to bark excitedly. He scraped at the gate of the kennel yard, wishing for the thousandth time that he could find out how to open it.

He flung himself on the two girls, licking and pawing and barking.

'Silly dog. Mad dog!' said George, and thumped his back affectionately. 'Listen, Tim - we're going off for the week-end with Julian and Dick! What do you think of that? We're going on a hike, so you'll love it. All through the woods and up the hills and goodness knows where!'

Timmy seemed to understand every word. He cocked up his ears, put his head on one side and listened intently while George was speaking.

'Woof,' he said, at the end, as if he approved thoroughly. Then off he went with the girls for his walk, his plummy tail wagging happily. He didn't like term-time nearly as much as the holidays - but he was quite prepared to put up with kennel life so long as he could be near his beloved George.

Julian rang up that night as he had promised. He had got everything planned already. Anne listened, thrilled.

'It sounds super,' she said. 'Yes - we can meet where you say, and we'll be there as near as we can on time. Anyway, we can wait about if you others aren't there. Yes - we'll bring the things you say. Oh Julian, won't it be fun?'

'What's he say?' asked George impatiently when at last Anne put the receiver down. 'You might have let me have a word with Julian. I wanted to tell him all about Timmy.'

'He doesn't want to waste an expensive telephone call listening to you raving about Timmy,' said Anne. 'He asked how he was and I said "fine", and that's all he wanted to know about Tim. He's made all the arrangements. I'll tell you what they are.'

The girls went off to a corner of their common-room and sat down. Timmy was there too. He was allowed in at certain times, and so were three other dogs belonging to the girls. Each dog behaved well - he knew that if he didn't he would be taken back to the kennels at once!

'Julian says that he and Dick can get off immediately after breakfast,' said Anne. 'So can we, so that's all right. He says we've got to take very little with us - just night-things, tooth-brush, hair-brush and flannel and a rolled-up mac. And any biscuits or chocolate we can buy. Have you any money left?'

'A bit,' said George. 'Not much. Enough to buy a few bars of chocolate, I think. Anyway, you've got all the biscuits your mother sent last week. We can take some of those.'

'Yes. And the barley sugar one of my aunts sent,' said Anne. 'But Julian says we're not to take much because this is to be a proper hike, and we'll get tired if we have to carry a heavy load. Oh, he said put in two pairs of extra socks.'

'Right,' said George, and she patted Timmy who was lying close beside her. 'There's going to be a long walky-walk, Tim. Won't you love that!'

Timmy grunted comfortably. He wondered if there would be any rabbits on the walk. A walk wasn't really exciting unless there were rabbits all over the place. Timmy thought it was a pity that rabbits were allowed to live down holes. They always disappeared most unfairly just when he had nearly caught one!

Anne and George went to see their house-mistress to tell her that they were not going to Kirrin Cottage after all, but were going walking.

'My brother says he has written to you,' said Anne. 'So you'll know all about it tomorrow, Miss Peters. And George's mother will be writing too. We can go, can't we?'

'Oh, yes - it will be a lovely half-term for you!' said Miss Peters. 'Especially if this sunny weather lasts. Where are you going?'

'Over the moors,' said Anne. 'In the very loneliest, most deserted parts that Julian can find! We might see deer and wild ponies and perhaps even a few badgers. We shall walk and walk.'

'But where will you sleep if the parts you are going to are so very lonely?' asked Miss Peters.

'Oh Julian is arranging all that,' said George. 'He's been looking up little inns and farm-houses on the map, and we shall make for those at night. It will be too cold to sleep out of doors.'

'It certainly will!' said Miss Peters. 'Well don't get into trouble, that's all I know what you five are when you get together. I imagine Timmy is going with you too?'

'Of course!' said George. 'I wouldn't go if he didn't go! I couldn't leave him here alone.'

The two girls got their things ready as Friday came near. The biscuits were taken out of the tin and put into paper bags. The barley sugar was put into a bag too, and the bars of chocolate.

Both girls had rucksacks with straps for their shoulders. They packed and repacked them several times. One by one more and more things were added. Anne felt she must take a book to read. George said they must each take a torch with a new battery.

'And what about biscuits for Timmy?' she said. 'I simply must take something for him. He'd like a bone too - a big one that he can chew and chew and that I can put back into the bag for another time.'

'Well, let me carry all the biscuits and chocolate then if you're going to put a smelly old bone into your bag,' said Anne. 'I don't see why you want to take anything for Timmy - he can always have something to eat when we do - wherever we have a meal.'

George decided not to take the bone. She had fetched one from his kennel, and it certainly was big and heavy, and equally certainly it was smelly. She took it back to the kennel again, Timmy following her rather puzzled. Why keep carrying his bone here and there? He didn't approve at all.

It seemed a long time till Friday, but at last it came. Both girls woke up very early indeed. George was out in the kennels before breakfast, brushing and combing Timmy to make him look spruce and tidy for Julian and Dick. He knew it was the day they were to set off and he was as excited as the two girls.

'We'd better eat a good breakfast,' said Anne. 'We might have to wait some time before our next meal. Let's slip off immediately after breakfast. It's lovely to feel free of school and bells and timetables - but I shan't feel really free till I'm outside the school grounds!'

They ate an enormous breakfast though really they were too excited to want much. Then they got their rucksacks, ready-packed the night before, said goodbye to Miss Peters, and went to fetch Timmy.

He was waiting impatiently for them, and barked madly when they came near. In a trice he was out of his kennel-yard and capering round them, almost tripping them up.

'Good-bye, Anne and George!' yelled one of their friends. 'Have a good time on your hike - and it's no good coming back on Tuesday and telling us you've had one of your usual hair-raising adventures, because we just shan't believe it!'

'Woof,' said Timmy, 'Woof, woof!' Which meant that he was going to have adventures with hundreds of rabbits, anyway!

Chapter 2
SETTING OFF

Julian and Dick were also on their way, very pleased to have such an unexpectedly long week-end.

'I never liked Willis or Johnson much,' said Dick, as they walked out of the school grounds. 'Awful swotters they were - never had any time for games or fun. But I take my hat off to them today! Because of their swotting they've won medals and scholarships and goodness knows what - and we've got a week-end off in celebration! Good old Willis and Johnson!'

'Hear hear,' said Dick. 'But I bet they'll sit in a corner with their books all the week-end - they won't know if it's a brilliant day like this, or pouring with rain like yesterday! Poor mutts!'

'They'd hate to go off on a hike,' said Julian. 'It would be utter misery to them. Do you remember how awful Johnson was at rugger? He never knew which goal he was playing against - always ran the wrong way!'

'Yes. But he must have got terrific brains,' said Dick. 'Why are we talking about Willis and Johnson? I can think of plenty of more interesting things. Anne and George, for instance - and old Tim. I hope they'll manage to get off in time all right.'

Julian had carefully looked up a large-scale map of the moors that lay between the two schools that he and the girls went to. They were vast stretches of lonely heathery land, dotted with farms here and there, with a few small cottages, and some inns.

'We'll keep right off the main roads, and the second-and third-grades,' he said. 'We'll take the little lanes and paths. I wonder what Timmy will say if we see deer. He'll wonder what in the world they are!'

'He'll only be interested in rabbits,' said Dick. 'I hope he's not as fat as he was last hols. I think we must have given him too many ice-creams and too much chocolate!'

'Well, he won't get that in term-time!' said Julian. 'The girls don't get as much pocket money as we do. Buck up - there's the bus!'

They ran for the little country bus that rumbled along the country lanes, taking people to market, or to the tiny villages that lay here and there tucked away in the moor. It stopped most obligingly for them, and they leapt in.

'Ha! Running away from school?' said the conductor. 'Have to report you, you know!'

'Very funny,' said Julian, bored at this joke, which the conductor produced regularly every time a boy got on board with a rucksack over his shoulders.

They had to get out at the next village and cut across country to get to another bus- route. They managed to catch a bus there easily and settled down comfortably in their seats. It was half an hour's run from there to where they had planned to meet the girls.

'Here you are, young sirs,' called the conductor, as the bus ran into a village. It had a wide green on which geese cackled, and a small pond for ducks. 'You wanted Pippin Village, didn't you? We don't go any farther - we just turn round and go back.'

'Thanks,' said the boys and got out. 'Now - are the girls here or not?' said Julian. 'They have to walk from a tiny railway station about two miles away.'

They were not there. Julian and Dick went to have a drink of orangeade at the village store. They had hardly finished when they saw the two girls looking in at the door.

'Julian! Dick! We guessed you'd be eating or drinking!' said Anne, and she rushed at her brothers. 'We came as quickly as we could. The engine broke down - it was such a funny little train! All the passengers got out and advised the engine-driver what todo!'

'Hallo!' said Julian, and gave Anne a hug. He was very fond of his young sister. 'Hallo, George! My, you've grown fat, haven't you?'

'I have not,' said George, indignantly. 'And Timmy isn't fat either, so don't tell him he is.'

'Julian's pulling your leg as usual,' said Dick, giving George a friendly slap on the back. 'All the same, you've grown a bit - you'll soon be as tall as I am. Hallo, Timmy! Good dog, fine dog! Tongue as wet as usual? Yes, it is! I never knew a dog with a wetter tongue than yours!'

Timmy went nearly mad with joy at being with all four of his friends. He leapt round them, barking, wagging his long tail and sending a pile of tins crashing to the floor in his delight.

'Now, now!' said the shop-woman, emerging from a dark little room at the back, 'Take that dog out. He's gone mad!'

'Don't you girls want a drink of ginger-beer or something?' asked Julian, getting hold of Timmy's collar. 'You'd better, because we don't want to have to carry heavy bottles of drinkables with us.'

'Where are we going to set off to?' asked George. 'Yes, I'd like ginger-beer please. Get down, Timmy. Anyone would think you'd been away from Julian and Dick for at least ten years!'

'It probably does seem like ten years to him,' said Anne. 'I say - are those sandwiches?'

She pointed to a ledge at the back of the counter. There was a little pile of sandwiches there, looking most appetizing.

'Yes, they're sandwiches, Miss,' said the shop-woman, opening two bottles of ginger-beer. 'I've made them for my son who works over at Blackbush Farm - he'll be in for them soon.'

'I suppose you couldn't make us some, could you?' asked Julian, 'We wouldn't need to bother about trying to get to some village at lunch time then. They look jolly good.'

'Yes. I can make you all you want,' said the shop-woman, putting two glasses down in front of the girls, 'What do you want - cheese, egg, ham or pork?'

'Well - we'd like some of all of those,' said Julian, 'The bread looks so nice too.'

'I make it myself,' said the woman, pleased, 'All right - I'll go and make you some. You tell me if anyone comes into the shop while I'm gone.'

She disappeared. 'That's good,' said Julian. 'If she makes plenty of those we can avoid villages all the day and have a really good day of exploration - treading where no foot has trod before and all that!'

'How many can you manage each?' asked the woman, suddenly reappearing. 'My son, he has six - that's twelve rounds of bread.'

'Well - could you manage eight sandwiches for each of us?' said Julian. The woman looked astonished. 'It's to last us all day,' he explained, and she nodded and disappeared again.

'That's a nice little sum for her,' said Anne. 'Eight sandwiches each, making sixteen rounds of bread - for four people!'

'Well, let's hope she's got a bread-cutting machine!' said Dick. 'Or we'll be here for keeps! Hallo - who's this?'

A tall man appeared at the entrance of the shop, a bicycle in his hand. 'Ma!' he called.

The children guessed who he was at once - the son who worked over at Blackbush Farm. He had come for his sandwiches!

'Your mother is hard at work cutting sixty-four rounds of bread,' said Dick. 'Shall I get her for you?'

'No. I'm in a hurry,' said the man and he set his bicycle by the door, came in, reached over the counter for his sandwiches and then went back to his bicycle.

'Tell my mother I've been in,' he said, 'And you might tell her I'll be late home today - got to take some stuff to the prison.'

He was off at once, sailing away down the road on his bicycle. The old woman suddenly came in, a knife in one hand, a loaf in the other.

'Did I hear Jim?' she said. 'Oh yes - he's got his sandwiches. You should have told me he was in!' 'He said he was in a hurry,' explained Julian. 'And he said we were to tell you he'd be late today because he had to take some stuff to the prison.'

'I've got another son there,' said the woman. The four looked at her. Did she mean he was a prisoner? And what prison?

She guessed their thoughts and smiled. 'Oh, my Tom isn't a prisoner!' she said. 'He's a warder - a fine fellow. Not a nice job there though - I'm always afraid of those men in prison - a fierce lot, a bad lot!'

'Yes - I've heard there is a big prison on this moor,' said Julian. 'It's marked on our map too. We're not going near it, of course.'

'No. Don't you take the girls near there,' said the woman, disappearing again. 'If I don't get on with your sandwiches you'll not have them before tomorrow morning.'

Only one customer came in while the children were waiting - a solemn old man smoking a clay pipe. He looked round the shop, couldn't see the woman, took a packet of blancmange powder, which he slipped into his pocket, and put the money down on the counter.

'Tell 'er when 'er comes,' he mumbled with his pipe still in his mouth, and out he shuffled. Timmy growled. The old man smelt very unwashed and Timmy didn't like him.

At last the sandwiches were finished and the old woman appeared again. She had packed them up neatly in four parcels of grease-proof paper, and had pencilled on each what they were, Julian read what she had written and winked at the others.

'My word - we're in for a grand time!' he said. 'Cheese, Pork, Ham and Egg - and what's this?'

'Oh, that's four slices of my home-made fruit cake,' said the old woman. 'I'm not charging you for that, It's just so that you can taste it!'

'It looks like half the cake!' said Julian, touched, 'But we shall pay for it, with many thanks. How much is all that?'

She told him. Julian put down the money and added some extra for the cake. 'There you are, and many thanks,' he said. 'And that money there was left by an old fellow with a clay pipe who took a packet of blancmange powder.'

'That would be Old Man Gupps,' said the woman. 'Well, I hope you'll enjoy your tour. Come back here if you want any more sandwiches cut! If you eat all those today you won't do badly!'

'Woof,' said Timmy, hoping that he too would share a few. The woman produced a bone for him, and he took it up in his mouth.

'Thanks!' Julian said. 'Come on - now we'll really start!'

Chapter 3

ACROSS THE COUNTRYSIDE

They set off at last, Timmy running in front. School already seemed far behind them. The October sun shone down warmly, and the trees in the village glowed yellow and red and golden, dressed in their autumn colourings. A few leaves floated down in the breeze, but not until there was a real frost would many come whirling down.

'It's a heavenly day,' said George. 'I wish I hadn't got my blazer on. I'm cooked already.'

'Well, take it off and carry it over your shoulder,' said Julian. 'I'm going to do the same. Our jerseys are quite warm enough today!'

They took off their thick blazers and carried them. Each of them had a rucksack, a mac rolled up tightly and tied to it, and now a blazer to carry. But none of them noticed the weight at the outset of their day.

'I'm glad you girls took my advice and wore your thickest shoes,' said Julian, looking with approval at their brogues. 'Some of our walking may be wet. Have you got changes of socks?'

'Yes. We brought everything you told us to,' said Anne. 'Your rucksack looks a bit fuller than ours, Ju!'

'Well, I've got maps and things in it,' said Julian. 'It's a queer place, this moor - miles and miles and miles of it! Queer names on it too - Blind Valley - Rabbit Hill - Lost Lake - Coney Copse!'

'Rabbit Hill! Timmy would love that,' said George, and Timmy pricked up his ears. Rabbits? Ah, that was the kind of place he liked!

'Well, actually we're going towards Rabbit Hill now,' said Julian, 'And after that there's Coney Copse, and as coney is a country word for rabbit, Timmy ought to enjoy himself!'

'Woof,' said Timmy joyfully and bounded ahead. He felt very happy. His four friends were with him, their rucksacks were full of delicious-smelling sandwiches, and a long, long walk lay ahead, teeming, he hoped with rabbits!

It was lovely walking along in the sun. They soon left the little village behind and took a winding lane. The hedges on either side became so high that the four couldn't see over the tops at all.

'What a sunken lane!' said Dick. 'I feel as if I'm walking in a tunnel! And how narrow! I wouldn't like to drive a car along this lane. If I met another car I might have to back for miles!'

'We shan't meet anyone much,' said Julian, 'It's only in the summer that cars come along these lanes - people on holiday, touring round the countryside. Look - we take that path now - it leads to Rabbit Hill, according to the map!'

They climbed over a stile in the high hedge and walked over a field towards a curious little hill. Timmy suddenly went mad with excitement. He could smell rabbits - and he could see them too!

'You don't often see so many rabbits out in the daytime,' said George, surprised. 'Big ones and little ones too - what a scampering.'

They came to the hill and sat down quietly to watch the rabbits. But it was quite impossible to make Timmy do the same. The sight and smell of so many made him quite wild. He pulled away from George's hand and went bounding madly up the hill, scattering rabbits by the dozen.

'Timmy!' yelled George, but for once Timmy paid no attention. He rushed here and rushed there, getting very angry as first one rabbit and then another neatly popped down a hole.

'It's no use calling him,' said Dick. 'He won't catch one, anyway - see how nippy they are, It's my belief they're having a game with our Timmy!'

It did look rather like it. As soon as Timmy had chased two or three rabbits down one hole, a few more would pop up from another behind him. The children laughed. It was as good as a pantomime.

'Where do you mean to have lunch?' asked Anne, 'If we stay here much longer I shall really have to have something to eat - and it's not nearly time yet. I wish I didn't always feel so hungry in the open air.'

'Well, come on then,' said Julian. 'We've got some way to go before we get to our lunch- place. I've made a pretty good time-table of our tour - we're going to go all round the moors and finish at the place we started at! I've really marked it all out pretty well.'

'Do we sleep at farm-houses or something at night?' asked George. 'I should like that. Will they mind having us, do you think? Or do we go to inns?'

'Farm-houses for two nights and inns for the other nights,' said Julian. 'I've marked them all.'

They went up Rabbit Hill and down the other side. There were just as many rabbits there. Timmy chased them till he panted like an engine going uphill! His tongue hung out, dripping wet.

'You've had enough, Tim,' said George. 'Be sensible now.'

But Timmy couldn't be sensible with so many rabbits about. So they left him to chase and dart and race at top speed and went on down the hill. Timmy came rushing after them when they got to the bottom.

'Now perhaps you'll stop tearing about like a mad thing and walk with us,' scolded George. But she spoke too soon, for soon they were in a small wood which Julian informed them was Coney Copse.

'And as I told you, coney means rabbit, so you can't expect Timmy to stop being mad just yet,' said Julian.

They very nearly lost Timmy in Coney Copse. A rabbit disappeared down a very big hole, and Timmy was actually able to get down a little way. Then he got stuck. He scabbled violently with his feet but it was no good. He was well and truly stuck.

The others soon discovered he wasn't with them and went back, calling. Quite by chance they came on the hole he was in and heard the sound of panting and scraping. A shower of sand flew out of the hole.

'There he is! The idiot, he's down a hole,' said George in alarm, 'Timmy! TIMMY! Come on out!' There was nothing that Timmy would have liked better, but he couldn't come out, however much he tried. A root of a tree had got wedged into his back, and he couldn't seem to push himself out again, past the annoying root.

It took the four children twenty minutes to get Timmy out. Anne had to lie down and wriggle in a little way to reach him. She was the only one small enough to get into the hole.

She caught hold of Timmy's back legs and pulled hard. Somehow the root slid off his back and he came backwards. He whined loudly.

'Oh Anne, you're hurting him, you're hurting him!' shouted George. 'Let him go!'

'I can't!' yelled back Anne. 'He'll only go down deeper, if I leave go his legs. Can you pull me out? If so Timmy will come too - he'll have to because I've got his legs!'

Poor Anne was pulled out by her legs, and poor Timmy came too, pulled by his. He whined and went to George.

'He's hurt himself somewhere,' said George anxiously. 'I know he has. He wouldn't whine like that if he wasn't hurt.'

She ran her fingers over him, pressing here and there. She examined each leg and each paw. She looked at his head. Still he whined. Where could he have hurt himself?

'Leave him,' said Julian, at last. 'I can't see that he's hurt anywhere - except in his feelings! He probably didn't like Anne hauling him out by his hind legs. Most undignified!'

George wasn't satisfied. Although she could find nothing wrong, she couldn't help being sure that Timmy had hurt himself somewhere. Ought he to see a vet?

'Don't be silly, George,' said Julian. 'Vets don't grow on trees in a moorland country like this! Let's go on walking, You'll see Timmy will follow quite all right, and soon forget to whine. I tell you, he's hurt his doggy feelings, that's all. His vanity is wounded!'

They left Coney Copse and went on, George rather silent. Timmy trotted beside her, also rather quiet. Still, there really didn't seem anything the matter with him, except that he gave sudden little whines now and again.

'Now here's where I thought we might have our lunch,' said Julian, at last, 'Fallaway Hill! It's a good name for it too - it falls away steeply, and we've got a marvellous view.'

So they had. They had come to the top of a steep hill, not guessing that it fell away on the other side. They could sit on the tip and see the sun shining on miles and miles of lonely heather-grown moor. They might see shy deer in the distance - or little wild ponies.

'This is heavenly,' said Anne, sitting down on a great tuft of heather. 'It's as warm as summer too! I do hope it's like this all over the week-end. We shall all be burnt brown!'

'It will also be heavenly having some of those sandwiches,' said Dick, choosing a lump of heather too. 'What comfortable seats are provided for us! I've a good mind to take a tuft of this heather back to school with me to put on the very hard chair that goes with my desk!'

Julian put the four packets of sandwiches down in the heather. Anne undid them. They looked wonderful!

'Super!' said Anne. 'What do you want first?'

'Well, speaking for myself I'm going to have one of each, put them all on top of one another, and have a huge bite of cheese, ham, pork and egg at once,' said Dick. Anne laughed.

'Even your mouth isn't big enough for that,' she said. But somehow Dick managed, though it was difficult.

'Disgusting behaviour,' he said, when he had managed the first mouthful. 'I think on the whole that one at a time is more economical. Hie, Timmy - have a bit?'

Timmy obliged. He was very quiet, and George was still anxious about him. Still, his appetite seemed remarkably good, so nobody but George wondered any more if he had hurt himself. He lay beside George, occasionally putting a great paw on her knee if he wanted another bit of sandwich.

'Timmy does jolly well,' said Dick, with his mouth full. 'He gets bits from us all. I bet he eats more than any of us. I say - did anyone ever taste such smashing sandwiches? Have you tried the pork? It must have come from a super pig!'

It was lovely sitting there in the sun, looking over miles of countryside, eating hungrily. They all felt very happy. Except George. Was there anything wrong with Timmy? It would spoil the whole week-end if so!

Chapter 4

GEORGE IS WORRIED

They lazed for some time in the sun after they had finished their meal. There were three sandwiches each left, and half a piece each of the fruit cake. No one had been able to manage a whole piece, much as they would have liked to.

Timmy seemed to think he could finish all the cake that was left, but Julian said no. 'It's such a gorgeous cake it would be really wasted on Timmy,' he said. 'You've had enough, Tim. Greedy dog!'

'Woof,' said Timmy, wagging his tail, and eyeing the cake watchfully. He sighed when he saw it being packed up. He had only had a bit of George's half-slice - what a cake!

'I'll pack three sandwiches and a half-slice of the cake into each of four bags,' said Julian, 'Anyone can eat his or hers whenever they like. I expect we shall have a good meal at the farmhouse I've chosen for tonight, so you can eat when you like before then.'

'I don't feel as if I could eat anything till tomorrow morning,' said Anne, putting her bag of food into her rucksack. 'But it's odd how hungry you keep on getting, even if you feel you can't possibly be for hours and hours.'

'Well, Timmy can wolf anything you don't want,' said Julian. 'Nothing wasted when Tim's about. Now are we all ready? We're going through a little village soon, where we'll stop for a drink. I could do with a ginger-beer. And then on we go to our farm-house. We ought to try and arrive about five, because it gets dark so soon.'

'What's the farm-house called?' asked Anne.

'Blue Pond Farm,' said Julian. 'Nice name, isn't it? I hope it's still got a blue pond.'

'Suppose they haven't room for us?' said Anne.

'Oh, they can always put a couple of girls somewhere,' said Julian. 'Dick and I can sleep in a barn if necessary. We're not particular!'

'I'd like to sleep in a barn too,' said Anne, 'I'd love to. Let's not ask for a bedroom, let's all sleep in a barn - on straw or hay or something.'

'No,' said Julian. 'You girls will have to be in the house. It gets cold at night, and we've brought no rugs. We boys will be all right with our macs over us. I'm not letting you two girls do that.'

'It's stupid being a girl!' said George, for about the millionth time in her life. 'Always having to be careful when boys can do as they like! I'm going to sleep in a barn, anyway. I don't care what you say, Ju!'

'Oh yes you do,' said Julian, 'You know quite well that if ever you go against the orders of the chief - that's me, my girl, in case you didn't know it - you won't come out with us again. You may look like a boy and behave like a boy, but you're a girl all the same. And like it or not, girls have got to be taken care of.'

'I should have thought that boys hated having to take care of girls,' said George, sulkily. 'Especially girls like me who don't like it.'

'Well, decent boys like looking after their girl cousins or their sisters,' said Julian, 'And oddly enough decent girls like it. But I won't count you as a girl, George, decent or otherwise. I'll merely count you as a boy who's got to have an eye on him - my eye, see? So take that look off your face, and don't make yourself any more difficult than you already are.'

George couldn't help laughing, and the sulky look went at once. She gave Julian a punch. 'All right. You win. You're so jolly domineering these days I feel quite afraid of you!'

'You're not afraid of anyone,' said Dick. 'You're the bravest girl I ever knew! Aha! That's made old George blush like a girl! Let me warm my hands, George!'

And Dick held his hands up in front of George's scarlet face, pretending to warm them at her fiery blush. She didn't know whether to be pleased or angry. She pushed his hands away and got up, looking more like a boy than ever with her short tousled hair and her well-freckled face!

The others got up and stretched. Then they settled their rucksacks on their backs again, with their macs fastened to them, threw their blazers over their shoulders and set off down Fallaway Hill.

Timmy followed, but he didn't bound about as usual. He went slowly and carefully. George looked round for him, and frowned.

'What is the matter with Timmy?' she said. 'Look at him! Not a jump or a scamper in him!'

They all stopped and watched him. He came towards them and they saw that he was limping slightly with his left hind leg. George dropped down beside him and felt the leg carefully.

'I think he must have twisted it - sprained it or something, when he was down that rabbit-hole,' she said. She patted him gently on the back and he winced.

'What's the matter, Tim?' said George, and she parted the hair on his back, examining the white skin underneath to see why he had winced when she had patted him.

'He's got an awful bruise here,' she said at last, and the others bent to see. 'Something must have hurt his back down in that hole. And Anne must have hurt one of his legs when she held on to them and dragged him out. I told you not to hold on to his legs, Anne.'

'Well, how were we to get him out if I didn't?' demanded Anne, feeling cross but rather guilty.

'Did you want him to stick there for days and days?'

'I don't think there's much damage done,' said Julian, feeling the hind leg. 'I honestly think he's only just twisted it a bit, George. He'll be all right after tonight, I'm sure.'

'But I must be certain,' said George. 'Did you say we come to a village soon, Ju?'

'Yes - Beacons Village,' said Julian, 'We can ask if there's a vet anywhere in the district if you like. He'll look at Timmy's leg and tell you if there's anything much wrong. But I don't think there is.'

'We'll go on to the village then,' said George. 'Oh dear - the only time I ever wish Timmy was a little dog is when he's hurt - because he's so very very heavy to carry.'

'Well, don't think of carrying him yet,' said Dick. 'He can walk on three legs even if he can't on four! He's not as bad as all that, are you, Timmy?'

'Woof,' said Timmy, mournfully. He was rather enjoying all the fuss. George patted his head.

'Come on,' she said, 'we'll soon get that leg put right. Come on, Tim.'

They all went on, looking round to see how Timmy was getting on. He followed slowly, and then began to limp more badly. Finally he lifted his left hind leg up from the ground and ran on three legs only.

'Poor boy,' said George. 'Poor Timmy! I do hope his leg will be all right tomorrow. I can't possibly go on with the hike if it isn't.'

It was rather a gloomy company that came to Beacons Village. Julian made his way to a little inn that stood in the middle, called Three Shepherds.

A woman was shaking a duster out of a window. Julian called up to her.

'I say! Is there a vet anywhere in this district? I want someone to have a look at our dog's leg.'

'No. No vet here,' answered the woman. 'Not one nearer than Marlins over six miles away.'

George's heart sank. Timmy would never be able to walk six miles.

'Is there a bus?' she called.

'No. Not to Marlins,' said the woman. 'No bus goes there, missy. But if you want your dog's leg seen to, you go up to Spiggy House, up along there. Mr. Gaston lives there with his horses, and he knows about dogs too. You take the dog there. He'll know what to do.'

'Oh thank you,' said George, gratefully. 'Is it very far?'

'About half a mile,' said the woman. 'See that hill? You go up there, take the turning to the right and you'll see a big house. That's Spiggy House. You can't mistake it because of the stables built all round it. Ask for Mr. Gaston. He's nice, he is. Maybe you'll have to wait a little if he's out with his horses though - he may not be in till it's almost dark.'

The four held a little council. 'We'd better go up to this Mr. Gaston's, I think,' said Julian. 'But I think you and Anne, Dick, should go on to the farm-house I planned to stay in for the night, and make arrangements for us. We don't want to leave it till the last minute. I'll go with George and Timmy, of course.'

'Right,' said Dick. 'I'll take Anne now. It will be dark pretty soon. Got your torch, Julian?'

'Yes,' said Julian. 'And I'm pretty good at finding my way, as you know. I shall come back to this village after we've been to Mr. Gaston's, and then make straight for the farm-house. It's about a mile and a half away.'

'Thanks awfully for saying you'll come with me, Julian,' said George. 'Let's go now, shall we? Well, Dick and Anne - see you later!'

Julian set off with George and Timmy up the hill to Spiggy House. Timmy went on three legs, and still seemed very sorry for himself. Anne and Dick watched him, feeling sorry for him.

'I hope he's all right tomorrow,' said Dick. 'It will spoil our week-end if he's not, no doubt about that!'

They turned away and walked through the little village of Beacons. 'Now for Blue Pond Farm-house,' said Dick. 'Julian didn't give me very clear directions, I think I'll ask someone exactly where it is.'

But they met nobody except a man driving a little cart. Dick hailed him and he pulled up his horse.

'Are we on the right road for Blue Pond Farm-house?' shouted Dick. 'Ar,' answered the man, nodding his head.

'Is it straight on - or do we take any paths or little lanes?' asked Dick, 'Ar,' said the man, nodding again.

'What does he mean - "ar"?' said Dick. He raised his voice again. 'Is it this way?' and he pointed.

'Ar,' said the man again. He raised his whip and pointed up the road where the two were going, and then across to the west.

'Oh, I see - we turn to the right up there?' called Dick.

'Ar,' said the man, nodding, and drove on so suddenly that the horse almost stepped on Dick's foot.

'Well - if we find the farm-house after all those "ars" we'll be clever,' said Dick. 'Come on!'

Chapter 5

ANNE AND DICK

It began to get dark very suddenly. The sun had gone, and a big black cloud slid smoothly over the sky. 'It's going to rain,' said Dick. 'Blow! I thought it was going to be a lovely evening.'

'We'd better hurry,' said Anne. 'I hate sheltering under a hedge in the pouring rain, with drips down my neck, and puddles round my feet!'

They hurried. They went up the road that led out of the village and then came to a turning on the right. This must be the one the man had meant. They stopped and looked down it. It seemed to be like one of the sunken lanes they had walked down in the morning, and it looked rather dark and tunnel-like now, in the twilight.

'I hope it's right,' said Dick. 'We'll ask the very first person we meet.'

'If we do meet anyone!' said Anne, feeling that they never would in this curious deep lane. They went up it. It wound round and about and then went downhill into a very muddy bit indeed. Anne found herself sloshing about in thick mud.

'A stream or something must run across the lane here,' she said. 'Ugh! The water's got into my shoes! I'm sure we don't go this way, Dick. The water's quite deep farther on, I'm certain. I was up to my ankles just now.'

Dick looked about in the deepening twilight. He made out something above him in the high hedge that grew on the steep bank each side.

'Look - is that a stile?' he said, 'Where's my torch? At the bottom of my rucksack, of course! Can you get it out, Anne, to save me taking the thing off?'

Anne found the torch and gave it to Dick. He switched it on, and immediately the shadows round them grew blacker, and the lane seemed more tunnel-like than ever. Dick flashed the torch upwards to what he had thought was a stile.

'Yes - it is a stile,' he said. 'I expect that leads up to the farm-house - a short cut, probably. I've no doubt this lane is the one used by the farm-carts, and probably goes right round to the farm - but if this is a short cut we might as well take it. It must lead somewhere, anyway!'

They scrambled up the bank to the stile. Dick helped Anne over, and they found themselves in a wide field. In front of them was a narrow path, running between crops of some sort.

'Yes - this is obviously a short cut,' said Dick, pleased. 'I expect we'll see the lights of the farm-house in a minute.'

'Or fall into the blue pond first,' said Anne, rather dismally. It was just beginning to rain and she was wondering if it was worth while to untie her mac from her shoulder and put it on. Or was the farm-house really nearby? Julian had said it wasn't very far.

They walked across the field and came to another stile. The rain was coming down fast now. Anne decided to put on her mac. She stood under a thick bush and Dick helped her on with it. She had a small sou'wester in the pocket and put that on too. Dick put his on and they set off again.

The second stile led into another endless field, and the path then came at last to a big field-gate. They climbed over it and found themselves on what looked like a heathery moor - wild and uncultivated land! No farm-house was to be seen - though, indeed they could not have seen anything of one unless they had been very close to it, because the night was on them, dark and rainy.

'If only we could see some lights somewhere - shining out of a window,' said Dick. He shone his torch on to the moor in front of them. 'I don't quite know what to do. There doesn't seem a path here - and I just hate the idea of going all the way back across those wet fields, and into that dark little lane.'

'Oh no - don't let's,' said Anne, with a shiver. 'I really didn't like that lane. There must be a path somewhere! It's silly for a gate to open on to moorland!'

And then, as they stood there, with the rain dripping on them and not much else to be heard, another noise came to their ears.

It was so unexpected and so very startling that both of them clutched the other in a start of alarm. It was certainly a strange noise to hear in that deserted bit of country.

Bells! Wild, clanging bells sounding without a stop, jangling out over the dark countryside in peal after peal. Anne held on tightly to Dick.

'What is it? Where are those bells? What are they ringing for?' whispered Anne.

Dick had no idea. He was as startled as Anne to hear this extraordinary noise. It sounded some distance away, but every now and again the wind blew hard and then the noise of the jangling swept round them, close to them it seemed.

'I wish they'd stop, Oh, I wish they'd stop!' said Anne, her heart beating fast. 'I don't like them. They frighten me. They're not church bells.'

'No. They're certainly not church bells,' said Dick. 'They're a warning of some kind. I'm sure - but what for? Fire? We'd see fire if there was one anywhere near us. War? No - bells and beacons were used to warn people of war long long ago, Not now.'

'That village was called Beacons,' said Anne, suddenly remembering. 'Do you suppose it has that name because long ago there was a nearby hill where people lighted a beacon, to send a warning to other towns telling them that the enemy was coming? Did they ring bells too? Are we hearing long-ago bells, Dick? They don't sound like bells I've ever heard in my life before.'

'Good gracious! They're certainly not long-ago bells!' said Dick, speaking cheerfully, though he was really just as puzzled and alarmed as Anne. 'Those bells are being rung now, at this very minute!'

Quite suddenly the bells stopped and an enormous silence took the place of the wild ringing. The two children stood and listened for a minute or two and then heaved a sigh of relief.

'They've stopped at last,' said Anne, 'I hated them! Why did they ring out on this dark, dark night? Oh do let's find Blue Pond Farm-house as soon as ever we can, Dick. I don't like being lost in the dark like this, with bells ringing madly for nothing at all!

'Come on,' said Dick. 'Keep close to the hedge. As long as we follow that we must come to somewhere. We won't wander out on to the moorland.'

He took Anne's arm and the two of them kept close to the hedge. They came to another path at last and followed it. That led to a lane, but not a sunken one this time - and then, oh wonderful sight, - not far off they saw a light shining!

'That must be Blue Pond Farm-house!' said Dick, thankfully. 'Come on, Anne - not much farther now!'

They came to a low stone wall and followed it till they came to a broken-down gate. It opened with a squeak, and Anne stepped through - right into an enormous puddle!

'Blow!' she said. 'Now I'm wetter than ever! For a moment I thought I must have stepped into the blue pond!'

But it was only a puddle. They went round it and followed a muddy path to a little door set in a white stone wall. Dick thought it must be the back door. Nearby was a window, and in it shone the light they had seen so thankfully.

An old woman sat near the light, her head bent over some sewing. The children could see her quite clearly as they stood by the door.

Dick looked for a bell or knocker but there was none. He knocked with his bare knuckles. Nobody answered. The door remained shut. They looked at the old woman by the lamp, and saw that she was still sewing.

'Perhaps she's deaf,' said Dick and he knocked again, much more loudly. Still the old woman sewed on placidly. She must indeed be deaf!

'We'll never get in at this rate!' said Dick, impatiently. He tried the handle of the door - it opened at once!

'We'll just have to walk in and announce ourselves,' said Dick, and he stepped on to the worn mat inside the door. He was in a narrow little passage that led to a stone stairway, steep and narrow at the farther end.

On his right was a door, a little ajar. It opened into the room where the old woman was sitting. The two children could see a streak of light coming through the crack.

Dick pushed the door open and walked boldly in, followed by Anne. Still the old woman didn't look up. She pushed her needle in and out of her sewing and seemed to hear and see nothing else whatsoever.

Dick had to walk right up to her before she knew he was in the room. Then she leapt up in such a fright that her chair fell over with a bang.

'I'm sorry,' said Dick, upset at frightening the old lady. 'We knocked but you didn't hear!'

She stared at them, her hand over her heart. 'You give me such a fright,' she said. 'Where did you come from, this dark night?'

Dick picked up her chair, and she sat down in it, panting a little.

'We've been looking for this place,' said Dick. 'Blue Pond Farm-house, isn't it? We wondered if we could stay the night here - and two others of us as well.'

The old woman pointed to her ears and shook her head. 'Deaf as a post,' she said. 'No good talking to me, my dear. You've lost your way, I suppose?'

Dick nodded.

'Well, you can't stay here,' said the old woman. 'My son won't have no one here at all. You'd best be gone before he comes. He have a nasty temper, he have.'

Dick shook his head. Then he pointed out to the dark rainy night, and then pointed to Anne's wet shoes and clothes. The old woman knew what he meant.

'You've lost your way, you're wet and tired, and you don't want me to turn you out,' she said. 'But there's my son, you see. He don't like strangers here.'

Dick pointed to Anne, and then to a sofa in a corner of the room. Then he pointed to himself, and then outside. Again the old woman understood at once.

'You want me to give your sister shelter, but you'll go out into the night?' she said. Dick nodded. He thought he could easily find some shed or barn for himself. But Anne really must be indoors.

'My son mustn't see either of you,' said the old woman, and she pulled Anne to what the girl thought was a cupboard. But when the door opened, she saw a very small, steep wooden staircase leading upwards into the roof.

'You go up there,' said the old woman to Anne. 'And don't you come down till I call you in the morning. I'll get into trouble if my son knows you're here.'

'Go up, Anne,' said Dick, rather troubled. 'I don't know what you'll find there. If it's too bad, come down. See if there's a window or something you can call out from, and then I'll know if you're all right.'

'Yes,' said Anne, in rather a trembling voice and she went up the steep, dirty wooden stairs. They led straight into a little loft. There was a mattress there, fairly clean, and a chair. A rug was folded up on the chair and a jug of water stood on a shelf. Otherwise the room was bare.

A tiny window opened out of one side. Anne went to it and called out. 'Dick! Are you there? Dick!'

'Yes, I'm here,' said Dick. 'What's it like, Anne? Is it all right? Listen, I'll find somewhere nearby to shelter in - and you can always call me if you want me!'

Chapter 6

IN THE MIDDLE OF THE NIGHT

'It's not bad,' said Anne. 'There's a fairly clean mattress and a rug. I'll be all right. But what about if the others come, Dick? Will you look out for them? I almost think George will have to sleep in a barn with you and Julian if she comes. That old woman won't let anyone else in, I'm sure!'

'I'll look out for them and arrange something,' said Dick. 'You eat the rest of your sandwiches and your cake, and see if you can dry your wet feet and make yourself really comfortable. There's a shed or something out here. I shall be quite all right. Yell for me if you want me.'

Anne went back into the room. She felt wet and tired, hungry and thirsty. She ate all her food, and had a drink from the jug. Then she felt sleepy and lay down on the mattress, throwing the rug over her. She meant to listen for the others to come, but she was too tired. She fell fast asleep!

Dick was prowling about down below. He was careful because he didn't want to run into the old woman's son. He didn't like the sound of him somehow! He came to a small barn with piles of straw in one corner. He flashed his torch cautiously round.

'This will do for me,' he thought. 'I can be quite comfortable here in that straw. Poor Anne! I wish old George was with her. I'd better wait about and watch for the other two, or I'll fall asleep and miss them, once I bed down in that straw! It's only about six o'clock too - but we've had a long day. I wonder how Timmy is. I wish he was here!'

Dick thought that probably George and Julian would come in through the same gate as he and Anne had used. He found a broken-down shed near the gate and sat down on a box there, waiting for them to come.

He ate his sandwiches while he waited. They were very comforting! He ate every one and then the cake. He yawned. He felt very sleepy indeed, and his feet were wet and tired.

No one arrived at all - not even the old woman's son. She could still be seen sewing under the lamp. But after about two hours, when it was almost eight o'clock, and Dick was beginning to be very worried about George and Julian, the old woman got up and put away her work-basket.

She disappeared out of Dick's sight, and didn't come back. But the light was still there, shining out of the window. Left for her son, probably, thought Dick.

He tiptoed to the window. The rain had stopped now and the night was much clearer. The stars were out and a moon was coming up. Dick's spirits rose.

He peered in at the lighted room. Then he saw the old woman lying on a broken-down sofa in a corner. A blanket was pulled right up to her chin and she seemed to be asleep. Dick went back to his shed, but now he felt there was no use in watching for George and Julian. They must have lost their way completely! Or else Mr. Gaston, or whatever his name was, must have had to do something to Timmy's leg, and Julian had decided to stay at the inn in Beacons Village for the night.

He yawned again. 'I'm too sleepy to watch any more,' he decided. 'I shall fall off this box with sleep if I don't go and lie down in that straw. Anyway I think I'd hear if the others came.'

Using his torch cautiously again, he made his way to the barn. He shut the door behind him and bolted it roughly from the inside by running a stick through two hasps. He didn't know why he did that - perhaps because he was still thinking of the old woman's bad-tempered son!

He flung himself down on the straw, and immediately fell asleep. Outside the sky became clearer and clearer. The moon came up, not fully, but large enough to give some light. It shone down on the desolate little stone house and ill-kept-out buildings.

Dick slept soundly. He lay in the soft straw and dreamed of Timmy and George and Blue Ponds and bells. Especially bells.

He awoke suddenly, and lay for a moment wondering where he was. What was this prickly stuff round him? Then he remembered - of course, it was straw and he was in a barn! He was about to cuddle down again when he heard a noise.

It was only a small noise - a scratching on the wooden walls of the barn perhaps. Dick sat up. Were there rats there? He hoped not!

He listened. The scratching seemed to come from outside the barn, not inside. Then it stopped. After an interval it began again. Then there came a gentle tapping at the broken window just above Dick's head.

He felt very startled. Rats scratched and scabbled about - but they didn't tap on windows. Who was tapping so very very cautiously on the little window? He held his breath and listened, straining his ears.

And then he heard a voice - a hoarse whisper. 'Dick! Dick!'

Dick was amazed. Could it be Julian? If so, how in the world did he know that he, Dick, was in the barn? He sat listening, stiff with surprise.

The tapping came again, and then the voice, a little louder. 'Dick! I know you're there. I saw you go in. Come here to the window - quiet, now!'

Dick didn't know the voice. It wasn't Julian's, and it certainly wasn't either George's or Anne's. Then how did the owner know his name and that he was there? It was astounding. Dick didn't know what to do!

'Buck up!' said the voice. 'I've got to go in half a tick. I've got that message for you.'

Dick decided to go nearer to the window. He was quite certain that he didn't want whoever it was outside to come into the barn. He cautiously knelt up in the straw and spoke just underneath the window.

'I'm here,' he said, trying to make his voice deep and grown-up.

'You've been long enough coming,' grumbled the one outside, and then Dick saw him through the window - just a face, dim and wild-eyed, with a round bullet-like head. He crouched back, thankful that the face couldn't see him in the darkness of the barn.

'Here's the message from Nailer,' said the voice. 'Two-Trees. Gloomy Water. Saucy Jane. And he says Maggie knows. He sent you this. Maggie's got one too.'

A bit of paper fluttered in at the broken pane. Dick picked it up in a daze. What was all this? Was he dreaming?

The voice came again, insistent and urgent. 'You heard all that, Dick? Two-Trees. Gloomy Water. Saucy Jane. And Maggie knows too. Now I'm going.'

There came the sound of someone cautiously creeping round the barn - and then there was silence. Dick sat amazed and bewildered. Who was this wild-eyed fellow, who called him by his name in the middle of the night and gave him extraordinary messages that meant nothing at all to a sleepy boy? But Dick was wide awake now. He stood up and looked out of the window. There was nothing and no one to be seen except the lonely house and the sky.

Dick sat down again and thought. He put his torch on cautiously and looked at the piece of paper he had picked up. It was a dirty half sheet, with pencil marks on it that meant nothing to Dick at all. Words were printed here and there, but they were all nonsense to him. He simply couldn't make head or tail of his visitor, his message or the bit of paper!

'I'm sure I must be dreaming,' thought Dick, and put the paper into his pocket. He lay back in his straw, cuddling in deep, because he had got cold by the window. He lay and thought for a while, puzzling over the curious happenings, and then he felt his eyes closing.

But before he was quite asleep, he heard cautious footsteps again! Was that fellow back once more? This time someone tried the door - but the wooden stick was in the hasps. Whoever it was outside shook the door and the stick fell out at once. The man shook the door again as if thinking it had stuck, and then opened it. He came inside and shut the door behind him.

Dick caught a quick glimpse of him. No - this wasn't the same man as before. This was a man with a head of thick hair, Dick hoped and prayed that he wouldn't come over to the straw.

He didn't. He sat down on a sack and waited. He talked to himself after a while, but Dick could only make out a word or two.

'What's happened?' he heard. 'How much longer do I wait?' Then there was a mumble and Dick could not catch a word.

'Wait, wait - that's all I do,' muttered the man, and he stood up and stretched himself. Then he went to the door and looked out. He came back and sat down on the sack again.

He sat still and quiet then, and Dick found his eyes closing once more. Was this part of a dream too? He didn't have time to think it out because he was suddenly in a real dream, walking along ringing bells and seeing trees in twos everywhere round him!

He slept heavily all night long. When morning came he awoke suddenly and sat up. He was alone in the barn. Where had the second visitor gone? Or could it all have been a dream?

Chapter 7
IN THE MORNING

Dick stood up and stretched himself. He felt dirty and untidy. Also he was very hungry. He wondered if the old woman would let him buy some bread and cheese and a glass of milk.

'Anne must be hungry too,' he thought. 'I wonder if she's all right.' He went cautiously outside and looked up at the tiny window of the loft where Anne had spent the night. Her anxious face was already there, watching for Dick!

'Are you all right, Anne?' called Dick, in a low tone. She pushed open the tiny window and smiled at him.

'Yes. But I daren't go down because that son is downstairs. I can hear him shouting at the deaf old woman every now and again. He sounds very bad-tempered.'

'I'll wait for him to go out to his work then, before I go and see the old woman,' said Dick. 'I must pay her something for letting you sleep up in that loft - and perhaps I can persuade her to let us have something to eat.'

'I wish you could,' said Anne. 'I've eaten all the chocolate I had in my bag. Shall I wait till I hear you call me?'

Dick nodded and disappeared into the barn in a hurry. He had heard footsteps!

A man came into sight - a broad, short, hunched-up man, with a shock of untidy hair. He was the man that Dick had seen in the barn the night before. He was muttering to himself and looked very bad-tempered indeed. Dick decided to keep out of his way. He crouched down in the barn.

But the man did not go in there. He walked past, still muttering. Dick listened for his footsteps to die away. He heard the opening of a gate somewhere, then it crashed behind the man.

'I'd better take my chance now,' thought Dick, and he went quickly out of the barn and up to the little white house. It looked very tumble-down and neglected in the daylight, and had a most forlorn air.

Dick knew that it was no good knocking, because the old woman wouldn't hear him. So he walked right into the house and found the woman washing up a few dishes in a cracked old sink. She stared at him in dismay.

'I'd forgotten about you! And the girl too! Is she still up there? Get her down quickly before my son comes back! And then go, both of you!'

'Can you sell us some bread and cheese?' shouted Dick. But the old woman really was stone deaf, and all she did was to push Dick away towards the door, jabbing at him with the wet cloth in her hand. Dick slipped aside and pointed to some bread on a table.

'No, no - I tell you, you're to go,' said the old woman, obviously terrified in case her son should come back. 'Get the girl, quickly!'

But before Dick could do anything, there were footsteps outside and in came the hunched-up fellow with the shock of hair! He was back already, holding some eggs he had been to find.

He walked into the kitchen and stared at Dick. 'Clear out!' he said, angrily. 'What do you want here?'

Dick thought he had better not say he had slept the night in the barn. There were queer goings-on here, and the man might be very savage if he knew Dick had slept the night nearby.

'I wanted to know if your mother could sell us some bread,' he said, and could have bitten his tongue out. He had said 'us'! Now the man would guess there was someone with him.

'Us? Who's "us"?' said the man, looking round. 'You fetch him and I'll tell you both what I do to boys who come stealing my eggs!'

'I'll go and fetch him,' said Dick, seizing the chance to get away. He ran to the door. The man made a clumsy dart at him and almost caught him. But Dick was out and away, running down the path. He hid behind a shed, his heart thumping. He had to wait for Anne. Somehow he had to go back and get her.

The man stood at the door, shouting angrily after Dick. But he didn't chase him. He went back into the house and after a while came out again with a pail of steaming food. Dick guessed he was going to feed the chickens wherever they were.

He had to take this chance of fetching Anne. He waited till he heard the crash of the distant gate again and then he rushed to the house. Anne's face was at the window, scared. She had heard all that the man had said to Dick, and then to his mother about allowing boys to come to the house.

'Anne! Come down at once. He's gone,' shouted Dick. 'Hurry!'

Anne's face disappeared from the window. She ran to the door, tumbled quickly down the stairs, and ran through the kitchen. The old woman flapped a cloth at her, screaming at her.

Dick ran into the kitchen and put twenty pence on the table. Then he caught Anne's arm and both children tore out of the house and down the path. They came to the hedge they had followed the night before.

Anne was quite scared. 'That awful man!' she said. 'Oh Dick - what a horrible place. Honestly I think Julian must be mad to choose a place like that to sleep in for the night - horrible little house! And it didn't look a bit like a farm. There were no cows or pigs that I could see and not even a farm-dog!'

'You know, Anne, I don't think it could possibly have been Blue Pond Farm-house,' said Dick, as they walked beside the hedge, looking for the gate that they had come through the night before. 'We made a mistake. It was an ordinary cottage. If we hadn't lost our way we'd have come to the proper Blue Pond Farm-house I'm sure.'

'Whatever will George and Julian be thinking?' said Anne. 'They'll be dreadfully worried, won't they, wondering what has become of us. Do you suppose they're at the real Blue Pond Farm-house?'

'We'll have to find out,' said Dick. 'Do I look very messy and untidy, Anne? I feel awful.'

'Yes. Haven't you a comb?' said Anne. 'Your hair's all up on end. And your face is very dirty. Look, there's a little stream over there. Let's get our flannels out and wash our hands and faces with them.'

They did a little washing in the cold water of the stream, and Dick combed back his hair.

'You look a lot better,' said Anne. 'Oh dear - I wish we could have some breakfast. I'm really starving! I didn't sleep awfully well, did you, Dick? My mattress was so hard, and I was rather scared, up in that funny little room all alone.'

Before Dick could answer, a boy came whistling through the gate. He looked astonished to see Dick and Anne.

'Hallo!' he said. 'You hiking?'

'Yes,' said Dick. 'Can you tell me if that place up there is Blue Pond Farm-house?'

He pointed back to the old woman's house. The boy laughed.

'That's no farm-house. That's Mrs. Taggart's place, and a dirty old place it is. Don't you go there, or her son will drive you off. Dirty Dick we call him - he's a terror! Blue Pond Farm-house is down along there, see? Past the Three Shepherds Inn and away up to the left.'

'Thanks,' said Dick, feeling very angry indeed with the man who had said 'ar' and sent them all wrong the day before. The boy waved, and set off across a moorland path.

'We certainly went the wrong way last night,' said Dick, as they walked over the fields they had crossed in the dark the night before. 'Poor Anne! Dragging you all that way in the dark and the rain to a horrible place that wasn't Blue Pond Farm-house after all. I can't think what Julian is going to say to me.'

'Well, it was my fault too,' said Anne. 'Dick, let's go down to the Three Shepherds and telephone Blue Pond Farm-house from there, shall we? If it's on the phone, that is. I don't somehow feel as if I want to walk for miles and perhaps not find Blue Pond Farm-house again.'

'Good idea,' said Dick. 'The Three Shepherds was where that woman was shaking a duster out of the window, wasn't it? She told Julian the way to Spiggy House. I wonder how old Timmy is. I hope he's better. I say - this hike isn't as good as we hoped it would be, is it?'

'Well, there's still time for it to be all right!' said Anne, much more cheerfully than she felt. She so badly wanted her breakfast that she felt quite bad-tempered!

'We'll telephone to Julian from the Three Shepherds to say what happened to us,' said Dick, as they came to the lane where they had floundered in the mud the night before. He helped Anne over the stile and they jumped down to the narrow road. 'And what's more, we'll have breakfast at the Three Shepherds - and I bet we eat more than ever the Three Shepherds did, whoever they were!'

Anne felt more cheerful at once. She had thought they would have to walk all the way to find Blue Pond Farm-house before they had breakfast!

'See - a stream does flow right across the road here,' she said. 'No wonder I got my feet wet yesterday! Come on - the thought of breakfast makes my legs want to run!'

They at last arrived in Beacons Village, and made their way to the inn. On the sign three shepherds were painted, looking rather gloomy.

'They look like I feel,' said Anne, 'but I shall soon feel different. Oh Dick - think of porridge - and bacon and eggs - and toast and marmalade!'

'We must telephone first,' said Dick, firmly - and then he suddenly stopped, just as he was going into the inn. Someone was calling him.

'DICK! DICK! ANNE! Look, there they are! Hey, Dick, DICK!'

It was Julian's voice! Dick swung round in delight. He saw Julian, George and Timmy racing along the village street, shouting and waving. Timmy was first to reach them of course - and there was no sign of limping either! He leapt on them, barking madly, and licked every bare part of them he could reach.

'Oh, Ju! I'm so glad to see you!' said Anne, in rather a trembling voice. 'We lost our way last night. George, is Timmy all right?'

'Quite, Absolutely,' said George. 'You see...'

'Have you had breakfast?' interrupted Julian. 'We haven't. We were so worried about you we were just going to see the police. But now we can all have breakfast together and tell our news!'

Chapter 8

ALL TOGETHER AGAIN

It was wonderful to be all together again. Julian took hold of Anne's arm and squeezed it. 'All right, Anne?' he said, rather worried at her pale face.

Anne nodded. She felt better at once, now she had Julian, George and Timmy, as well as Dick. 'I'm only just terribly hungry,' she said.

'I'll ask for breakfast straight away,' said Julian. 'All news later!'

The woman who had leaned out of the window shaking a duster the evening before, came up to them. 'I expect it's a bit late for you,' said Julian. 'But we haven't had any breakfast. What have you got?'

'Porridge and cream,' said the woman. 'And our own cured bacon and our own eggs. Our own honey and the bread I bake myself. Will that do? And coffee with cream?'

'I could hug you,' said Julian, beaming at her. The others felt the same. They went into a small, cosy dining-room and sat down to wait. Soon a smell of frying bacon and hot strong coffee would come into the room - what joy!

'Your news first,' said Dick, patting Timmy. 'Did you get to Spiggy House? Was Mr. Gaston there?'

'No, he wasn't,' said Julian. 'He was out somewhere. He had a very nice wife who made us wait for him, and said he wouldn't mind in the least looking at Timmy when he came back. So we waited and waited,'

'We waited till half past seven!' said George, 'and we felt rather awkward because we thought it might be getting near their meal-time. And then at last Mr. Gaston came.'

'He was awfully kind,' said Julian. 'He looked at Timmy's leg, and then he did something, I don't know what - put it back into place, I suppose - and Timmy gave a yell and George flung herself on him, and Mr. Gaston roared with laughter at George...'

'Well, he was very rough with Timmy's leg,' said George. 'But he knew what he was doing, of course, and now Timmy is perfectly all right, except for that bruise on his back, and even that is getting better. He can run as well as ever.'

'I'm glad,' said Anne. 'I kept thinking of poor old Tim all last night.' She patted him, and he licked her lavishly and wetly.

'What did you do then?' asked Dick.

'Well, Mrs. Gaston insisted on us staying to supper,' said Julian. 'She simply wouldn't take no for an answer, and I must say that by that time we were jolly hungry. So we stayed - and we had a jolly good meal too. So did Timmy! You should have seen his tummy afterwards - as round as a barrel. Good thing it's gone down today or I was thinking of changing his name to Tummy.' They all laughed, George especially.

'Idiot,' she said. 'Well, we didn't leave till about nine o'clock. We didn't worry about you because we felt sure you would be safely at Blue Pond Farm-house and would guess we'd had to wait about with Timmy. And when we got there and found you hadn't arrived - well, we were in a state!'

'And then we thought you must have found somewhere else for the night,' said Julian, 'but we thought if we heard nothing we'd go down to the police first thing this morning and report your disappearance!'

'So down we came - without any breakfast either!' said George. 'That shows how worried we were! Blue Pond Farm-house was nice. They gave us a bed each in two tiny little rooms, and Timmy slept with me, of course.'

A wonderful smell came creeping into the little dining-room, followed by the inn-woman carrying a large tray. On it was a steaming tureen of porridge, a bowl of golden syrup, a jug of very thick cream, and a dish of bacon and eggs, all piled high on crisp brown toast. Little mushrooms were on the same dish.

'It's like magic!' said Anne, staring 'Just the very things I longed for!'

'Toast, marmalade and butter to come, and the coffee and hot milk,' said the woman, busily setting everything out. 'And if you want any more bacon and eggs, just ring the bell.'

'Too good to be true!' said Dick, looking at the table. 'For goodness' sake, help yourselves quickly, girls, or I shall forget my manners and grab.'

It was a wonderful breakfast - extra wonderful because they were all so ravenously hungry. There wasn't a word said as they spooned up their porridge and cream, sweetened with golden syrup. Timmy had a dishful too - he loved porridge, though he didn't like the syrup - it made his whiskers sticky!

'I feel better,' said Anne, looking at the porridge dish. 'The thing is - shall I have some more porridge and risk not enjoying my bacon and eggs so much - or shall I go straight on with bacon and eggs?'

'A difficult question,' said Dick. 'And one that I am faced with too. On the whole I think I'll go on with bacon and eggs - we can always have more of those if we want to - and those little mushrooms really do make my mouth water! Aren't we greedy? But how can anyone help that when they're so hungry?'

'You haven't told us a single word of what happened to you last night,' said Julian, serving out the bacon and eggs with a generous hand. 'Now that you've got something inside you, perhaps you feel able to tell us exactly why you ignored my instructions and didn't arrive where you were supposed to last night.'

'You sound like our headmaster at school!' said Dick. 'The plain fact is - we got lost! And when we did finally arrive somewhere, we thought it was Blue Pond Farm-house, and we stayed the night there.'

'I see,' said Julian, 'But didn't the people there tell you it wasn't the right place? Just so that you could have let us know? You must have known that we would worry about you.'

'Well, the old woman there was stone-deaf,' explained Anne, attacking her bacon and eggs vigorously. 'She didn't understand a word we said, and as we thought it was Blue Pond Farm-house, we stayed there - though it was a horrible place. And we were worried because you didn't arrive!'

'A chapter of accidents,' said Julian. 'All's well that ends well, however.'

'Don't sound so pompous!' said Dick. 'Actually we had a pretty poor time, Ju. Poor Anne had to sleep in a little loft, and I slept in straw in a barn - not that I minded that - but - well, peculiar things happened in the night. At least - I think they did. I'm not really sure it wasn't all a dream.'

'What peculiar things?' asked Julian at once.

'Well - I think perhaps I'll tell you when we're on our way again,' said Dick. 'Now I think about it in full daylight I feel that either it was all a silly dream - or - well, as I said - something very peculiar.'

'You never told me, Dick!' said Anne, in surprise.

'Well, to tell you the truth I forgot about it because other things happened,' said Dick. 'Having to get away from that man, for instance - and wondering about Julian and George - and feeling so hungry.'

'You don't sound as if you had a good night at all,' said George. 'It must have been awful, too, trying to find your way in the dark. It poured with rain, didn't it?'

'Yes,' said Anne, 'but oh - the thing that frightened me more than anything was the bells! Did you hear them Julian? They suddenly clanged out, and they made me terribly scared. I couldn't think what they were! Whatever were they ringing out for? They were so loud.'

'Didn't you know what they were ringing for?' said Julian. 'They were bells rung from the prison that nice old woman told us about - they were rung to tell everyone on the countryside that a prisoner had escaped! Lock your doors. Guard your folk.'

Anne stared at Julian in silence. So that was why the bells had made such a clamour and clangour. She shivered.

'I'm glad I didn't know that,' she said. 'I would have slept in the straw with Dick if I'd known there was an escaped prisoner. Have they caught him?'

'I don't know,' said Julian. 'We'll ask the inn-woman when she comes.'

They asked her, and she shook her head. 'No. He's not caught yet. But he will be. All the roads from the moor are guarded and everyone is on the watch. He was a robber who broke into houses and attacked anyone who tried to prevent him. A dangerous fellow.'

'Julian - is it all right to go hiking on the moors if there's an escaped prisoner about?' said Anne. 'I shan't feel very comfortable.'

'We've got Timmy,' said Julian. 'He would be strong enough to protect us from three prisoners if necessary! You needn't worry.'

'Woof,' agreed Timmy, at once, and thumped his tail on the floor.

At last everyone had finished breakfast. Even starving Anne couldn't manage the last bit of toast. She sighed happily, 'I feel myself again,' she announced. 'I can't say I feel very much like walking - but I know it would be good for me after that enormous meal.'

'Good or not, we're going on our way,' said Julian, getting up. 'I'll buy some sandwiches first.'

The inn-woman was delighted with their hearty praises. She gave them some packets of sandwiches and waved good-bye. 'You come again whenever you can,' she said. 'I'll always have something nice for you.'

The four went down the street and took a lane at the bottom. It wound about for a short way and then came into a valley. A stream ran down the middle of the valley. The children could hear it gurgling from where they stood.

'Lovely!' said Anne. 'Are we going along by the stream? I'd like to.'

Julian looked at his map. 'Yes - we could,' he said. 'I've marked the path to follow, and the stream joins it some way on. So if you like we could go along by it, though it will be very rough walking.'

They made their way to the stream. 'Now Dick,' said Julian, when they had left the path. 'What about telling us all those peculiar things that happened in the night? There's nobody about to hear - not a soul in sight. Let's hear everything. We'll soon tell you whether it was a dream or not.'

'Right,' said Dick, 'Well, here's the tale. It does sound pretty queer. Listen...'

Chapter 9

DICK SURPRISES THE OTHERS

Dick began his tale - but it really was very difficult to hear it because they couldn't walk four abreast, as there was no path to follow.

In the end Julian stopped and pointed to a thick clump of heather. 'Let's go and sit there and hear Dick's story properly. I keep missing bits. No one can hear us if we sit here.'

They sat down and Dick started again. He told about the old woman who was afraid her son would be angry if she let them stay the night. He told about his bed in the straw.

'And now here comes the bit I think must have been a dream,' he said. 'I woke up to hear a scratching noise on the wooden walls of the barn...'

'Rats or mice?' said George, and Timmy leapt up at once, of course. He was sure she had said the words to him!

'I thought that too,' said Dick. 'But then I heard a gentle tap-tap-tapping on the window.'

'How horrid,' said Anne. 'I shouldn't have liked that at all.'

'Neither did I,' said Dick, 'But the next thing I heard was my name being called! "Dick! Dick!"

Just like that.'

'It must have been a dream then,' said Anne. 'There was no one there who knew your name.'

Dick went on. 'Well, then the voice said - "Dick! I know you're there, I saw you go in!" And it told me to go to the window.'

'Go on,' said Julian. He was puzzled. No one in the world but Anne could have known that Dick was in the barn - and it certainly wasn't Anne out there in the night!

'Well, I went to the window,' said Dick, 'and I saw, rather dimly, of course, a wild-eyed looking fellow. He couldn't see me in the darkness of the barn. I just mumbled, "I'm here," hoping he would think I was whoever he wanted.'

'What did he say next?' asked George.

'He said something that sounded stuff and nonsense,' said Dick, 'He said it twice. It was "Two-Trees. Gloomy Water. Saucy Jane." And he said "Maggie knows." Just like that!'

There was a silence. Then George laughed. 'Two-Trees! Gloomy Water! Saucy Jane - and Maggie knows about it! Well, it must have been a dream, Dick! You know it must. What do you think, Julian?'

'Well - it does sound a bit nonsensical to have someone come in the middle of the night and call Dick by name and give him a strange message that doesn't mean a thing to him!' said Julian. 'It sounds more dream-like than real. I'd say it was a dream too.'

Dick began to think they were right - and then a sudden thought struck him. He sat up straight. 'Wait a bit!' he said. 'I've remembered something! The man slipped a bit of paper through the broken pane of the window, and I picked it up!'

'Ah - that's different,' said Julian. 'Now - if you can't find that paper, it's all a dream and you dreamt the paper too - but if you can find it, well the whole thing is true. Very peculiar indeed - but true.'

Dick searched quickly in his pockets. He felt paper in one of them, and drew it out. It was a dirty, crumpled piece, with a few words on it and a few lines. He held it out to the others in silence, his eyes shining.

'Is this the paper?' asked Julian. 'My word - so you didn't dream it after all, then!'

He took the paper. Four heads bent over it to examine it. No, five - because Timmy wanted to see what they were all so interested in. He thrust his hairy head between Julian's and Dick's.

'I can't make any sense of this paper,' said Julian, 'It's a plan of some kind, I think - but what of, or where, it's impossible to know.'

'The fellow said that Maggie had one of these bits of paper too,' said Dick, remembering.

'Who in the wide world is Maggie?' said George, 'and why should Maggie know?'

'Any more to tell?' asked Julian, intensely interested now.

'Well - the son of the deaf old woman came into the barn later on,' said Dick. 'And he sat and waited and waited, and muttered and muttered - and then when I woke up he wasn't there. So I thought I must have dreamt him too. He didn't see me, of course.'

Julian pursed up his lips and frowned. Then Anne spoke excitedly.

'Dick! Ju! I think I know why the second man came into the barn. It was the second man that the wild-eyed man wanted to give the message to, and the bit of paper - not to Dick. He didn't want Dick. But he had seen him creep into the barn, and I suppose he thought Dick was the man he really wanted and that he was in the barn waiting for him!'

'That's all very well - but how did he know my name?' asked Dick.

'He didn't know it! He didn't know it was you at all!' said Anne, excitedly. 'The other man's name must have been Dick too! Don't you see? They must have planned to meet there, the wild-eyed man and the old woman's son - and the first man saw Dick go in, so he waited a bit and then went and tapped on the window! And when he called "Dick! Dick!" of course Dick thought it was he that he wanted, and he took the message and everything! And then the other man, the real Dick came along - and was too late to meet the first one. Our Dick had met him and got the message!'

Anne was quite breathless after this long speech. She sat and stared at the others eagerly. Didn't they think she was right?

They did, of course. Julian clapped her on the back. 'Well worked out, Anne! Of course that's what happened.'

Dick suddenly remembered the boy they had met on the way down from the old woman's cottage to Beacons Village - the whistling boy. What had he said about the old woman and her son?

'Anne - what did that whistling boy say? Wait a bit - he said that was Mrs. Taggart's place - and he said we'd better not go there or her son would drive us off. And he said - yes, I remember now - he said "Dirty Dick we call him - he's a terror!" Dirty Dick! His name must be Dick then! Why didn't I think of it before?'

'That proves that Anne is right,' said Julian, pleased. Anne looked pleased too. It wasn't often that she thought of something clever before the others did!

They all sat thinking. 'Would this have anything to do with the escaped prisoner?' said George at last.

'It might,' said Julian. 'He might have been the prisoner himself, that fellow who came with the message. Did he say who the message was from?'

'Yes,' said Dick, trying to remember. 'He said it was from Nailer. I think that was the name - but it was all given in whispers, you know.'

'A message from Nailer,' said Julian. 'Well - perhaps Nailer is in prison - a friend of the man who escaped. And maybe when he knew this fellow was going to make a dash for it, he gave him a message for someone - the man at that old cottage, son of the old woman. They may have had a prearranged plan.'

'How do you mean?' asked Dick, looking puzzled.

'Well - the old woman's son, Dirty Dick, may have known that when the bells rang out, this fellow was making a run for it - and would come to bring him a message. He was to wait in the barn at night if the bells rang, just in case it was Nailer's friend who had escaped.'

'Yes, I see,' said Dick. 'I think you're right. Yes, I'm sure you are. My word, I'm glad I didn't know that fellow at the window was an escaped convict!'

'And you've got the message from Nailer!' said Anne. 'What a peculiar thing! Just because we lost our way and went to the wrong place, you get a message from a prisoner given you by one who's escaped! It's a pity we don't know what the message means - or the paper either.'

'Had we better tell the police?' said George. 'I mean - it may be important. It might help them to catch that man.'

'Yes,' said Julian. 'I think we should tell the police. Let's have a look at our map. Where's the next village?'

He looked at the map for a minute. 'I think really we might as well go on with what I had planned,' he said. 'I planned we should reach this village here - Reebles, look - in time for lunch, in case we hadn't got sandwiches. We'd have gone there for drinks anyway. So I vote we just carry on with our ramble, and call in at Reebles police station - if there is one - and tell them our bit of news.'

They all got up. Timmy was glad. He didn't approve of this long sit-down so soon after breakfast. He bounded ahead in delight.

'His leg's quite all right,' said Anne, pleased. 'Well I hope it teaches him not to go down rabbit holes again!'

It didn't, of course. He had his head down half a dozen within the next half-hour, but fortunately he could get no farther, and he was able to pull himself out quite easily.

The four saw little wild ponies that day. They came trotting over a hillock together, small and brown, with long manes and tails, looking very busy indeed. The children stopped in delight. The ponies saw them, tossed their pretty heads, turned one way all together and galloped off like the wind.

Timmy wanted to go after them, but George held his collar tightly. No one must chase those dear little wild ponies!

'Lovely!' said Anne. 'Lovely to meet them as suddenly as that. I hope we meet some more.'

The morning was as warm and sunny as the day before. Once again the four of them had to take off their blazers, and Timmy's tongue hung out, wet and dripping. The heather and wiry grass was soft underfoot. They followed the stream closely, liking its brown colour and its soft gurgling voice.

They bathed their hot feet in it as they ate one of their sandwiches at half past eleven. 'This is bliss!' said George, lying back on a tuft of heather with her feet lapped by the water. 'The stream is tickling my feet, and the sun is warming my face - lovely! Oh, get away, Timmy, you idiot! Breathing down my neck like that, and making my face so wet!'

The stream at last joined the path that led to the village of Reebles. They walked along it, beginning to think of dinner. It would be fun to have it in a little inn or perhaps a farm-house, and keep their sandwiches for tea-time.

'But first we must find the police-station,' said Julian. 'We'll get our tale told, and then we'll be ready for our meal!'

Chapter 10

AN ANGRY POLICEMAN AND A FINE LUNCH

There was a police-station at Reebles, a small one with a house for the policeman attached. As the one policeman had four villages under his control he felt himself to be rather an important fellow.

He was in his house having his dinner when the children walked up to the police-station. They found nobody there, and walked out again. The policeman had seen them from his window and he came out, wiping his mouth. He wasn't very pleased at having to come out in the middle of a nice meal of sausage and onions.

'What do you want?' he said, suspiciously. He didn't like children of any sort. Nasty little things, he thought them - always full of mischief and cheek. He didn't know which were worse, the small ones or the big ones!

Julian spoke to him politely. 'We've come to report something rather strange, which we thought perhaps the police ought to know. It might help them to catch the prisoner who escaped last night.'

'Ha!' said the policeman scornfully. 'You've seen him too, I suppose? You wouldn't believe how many people have seen him. 'Cording to them he's been in every part of the moor at one and the same time. Clever fellow he must be to split himself up like that.'

'Well, one of us saw him last night,' said Julian politely. 'At least, we think it must have been him. He gave a message to my brother here.'

'Ho, he did, did he?' said the policeman, eyeing Dick in a most disbelieving manner. 'So he runs about giving messages to school-boys, does he? And what message did he give you, may I ask?'

The message sounded extremely silly when Dick repeated it to the police. 'Two-Trees. Gloomy Water. Saucy Jane. And Maggie knows.'

'Really?' said the policeman, in a sarcastic voice. 'Maggie knows as well, does she? Well, you tell Maggie to come along here and tell me too. I'd like to meet Maggie - specially if she's a friend of yours.'

'She's not,' said Dick feeling annoyed. 'That was in the message. I don't know who Maggie is! How should I? We thought perhaps the police could unravel the meaning. We couldn't. The fellow gave me this bit of paper too.'

He handed the piece of dirty paper to the policeman, who looked at it with a crooked smile. 'So he gave you this too, did he?' he said. 'Now wasn't that kind of him? And what do you suppose all this is, scribbled on the paper?'

'We don't know,' said Dick. 'But we thought our report might help the police to catch the prisoner, that's all.'

'The prisoner's caught,' said the policeman, with a smirk on his face. 'You know so much - but you didn't know that! Yes, he's caught - four hours ago - and he's safe back in prison now. And let me tell you youngsters this - I'm not taken in by any silly schoolboy spoofing, see?'

'It's not spoofing,' said Julian, in a very grown-up manner. 'You should learn to see the difference between the truth and a joke.'

That didn't please the policeman at all. He turned on Julian at once, his face reddening.

'Now you run away!' he said. 'I'm not having any cheek from you! Do you want me to take your names and addresses and report you?'

'If you like,' said Julian, in disgust. 'Have you got a notebook there? I'll give you all our names, and I myself will make a report to the police in our district when I get back.'

The policeman stared at him. He couldn't help being impressed by Julian's manner, and he calmed down a little.

'You go away, all of you,' he said, his voice not nearly so fierce. 'I shan't report you this time. But don't you go spreading silly stories like that or you'll get into trouble. Serious trouble too.'

'I don't think so,' said Julian. 'Anyway, seeing that you are not going to do anything about our story, may we have back our bit of paper, please?'

The policeman frowned. He made as if he would tear the paper up, but Dick snatched at it. He was too late. The aggravating policeman had torn it into four pieces and thrown it into the road!

'Don't you have laws against scattering litter in your village?' asked Dick, severely, and carefully picked up the four pieces of paper. The policeman glared at Dick as he put the bits into his pocket. Then he made a peculiar snorting noise, turned on his heel and marched back to his sausages and onions.

'And I hope his dinner's gone cold!' said George. 'Horrid fellow! Why should he think we're telling a lot of untruths?'

'It is rather a queer story of ours,' said Julian, 'After all - we found it a bit difficult to believe when Dick first told it. I don't blame the policeman for disbelieving it - I blame him for his manner. It's a good thing most of our police aren't the same. Nobody would ever report anything.'

'He told us one bit of good news, anyway,' said Anne. 'That escaped prisoner is back in prison again! I'm so relieved to know that.'

'I am too,' said Dick. 'I didn't like the look of him at all. Well, Ju - what do we do now? Forget the whole business? Do you think there's anything in that message to follow up? And if so - can we do anything?'

'I don't know,' said Julian. 'We must think a bit. Let's go and see if we can scrounge a meal in some farm-house somewhere. There seem to be plenty around.'

They asked a little girl if there was a farm-house anywhere near that would give them dinner. She nodded and pointed.

'See that farm-house up on the hill there? That's my Gran's place. She'll give you dinner, I expect. She used to give dinner in the summer to trippers, and I expect she would give you some too, if you ask her, though it's late in the season.'

'Thanks,' said Julian, and they all went up the lane that curved round the hill-side. Dogs barked loudly as they came near and Timmy's hackles went up at once. He growled.

'Friends, Timmy, friends,' said George. 'Dinner here, Timmy. Dinner, perhaps a nice bone for you. Bone!'

Timmy understood. The fur down his neck lay flat again and he stopped growling. He wagged his tail at the two dogs near the farm-gate who sniffed his doggy-smell suspiciously even when he was some distance away.

A man hailed them. 'What do you kids want? Mind those dogs!'

'We wondered if we could get a meal here!' called back Julian. 'A little girl down in the village said we might.'

'I'll ask my mother,' said the man, and he yelled in an enormous voice to the farm-house nearby.

'Ma! Ma! Four kids out here want to know if you can give them a meal.'

A very fat old lady appeared, with twinkling eyes and red cheeks like an apple. She took one glance at the four by the gate, and nodded her head. 'Yes. They look decent children. Tell them to come along in. Better hold their dog's collar though.'

The four walked to the farm-house, George holding Timmy firmly. The other two dogs came up, but as Timmy was hoping for a bone, he was determined to be friendly, and not a single growl came from him, even when the two dogs growled suspiciously. He wagged his tail, and let his tongue hang out.

The other dogs soon wagged theirs, and then it was safe to let Timmy go. He bounded over to them and there was a mad game of 'chase-me-roll-me-over' as George called it.

'Come your ways in,' said the plump old lady. 'Now you'll have to take what we've got. I'm busy today and haven't had time for cooking. You can have a bit of home-made meat-pie, or a slice or two of ham and tongue, or hard-boiled eggs and salad. Bless you, you look as pleased as Punch! I'll put the lot on the table for you and you can help yourselves! Will that do? There's no vegetables though. You'll have to make do with pickled cabbage and my own pickled onions and beetroot in vinegar.'

'It sounds too marvellous for words,' said Julian. 'We shan't want any sweet after that!'

'There's no pudding today,' said the old lady. 'But I'll open a bottle or two of our own raspberries and you can have them with cream if you like. And there's the cream cheese I made yesterday too.'

'Don't tell us any more!' begged Dick. 'It makes me feel too hungry. Why is it that people on farms always have the most delicious food? I mean, surely people in towns can bottle raspberries and pickle onions and make cream cheese?'

'Well either they can't or they don't,' said George. 'My mother does all those things - and even when she lived in a town she did. Anyway, I'm going to when I'm grown-up. It must be so wonderful to offer home-made things by the score when people come to a meal!'

It was extraordinary to think that any children could possibly eat the meal the four did, after having had such a huge breakfast. Timmy ate an enormous dinner too, and then lay down with a sigh. How he wished he could live at that farm-house! How lucky those other two dogs were!

A small girl came in shyly as they ate. 'I'm Meg,' she said. 'I live with my Gran. What are your names?'

They told her. Then Julian had an idea. 'We're walking over your moor,' he said. 'We've been to lots of nice places. But there's one we haven't been to yet. Do you know it? It's called Two-Trees.'

The little girl shook her head. 'Gran would know,' she said. 'Gran! Where's Two-Trees?'

The old lady looked in at the door. 'What's that? Two-Trees? Oh, that was a lovely place once, but it's all in ruins now. It was built beside a queer dark lake, in the middle of the moors. Let's see now - what was it called?'

'Gloomy Water?' said Dick.

'Yes! That's right. Gloomy Water,' said the old lady. 'Are you thinking of going by there? You be careful then, there's marshland around there, just when you least expect it! Now - would you like anything more?'

'No thank you,' said Julian, regretfully, and paid the very modest bill. 'It's the nicest lunch we've ever had. Now we must be off.'

'Off to Two-Trees and Gloomy Water, I hope!' George whispered to Dick. 'That would be really exciting.'

Chapter 11

JULIAN'S IDEA

Once outside the farm-house Julian looked round at the others. 'We'll find out how far Two-Trees is and see if we've got time to pay it a visit,' he said. 'If we have, we'll go along there and snoop round. If we haven't we'll go tomorrow.'

'How can we find out how far it is?' said Dick eagerly. 'Will it be on your map?'

'It may be marked there if the lake is big enough,' said Julian. They walked down the hill, and took a path that led once more over the moors. As soon as they were out of sight and hearing of anyone Julian stopped and took out his big map. He unfolded it and the four of them crouched over it as he spread it out on the heather.

'That nice old lady said it was in the middle of the moors,' said Julian. 'Also we know there's a lake or at any rate a big pool of some kind.'

His finger traced its way here and there on the map. Then George gave a cry and dabbed her finger down.

'There, look! It's not really in the middle. See - Gloomy Water! That must be it. Is Two-Trees marked as well?'

'No,' said Julian. 'But perhaps it wouldn't be if it's in ruins. Ruins aren't marked on maps unless they are important in some way. This can't be important. Well - that's certainly Gloomy Water marked there. What do you say? Shall we have a shot at going there this afternoon? I wonder exactly how far it is.'

'We could ask at the post-office,' said George. 'Probably once upon a time the postman had to take letters there. They might know. They could tell us the way to go.'

They went back to the village and found the post-office. It was part of the village store. The old man who kept it looked over the top of his glasses at the children.

'Gloomy Water! Now what be you wanting that for? A real miserable place it is, for all it was so fine years ago.'

'What happened to it?' asked Dick.

'It was burnt,' said the old man. 'The owner was away, and only a couple of servants were there. It flared up one night, no one knows how or why - and was burnt almost to a shell. Couldn't get a fire-engine out there, you see. There was only a cart-track to the place.'

'And wasn't it ever built up again?' asked Julian. The old man shook his head.

'No. It wasn't worth it. The owner just let it fall to rack and ruin. The jackdaws and the owls nest there now, and the wild animals snuggle in the ruins. It's a queer place. I once went out to see it, hearing tales of lights being seen there. But there was nothing to see but the shell of the place, and the dark blue water. Ah, Gloomy Water's a good name for that lake!'

'Could you tell us the way? And how long would it take us to get there?' asked Julian.

'What for do you want to go and gaze at a poor old ruin?' said the old man. 'Or do you want to bathe in the lake? Well, don't you do so - it's freezing cold!'

'We just thought we'd go and see Gloomy Water,' said Julian. 'Such a strange name. Which is the way, did you say?'

'I didn't say,' said the old fellow. 'But I will if so be you're set on it. Where's your map? Is that one in your hand?'

Julian spread it out. The old fellow took a pen from his waistcoat pocket and began to trace a path over the moor. He put crosses here and there.

'See them crosses? They mark marshland. Don't go treading there, or you'll be up to your knees in muddy water! You follow these paths I've inked in for you and you'll be all right. Keep your eyes open for deer - there's plenty about those parts, and pretty things they are too.'

'Thank you very much,' said Julian, folding up the map. 'How long would it take us to get there from here?'

'Matter of two hours or more,' said the old man. 'Don't you try to go this afternoon. You'll find yourselves in darkness coming back, and with them dangerous marshy bits you're in danger all the time!'

'Right,' said Julian. 'Thanks very much. Er - we're thinking of doing a bit of camping, as the weather is so beautiful. I suppose you couldn't hire us a groundsheet or two and a few rugs?'

The other three stared at him in astonishment. Camping out? Where? Why? What was Julian thinking of all of a sudden?

Julian winked at them. The old man was ferreting about in a cupboard. He pulled out two large rubber ground-sheets and four old rugs. 'Thought I had them somewhere!' he said. 'Well, better you camping out in October than me! Be careful you don't catch your deaths of cold!'

'Oh thanks - just what we want,' said Julian, pleased. 'Roll them up, you others. I'll settle up for them.'

Dick, Anne and George folded up the ground-sheets and the rugs in astonishment. Surely - surely Julian wasn't thinking of camping out by Gloomy Water? He must think the message that Dick had been given was very important!

'Julian!' said Dick, as soon as they got outside. 'What's up? What's all this for?'

Julian looked a little sheepish. 'Well - something suddenly came over me in the store,' he said. 'I suddenly felt we ought to go to Gloomy Water and snoop round. I felt excited somehow. And as we've got so little time this week-end I thought if we took things and camped out in the ruin we might make more of our few days.'

'What an idea!' said George. 'Not go on with our hiking, do you mean?'

'Well,' said Julian. 'If we find nothing, we can go on with our hike, of course. But if there's anything interesting, it's up to us to unearth it. I'm quite sure there's something up at Two-Trees.'

'We might meet Maggie there!' said Anne, with a giggle.

'We might!' said Julian. 'I feel quite free to go and investigate on our own seeing that we've made our report to the police, and it's been turned down with scorn. Somebody ought to follow up that message - besides Maggie!'

'Dear Maggie,' said Dick. 'I wonder who in the wide world she is!'

'Somebody worth watching if she's the friend of convicts,' said Julian, more soberly. 'Look, this is what I thought we'd do - buy some extra food, and go along to Gloomy Water this afternoon, arriving there before dark. We'll find a good place to shelter in - there must be some good spot in the old ruin - and get heather or bracken for beds. Then tomorrow we can be up bright and early to have a look round.'

'It sounds smashing,' said Dick, pleased. 'Sort of thing we like. What do you say, Tim?' 'Woof,' said Tim, solemnly, bumping his tail to and fro across Dick's legs.

'And if we find there's absolutely nothing of interest, well, we can come back here with the things we've borrowed, and go on with our hike,' said Julian. 'But we'll have to sleep the night there because it will be dark by the time we've had a look round.'

They bought some loaves of bread, some butter and potted meat, and a big fruit cake. Also some more chocolate and some biscuits. Julian bought a bottle of orangeade as well.

'There's sure to be a well,' he said. 'Or a spring of some sort. We can dilute the orangeade and drink it when we're thirsty. Now I think we're ready. Come on!'

They couldn't go as fast as usual because they were carrying so many things. Timmy was the only one that ran as fast as ever - but then Timmy carried nothing but himself!

It was a really lovely walk over the moorlands. They climbed fairly high and had wonderful views all over the autumn country-side. They saw wild ponies again, in the distance this time, and a little herd of dappled deer, that sped away immediately.

Julian was very careful to take the right paths - the ones traced so carefully on the map by the old man in the post-office. 'I expect he knew the way well because he was once a postman and had to take letters to Two-Trees!' said Dick, bending over the map. 'We're getting on, Ju - halfway there!'

The sun began to sink low. The children hurried as much as they could because once the sun had gone darkness would soon come. Fortunately the sky was very clear, so twilight would be later than it had been the night before.

'It looks as if the moorland near here gives way soon to a little bit of wooded country, according to the map,' said Julian. 'We'll look out for clumps of trees.'

After another little stretch of moorland Julian pointed to the right. 'Look!' he said. 'Trees! Quite a lot - a proper little wood.'

'And isn't that water over there?' said Anne. They stood still and gazed hard. Was it Gloomy Water? It might be. It looked such a dark blue. They hurried on eagerly. It didn't look very far now. Timmy ran ahead, his long tail waving in the air.

They went down a little winding path and joined a cart-track that was very much overgrown - so overgrown that it hardly looked like a track. 'This must lead to Two-Trees,' said Julian. 'I wish the sun wasn't going down so quickly. We'll hardly have any time to look round!'

They entered a wood. The track wound through it. The trees must have been cleared at some time to make a road through the wood. And then, quite suddenly, they came on what had once been the lovely house of Two-Trees.

It was a desolate ruin, blackened and scorched with fire. The windows had no glass, the roof had gone, except for a few rafters here and there. Two birds flew up with a loud cry as the children went near.

'Two Maggies!' said Anne, with a laugh. They were black and white magpies, their long tails stretched out behind them. 'I wonder if they know the message too.'

The house stood on the edge of the lake. Gloomy Water was indeed a good name for it. It lay there, smooth and dark, a curious deep blue. No little waves lapped the edge. It was as still as if it were frozen.

'I don't like it,' said Anne. 'I don't like this place at all! I wish we hadn't come!'

Chapter 12

A HIDING PLACE AT TWO-TREES

Nobody particularly liked the place. They all stared round and Julian pointed silently to something. At each end of the house was the great burnt trunk of a big tree.

'Those must be the two trees that gave the place its name,' said Julian. 'How horrid they look now, so stiff and black. Two-Trees and Gloomy Water - all so lonely and desolate now.'

The sun disappeared and a little chill came on the air. Julian suddenly became very busy. 'Come on - we must see if there's anywhere to shelter at all in this old ruin!'

They went to the silent house. The upper floors were all burnt out. The ground floor was pretty bad too, but Julian thought it might be possible to find a sheltered corner.

'This might do,' he said, coming out of a blackened room and beckoning the others to him. 'There is even a mouldy carpet still on the floor! And there's a big table. We could sleep under it if it rained - which I don't think it will do!'

'What a horrid room!' said Anne, looking round. 'I don't like its smell, either. I don't want to sleep here.'

'Well, find somewhere else then, but be quick about it,' said Julian. 'It will soon be dark. I'm going to collect heather and bracken straight away, before it's too dark. Coming, Dick and George?'

The three of them went off and came back with vast armfuls of heather and brown bracken. Anne met them, looking excited.

'I've found somewhere. Somewhere much better than this horrid room. Come and look.'

She took them to what once had been the kitchen. A door lay flat on the floor at the end of the room, and a stone stairway led downwards.

'That leads down to the cellars,' said Anne. 'I came in here and saw that door. It was locked and I couldn't open it. Well, I tugged and tugged and the whole door came off its rusty old hinges and tumbled down almost on top of me! And I saw there were cellars down there!'

She stared at Julian beseechingly. 'They'll be dry. They won't be burnt and black like everywhere else. We'll be well-sheltered. Can't we sleep down there? I don't like the feel of these horrid burnt rooms.'

'It's an idea,' said Julian. He switched on his torch and let the beam light up the cellar below. It seemed spacious and smelt all right.

He went down the steps, Timmy just in front. He called up in surprise.

'There's a proper room down here, as well as cellars all round. Maybe it was a kind of sitting-room for the staff. It's wired for electricity too - they must have had their own electricity generator. Yes - we'll certainly come down here.'

It was a queer little room. Moth-eaten carpets were on the floor, and the furnishings were moth-eaten too and covered with dust. Spiders had been at work and George slashed fiercely at the long cobwebs that hung down and startled her by touching her face.

'There are still candles in the candle-sticks on this shelf!' said Dick, surprised. 'We can light them and have a bit of brightness when it's dark. This isn't bad at all. I must say I agree with Anne. There's something hateful about those burnt-out rooms.'

They piled heather and bracken into the cellar room on the floor. The furniture was so old and moth-eaten that it gave beneath their weight, and was useless for sitting on. The table was all right though. They soon set out their food on it after George had wiped it free of dust. She caused them all to have fits of choking because she was so vigorous in her dusting! They were driven up into the kitchen till the dust had settled.

It was dark outside now. The moon was not yet up. The wind rustled the dry leaves left on the trees around, but there was no lap-lap of water. The lake was as still as glass.

There was a cupboard in the cellar room. Julian opened it to see what was there. 'More candles - good!' he said, bringing out a bundle. 'And plates and cups. Did anyone see a well outside? If so we could dilute some orangeade and have a drink with our supper.'

No one had noticed a well - but Anne suddenly remembered something queer she had seen in a corner of the kitchen, near the sink.

'I believe I saw a pump up there!' she said. 'Go and see, Ju. If so, it might still work.'

He went up the cellar-steps with a candle. Yes - Anne was right. That was an old pump over there in the corner. It probably pumped water into a tank and came out of the kitchen taps.

He turned on a big tap which was over the large sink. Then he took the handle of the pump and worked it vigorously up and down. Splash! Splash! Water came flooding through the big tap and splashed into the sink! That was good.

Julian pumped and pumped, feeling that he had better get rid of any water running into the tank for the first time for years. The tank might be dirty or rusty - he must wash it round with a good deal of pumped water first.

The water seemed to be clean and clear, and was certainly as cold as ice! Julian held a cup from the cellar cupboard under the tap, and then tasted the water. It was delicious.

'Good for you, Anne!' he called, going down the cellar-steps with a cupful of water. 'Dick, you find some more cups - or a jug or something in that cupboard, and we'll wash them out and fill them with water for our orangeade.'

The cellar room looked very cheerful as Julian came down the steps. George and Anne had lighted six more candles, and stuck them about here and there. The light they gave was very pleasant, and they also warmed the room a little.

'Well, I suppose as usual, everyone wants a meal?' said Julian. 'Good thing we bought that bread and potted meat and stuff. I can't say I'm as hungry as I was at breakfast, but I'm getting that way.'

The four squatted round on their beds of heather and bracken. They had put down their ground-sheets first in case the floor was damp, though it didn't seem to be. Over bread and butter and potted meat they discussed their plans. They would sleep there for the night and then have all the next day to examine Two-Trees and the lake.

'What exactly are we looking for?' asked Anne. 'Do you suppose there's some secret here, Julian?'

'Yes,' said Julian. 'And I think I know what it is!'

'What?' asked George and Anne, surprised. Dick thought he knew. Julian explained.

'Well, we know that a prisoner called Nailer sent an important message by his escaped friend to two people - one he wanted to send to Dirty Dick - but he didn't get it - and the other to Maggie, whoever she is. Now what secret does he want to tell them?'

'I think I can guess,' said Dick. 'But go on.'

'Now suppose that Nailor has done some big robberies,' said Julian. 'I don't know what. Jewellery robberies probably, because they are the commonest with big criminals. All right - he does a big robbery - he hides the stuff till he hopes the hue and cry will be over - but he's caught and put into prison for a number of years. But he doesn't tell where the stuff is hidden! He daren't even write a letter to tell his friends outside the prison where it is. All his letters are read before they leave the prison. So what is he to do?'

'Wait till someone escapes and then give him a message,' said Dick. 'And that's just what happened, isn't it, Julian? That round-headed man I saw was the escaped prisoner, and he was sent to tell Dirty Dick and Maggie where the stolen goods were hidden - so that they could get them before anyone else did!'

'Yes. I'm sure that's it,' said Julian. 'His friend, the escaped prisoner, probably wouldn't understand the message at all - but Dirty Dick and Maggie would, because they knew all about the robbery. And now Maggie will certainly try to find out where the stuff is.'

'Well, we must find it first!' said George, her eyes gleaming with excitement. 'We're here first, anyway. And tomorrow, as early as possible we'll begin to snoop round. What was the next clue in the message, Dick? After Two-Trees and Gloomy Water.'

'Saucy Jane,' said Dick.

'Sounds a silly sort of clue,' said Anne. 'Do you suppose Maggie and Jane are both in the secret?'

'Saucy Jane sounds more like a boat to me,' said Dick.

'Of course!' said George. 'A boat! Why not? There's a lake here, and I imagine that people don't build a house beside a lake unless they want to go boating and bathing and fishing. I bet we shall find a boat called Saucy Jane tomorrow - and the stolen goods will be inside it.'

'Too easy!' said Dick. 'And not a very clever place either. Anyone could come across goods hidden in a boat. No - Saucy Jane is a clue, but we shan't find the stolen goods in her. And remember, there's that bit of paper as well. It must have something to do with the hiding-place too, I should think.'

'Where is it?' asked Julian. 'That wretched policeman! He tore it up. Have you still got the pieces, Dick?'

'Of course,' said Dick. He fished in his pocket and brought them out. 'Four little pieces! Anyone got some gummed paper?'

Nobody had - but George produced a small roll of Elastoplast. Strips were cut and stuck behind the four portions of paper. Now it was whole again. They all examined it carefully.

'Look - four lines drawn, meeting in the centre,' said Julian. 'At the outer end of each line there's a word, so faintly written I can hardly read one of them. What's this one? "Tock Hill." And this next one is "Steeple". Whatever are the others?'

They made them out at last. ' "Chimney",' said Anne. 'That's the third.'

'And "Tall Stone" is the fourth,' said George. 'Whatever do they all mean? We shall never, never find out!'

'We'll sleep on it,' said Julian, cheerfully. 'It's wonderful what good ideas come in the night. It will be a very interesting little problem to solve tomorrow!'

Chapter 13

A NIGHT IN THE CELLAR

The piece of paper was carefully folded and this time Julian took it for safe keeping. 'I can't imagine what it means, but it's clearly important,' he said. 'We may quite suddenly come on something - or think of something - that will give us a clue to what the words and the lines mean on the paper.'

'We mustn't forget that dear Maggie has a copy of the paper too,' said Dick. 'She probably knows better than we do what it all means!'

'If she does, she will pay a visit to Two-Trees too,' said Anne. 'We ought to keep a look-out for her. Should we have to hide if we saw her?'

Julian considered this. 'No,' he said, 'I certainly don't think we should hide. Maggie can't possibly guess that we have had the message from Nailer, and the paper too. We had better just say we are on a hike and found this place and thought we would shelter here. All perfectly true.'

'And we can keep an eye on her, and see what she does if she comes!' said Dick, with a grin.

'Won't she be annoyed!'

'She wouldn't come alone,' said Julian, thoughtfully.

'I should think it quite likely that she would come with Dirty Dick! He didn't get the message, but she did - and probably part of her message was the statement that Dirty Dick would know everything too. So she would get in touch with him.'

'Yes - and be surprised that he hadn't got the message or the paper,' said George. 'Still, they'd think that the escaped fellow hadn't been able to get to Dirty Dick.'

'All very complicated,' said Anne, yawning. 'I can't follow any more arguments and explanations - I'm half asleep. How long are you going to be before you settle down?'

Dick yawned too. 'I'm coming now,' he said. 'My bed of bracken and heather looks inviting. It's not at all cold in here, is it?'

'The only thing I don't like is the thought of those cellars beyond this little underground room,' said Anne. 'I keep thinking that Maggie and her friends might be there, waiting to pounce on us when we are asleep.'

'You're silly,' said George, scornfully. 'Really silly! Do you honestly suppose that Timmy would lie here quietly if there was anyone in those cellars? You know jolly well he would be barking his head off!'

'Yes. I know all that,' said Anne, snuggling down in her heathery bed. 'It's just my imagination. You haven't got any, George, so you don't bother about imaginary fears. I'm not really scared while Timmy is here. But I do think it's funny the way we always plunge into something peculiar when we're together.'

'Adventures always do come to some people,' said Dick. 'You've only got to read the lives of explorers and see how they simply walk into adventures all the time.'

'Yes, but I'm not an explorer,' said Anne. 'I'm an ordinary person, and I'd be just as pleased if things didn't keep happening to me.'

The others laughed. 'I don't expect anything much will happen this time,' said Julian, comfortingly. 'We go back to school on Tuesday and that's not far off. Not much time for anything to happen!'

He was wrong of course. Things can happen one after the other in a few minutes! Still, Anne cuddled down feeling happier. This was better than last night when she was all alone in that horrid little loft. Now she had all the others with her, Timmy too.

Anne and George had one big bed between them. They drew their two rugs over themselves, and put their blazers on top too. Nobody had undressed because Julian had said that they might be too cold in just their night things.

Timmy as usual put himself on George's feet. She moved them because he was heavy. He wormed his way up the bed and found a very comfortable place between the knees of the two girls. He gave a heavy sigh.

'That means he's planning to go to sleep!' said George. 'Are you quite comfortable, Anne?'

'Yes,' said Anne, sleepily. 'I like Timmy there. I feel safe!'

Julian was blowing out the candles. He left just one burning. Then he got into his bed of bracken and heather beside Dick. He felt tired too.

The four slept like logs. Nobody moved except Timmy, who got up once or twice in the night and sniffed round inquiringly. He had heard a noise in the cellars. He stood at the closed door that led to the cellars and listened, his head on one side.

He sniffed at the crack. Then he went back to bed, satisfied. It was only a toad! Timmy knew the smell of toads. If toads liked to crawl about in the night, they were welcome to!

The second time he awoke he thought he heard something up in the kitchen above. He padded up the steps, his paws making a click-click-click as he went. He stood in the kitchen silently, his eyes gleaming like green lamps, as the moon shone on him.

An animal with a long bushy tail began to slink away outside the house. It was a fine fox. It had smelt unusual smells near the old ruin - the scent of people and of a dog, and it had come to find out what was happening.

It had slunk into the kitchen and then smelt the strong scent of Timmy in the room below. As quietly as a cat it had slunk out again - but Timmy had awakened!

Now the dog stood watching and waiting - but the fox had gone! Timmy sniffed its scent and padded to the door. He debated whether to bark and go after the fox.

The scent grew very faint, and Timmy decided not to make a fuss. He padded back to the steps that led down to the cellar room, and curled up on George's feet again. He was very heavy, but George was too tired to wake up and push him off. Timmy lay with one ear cocked for a while, and then went to sleep again, with his ear still cocked. He was a good sentinel!

It was dark in the cellar when the one candle went out. There was no daylight or sunshine to wake the children down in that dim little room, and they slept late.

Julian woke up first. He found his bed suddenly very hard, and he turned over to find a comfortable place. The heather and bracken had been flattened with his weight, and the floor below was very hard indeed! The movement woke him up, and he lay blinking in the darkness.

Where was he?

He remembered at once and sat up. Dick woke too and yawned. 'Dick! It's half-past eight!' said Julian, looking at the luminous hands of his wrist-watch. 'We've slept for hours and hours!'

They rolled out of their heathery bed. Timmy leapt off George's feet and came over to them, his tail wagging gladly. He had been half-awake for a long time and was very glad to see Julian and Dick awake too, because he was thirsty.

The girls awoke - and soon there was a great deal of noise and activity going on. Anne and George washed at the big stone sink, the cold water making them squeal. Timmy lapped up a big bowlful of water gladly. The boys debated whether or not to have a splash in the lake. They felt very dirty.

Dick shivered at the thought. 'Still, I think we ought to,' he said. 'Come on, Ju!'

The two boys went down to the lake-side and leapt in. It was icy-cold! They struck out strongly and came back glowing and shouting.

By the time they were back the girls had got breakfast in the cellar room. It was darker than the kitchen, but all of them disliked the look of the burnt, scorched rooms above. The bread and butter, potted meat, cake and chocolate went down well.

In the middle of the meal a sound came echoing into the old house - bells! Anne stopped eating, and her heart beat fast.

But they were not the clanging warning bells she had heard before!

'Church bells,' said Julian at once, seeing Anne's sudden look of fright. 'Lovely sound I always think!'

'Oh yes,' said Anne, thankfully. 'So it is. It's Sunday and people are going to church. I'd like to go too, on this lovely sunny October day.'

'We might walk across the moor to the nearest village if you like,' said Dick, looking at his watch. 'But we should be very late.'

It was decided that it was much too late. They pushed their plates aside and planned what to do that day.

'The first thing, of course, is to see if there's a boathouse and find out if there's a boat called Saucy Jane,' said Julian. 'Then we'd better try and puzzle out what that plan means. We could wander here and there and see if we can find Tall Stone - and I'll look at the map to see if Tock Hill is marked. That was on the plan too, wasn't it?'

'You boys go and get some more heather and bracken while we clear away and wash up,' said Anne. 'That is if you mean us to camp here another night.'

'Yes. I think we will,' said Julian. 'I think we may find things rather interesting here this weekend!'

Julian went out with Dick and they brought in a great deal more bedding. Everyone had complained that the hard floor came through the amount of heather and bracken they had used the night before, and poor George was quite stiff.

The girls took the dirty things up to the big sink to wash them. There was nothing to dry them with but that didn't matter. They laid them on the old worn draining board to dry.

They wiped their hands on their hankies and then felt ready for exploring round outside. The boys were ready too.

With Timmy bounding here and there they went down to the lake. A path had once led down to it, with a low wall on each side. But now the wall was broken, moss had crept everywhere, and the path was choked with tufts of heather and even with small bushes of gorse.

The lake was as still and dark as ever. Some moor-hens chugged across it quickly, disappearing under the water when they saw the children.

'Now, what about that boat-house?' said Dick at last. 'Is there one - or not?'

Chapter 14

WHERE IS THE 'SAUCY JANE'?

They walked beside the lake-side as best they could. It was difficult because bushes and trees grew right down to the edge. It seemed as if there was no boat-house at all.

And then George came to a little backwater, leading off the lake. 'Look!' she called. 'Here's a sort of river running from the lake.'

'It's not a river. It's only a little backwater,' said Dick. 'Now we may find a boat-house somewhere here.'

They followed the backwater a little way, and then Julian gave an exclamation. 'There it is! But it's so covered up with ivy and brambles that you can hardly see it!'

They all looked where he pointed. They saw a long low building built right across the backwater, where it narrowed and came to an end. It was almost impossible to tell that it was a building, it was so overgrown.

'That's it!' said Dick, pleased. 'Now for the Saucy Jane!'

They scrambled through bushes and brambles to get to the entrance of the building. It had to be entered by the front, which was over the water and completely open. A broad ledge ran right round the boat-house inside, and the steps that went up to it from the bank outside were all broken away, completely rotted.

'Have to tread warily here,' said Julian. 'Let me go first.'

He tried the old wooden steps, but they gave way beneath him at once. 'Hopeless!' he said. 'Let's see if there's any other way into the boat-house.'

There wasn't - but at one side some of the wooden boards that made the wall of the boat-house were so rotten that they could be pulled away to make an opening. The boys pulled them down and then Julian squeezed through the opening into the dark, musty boat-house.

He found himself on the broad ledge that went round the great shed. Below him was the dark, quiet water with not even a ripple on it. He called to the others.

'Come along in! There's a wooden ledge to stand on here, and it's hardly rotted at all. It must be made of better wood.'

They all went through the opening and stood on the ledge, peering down. Their eyes had to get used to the darkness at first, because the only light came through the big entrance at the farther end - and that was obscured by big trails of ivy and other creepers hanging down from roof to water.

'There are boats here!' said Dick, excited. 'Tied up to posts. Look - there's one just below us. Let's hope one of them is the Saucy Jane!'

There were three boats. Two of them were half full of water, and their bows were sunk right down. 'Must have got holes in them,' said Julian, peering about. He had got out his torch and was shining it all round the old boat-house.

Oars were strung along the walls. Dirty, pulpy masses of something lay on the shelves too - rotted cushions probably. A boat-hook stood in one corner. Ropes were in coils on a shelf. It was a dreary desolate sight, and Anne didn't like the queer echoes of their voices in the damp-smelling, lonely boat-house.

'Let's see if any of the boats are called Saucy Jane,' said Dick. He flashed his torch on to the nearest one. The name was almost gone.

'What is it?' said Dick, trying to decipher the faded letters. 'Merry something.'

'Meg!' said Anne. 'Merry Meg. Well, she may be a sister of Saucy Jane. What's the next boat's name?'

The torch shone steadily on to it. The name there was easier to read. They all read it at once.

'Cheeky Charlie!'

'Brother to Merry Meg!' said Dick. 'Well, all I can say is that these poor old boats look anything but merry or cheeky.'

'I'm sure the last one must be Saucy Jane!' said Anne, excited. 'I do hope it is!'

They went along the broad ledge and tried to read the name on the half-sunk boat there. 'It begins with C,' said George, disappointed. 'I'm sure it's C.'

Julian took out his handkerchief and dipped it in the water. He rubbed at the name to try and clean it and make it clearer.

It could be read then - but it wasn't Saucy Jane! 'Careful Carrie!' read the four, mournfully. 'Blow!'

'Merry Meg, Cheerful Charlie, Careful Carrie,' said Julian. 'Well, it's quite obvious that Saucy Jane belongs to the family of boats here - but where oh where is she?'

'Sunk out of sight?' suggested Dick.

'Don't think so,' said Julian. 'The water is pretty shallow in this boat-house - it's right at the very end of the little backwater, you see. I think we should be able to spot a boat sunk to the bottom. We can see the sandy bottom of the backwater quite clearly by the light of our torches.'

Just to make quite sure they walked carefully all round the broad wooden ledge and flashed their torches on the water that filled the boat-house. There was no completely sunken boat there at all.

'Well, that's that,' said Dick. 'The Saucy Jane is gone. Where? Why? And when?'

They flashed their torches round the walls of the boat-house once more. George's eye was caught by a large flat wooden thing standing upright on the ledge at one side of the house.

'What's that?' she said. 'Oh - a raft, isn't it? That's what those paddles are for, then, that I saw on the shelf above.'

They went and examined the raft. 'Yes - and in quite good condition too,' said Julian. 'It would be rather fun to see if it would carry us on the water.'

'Ooooh yes!' said Anne, thrilled. 'That would be super. I always like rafts. I'd rather try that raft' than any of those boats.'

'Well, there's only one boat that is possible to use,' said Julian. 'The others are obviously no good - they must have big holes in to sink down like that.'

'Hadn't we better look into them carefully just to make sure there's no loot hidden there?' said Dick.

'If you like,' said Julian. 'But I think it's Saucy Jane that's got the loot - otherwise why mention it by name in that message?'

Dick felt that Julian was right. All the same he went to examine the three boats most methodically. But except for rotted and burst cushions and coils of rope there was nothing to be seen in the boats at all.

'Well - where's the Saucy Jane?' said Dick, puzzled. 'All the family are here but her. Can she be hidden anywhere on the banks of the lake?'

'That's an idea!' said Julian, who was trying to shift the big raft. 'That's a really good idea! I think we ought to explore all round the lake and see if we can find the Saucy Jane hidden anywhere.'

'Let's leave the raft for a bit then,' said George, feeling thrilled at the thought of possibly finding the Saucy Jane tucked away somewhere, all the loot hidden in her. 'Let's go now!'

They made their way round the wooden ledge to the opening they had made in the side of the boathouse, and jumped down. Timmy leapt down gladly. He hadn't liked the dark boat-house at all. He ran into the warm sunshine, wagging his tail.

'Now which side of the lake shall we go first?' said Anne. 'The left or the right?'

They went down to the edge of the silent water and looked to left and right. They both seemed to be equally thick with bushes!

'It's going to be difficult to keep close to the edge of the water,' said Julian. 'Anyway, we'll try. The left side looks a bit easier. Come on!'

It was fairly easy at first to keep close to the water, and examine any tiny creek or look under over-hanging bushes. But after about a quarter of a mile the undergrowth became so very thick and grew so close to the water's edge that it was quite impossible to force their way through it without completely ruining their clothes.

'I give up!' said Julian at last. 'I shall have no jersey left in a minute! These spiteful brambles! My hands are ripped to bits.'

'Yes - they are spiteful!' said Anne. 'I felt that too!'

Timmy was the only one really enjoying himself. He couldn't imagine why the four were scrambling through such thick undergrowth, but as it was just what he liked he was very pleased. He was disappointed when they decided to give up and go back.

'Shall we try the right hand side of the lake, do you think?' said Julian, as they went back, rather disheartened.

'No. Don't let's,' said Anne. 'It looks even worse than this side. It's only waste of time. I'd rather go out on the raft!'

'Well - that would surely be a better way of exploring the banks of the lake than scrambling through prickly bushes, wouldn't it?' said George. 'We'd only need to paddle along slowly and squint into all the little creeks and under over-hanging trees - it would be easy!'

'Of course,' said Dick. 'We were silly not to think of it before. It would be a lovely way of spending the afternoon, anyway.'

They came through the trees and saw the ruined house in the distance. Timmy suddenly stopped. He gave a low growl, and all the others stopped too.

'What's up, Timmy?' said George in a low voice. 'What is it?'

Timmy growled again. The others cautiously retreated behind bushes and looked intently towards the house. They could see nothing out of the way. Nobody seemed to be about. Then what was Timmy growling at?

And then a woman came in sight, and with her was a man. They were talking earnestly together.

'Maggie! I bet it's Maggie!' said Julian.

'And the other is Dirty Dick,' said Dick. 'I recognize him - yes - it's Dirty Dick.'

Chapter 15

MAGGIE - AND DIRTY DICK

They watched the couple in the distance, and thought quickly. Julian had been expecting them, so he was not surprised. Dick was looking at Dirty Dick, recognizing the broad, short man, with his hunched-up shoulders and shock of hair. He didn't like the look of him any more than when he had seen him up at the old cottage!

Anne and George didn't like the look of the woman either! She was wearing trousers and had a jacket draped round her shoulders. She was also wearing sunglasses, and smoking a cigarette. She walked quickly and they could hear her voice. It was sharp and determined.

'So that's Maggie,' thought Julian. 'Well, I don't like her. She looks as hard as nails - a good companion for Nailer!'

He moved cautiously towards the other three. George had her hand on Timmy's collar, afraid that he might show himself.

'Listen,' said Julian. 'You're none of you to turn a hair! We'll just walk out into the open, talking cheerfully together and let them see us. If they ask us what we're doing, you all know what to say. Chatter nonsense as much as you like - put them off and make them think we're a bunch of harmless kids. If there are any leading questions asked us - leave me to answer them. Ready?'

They nodded. Then Julian swung out from the bushes and walked into the open, calling to Dick. 'Here we are again - there's the old house! My word, it looks worse than ever this morning!'

George and Timmy came bounding out together, and Anne followed, her heart beating fast. She wasn't as good as the others at this sort of thing!

The man and the woman stopped abruptly when they saw the children. They said a few words to one another very rapidly. The man scowled.

The children went towards them, chattering all the time as Julian had ordered. The woman called sharply to them.

'Who are you? What are you doing here?'

'Just hiking,' said Julian, stopping. 'It's our half-term.'

'What do you want to come here for then?' asked the woman. 'This is private property.'

'Oh no,' said Julian. 'It's only a burnout ruin. Anyone can come. We want to explore this queer lake - it looks exciting.'

The man and the woman looked at one another. It was clear that the idea of the children exploring the lake was surprising and annoying to them. The woman spoke again.

'You can't explore this lake. It's dangerous. People are forbidden to bathe in it or use a boat.'

'We weren't told that,' said Julian, looking astonished. 'We were told how to get here, and no one said the lake was forbidden. You've been told wrongly.'

'We want to watch the moor-hens, you see,' put in Anne, suddenly seeing a moor-hen on the water. 'We're fond of nature.'

'And we've been told there are deer near here,' said George.

'And wild ponies,' said Dick. 'We saw some yesterday. They were really lovely. Have you seen any?'

This sudden burst of chatter seemed to annoy the man and the woman more than Julian's answers. The man spoke roughly.

'Stop this nonsense. People aren't allowed here. Clear out before we make you!'

'Why are you here, then, if people aren't allowed?' asked Julian, and a hard tone came into his voice. 'Don't talk to us like that.'

'You clear off, I say!' cried the man, suddenly shouting loudly as he lost his temper. He took two or three steps towards them, looking very threatening indeed. George loosed her hold on Timmy's collar.

Timmy also took two or three steps forward. His hackles went up and he emitted a most fearsome growl. The man stopped suddenly, and then retreated.

'Take hold of that dog's collar,' he ordered. 'He looks savage.'

'Then he looks what he is,' said George. 'I'm not taking hold of his collar while you're about. Don't think it!'

Timmy took two or three more steps forward, growling loudly, walking stiffly and menacingly. The woman called out at once.

'It's all right, children. My friend here just lost his temper for a moment. Call your dog back.'

'Not while you are about,' said George. 'How long are you staying?'

'What's that to do with you?' growled the man, but he didn't say any more because Timmy at once growled back.

'Let's come and have something to eat,' said Julian, loudly, to the others. 'After all, we have as much right to be here as these people have. We don't need to take any notice of them - and we shan't be in their way!'

The four children marched forward. Timmy was still loose. He barked savagely once or twice as he came close to the unpleasant couple, and they shrank back at once. Timmy was such a big dog and he looked so very powerful! They eyed the children angrily as they went by, and watched them go into the ruined house.

'On guard, Timmy,' said George, as soon as they were in, pointing to the ruined doorway. Timmy understood at once, and stood in the doorway, a menacing figure with hackles up and snarling mouth. The children went down to the cellar room. They looked round to see if anyone had been there while they were away, but nothing seemed to have been moved.

'They probably haven't even noticed the cellars,' said Julian. 'I hope there's plenty of bread left. I'm hungry. I wish to goodness we were going to have a dinner like the one we had yesterday! I say - what an unpleasant pair Maggie and Dick are!'

'Yes. Very,' said Dick. 'I can't bear Maggie. Horrid common voice and hard face. Ugh!'

'I think Dirty Dick is worse,' said Anne. 'He looks like a gorilla or something with his broad hunched-up body. And WHY doesn't he cut his hair?'

'Fancies himself like that, I expect,' said George, cutting a loaf of bread. 'His surname ought to be Golliwog. Or Tarzan. I'm jolly glad we've got Timmy.'

'So am I,' said Anne. 'Good old Timmy. He hated them, didn't he? I bet they won't come near the doorway with Timmy there!'

'I wonder where they are,' said Dick picking up a great hunk of bread and butter and potted meat. 'I'm going to look.'

He came back in half a minute. 'They've gone to the boat-house, I think,' he said. 'I just caught a sight of one of them moving in that direction. Looking for Saucy Jane, I expect.'

'Let's sit down and eat and talk over what we'll do next,' said Julian. 'And what we think they will do next! That's quite important. They may be able to read the clues on that paper better than we can. If we watch what they do it may give us a guide as to what we must do.'

'That's true,' said Dick. 'I imagine that the plan Nailer sent must mean something to Dirty Dick and Maggie, just as the message did.' He chewed at his bread, thinking hard, trying once more to fathom the meaning of that mysterious piece of paper.

'I think on the whole we will follow out our original plan for this afternoon,' said Julian, after a little silence. 'We'll get out that raft and go on the lake with it. It's a harmless looking thing to do. We can examine the banks as we go - and if Maggie and Dick are out in a boat too, we can keep an eye on them as well.'

'Yes. Good idea,' said George. 'It's a heavenly afternoon anyway. I'd love to paddle about on the lake with that raft. I hope it's good and sound.'

'Sure to be,' said Dick. 'The wood it's made of is meant to last. Pass the cake, George - and don't save Timmy any. It's wasted on him.'

'It isn't!' said George. 'You know he loves it.'

'Yes. But I still say it's wasted on him,' said Dick. 'Good thing we got such an enormous cake!'

Are there any biscuits left?'

'Plenty,' said Anne. 'And chocolate too!'

'Good,' said Dick. 'I only hope our food will last us out. It won't if George has her usual colossal appetite.'

'What about yours?' said George, indignantly, rising every time to Dick's lazy teasing.

'Shut up, you two,' said Julian. 'I'm going to fill the water jug and have some orangeade. Give me something to take to old Tim.'

They spent about half an hour over their lunch. Then they decided to go and tackle the raft in the boathouse, and see if they could possibly launch it on the lake. It would be heavy, they knew.

They left the old house and went off to the boathouse. Julian suddenly caught sight of something out on the lake.

'Look!' he said, 'they've got one of the boats out of the boat-house - the one that wasn't half-sunk, I suppose! Dirty Dick is rowing hard. I BET they're looking for the Saucy Jane!'

They all stood still and watched. Dick's heart sank. Would Maggie and Dirty Dick get there first, and find what he and the other three were looking for? Did they know where the Saucy Jane was?

'Come on,' said Julian. 'We'd better get going if we want to keep an eye on them. They may be rowing to where the Saucy Jane is hidden!'

They climbed in through the wooden side of the boat-house and went to the raft. Julian saw at once that one of the boats had gone - Merry Meg. It was the only boat that was fit to take.

The four began to man-handle the big raft. They took it to the edge of the ledge. It had rope-handles on each side which the children held on to.

'Now - ease her gently,' said Julian. 'Gently does it. Down she goes!'

And down she went, landing with a big splash in the water. She bobbed there gently, a strong sound raft, eager to go out on the lake!

'Get the paddles,' said Julian. 'Then we'll be off.'

Chapter 16
OUT ON THE RAFT

There were four little paddles. Dick got them, and gave everyone one each. Timmy looked down solemnly at the raft. What was it? Surely he was not expected to ride on that bobbing, floating thing?

Julian was on the raft already, holding it steady for the others. He helped Anne on and then George stepped down. Dick came last - well, not quite last, because Timmy was not yet on.

'Come on, Tim!' said George. 'It's all right! It's not the kind of boat you're used to, but it acts in the same way. Come on, Timmy!'

Timmy jumped down and the raft bobbed violently. Anne sat down suddenly with a giggle. 'Oh dear - Timmy is so sudden! Keep still, Tim - there isn't enough room on this raft for you to walk all over it.'

Julian pushed the raft out of the boat-house. It knocked against the wooden ledge as it went, and then swung out on to the backwater outside. It floated very smoothly.

'Here we go!' said Julian, paddling deftly. 'I'll steer, Dick. None of you need to paddle till I say so. I can paddle and steer at the moment, till we get on to the lake itself.'

They were all sitting on the raft except Timmy, who was standing up. He was very interested in seeing the water flow past so quickly. Was this a boat then? He was used to boats - but in boats the water was never quite so near. Timmy put out a paw into the water. It was pleasantly cool and tickled him. He lay down with his nose almost in the water.

'You're a funny dog, Timmy!' said Anne. 'You won't get up too suddenly, will you, or you'll knock me overboard.'

Julian paddled down the little backwater and the raft swung out on to the lake itself. The children looked to see if there was any sign of Maggie and Dirty Dick.

'There they are!' said Julian. 'Out in the middle, rowing hard. Shall we follow them? If they know where the Saucy Jane is they'll lead us to it.'

'Yes. Follow them,' said Dick. 'Shall we paddle now? We'll have to be quick or we may lose them.'

They all paddled hard, and the raft suddenly swung to and fro in a most alarming manner.

'Hey, stop!' shouted Julian. 'You're all paddling against one another. We're going round in circles. Dick and Anne go one side and George the other. That's better. Watch how we're going, all of you, and stop paddling for a moment if the raft swings round too much.'

They soon got into the way of paddling so that the raft went straight ahead. It was fun. They got very hot and wished they could take off their jerseys. The sun was quite warm, and there was no wind at all - it was really a perfect October afternoon.

'They've stopped rowing,' said George, suddenly. 'They're looking at something - do you suppose they have got a bit of paper like the one we have, with the same marks, and are examining it? I wish I could see!'

They all stopped paddling and looked towards the boat in which Maggie and Dirty Dick sat. They were certainly examining something very carefully - their heads were close together. But they were too far away for the children to see if they were holding a piece of paper.

'Come on - we'll get as close to them as we can!' said Julian, beginning to paddle again. 'I expect it will make them absolutely mad to see us so close, but we can't help that!'

They paddled hard again, and at last came up to the boat. Timmy barked. Maggie and Dirty Dick at once looked round and saw the raft and the four children. They stared at them savagely.

'Hallo!' cried Dick, waving a paddle. 'We took the raft out. It goes well. Does your boat go all right?'

Maggie went red with rage. 'You'll get into trouble for taking that raft without permission,' she shouted.

'Whose permission did you ask when you took that boat?' shouted back Julian. 'Tell us and we'll ask their permission to use this raft!'

George laughed. Maggie scowled, and Dirty Dick looked as if he would like to throw his oars at them.

'Keep away from us!' he shouted. 'We don't want you kids spoiling our afternoon!'

'We like to be friendly!' called Dick, and made George laugh again.

Maggie and Dirty Dick had a hurried and angry conversation. They glared at the raft and then Maggie gave an order to Dirty Dick. He took up the oars again, and began to row, looking rather mutinous.

'Come on - follow,' said Julian, so the four began to paddle again following after the boat. 'Maybe we'll learn something now.'

But they didn't. Dirty Dick rowed the boat towards the west bank, and the raft followed. Then he swung out into the middle again, and again the raft followed, the children panting in their efforts to keep up.

Dirty Dick rowed right across to the east bank and stayed there till the children came up. Then he rowed off again.

'Having some nice exercise, aren't you?' called the woman in her harsh voice. 'So good for you all!'

The boat swung out to the middle of the lake again. Dick groaned. 'Blow! My arms are so tired I can hardly paddle. What are they doing?'

'I'm afraid they're just leading us on a wild goose chase,' said Julian, ruefully. 'They have evidently made up their minds that they won't look for the Saucy Jane while we're about - they're just tiring us out!'

'Well, if that's what they're doing I'm not playing!' said Dick, and he put down his paddle and lay flat on his back, his knees drawn up, panting hard.

The others did the same. They were all tired. Timmy licked each one sympathetically and then sat down on George. She pushed him off so violently that he nearly fell into the water.

'Timmy! Right on my middle!' cried George, surprised and indignant. 'You great clumsy dog, you!'

Timmy licked her all over, shocked at being scolded by George. She was too exhausted to push him away.

'What's happened to the boat?' asked Anne at last. 'I'm too tired to sit up and see.'

Julian sat up, groaning. 'Oh my back! Now where is that wretched boat? Oh, there it is - right away down the lake, making for the landing-place by the house - or for the boat-house probably. They've given up the search for the Saucy Jane for the time being anyway.'

'Thank goodness,' said Anne. 'Perhaps we can give it up too - till tomorrow anyhow! Stop snuffling down my neck, Timmy. What do you want us to do, Julian?'

'I think we'd better get back,' said Julian. 'It's too late now to start searching the banks of the lake - and anyway somehow I think it wouldn't be much use. The two in the boat didn't appear to be going anywhere near the banks - except when they began to play that trick on us to make us tired out!'

'Well, let's get back then,' said George. 'But I simply must have a rest first. Timmy, I shall push you into the water if you keep sitting on my legs.'

There was a sudden splash. George sat up in alarm. Timmy was not on the raft! He was swimming in the water, looking very pleased with himself.

'There! He thought he'd rather jump in than be pushed,' said Dick, grinning at George. 'You pushed him in!' said George, looking fierce.

'I didn't,' said Dick. 'He just took a header. He's having a jolly good time. I say - what about putting a rope round him and getting him to pull us to shore? It would save an awful lot of paddling.'

George was just about to say what she thought of that idea, when she caught Dick's sly grin. She kicked out at him. 'Don't keep baiting me, Dick. I'll push you in, in a minute.'

'Like to try?' asked Dick, at once. 'Come on. I'd like a wrestle to see who'd go into the water first.'

George, of course, always rose to a challenge. She never could resist one. She was up in a moment and fell on Dick, who very nearly went overboard at once.

'Shut up, you two!' said Julian, crossly. 'We haven't got a change of clothing, you know that. And I don't want to take you back with bronchitis or pneumonia. Stop it, George.'

George recognized the tone in his voice and she stopped. She ran her hand through her short curls and gave a sudden grin.

'All right, Teacher!' she said, and sat down meekly. She picked up her paddle.

Julian picked up his. 'We'll get back,' he said. 'The sun's sinking low. It seems to slide down the sky at a most remarkable speed in October.'

They took a very wet Timmy on board and began to paddle back. Anne thought it was a truly lovely evening. She gazed dreamily round as she paddled. The lake was a wonderful dark blue, and the ripples they made turned to silver as they ran away from the raft. Two moor-hens said 'crek-crek' and swam round the raft in curiosity, their heads bobbing like clockwork.

Anne gazed over the tops of the trees that grew at the lake-side. The sky was turning pink. Away in the distance, on a high slope about a mile away she saw something that interested her.

It looked like a high stone. She pointed at it. 'Look, Julian,' she said. 'What's that stone? Is it a boundary mark, or something? It must be very big.'

Julian looked where she was pointing. 'Where?' he said. 'Oh, that. I can't imagine what it is.'

'It looks like a very tall stone,' said Dick, suddenly catching sight of it too.

'A tall stone,' repeated Anne, wondering where she had heard that before. 'A tall... oh, of course!

It was printed on that plan, wasn't it - on the piece of paper Dick was given. Tall Stone! Don't you remember?'

'Yes. So it was,' said Dick and he stared at the faraway stone monument with interest. Then as the raft swung onwards, high trees hid the stone. It was gone.

'Tall Stone,' said Julian. 'It may be only a coincidence, of course. It wants a bit of thinking about, though. Funny we should suddenly spot it.'

'Would the loot be buried there?' asked George, doubtfully. Julian shook his head. 'Oh, no,' he said, 'it is probably hidden in some position explained by that mysterious map. Paddle up, everyone! We really must get back.'

Chapter 17

TIT FOR TAT!

When they arrived at the boat-house there was no sign of Maggie or Dick. But their boat was in the shed, tied up in front of the other two, where it had been before.

'They're back all right,' said Julian. 'I wonder where they are. Don't let's drag this clumsy, heavy raft into the boat-house. I don't feel as if I've any strength left in my arms. Let's drag it under a bush and tie it there.'

They thought this a good idea. They pulled the raft up to some thick bushes and tied it firmly to a root that was sticking out of the ground.

Then they made their way to the ruined house, keeping a sharp look-out for Maggie and Dick. There was still no sign of them.

They went in, Timmy first. He didn't growl so they knew it was safe. He led the way to the cellar steps. Then he growled!

'What's up?' said Julian. 'Are they down there, Tim?'

Timmy ran straight down the steps into the cellar room. He growled again, but it was not the fierce growl he always gave when he wanted to warn that enemies or strangers were near. It was an angry, annoyed growl as if something was wrong.

'I expect dear Maggie and Dirty Dick have been down here and found out where our headquarters are!' said Julian, following Timmy down the steps. He switched on his torch.

The beds of heather and bracken were there as they had left them, and their macs and rugs and rucksacks. Nothing seemed to have been disturbed. Julian lighted the candles on the mantelpiece and the dark little underground room came to life at once.

'What's the matter with Timmy?' asked George, coming down into the room. 'He's still growling. Timmy, what's up?'

'I expect he can smell that the others have been down here,' said Dick. 'Look at him sniffing all round. It's quite clear that someone has been here.'

'Anyone hungry?' asked Anne. 'I could do with some cake and biscuits.'

'Right,' said Julian, and opened the cupboard where they had put the food they had bought.

There was none there! Except for the crockery and one or two odds and ends that had been in the cupboard before, there was nothing. The bread had gone, the biscuits, the chocolate - everything!

'Blow!' said Julian, angrily. 'Look at that! The beasts! They've taken all our food - every bit. Not even a biscuit left. We were mad not to think they might do that!'

'Clever of them,' said Dick. 'They know we can't stay here long without food. It's a good way of chasing us out. It's too late to go and get any tonight, anyway - and if we go tomorrow for some, they'll do what they have come to do in their own good time... when we're not here.'

Everyone felt distinctly down in the dumps. They were hungry and tired, and a good meal would have made all the difference. Anne sank down on her bed of heather and sighed.

'I wish I'd left some chocolate in my rucksack,' she said. 'But I didn't leave any there at all. And poor Tim - he's hungry too! Look at him sniffing in the cupboard and looking round at George. Tim, there's nothing for you. The cupboard is bare!'

'Where are those two wretches gone?' suddenly said Julian, fiercely. 'I'll tick them off! I'll tell them what I think of people who come and rifle cupboards and take away all the food.'

'Woof,' said Timmy, in full agreement.

Julian went angrily up the stairs. He wondered again where Maggie and Dirty Dick were. He went to the empty doorway and looked out. Then he saw where they were.

Two small tents had been put up under some thickly growing trees! So that's where the two were going to sleep. He debated whether or not to go and tell them what he thought of people who stole food. He decided that he would.

But when he got over to the tents with Timmy, there was no one there! Rugs were laid inside, and there was a primus stove and a kettle and other odds and ends. At the back of one tent was a pile of something, covered by a cloth.

Julian had a good look into each tent, and then went to see if he could find out where Maggie and Dirty Dick had gone. He saw them at last, walking through the trees. They must have gone for an evening stroll, he thought.

They didn't come back to the tents, but sat down by the lake. Julian gave up the thought of tackling them and went back to the others. Timmy was left behind, snuffling about happily.

'They've got tents,' Julian informed the others when he was back in the cellar room again. 'They're obviously staying put till they've got what they came for. They aren't in the tents - they're out by the lake.'

'Where's Timmy?' asked George. 'You shouldn't have left him behind, Ju. They might do something to him.'

'Here he is!' said Julian, as a familiar noise of claws clattering on the ground came to their ears. Timmy came down the stone steps and ran to George.

'He's got something in his mouth!' said George, in surprise. Timmy dropped it into her lap. She gave a yell.

'It's a tin of shortbread! Where did he get it from?'

Julian began to laugh. 'He must have taken it from one of the tents!' he said. 'I saw something covered up with a cloth in one tent - their food, I imagine! Well, well - tit for tat - they took our food and now Timmy is taking theirs!'

'Fair exchange is no robbery,' grinned Dick. 'Serves them right! I say - Tim's gone again!'

He was back in a minute with something large and paper-covered. It was a big cake! The four roared with laughter. 'Timmy! You're a wonder! You really are!'

Timmy was pleased at this praise. Off he went again and brought back a cardboard box in which was a fine pork-pie. The children could hardly believe their eyes.

'It's a miracle!' said Anne. 'Just as I had made up my mind to starve for hours! A pork-pie of all things! Let's have some.'

'Well, I have no second thoughts about it,' said Julian, firmly. 'They took our food and we deserve some of theirs. Good gracious - don't say Tim's gone again.'

He had! He was enjoying himself thoroughly. He arrived this time with a packet of ham, and the children couldn't imagine how he had stopped himself from eating some on the way.

'Fancy carrying it in his mouth and not even tasting a bit!' said Dick. 'Tim's a better person than I am. I'd just have to have had a lick.'

'I say - we ought to stop him now,' said Julian, as Timmy ran up the steps again, his tail wagging nineteen to the dozen. 'We're getting a bit too much in exchange!'

'Oh, do see what he brings back this time,' begged Anne. 'Then stop him.'

He came back carrying an old flour bag in which something had been packed. Timmy carried it cleverly by the neck so that nothing had fallen out. George undid the bag.

'Home-made scones - and buns,' she said. 'Timmy, you are very, very clever, and you shall have a wonderful supper. But you are not to go and take any more things, because we've got enough. See? No more. Lie down and be a good dog and eat your supper.'

Timmy was quite willing. He wolfed ham and scones and a slice of cake, and then he went up into the kitchen, jumped into the sink and lapped the water lying there. He then jumped down and went to the doorway to look out. He barked. Then he growled loudly.

The children rushed up the stone steps at once. Outside, at a safe distance, was Dirty Dick.

'Have you been taking anything of ours?' he shouted.

'No more than you have been taking of ours!' shouted back Julian. 'Fair exchange, you know, and all that.'

'How dare you go into our tents?' raged the man, his shock of hair making him look very peculiar in the twilight.

'We didn't. The dog fetched and carried for us,' said Julian. 'And don't you come any nearer. He's just longing to fly at you! And I warn you, he'll be on guard tonight, so don't try any funny tricks. He's as strong and savage as a lion.'

'Grrrr,' said Timmy, so fiercely that the man started back in fright. He went off without another word, shaking with anger.

Julian and the others went back to finish a very delicious supper. Timmy went with them - but he planted himself at the top of the cellar steps.

'Not a bad place for him to be in tonight,' said Julian. 'I don't trust that couple an inch. We can give him one of our blazers to lie on. I say - this has boiled up into quite an adventure, hasn't it? It seems frightful to think we'll be back at school on Tuesday!'

'We must find the loot first!' said Anne. 'We really must. Let's get out that plan again, Ju. Let's make sure that Tall Stone is marked on it.'

They got it out and put it on the table. They bent over it once more.

'Yes - Tall Stone is marked at the end of one of the lines,' said Julian. 'Tock Hill is at the end of the opposite line. Let's get the map and see if there is a Tock Hill.'

They got the map, and studied it. Anne suddenly put her finger down on it. 'There it is. On the opposite side of the lake from where we saw the Tall Stone. Tock Hill on one side. Tall Stone on the other. Surely that means something.'

'It does, of course,' said Julian. 'It is bearings given to show the whereabouts of the hidden goods. There are four bearings given - Tall Stone. Tock Hill. Chimney. And Steeple.'

'Listen!' said Dick, suddenly. 'LISTEN! I know how to read that map. It's easy.'

The others looked at him in surprise and doubt.

'Read it, then,' said Julian. 'Tell us what it all means. I don't believe you can!'

Chapter 18

A VERY EXCITING TIME

'Let's take all the clues we know,' said Dick, looking excited. 'Two Trees. That's here. Gloomy Water. That's where the hidden stuff must be. Saucy Jane. It's a boat that contains the stuff, hidden somewhere on Gloomy Water.'

'Go on,' said Julian, as Dick paused to think.

'Maggie is the next clue - well she's here, probably an old friend of Nailer's,' said Dick. 'She knows all the clues too.'

He jabbed his finger at the piece of paper. 'Now for these clues. Listen! We saw Tall Stone when we were out on the lake, didn't we? Very well. There must be SOME spot on the lake from where we can see not only Tall Stone, but also Tock Hill, Chimney and Steeple, whatever they are! There must be only one spot from which we can see all those four things at the same time - and that's the spot to hunt in for the treasure!'

There was an astonished silence after this. Julian drew a long breath and clapped Dick on the back.

'Of course! What idiots we were not to see it before. The Saucy Jane must be somewhere on - or in - the lake at the spot where all four clues are seen at the same time. We've only got to explore and find out!'

'Yes - but don't forget that Maggie and Dirty Dick know what these clues mean too! They'll be there first if they possibly can!' said Dick. 'And what's more if they get the goods we can't do anything about it. We're not the police! They'll be off and away with their find and disappear completely.'

Everyone began to feel intensely excited. 'I think we'd better set off early tomorrow morning,' said Julian. 'As soon as it's light. Otherwise Maggie and Dick will get in first. I wish to goodness we had an alarm clock.'

'We'll go on the raft, and we'll paddle about till we see Tall Stone again - then we'll keep that in sight till we see Tock Hill, whatever that is,' said Dick. 'And once we've spotted that we'll keep both Tall Stone and Tock Hill in sight and paddle round to find out where we can see a steeple - and then a chimney. I should think that would be the one chimney left on Two Trees-house! Did you notice there is just one left, sticking up high?'

'Yes, I noticed,' said Anne. 'What a clever way to hide anything, Dick. Nobody could possibly know what the clues meant unless they knew something of the secret. This is awfully exciting!'

They talked about it for some time and then Julian said they really must try and go to sleep or they would never wake up early enough in the morning.

They settled down in their beds of heather and bracken. Timmy lay on Julian's blazer on the top step of the stairs leading down to the cellar room. He seemed to think it was quite a good idea to sleep there that night.

They were all tired and they fell asleep very quickly. Nothing disturbed them in the night. The fox came again and looked into the old house, but Timmy didn't stir. He merely gave a small growl and the fox fled, his bushy tail spread behind him.

The morning came and daylight crept in at the burnt-out doorway and windows. Timmy stirred and went to the door. He looked towards the two tents. No one was about there. He went to the cellar steps and clattered down waking Dick and Julian at once.

'What's the time?' said Julian, remembering immediately that he was to wake early. 'Half-past seven. Wake up, everyone! It's daylight. We've heaps to do!'

They washed hurriedly, combed out their hair, cleaned their teeth, and tried to brush down their clothes. Anne got ready some snacks for them - ham, scones and a piece of shortbread each. They all had a drink of water and then they were ready to go.

There was no sign of anyone near the two tents. 'Good,' said Julian. 'We'll be there first!'

They dragged the raft out and got on to it, taking up the paddles. Then off they went, Timmy too, all feeling tremendously excited.

'We'll paddle out to where we think we were last night when Anne caught sight of Tall Stone,' said Julian. So they paddled valiantly, though their arms were stiff with yesterday's paddling and it was really very painful to use the tired muscles all over again!

They paddled out to the middle of the lake and looked for Tall Stone. It didn't seem anywhere to be seen! They strained their eyes for it, but for a long time it was not to be spotted at all. Then Dick gave a cry. 'It's just come into sight. Look, when we passed those tall trees on the bank yonder, Tall Stone came into view. It was behind them before that.'

'Good,' said Julian. 'Now I'm going to stop paddling and keep Tall Stone in sight. If it goes out of sight I'll tell you and you must back-paddle. Dick, can you possibly paddle and look out for something that could be Tock Hill on the opposite side? I daren't take my eyes off Tall Stone in case it disappears.'

'Right,' said Dick, and paddled while he looked earnestly for Tock Hill.

'Got it!' he said suddenly. 'It must be it! Look, over there - a funny little hill with a pointed top. Julian, can you still see Tall Stone?'

'Yes,' said Julian. 'Keep your eyes on Tock Hill. Now it's up to the girls. George, paddle away and see if you can spot Steeple.'

'I can see it now, already!' said George, and for one moment the boys took their eyes off Tall Stone and Tock Hill and looked where George pointed. They saw the steeple of a faraway church glinting in the morning sun.

'Good, good, good,' said Julian. 'Now Anne - look for Chimney - look down towards the end of the lake - where the house is. Can you see its one chimney?'

'Not quite,' said Anne. 'Paddle just a bit to the left - the left, I said, George! Yes - yes, I can see the one chimney. Stop paddling everyone. We're here!'

They stopped paddling but the raft drifted on, and Anne lost the chimney again! They had to paddle back a bit until it came into sight. By that time George had lost her steeple!

At last all four things were in view at once, and the raft seemed to be still and unmoving on the quiet waters of the lake.

'I'm going to drop something to mark the place,' said Julian, still keeping his eyes desperately on Tall Stone. 'George, can you manage to watch Tall Stone and Steeple at the same time? I simply must look what I'm doing for the moment.'

'I'll try,' said George, and fixed her eyes first on Tall Stone, then on Steeple, then on Tall Stone again, hoping and praying that neither would slip out of sight if the raft moved on the water.

Julian was busy. He had taken his torch and his pocket-knife out of his pocket and had tied them together with string. 'I haven't enough string, Dick,' he said. 'You've got some, haven't you?'

Dick had, of course. He put his hand into his pocket, still keeping his eyes on Tock Hill and passed his string over to Julian.

Julian tied it to the end of the string that joined together the knife and torch. Then he dropped them into the water, letting out the string as they went down with their weight. The string slid through his hands. It stopped in a short while and Julian knew that the knife and torch had reached the bed of the lake.

He felt in his pockets again. He knew he had a cork somewhere that he had carved into a horse's head. He found it and tied the end of the string firmly round it. Then he dropped the cork thankfully into the water. It bobbed there, held by the string, which led right down to the knife and torch on the lake-bed below.

'It's done!' he said, with a sigh of relief. 'Take your eyes off everything! I've marked the place now, so we don't need to glue our eyes on the four bearings!'

He told them how he had tied together his knife and torch and dropped them on string to the bottom of the lake, and then had tied a cork to the other end, so that it would bob and show them the place.

They all looked at it. 'Jolly clever, Ju,' said Dick. 'But once we slide away from this spot, and it would be an easy thing to do, we'd find it jolly difficult to find that cork again! Hadn't we better tie something else to it?'

'I haven't got anything else that will float,' said Julian. 'Have you?'

'I have,' said George, and she handed him a little wooden box. 'I keep the three penny bits I collect in that,' she said, putting the money into her pocket. 'You can have the box. It will be much easier to see than the cork.'

Julian tied the box to the cork. It was certainly a good deal easier to see! 'Fine!' he said. 'Now we're quite all right. We must be right over the loot!'

They all bent over the edge of the raft and looked down - and they saw a most surprising sight! Below them, resting on the bottom of the lake, was a boat! It lay there in the shadows of the water, its outline blurred by the ripples the raft made - but quite plainly it was a boat!

'The Saucy Jane!' said Julian, peering down, feeling amazed and awed to think that they had read the bearings so correctly that they were actually over the Saucy Jane herself! 'The Nailer must have come here with the stolen goods - got out the Saucy Jane and rowed her to this spot. He must have taken his bearings very carefully indeed, and then holed the boat so that she sank down with the loot in her. Then I suppose he swam back to shore.'

'Most ingenious,' said Dick. 'Really, he must be a jolly clever fellow. But I say, Julian - how on earth are we going to get the boat up?'

'I can't imagine,' said Julian. 'I simply - can't - imagine! I hadn't even thought of that.'

Timmy suddenly began to growl. The four looked up quickly to see why.

They saw a boat coming over the water towards them - the Merry Meg, with Maggie and Dirty Dick in it. And the children felt quite certain that both were reading the bearings on their piece of paper in exactly the same way as they themselves had!

They were so engrossed in watching for Tall Stone, Tock Hill, Chimney and Steeple that they took no notice of the children at all. 'I don't think they guess for one moment that we've read the bearings and marked the place,' said Julian. 'How wild they'll be when they find we are right over the place they're looking for! Watch out for trouble!'

Chapter 19

MAGGIE AND DICK ARE ANNOYED

The boat in which Maggie and Dirty Dick were rowing went this way and that as the two searched for the same objects that the children had already spotted. The four watched them, and George put her hand on Timmy to stop him barking.

The boat came nearer and nearer. Maggie was trying to keep in view two or three of the bearings at once and her head twisted from side to side continually. The children grinned at one another. It had been hard enough for the four of them to keep all the bearings in view - it must be very difficult for Maggie, especially as Dirty Dick didn't seem to be helping very much.

They heard Maggie give sharp orders as the boat swung this way and that. Then it headed for them. Dirty Dick growled something to Maggie, who had her back to them, and she turned round sharply, losing the view of the things she was looking for.

Her face was full of anger when she saw the raft so near - and in the place where she wanted her boat to go! Afraid of completely losing the view of the things she was keeping her eyes on, she turned back again and hastily looked to see if Tock Hill, Tall Stone and Steeple were still all to be seen together. She said something in a furious voice to Dirty Dick, and he nodded with a sour face.

The boat came nearer and they heard Maggie say, 'I think I can see it now - yes - a bit farther to the right, please.'

'She's spotted One Chimney now,' whispered Anne. 'I expect they've got all the bearings. Oh dear - the boat will bump right into us!'

It did! Dirty Dick rowed viciously at them and the bows of the boat gave them a terrific jolt. Anne would have fallen into the water if Julian hadn't grabbed at her.

He yelled at Dirty Dick. 'Look out, you ass! You nearly had us over! What on earth do you think you're doing?'

'Get out of the way then,' growled Dirty Dick. Timmy began to bark savagely, and the boat at once drew away from the raft.

'There's plenty of room on this lake,' shouted Julian. 'What do you want to come and disturb us for? We aren't doing any harm.'

'We're going to report you to the police,' called the woman, her face red with anger. 'Taking a raft that doesn't belong to you, sleeping in a house where you've no right to be - and stealing our food.'

'Don't talk nonsense,' cried Julian. 'And don't you dare to ram us again. If you do I'll send our dog after you. He's longing to come.'

'Grrrr!' said Timmy, and showed his magnificent set of gleaming white teeth. Dirty Dick muttered something quickly to Maggie. She turned round again and called to them.

'Now look here, you kids - be sensible. My friend and I have come down here for a quiet weekend, and it isn't nice to find you four everywhere we go. Go back and keep out of our way and we won't report you at all. That's a fair bargain - we won't even say anything about your stealing our food.'

'We're going back when we think we will,' answered Julian. 'And no threats or bargains will make any difference to us.'

There was a silence. Then Maggie spoke hurriedly to Dirty Dick again. He nodded.

'Is this your half-term?' she called. 'When do you have to go back?'

'Tomorrow,' said Julian. 'You'll be rid of us then. But we're going to enjoy ourselves on this raft while we can.'

There was another hurried conference between the two. Then Dirty Dick rowed round a little, and Maggie began to peer down into the water. She suddenly looked up, nodded at Dirty Dick, and he rowed away again towards the end of the lake! Not another word did the couple say.

'I can see what they've decided to do,' said Julian, in a pleased voice. 'They think we'll be gone by tomorrow, so they'll wait till the coast is clear and then they'll come and collect the loot in peace. Did you see Maggie looking down into the water to spot the boat? I was afraid she would also spot our mark - the cork and the box! But she didn't.'

'I don't know why you sound so pleased,' said George. 'We can't get the boat up, you know that - and I don't feel pleased that we'll have to leave tomorrow and let that horrid pair collect the loot. I imagine they'll have some clever grown-up way of pulling up the boat from the bed of the lake - which they will do when we've gone tomorrow.'

'You're not very bright today, George,' said Julian, watching the boat being rowed farther and farther away. 'I told them we'd be gone tomorrow, hoping they would clear off and wait - and leave us time to get the loot ourselves. I think we can!'

'How?' said three voices at once, and Timmy looked inquiringly at Julian too.

'Well, we don't need to pull up the boat,' said Julian. 'We only want the loot. What's to prevent us from going down and getting it? I'm quite prepared to strip and dive down to the bottom there and feel about for any sack or bag or box. If I find one I'll come up for air, borrow a bit of rope from the raft and go down again - tie the rope to the sack and you can haul it up to the surface!'

'Oh Julian - it sounds so easy - but is it really?' said Anne. George and Dick considered the proposal carefully. They were most impressed by Julian's idea.

'Well, it may turn out to be much more difficult than it sounds, but I'm jolly well going to try it,' said Julian, and began to strip off his jersey.

Anne felt the water. It was very very cold to her warm hand. 'Ugh! I'd hate to dive down to the bottom of this horrid cold dark lake,' she said. 'I think you're brave, Ju.'

'Don't talk rubbish!' said Julian.

He was ready to go in now. He dived neatly into the water with hardly a splash. The other three craned over the edge of the raft to watch. They could see him down, deep down in the water, a ghostly figure. He stayed down such a long time that Anne got worried.

'He can't hold his breath all that time!' she said. 'He can't!'

But Julian could. He was one of the star swimmers and divers at his school, and this was easy to him. He came up again at last, and panted hard, trying to make up for holding his breath so long.

The others waited patiently. At last his breathing grew more even and he grinned at them.

'Ah - that's better! Well - it's there!' he said, triumphantly.

'Is it!' said everyone, thrilled. 'Oh Julian!'

'Yes. I dived right down to the boat - almost got there with the force of my dive - had to swim just a couple of strokes perhaps. And there was the poor old boat, rotting to bits. And in one end is a waterproof bag - almost a sack, it's so big. I ran my hands over it, and it's waterproof all right - so the loot must be packed in there.'

'Did it feel heavy?' asked Dick.

'I gave it a tug and couldn't move it,' said Julian. 'Either it's wedged in somehow or is really heavy. Anyway we can't fetch it out by diving down for it. I'll have to dive down again, fix a rope to it, then come up - and we'll give a heave-ho and up she'll come!'

Julian was shivering. Anne picked up the blazer she had brought and gave it to him to dry himself with. Dick looked hurriedly over the raft. There were certainly bits and pieces of rope sticking out here and there; some of it half-rotten, and a short length was tucked into a space between two planks of the raft.

It was much too short though - and surely the other bits and pieces would never join to make a long enough rope?

'The bits of rope we've got won't do, Julian,' said Dick. Julian was drying himself and looking towards the end of the lake, where Two-Trees stood. He was frowning. The others looked too.

The boat had reached the bank there, and had been pulled up. One of the couple, the children couldn't see which, was standing up on the bank - and something was glinting in the sun, something he or she was holding!

'See that glint?' said Julian. 'Well, that's either Maggie or Dirty Dick using field-glasses. They're going to keep an eye on us while we're here - just to make sure we don't suddenly spot the boat, I suppose! They don't guess we've already found it. I bet they were worried when they saw I'd taken a header into the water just over the sunken boat!'

'Oh - so that's what the flash is,' said George. 'The glint of field-glasses! Yes - they're watching us. Blow! That will put an end to us trying to haul up the loot, Ju. They'd see it and wait for us!'

'Yes. No good trying for that now,' said Julian. 'Anyway, as Dick says, we've not got enough rope. We'll have to get some from the boat-house.'

'But when do you propose to get the bag out of the sunk boat?' asked Dick. 'They'll keep those field-glasses on us even if we go out again this afternoon.'

'There's only one time to go when they won't have their glasses watching us,' said Julian, beginning to dress himself very rapidly, 'and that's tonight. We'll go tonight! My word – what an adventure!'

'Don't let's,' said Anne, in a small voice.

'There'll be a moon,' said George, excited.

'Smashing idea!' said Dick, thumping Julian on the back. 'Let's go back now so that they won't have any suspicions of us, and make our plans for tonight. And we'd better keep an eye on them too in case they row out to this spot themselves this afternoon.'

'They won't,' said Julian. 'They daren't run any risk of us spotting what they're doing. They will be sure to wait till we've gone.'

'And till the loot is gone!' said George with a laugh. 'I say - I do hope those two wretches haven't gone and taken our food again!'

'I hid it down in the cellars beyond our room - and locked the door leading there - and here's the key,' grinned Julian, holding up a large key.

'You never told us!' said George. 'Julian, you're a genius! How do you manage to think of things like that?'

'Oh - just brains!' said Julian, pretending to look modest, and then laughing. 'Come on - if I don't get warm quickly I'll have a most almighty chill!'

Chapter 20

IN THE MOONLIGHT

They paddled rapidly away. Dick took a last glance back to make sure that the cork and the box were still bobbing on the water to mark the place where the sunken boat lay. Yes - they were still there.

'It'll be maddening if it's cloudy tonight and the moon doesn't come out,' said George, as they paddled. 'We shouldn't be able to see Tock Hill, Tall Stone and the rest - and we might paddle for ages in the dark without spotting our cork-and-box mark.'

'Don't cross your bridges before you come to them,' said Dick.

'I'm not,' said George. 'I was only just hoping that wouldn't happen.'

'It won't,' said Julian, looking at the sky. 'The weather's set fine again.'

As soon as Maggie saw the children coming back again, she and Dirty Dick disappeared into their tents. Julian grinned. 'They've heaved a sigh of relief and gone to have a snack,' he said. 'I could do with one myself.'

Everyone felt the same. Paddling was hard work, and the air on the lake was keen - quite enough to give anyone a large appetite!

They pushed the raft into its hiding-place again. Then they made their way to the old house. They went down into the cellar room. Timmy growled and sniffed about again.

'I bet Maggie and Dirty Dick have been here, snooping round again,' said George. 'Looking for their pork-pie and ham! Good thing you locked it up, Ju!'

Julian unlocked the door into the cellars beyond, and brought out the food. 'A large toad was looking at it with great interest,' he said, as he brought it back. 'Timmy also looked at the toad with interest - but he's wary of toads by now. They taste much too nasty when pounced on!'

They took the meal up into the sunshine and enjoyed it. The orangeade was finished so they drank the cold clear water, pumping some vigorously.

'Do you know it's a quarter to three?' said Julian amazed. 'Where has the time gone? In a couple of hours or so it will be dark. Let me see - the moon will be well up about eleven o'clock. That's the time to go, I think.'

'Please don't let's,' said Anne. Julian put his arm round her.

'Now you know you don't mean that, Anne,' he said. 'You know you'll enjoy it all when the time comes. You couldn't bear to be left out of it! Could you?'

'No, I suppose I couldn't,' said Anne. 'But I don't like Maggie and Dirty Dick!'

'Nor do we,' said Julian, cheerfully. 'That's why we're going to beat them at their own game. We're on the side of the right, and it's worth while running into a bit of danger for that. Now let's see - perhaps we'd better just keep an eye on that couple till it's dark - just in case they try any funny tricks - and then we'll have a snooze, if we can, so as to be sure to be lively tonight.'

'There they are!' said Anne. As she spoke Maggie and her companion came out of their tents. They had a few words together and then walked off to the moorland.

'Taking their usual stroll, I suppose,' said Dick. 'Let's have a game of cricket. There's a bit of wood over there for a bat, and I've got a ball in my rucksack.'

'Good idea,' said Julian. 'I still feel a bit chilled from my bathe. Brrrrrr! That water was cold. I don't feel very thrilled at the thought of diving in tonight!'

'I'll do that,' said Dick, at once. 'My turn this time!'

'No. I know exactly where to spot the loot,' said Julian. 'I'll have to go down. But you can come down too, if you like, and help to tie the rope on to it.'

'Right,' said Dick. 'Now look out - I'm going to bowl!'

They enjoyed their game. The sun sank lower and lower, then it disappeared. A cloud came over the sky and darkness came quickly. George looked up at the sky anxiously.

'It's all right,' said Julian. 'It'll clear. Don't you worry!'

Before they went back into the house Julian and Dick slipped down to the boat-house for the coil of rope they would want that night. They found it easily enough and came back, pleased. It was quite good strong rope, frayed only in one place.

Julian was right about the weather. The sky cleared again in about an hour, and the stars shone crisply. Good!

Julian put Timmy on guard at the doorway. Then he and the others went into the dark cellar-room and lighted a couple of candles. They all snuggled down into their beds of heather.

'I shan't be able to snooze,' complained Anne. 'I feel much too excited.'

'Don't snooze then,' said Dick. 'Just have a rest and wake us up at the right time!'

Anne was the only one who didn't fall into a comfortable doze. She lay awake, thinking of this new adventure of theirs. Some children always had adventures and some didn't. Anne thought it would be much nicer to read about adventures than to have them. But then probably the ones who only read about them simply longed to have the adventures themselves! It was all very difficult.

Anne woke the others at ten to eleven. She shook George first, and then the boys. They were all in such a comfortable sleep that it was hard to wake them.

But soon they were up and about, whispering. 'Where's the rope? Good, here it is. Better put on blazers and macs. It'll be freezing on the lake. Everyone ready? Now - not a sound!

Timmy had come to the cellar room as soon as he had heard them stirring. He knew he had to be quiet so he didn't give even one small bark. He was thrilled to find they were going out into the night.

The moon was well up now, and although it was not full, it was very bright. Small clouds swam across the sky, and every now and again the moon went behind one of them and the world became dark. But that was only for a minute or two, then out it came again, as brilliant as ever.

'Any sign of the others?' whispered Dick. Julian stood at the doorway and looked towards the tents. No - all was quiet there. Still, it would be better if he and the others crept round the side of the house and kept in the shadows.

'We don't want to run any risk of them spotting us now,' whispered Julian, giving his orders. 'Keep out of the moonlight, whatever you do. And see that Tim walks to heel, George.'

Keeping well in the shadows the five crept down to the lake-side. The water gleamed in the moonlight, and a bright moon-path ran all down it, lovely to see. The lake looked very dark and brooding. Anne wished it had a voice of some kind - even the little lap-lap-lap of waves at the edge. But there was none.

They pulled out the raft and threw the coil of rope on to it. Then they clambered on, enjoying its smooth bob-bob-bobbing as they paddled out on the water. They were off!

Timmy was thrilled. He kept licking first one of the four, then another. He loved going out in the night. The moon shone down on the little company and turned every little ripple to silver as the raft bobbed over the water.

'It's a heavenly night,' said Anne, looking round at the silent trees that lined the banks. 'The whole place is so quiet and peaceful.'

An owl immediately hooted very loudly indeed from the trees and Anne jumped violently.

'Now don't start all the owls hooting by talking about how quiet everything is,' teased Julian. 'I agree though that it really is a heavenly evening. How calm and mirror-like this lake is. I wonder if it ever produces a wave of any sort! Do you suppose it stays like this even in a storm?'

'It's a queer sort of lake,' said Dick. 'Look out, Timmy - that's my ear. Don't lick it all away. I say - anyone looking out for our four bearings?'

'Well, we know more or less where we've got to paddle the raft to,' said Julian. 'We'll go in that direction and then see if we're spotting the bearings. I'm sure we're going right at the moment.'

They were. George soon saw Tall Stone, and then Tock Hill came into sight. It wasn't long before Steeple was seen too, shining in the moonlight.

'I bet the Nailer came and hid his loot out here on a moonlit night,' said Julian. 'All the bearings can be seen so very clearly - even Tall Stone. We really must find out sometime what it is. It looks like a great stone pointer of some sort, put up in memory of something or somebody.'

'There's One Chimney now,' said Anne. 'We have got them all in view - we should be near our mark.'

'We are!' said Dick, pointing to a little dark bobbing thing nearby. 'The cork and the box. How extremely clever we are! I really have a great admiration for the Five!'

'Idiot!' said Julian. 'Go on, strip now, Dick - we'll do our job straight away. Brrrrrr! It's cold!'

Both boys stripped quickly, putting their clothes into a neat pile in the middle of the raft. 'Look after them, Anne,' said Julian. 'Got the rope, Dick? Come on, then, in we go. We can't see the boat now, the waters are so dark - but we know it's just below the cork and the box!'

The boys dived in one after the other. Splash! Splash! They were both beautiful divers. The raft rocked as they plunged in and Timmy nearly went in too.

Julian had dived in first. He opened his eyes under the water and found that he could see the sunken boat just below him. With two strong strokes he reached it, and tugged at the waterproof bag there. Dick was beside him almost at once, the rope in his hands. The boys twisted it tightly round the top part of the bag.

Before they could finish the job they had to rise up to the surface to breathe. Dick couldn't hold his breath under water as long as Julian and he was up first, gasping painfully. Then Julian shot up and the night was full of great, painful breaths, as the boys gasped in the air they longed for.

The girls knew better than to ask anything just then. They waited anxiously till the boys' breathing grew easier. Julian turned and grinned at them.

'Everything's all right!' he said. 'Now - down we go again!'

Chapter 21

THE SACK AT LAST!

Down went the boys again and once more the raft jerked violently. The girls peered anxiously over the edge, waiting for them to return.

Julian and Dick were down at the sunken boat in a matter of a second or two. They finished the task of tying the rope to the waterproof bag. Julian gave it a hard jerk, hoping to free it if it were wedged tightly into the boat. He took the rest of the rope length in his hands in order to take it up to the surface.

Then, bursting for breath again, the two boys shot up to the raft, popping out of the water with loud gasps. They climbed on board.

They took a minute to get their breath and then Dick and Julian took the rope together. The girls watched, their hearts beating fast. Now was the test! Would that waterproof sack come up - or not?

The boys pulled strongly but without jerking. The raft slanted and Anne made a grab at the pile of clothes in the middle. Dick fell off into the water again.

He climbed back, spluttering. 'Have to pull more smoothly,' he said. 'I felt the sack give a bit, didn't you?'

Julian nodded. He was shivering with cold, but his eyes were shining with excitement. Anne put a macintosh round his shoulders and one round Dick's too. They never even noticed!

'Now - pull again,' said Julian. 'Steady does it - steady - steady! It's coming! Gosh, it's really coming. Pull, Dick, pull!'

As the heavy bag came up on the end of the rope, the raft slanted again, and the boys pushed themselves back to the other side of the raft, afraid of upsetting everyone into the water. Timmy began to bark excitedly.

'Be quiet, Timmy,' said George at once. She knew how easily sound travels over water, and she was afraid the couple in the tents might hear him.

'It's coming - it's there, look - just below the surface!' said Anne. 'One more pull, boys!'

But it was impossible to pull the heavy bag on board without upsetting the raft. As it was, the girls got very wet when the water splashed over the raft as it jerked and slanted.

'Look - let's paddle back to the shore and let the sack drag behind us.' said Julian, at last. 'We shall only upset the raft. Dress again, Dick, and we'll get back to the old house and open the sack in comfort. I'm so cold now that I can hardly feel my fingers.'

The boys dressed as quickly as they could. They were shivering, and were very glad to take up their paddles and work hard to get the raft back to shore. They soon felt a welcome warmth stealing through their bodies, and in ten minutes had stopped shivering. They felt very pleased with themselves indeed.

They looked back at the bulky object following them, dragging along just under the surface. What was in that bag? Excitement crept over all of them again, and the paddles struck through the water at top speed as all the four strained to get back as quickly as possible. Timmy felt the excitement too, and wagged his long tail without ceasing as he stood in the middle of the raft, watching the thing that bobbed along behind them.

They came at last to the end of the lake. Making as little noise as possible they dragged the raft under its usual bush. They did not want to leave it out on the bank in case Maggie and Dirty Dick saw that it had been used again, and started wondering.

Dick and Julian dragged the waterproof sack out of the water. They carried it between them as they went cautiously back to the house. It looked a most miserable, grotesque place with its burnt-out roof, doorways and windows - but the children didn't notice its forlorn appearance in the moonlight - they were far too excited!

They walked slowly up the overgrown path between the two broken-down walls, their feet making no sound on the soft mossy ground. They came to the doorway and dragged the bundle into the kitchen.

'Go and light the candles in the cellar room,' said Julian to George. 'I just want to make sure that that couple are not snooping anywhere about.'

George and Anne went to light the candles, flashing their torches before them down the stone steps. Julian and Dick stood at the open doorway, facing the moonlight, listening intently. Not a sound was to be heard, not a shadow moved!

They set Timmy on guard and left him there, dragging the dripping, heavy bundle across the stone floor of the kitchen. They bumped it down the cellar steps - and at last had it before them, ready to be opened!

Julian's fingers fumbled at the knots of the rope. George couldn't bear waiting. She took a pocket-knife and handed it to Julian.

'For goodness' sake, cut the rope!' she said. 'I simply can't wait another moment.'

Julian grinned. He cut the rope - and then he looked to see how to undo the waterproof wrapping. 'I see,' he said. 'It's been folded over and over the goods, and then sewn up to make a kind of bag. It must have kept the loot absolutely waterproof.'

'Buck up!' said George. 'I shall tear it open myself in a minute!'

Julian cut the strong stitches that closed the covering. They began to unwrap the bundle. There seemed to be yards and yards of waterproof covering! But at last it was off - and there, in the middle of the mass of waterproof, were scores of little boxes - leather-covered boxes that everyone knew at once were jewel-boxes!

'It is jewellery then!' said Anne, and she opened a box. They all exclaimed in wonder.

A magnificent necklace glittered on black velvet. It shone and glinted and sparkled in the candlelight as if it were on fire. Even the two boys gazed without a word. Why - it was fit for a queen!

'It must be that wonderful necklace stolen from the Queen of Fallonia,' said George at last. 'I saw a picture of it in the papers. What diamonds!'

'Oooh - are they diamonds!' said Anne, in awe. 'Oh Julian - what a lot of money they must be worth! A hundred pounds, do you think?'

'A hundred thousand pounds more likely, Anne,' said Julian, soberly. 'My word - no wonder the Nailer hid these stolen goods carefully, in such an ingenious place. No wonder Maggie and Dirty Dick were longing to find them. Let's see what else there is.'

Every box contained precious stones of some kind - sapphire bracelets, ruby and diamond rings, a strange and wonderful opal necklace, ear-rings of such enormous diamonds that Anne was quite sure no one would be able to bear the weight of them!

'I would never, never dare to own jewellery like this,' said Anne. 'I should always be afraid of its being stolen. Did it all belong to the Queen of Fallonia?'

'No. Some to a princess who was visiting her,' said Julian. 'These jewels are worth a king's ransom. I just hate the thought of being in charge of them, even for a little while.'

'Well, it's better that we should have them, rather than Maggie or Dirty Dick,' said George. She held a string of diamonds in her hands and let them run through her fingers. How they sparkled! No one could have imagined that they had been at the bottom of a lake for a year or two!

'Now let's see,' said Julian, sitting down on the edge of the table. 'We're due back at school tomorrow afternoon, Tuesday - or is it Tuesday already? It must be past midnight - gosh, yes, it's almost half past two! Would you believe it?'

'I feel as if I'd believe anything,' said Anne, blinking at the glittering treasure on the table.

'We'd better start off fairly early tomorrow,' went on Julian. 'We've got to get these things to the police ...'

'Not to that awful policeman we saw the other day!' said George, in horror.

'Of course not. I think our best course would be to ring up that nice Mr. Gaston and tell him that we've got important news for the police and see which police station he recommends us to go to,' said Julian. 'He might even arrange a car for us, so that we don't need to take this stuff about in buses. I'm not particularly keen on carrying it about with me!'

'Have we got to carry all these boxes?' said George, in dismay.

'No. That would be asking for trouble if anyone spotted them,' said Julian. 'I fear we'll just have to wrap up the jewels in our hankies and stuff them down into the bottom of our rucksacks. We'll leave the boxes here. The police can collect them afterwards if they want to.'

It was all decided. The four divided up the glittering jewellery and wrapped it carefully into four handkerchiefs, one for each of them. They stuffed the hankies into their rucksacks.

'We'd better use them for pillows,' said Dick. 'Then they'll be quite safe.'

'What! These horrid rough bags!' said Anne. 'Why? Timmy's on guard, isn't he? I'll put mine beside me under the rug but I just won't put my head on it.'

Dick laughed. 'All right, Anne. Timmy won't let any robber through, I'm quite sure. Now - we start off first thing in the morning, do we, Julian?'

'Yes. As soon as we wake,' said Julian. 'We can't have much to eat. There's only a few biscuits and a bit of chocolate left.'

'I shan't mind,' said Anne. 'I'm so excited that at the moment I don't feel I'll ever eat anything again!'

'You'll change your mind tomorrow,' said Julian with a laugh. 'Now - to bed, everyone.'

They lay down on their heather and bracken, excited and pleased. What a week-end! And all because Dick and Anne had lost their way and Dick slept in the wrong barn!

'Good-night,' said Julian, yawning. 'I feel very very rich - richer than I'll ever be in my life again. Well - I'll enjoy the feeling while I can!'

Chapter 22
AN EXCITING FINISH

They awoke to hear Timmy barking. It was daylight already. Julian leapt up the steps to see what was the matter. He saw Maggie not very far away.

'Why do you keep such a fierce dog?' she called. 'I just came to see if you wanted to take any food with you. We'll give you some if you like.'

'It's too kind of you, all of a sudden!' said Julian. How anxious Maggie was to get rid of them! She would even give them food to get rid of them quickly. But Julian didn't want any food from Maggie or Dirty Dick!

'Do you want some, then?' asked the woman. She couldn't make Julian out. He looked a youngster, and yet his manner was anything but childish. She was rather afraid of him.

'No thanks,' said Julian. 'We're just about to go. Got to get back to school today, you know.'

'Well, you'd better hurry then,' said the woman. 'It's going to rain.'

Julian turned on his heel, grinning. It wasn't going to rain. Maggie would say anything to hurry them away! Still, that was just what Julian wanted - to get away as quickly as possible!

In ten minutes' time the four children were ready to go. Each had rucksack and mac on their back - and each had jewels worth thousands of pounds in their charge! What a very extraordinary thing.

'It will be a lovely walk across the moors,' said Anne, as they went along. 'I feel like singing now everything's turned out all right. The only thing is - nobody at school will believe George or me when we tell them what's happened.'

'We shall probably be set a composition to do - "What did you do on your half-term?" ' said George. 'And Miss Peters will read ours and say "Quite well written, but rather far-fetched, don't you think?" '

Everyone laughed. Timmy looked round with his tongue out and what George called 'his smiling face'. Then his 'smile' vanished, and he began to bark, facing to the rear of the children.

They looked round, startled. 'Gosh - it's Maggie and Dirty Dick - rushing along like fury!' said Dick. 'What's up? Are they sorry we've gone and want us back again?'

'They're trying to cut us off,' said Julian. 'Look - they've left the path and they're going to take a short cut to come across us. There is marshland all round, so we can't leave our own path. What idiots they are! Unless they know this bit of marsh-moor country they'll get bogged.'

Maggie and Dirty Dick were yelling and shouting in a fury. Dirty Dick shook his fists, and leapt from tuft to tuft like a goat.

'They look as if they have gone quite mad,' said Anne, suddenly afraid. 'What's the matter with them?'

'I know!' said George. 'They've been into our cellar room - and they've found that waterproof covering and all those empty boxes. They've found out that we've got the goods!'

'Of course!' said Julian. 'We should have thrown all the boxes into the cellars beyond. No wonder they're in a fury. They've lost a fortune to us four!'

'What do they think they can do now, though?' said Dick. 'We've got Timmy. He'll certainly fly at them if they come too near. But Dirty Dick looks mad enough to fight even Timmy. Honestly, I think he's gone off his head.'

'I think he has,' said Julian, startled by the man's mad shouts and behaviour.

He looked at Anne, who had gone white. Julian felt sure that Timmy would go for Dirty Dick and bring him to the ground, and he didn't want Anne to see dog and man fighting savagely.

There was no doubt that Dirty Dick was quite out of his mind with rage and disappointment.

Timmy began to bark fiercely. He snarled, and looked very savage. He could see that the man was spoiling for a fight with someone. All right - Timmy didn't mind!

'Let's hurry on,' said Julian. 'But no short cuts for us, mind - we'll keep strictly to the path. Maggie is in difficulties already.'

So she was. She was floundering ankle deep in marshy ground, yelling to Dirty Dick to help her. But he was too intent on cutting right across the children's path.

And then he got into difficulties too! He suddenly sank up to his knees! He tried to clamber out and reach a tuft of some sort. He missed his footing and went down again. He gave an anguished yell. 'My ankle! I've broken it! Maggie, come over here!'

But Maggie was having her own difficulties and paid no attention. The children stopped and looked at Dirty Dick. He was sitting on a tuft, nursing his foot, and even from where the children stood they could see that his face was deathly white. He certainly had done something to his ankle.

'Ought we to help him?' said Anne, trembling.

'Good gracious no!' said Julian. 'He may be pretending for all we know - though I don't think so.'

The chase is over, anyway. And if, as I think, Dirty Dick really has injured his ankle, he won't be able to get far out of that marsh - and nor will Maggie by the look of her - down she goes again, look! It may be that the police will find it very easy to pick up that unpleasant couple when they come along to look for them.'

'Nicely embedded in the marsh,' said Dick. 'Well, personally, I don't feel sorry for either of them. They're bad lots.'

They went on their way again, Timmy gloomy because he hadn't had a fight with Dirty Dick after all. They walked all the way to Reebles. It took them two hours.

'We'll go to the post-office, and telephone from there,' said Julian.

The old man was pleased to see them again. 'Had a nice time?' he said. 'Did you find Two-Trees?'

Julian left him talking to the others while he went to look up Mr. Gaston's telephone number. He found it - and hoping devoutly that Mr. Gaston wouldn't mind giving his help, he rang him up.

Mr. Gaston answered the telephone himself. 'Hallo? Who? Oh, yes, of course I remember you. You want a bit of help? Well, what can I do for you?'

Julian told him. Mr. Gaston listened in amazement.

'WHAT! You've found the Fallonia jewels! I can't believe it! In your rucksacks now, you say! Bless us all! You're not spoofing me, are you?'

Julian assured him that he wasn't. Mr. Gaston could hardly believe his ears. 'Right. Right - of course I'll put you in touch with the police. We'd better go to Gathercombe - I know the Inspector there, a fine fellow. Where are you? Oh yes, I know it. Wait there and I'll fetch you in my car - in about half an hour, say.'

He rang off and Julian went to find the others, delighted that he had thought of getting into touch with Mr. Gaston. Some grown-ups were so jolly decent - and they knew exactly what to do. The other three were delighted too, when he told them.

'Well, I must say that although it's nice to have things happening to us, it's a sort of safe, comfortable feeling when we hand over to the grown-ups,' said George. 'Now I only want one thing - breakfast!'

'We'd better have a mixture of breakfast and lunch,' said Julian. 'It's so late.'

'Oh yes - let's have brunch!' said Anne, delighted. 'I love brunch.'

So they had some 'brunch' - sandwiches, buns, biscuits and ginger-beer, which they bought at a little shop down the road. And just as they were finishing, up swept Mr. Gaston in an enormous car!

The four children grinned at him with pleasure. Julian introduced Anne and Dick. Timmy was thrilled to see him again and offered him a polite paw, which Mr. Gaston shook heartily.

'Nice manners your dog's got,' he said, and pressed down the accelerator. Whoooosh! Away they went at top speed, with Timmy sticking his head out of the window as he always did in a car.

They told their extraordinary story as they went. Mr. Gaston was full of admiration for all they had done. 'You're a bunch of plucky kids!' he kept saying. 'My word, I wish you were mine!'

They came to the police station. Mr. Gaston had already warned the inspector they were coming, and he was waiting for them.

'Come along into my private room,' he said. 'Now first of all - where are these jewels? Have you really got them with you? Let's have a look at them before you tell your story.'

The children undid their rucksacks - and out of the hankies inside they poured the shining, glittering jewellery on to the oak table.

The inspector whistled and exchanged a look with Mr. Gaston. He picked up the diamond necklace.

'You've got them!' he said. 'The very jewels! And to think the police everywhere have been hunting for them for months and months and months. Where did you find them, youngsters?'

'It's rather a long story,' said Julian. He began to tell it, and he told it well, prompted by the others, when he forgot anything. Mr. Gaston and the inspector listened with amazement on their faces. When Julian came to the bit where Dirty Dick and Maggie had been left floundering in the marshes, the inspector interrupted him.

'Wait! Would they still be there? They would? Right. Half a minute!'

He pressed a bell and a policeman appeared. 'Tell Johns to take his three men and the car, and go to the Green Marshes, near Gloomy Water,' ordered the inspector. 'He's to pick up two people floundering there - man and woman. Our old friends Dirty Dick and Maggie Martin! Look sharp!'

The policeman disappeared. Anne hugged herself. Now that awful couple would be put into safe custody for some time, thank goodness - till she had forgotten about them! Anne hadn't liked them a bit.

Julian's tale came to an end. The inspector looked across at the tousle-headed, dirty, untidy group and smiled. He held out his hand. 'Shake!' he said. 'All of you! You're the kind of kids we want in this country - plucky, sensible, responsible youngsters who use your brains and never give up! I'm proud to meet you!'

They all shook hands with him solemnly. Timmy held up his paw too, and the inspector grinned and shook that too.

'And now - what's your programme?' asked Mr. Gaston, getting up.

'Well - we're all supposed to be back at school by three o'clock,' said Julian. 'But I don't think we can arrive looking like this. We'd get into awful rows! Is there a hotel where we can have a bath and clean ourselves up a bit?'

'You can do that here,' said the inspector. 'And if you like I'll run you back to your schools in the police car. We can't do too much for people who produce the Fallonia jewels out of rucksacks, you know. Bless us all - I can't believe it!'

Mr. Gaston said good-bye and went, saying that he was very proud to have made friends with them. 'And don't you get stuck down any more rabbit-holes!' he said to Timmy, who woofed happily at him.

They bathed and washed every inch of themselves. They found their clothes neatly folded and brushed, and felt grateful. They brushed their hairs and arrived looking very clean and tidy in the inspector's private room. He had a man there, inspecting the jewels and labelling them before he put them away into boxes.

'You'll be interested to know that we have picked up your couple,' he told them. 'The man had a broken ankle and couldn't stir a step. The woman was thigh deep in the marsh when we found her. They quite welcomed the police, they were so fed up with everything!'

'Oh good!' said the four, and Anne beamed with relief. That settled Maggie and Dirty Dick then! 'And these are the Fallonia jewels,' said the inspector. 'Not that I had any doubt of it. They are now being checked and labelled. I've no doubt the Queen of Fallonia and her titled friend will be extremely pleased to hear of your little exploit.'

A clock struck half past two. Julian looked at it. Half an hour only to get back in time. Would they do it?

'It's all right,' said the inspector, with his wide grin. 'Car's at the door. I'll come and see you off. You'll all be back at your schools in good time - and if anyone believes your tale I'll be surprised. Come along!'

He saw them into the car, Timmy too. 'Good-bye,' he said, and saluted them all smartly. I'm proud to have met you - good luck to you, Famous Five!

Yes, good luck to you, Famous Five - and may you have many more adventures!

THE END

Enid Blyton

THE
FAMOUS
FIVE

FIVE HAVE A WONDERFUL TIME

ENID BLYTON

FAMOUS FIVE 11

Five Have A Wonderful Time

Contents

| | | |
|----|---------------------------------|----|
| 1 | George Is All Alone | 2 |
| 2 | All Together Again | 6 |
| 3 | A Pleasant Morning | 10 |
| 4 | The Fair-Folk Arrive | 15 |
| 5 | Night And Morning | 19 |
| 6 | Unfriendly Folk | 24 |
| 7 | A Letter - A Walk - And A Shock | 28 |
| 8 | Where Are The Caravans? | 33 |
| 9 | A Great Surprise | 37 |
| 10 | Back With The Fair-Folk Again | 42 |
| 11 | A Very Strange Thing | 46 |
| 12 | Fire-Eating And Other Things! | 50 |
| 13 | Off To The Castle | 55 |
| 14 | Faynights Castle | 59 |
| 15 | An Interesting Day | 63 |
| 16 | Secret Ways | 68 |
| 17 | Excitement And Shocks | 72 |
| 18 | Jo Has An Adventure On Her Own | 77 |
| 19 | Jo Joins In | 81 |
| 20 | A Lot Of Excitement | 86 |
| 21 | In The Tower Room | 90 |
| 22 | Beauty And Jo Enjoy Themselves | 94 |
| 23 | Having A Wonderful Time! | 98 |

Chapter 1
GEORGE IS ALL ALONE

'I do think it's mean,' said George, fiercely. 'Why can't I go when the others do? I've had two weeks at home, and haven't seen the others since school broke up. And now they're off for a wonderful fortnight and I'm not with them.'

'Don't be silly, George,' said her mother. 'You can go as soon as that cold of yours is better.'

'It's better now,' said George, scowling. 'Mother, you know it is!'

'That's enough, Georgina,' said her father, looking up from his newspaper. 'This is the third breakfast-time we've had this argument. Be quiet.'

George would never answer anyone when she was called Georgina - so, much as she would have liked to say something back, she pursed up her mouth and looked away.

Her mother laughed. 'Oh, George, dear! Don't look so terribly fierce. It was your own fault you got this cold - you would go and bathe and stay in far too long - and after all, it's only the third week in April!'

'I always bathe in April,' said George, sulkily.

'I said BE QUIET,' said her father, banging down his paper on the table. 'One more word from you, George, and you won't go to your three cousins at all.'

'Woof,' said Timmy, from under the table. He didn't like it when anyone spoke angrily to George. 'And don't you start arguing with me, either,' said George's father, poking Timmy with his toe, and scowling exactly like George.

His wife laughed again. 'Oh, be quiet, the two of you,' she said. 'George, be patient dear. I'll let you go off to your cousins as soon as ever I can - tomorrow, if you're good, and don't cough much today.'

'Oh, Mother - why didn't you say so before?' said George, her scowl disappearing like magic. 'I didn't cough once in the night. I'm perfectly all right today. Oh, if I can go off to Faynights Castle tomorrow, I promise I won't cough once today!'

'What's this about Faynights Castle?' demanded her father, looking up again. 'First I've heard of it!'

'Oh no, Quentin dear, I've told you at least three times,' said his wife. 'Julian, Dick and Anne have been lent two funny old caravans by a school friend. They are in a field near Faynights

Castle.'

'Oh. So they're not staying in a castle, then,' said George's father. 'Can't have that. I won't have George coming home all high and mighty.'

'George couldn't possibly be high and mighty,' said his wife. 'It's as much as I can do to get her to keep her nails clean and wear clean shorts. Do be sensible, Quentin. You know perfectly well that George and her cousins always like to go off on extraordinary holidays together.'

'And have adventures,' grinned George, who was now in a very good temper indeed at the thought of going to join her cousins the next day.

'No. You're not to have any of those awful adventures this time,' said her mother. 'Anyway, I don't see how you can, staying in a peaceful place like the village of Faynights Castle, living in a couple of old caravans.'

'I wouldn't trust George anywhere,' said her husband. 'Give her just a sniff of an adventure, and she's after it. I never knew anyone like George. Thank goodness we've only got one child. I don't feel as if I could cope with two or three Georges.'

'There are plenty of people like George,' said his wife. 'Julian and Dick for instance. Always in the middle of something or other - with Anne tagging behind, longing for a peaceful life.'

'Well, I've had enough of this argument,' said George's father, pushing his chair out vigorously, and accidentally kicking Timmy under the table. He yelped.

'That dog's got no brains,' said the impatient man. 'Lies under the table at every meal and expects me to remember he's there! Well, I'm going to do some work.'

He went out of the room. The dining-room door banged. Then the study door banged. Then a window was shut with a bang. A fire was poked very vigorously. There was the creak of an armchair as someone sat down in it heavily. Then there was silence.

'Now your father's lost to the world till lunchtime,' said George's mother. 'Dear, oh dear - I've told him at least three times about Faynights Castle, where your cousins are staying, bless him. Now, George, I do really think you can go tomorrow, dear - you look so much better today. You can get your things ready and I'll pack them this afternoon.'

'Thank you, Mother,' said George, giving her a sudden hug. 'Anyway, Father will be glad to have me out of the house for a bit! I'm too noisy for him!'

'You're a pair!' said her mother, remembering the slammed doors and other things. 'You're both a perfect nuisance at times, but I couldn't bear to do without you! Oh, Timmy, are you still under the table? I wish you wouldn't leave your tail about so! Did I hurt you?'

'Oh, he doesn't mind you treading on it, Mother,' said George, generously. 'I'm going to get my things ready this very minute. How do I get to Faynights Castle? By train?'

'Yes. I'll take you to Kirrin Station, and you can catch the ten-forty,' said her mother. 'You change at Limming Ho, and take the train that goes to Faynights. If you send a card to Julian, he'll get it tomorrow morning and will meet you.'

'I'll write it now,' said George, happily. 'Oh, Mother, I began to be afraid this awful cold would hang on all through the holidays! I shan't bathe again on such a cold day in April.'

'You said that last year - and the year before that too,' said her mother. 'You have a very short memory, George!'

'Come on, Timmy!' said George, and the two of them went out of the door like a whirlwind. It slammed behind them, and the house shook.

At once the study door opened and an angry voice yelled loudly. 'Who's that slamming doors when I'm at work? Can't ANYBODY in this house shut a door quietly?'

George grinned as she fled upstairs. The biggest slammer-of-doors was her father, but he only heard the slams made by other people. George turned her writing-case inside out to find a post-card. She must post it at once or Julian wouldn't get it - and it would be so nice to have all her three cousins meeting her!

'We're off tomorrow,' she told Timmy, who looked up at her and wagged his tail vigorously. 'Yes, you're coming too, of course - then the Five will all be together again. The Famous Five! You'll like that, won't you, Tim? So shall I!'

She scribbled the post-card and flew down to post it. Slam went the front door, and her father almost jumped out of his skin. He was a very clever and hard-working scientist, impatient, hot-tempered, kindly and very forgetful. How he wished his daughter was not so exactly like him, but was like his quiet, gentle little niece Anne!

George posted the card. It was short and to the point.

'Cold gone. Coming tomorrow. Arriving 12.5 so make sure you all meet me and Timmy. Our tails are well up, I can tell you!'

GEORGE

George turned out her drawers and began to pick out the things she wanted to take with her. Her mother came to help. There was always an argument about packing, because George wanted to take as little as possible, and no warm things at all, and her mother had exactly opposite ideas.

However, between the two of them they managed to pack the suit-case full of quite sensible things. George refused as usual to take a dress of any sort.

'I wonder when you'll grow out of wanting to be a boy, and of acting like one!' said her mother, exasperated.

'All right, all right - take those awful old shorts if you want to, and that red jersey. But you are to pack those warm vests. I put them in once, and you took them out. And you must take a warm rug, Julian says. The caravans are not very warm this weather.'

'I wonder what they're like,' said George, stuffing the vests in. 'They're funny, old-fashioned ones, Julian said in his letter. Perhaps they're like the gypsies have - not the modern, stream-lined ones that are pulled along by cars.'

'You'll see tomorrow,' said her mother. 'Oh, George - you're coughing again!'

'Just the dust, that's all,' said George going purple in the face trying to hold back the tickle in her throat. She drank a glass of water in a hurry. It would be too dreadful if her mother said she wasn't to go after all!

However, her mother really did think that George was better. She had been in bed for a week, making a terrible fuss, and being a very difficult patient. Now, after being up for a few days she really seemed herself again.

'It will do her good to get down to Faynights and it's good strong air,' thought her mother. 'She needs company again, too - she doesn't like having to be all alone, knowing the others are holidaying without her.'

George felt happy that evening. Only one more night and she would be off to a fortnight's caravanning! If only the weather was good, what a fine time they would have!

Suddenly the telephone shrilled out. R-r-r-r-r-ring! R-r-r-r-r-ring!

George's mother went to answer it. 'Hallo!' she said. 'Oh - it's you, Julian. Is everything all right?'

George sped out into the hall at once. Oh, surely, surely, nothing had happened! Surely Julian wasn't ringing to tell her not to come! She listened breathlessly.

'What's that you say, Julian? I can't make out what you're talking about, dear. Yes, of course, your uncle is all right. Why shouldn't he be? No, he hasn't disappeared. Julian, what are you talking about?'

George listened impatiently. What was all this? But it turned out to be something quite ordinary, really. When at last her mother put down the receiver, she told George.

'Don't hop about like that, George. It's quite all right, you can go tomorrow. Julian was only ringing up to make sure that your father wasn't one of the scientists who have suddenly disappeared. Apparently in tonight's paper there is a short report about two that have completely vanished - and dear old Julian wanted to make sure your father was here safely!'

'As if Father would vanish!' said George, scornfully. 'Julian must be mad! It's just two more of those silly scientists who are disloyal to this country, and disappear to another country to sell our secrets! I could have told Julian that!'

Chapter 2

ALL TOGETHER AGAIN

NEXT morning, on a dewy hillside a good distance from Kirrin, where George lived, two boys leapt down the steps of a caravan, and went to one nearby. They rapped on the door.

'Anne! Are you awake? It's a heavenly day!'

'Of course I'm awake!' cried a voice. 'The door's unlocked. Come in. I'm getting breakfast.'

Julian and Dick pushed open the blue-painted door. Anne was standing at a little stove at one end of her caravan, boiling eggs in a saucepan.

'I can't look round,' she said. 'I'm timing them by my watch. One minute more to go.'

'The postman has just brought a card from George,' said Julian. 'She says her tail and Timmy's are both well up! I'm glad she's coming at last - and old Timmy too.'

'We'll all go and meet her,' said Anne, still with her eyes on her watch. 'Twenty seconds more.'

'We only came here ourselves three days ago,' said Dick. 'So she hasn't really missed much. Surely those eggs will be hard-boiled, Anne!'

Anne stopped looking at her watch. 'No, they won't. They'll be just right.' She scooped them out of the little saucepan with a big spoon. 'Put them in the egg-cups, Dick. There they are-just under your nose.'

Dick picked an egg up from the plate on which Anne had placed them. It was so hot that he dropped it with a yell, and it broke its shell. Yolk flowed out of it.

'DICK! You saw me take it out of boiling water!' said Anne. 'Now I've got to do another. It's a pity old Timmy isn't here. He'd soon have licked that broken egg up from the floor and saved me clearing up the mess.'

'We'll eat our breakfast sitting on the steps of your caravan, Anne,' said Julian. 'The sun's so lovely.'

So they all sat there, eating boiled eggs, well-buttered bread, with chunky, home-made marmalade afterwards, and then juicy apples. The sun shone down and Julian took off his coat.

Their two caravans were set on a sloping, grassy hillside. A tall hedge grew behind, and kept off the wind. Primroses ran in a pale gold streak under the hedge, and brilliant celandines shone in the sun, turning their polished faces towards it.

Not far off were three more caravans, but they were modern ones. The people staying in those were not yet up, and the doors were fast shut. The three children had had no chance of making friends with them.

On the opposite hill rose an old, ruined castle, whose great walls still defied the gales that sometimes blew over the hills. It had four towers. Three were very much broken, but the fourth looked almost complete. The windows were slitholes, made centuries back when archers shot their arrows from them.

A very steep pathway led up to the castle. At the top of it was a gateway, enormously strong, built of big white blocks of stone. The gateway was now filled by a great screen of wrought-iron to prevent anyone entering, and the only entrance was by a small tower in which was a narrow door. Here there was a turnstile through which visitors might go to see the old castle.

A high, strong wall ran all round the castle, still standing after so many years. Bits of the top of it had fallen down the hill and lay half-buried in grass and weeds. It had once been a magnificent old castle, built on the high, steep hill for safety, a place from which the castle guards might see the country easily for miles around.

As Julian said, anyone up in one of the towers, or even on the wall, would be able to see enemies approaching from seven counties. There would be plenty of time to shut the great gate, man the walls, and get ready to withstand quite a long siege if necessary.

The three of them sat on the steps, lazing in the sun, when they had finished their breakfast. They looked at the ruined old castle, and watched the jackdaws circling round the four towers.

'There must be about a thousand jackdaws there,' said Dick. 'I wish we had field-glasses so that we could watch them. It would be as good as a circus. I love the way they all fly up together, and circle round and round and yet never bump into one another.'

'Do they nest in that old castle?' asked Anne.

'Oh, yes - they fill up the towers with big sticks,' said Dick, 'and put their nests on the top. I bet we'd find the ground beneath the towers strewn ankle-deep in sticks if we went to see.'

'Well, let's go one day when George is here,' said Anne. 'It only costs five pence to go in. I like old castles. I like the feel of old places.'

'So do I,' said Julian. 'I hope George brings the field-glasses she had for her birthday. We could take them up into the castle with us and see all round the countryside for miles and miles. We could count the seven counties!'

'I must wash up,' said Anne, getting up. 'I must tidy the caravans too before George comes.'

'You don't really think old George will notice if they're tidy or not, do you?' said Dick. 'It will be a waste of your time, Anne!'

But Anne always enjoyed tidying things and putting them away in cupboards or on shelves. She liked having the two caravans to look after. She had just got used to them nicely and was looking forward to showing George round them.

She skipped over to the hedge and picked a great bunch of primroses. Back she went and divided them into two. She stuffed half into one little blue bowl, set their green crinkled leaves round them, and then put the other half into a second bowl.

'There - you go with the green and yellow curtains!' she said. She was soon very busy sweeping and dusting. She debated whether to send Dick to the stream to wash the breakfast things, and decided not to. Dick wasn't too good with crockery, and it was not theirs to break - it belonged to the owner of the caravans.

By the time it was half-past eleven the caravans were spick and span. George's sheets and blankets were on the shelf above her bunk, which, in the daytime, let down neatly against the wall to make more room. Anne had a bunk on the opposite side.

'This is the kind of holiday I like,' said Anne to herself. 'Somewhere small to live, fields and hills just outside, picnicky meals - and not too much adventure!'

'What are you murmuring about, Anne?' said Dick, peeping in at the window. 'Did I hear something about adventure? Are you looking for one already?'

'Good gracious no!' said Anne. 'It's the last thing I want! And the last thing we'll get too, in this quiet little place, thank goodness.'

Dick grinned. 'Well, you never know,' he said. 'Are you ready to come and meet George, Anne? It's about time we went.'

Anne went down the steps and joined Dick and Julian. 'Better lock the door,' said Dick. 'We've locked ours.' He locked Anne's door and the three set off down the grassy hillside to the stile that led into the lane below. The old castle on the opposite hill seemed to tower up higher and higher as they went down and down towards the village.

'It will be lovely to see Timmy again,' said Anne. 'And I'll be jolly glad to have George too, in my caravan. I didn't really mind being alone at night - but it's always nice to have George near me, and Timmy grunting in his sleep.'

'You want to sleep with Dick if you like grunts and snorts and moans,' said Julian. 'What do you dream about, Dick? You must have more nightmares than anyone else in the kingdom!'

'I never grunt or snort or moan,' said Dick indignantly. 'You want to hear yourself! Why...'

'Look - isn't that the train coming in - isn't that it curving round the line in the distance?' said Anne. 'It must be! There's only one train in the morning here! We'd better run!'

They ran at top speed. The train drew in at the station just as they raced on to the platform. A head of short curly hair looked out from a window - and then another dark brown head just below it.

'George - and Timmy!' yelled Anne.

'Hallo!' shouted George, almost falling out of the door.

'WOOF!' barked Timmy, and leapt down to the platform almost on top of Dick. Down jumped George, her eyes shining. She hugged Anne, and gave Julian and Dick a punch each. 'I'm here!' she said. 'I felt awful knowing you were away camping without me. I gave poor old Mother a dreadful time.'

'I bet you did,' said Julian, and linked his arm in hers. 'Let me take that suit-case. We'll just slip into the village first and have a few ice-creams to celebrate. There's a shop here that has some jolly decent ones.'

'Good. I feel exactly like ice-creams,' said George, happily. 'Look, Timmy knows what you said. His tongue is hanging out for an ice-cream already. Timmy, aren't you pleased we're all together again?'

'Woof,' said Timmy, and licked Anne's hand for the twentieth time.

'I really ought to bring a towel with me when I meet Timmy,' said Anne. 'His licks are so very wet. Oh no, not again, Timmy - go and use your tongue on Julian!'

'I say, look - George has brought her field-glasses with her!' said Dick, suddenly noticing that the brown strap over George's shoulder did not belong to a camera but to a very fine leather case that held the new field-glasses. 'Good! We wanted to watch the jackdaws with them and there are some herons down on the marsh too.'

'Well, I thought I must bring them,' said George. 'It's the first hols I've had a chance to use them. Mother wouldn't let me take them to school. I say - how much further is this ice-cream shop?'

'In the dairy here,' said Julian, marching her in. 'And I advise you to start off with vanilla, go on to strawberry and finish up with chocolate.'

'You do have good ideas!' said George. 'I hope you've got some money as well, if we're going to eat ice-creams at this rate. Mother didn't give me very much to spend.'

They sat down and ordered ice-creams. The plump little shop-woman smiled at them. She knew them by now. 'This is very good weather for you,' she said. 'Are there many caravanners up on Faynights Field?'

'No, not many,' said Julian, beginning his ice.

'Well, you're going to have a few more,' said the little plump lady. 'I hear there's some fair-folk coming - they usually camp up in your field. You'll have some fun if so.'

'Oh, good!' said Dick. 'We'll really be able to make a few friends then. We like fair-folk, don't we, Timmy?'

Chapter 3

A PLEASANT MORNING

'IS there going to be a fair near here then?' asked George, starting on her strawberry ice. 'What sort of a fair? A circus or something?'

'No. Just a mixed-up show,' said the shop-woman. 'There's to be a fire-eater, and that'll bring the villagers to the show faster than anything. A fire-eater! Did you ever hear of such a thing? I wonder that anyone cares to make a living at that!'

'What else is there to be?' asked Anne. She didn't somehow fancy watching anyone eating fire!

'Well, there's a man who can get himself free in under two minutes, no matter how tightly he's tied up with rope,' said the woman. 'Fair miracle he must be! And there's a man called Mr. India-rubber, because he can bend himself anywhere, and wriggle through drain-pipes and get in at a window if it's left open just a crack!'

'Gracious! He'd make a good burglar!' said George. 'I wish I was like India-rubber! Can this man bounce when he falls down?'

Everyone laughed. 'What else?' said Anne. 'This sounds very exciting.'

'There's a man with snakes,' said the plump little lady with a shudder. 'Snakes! Just fancy! I'd be afraid they would bite me. I'd run a mile if I saw a snake coming at me.'

'Are they poisonous snakes that he has, I wonder?' said Dick. 'I don't somehow fancy having a caravan next to ours with lashings of poisonous snakes crawling round.'

'Don't!' said Anne. 'I should go home at once.'

Another customer came in and the shop-woman had to leave the children and go to serve her. The four felt rather thrilled. What a bit of luck to have such exciting people in the same field as they were!

'A fire-eater!' said Dick. 'I've always wanted to see one. I bet he doesn't really eat fire! He'd burn the whole of his mouth and throat.'

'Has everyone finished?' asked Julian, getting some money out of his pocket. 'If so, we'll take George up to the field and show her our gay caravans. They aren't a bit like the ones we once went caravanning in, George - they are old-fashioned gypsy ones. You'll like them. Gay and very picturesque.'

'Who lent you them?' asked George, as they left the shop. 'Some school friend, wasn't it?'

'Yes. He and his family always go and camp in their caravans in the Easter and summer hols,' said Julian. 'But this Easter they're going to France - and rather than leave them empty, they thought they'd lend them out - and we're the lucky ones!'

They walked up the lane and came to the stile. George looked up at the towering castle, gleaming in the sun on the hill opposite.

'Faynights Castle,' she said. 'Hundreds of years old! How I'd love to know all the things that happened there through the centuries. I do love old things. I vote we go and explore it.'

'We will. It only costs five pence,' said Dick. 'We'll all have a good five pence worth of castle. I wonder if there are any dungeons. Dark, damp, drear and dreadful!

They went up the grassy hillside to the field where their caravans were. George exclaimed in delight. 'Oh! Are those our caravans? Aren't they gay? They're just like the caravans the gypsies use - only these look cleaner and gayer.'

'The red caravan, picked out with black and yellow, is ours,' said Dick. 'The blue one, picked out in black and yellow, is yours and Anne's.'

'Woof,' said Timmy at once.

'Oh, sorry - yours too, Timmy,' said Dick at once, and everyone chuckled. It was queer the way Timmy suddenly made a woofish remark, just as if he really understood every word that was said. George was quite certain he did, of course.

The caravans stood on high wheels. There was a window each side. The door was at the front, and so were the steps, of course. Gay curtains hung at the windows, and a line of bold carving ran round the edges of the out-jutting roof.

'They are old gypsy caravans painted and made really up to date,' said Julian. 'They're jolly comfortable inside too - bunks that fold down against the walls in the daytime - a little sink for washing-up, though we usually use the stream, because it's such a fag to fetch water - a small larder, cupboards and shelves - cork carpet on the floor with warm rugs so that no draught comes through....'

'You sound as if you are trying to sell them to me!' said George, with a laugh. 'You needn't! I love them both, and I think they're miles nicer than the modern caravans down there. Somehow these seem real!'

'Oh, the others are real enough,' said Julian. 'And they've got more space - but space doesn't matter to us because we shall live outside most of the time.'

'Do we have a camp-fire?' asked George, eagerly. 'Oh, yes - I see we do. There's the ashy patch where you had your fire. Oh, Julian, do let's have a fire there at night and sit round it in the darkness!'

'With midges biting us and bats flapping all round,' said Dick. 'Yes, certainly we will! Come inside, George.'

'She's to come into my caravan first,' said Anne, and pushed George up the steps. George was really delighted.

She was very happy to think she was going to have a peaceful two weeks here with her three cousins and Timmy. She pulled her bunk up and down to see how it worked. She opened the larder and cupboard doors. Then she went to see the boys' caravan.

'How tidy!' she said, in surprise. 'I expected Anne's to be tidy - but yours is just as spick and span. Oh dear - I hope you haven't all turned over a new leaf and become models of neatness. I haven't!'

'Don't worry,' said Dick, with a grin. 'Anne has been at work - you know how she loves to put everything in its place. We don't need to worry about anything when she's about. Good old Anne!'

'All the same, George will have to help me,' said Anne, firmly. 'I don't expect boys to tidy up and cook and do things like that - but George ought to because she's a girl.'

'If only I'd been born a boy!' groaned George. 'All right Anne, I'll do my share - sometimes. I say - there won't be much room for Timmy on my bunk at nights, will there?'

'Well, he's not coming on mine,' said Anne. 'He can sleep on the floor on a rug. Can't you, Timmy?'

'Woof,' said Timmy, without wagging his tail at all. He looked very disapproving.

'There you are - he says he wouldn't dream of doing such a thing!' said George. 'He always sleeps on my feet.'

They went outside again. It really was a lovely day. The primroses opened more and more of their little yellow flowers, and a blackbird suddenly burst into a fluting song on the bough of a hawthorn tree in the hedge nearby.

'Did anyone get a paper in the village?' asked Dick. 'Oh, you did, Julian. Good. Let's have a look at the weather forecast. If it's good we might go for a long walk this afternoon. The sea is not really very far off.'

Julian took the folded paper from his pocket and threw it over to Dick. He sat down on the steps of his caravan and opened it.

He was looking for the paragraph giving the weather forecast when headlines caught his eye. He gave an exclamation.

'Hallo! Here's a bit more about those two vanished scientists, Julian!'

'Oh!' said George, remembering Julian's telephone call of the night before. 'Julian, whatever in the world made you think my father could be one of the vanished scientists? As if he would ever be disloyal to his country and take his secrets anywhere else!'

'Oh, I didn't think that,' said Julian, at once. 'Of course I didn't! I'd never think Uncle Quentin would do a thing like that. No - in yesterday's paper it just said that two of our most famous scientists had disappeared - and I thought perhaps they had been kidnapped. And as Uncle Quentin is really very famous, I just thought I'd ring up to make sure.'

'Oh,' said George. 'Well, as Mother hadn't heard a thing about them she was awfully astonished when you asked her if Father had disappeared. Especially as he was banging about just then in the study, looking for something he had lost.'

'Which he was sitting on as usual, I suppose,' said Dick with a grin. 'But listen to this - it doesn't look as if the two men have been kidnapped - it looks as if they just walked out and took important papers with them! Beasts! There's too much of that sort of thing nowadays, it seems to me!'

He read out a paragraph or two.

'Derek Terry-Kane and Jeffrey Pottersham have been missing for two days. They met at a friend's house to discuss a certain aspect of their work, and then left together to walk to the underground. Since then they have not been seen.

'It has, however, been established that Terry-Kane had brought his passport up to date and had purchased tickets for flying to Paris. No news of his arrival there has been reported.'

'There! Just what I said to Mother!' exclaimed George. 'They've gone off to sell their secrets to another country. Why do we let them?'

'Uncle Quentin won't be pleased about that,' said Julian. 'Didn't he work with Terry-Kane at one time?'

'Yes. I believe he did,' said George. 'I'm jolly glad I'm not at home today - Father will be rampaging round like anything, telling Mother hundreds of times what he thinks about scientists who are traitors!'

'He certainly will,' said Julian. 'I don't blame him either. That's a thing I don't understand - to be a traitor to one's own country. It leaves a nasty taste in my mouth to think of it. Come on - let's think about dinner, Anne. What are we going to have?'

'Fried sausages and onions, potatoes, a tin of sliced peaches and I'll make a custard,' said Anne, at once.

'I'll fry the sausages,' said Dick. 'I'll light the fire out here and get the frying-pan. Anyone like their sausages split in the cooking?'

Everyone did. 'I like mine nice and burnt,' said George. 'How many do we have each? I've only had those ice creams since breakfast.'

'There are twelve,' said Anne, giving Dick the bag. 'Three each. None for Timmy! But I've got a large, juicy bone for him. Julian, will you get me some water, please? There's the pail, over there. I want to peel the potatoes. George, can you possibly open the peaches without cutting yourself like you did last time?'

'Yes, Captain!' said George, with a grin. 'Ah - this is like old times. Good food, good company and a good time. Three cheers for Us!'

Chapter 4

THE FAIR-FOLK ARRIVE

THAT first day they were all together was a lovely one. They enjoyed it thoroughly, especially George, who had fretted all by herself for two weeks at home. Timmy was very happy too. He tore after rabbits, most of them quite imaginary, up and down the field and in and out the hedges till he was tired out.

Then he would come and fling himself down by the four, panting like a steam-engine going uphill, his long pink tongue hanging out of his mouth.

'You make me feel hot just to look at you, Timmy,' said Anne, pushing him away. 'Look, George - he's so hot he's steaming! One of these days, Timmy, you'll blow up!'

They went for a walk in the afternoon, but didn't quite get to the sea. They saw it from a hill, sparkling blue in the distance. Little white yachts dotted the blue water like far-off swans with wings out-spread. They had tea at a farmhouse, watched by a couple of big-eyed farm-children.

'Do you want to take some of my home-made jam with you?' asked the farmer's jolly, red-faced wife, when they paid her for their tea.

'Oh, yes, rather!' said Dick. 'And I suppose you couldn't sell us some of that fruit-cake? We're camping in caravans in Faynights Field, just opposite the castle - so we're having picnic meals each day.'

'Yes, you can have a whole cake,' said the farmer's wife. 'I did my baking yesterday, so there's plenty. And would you like some ham? And I've some good pickled onions too.'

This was wonderful! They bought all the food very cheaply indeed, and carried it home gladly. Dick took off the lid of the pickled onions half-way back to the caravans, and sniffed.

'Better than any scent!' he said. 'Have a sniff, George.'

It didn't stop at sniffs, of course. Everyone took out a large pickled onion - except Timmy who backed away at once. Onions were one thing he really couldn't bear. Dick put back the lid.

'I think somebody else ought to carry the onions, not Dick,' said Anne. 'There won't be many left by the time we reach our caravans!'

When they climbed over the stile at the bottom of the field the sun was going down. The evening star had appeared in the sky and twinkled brightly. As they trudged up to their caravans Julian stopped and pointed.

'Hallo! Look! There are two more caravans here - rather like ours. I wonder if it's the fair-folk arriving.'

'And there's another one, see - coming up the lane,' said Dick. 'It will have to go to the field-gate because it can't come the way we do - over the stile. There it goes.'

'We shall soon have plenty of exciting neighbours!' said Anne, pleased. They went up to their own caravans and looked curiously at the one that stood near to theirs. It was yellow, picked out with blue and black, and could have done with a new coat of paint. It was very like their own caravans, but looked much older.

There didn't seem to be anyone about the newly-arrived vans. The doors and windows were shut. The four stood and looked curiously at them.

'There's a big box under that nearest caravan,' said Julian. 'I wonder what's in it!'

The box was long, shallow and wide. On the sides were round holes, punched into it at intervals. George went to the caravan and bent down to look at the box, wondering if there was anything alive in it.

Timmy went with her, sniffing at the holes in curiosity. He suddenly backed away, and barked loudly. George put her hand on his collar to drag him off but he wouldn't go with her. He barked without stopping!

A noise came from inside the box - a rustling, dry, sliding sort of noise that made Timmy bark even more frantically.

'Stop it, Timmy! Stop it!' said George, tugging at him. 'Julian, come and help me. There's something in that box that Timmy has never met before - goodness knows what - and he's half-puzzled and half-scared. He's barking defiance - and he'll never stop unless we drag him away!' An angry voice came from the bottom of the field by the stile. 'Hey you! Take that dog away! What do you mean by poking into my business - upsetting my snakes!'

'Oooh - snakes!' said Anne, retiring quickly to her own caravan. 'George, it's snakes in there. Do get Timmy away.'

Julian and George managed to drag Timmy away, half-choking him with his collar, though he didn't seem to notice this at all. The angry voice was now just behind them. George turned and saw a little dark man, middle aged, with gleaming black eyes. He was shaking his fist, still shouting.

'Sorry,' said George, pulling Timmy harder. 'Please stop shouting, or my dog will go for you.'

'Go for me! He will go for me! You keep a dangerous dog like that, which smells out my snakes and will go for me!' yelled the angry little man, dancing about like a boxer on his toes. 'Ahhhhhh! Wait till I let out my snakes - and then your dog will run and run, and will never be seen again!'

This was a most alarming threat. With an enormous heave Julian, Dick and George at last got Timmy under control, dragged him up the steps of Anne's caravan, and shut the door on him. Anne tried to quieten him, while the other three went out to the angry little man again.

He had dragged out the big, shallow box, and had opened the lid. The three watched, fascinated. What snakes had he in there? Rattlesnakes? Cobras? They were all ready to run for their lives if the snakes were as angry as their owner.

A great head reared itself out of the box, and swung itself from side to side. Two unblinking dark eyes gleamed - and then a long, long body writhed out and glided up the man's legs, round his waist and round his neck. He fondled it, talking in a low, caressing voice.

George shivered. Julian and Dick watched in amazement. 'It's a python,' said Julian. 'My, what a monster. I've never seen one so close before. I wonder it doesn't wind itself round that fellow and squeeze him to death.'

'He's got hold of it near the tail,' said Dick, watching. 'Oh, look - there's another one!'

Sure enough a second python slid out of the box, coil upon gleaming coil. It too wreathed itself round its owner, making a loud hissing noise as it did so. Its body was thicker than Julian's calf.

Anne was watching out of her caravan window, hardly able to believe her eyes. She had never in her life seen snakes as big as these. She didn't even know what they were. She began to wish their caravans were miles and miles away.

The little man quieted his snakes at last. They almost hid him with their great coils! From each side of his neck came a snake's head, flat and shining.

Timmy was now watching out of the window also, his head beside Anne's. He was amazed to see the gliding snakes, and stopped barking at once. He got down from the window and went under the table. Timmy didn't think he liked the look of these new creatures at all!

The man fondled the snakes and then, still speaking to them lovingly, got them back into their box again. They glided in, and piled themselves inside, coil upon coil. The man shut down the lid and locked it.

Then he turned to the three watching children. 'You see how upset you make my snakes?' he said. 'Now you keep away, you hear? And you keep your dog away too. Ah, you children! Interfering, poking your noses, staring! I do not like children and nor do my snakes. You KEEP AWAY, SEE?'

He shouted the last words so angrily that the three jumped. 'Look here,' said Julian. 'We only came to say we were sorry our dog barked like that. Dogs always bark at strange things they don't know or understand. It's only natural.'

'Dogs, too, I hate,' said the little man, going into his caravan. 'You will keep him away from here, especially when I have my snakes out, or one might give him too loving a squeeze. Ha!'

He disappeared into his van and the door shut firmly.

'Not so good,' said Julian. 'We seem to have made a bad start with the fair-folk - and I had hoped they would be friendly and let us into some of their secrets.'

'I don't like the last thing he said,' said George, worried. 'A loving squeeze by one of those pythons would be the end of Timmy. I shall certainly keep him away when I see that funny little man taking out his snakes. He really seemed to love them, didn't he?'

'He certainly did,' said Julian. 'Well, I wonder who lives in the second newly-arrived caravan. I feel I hardly dare even to look at it in case it contains gorillas or elephants or hippos, or...'

'Don't be an idiot,' said George. 'Come on, it's getting dark. Hallo, here comes the caravan we saw down in the lane just now!'

It came slowly up the grassy hillside, bumping as it went. On the side was painted a name in large, scarlet letters.

'Mister India-rubber.'

'Oh - the rubber-man!' said George. 'Dick - is he the driver, do you think?'

They all stared at the driver. He was long and thin and droopy, and he looked as if he might burst into tears at any moment. His horse looked rather the same.

'Well - he might be Mr. India-rubber,' said Julian. 'But certainly there doesn't seem to be much bounce in him! Look - he's getting down.'

The man got down with a supple, loose grace that didn't seem to fit his droopy body at all. He took the horse out of the shafts and set it loose in the field. It wandered away pulling here and there at the grass, still looking as sad and droopy as its master.

'Bufflo!' suddenly yelled the man. 'You in?'

The door of the second caravan opened and a young man looked out - a huge young man with a mop of yellow hair, a bright red shirt and a broad smile.

'Hiya, Rubber!' he called. 'We got here first. Come along in - Skippy's got some food ready.'

Mr. India-rubber walked sadly up the steps of Bufflo's caravan. The door shut.

'This is really rather exciting,' said Dick. 'An India-rubber man - Bufflo and Skippy, whoever they may be - and a man with tame snakes next to us. Whatever next!'

Anne called to them. 'Do come in. Timmy's whining like anything.'

They went up the steps of her caravan and found that Anne had got ready a light supper for them - a ham sandwich each, a piece of fruit cake and an orange.

'I'll have a pickled onion with my sandwich, please,' said Dick. 'I'll chop it up and put it in with the ham. What wonderful ideas I do have, to be sure!'

Chapter 5

NIGHT AND MORNING

AS they had their supper they talked about the queer new arrivals. Timmy sat close to George, trying to tell her that he was sorry for causing such a disturbance. She patted him and scolded him at the same time.

'I quite understand that you don't like the snakes, Timmy - but when I tell you to stop barking and come away you MUST do as you're told! Do you understand?'

Timmy's tail dropped and he put his big head on George's knee. He gave a little whine.

'I don't think he'll ever go near that box again, now he's seen the snakes that came out of it,' said Anne. 'You should have seen how scared he was when he looked out of the window with me and saw them. He went and hid under the table.'

'It's a pity we've made a bad start with the fair-folk,' said Julian. 'I don't expect they like children much, because as a rule the kids would make themselves an awful nuisance - peering here and poking there.'

'I think I can hear more caravans arriving,' said George, and Timmy pricked up his ears and growled. 'Be quiet, Timmy. We're not the only ones allowed in this field!'

Dick went to the window and peered out into the twilight. He saw some large dark shapes in another part of the field, looming out of the darkness. A little camp-fire burned brightly in front of one, showing a small figure bending over it.

'These are jolly good sandwiches, Anne,' said Dick. 'What about another pickled onion, everyone?'

'No Dick,' said Anne, firmly. 'You've eaten your sandwich.'

'Well, I can eat a pickled onion without a sandwich, can't I?' said Dick. 'Hand over, Anne.'

Anne wouldn't. 'I've hidden them,' she said. 'You want some for tomorrow, don't you? Don't be greedy, Dick. Have a biscuit if you're still hungry.'

'I meant to ask if we could have a camp-fire outside tonight,' said George, remembering. 'But somehow I feel so sleepy I think I'd nod off if I sat by it!'

'I feel sleepy too,' said Anne. 'Let's clear up, George, and snuggle into our bunks. The boys can go to their caravan and read or play games if they want to.'

Dick yawned. 'Well - I might read for a bit,' he said. 'I hope you've got enough water, Anne, for the various things you use it for - because I do NOT intend to stumble over this dark field to the stream, and fall over snakes and anything else the fair-folk may have strewn carelessly about the grass!'

'You don't think those snakes could get loose, do you?' said Anne, anxiously.

'Of course not!' said Julian. 'Anyway, Timmy will bark the place down if even a hedgehog comes roving by, so you don't need to worry about snakes!'

The boys said good night and went off to their own caravan. The girls saw a light suddenly shine out there, and shadows moved across the curtains drawn over the windows.

'Dick's lighted their lamp,' said Anne. 'Theirs was already lighted, and the caravan looked cosy and friendly. Anne showed George how to put up her bunk. It clicked into place, felt nice and firm and was most inviting-looking.

The girls made their beds in the bunks, putting in sheets and blankets and rugs. 'Where's my pillow?' asked George. 'Oh - it's a cushion in the daytime, is it? What a good idea!'

She and Anne took the covers off the two cushions in the chairs, and underneath were the pillow-cases over the pillows, ready for the night!

They undressed, washed in stream water in the little sink, cleaned their teeth and brushed their hair. 'Does the water go under the caravan when I pull the plug out of the sink?' said George. 'Here it goes!'

The water gurgled out and splashed on the ground under the van. Timmy pricked up his ears and listened. He could see that he would have to get used to quite a lot of new noises here!

'Got your torch?' said Anne when at last they had both got into their bunks. 'I'm going to blow out the lamp. If you want anything in the night you'll have to put on your torch, George. Look at Timmy sitting on the floor still! He doesn't realize we've gone to bed! Tim - are you waiting for us to go upstairs?'

Timmy thumped his tail on the floor. That was just exactly what he was waiting for. When George went to bed she always went upstairs, whether she was at school or at home - and though he hadn't managed to discover any stairs in the caravan yet, he was sure that George knew where they were!

It took Timmy a few minutes to realize that George was going to sleep for the night in the bunk she had put up against the wall. Then, with one bound he was on top of her, and settled down on her legs. She gave a groan.

'Oh, Timmy - you are rough! Get off my legs - get further down - get into the curve of my knees.' Timmy found the bunk too small to be really comfortable. However he managed to curl himself up in as small a space as possible, put his head down on one of George's knees, gave one of his heavy sighs, and fell asleep.

He had one ear open all the time, though - an ear for a rat that for some peculiar reason ran over the roof - an ear for a daring rabbit that nibbled the grass under the caravan - and a very alert ear for a big cockchafer that flew straight into the glass pane of the right-hand window, just above George's bunk.

Plang! It collided with the pane, and fell back, stunned. Timmy couldn't for the life of him think what it was, but soon fell asleep again, still with one ear open. The blackbird in the hawthorn tree woke him up early. It had thought of a perfectly new melody, and was trying it out very loudly and deliberately. A thrush nearby joined in.

'Mind how you do it, mind how you do it!' sang the thrush at the top of its voice. Timmy sat up and stretched. George woke up at once, because Timmy trod heavily on her middle.

She couldn't think where she was at first, then she remembered and smiled. Of course - in a caravan, with Anne. How that blackbird sang - a better song than the thrush! Cows mooed in the distance, and the early morning sun slid in through the window and picked out the clock and the bowl of primroses.

Timmy settled down. If George wasn't going to get up neither was he! George shut her eyes and fell asleep again too. Outside, the camp began to awake. Caravan doors opened. Fires were lighted. Somebody went down to the stream to get water.

The boys came banging at the door of the girls' caravan. 'Come on, sleepyheads! It's half-past seven, and we're hungry!'

'Goodness!' said Anne, sitting up, bright-eyed with sleep. 'George! Wake up!'

It wasn't long before they were all sitting round a little fire, from which came a very nice smell. Dick was frying bacon and eggs, and the smell made everyone very hungry. Anne had boiled a kettle on her little stove, and made some tea. She came down the steps with a tray on which she had put the teapot and hot water.

'Anne always does things properly,' said Dick. 'Here, hold your plate out, Ju - your bacon's done. Take your nose out of the way, Timmy, you silly dog - you'll get it splashed with hot fat again. Do look after Timmy when I'm cooking, George. He's already wolfed one slice of bacon.'

'Well, it saved you cooking it,' said George. 'I say, aren't there a lot of caravans here now? They must have come last night.'

They stared round at the field. Besides the snake-man's caravan, and Bufflo's and Mr. India-rubber's, there were four or five more.

One interested the children very much. It was a brilliant yellow with red flames painted on the sides. The name on it was 'Alfredo, the Fire Eater'.

'I imagine him to be a great big fierce chap,' said Dick. 'A regular fire-eater, with a terribly ferocious temper, an enormous voice and a great stride when he walks.'

'He will probably be a skinny little fellow who trots along like a pony,' said Julian.

'There's someone coming out of his caravan now,' said George. 'Look.'

'It's a woman,' said Anne. 'His wife, I expect. How tiny she is - rather sweet. She looks Spanish, she's so dark.'

'This must be the fire-eater, coming behind her,' said George. 'Surely it is! And he's JUST like you imagined him, Dick. How clever of you!'

A great big fellow came down the steps behind his tiny wife. He certainly looked very fierce, for he had a lion-like mane of tawny hair, and a big red face with large, gleaming eyes. He took enormous strides as he went, and his little wife had to run to keep up with him.

'Just my idea of a fire-eater,' said Dick, pleased. 'I think we'll keep out of his way until we know if he also dislikes children, like the snake-man. What a tiny wife he has! I bet he makes her run around him, and wait on him hand and foot.'

'Well, he's fetching water from the stream for her, anyway,' said Anne. 'Two huge pails. My word, he really does look like a fire-eater, doesn't he?'

'There's somebody else, look,' said Dick. 'Now who would he be? Look at him going to the stream - he walks like a tiger or a cat - all slinky and powerful.'

'The man who can set himself free from ropes no matter how he's tied!' said Anne. 'I'm sure he is.'

It was most exciting to watch the new arrivals. They all seemed to know one another. They stopped to talk, they laughed, they visited one another's caravans, and finally three of the women set off together with baskets.

'Going off to shop,' said Anne. 'That's what I ought to do. Coming George? There's a bus that goes down to the village in about ten minutes. We can easily clear up when we come back.'

'Right,' said George, and got up too. 'What are the boys going to do while we're gone?'

'Oh, fetch more water, find sticks for the fire, and see to their own bunks,' said Anne, airily.

'Are we really?' said Dick, grinning. 'Well, we might. On the other hand, we might not. Anyway, you two go, because food is getting rather low. A very serious thought, that! Anne, get me some more tooth-paste, will you? And if you can spot some of those doughnuts at the dairy, bring a dozen back with you.'

'Yes - and see if you can get a tin of pineapple,' said Julian. 'Don't forget we want milk too.'

'If you want many more things you'll have to come and help us carry them,' said Anne. 'Anything else?'

'Call at the post office and see if there are any letters,' said Dick. 'And don't forget to buy a paper. We may as well find out if anything has happened in the outside world! Not that I feel I can take much interest in it at the moment.'

'Right,' said Anne. 'Come on, George - we shall miss that bus.' And off they went with Timmy at their heels.

Chapter 6

UNFRIENDLY FOLK

THE two boys decided they would fetch the water and stack up some firewood while the girls were gone. They made their bunks too, by the simple process of dragging off all the clothes and bundling them on the shelf, and then letting down the bunks against the wall.

That done there didn't seem much else to do except wait for the girls. So they took a walk round the field. They kept a good distance from the snake-man, who was doing something peculiar to one of his pythons.

'It looks as if he's polishing it, but he surely can't be,' said Julian. 'I'd like to go near enough to watch but he's such a hot-tempered little fellow he might quite well set one of those enormous pythons on to us!'

The snake-man was sitting on a box, with one snake spread over his knee, some of its coils round one of his legs, the other coils round his waist. The head appeared to be under his arm-pit. The man was rubbing away hard at the snake's scaly body, and it really seemed as if the python was enjoying it!

Bufflo was doing something with a whip. It had a magnificent handle, set with semi-precious stones that caught the sun and glittered in many colours.

'Look at the lash,' said Julian. 'Yards and yards long! I'd like to see him crack it!'

Almost as if he heard him, Bufflo got to his feet, and swung the great whip in his hand. Then he raised it - and a moment later there was a sound exactly like a pistol-shot! The lash cracked as it was whipped through the air, and the two boys jumped, not expecting such a loud noise.

Bufflo cracked it again. Then he whistled and a small plump woman came to the steps of his caravan.

'You mended it yet?' she called.

'Perhaps,' said Bufflo. 'Get a cigarette, Skippy. Hurry!'

Skippy put her hand into the caravan, felt along a shelf, and brought out a packet of cigarettes. She didn't go down the steps, but stood there, holding out the cigarette between her finger and thumb.

Bufflo swung his whip. CRACK! The cigarette disappeared as if by magic! The boys stared in amazement. Surely the end of the lash hadn't whipped that cigarette from Skippy's fingers? It didn't seem possible.

'There it is,' said Bufflo, pointing some distance away. 'Hold it again, Skippy. I reckon this whip is okay now.'

Skippy picked up the cigarette and put it in her mouth!

'No!' called Bufflo. 'I ain't sure enough of this lash yet. You hold it like you did.'

Skippy took it out of her mouth and held out the cigarette in her finger and thumb once more.

CRACK! Like a pistol-shot the whip cracked again, and once more the cigarette disappeared.

'Aw, Bufflo - you've gone and broken it in half,' said Skippy, reproachfully, pointing to where it lay on the ground, neatly cut in half. 'That was real careless of you.'

Bufflo said nothing. He merely turned his back on Skippy, and set to work on his lash again, though what he was doing neither of the boys could make out. They went a little nearer to see.

Bufflo had his back to them but he must have heard them coming. 'You clear out,' he said, hardly raising his voice. 'No kids allowed round here. Clear out - or I'll crack my whip and take the top hairs off your head!'

Julian and Dick felt perfectly certain he would be able to carry out his threat, and they retreated with as much dignity as they could. 'I suppose the snake-man told him what a disturbance old Timmy made yesterday with the snakes,' said Dick. 'I hope it won't spoil things for us with all the fair-folk.'

They went across the field and on the way met Mr. India-rubber. They couldn't help staring at him. He honestly looked as if he were made of rubber - he was a curious grey, the grey of an ordinary school rubber, and his skin looked rubbery too.

He scowled at the two boys. 'Clear out,' he said. 'No kids allowed in our field.'

Julian was annoyed. 'It's our field as much as yours,' he said. 'We've got a couple of caravans here - those over there.'

'Well, this has always been our field,' said Mr. India-rubber. 'So you clear out to the next one.'

'We haven't any horses to pull our caravans, even if we wanted to go, which we don't,' retorted Julian, angrily. 'Anyway, why should you object to us? We'd like to be friendly. We shan't do you any harm, or make a nuisance of ourselves.'

'Us-folk and you-folk don't mix,' said the man, obstinately. 'We don't want you here - nor them posh caravans down there, neither,' and he pointed to the three modern caravans in one corner of the field. 'This has always been our field.'

'Don't let's argue about it,' said Dick, who had been looking at the man with the greatest curiosity. 'Are you really so rubbery that you can wriggle in and out of pipes and things? Do you -'

But he didn't have time to finish his question because the rubber-man flung himself down on the ground, did a few strange contortions, nicked himself between the boys' legs - and there they both were, flat on the ground! The rubber-man was walking off, looking quite pleased with himself.

'Well!' said Dick, feeling a bump on his head. 'I tried to grab his legs and they honestly felt like rubber! I say - what a pity these people resent us being in their field. It's not going to be very pleasant to have them all banded against us. Not fair either. I should like to be friendly.'

'Well, perhaps it's just a case of us-folk and you-folk,' said Julian. 'There's a lot of that kind of feeling about these days, and it's so silly. We're all the same under the skin. We've always got on well with anyone before.'

They hardly liked to go near the other caravans, though they longed to have a closer view of Alfredo the Fire-Eater.

'He looked so exactly like what I imagined a fire-eater ought to be,' said Dick. 'I should think he's probably chief of all the fair-folk here - if they've got a chief.'

'Look - here he comes!' said Julian. And sure enough, round the corner came Alfredo, running fast. He came towards the boys, and Julian at first thought that he was coming to chase them away. He didn't mean to run from Alfredo, but it wasn't very pleasant standing still, either, with this enormous fellow racing towards them, his cheeks as red as fire, his great mane of hair flopping up and down.

And then they saw why Alfredo was running! After him came his tiny little dark wife. She was shrieking at him in some foreign language, and was chasing him with a saucepan!

Alfredo lumbered by the two boys, looking scared out of his life. He went down to the stile, leapt over it and disappeared down the lane.

The little dark woman watched him go. When he turned to look round she waved the saucepan at him.

'Big bad one!' she cried. 'You burn breakfast again! Again, again! I bang you with saucepan, big bad one. Come, Alfredo, come!'

But Alfredo had no intention of coming. The angry little woman turned to the two boys. 'He burn breakfast,' she said. 'He no watch, he burn always.'

'It seems queer for a fire-eater to burn something he's cooking,' said Julian. 'Though, on second thoughts, perhaps it's not!'

'Poof! Fire-eating, it is easy!' said Alfredo's hot-tempered little wife. 'Cooking is not so easy. It needs brains and eyes and hands. But Fredo, he has no brains, his hands are clumsy - he can only eat fire, and what use is that?'

'Well - I suppose he makes money by it,' said Dick, amused.

'He is my big bad one,' said the little woman. She turned to go and then turned back again with a sudden smile. 'But he is very good sometimes,' she said.

She went back to her caravan. The boys looked at one another. 'Poor Alfredo,' said Dick. 'He looks as brave as a lion, and he's certainly a giant of a man - but he's as timid as a mouse. Fancy running away from that tiny little woman.'

'Well, I'm not so sure I wouldn't too, if she came bounding over the field after me, brandishing that dangerous-looking saucepan,' said Julian. 'Ah - who's this?'

The man that Anne had thought might be the one who could set himself free when bound with ropes was coming up from the stile. He walked easily and lightly, really very like a cat. Julian glanced at his hands - they were small but looked very strong. Yes - he could certainly undo knots with hands like that. They gazed at him curiously.

'No kids allowed here,' said the man, as he came up.

'Sorry, but we're caravanners too,' said Dick. 'I say - are you the fellow that can undo ropes when he's tied up in them?'

'Could be,' said the man, and walked on. He turned round suddenly. 'Like me to tie you up?' he called. 'I've a good mind to try. Don't you try interfering with us, or I'll do it!'

'Dear me - what a nice, pleasant lot they are!' said Julian. 'Quite different from the other circus folk we've known. I begin to feel we shan't make friends as fast as I thought!

'We'd better be careful, I think,' said Dick. 'They seem to resent us, goodness knows why. They may make things jolly unpleasant. Don't let's snoop round any more this morning. Let's keep away from them till they get a bit used to us. Then perhaps they'll be more friendly.'

'We'll go and meet the girls,' said Julian. So they went down to the stile and walked to the bus-stop. The bus came panting up the hill at that very moment, and the girls stepped off, with the three fair-women behind them.

The girls joined the boys. 'We've done a lot of shopping,' said Anne. 'Our baskets are awfully heavy. Thanks, Julian, if you'll carry mine. Dick can take George's. Did you see those women who got off with us?'

'Yes,' said Julian. 'Why?'

'Well, we tried to talk to them but they were very unfriendly,' said Anne. 'We felt quite uncomfortable. And Timmy growled like anything, of course, which made things worse. I don't think he liked their smell. They did smell rather unwashed.'

'We didn't get on too well either, with the rest of the fair-folk,' said Julian. 'In fact I can't say that Dick and I were a success at all. All they wanted us to do was to clear out.'

'I got a paper for you,' said Anne, 'and George found a letter at the post office from her mother. It's addressed to all of us so we didn't open it. We'll read it when we get to the caravans.'

'I hope it's nearly time for dinner,' said George. 'What do you think, Timmy?'

Timmy knew the word dinner! He gave a joyful bark and led the way. Dinner? There couldn't be a better idea!

Chapter 7

A LETTER - A WALK - AND A SHOCK

GEORGE opened her mother's letter when they had finished their meal. Everyone voted that it was a truly wizard lunch - two hard-boiled eggs each, fresh lettuce, tomatoes, mustard and cress, and potatoes baked in the fire in their jackets - followed by what Julian had asked for - slices of tinned pineapple, very sweet and juicy.

'Very nice,' said Julian, lying back in the sun. 'Anne, you're a jolly good housekeeper. Now,

George, let's hear what Aunt Fanny has got to say in her letter.'

George unfolded the note-paper and smoothed it out. 'It's to all of us,' she said.

'DEAR GEORGE, ANNE, JULIAN AND DICK,

'I hope George arrived safely and that you all met her. I am really writing to remind George that it is her grandmother's birthday on Saturday, and she must write to her. I forgot to remind George before she went, so thought I must quickly send a letter.'

'George, your father is very much upset to read about those two missing scientists. He knows Derek Terry-Kane very well, and worked with him for some time. He says he is absolutely sure that he isn't a traitor to his country; he thinks he has been spirited away somewhere, and Jeffrey Pottersham too - probably in a plane miles away by now, in a country that will force them to give up their secrets. It's just as well you went off today, because this afternoon your father is striding about all over the place, talking nineteen to the dozen, and banging every door he comes to, bless him.'

'If you write, please don't mention scientists, as I am hoping he will calm down soon. He really is very upset, and keeps on saying 'What is the world coming to?' when he knows quite well that it's coming to exactly what the scientists plan it to come to.'

'Have a good time, all of you, and DON'T forget to write to your grandmother, George!'

Your loving,

MOTHER (AUNT FANNY).'

'I can just see Father striding about like a - like a...'

'Fire-eater,' said Julian with a grin, as George stopped for a word. 'He'll drive Aunt Fanny into chasing him around with a saucepan one day! Funny business about these scientists though, isn't it? After all, Terry-Kane had planned to leave the country - got his aeroplane ticket and everything - so although your father believes in him, George, it honestly looks a bit fishy, doesn't it?'

'Anything in the paper about it?' asked Dick, and shook it open. 'Yes-here we are:

'MISSING SCIENTISTS

'It is now certain that Jeffrey Pottersham was in the pay of a country unfriendly to us, and was planning to join Terry-Kane on his journey abroad. Nothing has been heard of the two men, although reports that they have been seen in many places abroad have been received.'

'That rather settles it,' said Julian. 'Two Really Bad Eggs. Look - here are their photographs.'

The four leaned over the paper, looking at the pictures of the two men. 'Well, I should have thought anyone would recognize Terry-Kane if they saw him,' said Anne. 'Those big, thick, arched eyebrows, and that enormous forehead. If I saw anyone with eyebrows like that I'd think they weren't real!'

'He'll shave them off,' said Dick. 'Then he'll look completely different. Probably stick them on his upper lip upside down and use them for moustaches!'

'Don't be so silly,' said George, with a giggle. 'The other fellow is very ordinary-looking, except for his dome of a head. Pity none of us four have got great foreheads - I suppose we must be rather stupid people!'

'We're not so bad,' said Julian. 'We've had to use our brains many times in all our adventures - and we haven't come off so badly!'

'Let's clear up and then go for a walk again,' said Anne. 'If we don't I shall fall asleep. This sun is so gloriously hot, it's really cooking me.'

'Yes - we'd better go for a walk,' said Julian, getting up. 'Shall we go and see the castle, do you think? Or shall we leave that for another day?'

'Leave it,' said Anne. 'I honestly don't feel like clambering up that steep hill just now. I think the morning would be a better time!'

They cleared up and then locked the two caravans and set out. Julian looked back. Some of the fair-folk were sitting together, eating a meal. They watched the children in silence. It wasn't very pleasant somehow.

'They don't exactly love us, do they?' said Dick. 'Now you listen, Timmy - don't you go accepting any titbits from people here, see?'

'Oh, Dick!' said George, in alarm, 'you surely don't think they would harm Timmy?'

'No, I don't really,' said Dick. 'But we might as well be careful. As the rubber man pointed out to us this morning, us-folk and his-folk think differently about some things. It just can't be helped. But I do wish they'd let us be friendly. I don't like this kind of thing.'

'Well, anyway I shall keep Timmy to heel all the time,' said George, making up her mind firmly.

'Timmy, to heel! Please understand that as long as we are in the caravan field you must walk to heel? Do you understand?'

'Woof-woof,' said Timmy, and immediately kept so close to George's ankles that his nose kept bumping into them.

They decided to catch the bus to Tinkers' Green, and then walk from there to the sea. They would have time to get there and back before dark. The bus was waiting at the corner, and they ran to catch it. It was about two miles to Tinkers' Green, which was a dear little village, with a proper green and a duck-pond with white ducks swimming on it.

'Shall we have an ice-cream?' suggested Dick as they came to a grocer's shop with an ice-cream sign outside it.

'No,' said Julian firmly. 'We've just had an enormous lunch, and we'll save up ice-creams for tea-time. We shall never get down to the sea if we sit and eat ice-creams half the afternoon!'

It was a lovely walk, down violet-studded lanes, and then over a heathery common with clumps of primroses in the hollows - and even a few very very early bluebells, much to Anne's delight.

'There's the sea! Oh, what a dear little bay!' said Anne, in delight. 'And isn't it blue - as blue as cornflowers. We could almost bathe.'

'You wouldn't like it if you did,' said Julian. 'The sea would be as cold as ice! Come on - let's get down to the little jetty and have a look at the fishing-boats.'

They went down to the sun-warmed stone jetty and began talking to the fishermen there. Some were sitting in the sun mending their nets, and were very willing to talk.

'How nice to have a bit of friendliness shown us instead of the stares and rudeness of the fair-folk!' said Dick to Julian, who nodded and agreed.

A fisherman took them on his boat, and explained a lot of things they already knew and some they didn't. It was nice to sit and listen to his broad speech, and to watch his bright blue eyes as he talked. He was as brown as an oak-apple.

'Could we ever hire a boat here if we wanted to?' asked Julian. 'Is there one we could manage by ourselves? We are quite good at sailing.'

'Old Joseph there has a boat he could hire out if you wanted one,' said the man they were talking to. 'He hired it out the other day, and I expect he'd hire it out to you too if so be you can really manage it.'

'Thanks. We'll ask him, if we ever decide to go out,' said Julian. He looked at his watch. 'We'd better go and get some tea somewhere. We want to be home before dark. We're camping over at Faynights Castle.'

'Oh ay?' said the fisherman. 'You've got the fair-folk there now, haven't you? They were here two weeks since. My, that fire-eater is a fair treat, he is! And that rope-man - well! I tell you this - I tied him up in my fishing-line - you can see it here, strong as two ropes it is! I tied him up with all the knots I know - and in under a minute he stood up and the line fell off him, knots and all!'

'Ay, that is so,' said the old fellow called Joseph. 'A wonder he is, that man. So is the rubber fellow. He called for a drain-pipe, narrow as this, see? And he wriggled through it, quick as an eel. Fair scared me, it did, to see him wriggling out of the other end.'

'We'll go and see them perform when they begin their show,' said Julian. 'At the moment they're not very friendly towards us. They don't like us being in their field.'

'They keeps themselves to themselves,' said Joseph. 'They had a heap of trouble at the place they were in before they came to us - someone set the police on them, and now they won't make friends with anyone.'

'Well, we must go,' said Julian, and they said goodbye to the friendly fishermen and went. They stopped and had tea at a little tea-shop, and then made their way home. 'Anyone want to take the bus?' said Julian. 'We can easily get home before dark if we walk - but if the girls are tired we'll bus from Tinkers' Green.'

'Of course we're not tired!' said George indignantly. 'Have you ever known me say I'm tired, Julian?'

'All right, all right - it was just a bit of politeness on my part,' said Julian. 'Come on - let's get going.'

The way was longer than they had thought. It was getting dark when they got to the stile that led into the caravan field. They climbed over it and made their way slowly to their corner.

And then they suddenly stopped and stared. They looked all round and stared again.

Their two caravans were gone! They could see the places where they had stood, and where their fire had been. But no caravans stood there now!

'Well!' said Julian, astounded. 'This beats everything! Are we dreaming? I can't see a sign of our caravans anywhere!'

'Yes - but - how could they go?' said Anne, almost stammering in her surprise. 'I mean - we had no horses to pull them away anywhere! They couldn't go just by themselves.'

There was a silence. The four were completely bewildered. How could two large, solid caravans disappear into thin air?

'Look - there are wheel-marks in the grass,' said Dick suddenly. 'See - our caravans went this way - come on, follow. Down the hillside, look!'

In the greatest astonishment the four children and Timmy followed the wheel-marks. Julian glanced back once, feeling that they were being watched. But not one of the fair-folk was to be seen. Perhaps they are watching silently behind their caravan curtains. Julian thought, uncomfortably.

The wheel-marks went right down the field and reached the gate. It was shut now, but it must have been opened for the two caravans, because there were marks in the grass by the gate, marks that passed through it and then were lost in the lane.

'What are we to do?' said Anne, scared. 'They're gone! We've nowhere to sleep. Oh, Julian - what are we going to do?'

Chapter 8

WHERE ARE THE CARAVANS?

FOR once in a way Julian was quite at a loss what to do! It looked as if someone had stolen the two caravans - taken them right away somewhere!

'I suppose we'd better ring up the police,' he said. 'They'll watch out for the two caravans, and arrest the thieves. But that won't help us much for tonight! We've got to find somewhere to sleep.'

'I think we ought to go and tackle one or two of the fair-folk,' said Dick. 'Even if they have got nothing to do with the theft they must have seen the caravans being taken away.'

'Yes. I think you're right,' said Julian. They must know something about it. George, you stay here with Anne, in case the fair people are rude. We'll take Timmy - he may be useful.'

George didn't want to stay behind - but she could see that Anne did! So she stayed with her, straining her eyes after the two boys as they went back up the hill with Timmy close behind.

'Don't let's go to the snake-man,' said Dick. 'He might be playing with his snakes in his caravan!'

'What possible game can you play with snakes?' said Julian. 'Or are you thinking of snakes and ladders?'

'Funny joke,' said Dick, politely. 'Look - there's somebody by a camp-fire - Bufflo, I think. No, it's Alfredo. Well, we know he isn't as fierce as he looks - let's tackle him about the caravans.'

They went up to the big fire-eater, who was sitting smoking by the fire. He didn't hear them coming and jumped violently when Julian spoke to him.

'Mr. Alfredo,' began Julian, 'could you tell us where our two caravans have gone? We found them missing when we got back just now.'

'Ask Bufflo,' said Alfredo, gruffly, not looking at them.

'But don't you know anything about them?' persisted Julian.

'Ask Bufflo,' said Alfredo, blowing out clouds of smoke. Julian and Dick turned away, annoyed, and went over to Bufflo's caravan. It was shut. They knocked on the door, and Bufflo appeared, his mop of golden hair gleaming in the lamplight.

'Mr. Bufflo,' began Julian politely again. 'Mr. Alfredo told us to come and ask you about our caravans, which are missing, and...'

'Ask the rubber-man,' said Bufflo, shortly, and slammed the door. Julian was angry. He knocked again. The window opened and Skippy, Bufflo's little wife, looked out.

'You go and ask Mr. India-rubber,' she called, and shut the window with what sounded suspiciously like a giggle.

'Is this a silly trick they're playing on us?' said Dick fiercely.

'Looks like it,' said Julian. 'Well, we'll try the rubber-man. Come on. He's the last one we'll try, though!'

They went to the rubber-man's caravan, and rapped smartly on the door. 'Who's there?' came the voice of Mr. India-rubber.

'Come out - we want to ask you something,' said Julian.

'Who's there?' said the rubber-man again.

'You know jolly well who we are,' said Julian raising his voice. 'Our caravans have been stolen, and we want to find out who took them. If you won't give us any help, we're going to telephone the police.'

The door opened and the rubber-man stood on the top of the steps, looking down at Julian. 'Nobody has stolen them,' he said. 'Nobody at all. You go and ask the snake-man.'

'If you think we're going round asking every single person in this camp, you're mistaken!' said

Julian, angrily. 'I don't want to go to the police - we wanted to be friends with you fair-folk, not enemies. This is all very silly. If the caravans are stolen we've no other choice but to go to the police - and I don't imagine you want them after you again! We know they were put on to you a few weeks back.'

'You know too much,' said the rubber-man, in a very surly voice. 'Your caravans are not stolen. I will show you where they are.'

He came lightly down the steps of his caravan and walked in front of the two boys in the half-darkness. He went across the grassy hillside, making for where the children's caravans had stood. 'Where are you taking us?' called Julian. 'We know the vans are not there! Please don't act the idiot - there's been enough of that already.'

The man said nothing, but walked on. The boys and Timmy could do nothing but follow. Timmy was not happy. He kept up a continuous low growling, like far-off thunder. The rubber-man took not the slightest notice. Julian wondered idly if he didn't fear dogs because they wouldn't be able to bite rubber!

The man took them to the hedge that ran at one side of the field, beyond where the two caravans had stood. Julian began to feel exasperated. He knew perfectly well that the two vans had been taken down to the field-gate and out into the lane - then why was this fellow leading him in the opposite direction?

The rubber-man forced his way through the hedge, and the boys followed - and there, just the other side, two big, dark shapes loomed up in the twilight - the caravans!

'Well!' said Julian, taken aback. 'What was the idea of putting the caravans here, in the next field?'

'Us-folk and you-folk don't mix,' said the man. 'We don't like kids messing about. Three weeks ago we had a canary-man, with over a hundred canaries that gave a show with him - and some kids opened all the cages one night and set them loose.'

'Oh,' said Julian. 'They'd die, of course, if they were set loose - they don't know how to look for their own food. That was bad luck. But we don't do things like that.'

'No kids allowed with us now,' said the rubber-man. 'That's why we put horses into your vans, took them down to the field-gate, and up into the next field - and here they are. We thought you'd be back in the daylight and would see them.'

'Well, it's nice to find you can be chatty, all of a sudden,' said Julian. 'Don't growl any more,

Timmy. It's all right. We've found our vans!

The rubber-man disappeared without another word. They heard him squeezing easily through the hedge. Julian took out the key to his caravan, went up the steps and opened the door. He rummaged about and found his torch. He switched it on and shone it round. Nothing had been disturbed.

'Well - so that's that,' he said. 'Just a bit of spite on the part of the fair-folk, I suppose - punishing us for what those horrid kids did to the canaries. I must say it was a shame to open those cages - half the poor little creatures must have died. I don't like birds put in cages - but as canaries can't live in this country unless they are looked after, it's cruel to let them go loose, and starve.'

'I agree with you,' said Dick. They were now walking down the hillside to a gap in the hedge through which the vans must have been pulled up the hill. George and Anne would be most relieved to hear they had found the caravans!

Julian gave a whistle, and George answered it at once. 'We're still here, Julian! What's happened?'

'We've got the caravans,' shouted back Julian, cheerily. 'They're in this field.'

The girls joined them at once, most surprised to hear this news. Julian explained.

'The fair-folk really have got a hate on against children,' he said. 'Apparently they had a canary-man, whose show consisted of singing canaries - and some kids set all the birds loose one night - so half of them died. And now the fair-folk won't have children anywhere near them.'

'I suppose the snake-man is afraid of us setting his snakes loose,' said Dick, with a chuckle.

'Well, thank goodness we've found the vans. I had a feeling we might have to sleep in a haystack tonight!'

'I wouldn't have minded that,' said George. 'I like haystacks.'

'We'll light a fire and cook something,' said Julian. 'I feel hungry after all this upset.'

'I don't,' said Anne. 'I hate feeling that the fair-folk won't be friends. It's silly of them. We're not used to that.'

'Yes - but they're rather like children themselves,' said Julian. 'Somebody does something unkind to them, so they get sulky, and wait for a chance to hit back - and then someone set the police on them, too, don't forget - they're very touchy at the moment, I imagine.'

'Well, it's a pity,' said George, watching Dick light a camp-fire very efficiently. 'I was looking forward to having a good time with them. Do you suppose the farmer will mind us being here?'

'Oh - I never thought of that,' said Julian. 'This may not be a camping field. I hope to goodness we don't have an angry farmer shouting at us tomorrow!'

'And, oh dear, we are so far away from the stream now,' said Anne. 'It's on the other side of the field where we were - and we do badly want water.'

'We'll have to do without it tonight,' said Dick, firmly. 'I don't want the top of my hair taken off by Bufflo, or a rope tying up my legs, thrown by the ropeman, or a snake wriggling after me. I bet those fair-folk will be on the watch for us to fetch water. This is all very silly.'

They had rather a solemn meal. Things had suddenly begun to seem rather complicated. They couldn't go to the police about such a silly thing - nor did they want to. But if the farmer wanted to turn them out of this field, how could they go back to their first camping-place? Nobody wanted to live in a camp surrounded by enemies!

'We'll sleep on it,' said Julian, at last. 'Don't worry, you girls. We'll find a way out of this problem. We are pretty good at getting out of difficulties. Never say die!'

'Woof,' said Timmy, agreeing heartily. George patted him.

'That's one of your mottoes, isn't it, Timmy?' she said.

'And another motto of his is 'Let sleeping dogs lie',' said Dick, with a broad grin. 'He hates being wakened up when he's having a nice nap, dreaming of millions of rabbits to catch!'

'Well, talking of naps, what about getting into our bunks?' said Julian, with a yawn. 'We've had a good long walk today, and I'm tired. I'm going to lie in my bunk and read.'

Everyone thought this a very good idea. They cleared up the supper-things, and the girls said good night to the boys. They went into the caravan with Timmy.

'I do hope this holiday isn't going to be a failure,' said Anne, as she got into her bunk. George gave one of her snorts.

'A failure! You wait and see! I've a feeling it will turn out to be super.'

Chapter 9

A GREAT SURPRISE

IT didn't seem as if George's feeling that the holiday was going to be 'super' was at all correct the next morning. A loud rapping came on the door of the boys' caravan before they were even awake!

Then a large red face looked in at the window, startling Julian considerably.

'Who gave you permission to camp here?' said the face, looking as black as thunder.

Julian went to the door in his pyjamas. 'Do you own this field?' he said, politely. 'Well, we were camping in the next field, and...'

'That's let for campers and caravanners,' said the man, who was dressed like a farmer. 'This isn't.' 'As I said, we were in the next field,' repeated Julian, 'and for some reason the fair-folk there didn't like us - and when we were out they brought our caravans here! As we've no horses to take them away, we couldn't do anything else but stay!'

'Well, you can't stay,' said the farmer. 'I don't let out this field. I use it for my cows. You'll have to go today, or I'll put your caravans out into the road.'

'Yes, but look here...' began Julian, and then stopped. The farmer had walked off, a determined figure in riding breeches and tweed coat. The girls opened their window and called to Julian.

'We heard what he said. Isn't he mean? Now what are we going to do?'

'We're going to get up and have breakfast,' said Julian. 'And then I'm going to give the fair-folk one more chance - they'll have to lend us two horses - the two they used yesterday to pull our vans! - and pull us back into our rightful place. Otherwise I very much fear I shall have to get help from the police!'

'Oh, dear,' said Anne. 'I do hate this kind of thing. We were having such a lovely time before the fair people arrived. But it seems quite impossible to get them to be friends with us.'

'Quite,' said Julian. 'I'm not so sure I want to be friendly now, either. I'd rather give up this holiday altogether and go back home than have continual trouble going on round us! Dick and I will go and tackle the fair-folk after breakfast.'

Breakfast was just as solemn as supper had been. Julian was rather silent. He was thinking what was best to say to the sullen folk in the next field.

'You must take Timmy with you,' said George, voicing the thoughts of everyone.

Julian and Dick set off with Timmy about half past eight. All the fair people were up and about, and the smoke of their fires rose up in the morning air.

Julian thought he would go and tackle the fire-eater, so the two boys went towards his caravan. The other fair people looked up, and one by one left their vans or their fires and closed round the boys. Timmy bared his teeth and growled.

'Mr. Alfredo,' began Julian, 'the farmer is turning us out of that field. We must come back here. We want you to lend us two horses for our vans.'

A ripple of laughter spread through the listening people. Mr. Alfredo answered politely, with a large smile on his face. 'What a pity! We don't hire out our horses!'

'I don't want to hire them from you,' said Julian, patiently. 'It's up to you to let us have them to bring back our vans. Otherwise - well, I shall have to go and ask the police for help. Those caravans don't belong to us, you know.'

There was an angry murmur from the listening crowd. Timmy growled more loudly. One or two of the fair-folk stepped back hurriedly when they heard him.

CRACK! Julian turned quickly. The fair people ran back, and the two boys found that they were facing Bufflo, who, with a large and unpleasant grin on his face, was swinging his whip in his hand.

CRACK! Julian jumped violently, for a few hairs from the top of his head were suddenly whisked off into the air - the end of the lash had neatly cut them away!

The crowd laughed loudly. Timmy bared his white teeth, and snarled.

Dick put his hand down on the dog's collar. 'Do that again and I shan't be able to hold the dog!' he called, warningly.

Julian stood there, at a loss to know what to do next. He couldn't bear turning tail and going off to the accompaniment of jeers and howls. He was so full of rage that he couldn't say a word.

And then something happened. Something so utterly unexpected that nobody did anything at all except let it happen!

A boyish figure came running up the grassy hillside - someone very like George, with short curly hair and a very freckled face - someone dressed, however, in a short grey skirt, and not in shorts, like George.

She came racing up, yelling at the top of her voice. 'Dick! DICK! Hey, DICK!'

Dick turned and stared in amazement.

'Why - it's Jo! JO! The gypsy girl who once got mixed up with us in an adventure! Julian, it's Jo!' There was no doubt about it at all. It was Jo! She came tearing up, her face glowing with the utmost delight and flung herself excitedly on Dick. She had always liked him best.

'Dick! I didn't know you were here! Julian! Are the others here too? Oh, Timmy, dear old Timmy! Dick, are you camping here? Oh, this is really too marvellous to be true!'

Jo seemed to be about to fling herself on Dick again, and he fended her off. 'Jo! Where in the world have you come from?'

'Well, you see,' said Jo, 'I've got school holidays like you - and I thought I'd go and visit you at Kirrin Cottage. So I did. But you had all gone away together. That was yesterday.'

'Go on,' said Dick, as Jo stopped, out of breath.

'Well, I didn't want to go back home again straight away,' said Jo. 'So I thought I'd pay a visit to my uncle - he's my mother's brother - and I knew he was camping here so I hitch-hiked all the way yesterday, and came late last night.'

'Well, I'm blessed,' said Julian. 'And who is your uncle, may I ask?'

'Oh Alfredo - the Fire-Eater,' was Jo's astonishing reply. 'Didn't you know? Oh, Dick! Oh, Julian! Can I stay here while you're here? Do, DO say I can! You haven't forgotten me, have you?'

'Of course not,' said Dick, thinking that nobody could possibly forget this wild little gypsy girl, with her mad ways and her staunch affection.

Then for the first time Jo realized that something was going on! What was this crowd doing round Julian and Dick?

She looked round, and immediately sensed that the fair people were not friendly to the two boys - although the main expression on their faces now was one of astonishment!

'How did Jo know these boys?' they wondered. How was it she was so very friendly with them? They were puzzled and suspicious.

'Uncle Alfredo, where are you?' demanded Jo, looking all round. 'Oh, there you are! Uncle, these are my very best friends - and so are the girls too, wherever they are. I'll tell you all about them, and how nice they were to me! I'll tell everybody!'

'Well,' said Julian, feeling rather embarrassed at what Jo might reveal, 'well, you tell them, Jo, and I'll just pop back and break the news to George and Anne. They will be surprised to find you are here - and that Alfredo is your uncle!'

The two boys and Timmy turned to go. The little crowd opened to let them pass. It closed up again round the excited Jo, whose high voice the boys could hear all the way across the field.

'Well, well, well!' said Dick, as they got through the hedge. 'What an astonishing thing! I couldn't believe my eyes when young Jo appeared, could you? I hope George won't mind. She was always rather jealous of Jo and the things she could do.'

The two girls were amazed at the boys' news. George was not too pleased. She preferred Jo at a distance rather than near. She liked and admired her but rather unwillingly. Jo was too like George herself for George to give her complete friendliness!

'Well, fancy Jo, Jo herself being here!' said Anne, smiling. 'Oh, Julian - it was a good thing she arrived when she did! I don't like that bit about Bufflo cracking his whip at you. He might have made you bald on the top!'

'Oh, it was only a few hairs,' said Julian. 'But it gave me quite a shock. And I think it gave the fair people a shock too when Jo arrived like a little hurricane, yelling at the top of her voice, and flinging herself on poor old Dick. She almost knocked him over!'

'She's not a bad kid,' said Dick, 'but she never stops to think. I wonder if the people she stays with know where she's gone. I wouldn't be a bit surprised if she just disappeared without a word.'

'Like the two scientists,' said Julian, with a grin. 'Gosh, I can't get over it! Jo was the very last person I would expect here.'

'Well, not really, if you think a bit,' said Anne. 'Her father is a gypsy, isn't he - and her mother was in a circus, she told us so. She trained dogs, don't you remember, Julian? So it's quite natural for Jo to have relations like the fair people. But just fancy having a fire-eater for an uncle!'

'Yes - I'd forgotten that Jo's mother was in a circus,' said Julian. 'I expect she's got peculiar relations all over the country! I wonder what she's telling them about us.'

'She's singing Dick's praises anyway,' said George. 'She always thought the world of Dick. Perhaps the fair people won't be quite so unfriendly if they know that Jo is fond of us.'

'Well, we're in a bit of a fix,' said Dick. 'We can't stay in this field, or the farmer will be after us again - and I can't see the fair people lending us their horses - and without horses we can't leave this field!'

'We could ask the farmer to lend us his horses,' suggested Anne.

'We'd have to pay him, though, and I don't see why we should,' said Julian. 'After all, it isn't our fault that our caravans were moved here.'

'I think this is a horrid and unfriendly place,' said Anne. 'And I don't want to stay here another day. I'm not enjoying it a bit.'

'Cheer up!' said Dick. 'Never say die!'

'Woof,' said Timmy.

'Look - someone's coming through that gap in the hedge down there by the lane,' said George, pointing. 'It's Jo!'

'Yes - and my goodness me, she's got a couple of horses with her!' cried Dick. 'Good old Jo! She's got Alfredo's horses!'

Chapter 10

BACK WITH THE FAIR-FOLK AGAIN

THE four of them, with Timmy capering behind, ran to meet Jo. She beamed at everyone.

'Hallo, Anne, hallo, George! Pleased to meet you again! This isn't half a surprise!'

'Jo! How did you get those horses?' said Dick, taking one by the bridle.

'Easy,' grinned Jo. 'I just told Uncle Fredo all about you - what wonders you were - and all you did for me - and wasn't I shocked when I heard they'd turned you out of your field! I let go then! I told them just what I thought of them, treating my best friends like that!'

'Did you really, Jo?' said George, doubtfully.

'Didn't you hear me?' demanded Jo. 'I yelled like anything at Uncle Fredo, and then his wife, my Aunt Anita, she yelled at him too - and then we both yelled at everyone.'

'It must have been quite a yelling match,' said Julian. 'And the result was that you got your way, and got the horses to take back our caravans, Jo?'

'Well, when Aunt Anita told me they'd taken your caravans into the next field and left them there, and wouldn't lend you horses to bring them back, I told them all a few things,' said Jo. 'I said - no, I'd better not tell you what I said. I wasn't very polite.'

'I bet you weren't' said Dick, who had already had a little experience of Jo's wild tongue the year before.

'And when I told them how my father went to prison, and you got me a home with somebody nice who looks after me, they were sorry they'd treated you roughly,' said Jo. 'And so I told Uncle Fredo I was going to catch two horses and bring your caravans back into the field again.'

'I see,' said Julian. 'And the fair-folk just let you?'

'Oh, yes,' said Jo. 'So let's hitch them in, Julian, and go back at once. Isn't that the farmer coming over there?'

It was, and he looked pretty grim. Julian hurriedly put one horse into the shafts of the girls' caravan, and Dick backed the other horse into the shafts of the second caravan. The farmer came up and watched.

'So you thought you'd get horses after all, did you?' he said. 'I thought you would telling me a lot of poppycock about being stranded here and not being able to get away!'

'Grrrrrrr,' said Timmy at once, but he was the only one who made any reply!

'Gee-up!' said Jo, taking the reins of the horse pulling the girls' caravan. 'Hup there! Git along, will you?'

The horse got along, and Jo wickedly drove him so near to the farmer that he had to move back in a hurry. He growled something at her. Timmy, appearing round the caravan, growled back. The farmer stood back further, and watched the two caravans going down the hillside, out through the wide gap in the hedge, and down the lane.

They came to the field-gate and Anne opened it. In went the horses, straining now, because they were going uphill, and the vans were heavy. At last they arrived in the corner where the vans had stood before. Julian backed them over the same bit of ground.

He unhitched the horses, and threw the reins of the second horse to Dick. 'We'll take them back ourselves,' he said.

So the two boys walked the horses over to Alfredo, who was pegging up some washing on a line. It seemed a most unsuitable thing for a fire-eater to do, but Alfredo didn't seem to mind.

'Mr. Alfredo, thank you for lending us the horses,' said Julian, in his politest tones. 'Shall we tie them up anywhere, or set them loose?'

Alfredo turned round, and took some pegs out of his large mouth. He looked rather ashamed.

'Set them loose,' he said. He hesitated before he put the pegs back into his mouth. 'We didn't know you were friends with my niece,' he said. 'She told us all about you. You should have told us you knew her.'

'And how could he do that when he didn't know she was your niece?' shouted Mrs. Alfredo from the caravan door. 'Fredo, you have no brains, not a single brain do you have. Ahhhhhh! Now you drop my best blouse on the ground!'

She ran out at top speed, and Alfredo stared in alarm. Fortunately she had no saucepan with her this time. She turned to the two amused boys.

'Alfredo is sorry he took your caravans away,' she said, 'are you not, Fredo?'

'Well! It was you who...' began Alfredo, with a look of astonishment. But he wasn't allowed to finish. His dark little wife gave him a violent nudge, and spoke again herself, her words tumbling over one another.

'Pay no attention to this big bad man! He has no brains. He can only eat fire, and that is a poor thing to do! Now Jo, she has brains. Now, are you not glad that you are back again in your corner?'

'I should have felt gladder if you had all been friendly to us,' said Julian. 'I'm afraid we don't feel like stopping here any longer, though. We shall probably leave tomorrow.'

'Now there, Fredo, see what you have done! You have chased away these nice children!' cried Mrs. Alfredo. 'They have manners, these boys, a thing you know nothing about, Fredo. You should learn from them, Fredo, you should...'

Fredo took some pegs from his mouth to make an indignant answer, but his wife suddenly gave a shriek and ran to her caravan. 'Something burns! Something burns!'

Alfredo gave a hearty laugh, a loud guffaw that surprised the boys. 'Ha! She bakes today, and burns her cake! She has no brains, that woman! No brains at all!'

Julian and Dick turned to go. Alfredo spoke to them in a low voice. 'You can stay here now, here in this field. You are Jo's friend. That is enough for us.'

'It may be,' said Julian. 'But it's not quite enough for us, I'm afraid. We shall leave tomorrow.'

The boys went back to the caravans. Jo sat on the grass with George and Anne, eagerly telling them of her life with a very nice family. 'But they won't let me wear shorts or be a boy,' she ended sadly. 'That's why I wear a skirt now. Could you lend me some shorts, George?'

'No, I couldn't,' said George, firmly. Jo was quite enough like her as it was, without wearing shorts! 'Well, you seem to have turned over a new leaf, Jo. Can you read and write yet?'

'Almost,' said Jo, and turned her eyes away. She found lessons very difficult, for she had never been to school when she lived with her gypsy father. She looked back again with bright eyes. 'Can I stay with you?' she said. 'My foster-mother would let me, I know - if it was you I was with.'

'Didn't you tell her you were coming here?' said Dick. 'That was unkind, Jo.'

'I never thought,' said Jo. 'You send her a card for me, Dick.'

'Send one yourself,' said George at once. 'You said you could write.'

Jo took no notice of that remark. 'Can I stay with you?' she said. 'I won't sleep in the caravans, I'll doss down underneath. I always did that when the weather was fine, and I lived with my Dad in his caravan. It would be a change for me now not to live in a house. I like lots of things in houses, though I never thought I would - but I shall always like sleeping rough best.'

'Well - you could stay here with us, if we were going to stay,' said Julian. 'But I don't much feel inclined to, now we've had such an unfriendly welcome from everyone.'

'I'll tell everyone to be kind to you,' said Jo at once, and got up as if she meant to go then and there to force everyone into kindness!

Dick pushed her down. 'No. We'll stay here one more day and night, and make up our minds tomorrow. What do you say, Julian?'

'Right,' said Julian. He looked at his watch. 'Let's go and celebrate Jo's coming with a few ice-creams. And I expect you two girls have got some shopping to do, haven't you?'

'Yes,' said Anne, and fetched the shopping bags. They set off down the hill, the five of them and Timmy. As they passed the snake-man he called out cheerily to them: 'Good morning! Nice day, isn't it?'

After the surliness and sulkiness the children had got from the fair-folk up till then, this came as a surprise. Anne smiled, but the boys and George merely nodded and passed by. They were not so forgiving as Anne!

They passed the rubber-man, bringing back water. Behind him came the rope-man. Both of them nodded to the children, and the sad-looking rubber-man actually gave a brief grin.

Then they saw Bufflo, practising with his whip - crack-crack-crack! He came over to them. 'If you'd like a crack with my whip, you're welcome any time,' he said to Julian.

'Thanks,' said Julian, politely but stiffly. 'But we're probably leaving tomorrow.'

'Keep your hair on!' said Bufflo, feeling snubbed.

'I would if you'd let me,' said Julian at once, rubbing his hand over the top of his head where Bufflo had stripped off a few up-standing hairs.

'Ho, ho!' guffawed Bufflo and then stopped abruptly, afraid he had given offence. Julian grinned at him. He rather liked Bufflo, with his mop of yellow hair and lazy drawl.

'You stay on with us,' said Bufflo. 'I'll lend you a whip.'

'We're probably leaving tomorrow,' repeated Julian. He nodded to him, and went on with the others.

'I'm beginning to feel I'd rather like to stay after all,' said George. 'It makes such a difference if people are friendly.'

'Well, we're not staying,' said Julian, shortly. 'I've practically made up my mind - but we'll just wait till tomorrow. It's a - a matter of pride with me. You girls don't understand quite how I feel about the whole thing.'

They didn't. Dick understood, though, and he agreed with Julian. They went on down to the village and made their way to the ice-cream shop.

They had a very pleasant day. They had a wonderful lunch on the grass by their caravans - and to their surprise Mrs. Alfredo presented them with a sponge sandwich she had made. Anne thanked her very much indeed to make up for a certain stiffness in the thanks of the two boys.

'You might have said a bit more,' she said reproachfully to them. 'She really is a kind little woman. Honestly I wouldn't mind staying on now.'

But Julian was curiously obstinate about it. He shook his head. 'We go tomorrow,' he said. 'Unless something unexpected happens to make us stay. And it won't.'

But Julian was quite wrong. Something unexpected did happen. Something really very peculiar indeed.

Chapter 11

A VERY STRANGE THING

THE unexpected happening came that evening after tea. They had all had rather a late tea, and a very nice one. Bread and butter and honey - new doughnuts from the dairy - and the sponge-cake that Mrs. Alfredo had presented them with, which had a very rich filling indeed.

'I can't eat a thing more,' said George, 'that spongecake was too rich for words. I don't even feel as if I can get up and clear away - so don't start suggesting it, Anne.'

'I'm not,' said Anne. 'There's plenty of time. It's a heavenly evening - let's sit for a while. There goes that blackbird again. He has a different tune every time he sings.'

'That's what I like about blackbirds,' said Dick, lazily. 'They're proper composers. They make up their own tunes - not like the chaffinch who just carols the same old song again and again and again. Honestly there was one this morning that said it fifty times without stopping.'

'Chip-chip-chip, cherry-erry-erry, chippee-OO-EE-Ar!' shouted a chaffinch, rattling it all off as if he had learnt it by heart. 'Chip-chip-chip...'

'There he goes again,' said Dick. 'If he doesn't say that, he shouts pink-pink-pink as if he'd got that colour on the brain. Look at him over there - isn't he a beauty?'

He certainly was. He flew down to the grass beside the children and began to peck up the crumbs, even venturing on to Anne's knee once. She sat still, really thrilled.

Timmy growled, and the chaffinch flew off. 'Silly, Timmy,' said George. 'Jealous of a chaffinch! Oh, look, Dick - are those herons flying down to the marsh on the east side of the castle hill?'

'Yes,' said Dick, sitting up. 'Where are your field-glasses, George? We could see the big birds beautifully through them.'

George fetched them from her caravan. She handed them to Dick. He focused them on the marsh. 'Yes - four herons - gosh, what long legs they've got, haven't they? They are wading happily about - now one's struck down at something with its great beak. What's it got? Yes, it's a frog. I can see its back legs!'

'You can't!' said George, taking the field-glasses from him. 'You're a fibber. The glasses aren't powerful enough to see a frog's legs all that way off!'

But they were powerful enough. They were really magnificent ones, far too good for George, who wasn't very careful with valuable things.

She was just in time to see the poor frog's legs disappearing into the big strong beak of the heron. Then something frightened the birds, and before the others could have a look at them they had all flapped away.

'How slowly they flap their wings,' said Dick. 'They must surely flap them more slowly than any other bird. Give me the glasses again, George. I'll have a squint at the jackdaws. There are thousands of them flying again over the castle - their evening jaunt, I suppose.'

He put them to his eyes, and moved the glasses to and fro, watching the endless whirl and swoop of the black jackdaws. The sound of their many voices came loudly over the evening air. 'Chack-chack-chack-chack!'

Dick saw some fly down to the only complete tower of the castle. He lowered the glasses to follow them. One jackdaw flew down to the sill of the slit-window near the top of the tower, and Dick followed its flight. It rested for half a second on the sill and then flew off as if frightened.

And then Dick saw something that made his heart suddenly jump. His glasses were trained on the window-slit and he saw something most astonishing there! He gazed as if he couldn't believe his eyes.

Then he spoke in a low voice to Julian.

'Ju! Take the glasses, will you? Train them on the window-slit near the top of the only complete tower - and tell me if you see what I see. Quick!'

Julian held out his hand in astonishment for the glasses. The others stared in surprise. What could Dick have seen? Julian put the glasses to his eyes and focused them on the window Dick had been looking at. He stared hard.

'Yes. Yes, I can. What an extraordinary thing. It must be an effect of the light, I think.'

By this time the others were in such a state of curiosity that they couldn't bear it. George snatched the glasses from Julian. 'Let me see!' she said, quite fiercely. She trained them on to the window. She gazed and gazed and gazed.

Then she lowered the glasses and stared at Julian and Dick. 'Are you being funny?' she said. 'There's nothing there - nothing but an empty window!'

Anne snatched the glasses from her just before Dick tried to take them again. She too trained them on the window. But there was absolutely nothing there to see.

'There's nothing,' said Anne, disgusted, and Dick took the glasses from her at once, focusing them once more on the window. He lowered them.

'It's gone,' he said to Julian. 'Nothing there now.'

'DICK! If you don't tell us what you saw we'll roll you down the hill,' said George, crossly. 'Are you making something up? What did you see?'

'Well,' said Dick, looking at Julian. 'I saw a face. A face not far from the window, staring out. What did you see, Ju?'

'The same,' said Julian. 'It made me feel pretty queer, too.'

'A face!' said George, Anne and Jo all together. 'What do you mean?'

'Well - just what we said,' replied Dick. 'A face - with eyes and nose and mouth.'

'But nobody lives in the castle. It's a ruin,' said George. 'Was it someone exploring, do you think?'

Julian looked at his watch. 'No, it couldn't have been a visitor. I'm sure - the castle shuts at half past five and it's gone six. And anyway - it looked a - a - sort of desperate face!'

'Yes. I thought so too,' said Dick. 'It's - well, it's very peculiar, isn't it, Julian? There may be some kind of ordinary explanation for it, but I can't help feeling there's something queer about it.'

'Was it a man's face?' asked George. 'Or a woman's?'

'A man's, I think,' said Dick. 'I couldn't see any hair against the darkness inside the window. Or clothes. But it looked a man's face. Did you notice the eyebrows, Ju?'

'Yes, I did,' said Julian. 'They were very pronounced, weren't they?'

This rang a bell with George! 'Eyebrows!' she said at once. 'Don't you remember - the picture of that scientist, Terry-Kane, showed that he had thick black eyebrows you said he'd shave them off and use them upside down for moustaches, don't you remember, Dick?'

'Yes. I do remember,' said Dick, and looked at Julian. Julian shook his head. 'I didn't recognize the likeness,' he said, 'but after all it's a very long way away. It is only because George's glasses are so extraordinarily good that we managed to spot a face looking out of a window so very far away. Actually I think there will be an ordinary explanation - it's just that we were so startled - and that made us think it was very queer.'

'I wish I'd seen the face,' sighed George. 'They're my glasses, too - and I never saw the face!'

'Well, you can keep on looking and see if it comes back,' said Dick, handing over the glasses. 'It may do.'

So Anne, George, and Jo took turn and turn about, gazing earnestly through the field-glasses - but they saw no face. In the end it got so dark that it was quite difficult to make out the tower, let alone the window or a face!

'I tell you what we might do,' said Julian. 'We could go and see over the castle ourselves tomorrow. And we could go up into that tower. Then we should certainly see if there's a face there.'

'But I thought we were leaving tomorrow,' said Dick.

'Oh - yes, we did think of leaving, didn't we?' said Julian, who had quite forgotten this idea of his in his excitement. 'Well - I don't feel as if we can go before we've explored that castle, and found the explanation of the face.'

'Of course we can't,' said George. 'Fancy seeing a thing like that and rushing off without finding out about it. I couldn't possibly.'

'I'm going to stay anyhow,' announced Jo. 'I could stop with my Uncle Alfredo, if you go, and I'll let you know if the face comes again - if George will leave me her glasses.'

'Well, I shan't,' said George, with much determination. 'If I go, my glasses go with me. But I'm not going. You will stay now, won't you, Julian?'

'We'll stay and find out about the face,' said Julian. 'I honestly feel awfully puzzled about it. Hallo, who's this coming?'

A big figure loomed up in the twilight. It was Alfredo, the fire-eater. 'Jo! Are you there?' he said. 'Your aunt invites you to supper - and all your friends too. Come along.'

There was a pause. Anne looked expectantly across at Julian. Was he still going to be high-and-mighty and proud? She hoped not.

'Thanks,' said Julian, at last. 'We'd be pleased to come. Do you mean now?'

'That would be nice,' said Alfredo, with a little bow. 'I fire-eat for you? Anything you say!'

This was too tempting to resist. Everyone got up at once and followed the big Alfredo over the hillside to his caravan. Outside there was a really good fire, and on it was a big black pot that gave out a wonderful smell.

'Supper is not quite ready,' said Alfredo. The five children were relieved. After their big tea they didn't feel ready even for a meal that smelt as good as the one in the pot! They sat down by it.

'Will you really eat fire for us?' asked Anne. 'How do you do it?'

'Ah, very difficult!' said Alfredo. 'I do it only if you promise me not to try it by yourselves. You would not like blisters all over your mouth inside, would you?'

Everyone felt certain that they wouldn't. 'I don't want you to have blisters in your mouth, either,' added Anne.

Alfredo looked shocked. 'I am a very good fire-eater,' he assured her. 'No good ones ever make blisters in their mouths. Now - you sit still and I will fetch my torch and eat fire for you.'

Someone else sat down beside them. It was Bufflo. He grinned at them. Skippy came and sat down too. Then the snake-man came up, and he sat down on the opposite side of the fire.

Alfredo came back carrying a few things in his hands. 'Quite a family circle!' he said. 'Now watch - I will eat fire for you!'

Chapter 12

FIRE-EATING AND OTHER THINGS!

ALFREDO sat down on the grass, some way back from the fire. He set a little metal bowl in front of him, that smelt of petrol. He held up two things to show the children.

'His torches,' said Mrs. Alfredo, proudly. 'He eats fire from them.'

Alfredo called out something to the snake-man, dipping his two torches into the bowl. They were not alight yet, and to the children they looked like very large buttonhooks, with a wad of wool caught in the hook-part.

The snake-man leaned forward and took a burning twig out of the fire. With a deft throw he pitched it right into the metal bowl. Immediately it set light to the petrol there, and flames shot up in the darkness.

Alfredo had held his torches out of the way, but now he thrust first one and then another into the burning petrol in the bowl.

They flared alight at once, and red flames shot up as he held one in each hand. His eyes gleamed in the brilliant light, and the five children sat still, spellbound.

Then Alfredo leaned back his head - back and back - and opened his great mouth wide. He put one of the lighted torches into it, and closed his mouth over it, so that his cheeks gleamed a strange and unbelievable red from the flames inside his mouth. Anne gave a little scream and George gasped. The two boys held their breath. Only Jo watched unconcerned. She had seen her uncle do this many times before!

Alfredo opened his mouth, and flames rushed out of it, gushing like a fiery waterfall. What with the other torch flaring in his left hand, the burning petrol in the bowl, the torch in his right hand and the flames from his mouth, it really was an extraordinary scene!

He did the same with the other torch, and once more his cheeks glowed like a lamp. Then fire came from his mouth again, and was blown this way and that by the night breeze.

Alfredo closed his mouth. He swallowed. Then he looked round, opened his mouth to show that he no longer had any flames there, and smiled broadly.

'Ah - you like to see me eat fire?' he said, and put out his torches. The bowl was no longer flaming, and now only the fire-light lit the scene.

'It's marvellous,' said Julian, with great admiration. 'But don't you burn your mouth?'

'What, me? No, never!' laughed Alfredo. 'At first may be, yes - when I begin years and years ago. But now, no. It would be a shameful thing to burn my mouth - I would hang my head, and go away.'

'But - how is it you don't burn your mouth?' asked Dick, puzzled.

Alfredo refused to give any explanation. That was part of the mystery of his act and he wasn't going to give it away.

'I can fire-eat too,' announced Jo, casually and most unexpectedly. 'Here, Uncle, let me have one of your torches.'

'You! You will do nothing of the sort!' roared Alfredo. 'Do you want to burn to bits?'

'No. And I shan't either,' said Jo. 'I've watched you and I know just how it's done. I've tried it.'

'Fibber!' said George at once.

'Now you listen to me,' began Alfredo again. 'If you fire-eat I will whip you till you beg me for mercy. I will...'

'Now, Fredo,' said his wife, 'you'll do nothing of the sort. I'll deal with Jo if she starts any nonsense here. As for fire-eating - well, if there's to be anyone else fire-eating here, I will do it. I, your wife.'

'You will not fire-eat,' said Alfredo obstinately, evidently afraid that his hot-tempered little wife might try to do it.

Anne suddenly gave a scream of fright. A long, thick body glided between her and Julian - one of the snake-man's pythons! He had brought one with him, and the children hadn't known. Jo caught hold of it and held on for dear life.

'Let him be,' said the snake-man. 'He will come back to me. He wants a run.'

'Let me hold him for a bit,' begged Jo. 'He feels so smooth and cold. I like snakes.'

Julian put out his hand gingerly and touched the great snake. It did feel unexpectedly smooth, and quite cool. How extraordinary! It looked so scaly and rough.

The snake slithered all the way up Jo and then began to pour itself down her back. 'Now don't you let him get his tail round you,' warned the snake-man. 'I've told you that before.'

'I'll wear him round my neck,' said Jo, and proceeded to pull the snake's long body until in the end he hung round her neck like a fur. George watched in unwilling admiration. Anne had removed herself as far from Jo as possible. The boys gazed in astonishment, and felt a new respect for the little gypsy girl.

Someone struck up a soft melody on a guitar. It was Skippy, Bufflo's wife. She hummed a sad little song that had a gay little chorus in which all the fair-folk joined. Practically all the camp had come along now, and there were quite a few the children hadn't seen before.

It was exciting sitting there round the glowing fire, listening to the thrum of the guitar, and the sound of Skippy's low, clear voice - sitting near a fire-eater too, and within arm's length of a snake who also seemed to be enjoying the music! He swayed about in time to the chorus, and then suddenly poured himself all down the front of Jo, and glided like magic to his master, the snake-man.

'Ah, my beauty,' said the funny little man, and let the python slide between his hands, its coils pulsing powerfully as it went. 'You like the music, my beauty?'

'He really loves his snake,' whispered Anne to George. 'How can he?'

Alfredo's wife got up. 'It is time to go,' she told the audience. 'Alfredo needs his supper. Is it not so, my big bad man?'

Alfredo agreed that it was so. He placed the heavy iron pot over the glowing fire again, and in a few seconds such a glorious smell came from it that all the five children began to sniff expectantly.

'Where's Timmy?' said George, suddenly. He was nowhere to be seen!

'He crept away with his tail down when he saw the snake,' said Jo. 'I saw him go. Timmy, come back! It's all right! Timmy, Timmy!'

'I'll call him, thank you,' said George. 'He's my dog. Timmy!'

Timmy came, his tail still down. George fondled him and so did Jo. He licked them both in turn. George tried to drag him away from Jo. She didn't like Timmy to show affection for the little gypsy girl - but he always did! He loved her.

The supper was lovely. 'What is in your pot?' asked Dick, accepting a second helping. 'I've never tasted such a delicious stew in my life.'

'Chicken, duck, beef, bacon, rabbit, hare, hedgehog, onions, turnips...' began Alfredo's wife. 'I put there everything that comes. It cooks and I stir, it cooks and I stir. Perhaps a partridge goes in one day, and a pheasant the next, and...'

'Hold your tongue, wife,' growled Alfredo, who knew quite well that the farmers round about might well ask questions about some of the things in that stew.

'You tell me to hold my tongue!' cried little Mrs. Alfredo angrily, flourishing a spoon. 'You tell me that!'

'Woof,' said Timmy, receiving some nice tasty drops on his nose, and licking them off. 'Woof!' He got up and went towards the spoon, hoping for a few more.

'Oh, Aunt Nita, do give Timmy a spoonful out of the stew,' begged Jo, and to Timmy's great joy he got a big plateful all to himself. He could hardly believe it!

'Thank you very much for a very nice supper,' said Julian, feeling that it really was time to go. He got up and the others followed his example.

'And thank you for fire-eating for us, Alfredo,' said George. 'It doesn't seem to have spoilt your appetite!'

'Poof!' said Alfredo, as if such a thing would never enter his head. 'Jo - are you going to stay with us again tonight? You are welcome.'

'I'd just like an old rug, that's all, Aunt Nita,' said Jo. 'I'm going to sleep under George's caravan.'

'You can sleep on the floor inside, if you like,' said George. But Jo shook her head.

'No. I've had enough of sleeping indoors for a bit. I want to sleep out. Under the caravan will be a fine place for me. Gypsies often sleep there when the weather is warm.'

They went back over the dark hillside. A few stars were out, but the moon was not yet up.

'That was a jolly interesting evening,' said Dick. 'I enjoyed it. I like your aunt and uncle, Jo.'

Jo was delighted. She always loved praise from Dick. She went under the girls' caravan, and rolled herself up in the rug. She had been taught to clean her teeth and wash and do her hair, by the foster-mother she had lived with for some months - but all that was forgotten now that she was leading a gypsy life again!

'In a day or two she'll be the filthy, dirty, tangly-haired, rude girl she was when we first knew her,' said George, combing out her own hair extra well. 'I'm glad we're going to stay here after all, aren't you, Anne? I really do think the fair people are friendly towards us now.'

'Thanks to Jo,' said Anne. George said nothing. She didn't like being under obligation to Jo! She finished preparing herself for bed and got into her bunk.

'I wish we'd seen that face at the window, don't you, Anne?' she said. 'I do wonder whose it was - and why it was there, looking out.'

'I don't think I want to talk about faces at windows just now,' said Anne, getting into her bunk.

'Let's change the subject.' She blew out the lamp and settled down. They talked for a few minutes, and then George heard something outside the caravan. What could it be? Timmy raised his head and gave a little growl.

George looked at the window opposite. A lone star shone through it - and then something came in front of the star, blotted it out, and pressed itself against the glass pane. Timmy growled again, but not very loudly. Was it someone he knew?

George flashed on her torch, and immediately saw what it was. She gave a little giggle. Then she called to Anne.

'Anne! Anne! Quick, there's a face at the window. Anne, wake up!'

'I'm not asleep,' said Anne's voice, and she sat up, scared. 'What face? Where? You're not just frightening me, are you?'

'No - there it is, look!' said George and shone her torch at the window. A big, long, dark-brown face looked in, and Anne gave a shriek. Then she laughed. 'You beast, George - it's only Alfredo's horse. Oh, you did give me a fright. I've a good mind to pull you out of your bunk on to the floor. Go away, you silly staring horse - shoo, go away!'

Chapter 13

OFF TO THE CASTLE

NEXT morning, as they had breakfast, the children discussed the face at the castle window again. They had levelled the field-glasses time and again at the window, but there was nothing to be seen.

'Let's go and see over the castle as soon as it opens,' said Dick. 'But mind - nobody is to mention faces at windows - you hear me, Jo? You're the one who can't keep your tongue still sometimes.'

Jo flared up. 'I'm not! I can keep a secret!'

'All right, fire-eater,' said Dick with a grin. He looked at his watch. 'It's too soon to go yet.'

'I'll go and help Mr. Slither with his snakes,' said Jo. 'Anyone else coming?'

'Mr. Slither! What a marvellous name for a man who keeps snakes,' said Dick. 'I don't mind coming to watch, but I'm not keen on the way they pour themselves up and down people.'

They all went to Mr. Slither's caravan except Anne, who said she would much rather clear up the breakfast things.

The snake-man had both his snakes out of their box. 'He is polishing them,' said George, sitting down near by. 'See how he makes their brown bodies shine.'

'Here, Jo - you mop Beauty for me,' said Mr. Slither. 'The stuff is in that bottle over there. He's got those nasty little mites again under his scales. Mop him with that stuff and that will soon get rid of them.'

Jo seemed to know what to do. She got a rag, tipped up the bottle of yellow stuff and began to pat one of the snakes gently, letting the lotion soak round his scales.

George, not to be outdone, offered to help in the polishing of the other snake. 'You hold him then,' said Mr. Slither, and slid the snake over to George. He got up and went into his caravan. George hadn't quite bargained for this. The snake lay across her knees, and then began to wind round her body. 'Don't you let him get a hold of you with his tail,' Jo warned her.

The boys soon got tired of seeing Jo and George vying with one another over the pythons, and went off to where Bufflo was practising spinning rope-rings. He spun loop after loop of rope, making wonderful patterns in the air with it. He grinned at the boys.

'Like a try?' he said. But neither of them could do anything with the rope at all.

'Let's see you snap off something with the whip-lash,' said Dick. 'I think you're a marvel at that.'

'What do you want me to hit?' asked Bufflo, picking up his magnificent whip. 'The topmost leaves on that bush?'

'Yes,' said Dick. Bufflo looked at them, swung his whip once or twice, lifted it - and cracked it.

Like magic the topmost leaves disappeared off the bush. The boys gazed in admiration. 'Now pick off that daisy-head over there,' said Julian, pointing.

Crack! The daisy-head vanished. 'That's easy,' said Bufflo. 'Look, you hold a pencil or something in your hands, one of you. I'll pick it out without touching your fingers!'

Julian hesitated. But Dick dived his hand into his pocket and brought out a red pencil, not very long. He held out his hand, with the pencil between finger and thumb. Bufflo looked at it with half-closed eyes, as if measuring the distance. He raised his whip.

Crack! The tip-end of the lash curled itself round the pencil and pulled it clean out of Dick's hand. It flew up into the air, and Bufflo reached out his hand and caught it!

'Jolly good,' said Dick, lost in admiration. 'Does it take long to learn a thing like that?'

'Matter of twenty years or so,' said Bufflo. 'But you want to begin when you're a nipper - about three years old, say. My Pa taught me - and if I didn't learn fast enough he'd take the skin off the tips of my ears with his whiplash! You soon learn if you know that's going to happen to you!'

The boys gazed at Bufflo's big ears. They certainly did look a bit rough at the edges!

'I throw knives too,' said Bufflo, basking in the boys' admiration. 'I put Skippy up against a board, and throw knives all round her - so that when she walks away from the board at the end, there's her shape all outlined in knives. Like to see me?'

'Well, no, not now,' said Julian, looking at his watch. 'We're going to see over the castle. Have you ever seen over it, Bufflo?'

'No. Who wants to waste time going over a ruined old castle?' said Bufflo, scornfully. 'Not me!'

He went off to his caravan, spinning rope-rings as he went with an ease that Dick couldn't help envying from the bottom of his heart. What a pity he hadn't begun to learn these things early enough. He was afraid he would never be really good at them now. He was too old!

'George! Jo! It's time we went,' called Julian. 'Put down those snakes, and come along. Anne! Are you ready?'

Mr. Slither went to collect his snakes. They glided over him in delight, and he ran his hands over their smooth, gleaming bodies.

'I must wash my hands before I go,' said George. 'They're a bit snaky. Coming, Jo?'

Jo didn't really see why it was necessary to wash snaky hands, but she went with George to the stream and they rinsed them thoroughly. George wiped her hands on a rather dirty hanky, and Jo wiped hers on a much dirtier skirt. She looked at George's shorts enviously. What a pity to have to wear skirts!

They didn't lock up the caravans. Julian felt sure that the fair-folk were now really friendly to them, and would not take anything from them themselves, nor permit anyone else to do so. They all walked down the hillside, Timmy bounding along joyfully, under the impression that he was going to take them for a nice long walk.

They climbed over the stile, walked up the lane a little way, and came to the wooden gate that opened on to the steep path up to the castle. Now that it was so near to them it looked almost as if it might fall on top of them!

They went up the path and came to the small tower in which was the little door giving entrance to the castle. An old woman was there, looking a little like a witch. If she had had green eyes Anne would most certainly have set her down as a descendant of a witch! But she had eyes like black beads. She had no teeth at all and it was difficult to understand what she said.

'Five, please,' said Julian, giving her twenty-five pence.

'You can't take the dog in,' said the old woman, mumbling so much that they couldn't make out what she said. She pointed to the dog and repeated her remark again, shaking her head all the time.

'Oh - can't we really take our dog?' said George. 'He won't do any harm.'

The old woman pointed to a set of rules: 'DOGS NOT ALLOWED IN.'

'All right. We'll leave him outside then,' said George, crossly. 'What a silly rule! Timmy, stay here. We won't be long.'

Timmy put his tail down. He didn't approve of this. But he knew that he was not allowed into certain places, such as churches, and he imagined this place must be an enormous church - the kind of place into which George so often disappeared on Sundays. He lay down in a sunny corner.

The five children went in through the clicking turnstile. They opened the door beyond and went into the castle grounds. The door shut behind them.

'Wait - we ought to get a guide-book,' said Julian. 'I want to know something about that tower.'

He went back and bought one for another five pence. They stood in the great castle yard and looked at the book. It gave the history of the old place - a history of peace and war, quarrels and truces, family feuds, marriages and all the other things that make up history.

'It would be an exciting story if it was written up properly,' said Julian. 'Look - here's the plan. There are dungeons!'

'Not open to the public,' quoted Dick, in disappointment. 'What a pity.'

'It was once a very strong and powerful castle,' said Julian, looking at the plan. 'It always had the strong wall that is still round it - and the castle itself is built in the middle of a great courtyard that runs all round. It says the walls of the castle itself are eight feet thick. Eight feet thick! No wonder most of it is still standing!'

They looked at the silent ruins in awe. The castle towered up, broken here and there, with sometimes a whole wall missing, and with all the doorways misshapen.

'There were four towers, of course,' said Julian, still with his nose glued to the guide-book. 'It says three are almost completely ruined now - but the fourth one is in fairly good condition, though the stone stairway that led up to the top has fallen in.'

'Well then - you couldn't have seen a face at that window,' said George, looking up at the fourth tower. 'If the stairway has fallen in, no one could get up there.'

'Hm. We'll see how much fallen in it is,' said Julian. 'It may be dangerous to the public, and perhaps we'll find a notice warning us off - but it might be quite climbable in places.'

'Shall we go up it if so?' said Jo, her eyes shining. 'What shall we do if we find the Face?'

'We'll wait till we find it first!' said Julian. He shut the guide-book and put it into his pocket.

'Well, we seem to be the only people here. Let's get going. We'll walk round the courtyard first.'

They walked round the courtyard that surrounded the castle. It was strewn with great white stones that had fallen from the walls of the castle itself. In one place a whole wall had fallen in, and they could see the inside of the castle, dark and forbidding.

They came round to the front of it again. 'Let's go in at the front door - if you can call that great stone archway that,' said Julian. 'I say - can't you imagine knights on horseback riding round this courtyard, impatient to be off to some tournament, their horses' hoofs clip-clopping all the time?'

'Yes!' said Dick. 'I can just imagine it!'

They went in at the arched entrance, and wandered through room after room with stone floors and walls, and with small slit-like windows that gave very little light indeed.

'They had no glass for panes in those days,' said Dick. 'I bet they were glad on cold windy days that the windows were so tiny. Brrrrrr! This must have been a terribly cold place to live in.'

'The floors used to be covered with rushes, and tapestry was hung on the walls,' said Anne, remembering a history lesson. 'Julian - let's go and look for the stairway to that tower now. Do let's! I'm longing to find out whether there really is a face up in that tower!'

Chapter 14

FAYNIGHTS CASTLE

'CHACK-CHACK-CHACK! Chack-chack-chack!' The jackdaws circled round the old castle, calling to one another in their cheerful, friendly voices. The five children looked up and watched them.

'You can see the grey at the backs of their necks,' said Dick. 'I wonder how many years jackdaws have lived round and about this castle.'

'I suppose the sticks lying all over this courtyard must have been dropped by them,' said Julian. 'They make their nests of big twigs - really, they must drop as many as they use! Just look at that pile over there!'

'Very wasteful of them!' said Dick. 'I wish they would come and drop some near our caravan to save me going to get firewood each day for the fire!'

They were standing at the great archway that made the entrance to the castle. Anne grew impatient. 'Do let's look at the towers now,' she said.

They went to the nearest one, but it was almost impossible to realize that it had been a tower. It was just a great heap of fallen stones, piled one on top of another.

They went to the only good tower. They had hoped to find some remains of a stone stairway, but to their great disappointment they could not even look up into the tower! One of the inner walls had fallen in, and the floor was piled up, completely blocked. There was no sign of a stairway. Either it too had fallen in, or it was covered by the stones of the ruined wall.

Julian was astonished. It was obvious that nobody could possibly climb up the tower from the inside! Then how in the world could there have been a face at the tower window? He began to feel rather uncomfortable. Was it a real face? If not what could it have been?

'This is queer,' said Dick, thinking the same as Julian, and pointing to the heaped-up stones on the ground floor of the tower. 'It does look absolutely impossible for anyone to get up into the top of the tower. Well - what about that face then?'

'Let's go and ask that old woman if there is any way at all of getting up into the tower,' said Julian. 'She might know.'

So they left the castle, walked across the courtyard, back to the little tower in the outer wall that guarded the big gateway. The old woman was sitting by the turnstile, knitting.

'Could you tell us, please, if there is any way of getting up into the tower over there?' asked Julian.

The old woman answered something, but it was difficult to understand a word she said. However, as she shook her head vigorously, it was plain that there was no way up to the tower. It was very puzzling.

'Is there a better plan of the castle than this?' asked Julian, showing his guide-book. 'A plan of the dungeons, for instance - and a plan of the towers as they once were, before they were ruined?'

The old lady said something that sounded like 'Society of Reservation of something-or-other.'

'What did you say?' asked Julian, patiently.

The witch-like woman was evidently getting tired of these questions. She opened a big book that showed the amount of people and fees paid, and looked down it. She put her finger on something written there, and showed it to Julian.

'Society for Preservation of Old Buildings,' he read. 'Oh - did somebody come from them lately? Would they know more than it says in the guide-book?'

'Yes,' said the old woman. 'Two men came. They spent all day here - last Thursday. You ask that Society what you want to know - not me. I only take the money.'

She sounded quite intelligible all of a sudden. Then she relapsed into mumbles again, and no one could understand a word.

'Anyway, she's told us what we want to know,' said Julian. 'We'll telephone the Society and ask them if they can tell us any more about the castle. There may be secret passages and things not shown in the guide-book at all.'

'How exciting!' said George, thrilled. 'I say, let's go back to that tower and look at the outside of it. It might be climbable there.'

They went back to see - but it wasn't climbable. Although the stones it was built of were uneven enough to form slight foot-holds and hand-holds it would be much too dangerous for anyone to try to climb up - even the cat-footed Jo. For one thing it would not be possible to tell which stones were loose and crumbling until the climber caught hold - and then down he would go!

All the same, Jo was willing to try. 'I might be able to do it,' she said, slipping off one of her shoes.

'Put your shoe on,' said Dick at once. 'You are NOT going to try any tricks of that sort. There isn't even ivy for you to cling to.'

Jo put back her shoe sulkily, looking astonishingly like George as she scowled. And then, to everyone's enormous astonishment, who should come bounding up to them but Timmy!

'Timmy! Wherever have you come from?' said George, in surprise. 'There's no way in except through the turnstile - and the door behind it is shut. We shut it ourselves! How did you get in?'

'Woof,' said Timmy, trying to explain. He ran to the good tower, made his way over the blocks of stone lying about and stopped by a small space between three or four of the fallen stones. 'Woof,' he said again, and pawed at one of the stones.

'He came out there,' said George. She tugged at a big stone, but she couldn't move it an inch, of course. 'I don't know how in the world Timmy squeezed himself out of this space - it doesn't look big enough for a rabbit. Certainly none of us could get inside!'

'What puzzles me,' said Julian, 'is how Timmy got in from the outside. We left him right outside the castle - so he must have run round the outer wall somewhere and found a small hole. He must have squeezed into that.'

'Yes. That's right,' said Dick. 'We know the walls are eight feet thick, so he must have found a place where a bit of it had broken at the bottom, and forced his way in. But - would there be a hole right through the whole thickness of eight feet?'

This was really puzzling. They all looked at Timmy, and he wagged his tail expectantly. Then he barked loudly and capered round as if he wanted a game.

The door behind the turnstile opened at once and the old lady appeared. 'How did that dog get here?' she called. 'He's to go out at once!'

'We don't know how he got in,' said Dick. 'Is there a hole in the outer wall?'

'No,' said the old woman. 'Not one. You must have let that dog in when I wasn't looking. He's to go out. And you too. You've been here long enough.'

'We may as well go,' said Julian. 'We've seen all there is to see - or all that we are allowed to see. I'm quite sure there is some way of getting up into that tower although the stairway is in ruins. I'm going to ring up the Society for the Preservation of Old Buildings and ask them to put me in touch with the fellows who examined the castle last week. They must have been experts.'

'Yes. They would probably have a complete plan,' said Dick. 'Secret passages, dungeons, hidden rooms and all - if there are any!'

They took Timmy by the collar, and went out through the turnstiles, click-click-click. 'I feel like having a couple of doughnuts at the dairy,' said George. 'And some lemonade. Anyone else feel the same?'

Everyone did, including Timmy, who barked at once.

'Timmy's silly over those doughnuts,' said George. 'He just wolfs them down.'

'It's a great waste,' said Anne. 'He ate four last time - more than anyone else had.'

They walked down to the village. 'You go and order what we want,' said Julian, 'and I'll just go and look up this Society. It may have an office somewhere in this district.'

He went to the post office to use the telephone there, and the rest of them trooped in at the door of the bright little dairy. The plump shopwoman welcomed them beamingly. She considered them her best customers, and they certainly were.

They were each on their second doughnut when Julian came back. 'Any news?' asked Dick.

'Yes,' said Julian. 'Peculiar news, though. I found the address of the Society - they've got a branch about fifty miles from here, that deals with all the old buildings for a radius of a hundred miles. I asked if they had any recent booklet about the castle.'

He stopped to take a doughnut, and bit into it. The others waited patiently while he chewed.

'They said they hadn't. The last time they had checked over Faynights Castle was two years ago.'

'But - but what about those two men who came from the Society last week, then?' said George.

'Yes. That's what I said,' answered Julian, taking another bite. 'And here's the peculiar bit. They said they didn't know what I was talking about, nobody had been sent there from the Society, and who was I, anyhow?'

'Hmm!' said Dick, thinking hard. 'Then - those men were examining and exploring the castle for their own reasons!'

'I agree,' said Julian. 'And I can't help thinking that the face at the window and those two men have something to do with one another. It's quite clear that the men had nothing whatever to do with any official society - they merely gave it as an excuse because they wanted to find out what kind of hiding-place the castle had.'

The others stared at him, feeling a familiar excitement rising in them - what George called the 'adventure feeling'.

'Then there was a real face at that tower window, and there is a way of getting up there,' said Anne.

'Yes,' said Julian. 'I know it sounds very far-fetched, but I do think there is just a possibility that those two scientists have gone there. I don't know if you read it in the paper, but one of them, Jeffrey Pottersham, has written a book on famous ruins. He would know all about Faynights Castle, because it's a very well-known one. If they wanted to hide somewhere till the hue and cry had died down, and then escape to another country, well...'

'They could hide in the tower, and then quietly slip out from the castle one night, go down to the sea, and hire a fishing-boat!' cried Dick, taking the words out of Julian's mouth. 'They'd be across the Channel in no time.'

'Yes. That's what I'd worked out too,' said Julian. 'I rather think I'll telephone Uncle Quentin about this. I'll describe the face as well as I can to him. I feel this is all rather too important to manage quite on our own. Those men may have extremely important secrets.'

'It's an adventure again,' said Jo, her face serious, but her eyes very bright. 'Oh - I'm glad I'm in it too!'

Chapter 15

AN INTERESTING DAY

EVERYONE began to feel distinctly excited. 'I think I'll catch the bus into the next town,' said Julian. 'The telephone-box here is too easily overheard. I'd rather go to a kiosk somewhere in a street, where nobody can hear what I'm saying.'

'All right. You go,' said Dick. 'We'll do some shopping and go back to the caravans. I wonder what Uncle Quentin will say!'

Julian went off to the bus-stop. The others wandered in and out of the few village shops, doing their marketing. Tomatoes, lettuces, mustard and cress, sausage rolls, fruit cake, tins of fruit, and plenty of creamy milk in big quart bottles.

They met some of the fair-folk in the street, and everyone was very friendly indeed. Mrs. Alfredo was there with an enormous basket, nearly as big as herself. She beamed and called across to them.

'You see I have to do my shopping myself! That big bad man is too lazy to do it for me. And he has no brains. I tell him to bring back meat and he brings fish. I tell him to buy cabbage and he brings lettuce. He has no brains!'

The children laughed. It was strange to find great big Alfredo, a real fire-eater, ordered about and grumbled at by his tiny little wife.

'It's a change to find them all so friendly,' said George, pleased. 'Long may it last. There's the snake-man, Mr. Slither - he hasn't got his snakes with him, though.'

'He'd have the whole village to himself if he did!' said Anne. 'I wonder what he buys to feed his snakes on.'

'They're only fed once a fortnight,' said Jo. 'They swallow...'

'No, don't tell me,' said Anne, hastily. 'I don't really want to know. Look, there's Skippy.'

Skippy waved cheerily. She carried bags filled to bursting too. The fair-folk certainly did themselves well.

'They must make a lot of money,' said Anne.

'Well, they spend it when they have it,' said Jo. 'They never save. It's either a good time for them or a very bad time. They must have had a good run at the last show-place - they all seem very rich!'

They went back to the camp and spent a very interesting day, because the fair-folk, eager to make up for their unfriendly behaviour, made them all very welcome. Alfredo explained his fire-eating a little more, and showed how he put wads of cotton wool at the hook-end of his torches, and then soaked them in petrol to flare easily.

The rubber-man obligingly wriggled in and out of the wheel-spokes of his caravan, a most amazing feat. He also doubled himself up, and twisted his arms and legs together in such a peculiar manner that he seemed to be more like a four-tentacled octopus than a human being.

He offered to teach Dick how to do this, but Dick couldn't even bend himself properly double. He was disappointed because he couldn't help thinking what a marvellous trick it would be to perform in the playing-field at school.

Mr. Slither gave them a most entertaining talk about snakes, and ended up with some information about poisonous snakes that he said they might find very useful indeed.

'Take rattlers now,' he said, 'or mambas, or any poisonous snake. If you want to catch one to tame, don't go after it with a stick, or pin it to the ground. That frightens it and you can't do anything with it.'

'What do you have to do then?' asked George.

'Well, you want to watch their forked tongues,' said Mr. Slither, earnestly. 'You know how they put them out, and make them quiver and shake?'

'Yes,' said everyone.

'Well, now, if a poisonous snake makes its tongue go all stiff without a quiver in it, just be careful,' said Mr. Slither, solemnly. 'Don't you touch it then. But if its tongue is nice and quivery, just slide your arms along its body, and it will let you pick it up.' He went through the motions he described, picking up a pretend snake and letting its body slither through his arms. It was fascinating to watch, but very weird.

'Thanks most awfully,' said Dick. 'Whenever I pick up poisonous snakes, I'll do exactly as you say.'

The others laughed. Dick sounded as if he went about picking up poisonous snakes every day! Mr. Slither was pleased to have such an appreciative audience. George and Anne, however, had firmly made up their minds that they were not going even to look at a snake's tongue if it put it out - they were going to run for miles!

There were a few more fair-folk there that the children didn't know much about - Dacca, the tap-dancer, who put on high boots and tap-danced for the children on the top step of her caravan - Pearl, who was an acrobat and could walk on a wire-rope, dance on it, and turn somersaults over it, landing back safely each time - and others who belonged to the show but only helped with the crowds and the various turns.

Jo didn't know them all, but she was soon so much one of them that the children began to wonder if she would ever go back to her foster-mother again!

'She's exactly like them all now,' said George. 'Cheerful and dirty, slap-dash and generous, lazy and yet hardworking too! Bufflo practises for hours at his rope-spinning, but he lies about for hours too. They're queer folk, but I really do like them very much.'

The others agreed with her heartily. They had their lunch without Julian, because he hadn't come back. Why was he so long? He only had to telephone his uncle!

He came back at last. 'Sorry I'm so late,' he said, 'but first of all I couldn't get any answer at all, so I waited a bit in case Aunt Fanny and Uncle Quentin were out - and I had lunch while I waited. Then I telephoned again, and Aunt Fanny was in, but Uncle Quentin had gone to London and wouldn't be back till night.'

'To London!' said George, astonished. 'He hardly ever goes to London.'

'Apparently he went up about these two missing scientists,' said Julian. 'He's so certain that his friend Terry-Kane isn't a traitor, and he went up to tell the authorities so. Well, I couldn't wait till night, of course.'

'Didn't you report our news then?' said Dick, disappointed.

'Yes. But I had to tell Aunt Fanny,' said Julian. 'She said she would repeat it all to Uncle Quentin when he came back tonight. It's a pity I couldn't get hold of him and find out what he thinks. I asked Aunt Fanny to tell him to write to me at once.'

After tea they sat on the hillside again, basking in the sun. It really was wonderful weather for them. Julian looked over to the ruined castle opposite. He fixed his eyes on the tower where they had seen the face. It was so far away that he could only just make out the window-slit.

'Get your glasses, George' he said. 'We may as well have another squint at that window. It was about this time that we saw the face.'

George fetched them. She would not give them to Julian first though - she put them to her own eyes and gazed at the window. At first she saw nothing - and then, quite suddenly, a face appeared at the window! George was so astonished that she cried out.

Julian snatched the glasses from her. He focused them on the window and saw the face at once. Yes - the same as yesterday - eyebrows and all!

Dick took the glasses, and then each of them in turn gazed at the strange face. It did not move at all, as far as they could see, but simply stared. Then, when Anne was looking at it, it suddenly disappeared and did not come back again.

'Well - we didn't imagine it yesterday then,' said Julian. 'It's there all right. And where there's a face, there should be a body. Er - did any of you think that the face had a - a sort of - despairing expression.'

'Yes,' said Dick and the others agreed. 'I thought so yesterday, too,' said Dick. 'Do you suppose the fellow, whoever he is, is being kept prisoner up there?'

'It looks like it,' said Julian. 'But how in the world did he get there? It's a marvellous place to put him, of course. Nobody would ever dream of a hiding-place like that - and if it hadn't been for us looking at the jackdaws through very fine field-glasses, we'd never have seen him looking out. It was a chance in a thousand that we saw him.'

'In a million,' said Dick. 'Look here, Ju - I think we ought to go up to the castle and yell up to the fellow - he might be able to yell back, or throw a message out.'

'He would have thrown out a message before now if he'd been able to,' said Julian. 'As for yelling, he'd have to lean right out of that thick-walled window to make himself heard. He's right at the back of it, remember, and the slit is very deep.'

'Can't we go and find out something?' said George, who was longing to take some action. 'After all, Timmy got in somewhere, and we might be able to as well.'

'That's quite an idea,' said Julian. 'Timmy did find a way in - and it may be the way that leads up to the top of the tower.'

'Let's go then,' said George at once.

'Not now,' said Julian. 'We'd be seen if we scrambled about on the hill outside the castle walls. We'd have to go at night. We could go when the moon comes up.'

A shiver of excitement ran through the whole five. Timmy thumped his tail on the ground. He had been listening all the time, just as if he understood.

'We'll take you too, Timmy,' said George, 'just in case we run into any trouble.'

'We shan't get into trouble,' said Julian. 'We're only going to explore - and I don't think for a minute we'll find much, because I'm sure we shan't be able to get up into the tower. But I expect you all feel like I do - you can't leave this mystery of the face at the window alone - you want to do something about it, even if it's only scrambling round the old walls at night.'

'Yes. That's exactly how I feel,' said George. 'I wouldn't be able to go to sleep tonight, I know. Oh Julian - isn't this exciting?'

'Very,' said Julian. 'I'm glad we didn't leave today, after all! We should have, if we hadn't seen that face at the window.'

The sun went down and the air grew rather cold. They went into the boys' caravan and played cards, not feeling at all sleepy. Jo was very bad at cards, and soon stopped playing. She sat watching, her arm round Timmy's neck.

They had a supper of sausage rolls and tinned strawberries. 'It's a pity they don't have meals like this at school,' said Dick. 'No trouble to prepare, and most delicious to eat. Julian - is it time to go?'

'Yes,' said Julian. 'Put on warm things - and we'll set off! Here's to a really adventurous night!'

Chapter 16

SECRET WAYS

THEY waited till the moon went behind a cloud, and then, like moving shadows, made their way down the hillside as fast as they could. They did not want any of the fair-folk to see them. They clambered over the stile and went up the lane. They made their way up the steep path to the castle, but when they came to the little tower where the turnstile was they went off to the right, and walked round the foot of the great, thick walls.

It was difficult to walk there, because the slope of the hill was so steep. Timmy went with them, excited at this unexpected walk.

'Now, Timmy listen - we want you to show us how you got in,' said George. 'Are you listening, Timmy? Go in, Timmy, go in where you went this morning.'

Timmy waved his long tail, panted, and let his tongue hang out in the way he did when he wanted to show he was being as helpful as he could. He ran in front, sniffing.

Then he suddenly stopped and looked back. He gave a little whine. The others hurried to him.

The moon most annoyingly went behind a cloud. Julian took out his torch and shone it where Timmy stood. The dog stood there, looking very pleased.

'Well, what is there to be pleased about, Timmy?' said Julian, puzzled. 'There's no hole there - nowhere you could possibly have got in. What are you trying to show us?'

Timmy gave a little bark. Then suddenly leapt about four feet up the uneven stones of the wall, and disappeared!

'Hie - where's he gone?' said Julian, startled, and flashed his torch up. 'I say, look! There's a stone missing up there, quite a big block - and Timmy's gone in at the hole.'

'There's the block - fallen down the hillside,' said Dick, pointing to a big white stone, roughly square in shape. 'But how has Timmy gone in, Ju? This wall is frightfully thick, and even if one stone falls out, there must be plenty more behind!'

Julian climbed up. He came to the space where the great fallen stone had been and flashed his torch there. 'I say - this is interesting!' he called. 'The wall is hollow just here. Timmy's gone into the hollow!'

At once a surge of excitement went through the whole lot. 'Can we get in and follow Timmy?' called George. 'Shout to him, Julian, and see where he is.'

Julian called into the hollow. 'Timmy! Timmy, where are you?'

A distant, rather muffled bark answered him, and then Timmy's eyes suddenly gleamed up at Julian. The dog was standing down in the small hollow behind the fallen stone. 'He's here,' called back Julian. 'I tell you what I think we've hit on. When this enormous wall was built, a space was left inside - either to save stones, or to make a hidden passage, I don't know which. And that fallen stone has exposed a bit of the hollow. Shall we explore?'

'Oh, yes,' came the answer at once. Julian climbed down into the middle of the wall. He flashed his torch into the space he was standing in. 'Yes,' he called, 'it's a kind of passage. It's small, though. We'll have to bend almost double to get along it. Anne, you come next, then I can help you.'

'Will the air be all right?' called Dick into the passage.

'It smells a bit musty,' said Julian. 'But if it really is a passage, there must be secret air-holes somewhere to keep the air fresh in here. That's right, Anne - you hang on to me. Jo, you come next, then George, then Dick.'

Soon they were all in the curious passage, which ran along in the centre of the wall. It certainly was very small. They all got tired of going along bent double. It was pitch dark too, and although they all had torches, except Jo, it was very difficult to see.

Anne hung on to Julian's coat for dear life. She wasn't enjoying this very much, but she wouldn't have been left out of it for anything.

Julian suddenly stopped, and everyone bumped into the one in front. 'What's up?' called Dick, from the back.

'Steps here!' shouted back Julian. 'Steps going down, very very steeply - almost like a stone ladder. Be careful, everybody!'

The steps were certainly steep. 'Better go down backwards,' decided Julian. 'Then we can have hand-holds as well as foot-holds. Anne, wait till I'm down and I'll help you.'

The steps went down for about ten feet. Julian got down safely, then Anne turned herself round and went down backwards too, as if she were on a ladder instead of on stairs. It was much easier that way.

At the bottom was another passage, wider and higher, for which everyone was devoutly thankful. 'Where does this lead to?' said Julian, stopping to think. 'This passage is at right angles to the wall - we've left the wall now - we're going underneath part of the courtyard. I should think.'

'I bet we're not far from that tower,' called Dick. 'I say - I do hope this leads to the tower.'

Nobody could possibly tell where it was going to lead to! Anyway, it seemed to run quite straight, and after about eighty feet of it, Julian stopped again.

'Steps up again!' he called. 'Just as steep as the others. I think we may be going up into the inside of the castle walls. This is possibly a secret way into one of the old rooms of the castle.'

They went carefully up the steep stone steps and found themselves, not in a passage, but in a very small room that appeared to be hollowed out of the wall of the castle itself. Julian stopped in surprise, and everyone crowded into the tiny room. It really wasn't much larger than a big cupboard. A narrow bench stood at one side, with a shelf above it. An old pitcher stood on the shelf, with a broken lip, and on the bench was a small dagger, rusty and broken.

'I say! Look here! This is a secret room - like they used to have in old places, so that someone might hide if necessary,' said Julian. 'We're inside one of the walls of the castle itself - perhaps the wall of an old bedroom!'

'And there's the old pitcher that had water in,' said George. 'And a dagger. Who hid here - and how long ago?'

Dick flashed his torch round to see if he could spot anything else. He gave a sudden exclamation, and kept his torch fixed on a corner of the room.

'What is it?' said Julian.

'Paper - red and blue silver paper,' said Dick. 'Chocolate wrapping! How many times have we bought this kind of chocolate, wrapped in silver paper patterned with red and blue!'

He picked it up and straightened it out. Yes - there was the name of the chocolate firm on it!

Everyone was silent. This could only mean one thing. Someone had been in this room lately - someone who ate chocolate - someone who had thrown down the wrapping never expecting it to be found!

'Well,' said Julian, breaking the silence. 'This is surprising. Someone else knows this way in. Where does it lead to? Up to that tower, I imagine!'

'Hadn't we better be careful?' said Dick, lowering his voice. 'I mean - whoever was here might quite well be wandering about somewhere near.'

'Yes. Perhaps we'd better go back,' said Julian, thinking of the girls.

'No,' said George, in a fierce whisper. 'Let's go on. We can be very cautious.'

A passage led from the strange hidden room. It went along on the level for a little way, and then they arrived at a spiral stairway that ran straight upwards like a corkscrew.

At the top they came to a small, very narrow door. It had a great, old-fashioned iron ring for a handle.

Julian stood hesitating. Should he open it or not? He stood for half a minute, trying to make up his mind. He whispered back to the others. 'I've come to a little door. Shall I open it?'

'Yes,' came back the answering whispers. Julian cautiously took hold of the iron ring. He turned it, and it made no noise. He wondered if the door was locked on the other side. But it wasn't. It opened silently.

Julian looked through it, expecting to see a room, but there wasn't one. Instead he found himself on a small gallery that seemed to run all the way round the inside of the tower. The moon shone in through a slit-window, and Julian could just make out that he must be looking down from a gallery into the darkness of a tower-room on the second or third floor of the tower - the third, probably.

He pulled Anne out and the other three followed. There was no sound to be heard. Julian whispered to the others. 'We've come out on to a gallery, which overlooks one of the rooms inside the tower. It may be a second-floor room, because we know that the ceiling of the first floor has fallen in. Or perhaps it's even the third floor.'

'Must be the third,' said Dick. 'We're pretty high.' His whisper went all round the gallery and came back to them. He had spoken more loudly than Julian. It made them jump.

'How do we get higher still?' whispered George.

'Is there any way up from this gallery?'

'We'll walk round it and see,' said Julian. 'Be as quiet as you can. I don't think there's anyone here, but you never know. And watch your step, in case the stone isn't sound - it's very crumbly here and there.'

Julian led the way round the curious little gallery. Had this tower-room been used for old plays or mimes? Was the gallery for spectators? He wished he could turn back the years and lean over the gallery to see what had been going on in the room below, when the castle was full of people. About three-quarters of the way round the gallery a little flight of steps led downwards into the room below. But just beyond where the steps began there was another door set in the wall, very like the one they had just come through.

It too had an iron ring for a handle. Julian turned it slowly. It didn't open. Was it locked? There was a great key standing in the iron lock, and Julian turned it. But still the door didn't open. Then he saw that it was bolted.

The bolt was securely pushed home. So somebody was a prisoner the other side! Was it the man who owned the Face? Julian turned and whispered very softly in Anne's ear.

'There's a door here bolted my side. Looks as if we're coming to the Face. Tell George to send Timmy right up to me.'

Anne whispered to George, and George pushed Timmy forward. He squeezed past Anne's legs and stood by Julian, sensing the sudden excitement.

'We're probably coming to stairs that lead up to the top tower-room, where that window is with the Face,' thought Julian, as he slid back the bolt very cautiously. He pushed the door, and it opened. He stood listening, his torch switched off. Then he switched it on.

Just as he had thought, another stone stairway led up steeply. At the top must be the prisoner, whoever he was.

'We'll go up,' said Julian softly. 'Quiet, everybody!'

Chapter 17

EXCITEMENT AND SHOCKS

TIMMY strained forward, but Julian had his hand on the dog's collar. He went up the stone stairway, very steep and narrow. The others followed with hardly a sound. All of them but Jo had on their rubber shoes; she had bare feet. Timmy made the most noise, because his claws clicked on the stone.

At the top was another door. From behind it came a curious noise - guttural and growling. Timmy growled in his throat. At first Julian couldn't think what the noise was. Then he suddenly knew.

'Somebody snoring! Well, that's lucky. I can take a peep in and see who it is. We must be at the top of the tower now.'

The door in front of him was not locked. He pushed it open and looked inside, his hand still on Timmy's collar.

The moonlight struck through a narrow window and fell on the face of a sleeping man. Julian stared at it in rising excitement. Those eyebrows! Yes - this was the man whose face had appeared at the window!

'And I know who he is too - it is Terry-Kane!' thought Julian, moving like a shadow into the room. 'He's exactly like the picture we saw in the papers. Perhaps the other man is here too.'

He looked cautiously round the room but could see no one else, although it was possible there might be someone in the darkest shadows. He listened.

There was only the snoring of the man lying in the moonlight. He could not hear the breathing of anyone else. With his hand still on Timmy's collar he switched on his torch and swept it round the tower-room, its beam piercing the black corners.

No one was there except the one man - and, with a sudden shock, Julian saw that he was tied with ropes! His arms were bound behind him and his legs were tied together too. If this was Terry-Kane then his uncle must be right. The man was no traitor - he had been kidnapped and was a prisoner.

Everyone was now in the room, staring at the sleeping man. He had his mouth open, and he still snored loudly.

'What are you going to do, Julian?' whispered George. 'Wake him up?'

Julian nodded. He went over to the sleeping man and shook him by the shoulder. He woke up at once and stared in amazement at Julian, who was full in the moonlight. He struggled up to a sitting position.

'Who are you?' he said. 'How did you get here - and who are those over in the shadows there?'

'Listen - are you Mr. Terry-Kane?' asked Julian.

'Yes. I am. But who are you?'

'We are staying on the hill opposite the castle,' said Julian. 'And we saw your face at the window, through our field-glasses. So we came to find you.'

'But - but how do you know who I am?' said the man, still amazed.

'We read about you in the papers,' said Julian. 'And we saw your picture. We couldn't help noticing your eyebrows, sir - we even saw them through the glasses.'

'Look here - can you undo me?' said the man, eagerly. 'I must escape. Tomorrow night my enemies are smuggling me out of here, into a car and down to the sea and a boat is being hired to take me across to the Continent. They want me to tell them what I know about my latest experiments. I shan't of course - but life wouldn't be at all pleasant for me!'

'I'll cut the ropes,' said Julian, and he took out his pocket-knife. He cut the knots that tied Terry-Kane's wrists together and then freed his legs. Timmy stood and watched, ready to pounce if the man did anything fierce!

'That's better,' said the man, stretching his arms out.

'How did you manage to get to the window?' asked Julian, watching the man rub his arms and knees.

'Each evening one of the men who brought me here comes to bring me food and drink,' said Terry-Kane. 'He undoes my hands so that I can feed myself. He sits and smokes while I eat, taking no notice of me. I drag myself over to the window to have a breath of fresh air. I can't stay there long because I am soon tied up again, of course. I can't imagine how anyone could see my face at this deep-set slit-window!'

'It was our field-glasses,' said Julian. 'They are such fine ones. It's a good thing you did get to the window for a breath of air or we'd never have found you!'

'Julian - I can hear a noise,' said Jo, suddenly. She had ears like a cat, able to pick up the slightest sound.

'Where?' said Julian, turning sharply.

'Downstairs,' whispered Jo. 'Wait - I'll go and see.'

She slipped out of the door and down the steep little stairs. She came to the door at the bottom, the one that led into the gallery.

Yes - someone was coming! Coming along the gallery too. Jo thought quickly. If she darted back up the stairs to warn the others this newcomer might go up there too, and they would all be caught. He could bolt the door at the top and would have six prisoners instead of one! She decided to crouch down on the floor of the gallery a little beyond the door that led upwards.

Footsteps came loudly along the gallery and up to the door. Then the stranger obviously found the door unbolted, and stopped in consternation. He stood perfectly still, listening. Jo thought he really must be able to hear her heart beating, it was thumping so loudly. She didn't dare to call out to try and warn the others - if she did they would walk straight into his arms!

And then Jo heard Julian's voice calling quietly down the stone stairs. 'Jo! Jo! Where are you?' And then, oh dear, she thought she could hear Julian coming down the stairs to find her. 'Don't come, Julian,' she said under her breath. 'Don't come.'

But Julian came right down - and behind him came Terry-Kane and Dick, with the girls following with Timmy, on their way to escaping.

The stranger down at the door was even more amazed to hear voices and footsteps. He slammed the door suddenly and rammed the stout bolt home. The footsteps on the stairs stopped in alarm.

'Hey, Jo! Is that you?' called Julian's voice. 'Open the door!'

The stranger spoke angrily. 'The door's bolted. Who are you?'

There was a silence - then Terry-Kane answered. 'So you're back again, Pottersham! Open that door at once.'

Oho! thought Julian, so the other scientist is here too - Jeffrey Pottersham. He must have got Terry-Kane here by kidnapping him. What can have happened to Jo?

The man at the door stood there as if he didn't quite know what to do. Jo crouched down in the gallery and listened intently. The man spoke again.

'Who set you free? Who's that with you?'

'Now, listen, Pottersham,' said Terry-Kane's voice. 'I've had enough of this nonsense. You must be out of your mind, acting like this! Doping me, and kidnapping me, telling me we're going to go off by fishing-boat to the Continent, and the rest of it! There are four children here, who saw my face at the window and came to investigate, and...'

'Children!' said Pottersham, taken aback. 'What in the middle of the night! How did they get up to this tower? I'm the only one that knows the way in.'

'Pottersham, open the door!' shouted Terry-Kane, furiously. He gave it a kick, but the old door was sturdy and strong.

'You can go back to the tower, all of you,' said Pottersham. 'I'm going off to get fresh orders. It looks as if we'll have to take those kids with us, Terry-Kane - they'll be sorry they saw your face at the window. They won't like life, where we're going!

Pottersham turned and went back the way he had come. Jo guessed that he knew the same way in as they had happened on. She waited until she felt that it was perfectly safe, and then she ran to the door again. She hammered on it.

'Dick! Dick! Come down. Where are you?' She heard an answering shout from up the stairs behind the door, and then Dick came running down.

'Jo! Unbolt the door, quick!'

Jo unbolted it - but it wouldn't open. Julian had now come down too, and he called to Jo. 'Turn the key, Jo. It may be locked too.'

'Julian, the key's gone!' cried Jo, and she tugged in vain at the door. 'He must have locked it as well as bolted it - and he's taken the key. Oh, how can I get you out?'

'You can't,' said Dick. 'Still, you're free, Jo. You can go and tell the police. Buck up, now. You know the way, don't you?'

'I haven't got a torch,' said Jo.

'Oh dear - well, we can't possibly get one of ours out to you,' said Dick. 'You'd better wait till morning, then, Jo. You may lose yourself down in those dark passages. Yes - wait till morning.'

'The passages will still be dark!' said poor Jo. 'I'd better go now.'

'No - you're to wait till morning,' said Julian, fearing that Jo might wander off in the strange passages, and be lost for ever! She might even find herself down in the dungeons. Horrible thought.

'All right,' said Jo. 'I'll wait till morning. I'll curl up on the gallery here. It's quite warm.'

'It will be very hard!' said Dick. 'We'll go back to the room upstairs, Jo. Call us if you want us. What a blessing you're free!'

Jo curled up on the gallery, but she couldn't sleep. For one thing the floor was very hard, and the stone was very very cold. She suddenly thought of the little room where they had seen the pitcher, the dagger and the chocolate wrapping-paper. That would be a far better place to sleep! She could lie on the bench!

She stood up and thought out the way. All she had to do was to go round the gallery till she came to the little door that opened on to the corkscrew staircase leading from the gallery to the little hidden room.

She made her way cautiously to the door. She felt for the iron ring, turned it and opened the door. It was very, very dark, and she could see nothing at all in front of her. She put out her foot carefully. Was she at the top of the spiral staircase?

She found that she was. She held out her hands on either side, touching the stone walls of the curious little stairway, and went slowly down, step by step.

'Oh dear - am I going the right way? The stairs seem to be going on so long!' thought Jo. 'I don't like it - but I MUST go on!'

Chapter 18

JO HAS AN ADVENTURE ON HER OWN

JO came to the end of the spiral stairway at last. She found herself on the level once more, and remembered the little straight passage that led to the secret room from the stairway. Good, good, good! Now she would soon be in the room and could lie down on the bench.

She went through the doorway of the secret room without knowing it, because it was so dark. She groped her way along, and suddenly felt the edge of the bench.

'Here at last,' she said thankfully, out loud.

And then poor Jo got a dreadful shock! A pair of strong arms went round her and held her fast! She screamed and struggled, her heart beating in wild alarm. Who was it? Oh, if only she had a light!

And then a torch was switched on, and held to her face. 'Oho! You must be Jo, I suppose,' said Pottersham's voice. 'I wondered who you were when one of those kids yelled out for you! I thought you must be wandering somewhere about. I guessed you'd come this way, and I sat on the bench and waited for you.'

'Let me go,' said Jo fiercely and struggled like a wild cat. The man only held her all the more tightly. He was very strong.

Jo suddenly put down her face and bit his hand. He gave a shout and loosened his hold. Jo was almost free when he caught her again, and shook her like a rat. 'You little wild cat! Don't you do that again!'

Jo did it again, even more fiercely, and the man dropped her on to the ground, nursing his hand.

Jo made for the entrance of the room, but again the man was too quick and she found herself held again.

'I'll tie you up,' said the man, furiously. 'I'll rope you so that you won't be able to move! And I'll leave you here in the dark till I come back again.'

He took a rope from round his waist and proceeded to tie Jo up so thoroughly that she could hardly move. Her hands were behind her back, her legs were tied at knees and ankles. She rolled about the floor, calling the man all the names she knew.

'Well, you're safe for the time being,' said Pottersham, sucking his bitten hand. 'Now I'm going. I wish you joy of the hard cold floor and the darkness, you savage little wild cat!'

Jo heard his footsteps going in the distance. She could have kicked herself for not having guessed he might have been lying in wait for her. Now she couldn't get help for the others. In fact, she was much worse off than they were because she was tied up, and they weren't.

Poor Jo! She dozed off, exhausted by the night's excitement and her fierce struggle. She lay against the wall, so uncomfortable that she kept waking from her doze every few minutes.

And then a thought came into her head. She remembered the rope-man, all tied up in length after length of knotted rope. She had watched him set himself free so many times. Could any of his tricks help her now?

'The rope-man would be able to get himself free of this rope in two minutes!' she thought, and began to wriggle and struggle again. But she was not the rope-man, and after about an hour she was so exhausted again that she went into a doze once more.

When she awoke, she felt better. She forced herself into a sitting position, and made herself think clearly and slowly.

'Work one knot free first,' she said to herself, remembering what the rope-man had told her. 'At first you won't know which knot is best. When you know that you will always be able to free yourself in two minutes. But find that one knot first!'

She said all this to herself as she tried to find a knot that might be worked loose. At last one seemed a little looser than the others. It was one that bound her left wrist to her right. She twisted her wrist round and got her thumb to the knot. She picked and pulled and at last it loosened a little. She had more control over that hand now. If only she had a knife somewhere! She could manage to get it between her finger and thumb now and perhaps use it to cut another knot.

She suddenly lost her patience and flung her head back on the bench, straining and pulling at the rope. She knocked against something and it fell to the stone floor with a clatter. Jo wondered what it was - and then she knew.

'That dagger! That old, rusty dagger! Oh, if I could find it I might do something with it!'

She swung herself round on the floor till she felt the dagger under her. She rolled over on her back and tried to pick it up with her free finger and thumb, and at last she managed to hold it.

She sat up, bent forward and did her best to force the rusty dagger up and down a little on the rope that tied her hands behind her. She could hardly move it at all because her hands were still so tightly tied. But she persevered.

She grew so tired that she had to give it up for a long while. Then she tried again, then had another long rest. The third time she was lucky! The rope suddenly frayed and broke! She pulled her hands hard, found them looser and picked at a knot.

It took Jo a long long time to free her hands, but she did it at last. She couldn't manage to undo her legs at first, because her hands were trembling so much. But after another long rest she undid the tight knots, and shook her legs free. 'Well, thank goodness I learnt a few hints from the rope-man,' she said, out loud. 'I'd never have got free if I hadn't!'

She wondered what the time was. It was pitch dark in the little room, of course. She stood up and was surprised to find that her legs were shaky. She staggered a few steps and then sat down again. But her legs soon felt better and she stood up once more. 'Now to find my way out,' she said. 'How I wish I had a torch!'

She went carefully down the flight of stone steps that led down from the room, and then came to the wide passage that ran under the courtyard. She went along it, glad it was level, and then came once again to stone steps that led upwards. Up she climbed, knowing that she was going the right way, although she was in the dark.

Now she came to the small passage where she had to bend almost double, the one that ran through the centre of the thick outer walls. Jo heaved a sigh of relief. Surely she would soon come to where the stone had fallen out and would be able to see daylight!

She saw daylight before she came to the place where the stone was missing. She saw it some way in front of her, a misty little patch that made her wonder what it was at first. Then she knew.

'Daylight! Oh, thank goodness!' She stumbled along to it and climbed up to the hole from which the stone had fallen. She sat there, drinking in the sunlight. It was bright and warm and very comforting.

After the darkness of the passages Jo felt quite dazed. Then she suddenly realized how very high the sun was in the sky! Goodness, it must be afternoon!

She looked cautiously out of the hole in the wall. Now that she was so near freedom she didn't want to be caught by anyone watching out for her! There was nobody. Jo leapt down from the hole and ran down the steep hillside. She went as sure-footed as a goat, leaping along till she came to the lane. She crossed it and made her way to the caravan-field.

She was just about to go over the stile when she stopped. Julian had said she was to go to the police. But Jo, like the other gypsy folk, was afraid of the police. No gypsy ever asked the police for help. Jo felt herself shrivelling up inside when she thought of talking to big policemen.

'No. I'll go to Uncle Fredo,' she thought. 'He will know what to do. I will tell him all about it.'

She was going up the field when she saw someone strange there! Who was it? Could it be that horrid man who had tied her up? She had not seen him at all clearly, and she was afraid it might be. She saw that he was talking urgently to some of the fair-folk. They were listening politely, but Jo could see that they thought he was rather mad.

She went a bit nearer, and found that he was asking where Julian and the rest were. He was becoming very angry with the fair-people because they assured him that they did not know where the children had gone.

'It's the man they call Pottersham,' said Jo to herself, and dived under a caravan. 'He's come to find out how much we've told anyone about that Face.'

She hid till he had gone away down the hillside to the lane, very red in the face, and shouting out that he would get the police.

Jo crawled out, and the fair-folk crowded round her at once. 'Where have you been? Where are the others? That man wanted to know all about you. He sounds quite mad!'

'He's a bad man,' said Jo. 'I'll tell you all about him - and where the others are. We've got to rescue them!'

Whereupon Jo launched into her story with the greatest zest, beginning in the middle, then going back to the beginning, putting in things she had forgotten, and thoroughly muddling everyone. When she ended they all stared at her in excitement. They didn't really know what it was all about but they had certainly gathered a few things.

'You mean to say that those kids are locked up in that tower over there?' said Alfredo, amazed.

'And a spy is with them!'

'No - he's not a spy - he's a good man,' explained Jo. 'What they call a scientist, very, very clever.' 'That man who left just now, he said he was a - a scientist,' said Skippy, stumbling over the unfamiliar word.

'Well, he's a bad man,' said Jo, firmly. 'He is probably a spy. He kidnapped the good man, up in the tower there, to take him away to another country. And he tied me up too, like I told you. See my wrists and ankles?'

She displayed them, cut and bruised. The fair-folk looked at them in silence. Then Bufflo cracked his whip and made everyone jump.

'We will rescue them!' he said. 'This is no police job. It is our job.'

'I say, look - that scientist comes back,' said Skippy suddenly. And sure enough, there he was, coming hurriedly up the field to ask some more questions!

'We will get him,' muttered Bufflo. All the fair-folk waited in silence for the man to come up. Then they closed round him solidly and began to walk up the hill. The man was taken with them. He couldn't help himself! He was walked behind a caravan, and before the crowd had come apart again he was on the ground, neatly roped by the rope-man!

'Well, we've got you,' said the rope-man. 'And now we'll get on to the next bit of business!'

Chapter 19 JO JOINS IN

THE 'scientist', as Skippy persisted in calling him, was put into an empty caravan with windows and doors shut, because he shouted so loudly. When the snake-man opened the door and slid in one of his pythons the scientist stopped shouting at once and lay extremely still.

The snake-man opened the door and his python glided out again. But the man in the caravan had learnt his lesson. Not another sound came from him!

Then everyone in the camp held a conference. There was no hurry about it at all, because it had been decided that nothing should be done before night-time.

'If we make a rescue in the daylight, then the police will come,' said Alfredo. 'They will interfere. They will not believe a word we say. They never do.'

'How shall we rescue them?' said Skippy. 'Do we go through these strange passages and up steep stone stairs? It does not sound nice to me.'

'It isn't at all nice,' Jo assured her. 'And anyway it wouldn't be sensible. The door leading to the tower-room is locked, I told you. And that man has got the key.'

'Ah!' said Bufflo, springing up at once. 'You didn't tell us that before! He has the key? Then I will get it from him!'

'I didn't think of that,' said Jo, watching Bufflo leap up the caravan steps.

He came out in a minute or two and joined them again. 'He has no key on him,' he said. 'He says he never had. He says we are all mad, and he will get the police.'

'He will find it hard to get the police just yet,' said Mrs. Alfredo, and gave a high little laugh. 'He has thrown away the key - or given it to a friend, perhaps?'

'Well, it's settled we can't get in through the door that leads to the tower-room, then,' said the snake-man, who seemed to have a better grasp of things than the others. 'Right. Is there any other way into the room?'

'Only by the window,' said Jo. 'That slit-window there, see? Too high for any ladder, of course. Anyway, we've got to get into the courtyard first. We'll have to climb over the high castle wall.'

'That is easy,' said the rubber-man. 'I can climb any wall. But not, perhaps, one so high as the tower wall.'

'Can anyone get into or out of the slit of a window?' asked Bufflo screwing up his eyes to look at the tower.

'Oh, yes - it's bigger than you think,' said Jo. 'It's very deep - the walls are so thick, you see - though I don't think they are so thick up there as they are down below. But Bufflo, how can anyone get up to that window?'

'It can be done,' said Bufflo. 'That is not so difficult! You can lend us a peg-rope, Jekky?' he said to the rope-man.

'Yes,' said Jekky. Jo knew what that was - a thick rope with pegs thrust through the strands to act as footholds.

'But how will you get the peg-rope up?' said Jo, puzzled.

'It can be done,' said Bufflo again, and the talking went on. Jo suddenly began to feel terribly hungry and got up to get herself a meal. When she got back to the conference everything was apparently settled.

'We set off tonight as soon as darkness comes,' Bufflo told her. 'You will not come, Jo. This is man's business.'

'Of course, I'm coming!' said Jo, amazed that anyone should think she wasn't. 'They're my friends, aren't they? I'm coming all right!'

'You are not,' said Bufflo, and Jo immediately made up her mind to disappear before the men set off and hide somewhere so that she might follow them.

By this time it was about six o'clock. Bufflo and the rope-man disappeared in Jekky's caravan and became very busy there. Jo went peeping in at the door to see what they were doing but they ordered her out.

'This is not your business any more,' they said, and turned her out when she refused to go.

When darkness came, a little company set out from the camp. They had searched for Jo to make sure she was not coming, but she had disappeared. Bufflo led the way down the hill, looking extremely fat because he was wound about with a great deal of peg-rope. Then came Mr. Slither with one of his pythons draped round him. Then the rubber-man with Mr. Alfredo.

Bufflo also carried his whip though nobody quite knew why. Anyway, Bufflo always did carry a whip, it was part of him; so nobody questioned him about it.

Behind them, like a little shadow, slipped Jo. What were they going to do? She had watched the tower-window for the last two hours, and when darkness came she saw a light there - a light that shone on and off, on and off.

That's Dick or Julian signalling, she thought. They will have wondered why I haven't brought help sometime today. They don't know that I was captured and tied up! I'll have something to tell them when we're all together again!

The little company went over the stile, into the lane and up the path to the castle. They came to the wall. The rubber-man took a jump at it, and literally seemed to run up it, fling himself on to the top, roll over and disappear!

'He's over,' said Bufflo. 'What it is to be made of rubber! I don't believe that fellow ever feels hurt!'

There was a low whistle from the other side of the wall. Bufflo unwound a thin rope from his waist, tied a stone to it and flung it over. The rope slithered after the stone and over the wall like a long thin worm.

Thud! They heard the stone fall on the ground the other side. Another low whistle told them that the rubber-man had it. Bufflo then undid the peg-rope from his waist, and he and the others held out its length between them, standing one behind the other. One end was fastened to the thin rope whose other end held the stone.

The rubber-man, on the other side of the wall, began to pull on the thin rope. When all the slack was taken in, the peg-rope began to go up the wall too, because it was tied to the thin rope and had to follow it! Up went the peg-rope and up, looking like a great thick caterpillar with tufts sticking out of its sides.

Jo watched. Yes, that was clever. A good and easy way of getting over the thick high wall. But to get the peg-rope up to the slit-window would not be so easy.

A whistle came again. Bufflo let go the peg-rope, and it swung flat against his side of the wall. He tugged it. It was firm. Evidently the rubber-man had tied it fast to something. It was safe to go up. It would bear anyone's weight without slipping down the wall.

Bufflo went up first, using the pegs as foot-holds and pulling himself up by the rope between the pegs. Each of the men was quick and deft in the way he climbed. Jo waited till the last one had started up, and then leapt for the rope too!

Up she went like a cat and landed beside Bufflo on the other side of the wall. He was astounded and gave her a cuff. She dodged away, and stood aside, watching. She wondered how the men intended to reach the topmost window of the high tower. Perhaps she would be of some help. If only she could be!

The four men stood in the moonlight, looking up at the tower. They talked in low tones, while the rubber-man undid the thin rope from the peg-rope, and neatly coiled it into loops. The peg-rope was left on the wall.

Jo heard a car going up the lane at the bottom of the castle hill. She heard it stop and back somewhere. Part of her attention was on the four men and the other part on the car.

The car stopped its engine. There was no further sound. Jo forgot it for a few minutes, and then was on the alert again - was that voices she heard somewhere? She listened intently. The sound came again on the night air - a low murmur that came nearer.

Jo held her breath - could that horrid man - what was his name - Pottersham - could he have arranged for his equally horrid friends to fetch Mr. Terry-Kane, and all the children out of the tower that night, and take them off to the coast? Perhaps they had already hired a fishing-boat from Joseph the old fisherman, and they would all be away and never heard of again!

So the thoughts ran in Jo's alert mind. Mr. Pottersham would have had plenty of time to get fresh orders, and arrange everything before he had gone to the camp and got himself locked up in a caravan! Oh dear - dare she go and warn her Uncle Alfredo, where he stood in the moonlight, holding a little conference with the others?

He'll cuff me as soon as I go near, thought Jo, rubbing her left ear, which still stung from Bufflo's cuff. They won't listen to me, I know. Still I'll try.

She went up to the group of men cautiously. She saw Bufflo take out a dagger-knife from his belt, and tie it to the end of the thin rope that the rubber-man held. She guessed in a moment what he was about to do, and ran to him.

'No, Bufflo, no! Don't throw that knife up - you'll hurt someone - you might wound one of them! No, Bufflo, no!'

'Clear out,' said Bufflo, angrily and raised his hand to slap her. She dodged away.

She went round the group to her uncle. 'Uncle Fredo,' she said beseechingly. 'Listen. I can hear voices - I think those...'

Alfredo pushed her away roughly. 'Will you stop this, Jo? Do you want a good whipping? You behave like a buzzing fly!'

Mr. Slither called her. 'See here, Jo - if you want to be useful, hold Beauty for me. He will be in the way in a minute.'

He draped the great snake over her shoulders, and Beauty hissed loudly. He began to coil himself round Jo, and she caught hold of his tail. She liked Beauty, but just at that moment she didn't want him at all!

She stood back and watched what Bufflo was going to do. She knew, of course, and her heart beat fearfully. He was going to throw his knife through that high slit-window, a thing that surely only Bufflo, with his unerring aim, could possibly do!

'But if he gets it through the window, it may stick into one of the four up there - or into Mr. Terry-Kane,' she thought, in a panic. 'It might wound Dick - or Timmy! Oh, I wish Bufflo wouldn't do it!'

She heard low voices again - this time they came from just the other side of the wall! Men were going to follow those secret passages, and go right up to the tower-room! Jo knew they were! They would be there before Bufflo and the others had followed out their rescue plan. She pictured the four children being dragged down the stairs, and Terry-Kane, too. Would Timmy defend them? He would - but the men would certainly deal with him. They knew there was a dog there, because Timmy had barked the night before.

Oh, dear, thought Jo, in despair. I must do something! But what can I DO?

Chapter 20

A LOT OF EXCITEMENT

JO suddenly made up her mind. She would follow the men through those passages, and see if she could warn the others by shouting when she came near enough to the tower-room. She would help them somehow. Bufflo and the others would be too late to save them now.

Jo ran to the wall. She was up the peg-rope left there and down the other side in a trice. She made her way to where the missing stone left the gap in the old wall.

Beauty, the python, was surprised to find himself pulled off and thrown on the ground, just before Jo ran for the wall. He wasn't used to that sort of treatment. He lay there, coiling and uncoiling himself. Where had that nice girl gone? Beauty liked Jo - she knew how to treat him!

He glided after her. He too went up the wall and over, quite easily, though he did not need to use the peg-rope like Jo. He glided after Jo quickly. It was amazing to see his speed when he really wanted to be quick!

He came to the hole in the wall. Ah, he liked holes. He glided in after Jo. He caught up with her just as she had reached the end of the small passage, through which she had had to walk bent double. He pushed against her legs and then twined himself round her.

She gave a small scream, and then realized what it was. 'Beauty! You'll get into trouble with Mr. Slither, coming after me like this. Go back! Stop twining yourself round me - I've got important things to do.'

But Beauty was not like Timmy. He obeyed only when he thought he would, and he was not going to obey this time!

'All right - come with me if you want to,' said Jo, at last, having in vain tried to push the great snake back. 'You'll be company, I suppose. Stop hissing like that, Beauty! You sound like an engine letting off steam in this narrow passage.'

Soon Jo had gone down the steep steps that led to the level passage under the courtyard. Beauty slithered down them too, rather surprised at the sudden drop. Along the wider passage they went.

Beauty now in front, and Jo sometimes tripping over his powerful tail.

Up steps again, and into the thick wall of the castle itself. Something shining ahead made Jo suddenly stop. She listened but heard nothing. She went forward cautiously and found that in the little secret room was a small lantern, left there probably by one of the men in front.

She saw the rusty dagger lying on the floor where she had left it the night before and grinned.

The rope was there too, that she had untied from her arms and legs.

Jo went on, along the passage that led to the spiral stairway. Now she thought she could hear something. She climbed the steep stairs, cross with Beauty because he pushed by her and almost sent her headlong down them. She came to the door that opened on to the little gallery. Dare she open it? Suppose the men were just outside?

She opened it slowly. It was pitch dark on the other side, of course, but Jo knew she was about to step out on the little gallery. Beauty suddenly slithered up her and coiled himself lovingly round her. Jo could not make the snake uncoil, and she stepped out on the small gallery with Beauty firmly wrapped about her.

And then, what a noise she heard! She stood quite aghast. Whatever could be going on? She heard excited voices - surely one was Bufflo's? And was that crack a pistol-shot?

What had happened down below in the courtyard when Jo had disappeared over the wall with Beauty? None of the men noticed her go. They were all too intent on their plan.

Bufflo was to use his gift for knife-throwing - but in quite a different way from usual! He was to throw the knife high into the air, and make it curve in through the slit-window at the top of the tower!

Bufflo was an expert at knife-throwing, or, indeed, at any kind of throwing. He stood there in the courtyard, looking up at the high window. He half-closed his eyes, getting the distance and the direction fixed in his mind. The moon suddenly went in, and he lowered his hand. He could not throw accurately in the dark!

The moon sailed out again, quite brilliant. Bufflo lost no time. Once more he took aim, his eyes narrowed - and then the knife flew high into the air, gleaming as it went - taking behind it a long tail of very thin rope.

It struck the sill of the slit-window and fell back. Bufflo caught it deftly. The moonlight showed plainly that the knife was not sharp-pointed - Bufflo had filed off the point, and it was now quite blunt. Jo need not have worried about someone in the tower being hurt by a sharp dagger!

Once more Bufflo took aim, and once more the knife sailed up, swift as a swallow, shining silver as it went. This time it fell cleanly in at the window-opening, slithered all the way across the stone ledge inside, and fell to the floor of the tower-room with a thud.

It caused the greatest astonishment there. Mr. Terry-Kane, the four children and Timmy were all huddled together for warmth in one corner. They were hungry and cold. No one had brought them food, and they had nothing to keep them warm except a rug belonging to Terry-Kane. All that day they had been in the tower-room, sometimes looking from the window, sometimes shouting all together at the tops of their voices. But nobody heard them, and nobody saw them.

'Why doesn't Jo bring help?' they had said a hundred times that long, long day. They didn't know that poor Jo was spending hours trying to free herself from the knots round her legs and wrists.

They had looked out of the window at the camp on the opposite hill, where the fair-folk went about their business, looking like ants on the far-off green slope. Was Jo there? It was too far-off to make out anyone for certain.

When darkness came Julian had flashed his torch from the window on and off - on and off. Then, cold and miserable, they had all huddled together, with Timmy licking first one and then another, not at all understanding why they should stay in this one room.

'Timmy will be so thirsty,' said George. 'He keeps licking round his mouth in the way he does when he wants a drink.'

'Well, I feel like licking round my mouth too,' said Dick.

They were half-asleep when the knife came thudding into the room. Timmy leapt up at once and barked madly. He stood and stared at the knife that lay gleaming in the moonlight, and barked without stopping.

'A knife!' said George, in amazement. 'A knife with a string tied on the end!'

'It's blunt,' said Julian, picking it up. 'The tip has been filed off. What's the meaning of it? And why the string tied to it?'

'Be careful that another knife doesn't come through' warned Terry-Kane.

'It won't,' said Julian. 'I think this is something to do with Jo. She hasn't gone to the police. She has got the fair-folk to help us. This is Bufflo's knife, I'm sure!'

They were all round him, examining it now. 'I'm going to the window,' said Julian. 'I'll look right out into the courtyard. Hold my legs, Dick.'

He climbed up on the stone sill and crawled a little forward through the deep-set slit. He came to the outer edge of the window and looked down. Dick hung on to his legs, afraid that the sill might crumble away and Julian would fall.

'I can see four people down in the courtyard,' said Julian. 'Oh, good - one is Alfredo, one is Bufflo - and I can't make out the other two. AHOY down there!'

The four men below were standing looking up intently. They saw Julian's head appear outside the window, and waved to him.

'Pull in the rope!' shouted Bufflo. He had now tied the end of a second peg-rope to the thin rope, and he and the others lifted it so that it might run easily up the wall.

Julian slid back into the tower room. He was excited. 'This string on the knife runs down the wall and is tied to a thicker rope,' he said. 'I'll pull it up - and up will come a rope that we can climb down!'

He pulled on the string, and more and more of it appeared through the window. Then Julian felt a heavier weight and he guessed the thicker rope was coming up. Now he had to pull more slowly. Dick helped him.

Over the window-sill, in at the window, appeared the first length of the peg-rope. The children had never seen one like it before; they were used to the more ordinary rope-ladder. But Terry-Kane knew what it was.

'A peg-rope,' he said. 'Circus people and fair-people make them - they are lighter and easier to manage than rope-ladders. We'll have to fix the end to something really strong, so that it will hold our weight.'

Anne looked at the peg-rope in dismay. She didn't at all like the idea of climbing down that, swinging on it all the way down the high stone wall of the tower! But the others looked at it with pleasure and excitement - a way of escape - a good, strong rope to climb down out of this hateful cold room!

Terry-Kane looked about for something to fasten the rope to. In the wall at one side was a great iron ring, embedded in the stone. What it had been used for once upon a time nobody could imagine - but certainly it would be of great use now!

There were no pegs in the first yard or so of the rope. Terry-Kane and Julian cut off the string that had pulled it up, and then dragged the thick rope through the iron ring. They dragged it right through until the first peg stopped it. Then they twisted the rope-end round upon itself and made great strong knots that could not slip.

Julian took hold of the rope, and leaned back hard on it, pulling it with all his strength. 'It would hold a dozen of us at once!' he said, pleased. 'Shall I go first, sir? I can help everyone else down then, if I'm at the bottom. Dick and you can see to the girls when they climb out.'

'What about Timmy?'

asked George, at once.

'We'll wrap him up in the rug, tie him firmly and lower him down on the string,' said Dick. 'It's very strong string - thin rope, really.'

'I'll go down now,' said Julian, and went to the window. Then he stopped. Someone was clattering up the stone steps that led to the tower. Someone was at the door! Who could it be?

Chapter 21

IN THE TOWER ROOM

THE door was flung open, and a man stood there, panting. Behind him came three others.

'Pottersham!' said Terry-Kane. 'So you're back!'

'Yes. I'm back,' said the panting man.

Timmy began to bark and try to escape from George's hand. He showed his teeth and all his hackles rose up on his neck. He looked a very savage dog indeed.

Pottersham backed away. He didn't like the look of Timmy at all! 'If you let that dog go, I'll shoot him,' he said, and as if by magic a gun appeared in his right hand.

George tried her hardest to restrain the furious Timmy, and called to Julian to help her. 'Julian, hold him as well. He'll fling himself on that man, he's so angry.'

Julian went to help. Between them they forced the furious dog back into a corner, where George tried in vain to pacify him. She was terrified that he might be shot.

'You can't behave like this, Pottersham,' began Terry-Kane, but he was cut short.

'We've no time to lose. We're taking you, Terry-Kane, and one of the kids. We can use him for a hostage if too much fuss is made about your disappearance. We'll take this boy,' and he grabbed at Dick. Dick gave him a punch on the jaw immediately, thanking his stars that he had learnt boxing at school. But he at once found himself on the floor! These men were not standing for any nonsense. They were in a hurry!

'Get him,' said Pottersham, to one of the men behind him, and Dick was pounced on. Then Terry-

Kane was taken too, and his arms held behind him.

'What about these other kids?' he said, angrily. 'You're surely not going to lock them up in this room and leave them.'

'Yes, we are,' said Pottersham. 'We're leaving a note for the old turnstile woman to tell her they're up here. Let the police rescue them if they can!'

'You always were a...,' began Terry-Kane, and then ducked to avoid a blow.

Timmy barked madly all the time, and almost choked himself trying to get away from George and Julian. He was mad with rage, and when he saw Dick being roughly treated he very nearly did manage to get loose.

'Take them,' ordered Pottersham. 'And hurry. Go on - down the steps with them.'

The three men forced Terry-Kane and Dick to the stone stairs - and then everyone shot round in astonishment! A loud voice suddenly came from the window!

Anne gasped. Bufflo was there! He hadn't been able to understand why nobody came down the peg-rope, so he had come up to find out. And to his enormous surprise there appeared to be quite an upset going on!

'Hey there! WHAT'S UP?' he yelled, and slid into the room, looking most out of place with his mop of yellow hair, gay checked shirt and whip!

'BUFFLO!' shouted all four of the children, and Timmy changed his angry bark to a welcoming one. Terry-Kane looked on in astonishment, his arms still pinioned behind him.

'Who in the world is this?' shouted Pottersham, alarmed at Bufflo's sudden appearance through the window. 'How did he get through there?'

Bufflo eyed the gun in Pottersham's hand and lazily cracked his small whip once or twice. 'Put that thing away,' he said, in his drawling voice. 'You ought to know better than to wave a thing like that about when there's kids around. Go on - put it away!'

He cracked his whip again. Pottersham pointed the gun at him angrily. And then a most amazing thing happened.

The gun disappeared from Pottersham's hand, flew right up into the air, and was neatly caught by Bufflo! And all by the crack of a whip!

Crack! Just that - and the gun had been flicked from his hand by the powerful lash-end - and had stung Pottersham's fingers so much he was now howling in pain and bending double to nurse his injured hand.

Terry-Kane gasped. What a neat trick - but how dangerous! The gun might have gone off. Now the tables were indeed turned, for it was Bufflo who held the gun, not Pottersham. And Pottersham looked very pale indeed!

He stared as if he hardly knew what to do. 'Let go of them,' ordered Bufflo, nodding his head towards Terry-Kane and Dick. The three men released them and stood back.

'Seems as if we got to get the police after all,' remarked Bufflo, in a perfectly ordinary voice, as if these happenings were not at all unusual. 'You can let that dog go now, if you want, Julian.'

'No! NO!' cried Pottersham in terror - and at that moment the moon went behind a cloud, and the tower-room was plunged in darkness - except for the lantern that Pottersham had set down on the floor when he had first arrived.

He saw one slight chance for himself and the others. He suddenly kicked at the lantern, which flew into the air and hit Bufflo, then went out, and left the entire place in pitch darkness. Bufflo did not dare to fire. He might hit the wrong person!

'Set the dog loose!' he roared - but it was too late. By the time Timmy had got to the door, it was slammed shut - and a bolt was shot home the other side! There was the sound of hurried steps slipping and stumbling down the stone stairway in the dark.

'Hrrr!' said Bufflo, when the moon came out again, and showed him the astonished and dismayed faces of the five in the room. 'We slipped up somewhere, didn't we? They've gone!'

'Yes. But without us,' said Terry-Kane, letting Dick untie his arms. 'They've probably gone down through those passages. They'll be out before we've escaped ourselves, more's the pity. And now we've got to try this rope-trick down the tower wall, seeing that the door is locked!'

'Come on, then,' said Julian. 'Let's go before anything else happens.' He went to the window, slid to the outer edge, and took hold of the rope. It was perfectly easy to climb down, though it wasn't very pleasant to look below him into the courtyard. It seemed so very far away.

Anne went next, very much afraid, but not showing it. She was quite a good climber so she didn't find the rope difficult. She was very, very glad when she at last stood safely beside Julian.

Then came George, with a bit of news. 'I can't think what's happening to the four men,' she said. 'They still seem to be about - and they're yelling like anything. It sounds as if they are rushing round that gallery that runs along the walls of the tower-room below.'

'Well, let them,' said Julian. 'If they stay there long enough, we'll have time to go to the hole in the outer wall, and wait for them to come out one by one! That would be very, very nice.'

'Timmy's coming now,' said George. 'I've wrapped him up well in that rug and tied it all round him, and put a kind of rope-harness on him. Dick's going to lower him down. We doubled the rope to make sure it would hold. Look - here he comes! Poor darling Timmy! He can't think what in the world is happening!'

Timmy came down slowly, swinging a little, and bumping into the stone wall now and again. He gave a little yelp each time, and George was sure he would be covered with bruises! She watched in great suspense as he came lower and lower.

'Timmy ought to be used to this sort of thing by now,' said Julian. 'He's had plenty of it in the adventures he's shared with us. Hey there, Tim! Slowly does it! Good dog, then! I guess you're glad to be standing on firm ground again!'

Timmy certainly was. He allowed himself to be untied from his rug by George, and then tried a few steps to see if the ground was really firm beneath his feet. He leapt up at George joyfully, very glad to be out in the open air again.

'Here comes Dick,' said Julian. The peg-rope swayed a little, and Alfredo went to hold it steady. He and the rubber-man and Mr. Slither were now extremely concerned about something, so concerned that they had hardly a word to say to Julian and George and Anne.

They had suddenly missed Jo and the snake! The snakeman didn't care tuppence about Jo - but he did care about his precious, beloved, magnificent python! He had already hunted all round the courtyard for it.

'If Jo's taken it back to camp with her, I'll pull her hair off!' muttered the snake-man, unhappily, and Julian looked at him in astonishment. What was he muttering about?

Terry-Kane came next, and last of all Bufflo, who seemed to slide down in a most remarkable way, not using the pegs at all. He leapt down beside them, grinning.

'There's a tremendous upset up aloft!' he said. 'Yelling and shouting and scampering about. What do you suppose is the matter with those fellows? We'll be able to get them nicely, if we go to the hole in the wall. They'll be out there soon, I reckon. Come on!'

Chapter 22

BEAUTY AND JO ENJOY THEMSELVES

SOMETHING certainly had happened to upset Pottersham and his three friends. After the door of the tower-room had been slammed and bolted, the men had gone clattering down the stone steps. They had come to the door that led into the gallery, and had opened it and gone out on to the gallery itself.

But before they could find the spiral staircase a little way along, Pottersham had tripped over something - something that hissed like an engine letting off steam, and had wound itself round his legs.

He yelled, and struck out at whatever it was. At first he had thought it was a man lying in wait for him, who had pounced at his legs - but he knew it wasn't a man now. No man could hiss like that!

One of the men shone a torch down to see what was the matter with Pottersham. What he saw made him yell and almost drop the torch.

'A snake! A snake bigger than any I've ever seen! It's got you, Pottersham!'

'Help me, man, help me!' shouted Pottersham, hitting down at the snake as hard as he could. 'It's squeezing my legs together in its coils.'

The other men ran to help him. As soon as they began to tug, Beauty uncoiled and glided off into the shadows.

'Where's the horrible thing gone?' panted Pottersham. 'It nearly crushed my legs to powder! Quick, let's go before it comes back. Where in the world did it come from?'

They took a few steps - but the snake was lying in wait for them! It tripped them all up by gliding in and out of their legs, and then began to coil itself round one of the men's waists.

Such a shouting and yelling and howling began then! If ever there were frightened men, those four were! No matter where they went, that snake seemed to be there, coiling and uncoiling, gliding, writhing, squeezing!

It was Jo who had set the python on to them, of course. Jo had stayed in the gallery while all the disturbance upstairs had been going on, Beauty draped round her neck. The girl tried in vain to make out what was happening.

And then she had heard a door slam, a bolt shot home, and men's feet pouring down the stone stairs! She guessed it must be the four whose voices she had heard earlier in the evening, the men who had gone through the passages.

'Beauty! Now it's your turn to do something,' said Jo, and she pulled the snake off her shoulders. He poured himself down her and flowed on to the ground in one beautiful movement. He glided towards the men, who were now coming out of the gallery. After that, the python had the time of his life. The more the men howled the more excited the big snake became.

Jo was huddled in a corner, laughing till the tears ran down her cheeks. She knew the snake was quite harmless unless he gave one of the men too tight a squeeze. She couldn't see what was going on, but she could hear.

'Oh dear - there's another one down!' she thought, as she heard one of the men tripped up by Beauty. 'And there goes another! I shall die of laughing. Good old Beauty! He's never allowed to behave like this in the usual way. He must be enjoying himself!'

At last the men could bear it no more. 'Come up to that tower-room!' yelled Pottersham. 'I'm not going back through those dark passages with snakes after me. There must be dozens of them here. We'll be bitten soon!'

Jo laughed out loud. Dozens of them! Well, probably Beauty did seem like a dozen snakes to the bewildered men falling over one another in the dark. But Beauty would not bite - he was not poisonous.

Somehow the men got up into the tower-room, and left the snake behind. Beauty was tired of the game now, and went to Jo when the girl called to him. She draped him round her neck, and listened.

The door up in the tower-room had slammed. Jo slipped up the steps, felt for the door-bolt in the darkness and neatly and quietly pulled it across. Now, unless the men liked to risk going down the peg-rope, which she guessed Bufflo had put up against the wall to rescue the others, they were nicely trapped. And if they did go down the rope they would be sure to find a few people waiting for them at the bottom!

'Come on Beauty, let's go,' said Jo, and went down the steps, wishing she had a torch. She remembered the little lantern that had been left in the hidden room, and felt more cheerful. She would be able to take that with her down all those dark passages. Good!

Beauty slithered in front of her. He knew the way all right! They came to the little room, and Jo thankfully picked up the lantern. She looked down at the big python and he stared up at her with gleaming, unwinking eyes. His long body coiled and uncoiled, shining brown and polished in the light.

'I wouldn't mind you for a pet, if you were a bit smaller,' Jo told him. 'I don't know why people don't like snakes. Oh, Beauty - it makes me laugh to think of the way you treated those men!'

She chuckled as she went along the secret ways, holding the lantern high, except when she came to the last passage of all, and had to walk bent double. Beauty waited for her when she came to the hole in the wall. He had heard noises outside.

Jo climbed out first, and was immensely surprised to find herself pounced on and held. She wriggled and shouted and struggled, and finally bit the hand that was holding her.

Then a torch was shone on her and a shout went up. 'It's Jo! Jo, where have you been? And look here, if you bite like that I'll scrag you!'

'Bufflo! I'm sorry - but what did you want to go and pounce on me for?' cried Jo. The moon suddenly came out and lighted up the scene. She saw Julian and the rest there, coming up eagerly.

'Jo! Are you all right?' said her uncle. 'We were worried about you. Where have you been?'

'You escaped!' she cried. 'Did you all get safely down the peg-rope?'

'There's no time to tell about that now,' said Bufflo, watching the hole in the wall. 'What about those fellows? We're waiting for them here. Did you hear anything of them, Jo?'

'Oh, yes. I followed them. Oh, Bufflo, it was so funny...' said Jo, and began to laugh. Bufflo, shook her, but she couldn't stop. And then who should come gliding out through the hole but Beauty!

Mr. Slither saw him at once and gave a yell. 'Beauty! Jo, did you take him with you. You wicked girl! Come here, my Beauty!'

The snake glided to him and wound himself lovingly round him.

'I'm not wicked,' said Jo, indignantly. 'Beauty wanted to come with me and he did - and oh, he got mixed up with all those men, and...'

She went off into peals of laughter again. Dick grinned in sympathy. Jo was very funny when she couldn't stop laughing.

Alfredo shook her roughly and made her stop. 'Tell us what you know about those men,' he commanded. 'Are they coming out this way? Where are they?'

'Oh - the men,' said Jo, wiping her eyes and trying to stop laughing. 'They're all right. Beauty chased them back to the tower-room, and I bolted them in. They're still there. I expect - unless they dare to get down the peg-rope, which I bet they won't!

Bufflo gave a short laugh. 'You did well, Jo,' he said. 'You and Beauty!'

He gave a sharp order to Alfredo and the rubber-man, who went back over the wall and into the courtyard to watch if the men slid down the peg-rope.

'I think it would be a good idea to get the police now,' said Terry-Kane, beginning to feel that he must be in some kind of extraordinary dream, with peg-ropes and whips and knives and snakes turning up in such a peculiar manner. 'That fellow Pottersham is dangerous. He's a traitor, and must be caught before he gives away all that he knows about the work he and I have been doing.'

'Right,' said Bufflo. 'We've got another fellow locked up too - in an empty caravan.'

'But - didn't he escape then?' said Jo, surprised. 'I thought that man Pottersham, who's up in the tower-room now, was the one we locked up.'

'The one we locked up is still locked up,' said Bufflo grimly.

'But who is he, then?' said Terry-Kane, bewildered.

'We'll soon find out,' said Bufflo. 'Come on, let's get going now. It's very late, you kids must be dying of hunger, somebody ought to go to the police, and I want to get back to camp.'

'Alfredo and the rubber-man will keep guard on the peg-rope,' said Mr. Slither, still fondling Beauty. 'There is no need to stay here any longer.'

So down the hill they went, talking nineteen to the dozen. Terry-Kane went off to the police-station and to telephone what he vaguely called 'the high-up authorities'. The five children began to think hungrily of something to eat and drink! Timmy ran to the stream as soon as they reached the field and began to lap thirstily.

'Let's just find out if you know the fellow we've got locked up in this caravan,' said Bufflo, when they got to the camp. 'He seems the only unexplained bit so far.'

He unlocked the caravan, and called loudly. 'Come on out. We want to know who you are!' He held up a lamp, and the man inside came slowly to the door.

There was a shout of amazement from all the children. 'Uncle Quentin!' cried Julian, Dick and Anne. 'Father!' shouted George. 'What ARE you doing here?'

Chapter 23

HAVING A WONDERFUL TIME!

THERE was a minute or two of silence. Everyone was most astonished. To think that George's father had been locked up like that! It had been Jo's mistake, of course - she had been so sure he was Mr. Pottersham.

'Julian,' said Uncle Quentin, very much on his dignity, and also very angry. 'I must ask you to go and get the police here. I was set on and locked up in this caravan for no reason at all.'

Bufflo began to look most disturbed. He turned on Jo.

'Why didn't you tell us he was George's father?' he said.

'I didn't know it was,' said Jo. 'I've never seen him, and anyway I thought...'

'It doesn't matter what you thought,' said Uncle Quentin, looking at the dirty little girl in disgust.

'I insist on the police being fetched.'

'Uncle Quentin, I'm sure it's all been a mistake,' said Julian, 'and anyway Mr. Terry-Kane has gone to the police himself.'

His uncle stared at him as if he couldn't believe his ears. 'Terry-Kane? Where is he? What has happened? Is he found?'

'Yes. It's rather a long story,' said Julian. 'It all began when we saw that face at the window. I told Aunt Fanny all about that, Uncle, and she said she would tell you when you got back from London. Well - it was Mr. Terry-Kane at the window!'

'I thought so! I told your Aunt Fanny I had a feeling it was!' said his uncle. 'That's why I came as soon as ever I could - but you were none of you here. What happened to you?'

'Well, that's part of the story, Uncle,' said Julian, patiently. 'But I say, do you mind if we have something to eat. We're practically dead from starvation - haven't had anything since yesterday!'

That ended the interview for the time being! Mrs. Alfredo bustled about, and soon there was a perfectly glorious meal set in front of the five half-starved children. They sat round a camp-fire and ate and ate and ate.

Mrs. Alfredo practically emptied her big pot for them. Timmy was surrounded by plates of scraps and big bones brought by every member of the camp! Almost every minute someone loomed up out of the darkness with a plate of something or other either for the hungry children, or for Timmy.

At last they really could eat no more, and Julian began to tell their extraordinary story. Dick took it up, and George added quite a few bits. Jo interrupted continually and even Timmy put in a few barks. Only Anne said nothing. She was leaning against her uncle, fast asleep.

'I never heard such a tale in my life,' said Uncle Quentin, continually. 'Never! Fancy that fellow Pottersham going off with Terry-Kane like that. I knew Terry-Kane was all right - he wouldn't let his country down. Now, Pottersham I never did like. Well, go on.'

The fair-folk were as enthralled as Uncle Quentin with the tale. They came closer and closer as the story of the secret passages, the hidden room, the stone stairways and the rest was unfolded.

They got very excited when they learnt how Bufflo had appeared in the tower-room and had flicked the gun out of Pottersham's hand. Uncle Quentin threw back his head and roared when he heard that bit.

'What a shock for that fellow!' he said. 'I'd like to have seen his face. Well, well - I never heard such a tale in my life!'

And then it was Jo's turn to tell how she had followed the four men into the secret passages, and had set Beauty, the python, on to the men. She began to laugh again as she told her tale, and soon all the fair-folk were laughing in sympathy, rocking to and fro, with tears streaming down their faces.

Only Uncle Quentin looked rather solemn at this point. He remembered how he had felt when, because of his shouting, the fair-folk had sent the python into his caravan, and almost frightened him out of his life.

'Mr. Slither, please do get Beauty,' begged Jo. 'He ought to listen to his part of the story. He was wonderful. He enjoyed it all too. I'm sure he would have laughed if only snakes could laugh.'

Poor Uncle Quentin didn't like to object when the snake-man fetched his beloved python - in fact, he fetched both of them, and they had never had such a fuss made of them before. They were patted and rubbed and pulled about in a way they both seemed to enjoy hugely.

'Let me hold Beauty, Mr. Slither,' said Jo, at last, and she draped him round her neck like a long, shiny fur. Uncle Quentin looked as if he was going to be sick. He would certainly have got up and gone away if it hadn't been that his favourite niece Anne was fast asleep against his shoulder.

'What extraordinary people George seems to be friends with,' he thought. 'I suppose they are all right - but really! What with whips and knives and snakes I must say I find all this very peculiar.'

'Somebody's coming up the field,' said Jo, suddenly. 'It's - yes, it's Mr. Terry-Kane, and he's got three policemen with him.'

Immediately almost all the fair-folk melted away into the darkness. They knew quite well why the police had come - not for them, but because of Mr. Pottersham and his unpleasant friends. But all the same they wanted nothing to do with the three burly policemen walking up the hill with Terry-Kane.

Uncle Quentin leapt to his feet as soon as he saw Terry-Kane. He ran to meet him joyfully, and pumped his arm up and down, up and down, shaking hands so vigorously that Terry-Kane felt quite exhausted.

'My dear fellow,' said Uncle Quentin. 'I'm so glad you're safe. I told everyone you weren't a traitor, and never could be - everyone! I went up to London and told them. I'm glad you're all right.'

'Well - it's thanks to these children,' said Terry-Kane, who looked very tired. 'I expect you've heard the peculiar and most extraordinary tale of the Face at the Window.'

'Yes - it's all so extraordinary that I shouldn't believe it if I read it in a book,' said Uncle Quentin. 'And yet it all happened! My dear fellow, you must be very tired!'

'I am,' said Terry-Kane. 'But I'm not going to lie down and sleep until those other fellows are safely under lock and key - Pottersham and his fine friends! Do you mind if I leave you for a bit, and go off to the castle again? We simply must catch those fellows. I came to ask if one of the children could go with us, because I hear we have to creep through all kinds of passages and galleries and up spiral stairways and goodness knows what.'

'But - didn't you go that way when Pottersham first took you there and hid you in that room?' asked Dick, surprised.

'Yes. I must have gone that way,' said Mr. Terry-Kane. 'But I was blindfolded and half-doped with something they had made me drink. I've no idea of the way. Of course, Pottersham knew every inch - he's written books about all these old castles, you know - nobody knows more about them and their secrets than he does. He certainly put his knowledge to good use this week!'

'I'll go with you,' said Jo. 'I've been up and down those passages four times now. I know them by heart! The others have only been once.'

'Yes, you go,' said Bufflo.

'Take Timmy,' said George most generously, for usually she would never let Timmy go with Jo.

'Or take a snake,' suggested Dick, with a grin.

'I won't take anything,' said Jo. 'I'll be all right with three big policemen! So long as they're not after me, I like them!'

She didn't really, but she couldn't help boasting a little. She set off with Terry-Kane and the three policemen, strutting a little, and feeling quite a heroine.

The others all went to their caravans, tired out. Uncle Quentin sat by the camp-fire, waiting for the arrival of Pottersham and his three friends.

'Good night,' said Julian to the girls. 'I'd like to wait till the crowd come back - complete with the rubber-man and Alfredo - but I shall fall asleep standing on my feet in a minute. I say, wasn't that a smashing supper?'

'Super!' said the others. 'Well - see you tomorrow.'

They all slept very late the next day. Jo was back long before they awoke, very anxious to tell them how they had captured Pottersham and the others, and how they had been marched off to the police-station, with her following all the way. But Mrs. Alfredo would not let her wake the four children up.

However, they did awake at last, and got up eagerly, remembering all the exciting moments of the day before. Soon they were jumping down the steps of the two caravans, eager to hear the latest news.

'Hallo, Father!' shouted George, seeing him not far off.

'Hallo, Uncle Quentin! Hallo, Jo!' called the others, and soon heard the latest bits of information from Jo who was very proud of being in at the finish.

'But they didn't put up any fight at all,' she said, rather disappointed. 'I think Beauty scared all the fight out of them last night - they just gave in without a word.'

'Now you children!' called Mrs. Alfredo, 'I have kept a little breakfast for you. You like to come?'

They did like to come! Jo went too, though she had already had one breakfast. Uncle Quentin went to sit down with them. He gazed around amazed at all the goings-on of the camp.

Bufflo was doing some remarkable rope-spinning and whip-cracking. The rubber-man was wriggling in and out of the wheel-spokes of his caravan without stopping. Mr. Slither was polishing his snakes. Dacca was step dancing on a board, click-click-clickity-click.

Alfredo came up with his buttonhook-like torches, and his metal bowl. 'I give you a treat,' he announced to Uncle Quentin. 'You would like to see me fire-eat?'

Uncle Quentin stared at him as if he thought he had gone raving mad.

'He's a fire-eater, Uncle,' explained Dick.

'Oh. No thank you, my good man. I would rather not see you eat fire,' said Uncle Quentin, politely but very firmly. Alfredo was most disappointed. He had meant to give this man a real treat to make up for locking him into the caravan! He went away sadly, and Mrs. Alfredo screamed after him.

'You foolish man. Who wants to see you fire-eat? You have no brains. You are a big, silly bad man. You keep away with your fire-eating!' She disappeared into her caravan, and Uncle Quentin looked after her, astonished at her sudden outburst.

'This is really a very extraordinary place,' he said. 'And most extraordinary people. I'm going back home today, George. Wouldn't you all like to come with me? I don't really feel it's the right thing for you to get mixed up in so many queer doings.'

'Oh no, Father,' said George, in horror. 'Go home when we've only just settled in! Of course not. None of us want to leave - do we Julian?' she said, looking round beseechingly at him.

Julian answered at once. 'George is right, Uncle. We're just beginning to enjoy ourselves here. I think we're all agreed on that?'

'We are,' said everyone, and Timmy thumped his tail hard and gave a very loud 'WOOF'.

'Very well,' said Uncle Quentin, getting up. 'I must go, I suppose. I'll catch the bus down to the station. Come down with me.'

They went to see him off on the bus. It came up well on time and he got in.

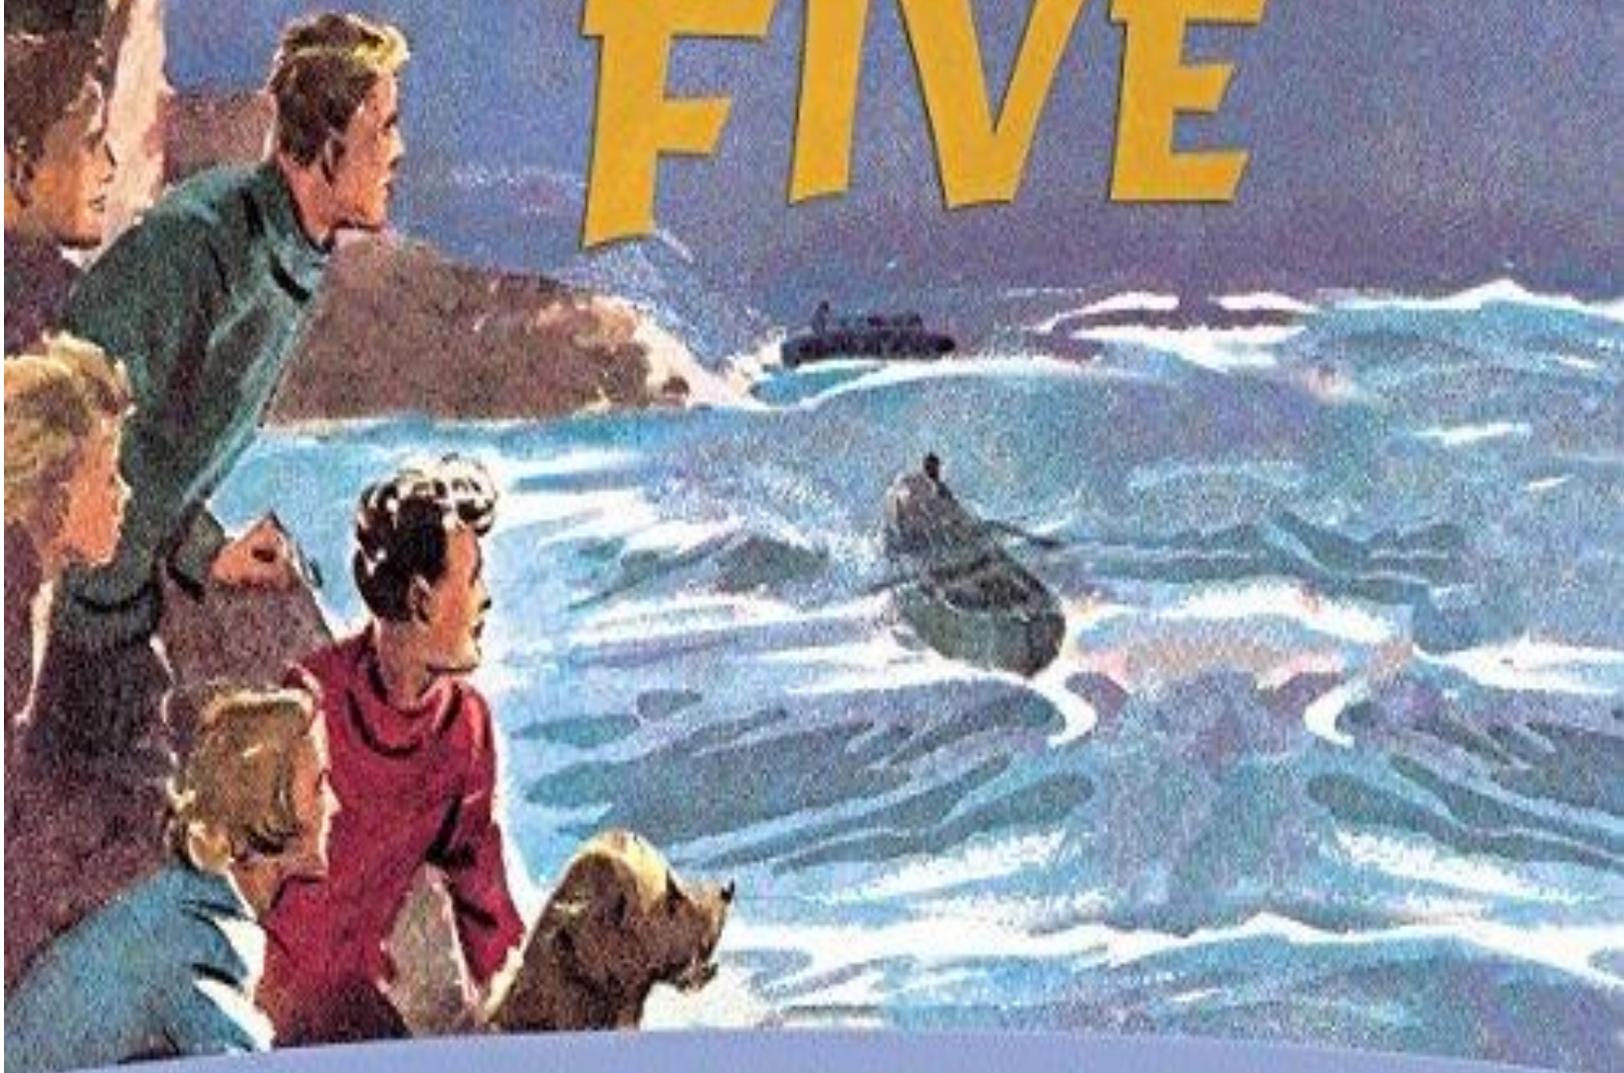

'Good-bye,' he said. 'What message shall I give your mother, George? She'll expect to hear something from the five of you.'

'Well,' shouted everyone, as the bus rumbled off, 'well - just tell her the FIVE ARE HAVING A WONDERFUL TIME! Good-bye, Uncle Quentin, good-bye!'

THE END

Enid Blyton

THE
FAMOUS
FIVE

FIVE GO DOWN TO THE SEA

ENID BLYTON

FAMOUS FIVE 12

Five Go Down To The Sea

Contents

| | | |
|----|----------------------------|----|
| 1 | The Holiday Begins | 2 |
| 2 | Tremannon Farm | 7 |
| 3 | The First Evening | 12 |
| 4 | Down In The Cove | 17 |
| 5 | Yan - And His Grandad | 22 |
| 6 | A Queer Tale | 28 |
| 7 | Out In The Night | 33 |
| 8 | Here Come The Barnies! | 39 |
| 9 | The Light In The Tower | 44 |
| 10 | Getting Ready For The Show | 49 |
| 11 | The Barnies - And Clopper | 55 |
| 12 | A Trip To The Tower | 60 |
| 13 | In The Wreckers' Tower | 65 |
| 14 | The Secret Passage | 70 |
| 15 | Locked In The Cave | 75 |
| 16 | Wreckers' Way | 81 |
| 17 | Long After Midnight! | 86 |
| 18 | Dick Gets An Idea! | 91 |
| 19 | Mostly About Clopper | 95 |

Chapter 1
THE HOLIDAY BEGINS

'Blow! I've got a puncture!' said Dick. 'My tyre's going flat. Worst time it could possibly happen!'

Julian glanced down at Dick's back tyre. Then he looked at his watch. 'You've just got time to pump it up and hope for the best,' he said. 'We've got seven minutes before the train goes.'

Dick jumped off and took his pump. The others got off their bicycles, too, and stood round, watching to see if the tyre blew up well or not.

They were on their way to Kirrin Station to catch the train, bicycles and all. Their luggage had gone on in advance, and they thought they had left plenty of time to ride to the station, get their bicycles labelled and put in the luggage van, and catch the train comfortably.

'We can't miss the train!' said George, putting on her best scowl. She always hated it when things went wrong.

'We can. Easiest thing in the world!' said Julian, grinning at George's fierce face. 'What do you say, Timmy?'

Timmy barked sharply, as if to say he certainly agreed. He licked George's hand and she patted him. The scowl left her face as she saw Dick's tyre coming up well. They'd just do it! Dick felt his tyre, gave a sigh of relief, and put his pump back in its place.

'Phew! That was hot work,' he said, mounting his bicycle. 'Hope it will last till we get to the station. I was afraid you'd have to go without me.'

'Oh, no,' said Anne. 'We'd have caught the next train. Come on, Timmy!'

The four cousins and Timmy the dog raced on towards the station. They cycled into the station yard just as the signal went up to show the train was due. The porter came towards them, his big round face red and smiling.

'I sent your luggage off for you,' he said. 'Not much between you, I must say - just one small trunk!'

'Well, we don't wear much on holidays,' said Julian. 'Can you label our bikes quickly for us? I see the train is due.'

The porter began to label the four bicycles. He didn't hurry. He wouldn't let the train go off again till he had done his job, that was certain. There it was now, coming round the bend.

'You going off to Cornwall, I see?' said the porter. 'And to Tremannon, too. You want to be careful of bathing there. That's a fierce coast and a hungry sea.'

'Oh, do you know it?' said Anne, surprised. 'Is it a nice place?'

'Nice? Well, I dunno about that,' said the porter, raising his voice as the train came rumbling in. 'I used to go out in my uncle's fishing-boat all round there, and it's wild and lonely. I shouldn't have thought it was much of a place for a holiday - no pier, no ice-cream sellers, no concert parties, no cinema, no...'

'Good,' said Julian. 'We can do without all those, thank you. We mean to bathe, and hire a boat, and fish, and bike all round about. That's our kind of holiday!'

'Woof!' said Timmy, wagging his tail.

'Yes, and yours too,' said George, rubbing his big head. 'Come on, we'd better get into a carriage.'

'I'll see to your bikes,' said the porter. 'Have a good holiday, and if you see my uncle, tell him you know me. His name's same as mine, John Polpenny.'

' "By Tre, Pol and Pen, you may know the Cornishmen", ' quoted Julian, getting into a carriage with the others. 'Thanks, John. We'll look up your uncle if we can!'

They each took a corner seat, and Timmy went to the opposite door, put his feet up on the ledge and his nose out of the window. He meant to stand like that all the way! He loved the rush of air past his nose.

'Timmy, come down,' said George.

Timmy took no notice. He was happy. It was holidays again, and he was with everybody he loved. They were going away together. There might be rabbits to chase. Timmy had never yet caught a rabbit, but he went on hoping!

'Now, we're off again!' said Julian, settling into his corner. 'Gosh, how I do like the beginnings of a holiday, getting ready, looking at maps, planning how to get there, and then at last setting off!'

'On a lovely fine day like this!' said Anne. 'George, how did your mother hear of Tremannon Farm?'

'Well, it was Father who heard about it, really,' said George. 'You know Father's got a lot of scientist friends who like to go off to lonely places and work out all kinds of ideas in peace and quiet. Well, one of them went to Tremannon Farm because he heard it was one of the quietest places in the kingdom. Father said his friend went there all skin and bone and came back as fat as a Christmas goose, and Mother said that sounded just the place for us to go to these hols!'

'She's right!' said Dick. 'I feel a bit skin-and-bonish myself after slaving at school for three months. I could do with fattening up!'

They all laughed. 'You may feel skin-and-bonish, but you don't look it,' said Julian. 'You want a bit of exercise to take your fat off. We'll get it, too. We'll walk and bike and bathe and climb...'

'And eat,' said George. 'Timmy, you must be polite to the farm dogs, or you'll have a bad time.'

'And you must remember that when you go out to play, you'll have to ask the other dogs' permission before you can chase their rabbits,' said Dick solemnly.

Timmy thumped his tail against Dick's knees and opened his mouth to let his tongue hang out. He looked exactly as if he were laughing.

'That's right. Grin at my jokes,' said Dick. 'I'm glad you're coming, Tim, it would be awful without you.'

'He always has come with us, on every holiday,' said George. 'And he's shared in every single adventure we've ever had.'

'Good old Timmy,' said Julian. 'Well, he may share in one this time, too. You never know.'

'I'm not going to have any adventures this time,' said Anne in a firm voice. 'I just want a holiday, nothing more. Let's have a jolly good time, and not go on looking for anything strange or mysterious or adventurous.'

'Right,' said Julian. 'Adventures are off this time. Definitely off. And if anything does turn up, we pooh-pooh it and walk off. Is that agreed?'

'Yes,' said Anne.

'All right,' said George, doubtfully.

'Fine,' said Dick.

Julian looked surprised. 'Gosh, you're a poor lot, I must say. Well, I'll fall in with you, if you're all agreed. Even if we find ourselves right in the very middle of Goodness Knows What, we say "No, thank you" and walk away. That's agreed.'

'Well,' began George, 'I'm not sure if...' But what she wasn't sure about nobody knew because Timmy chose that moment to fall off the seat. He yelped as he hit the floor with a bang, and immediately went back to his post at the window, putting his head right out.

'We'll have to get him in and shut the windows,' said George. 'He might get something in his eye.'

'No. I'm not going to cook slowly to a cinder in this hot carriage with all the windows shut, not even for the sake of Timmy's eyes,' said Julian, firmly. 'If you can't make him obey you and come inside, he can jolly well get something in his eye.'

However, the problem was solved very quickly because at that moment the train gave a most unearthly shriek and disappeared headlong into utter blackness. Timmy, astounded, fell back into the carriage and tried to get on to George's knee, terrified.

'Don't be a baby, Timmy,' said George. 'It's only a tunnel! Ju, haul him off me. It's too hot to try and nurse a heavy dog like Timmy. Stop it, Timmy, I tell you it's only a tunnel!'

The journey seemed very long. The carriage was so hot, and the train stopped at so many little out-of-the-way places, sometimes for ten minutes at a time. They had to change twice, and sit on sun-baked stations waiting for their next train to come along. Timmy panted loudly and hung his tongue out; George begged the porters for water at each changing-place.

They had their lunch with them, but somehow they weren't hungry. They got dirtier and dirtier, and thirstier and thirstier, for they very quickly drank the orangeade they had brought with them.

'Phew!' said Julian, fanning himself with a magazine. 'What wouldn't I give for a bathe? Timmy, don't pant all over me. You make me feel hotter still.'

'What time do we get there?' asked Anne.

'Well, we have to get out at Polwilly Halt,' said Julian. 'That's the nearest place to Tremannon Farm. We bike from there. With luck, we should be there by tea-time.'

'We ought to have brought masses more to drink,' said Dick. 'I feel like a man who's been lost in a sun-scorched desert for weeks.'

They were all extremely glad when they at last arrived at Polwilly Halt. At first they didn't think it was a halt, but it was. It was nothing but a tiny wooden stage built beside the railway. The children sat and waited. They hadn't even seen the little wooden stage or the small sign that said 'Polwilly Halt'.

The sound of impatient feet came along the little platform. The guard's perspiring face appeared at the window.

'Well? Didn't you want to get out here? You going to sit there all day?'

'Gosh! Is this Polwilly?' said Julian, leaping up. 'Sorry. We didn't know it was a Halt. We'll be out in half a tick.'

The train started off almost before they had banged the door. They stood there on the funny little staging, all alone save for their four bicycles at the other end. The little Halt seemed lonely and lost, set in the midst of rolling fields and rounded hills. Not a building was in sight!

But not far off to the west George's sharp eyes saw something lovely. She pulled Julian's arm. 'Look, the sea! Over there, between the hills, in the dip. Can't you see it? I'm sure it's the sea. What a heavenly blue.'

'It's always that gorgeous blue on the Cornish coast,' said Dick. 'Ah, I feel better when I see that. Come on, let's get our bikes and find our way to Tremannon Farm. If I don't get something to drink soon I shall certainly hang my tongue out, like Timmy.'

They went to get their bikes. Dick felt his back tyre. It was a bit soft, but not too bad. He could easily pump it up again. 'How far is it to Tremannon Farm?' he asked.

Julian looked at his notes. ' "Get out at Polwilly Halt. Then bike four miles to Tremannon Farm, along narrow lanes. Tremannon Village is about one mile before you get to the farm." Not too bad. We might get some lemonade, or even an ice-cream, in the village.'

'Woof, woof,' said Timmy, who knew the word ice-cream very well indeed.

'Poor Tim!' said Anne. 'He'll be so hot running beside our bikes. We'd better go slowly.'

'Well, if anyone thinks I'm going to tear along, he can think again,' said Dick. 'I'll go as slowly as you like, Anne!'

They set off with Timmy down a queer little lane, deep-set between high hedges. They went slowly for Timmy's sake. He panted along valiantly. Good old Timmy! He would never give up as long as he was with the four children.

It was about five o'clock and a very lovely evening. They met nobody at all, not even a slow old farm cart. It was even too hot for the birds to sing. No wind blew. There seemed a curious silence and loneliness everywhere.

Julian looked back at the other three with a grin. 'Adventure is in the air! I feel it. We're all set for adventure! But no, we'll turn our backs on it and say: "Away with you!" That's agreed!'

Chapter 2

TREMANNON FARM

It certainly was a lovely ride to Tremannon Farm. Poppies blew by the wayside in hundreds, and honeysuckle threw its scent out from the hedges as they passed. The corn stood high in the fields, touched with gold already, and splashed with the scarlet of the poppies.

They came to Tremannon Village at last. It was really nothing but a winding street, set with a few shops and houses, and beyond that, straggling out, were other houses. Farther off, set in the hills, were a few farm-houses, their grey stone walls gleaming in the sun.

The four children found the general store and went in. 'Any ice-cream?' said Julian hopefully. But there was none. What a blow! There was orangeade and lemonade, however, quite cool through being kept down in the cellar of the store.

'You be the folks that old Mrs. Penruthlan be having in?' said the village shopkeeper. 'She do be expecting of you. Furriners, bain't you?'

'Well, not exactly,' said Julian, remembering that to many Cornish folk anyone was a foreigner who did not belong to Cornwall. 'My mother had a great-aunt who lived in Cornwall all her life. So we're not exactly "furriners", are we?'

'You're furriners all right,' said the bent little shopkeeper, looking at Julian with bird-like eyes. 'Your talk is furrin-like, too. Like that man Mrs. Penruthlan had before. We reckoned he was mad, though he was harmless enough.'

'Really?' said Julian, pouring himself out a third lemonade. 'Well, he was a scientist, and if you're going to be a really good one you have to be a bit mad, you know. At least, so I've heard. Golly, this lemonade is good. Can I have another bottle, please?'

The old woman suddenly laughed, sounding just like an amused hen. 'Well, well, Marty Penruthlan's got a fine meal ready for you, but seems like you won't be able to eat a thing, not with all that lemonade splashing about in your innards!'

'Don't say you can hear the splashing,' said Julian earnestly. 'Very bad manners, that! Furriners' manners, I'm sure. Well, how much do we owe you? That was jolly good lemonade.'

He paid the bill and they all mounted their bicycles once more, having been given minute directions as to how to get to the farm. Timmy set off with them, feeling much refreshed, having drunk steadily for four minutes without stopping.

'I should think you've had about as much water as would fill a horse-trough, Timmy,' Julian told him. 'My word, if this weather holds we're going to look like Red Indians!'

It was an uphill ride to Tremannon Farm, but they got there at last. As they cycled through the open gates, a fusillade of barks greeted them, and four large dogs came flying to meet them. Timmy put up his hackles at once and growled warningly. He went completely stiff, and stood there glaring.

A woman came out behind the dogs, her face one large smile. 'Now, Ben; now, Bouncer! Here, Nellie, here! Bad dog, Willy! It's all right, children, that's their way of saying "Welcome to Tremannon Farm!"'

The dogs now stood in a ring round the four children, their tongues out, their tails wagging vigorously. They were lovely dogs, three collies and one small black Scottie. Timmy eyed them one by one. George had her hand on his collar, just in case he should feel foolhardy all of a sudden and imagine he could take on all four dogs single-handed.

But he didn't. He behaved like a perfect gentleman! His tail wagged politely, and his hackles went down. The little Scottie ran up to him and sniffed his nose. Timmy sniffed back, his tail wagging more vigorously.

Then the three sheepdogs ran up, beautiful collies with plummy tails, and the children heaved sighs of relief to see that the farm dogs evidently were not going to regard Timmy as a 'furriner'!

'They're all right now,' said Mrs. Penruthlan. 'They've introduced themselves to one another. Now come along with me. You must be tired and dirty - and hungry and thirsty. I've high tea waiting for you.'

She didn't talk in the Cornish way. She was pleased to see them and gave them a grand welcome. She took them upstairs to a bathroom, big but primitive. There was one tap only and that was for cold water. It ran very slowly indeed!

But it was really cold, and was lovely and soft to wash in. The tired children cleaned themselves and combed their hair.

They had two bedrooms between them, one for the girls and one for the boys. They were rather small, with little windows that gave a meagre amount of light, so that the rooms looked dark even in the bright evening sunshine.

They were bare little rooms, with two beds in each, one chair, one chest of drawers, one cupboard and two small rugs. Nothing else! But, oh! The views out of the windows!

Miles and miles of countryside, set with cornfields, pasture land, tall hedges and glimpses of winding lanes; heather was out on some of the hills, blazing purple in the sun; and, gleaming in the distance was the dark blue brilliance of the Cornish sea. Lovely!

'We'll bike to the sea as soon as we can,' said Dick, trying to flatten the few hairs that would stick up straight on the top of his head. There are caves on this coast. We'll explore them. I wonder if Mrs. Penruthlan would give us picnic lunches so that we can go off for the day when we want to.' 'Sure to,' said Julian. 'She's a pet. I've never felt so welcome in my life. Are we ready? Come on down, then. I'm beginning to feel very empty indeed.'

The high tea that awaited them was truly magnificent. A huge ham gleaming as pink as Timmy's tongue; a salad fit for a king. In fact, as Dick said, fit for several kings, it was so enormous. It had in it everything that anyone could possibly want.

'Lettuce, tomatoes, onions, radishes, mustard and cress, carrot grated up - that is carrot, isn't it, Mrs. Penruthlan?' said Dick. 'And lashings of hard-boiled eggs.'

There was an enormous tureen of new potatoes, all gleaming with melted butter, scattered with parsley. There was a big bottle of home-made salad cream.

'Look at that cream cheese, too,' marvelled Dick, quite overcome. 'And that fruit cake. And are those drop-scones, or what? Are we supposed to have something of everything, Mrs. Penruthlan?'

'Oh, yes,' said the plump little woman, smiling at Dick's pleasure. 'And there's a cherry tart made with our own cherries, and our own cream with it. I know what hungry children are. I've had seven of my own, all married and gone away. So I have to make do with other people's when I can get them.'

'I'm jolly glad you happened to get hold of us,' said Dick, beginning on ham and salad. 'Well, we'll keep you busy, Mrs. Penruthlan. We've all got big appetites!'

'Ah, I've not met any children yet that could eat like mine,' said Mrs. Penruthlan, sounding really sorry. 'Same as I've not met any man that can eat like Mr. Penruthlan. He's a fine eater, he is. He'll be in soon.'

'I hope we shall leave enough for him,' said Anne, looking at the ham and the half-empty salad dish. 'No wonder my uncle's friend, the man who came to stay here, went away as fat as butter, Mrs. Penruthlan.'

'Oh, the poor man!' said their hostess, who was now filling up their glasses with rich, creamy milk. 'Thin as my husband's old rake, he was, and all his bones showing and creaking. He said "No" to this and "No" to that, but I took no notice of him at all. If he didn't eat his dinner, I'd take his tray away and tidy it up, and then in ten minutes I'd take it back again and say: "Dinner-time, sir, and I hope you're hungry!" And he'd start all over again, and maybe that time he'd really tuck in!'

'But didn't he know you'd already taken him his dinner-tray once?' said Julian, astonished. 'Goodness, he must have been a dreamer.'

'I took his tray in three times once,' said Mrs. Penruthlan. 'So you be careful in case I do the same kind of thing to you!'

'I should love it!' grinned Julian. 'Yes, please, I'd like some more ham. And more salad.'

Footsteps came outside the room, on the stone floor of the hall. The door opened and the farmer himself came in. The children stared at him in awe.

He was a strange and magnificent figure of a man - tall, well over six feet, broadly built, and as dark as a sunburnt Spaniard. His mane of hair was black and curly, and his eyes were as black as his hair.

'This is Mr. Penruthlan,' said his wife, and the children stood up to shake hands, feeling half afraid of this dark giant.

He nodded his head and shook hands. His hand was enormous, and was covered with hairs so thick and black that it was like fur. Anne felt that it would be quite nice and soft to stroke, like a cat's back!'

He didn't say a word, but sat down and let his wife serve him. 'Well, Mr. Penruthlan,' she said, 'and how's the cow getting along?'

'Ah,' said the farmer, taking a plate of ham. The children gazed at the slices in awe, seven or eight of them. Goodness!

'Oh, I'm glad she's all right,' said Mrs. Penruthlan, stacking up some dirty plates. 'And is the calf a dear little thing - and what's the colour?'

'Ah,' said Mr. Penruthlan, nodding his head.

'Red and white, like its mother! That's good, isn't it?' said his wife, who seemed to have a miraculous way of interpreting his 'Ahs'. 'What shall we call it?'

Everyone badly wanted to say 'Ah', but nobody dared. However, Mr. Penruthlan didn't say 'Ah' that time, but something that sounded like 'Ock'.

'Yes, we'll call it Buttercup, then,' said his wife, nodding her head. 'You always have such good ideas, Mr. Penruthlan.'

It sounded odd to hear her call her husband by his surname like that, and yet, somehow, the children couldn't imagine this giant of a fellow even owning a name like Jack or Jim. They went on with their own meal, enjoying every minute of it, watching Mr. Penruthlan shovel in great mouthfuls, and working his way quickly through every dish. Mrs. Penruthlan saw them watching him.

'He's a grand eater, isn't he?' she said, proudly. 'So were all my children. When they were at home, I was kept really busy, but now, with only Mr. Penruthlan to feed, I feel quite lost. That's why I like people here. You'll tell me if you don't have enough to eat, won't you?'

They all laughed, and Timmy barked. He had had a wonderful meal, too, it was the remains of Mrs. Penruthlan's big stock-pot, and was very tasty indeed. He had also got the largest bone he had ever had in his life. The only thing that really worried the well-fed Timmy now was, where could he put the bone out of the way of the farm dogs?

Mr. Penruthlan suddenly made a peculiar noise and began undoing a trouser pocket at the back. 'Oo-ah!' he said, and brought out a dirty, folded piece of paper. He handed it to his wife, who unfolded it and read it. She looked up at the children, smiling.

'Now, here's a bit of excitement!' she said. 'The Barnies will be along this week! You'll love them.'

'What are the Barnies?' asked George, puzzled at Mrs. Penruthlan's evident pleasure and excitement.

'Oh, they're travelling players that wander round the countryside and play and act in our big barns,' said Mrs. Penruthlan. 'We've no cinemas for miles, you know, so the Barnies are always very welcome.'

'Oh, you call them Barnies because they use your barns for their shows,' said Anne, seeing light. 'Yes, we shall love to see them, Mrs. Penruthlan. Will they play in your barn?'

'Yes. We'll have all the village here when the Barnies come,' said Mrs. Penruthlan, her cheeks going red with delight. 'And may be people from Trelin Village, too. Now, there's a treat for you!'

'Ah,' said Mr. Penruthlan, and nodded his great head. Evidently he liked the Barnies, too. He gave a sudden laugh and said something short and quite incomprehensible.

'He says you'll like Clopper the horse,' said his wife, laughing. 'The things he does! The way he sits down and crosses his legs. Well, you wait and see. That horse!'

This sounded rather astonishing. A horse that sat down and crossed its legs? Julian winked at Dick. They would most certainly see the Barnies!

Chapter 3

THE FIRST EVENING

After their wonderful high tea the four children didn't really feel like doing very much. Dick thought he ought to mend his puncture, but wasn't sure that he could bend over properly!

Mrs. Penruthlan began to stack the dishes and clear away. George and Anne offered to help her. 'Well, that's kind of you, Anne and Georgina,' said the farmer's wife. 'But you're tired tonight. You can give me a hand some other time. By the way, which of you is which?'

'I'm Anne,' said Anne.

'And I'm George, not Georgina,' said George. 'So please don't call me that. I hate it. I always wanted to be a boy, so I only like to be called George.'

'What she really means is that she won't answer unless you do call her George,' said Anne. 'Well, if you really are sure you don't need our help, we'll go out with the boys.'

So out they went, George really looking far more like a boy than a girl, with her grey shorts and shirt and her short, curly hair and freckled face. She put her hands in her pockets and tried to walk like Dick!

Dick soon found his puncture and mended it. Mr. Penruthlan came by with some straw for his cow and new calf. The boys watched him in awe, for he was carrying almost a wagon load of straw tied up in bales! What strength he had! He nodded to them and passed without a word.

'Why doesn't he talk?' wondered Dick. 'I suppose all his seven children take after their talkative mother, and he never had a chance to get a word in. And it's too late now, he's forgotten how to!'

They laughed. 'What a giant of a man,' said Julian. 'I hope I grow as big as that.'

'I don't. I'd hate to have my bare feet poking out of the bottom of the bed every night,' said Dick.

'There. I've finished that puncture. See the nail that made it? I must have run over it on the way to the station this morning.'

'Do look at Timmy,' said Julian. 'He's having the time of his life with those farm dogs, acting just like a puppy!

So he was, bounding here and there, rushing round the dogs and then rushing away, jumping on first one and then another, till they all went down in an excited, yapping scum, the little Scottie doing his best to keep up with everything!

'Timmy's going to have a good time here,' said Dick. 'And he'll soon lose his beautiful waist-line if he eats as well as we do!'

'We'll take him on long bike rides,' said Julian. 'He can't grow much tummy if he runs for miles!'

The girls came up just then. A few feet behind trotted a queer little boy, bare-footed, shock-headed and very dirty.

'Who's this?' said Dick.

'I don't know,' said George. 'He suddenly appeared behind us and has been following us ever since. He just won't go away!'

The boy wore a ragged pair of pants and a shirt with no sleeves or buttons. He was black-eyed and burnt dark-brown by the sun. He stood a few feet away and stared.

'Who are you?' said Dick. The boy went back a few steps in fright. He shook his head.

'I said, who are you?' said Dick again. 'Or, if you prefer it another way, what's your name?'

'Yan,' said the boy.

'Yan?' said Dick. 'That's a queer name.'

'He probably means Jan,' said George.

The boy nodded. 'Iss. Yan,' he said.

'I suppose "Iss" means "Yes",' said Anne. 'All right, Jan. You can go now.'

'I stay,' said the boy solemnly. 'Iss.'

And stay he did, following them about everywhere, gazing at all they did with the utmost curiosity, as if he had never in his life seen children before!

'He's like a mosquito,' said Dick. 'Always buzzing around. I'm getting tired of it. Hey, Yan!'

'Iss?'

'Clear out now! Understand? Get away, go, run off, vamoose, bunk, scoot!' explained Dick sternly. Yan stared.

Mrs. Penruthlan came out and heard all this. 'Jan bothering you?' she said. 'He's as full of curiosity as a cat. Go home, Jan. Take this to your old Grandad. And here's some for you.'

Jan came up eagerly and took the packet of food Mrs. Penruthlan held out to him, and the slice of cake. He ran off without a word, his bare feet making no sound.

'Who is he?' asked George. 'What a little scarecrow!'

'He's a poor little thing,' said the farmer's wife. 'He's got no kith or kin except for his old great-grand-dad, and there's more than eighty years between them! The old man is our shepherd. Do you see that hill over there, well, he's got a hut on the other side, and there he lives, winter and summer alike, and that child with him.'

'Surely he ought to go to school?' said Julian. 'Perhaps he does?'

'No,' said Mrs. Penruthlan. 'He plays truant nearly all the time. You ought to go and talk to his old great-grandad. His father was one of the Wreckers on this coast, and he can tell you some strange stories about those dreadful days.'

'We'll certainly go and talk to him,' said Dick. 'I'd forgotten that this Cornish coast was the haunt of Wreckers. They shone false lights to bring ships in close to shore, so that they would be smashed to pieces on the rocks, didn't they?'

'Yes, and then they robbed the poor, groaning ship when she was helpless,' said Mrs. Penruthlan.

'And it's said they paid no heed to the drowning folk, either. Those were wicked days.'

'How far is it to cycle to the sea?' said George. 'I can see it from my bedroom window.'

'Oh, it won't take you more than ten minutes,' said the farmer's wife. 'Go tomorrow, if you like. You all look very tired now. Why don't you take a short walk and go to bed? I'll have a snack ready for you when you come in.'

'Oh, we couldn't possibly eat any more tonight, thank you,' said Dick, hurriedly. 'But the walk is quite a good idea. We'd like to see round the farm.'

Mrs. Penruthlan left them, and Dick looked round at the others. 'A snack!' he said. 'I never thought I'd groan at the thought. But I bet Mr. Penruthlan will want a jolly good snack when he comes in. Come on, let's go up by those sheds.'

They went off together, Timmy following behind with his four friends, their tails wagging amiably. It was still a lovely evening, and a cool breeze came down from the hills, making it lovelier still. The children wandered round, enjoying the familiar farm sights, the ducks on the pond, a few hens still clucking round, the grey sheep dotting the hills. Cows were peacefully grazing and an old farm horse came to a gate to stare at them.

They rubbed his velvety nose, and he bent down to sniff at Timmy, whom he didn't know. Timmy sniffed solemnly back.

They went into the barns and looked around, big, dark, sweet-smelling places, stored with many things. Dick was sure that the biggest one would be the one used by the Barnies. What fun!

'I bet they'll be pretty awful, but good fun, all the same,' he said. 'It must be grand to wander round the countryside with all your belongings done up in a parcel or two, and then amaze the country people with your songs and dances and acting. I wouldn't mind trying it myself! I'm pretty good at a spot of conjuring, for instance!'

'Yes, you are,' said Anne. 'Wouldn't it be fun if we could give a little show too, if the Barnies would let us join them just for one evening?'

'We wouldn't be allowed to because we're "furriners",' said Dick, grinning. 'I say, what's that, over there, behind that sack?'

Timmy at once went to see, and stood there barking. The others went over to look.

'It's that kid Yan again,' said Julian, in disgust. He pulled the boy out from his hiding-place.

'What are you following us around for, you little idiot?' he demanded. 'We don't like it. See? Go and find your old Grandad before you eat all the food Mrs. Penruthlan gave you. Go on, now.'

He pushed the boy out of the barn, and watched him go into the next field. 'That's got rid of him,' he said. 'I think he's a bit simple. We'll go and see that Grandad of his one day and see if he really has got anything interesting to say about the old Wreckers.'

'Let's go back now,' said Dick, yawning. 'I've seen enough of this place to know. I'm going to like it a lot. I'm going to like my bed tonight too. Coming, Ju?'

They all felt the same as Dick. His yawn had set them yawning, too, and they thought longingly of bed. They made their way back to the farm, followed closely by Timmy at their heels, and the other four dogs a respectful distance away.

They said good night to the two Penruthlans, who were sitting peacefully listening to their radio. Mrs. Penruthlan wanted to come up with them but they wouldn't let her.

They said good night to the farmer, who grunted 'Ah!' without even looking at them, and went on listening to the radio programme. Then up the stairs they went, and into their rooms.

When Julian was in bed and almost asleep he heard a scrabbling noise outside his window. He half-opened his eyes, and listened. He hoped it wasn't rats! If it was, Anne would probably hear them too, and be scared, and Timmy would hear them and bark the place down!

The scrabbling noise came again. Julian spoke softly to Dick. 'Dick! Are you awake? Did you hear that noise at the window?'

No answer. Dick was sound asleep, dreaming that he had a puncture in his foot and couldn't walk till it was mended! Julian lay and listened. Yes, there it was again, and now surely there was someone trying to peep in at the tiny window?

He slid out of bed and went to the side of the window. Thick ivy grew outside. Somebody was still there for Julian could see the leaves shaking.

He put his head suddenly out of the window, and a scared face, quite close to his, stared in fright. 'Yan! What do you think you're doing?' said Julian, fiercely. 'I'll spank you if you go on like this, staring and peeping! What's so queer about us?'

Yan was terrified. He suddenly slithered down the ivy like a cat, landed with a slight thud on the ground and then ran off into the twilight at top speed.

'I hope he's not going to follow us around all the time,' thought Julian, getting into bed again. 'I'll teach him a lesson if he does. Blow him! Now he's made me wide awake!'

But it wasn't long before Julian was sleeping as soundly as Dick. Neither of them stirred until a cock outside their window decided that it was time the whole world woke up, and crowed at the top of his voice.

'Cock-a-doodle-DOO!'

The boys woke with a jump. The early sun streamed into the room, and Julian glanced at his watch. How early it was! And yet he could hear movements downstairs that told him Mrs. Penruthlan was up and about, and so was her giant of a husband.

He fell asleep again, and was awakened by a loud knock at his door, and Mrs. Penruthlan's voice. 'It's half past seven, and breakfast will be on the table for you at eight. Wake up!'

How lovely to wake in a strange place at the beginning of a holiday, to think of bathing and biking and picnicking and eating and drinking, forgetting all about exams and rules and punishments! The four children and Timmy stretched themselves and stared at the sunshine outside. What a day!

Downstairs breakfast awaited them. 'Super!' said Dick, eyeing the bacon and fried eggs, the cold ham, and the home-made jam and marmalade. 'Mrs. Penruthlan, your seven children must have been very sorry to marry and leave home. I feel, if I'd been one of them, I'd have stayed with you for the rest of my life!'

Chapter 4

DOWN IN THE COVE

The first three days at Tremannon Farm were lazy, uneventful days, full of sunshine, good food, dogs - and of little Yan.

He really was a perfect nuisance. The four children seemed to have a real fascination for him, and he trailed them everywhere, following them bare-footed. He turned up behind hedges, along lanes, at their picnicking places, his dark eyes watching them intently.

'What's the good of telling him to go?' groaned Julian. 'He disappears behind one hedge and appears out of another. You'd think he'd get bored, doing this shadowing business all the time. What's the point of it, anyway?'

'No point,' said George. 'Just curiosity. What I can't understand is why Timmy puts up with him. You'd think he'd bark or growl or something, but he's quite silly with Yan, lets him play with him, and roll him over as if he was a mad puppy.'

'Well, I'm going to find this Great-Grandad of his tomorrow, and tell him to keep Yan with him,' said Julian. 'He's maddening. I feel I want to swot him like a gnat, always buzzing round us. Gosh, there he is again!'

So he was. A pair of dark eyes were gazing round a tree-trunk, half hidden by a sheaf of leaves. Timmy bounded up to him in glee, and made such a fuss of Yan that George was quite disgusted.

'Timmy! Come here!' she called, imperiously. 'Don't you understand that you ought to chase Yan away when he comes and not encourage him? I'm ashamed of you!'

Timmy put his tail down and went to her. He sat down beside her with a bump. Dick laughed.

'He's sulking! He won't look at you, George! He's turning his head away on purpose!'

Julian chased Yan away, threatening him with all sorts of things if he caught him, but the boy was as fast as a hare, and seemed suddenly to disappear into thin air. He had a wonderful way of vanishing, and an equally remarkable way of appearing again.

'I don't like that kid,' said Julian. 'He makes me shiver down my back whenever I see him suddenly peeping somewhere.'

'He can't be a bad kid, though, because Timmy likes him so much,' said Anne, who had great faith in Timmy's judgment. 'Timmy never likes anyone horrid.'

'Well, he's made a mistake this time, then,' said George, who was cross with Timmy. 'He's being very stupid. I'm not pleased with you, Timmy!'

'Let's go down to the sea and bathe,' said Dick. 'We'll go on our bikes and Yan won't be able to pop up and watch us there.'

They took their bicycles and rode off to the coast. Mrs. Penruthlan made them sandwiches and gave them fruit cake and drinks to take with them. They saw Yan watching them from behind a hedge as they went.

They took the road to the sea. It was no more than a narrow lane, and wound about like a stream, twisting and turning so that they couldn't get up any speed at all.

'Look - the sea!' cried Dick, as they rounded one last bend. The lane had run down between two high, rocky cliffs, and in front of them was a cove into which raced enormous breakers, throwing spray high into the air.

They left their bicycles at the top of the cove, and went behind some big rocks to change into bathing things. When they came out, Julian looked at the sea. It was calm beyond the rocks, but over these the waters raged fiercely and it was impossible to venture in.

They walked a little way round the cliffs, and came to a great pool lying in a rocky hollow. 'Just the thing!' cried George and plunged in. 'Gosh, it's cold!'

It should have been hot from the sun, but every now and again an extra large wave broke right into the pool itself, bringing in cooler water. It was fun when that happened. The four of them swam to their hearts' content, and Timmy had a fine time too.

They picnicked on the rocks, with spray flying round them, and then went to explore round the foot of the cliffs.

'This is exciting,' said George. 'Caves, and more caves, and yet more caves! And cove after cove, all as lovely as the one before. I suppose when the tide's in, all these coves are shoulder-high in water.'

'My word, yes,' said Julian, who was keeping a very sharp eye indeed on the tide. 'And a good many of these caves would be flooded too. No wonder Mrs. Penruthlan warned us so solemnly about the tides here! I wouldn't want to try and climb up these cliffs if we were caught!'

Anne looked up and shivered. They were so very steep and high. They frowned down at her as if to say 'We stand no nonsense from anyone! So look after yourself!'

'Well, I'm blessed! Look there, isn't that that tiresome little wretch of a Yan?' said Dick, suddenly. He pointed to a rock covered with seaweed. Peeping from behind it was Yan!

'He must have run all the way here, and found us,' said Julian, in disgust. 'Well, we'll leave him here. It's time we went. The tide's coming in. It'll serve him right to find us gone as soon as he arrives. He must be mad!'

'Do you think he knows about the tide?' said Anne, looking worried. 'I mean, knows that it's coming in and might catch him?'

'Of course he knows!' said Julian. 'Don't be silly. But we'll wait and have our tea at the top part of the cove, if you like. That's the only way back, if he wants to escape the tide, short of climbing the cliff, which no one would be mad enough to try!'

They had put aside some cake and biscuits for their tea, and they found a good picnicking place at the top of the cove where they had left their bicycles. They settled down to munch the solid fruit cake that Mrs. Penruthlan had given them. There was no doubt about it, she was a wonderful cook!

The tide swept in at a great rate, and soon the noise of enormous waves pounding on the rocks grew louder. 'Yan hasn't appeared yet,' said Anne. 'Do you think he's all right?'

'He must be having a good old wetting if he's still there,' said Dick. 'I think we'd better go and see. Much as I dislike him I don't want him to be drowned.'

The two boys went down the cove as far as they could, peering round the cliff to where they had seen Yan hiding. But how different it all looked now!

'Gosh, the beach is gone already!' said Julian, startled. 'I can see how easily anyone could get caught by the tide now, see that last wave, it swept right into that cave we explored!'

'What's happened to Yan?' said Dick. 'He's nowhere to be seen. He didn't come out of the cove; we've been sitting there all the time. Where is he?'

Dick spoke urgently, and Julian began to feel scared too. He hesitated. Should they wade over the rocks a little way? The next wave decided him. It would be folly to do any such thing! Another wave like that and both he and Dick would be flung off the rock they were standing on!

'Look out, here comes an even bigger one!' yelled Julian, and the two boys leapt off their rock and raced back up the cove. Even so, the wave lapped right up to their feet.

They went back to the girls. 'Can't see him anywhere,' said Julian, speaking more cheerfully than he felt. 'The whole beach is covered with the tide now, more than covered. The lower caves are full too.'

'He - he won't be drowned, will he?' said Anne, fearfully.

'Oh, I expect he can look after himself,' said Julian. 'He's used to this coast. Come on, it's time we went.'

They all rode off, Timmy running beside their bicycles. Nobody said anything. They couldn't help feeling worried about Yan. Whatever could have happened to him?

They arrived at the farm and put their bicycles away. They went in to find Mrs. Penruthlan. They told her about Yan, and how he had disappeared.

'You don't think he might have been swept off his feet and drowned, do you?' asked Anne.

Mrs. Penruthlan laughed. 'Good gracious, no! That boy knows his way about the countryside and the seashore blindfold. He's cleverer than you think. He never misses anything! He's a poor little thing, but he looks after himself all right!'

This was rather comforting. Perhaps Yan would turn up again, with his dark eyes fixed unblinkingly on them!

After a high-tea as good as any they had had, they went for a walk down the honeysuckle-scented lanes, accompanied as usual by the five dogs. They sat on a stile, and Dick handed round some barley-sugar.

'Look!' said George suddenly. 'Do you see what I see? Look!' She nodded her head towards an oak tree in the hedge, not far off. The others stared up into it.

Two dark eyes stared back. Yan! He had followed them as usual, and had hidden himself to watch them. Anne was so tremendously relieved to see him that she called to him in delight.

'Oh, Yan! Have a barley-sugar?'

Yan slithered down the tree at top speed and came up. He held out his hand for the barley-sugar. For the first time he smiled, and his dirty, sullen face lighted up enchantingly. Anne stared at him. Why, he was a dear little fellow! His eyes shone and twinkled, and a dimple came in each cheek.

'Here you are, here's a couple more sweets for you,' Dick said, very glad to see that the small boy hadn't been drowned. Yan almost snatched them from him! It was plain that he very, very seldom had any sweets! Timmy was making a fuss of him as usual. He lay down on his back and rolled over Yan's feet. He licked his bare knees and arms, and jumped up at him, almost knocking the boy down. Yan laughed, and fell on Timmy, rolling over and over with him. Julian, Dick and Anne watched and laughed.

But George was not pleased. Timmy was her dog, and she didn't like him to make a fuss of anyone she disapproved of. She was glad that Yan was safe but she still didn't like him! So she scowled, and Julian nudged Dick to make him see the scowl. George saw him and scowled worse than ever.

'You'll be sorry you gave him sweets,' she said. 'He'll be round us worse than ever now.'

Yan came up after a minute or two, sucking all three sweets at once, so that his right cheek was very swollen indeed.

'Come, see my Grandad,' he said, earnestly, talking even worse than usual because of the sweets. 'I tell him 'bout you all. He tell you many things.'

He stared at them all seriously. 'Grandad likes sweets too,' he added, solemnly. 'Iss. Iss, he do.'

Julian laughed. 'All right. We'll come and see him tomorrow afternoon. Now you clear off or you won't get any more sweets. Understand?'

'Iss,' said Yan, nodding his head. He took the three sweets out of his mouth, looked at them to see how much he had sucked them, and then put them back again.

'Clear off now,' said Julian again. 'But wait a bit, I've just thought; how did you get away from that beach this afternoon? Did you climb that cliff?'

'No,' said Yan, shifting his sweets to the other cheek. 'I came the Wreckers' Way. My Grandad learnt it me.'

He was off and away before anyone could ask him another question. The four looked at one another. 'Did you hear that?' said Julian. 'He went the Wreckers' Way. What's that, do you suppose? We must have been on one of the beaches the wreckers used long, long ago.'

'Yes. But how did he get off that beach, and away into safety?' said Dick. 'I'd like to know more about the Wreckers' Way! I certainly think we'd better pay a visit to old Great-Grandad tomorrow. He might have some very interesting things to tell us.'

'Well, we'll go and see him,' said George, getting up. 'But just you remember what I said. Yan will pester us more than ever now we've encouraged him.'

'Oh well, he doesn't seem such a bad kid after all,' said Dick, remembering that sudden smile and the eager acceptance of a few sweets. 'And if he persuades Grandad to let us into the secret of Wreckers' Way, we might have some fun doing a bit of exploring. Don't you think so, Ju?'

'It might even lead to an adventure,' said Julian, laughing at Anne's serious face. 'Cheer up, Anne. I can't even smell an adventure in Tremannon. I'm just pulling your leg!'

'I think you're wrong,' said Anne. 'If you can't smell one somewhere, I can. I don't want to, but I can!'

Chapter 5

YAN - AND HIS GRANDAD

The next day was Sunday. It made no difference to the time that the two Penruthlans got up, however. As Mrs. Penruthlan said, the cows and horses, hens and ducks didn't approve of late Sunday breakfasts! They wanted attending to at exactly the same time each day!

'Will you be going to church?' asked Mrs. Penruthlan. 'It's a beautiful walk across the fields to Tremannon Church, and you'd like Parson. He's a good man, he is.'

'Yes, we're all going,' said Julian. 'We can tie Timmy up outside. He's used to that. And we thought we'd go up and see your old shepherd this afternoon, Mrs. Penruthlan, and see what tales he has to tell.'

'Yan will show you the way,' said the farmer's wife, bustling off to her cooking. 'I'll get you a fine Sunday dinner. Do you like fresh fruit salad with cream?'

'Rather!' said everyone at once.

'Can't we help you to do something?' said Anne. 'I've just seen all the peas you're going to shell. Piles of them! And don't you want help with those red currant? I love getting the currants off their stalks with a fork!'

'Well, you'll have a few odd minutes before you go to church, I expect,' said Mrs. Penruthlan, looking pleased. 'It would be a bit of help today. But the boys needn't help.'

'I like that!' said George, indignantly. 'How unfair! Why shouldn't they, just because they're boys?'

'Don't fly off the handle, George,' grinned Dick. 'We're going to help, don't worry. We like podding peas too! You're not going to have all the treats!'

Dick had a very neat way of turning the tables on George when he saw her flying into a tantrum. She smiled unwillingly. She was always jealous of the boys because she so badly wanted to be one herself, and wasn't! She hitched up her shorts, and went to get a pan of peas to shell.

Soon the noise of the popping of pods was to be heard, a very pleasant noise, Anne thought. The four of them sat on the big kitchen step, out in the sun, with Timmy sitting beside them, watching with interest. He didn't stay with them long though.

Up came his four friends, the little Scottie trotting valiantly behind, trying to keep up with the longer legs of the others. 'Woof!' said the biggest collie. Timmy wagged his tail politely, but didn't stir.

'Woof!' said the collie again, and pranced around invitingly.

'Timmy! He says "Will you come and play?" ' said George. 'Aren't you going? You aren't the least help with shelling peas, and you keep breathing down my neck.'

Timmy gave George a flying lick and leapt off the step joyfully. He pounced on the Scottie, rolled him over, and then took on all three collies at once. They were big, strong dogs, but no match for Timmy!

'Look at him,' said George, proudly. 'He can manage the whole lot single-handed.'

'Single-footed!' said Dick. 'He's faster than even that biggest collie and stronger than the whole lot. Good old Tim. He's come in jolly useful in some of our adventures!'

'I've no doubt he will again,' said Julian. 'I'd rather have one Timmy than two police-dogs.'

'I should think his ears are burning, the way we're talking about him!' said Anne. 'Oh, sorry, Dick, that pod popped unexpectedly!'

'That's the second lot of peas you've shot all over me,' said Dick, scrabbling inside his shirt. 'I must just find one that went down my neck, or I shall be fidgeting all through church.'

'You always do,' said Anne. 'Look - isn't that Yan?'

It was! He came sidling up, looking as dirty as ever, and gave them a quick smile that once more entirely changed his sullen little face. He held out his hand, palm upwards, and said something.

'What's he saying?' said Dick. 'Oh, he's asking for a sweet.'

'Don't give him one,' said Julian, quickly. 'Don't turn him into a little beggar. Make him work for a sweet this time. Yan, if you want a sweet, you can help pod these peas.'

Mrs. Penruthlan appeared at once. 'But see he washes those filthy hands first,' she commanded, and disappeared again. Yan looked at his hands, then put them under his arm-pits.

'Go and wash them,' said Julian. But Yan shook his head, and sat down a little way away from them.

'All right. Don't wash your hands. Don't shell the peas. Don't have a sweet,' said George.

Yan scowled at George. He didn't seem to like her any more than she liked him. He waited till someone split a pod, and a few peas shot out on to the ground instead of into the dish. Then he darted at them, picked them up and ate them. He was as quick as a cat.

'My Grandad says come see him,' announced Yan. 'I take you.'

'Right,' said Julian. 'We'll come this afternoon. We'll get Mrs. Penruthlan to pack us up a basket, and we'll have tea in the hills. You can share it if you wash your hands and face.'

'I shouldn't think he's ever washed himself in his life,' said George. 'Oh, here's Timmy come back. I will not have him fawn round that dirty little boy. Here, Timmy!'

But Timmy darted to Yan with the greatest delight and pawed at him to come and have a game. They began to roll over and over like two puppies.

'If you're going to church, you'd better get ready,' said Mrs. Penruthlan, appearing again, this time with arms floured up to the elbow. 'My, what a lot of peas you've done for me!'

'I wish I had time to do the red currants,' said Anne. 'We've practically finished the peas, anyway, Mrs. Penruthlan. We've done thousands, I should think!'

'Ah, Mr. Penruthlan is real fond of peas,' said the farmer's wife. 'He can eat a whole tureen at one sitting.'

She disappeared again. The children went to get ready for church, and then off they went. It certainly was a lovely walk over the fields, with honeysuckle trailing everywhere!

The church was small and old and lovely. Yan went with them, trailing behind, right to the church door. When he saw George tying Timmy up to a railing, he sat down beside him and looked pleased. George didn't look pleased, however. Now Timmy and Yan would play about together all the time she was in church! How annoying!

The church was cool and dark, except for three lovely stained-glass windows through which the sun poured, its brilliance dimmed by the colours of the glass. 'Parson' was as nice as Mrs. Penruthlan had said, a simple, friendly person whose words were listened to by everyone, from an old, old woman bent almost double in a corner to a solemn-eyed five year old clutching her mother's hand.

It was dazzling to come out into the sun again from the cool dimness of the church. Timmy barked a welcome. Yan was still there, sitting with his arm round Timmy's neck. He gave them his sudden smile, and untied Timmy, who promptly went mad and tore out of the churchyard at sixty miles an hour. He always did that when he had been tied up.

'You come see Grandad,' said Yan to Dick, and pulled at his arm.

'This afternoon,' said Dick. 'You can show us the way. Come after dinner.'

So, after the children had had a dinner of cold boiled beef and carrots, with a dumpling each, and 'lashings' of peas and new potatoes, followed by a truly magnificent fruit salad and cream, Yan appeared at the door to take them to his Grandad.

'Did you see the amount of peas that Mr. Penruthlan got through?' said Anne, in awe. 'I should think he really did manage a tureen all to himself. I wish he'd say something beside 'Ah' and 'Ock' and the other peculiar sounds he makes. Conversation is awfully difficult with him.'

'Is Yan taking you up to Grandad?' called Mrs. Penruthlan. 'I'll put a few cakes in the basket for him, too, then, and for Grandad.'

'Don't put us up a big tea,' begged Dick. 'We only want a snack, just to keep us going till high-tea.'

But all the same the basket was quite heavy when Mrs. Penruthlan had finished packing it!

It was a long walk over the fields to the shepherd's hut. Yan led the way proudly. They crossed the fields, and climbed stiles, walked up narrow cart-paths, and at last came to a cone-shaped hill on which sheep grazed peacefully. Half-grown lambs, wearing their woolly coats, unlike the shorn sheep, gambolled here and there - then remembered that they were nearly grown up, and walked sedately.

The old shepherd was sitting outside his hut, smoking a clay pipe. He wasn't very big, and he seemed shrivelled up, like an apple stored too long. But there was still sweetness in him, and the children liked him at once. He had Yan's sudden smile, that lighted up eyes that were still as blue as the summer sky above them.

His face had a thousand wrinkles that creased and ran into one another when he smiled. His shaggy eye-brows, curly beard and hair were all grey, as grey as the woolly coats of the sheep he had lived with all his life.

'You be welcome,' he said, in his slow Cornish voice. 'Yan here have told me about you.'

'We've brought our tea to share with you,' said Dick. 'We'll have it later on. Is it true that your father was one of the Wreckers in the old days?'

The old fellow nodded his head. Julian got out a bag of boiled sweets, and offered them to the old man. He took one eagerly. Yan edged up at once and was given one too.

Judging by the crunching that went on old Grandad still had plenty of teeth! When the sweet had gone, he began to talk. He talked slowly and simply, almost as Yan might have done, and sometimes paused to find a word he wanted.

Living with sheep all his life doesn't make for easy talking, thought Julian, interested in this old man with the wise, keen eyes. He must be much more at home with sheep than with human beings.

Grandad certainly had some interesting things to tell them, dreadful things, Anne thought.

'You've seen them rocks down on Tremannon coast,' began Grandad. 'Wicked rocks they be, hungry for ships and men. There's many a ship been wrecked on purpose! Ay, you can look disbelieving-like, but it's true.'

'How did they get wrecked on purpose?' asked Dick. 'Were they lured here by a false light, or something?'

The old man lowered his voice as if he was afraid of being overheard.

'Way back up the coast, more than a hundred years ago, there was a light set to guide the ships that sail round here,' said Grandad. 'They were to sail towards that light, and then hug the coast and avoid the rocks that stood out to sea. They were safe then. But, on wild nights, a light was set two miles farther down the coast, to bemuse lost ships, and drag them to the rocks round Tremannon coves.'

'How wicked!' said Anne and George together. 'How could men do that?'

'It's fair amazing what men will do,' said Grandad, nodding his head. 'Take my old Dad now - a kind man he was and went to church, so he did, and took me with him. But he was the one that set the false light burning every time, and sent men to watch the ship coming in on the rocks - crashing over them to break into pieces.'

'Did you - did you ever see a ship crashing to its death?' asked Dick, imagining the groaning of the sailing ships, and the groaning of the men flung into the raging sea.

'Ay. I did so,' said Grandad, his eyes taking on a very far-away look. 'I were sent to the cove with the men, and had to hold a lantern to bemuse the ship again when she came to the rocks. Poor thing, she groaned like a live thing, she did, when she ran into them wicked rocks, and split into pieces. And next day I went to the cove to help get the goods that were scattered all around the cove. There were lots drowned that night, and...'

'Don't tell us about that,' said Dick, feeling sick. 'Where did they flash the false light from? From these hills, or from the cliff somewhere?'

'I'll show you where my Dad flashed it from,' said Grandad, and he got up slowly. 'There's only one place on these hills where you could see the light a-flashing. The wreckers had to find somewhere well hidden, so that their wicked light couldn't be seen from inland, or the police would stop it, but it could be seen plainly by any ship on the sea near this coast!'

He took them round his hill, and then pointed towards the coast. Set between two hills there the roof of a house could just be seen, and from it rose a tower. It could only be seen from that one spot! Dick took a few steps to each side of it, and at once the house disappeared behind one or other of the hills on each side of it.

'I were the only one that ever knew the false light could be seen from inland,' said Grandad, pointing with his pipe-stem towards the far-off square tower. 'I were watching lambs one night up here, and I saw the light a-flashing. And I heard there was a ship wrecked down in Tremannon cove that night so I reckoned it were the wreckers at work.'

'Did you often see the light flashing over there, when you watched the sheep?' asked George.

'Oh ay, many a time,' said the shepherd. 'And always on wild, stormy nights, when ships were labouring along, and in trouble, looking for some light to guide them into shore. Then a light would flare out over there, and I'd say to meself "Now may the Good God help those sailors tonight, for it's sure that nobody else will!" '

'How horrible!' said George, quite appalled at such wickedness. 'You must be glad that you never see that false light shining there on stormy nights now!'

Grandad looked at George, and his eyes were scared and strange. He lowered his voice and spoke to George as if she were a boy.

'Little master,' he said, 'that light still flares on dark and stormy nights. The place is a ruin, and jackdaws build in the tower. But three times this year I've seen that light again! Come a stormy night it'll flare again! I know it in my bones, little master, I know it in my bones!'

Chapter 6

A QUEER TALE

The four children shivered suddenly in the hot sun, as they listened to the shepherd's strange words. Were they true? Did the wreckers' light still flash in the old tower on wild and stormy nights? But why should it? Surely no wreckers any longer did their dreadful work on this lonely rocky coast?

Dick voiced the thoughts of the others. 'But surely there are no wrecks on this coast now? Isn't there a good lighthouse farther up, to warn ships to keep right out to sea?'

Grandad nodded his grey head. 'Yes. There's a lighthouse, and there's not been a wreck along this coast for more years than I can remember. But I tell you that light flares up just as it used to do. I seen it with my own eyes, and there's nought wrong with them yet!'

'I seen it too,' put in Yan, suddenly.

Grandad looked at Yan, annoyed. 'You hold your noise, you,' he commanded. 'You've never seen no light. You sleeps like a babe at nights.'

'I seen it,' said Yan, obstinately, and moved out of Grandad's way quickly as the old man raised his hand to cuff the small boy.

Dick changed the subject. 'Grandad, do you know anything about the Wreckers' Way?' he asked. 'Is it a secret way to get down to the coves from inland? Was it used by the wreckers?'

Grandad frowned. 'That be a secret,' he said, shortly. 'My Dad, he showed it to me, and I swore as I never would tell. Us all had to swear and promise that.'

'But Yan here said that you taught the way to him,' said Dick, puzzled.

Yan promptly removed himself from the company and disappeared round a clump of bushes. His old Great-Grandad glared round at the disappearing boy.

'Yan! That boy! He doesn't know anything about the Wreckers' Way. It's lost and forgotten by every man living. I'm the last one left as knows of it. Yan! He's dreaming! Maybe he's heard tell of an old Wreckers' Way, but that's all.'

'Oh!' said Dick, disappointed. He had hoped that Grandad would tell them the old way, and then they could go and explore it. Perhaps they could go and search for it, anyhow! It would be fun to do that.

Julian came back to the question of the light flashing from the old tower by the coast. He was puzzled. 'Who could possibly flash that light?' he said to Grandad. 'You say the place is a ruin. Are you sure it wasn't lightning you saw? You said it came on a wild and stormy night.'

'It weren't lightning,' said the old man shortly. 'I first saw that light near ninety years ago, and I tell you I saw it again three times this year, same place, same light, same weather! And if you telled me it weren't flashed by mortal hands, I'd believe you.'

There was a silence after this extraordinary statement. Anne looked over towards the far-off tower that showed just between the two distant hills. How queer that this spot where they were standing was the only place from which the tower could be seen from inland. The wreckers had been clever to choose a spot like that to flash a light from. No one but old Grandad up on the hills could possibly have seen the light and guessed what was going on, no one but the callous wreckers themselves.

Grandad delved deep into more memories stored in his mind. He poured them out, tales of the old days, queer, unbelievable stories. One was about an old woman who was said to be a witch. The things she did!

The four stared at the old shepherd, marvelling to think they were, in a way, linked with the witches and brownies, the wreckers and the killers of long-ago days, through this old, old man.

Yan appeared again as soon as Julian opened the tea-basket. They had now gone back to the hut, and sat outside in the sunshine, surrounded by nibbling sheep. One or two of the half-grown lambs came up, looking hot in their unshorn woolly coats. They nosed round the old shepherd, and he rubbed their woolly noses.

'These be lambs I fed from a bottle,' he explained. 'They always remember. Go away now, Woolly. Cake's wasted on you.'

Yan wolfed quite half the tea. He gave Anne a quick grin of pure pleasure, showing both his dimples at once. She smiled back. She liked this funny little boy now, and felt sorry for him. She was sure that his old Grandad didn't give him enough to eat!

The church bells began to ring, and the sun was now sliding down the sky. 'We must go,' said Julian, reluctantly. 'It's quite a long walk back. Thanks for a most interesting afternoon, Grandad. I expect you'll be glad to be rid of us now, and smoke your pipe in peace with your sheep around you.'

'Ay, I will,' said Grandad, truthfully. 'I do be one for my own company, and I likes to think my own thoughts. Long thoughts they be, too, going back nigh on a hundred years. If I wants to talk, I talks to my sheep. It's rare and wunnerful how they listen.'

The children laughed, but Grandad was quite solemn, and meant every word he said. They packed up the basket, and said good-bye to the old man.

'Well, what do you think he meant when he talked about the light still flashing in the old tower?' said Dick, as they went over the hills back to the farm. 'What an extraordinary thing to say. Was it true, do you suppose?'

'There's only one way to find out!' said George, her eyes dancing. 'Wait for a wild and stormy night and go and see!'

'But what about our agreement?' said Julian, solemnly. 'If anything exciting seems about to happen we turn our backs on it. That's what we decided. Don't you remember?'

'Pooh!' said George.

'We ought to keep the agreement,' said Anne, doubtfully. She knew quite well that the others didn't think so!

'Look! Who are all these people?' said Dick, suddenly. They were just climbing over a stile to cross a lane to another field.

They sat on the stile and stared. Some carts were going by, open wagons, their canvas tops folded down. They were the most old-fashioned carts the children had ever seen, not in the least like gipsy caravans.

Ten or eleven people were with the wagons, dressed in the clothes of other days! Some rode in the wagons and some walked. Some were middle-aged, some were young, but they all looked cheerful and gay.

The children stared. After Grandad's tales of long ago these old-time folk seemed just right! For a few moments Anne felt herself back in Grandad's time, when he was a boy. He must have seen people dressed like these!

'Who are they?' she said, wonderingly. And then the children saw red lettering painted on the biggest cart:

THE BARNIES

'Oh! It's the Barnies! Don't you remember Mrs. Penruthlan telling us about them?' said Anne. 'The strolling players, who play to the country-folk around, in the barns. What fun!'

The Barnies waved to the watching children. One man, dressed in velvet and lace, with a sword at his side, and a wig of curly hair, threw a leaflet or two to them. They read them with interest.

THE BARNIES ARE COMING!

They will sing, they will dance, they will fiddle.

They will perform plays of all kinds.

Edith Wells, the nightingale singer.

Bonnie Carter, the old-time dancer.

Janie Coster and her fiddle.

John Walters, finest tenor in the world.

Georgie Roth - he'll make you laugh!

And Others.

We also present Clopper, the Funniest Horse in the World!

THE BARNIES ARE COMING!

'This'll be fun!' said George, pleased. She called out to the passing wagons: 'Will you be playing at Tremannon Farm?'

'Oh, yes!' called a man with bright, merry eyes. 'We always play there. You staying there?'

'Yes,' said George. 'We'll look out for you all. Where are you going now?'

'To Poltelly Farm for the night,' called the man. 'We'll be at Tremannon soon.'

The wagons passed, and the gay, queerly-dressed players went out of sight. 'Good,' said Dick.

'Their show may not be first-rate, but it's sure to be funny. They looked a merry lot.'

'All but the man driving the front cart. Did you see him?' said Anne. 'He looked pretty grim, I thought.'

Nobody else had noticed him. 'He was probably the owner of the Barnies,' said Dick. 'And has got all the organization on his shoulders. Well, come on. Where's Timmy?'

They looked round for him, and George frowned. Yan had followed them as usual, and Timmy was playing with him. Bother Yan! Was he going to trail them all day and every day?

They went back to the peaceful farm-house. Hens were still clucking around and ducks were quacking. A horse stamped somewhere near by, and the grunting of pigs came on the air. It all looked quite perfect.

Footsteps came through the farm-yard, and Mr. Penruthlan came by. He grunted at them and went into a barn.

Anne spoke in almost a whisper. 'I can imagine him living in the older days and being a wrecker. I can really!'

'Yes! I know what you mean,' said Dick. 'He's so fierce-looking and determined. What's the word I want? Ruthless! I'm sure he would have made a good wrecker!'

'Do you suppose there are any wreckers now, and that light really is flashed to make ships go on the rocks?' said George.

'Well, I shouldn't have thought there were any wreckers in this country, anyway,' said Dick. 'I can't imagine that such a thing would be tolerated for an instant. But if that light is flashed, what is it flashed for?'

'Old Grandad said there hadn't been any wrecks on this coast for ages,' said Julian. 'I think really that the old man is wandering a bit in his mind about that light!'

'But Yan said he had seen it, too,' said Anne.

'I'm not sure that Yan's as truthful as he might be!' said Julian.

'Why did Grandad say that the light isn't flashed by mortal hands now?' asked George. 'It must be! I can't imagine any other hands working it! He surely doesn't think that his father is still doing it?'

There was a pause. 'We could easily find out if we popped over to that tower and had a look at it,' said Dick.

There was another pause. 'I thought we said we wouldn't go poking about in anything mysterious,' said Anne.

'This isn't really mysterious,' argued Dick. 'It's just a story an old man remembers, and I really can't believe that that light still flashes on a wild stormy night. Grandad must have seen lightning or something. Why don't we settle the matter for good and all and go and explore the old house with the tower?'

'I should like to,' said George firmly. 'I never was keen on this "Keep away from anything unusual" idea we suddenly had. We've got Timmy with us - we can't possibly come to any harm!'

'All right,' said Anne, with a sigh. 'I give up. We'll go if you want to.'

'Good old Anne,' said Dick, giving her a friendly slap on the back. 'But you needn't come, you know. Why don't you stay behind and hear our story when we come back?'

'Certainly not,' said Anne, quite cross. 'I may not want to go as much as you do, but I'm not going to be left out of anything, so don't think it!'

'All right. It's settled then,' said Julian. 'We take our opportunity and go as soon as we can, Tomorrow, perhaps.'

Mrs. Penruthlan came to the door and called them. 'Your high tea is ready. You must be hungry. Come along indoors.'

The sun suddenly went in. Julian looked up at the sky in surprise. 'My word, look at those black clouds!' he said. 'There's a storm coming! Well, I thought there might be, it's been so terribly hot all day!'

'A storm!' said George. 'That light flashes on wild and stormy nights! Oh, Julian, do you think it will flash tonight? Can't we - can't we go and see?'

Chapter 7

OUT IN THE NIGHT

Before the children had finished their high tea, the big kitchen-sitting-room was quite dark. Thunder clouds had moved up from the west, gathering together silently, frowning and sinister. Then, from far off, came the first rumble of thunder.

The little Scottie came and cowered against Mrs. Penruthlan's skirts. He hated storms. The farmer's wife comforted him, and her big husband gave a little unexpected snort of laughter. He said something that sounded like 'oose'.

'He's not as timid as a mouse,' said his wife, who was really marvellous at interpreting her husband's peculiar noises. 'He just doesn't like the thunder. He never did. He can sleep with us in our room tonight.'

There were a few more sounds from Mr. Penruthlan to which his wife listened anxiously. 'Very well, if you have to get up and see to Jenny the horse in the night, I'll see Benny doesn't bark the house down,' she said. She turned to the children. 'Don't worry if you hear him barking,' she said. 'It will only be Mr. Penruthlan stirring.'

The thunder crashed and rumbled again, this time a little nearer, and then lightning flashed. Then down came the rain. How it poured! It rattled and clattered on the roof in enormous drops, and then settled down into a steady downpour.

The four children got out their cards and played games by the light of the oil lamp. There was no electricity at Tremannon. Timmy sat with his head on George's knee. He didn't mind the thunder but he didn't particularly like it.

'Well, I think we'd better go to bed,' said Julian at last. He knew that the Penruthlans liked to go to bed early because they got up so early, and as they did not go upstairs until after the children did, Julian saw to it that they, too, went early.

They said good night and went up to their bare little rooms. The windows were still open and the small curtains drawn back, so that the hills, lit now and again by lightning, showed up clearly. The children went and stood there, watching. They all loved a storm, especially Dick. There was something powerful and most majestic about this kind of storm, sweeping over hills and sea, rumbling all round, and tearing the sky in half with flashes of lightning.

'Julian, is it possible to go up to that place the shepherd showed us and see if the light flashes tonight?' said George. 'You only laughed when I asked you before.'

'Well, I laugh again!' said Julian. 'Of course not! We'd be drenched, and I don't fancy being out in this lightning on those exposed hills, either.'

'All right,' said George. 'Anyway, I don't feel quite such an urge to go now that it's so pitch dark.'

'Just as well,' said Julian. 'Come on, Dick, let's go to bed.'

The storm went on for some time, rumbling all round the hills again, as if it were going round in a circle. The girls fell asleep, but the boys tossed about, feeling hot and sticky.

'Dick,' said Julian, suddenly, 'let's get up and go out. It's stopped raining. Let's go and see if that light is flashing tonight. It should be just the night for it, according to old Grandad.'

'Right,' said Dick, and sat up, feeling for his clothes. 'I simply can't go to sleep, even though I felt really sleepy when I undressed.'

They pulled on as few clothes as possible, for the night was still thundery and hot. Julian took his torch and Dick hunted for his.

'Got it,' he said at last. 'Are you ready? Come on, then. Let's tiptoe past the Penruthlans' door, or we may wake that dog Scottie! He's sleeping there tonight, don't forget.'

They tiptoed along the passage, past the Penruthlans' door and down the stairs. One stair creaked rather alarmingly, and they stopped in dismay, wondering if Ben the Scottie would break out into a storm of barking.

But he didn't. Good! Down they went again, switching on their torches to see the way. They came to the bottom of the stairs. 'Shall we go out by the front door or back door, Ju?' whispered Dick.

'Back,' said Julian. 'The front door's so heavy to open. Come on.'

So they went down the passage to the back door that led out from the kitchen. It was locked and bolted, but the two boys opened it without too much noise.

They stepped out into the night. The rain had now stopped, but the sky was still dark and overclouded. The thunder rumbled away in the distance. A wind had got up and blew coolly against the boys' faces.

'Nice cool breeze,' whispered Dick. 'Now - do we go through the farm-yard? Is that the shortest way to the stile we have to climb over into that first field?'

'Yes, I think so,' said Julian. They made their way across the silent farm-yard, where, in the daytime, such a lot of noise went on, clucking, quacking, grunting, clip-clopping, and shouting!

Now it was dark and deserted. They passed the barns and the stables. A little 'hrrrrrumphing' came from one of the stables. 'That's Jenny, the horse that's not well,' said Julian, stopping. 'Let's just have a look at her and see if she's all right. She was lying down feeling very sorry for herself when I saw her last.'

They flashed their torch over the top half of the stable door, which was pulled back to let in air. They looked in with interest.

Jenny was no longer lying down. She was standing up, munching something. Goodness, she must be quite all right again! She whinnied to the two boys.

They left her and went on. They came to the stile and climbed over. The rain began drizzling again, and if the boys had not had their torches with them they would not have been able to see a step in front of them, it was so dark.

'I say, Ju - did you hear that?' said Dick, stopping suddenly.

'No. What?' said Julian, listening.

'Well, it sounded like a cough,' said Dick.

'One of the sheep,' suggested Julian. 'I heard one old sheep coughing just like Uncle Quentin does sometimes, sort of hollow and mournful.'

'No. It wasn't a sheep,' said Dick. 'Anyway, there aren't any in this field.'

'You imagined it,' said Julian. 'I bet there's nobody idiotic enough to be out on a night like this, except ourselves!'

They went on cautiously over the field. The thunder began again, a little nearer. Then came a flash, and again the thunder. Dick stopped dead once more and clutched Julian's arm.

'There's somebody a good way in front of us, the lightning just lighted him up for half a second. He was climbing over that stile, the one we're making for. Who do you suppose it is on a night like this?'

'He's apparently going the same way that we are,' said Julian. 'Well, I suppose if we saw him he's quite likely to have seen us!'

'Not unless he was looking backwards,' said Dick. 'Come on, let's see where he's going.'

They went on cautiously towards the stile. They came to it and climbed over. And then a hand suddenly clutched hold of Dick's shoulder!

He jumped almost out of his skin! The hand gripped him so hard and so fiercely that Dick shouted in pain and tried to wriggle away from the powerful grip.

Julian felt a hand lunge at him, too, but dodged and pressed himself into the hedge. He switched off his torch at once and stood quite still, his heart thumping quickly.

'Let me go!' shouted Dick, wriggling like an eel. His shirt was almost torn off his back in his struggles. He kicked out at the man's ankles and for one moment his captor loosened his grasp. That was enough for Dick. He ripped himself away and left his shirt in the man's hand!

He ran up the lane into which the stile had led and flung himself under a bush in the darkness, panting. He heard his captor coming along, muttering, and Dick pressed himself farther into the bush. A torchlight swept the ground near him, but missed him.

Dick waited till the footsteps had gone and then crawled out. He went quietly down the lane. 'Julian!' he whispered, and jumped as a voice answered almost in his ear, just above his head!

'I'm here. Are you all right?'

Dick looked up into the darkness of a tree, but could see nothing. 'I've dropped my torch somewhere,' he said. 'Where are you, Ju? Up in the tree?'

A hand groped out and felt his head. 'Here I am, on the first branch,' said Julian. 'I hid in the hedge first and then climbed up here. I daren't put on my torch in case that fellow's anywhere around and sees it.'

'He's gone up the lane,' said Dick. 'My word, he nearly wrenched my shoulder off. Half my shirt's gone! Who was he? Did you see?'

'No, I didn't,' said Julian, clambering down. 'Let's find your torch before we go home. It's too good to lose. It must be by that stile.'

They went to look. Julian still didn't like to put on his torch, so that it was more a question of feeling for Dick's torch, not looking! Dick suddenly trod on it and picked it up thankfully.

'Listen, there's that fellow coming back again, I'm sure!' said Dick. 'I heard the same dry little cough! What shall we do?'

'Well, I don't now feel like going up to the shepherd's hill to see if that light is flashing from the tower,' said Julian. 'I vote we hide and follow this chap to see where he goes. I don't think anyone who is wandering out tonight can be up to any good.'

'Yes. Good idea,' said Dick. 'Squash into the hedge again. Blow, there are nettles here! Just my luck.'

The footsteps came nearer, and the cough came again. 'I seem to know that cough,' whispered Dick.

'Sh!' said Julian.

The man came up to the stile, and they heard him climbing over it. After a short time both boys followed cautiously. They couldn't hear the man's footsteps across the grass, but the sky had cleared a little and they could just make out a moving shadow ahead of them.

They followed him at a distance, holding their breath whenever they kicked against a stone or cracked a twig beneath their feet. Now and again they heard the cough.

'He's making for the farm,' whispered Julian. He could just see the outline of the big barns against the sky. 'Do you think he's one of the labourers? They live in cottages round about.'

The man came to the farm-yard and walked through it, trying to make as little sound as possible. The boys followed. He went round the barns and into the little garden that Mrs. Penruthlan tended herself. Still the boys followed.

Round to the front door went the man, and the boys held their breath. Was he going to burgle the farmhouse? They tiptoed nearer. There came the sound of a soft click, and then of bolts being shot home! After that there was silence.

'He's gone in,' said Julian in amazement.

'Don't you know who it was? Can't you guess now?' said Dick. 'We both ought to have known when we heard that cough! It was Mr. Penruthlan! No wonder he almost dislocated my shoulder with his strong hand!'

'Mr. Penruthlan - gosh, yes, you're right,' said Julian, astonished, almost forgetting to speak in a whisper. 'We didn't notice that the front door was undone because we went out the back way. So it was he we followed. How silly! But what was he doing out on the hills? He didn't go to see the horse, she wasn't ill.'

'Perhaps he likes a walk at night,' suggested Dick. 'Come on, let's go in ourselves. I feel a bit chilly with practically no shirt on!'

They crept round to the back door. It was still open, thank goodness! They went inside, bolted and locked it, and tiptoed upstairs. They heaved sighs of relief when they were safely in their room again.

'Switch on your torch, Julian, and see if my shoulder is bruised,' said Dick. 'It feels jolly painful.' Julian flashed his torch on Dick's shoulder. He gave a low whistle. 'My word, you've got a wonderful bruise all down your right shoulder. He must have given you an awful wrench.'

'He did,' said poor Dick. 'Well, I can't say we had a very successful time, followed our host through the night, got caught by him, and followed him all the way back here. Not very clever!'

'Well, never mind. I bet no light flashed in that tower,' said Julian, getting into bed. 'We haven't lost much by not going all the way to see!'

Chapter 8

HERE COME THE BARNIES!

The two boys looked curiously at Mr. Penruthlan the next morning. It seemed strange to think of their little adventure the night before with him, and he didn't even know it was they he had tried to catch! He gave the curious little dry cough again, and Julian nudged Dick and grinned.

Mrs. Penruthlan was beaming at the head of the breakfast table as usual. 'Did you sleep well, all of you?' she asked. 'The storm soon died down, didn't it?'

Mr. Penruthlan got up saying 'Ah, ock, oooh!' or something that sounded like that, and went out.

'What did he say?' asked Anne curiously. She could not think how anyone could possibly understand Mr. Penruthlan's extraordinary speech. Julian had said that he thought he must talk in shorthand!

'He said he might not be back for dinner,' said Mrs. Penruthlan. 'I hope he'll get some somewhere. He had his breakfast at half past six, and that's very early. I'm glad he came in and had a cup of your breakfast tea now. The poor man had a very bad night, I'm sorry to say.'

The boys pricked up their ears. 'What happened?' asked Julian at once.

'Oh, he had to get up and go and spend two hours with poor Jenny,' said Mrs. Penruthlan. 'I woke when he left, but luckily Benny didn't bark, and it wasn't till two hours later he came back, he'd been sitting with the horse all that time, poor man.'

Julian and Dick did not feel at all sympathetic. They knew quite well where Mr. Penruthlan had been, not with the horse, that was certain! Anyway, Jenny hadn't been ill when they had looked at her in the night. What a lot of untruths!

They were puzzled. Why should Mr. Penruthlan deceive his wife and tell her what wasn't true? What had he been doing that he didn't even want her to know?

They told the girls everything immediately after breakfast, when they went to pick currants, raspberries and plums for a fruit salad. Anne and George listened in surprise.

'You never told us you were going,' said George, reproachfully. 'I'd like to have come with you.'

'I always thought Mr. Penruthlan looked sort of strange and - and sinister,' said Anne. 'I'm sure he's up to no good. What a pity. His wife is so very nice.'

They went on picking the endless red-currants. Anne suddenly got the feeling that somebody was hiding somewhere near. She looked round uncomfortably. Yes, there was someone in the tall raspberry canes, she was sure! She watched.

It was Yan, of course. She might have guessed! He flashed his smile at her and came towards her. He liked Anne best of all! He held out his hand.

'No, I've no sweets,' said Anne. 'How did you get on last night in the storm, Yan? Were you frightened?'

Yan shook his head. Then he came nearer and spoke softly.

'I seen the light last night!'

Anne stared at him, astonished. What light?

'You don't mean - the light that flashes in that old hidden tower?' she said.

He nodded. Anne went quickly to Julian and Dick, who were picking white currants and eating just about as many as they put into the basket!

'Julian! Dick! Yan says he saw that light flashing last night, the one in the tower!'

'Gosh!' said the boys together. They turned to Yan, who had followed Anne. 'You saw that light?' said Julian.

Yan nodded. 'Big light. Very big,' he said. 'Like - like a fire.'

'Shining from the tower?' said Dick, and Yan nodded again.

'Did your Grandad see it?' asked Dick.

Yan nodded. 'He seen it, too.'

'Are you telling the truth?' demanded Julian, wondering how far he could believe Yan.

Yan nodded again.

'What time was this?' asked Dick. But that Yan couldn't tell him. He had no watch, and if he had had, he wouldn't have been able to use it. He couldn't tell the time.

'Blow!' said Julian to Dick. 'We missed it. If Yan's telling the truth we would have seen that light last night.'

'Yes. Well, we'll go tonight and watch for it,' said Dick, determined. 'It's a wild enough day, all wind and scurrying clouds. If that light is used at night in weather like this, we'll be able to see it again. But I'm blessed if I can understand why the wreckers' tower should be used nowadays. No ship would take any notice of an odd light like that when they've got the lighthouse signalling hard all the time!'

'I go, too,' nodded Yan, who had overheard this.

'No, you won't,' said Julian. 'You can stay with Grandad. He'll wonder where you are if you're not there.'

It began to rain. 'Blow!' said George. 'I do hope the weather hasn't broken up. It's been so gorgeous. It's quite cold today with this tearing wind. Come on, let's go in, Anne. We've got enough now to feed an army, I should think!'

They all went in, just as the rain came down properly. Mrs. Penruthlan greeted them in excitement.

'The Barnies want our barn for tomorrow night!' she said. 'They're giving their first show in our barn, and after that they go to another place. Would you like to help clear out the barn and get ready?'

'Rather!' said Julian. 'We'll go now. There's a lot of stuff to clear out. Where shall we put it? In the other barn?'

The Barnies arrived in about twenty minutes and went straight to the barn, which they had been lent several times before for their shows. They were pleased to see the children and were glad of their help.

They were no longer dressed in fancy clothes, as they had been when the children had seen them on the Sunday evening. They were practically all dressed in slacks, the women, too, ready for the hard work of clearing the barn and setting up a simple stage and background.

Julian caught sight of a horse's head being carried in by a little nimble fellow who pranced along with it comically.

'What's that for?' he said. 'Oh, is that Clopper's head? The horse that can sit down and cross its legs?'

'That's right,' said the little fellow. 'I'm in charge of it. Never let it out of my sight! Guv'nor's orders!'

'Who's the Guv'nor?' asked Julian. 'The fellow over there?' He nodded to a grim-faced man who was supervising the moving of some bales of straw.

'That's him,' said the little man with a grin. 'His lordship himself! What do you think of my horse, chum!'

Julian looked at the horse's head. It was beautifully made and had a most comical look in its eye. Its mouth could open and shut, and so could its big eyes.

'I'm only the hind legs,' said the little man regretfully. 'But I work his tail, too. Mr. Binks over there is his front legs, and works his head, the horse's head, I mean. You should see old Clopper when he performs! My, there isn't a horse like him in the world. He can do everything short of fly!'

'Where are his back and front legs - and - er - his body part?' asked Dick, coming up and looking with great interest at the horse's head.

'Over there,' said the little man. 'By the way, my name's Sid. What's yours, and how is it you're here?'

Julian introduced himself and Dick, and explained that they were helping because they were staying at the farm. He caught hold of a bale of straw, thinking it was about time he did some work.

'Like to give me a hand?' he asked.

Sid shook his head.

'Sorry. Orders are I'm not to put this horse's head down anywhere. Where I go, it goes! I can tell you, me and Clopper are quite attached to one another!'

'Why? Is it so valuable?' asked Dick.

'It's not so much that,' said Sid. 'It's just that Clopper's so popular, you know. And he's important. You see, whenever we think the show's flopping a bit, we bring Clopper on, and then we get the laughs and the claps, and the audience is in a good temper. Oh, Clopper's saved the show times without number. He's a jolly good horse is Clopper.'

Mr. Binks came up. He was bigger than Sid and much stronger. He grinned at the two boys. 'Admiring old Clopper?' he said. 'Did Sid tell you about the time Clopper's head dropped off the wagon and we didn't miss him till we were miles away? My word, what a state the Guv'nor was in! Said we couldn't give a show without Clopper, and nearly gave us all the sack!'

'We're important, we are,' said Sid, throwing out his chest and doing a funny little strut with the horse's head in front of him. 'Me and Binks and Clopper - no show without us!'

'Don't you put that horse down even for a moment,' warned Mr. Binks. 'The Guv'nor's got his eye on you, Sid. Look, he's calling you.'

Sid went over to the Guv'nor, looking rather alarmed. He carried the horse's head safely under his arm.

The grim-faced man said a few sharp words and Sid nodded. Julian went up to him when he came back. 'Let me feel how heavy the horse's head is,' he said. 'I've often wondered, when I've seen something like this on the stage.'

Sid immediately put the horse under his other arm, and glared at Julian, looking round quickly to see if the Guv'nor had heard.

'That's a fool thing to ask me,' he said. 'After I've told you I'm not allowed to put the horse down! And didn't the Guv'nor just this minute say to me "Keep away from those kids, you know what tricks they're up to. They'll have that horse away from you if you're not careful." See? Do you want me to lose my job?'

Julian laughed. 'Don't be silly. You wouldn't lose your job for that! When are you and Mr. Binks going to do a bit of practice? We want to see you!'

'Oh well, we could manage that all right,' said Sid, calming down. 'Here, Binks. Bit of practice wanted. Get the legs.'

Binks and Sid went to a cleared space in the big barn and proceeded to clothe themselves in the horse's canvas skin and legs. Sid showed the boys how he worked the tail with one of his hands when he wanted to.

Binks put on the head and the front legs. His head only went into the neck of the horse, no farther. He was able to use his hands for pulling strings to open the horse's mouth and work its rolling eyes.

Sid got his legs in the horse's back legs, bent over and put his head and arms over towards Binks, so making the horse's back. Somebody came up and zipped up the two halves of the horse's 'skin'.

'Oh! What a jolly good horse!' said Dick, delighted. It looked a lively, comical, extremely supple beast, and the two men inside at once proceeded to make it do ridiculous things. It marched - left-right, left-right, left-right. It did a little tap-dance with its front feet, which then remained perfectly still, and then the back feet did the same little tap-dance.

The back feet got themselves entangled and fell over, and the horse's head looked round at itself in astonishment.

All four children were now watching, and Yan was peeping in at the door. They roared with laughter at the ridiculous horse.

It took its tail in its mouth and marched round and round itself. It stood up on its hind legs only. It jumped like a kangaroo, and made peculiar noises. The whole company stood and watched and even the grim-faced Guv'nor had to smile.

Then it sat down on its hind-legs and crossed its front ones in the air, looking round comically. It then gave an enormous yawn that showed dozens of large teeth.

'Oh, don't do any more!' cried Anne, who was weak with laughing. 'Don't! Oh, I can quite well see how important you are, Clopper! You'll be the best part of the show!'

It was a mad, gay morning, for the Barnies were full of chatter and jokes and laughter. Sid and Binks took off their horse garments, and Sid thereupon went about as before, the horse's head, grinning comically, tucked safely under his arm.

Mrs. Penruthlan called the children in to dinner. Yan ran after Julian, and caught hold of his arm.

'I seen that light,' he said, urgently. 'You come, see it tonight. Don't forget. I seen that light!'

Julian had forgotten it in the excitement of the morning. He grinned down at the small boy.

'All right, all right. I won't forget. We're coming along tonight, but you're not coming, Yan, so get that out of your head! Look, here's a sweet for you. Now, scoot!'

Chapter 9

THE LIGHT IN THE TOWER

By the end of the day the big barn was quite transformed! It had been cleared of all straw, sacks of corn, bags of fertilizer and odd machines that had been stored in it. It looked enormous now, and the Barnies were very pleased with it.

'We've been here plenty of times,' they told the children. 'It's the best barn in the district. We don't get the best audience, though, because it's rather a lonely spot here, and there are only two villages near enough to send people to see us. Still, we have a good time, and Mrs. Penruthlan gives us a marvellous supper afterwards!'

'I bet she does!' said Dick, grinning. 'I bet that's why you come to this lonely spot, too, to taste Mrs. Penruthlan's cooking. I don't blame you. I'd come a good few miles myself!'

A stage had been set up, made of long boards, supported on barrels. A back-cloth had been unrolled and hung over the wooden wall of the barn at the back of the stage. It showed a country scene, and had been painted by the company themselves, bit by bit.

'That's my bit,' said Sid, showing Dick a horse standing in one of the fields painted on the back-cloth. 'I had to put old Clopper in! See him?'

The Barnies had plenty of home-made scenery, which they were used to changing several times during their performance. This was all home-made too, and they were very proud of it, especially some that represented a castle with a tower.

The tower reminded the boys of the one Yan had said he had seen flashing a light the night before. They looked at one another secretly, and Julian nodded slightly. They would certainly watch to see that light themselves. Then they would know for certain whether Grandad and Yan were telling the truth.

Julian wondered if they would have to look out for Mr. Penruthlan again that night. Jenny the horse was quite better now, if she had ever been ill, and was out in the fields again. So Mr. Penruthlan had no excuse for creeping about the countryside at night again!

Neither of the boys could imagine what had taken him out the night before, on such a wild night too! Was he meeting somebody? He hadn't had time to go up to see the shepherd about anything, and there wouldn't have been much point in that anyway. He had seen Grandad in the morning already.

Mrs. Penruthlan came to see the barn now that it was almost ready for the show the next night. She looked red and excited. This was a grand time for her, the Barnies in her barn, the villagers all coming up the next night, a grand supper to be held afterwards. What an excitement!

She was very busy in her kitchen, cooking, cooking, cooking! Her enormous larder was already full of the most appetizing looking pies, tarts, hams, brawns and cheeses. The children took turns at looking into it and sniffing in delight. Mrs. Penruthlan laughed at them and shooed them out.

'You'll have to help me tomorrow,' she said. 'Shelling peas, scraping potatoes, stringing beans, picking currants and raspberries, and you'll find hundreds of wild strawberries in the copse, too, which can go to add a flavour to the fruit salad.'

'We shall love to help,' said Anne. 'All this is grand fun! But surely you aren't going to do all the supper single-handed, Mrs. Penruthlan?'

'Oh, one or two of the villagers will stay behind to help me serve it,' said the plump little farmer's wife, who looked as happy as could be in the midst of so much hard work. 'Anyway, I'll be up at five o'clock tomorrow morning. I'll have plenty of time!'

'You'd better go to bed early tonight then!' said George.

'We all will,' said Mrs. Penruthlan. 'We'll be up early and abed late tomorrow, and we'll need some sleep tonight. It's no trouble to get Mr. Penruthlan to bed early. He's always ready to go!'

The children felt sure he would be ready to go early that night because he had spent so much time out in the storm the night before! Julian and Dick were tired too, but they were quite determined to go up to the shepherd's hill and find the place where they could watch and see if that light really did flash out!

They had a high tea as usual, at which Mr. Penruthlan was present. He ate solidly and solemnly, not saying a word except something that sounded like 'Ooahah, ooh.'

'Well, I'm glad you like the pie, Mr. Penruthlan,' said his wife. 'Though I says it as shouldn't, it's a good one.'

It really was wonderful the way she understood her husband's speech. It was also very queer to hear her speak to her husband as if he was someone to whom she had to be polite, and call Mister! Anne wondered if she called him Mr. Penruthlan when they were alone together. She looked at him earnestly. What a dark giant he was - and how he ate!

He looked up and saw Anne watching him. He nodded at her and said 'Ah! Oooh, ock, ukker.' It might have been a foreign language for all Anne could understand! She looked startled and didn't know what to say.

'Now, Mr. Penruthlan, don't you tease the child!' said his wife. 'She doesn't know what to answer. Do you, Anne?'

'Well - I - er - I didn't really catch what he said,' said Anne, going scarlet.

'There now, Mr. Penruthlan - see how badly you talk without your teeth in!' said the farmer's wife scoldingly. 'Haven't I told you you should wear your teeth when you want to make conversation? I understand you all right, but others don't. It must sound just a mumble to them!'

Mr. Penruthlan frowned and muttered something. The children all stared at him, dumbfounded to hear that he had no teeth. Goodness gracious - HOW did he manage to eat all he did, then? He seemed to chew and munch and crunch, and yet he had no teeth!

'So that's why he speaks so queerly,' thought Dick, amused. 'But fancy eating as much as he does, with no teeth in his head! Goodness, what would he eat if he had got all his teeth.'

Mrs. Penruthlan changed the conversation because it was clear that her husband was annoyed with her. She talked brightly about the Barnies.

'That horse Clapper! You wait till you see him prance on to the stage, and fall off it. You'll see Mr. Penruthlan almost fall out of his seat he laughs so much. He's fair set on that horse. He's seen it a dozen times, and it tickles him to death.'

'I think it's jolly funny myself,' said Julian. 'I've always thought I'd like to put on an act like that at our end-of-term concert at school. Dick and I could do it all right. I wish Sid and Mr. Binks would let us try.'

The meal was finished at last. Most of the dishes were empty, and Mrs. Penruthlan looked pleased. 'There now - you've done really well,' she said. 'That's what I do like to see, people finishing up everything put before them.'

'It's easy when it's food you put before us,' said George. 'Isn't it, Timmy? I bet Timmy wishes he lived here always, Mrs. Penruthlan! I'm sure he keeps telling your dogs how lucky they are!'

After the washing-up, in which everyone but Mr. Penruthlan helped, they went to sit down for a while, and read. But the farmer kept giving such enormous yawns that he set everyone else yawning too, and Mrs. Penruthlan began to laugh.

'Come on, to bed, all of you!' she said. 'I've never heard so many yawns in my life! Poor Mr. Penruthlan. He's tired out with sitting up with Jenny the horse half the night.'

The children exchanged glances. They knew better!

Everyone went up to bed, and the children laughed to hear Mr. Penruthlan still yawning loudly in his room. Julian looked out of his window. It was a dark, blustery night, with sudden spurts of sharp rain. The wind howled and Julian almost thought he could hear the great waves crashing on the rocks in the nearest caves! How enormous they would be in this wind!

'A good night for wreckers, if there were any nowadays!' he said to Dick. 'Not much chance for any ship that went too near those coves tonight! They'd be on the rocks, and dashed to pieces in half an hour! The beach would be strewn with thousands of pieces of wreckage the next day.'

'We'd better wait a bit before we go,' said Dick. 'It's really very early. On a bright sunny evening the hills would still be full of daylight, but this stormy evening is very dark. Let's light our candles and read.'

The wind became even stronger, and grew almost to a gale. It made a howling noise round the old farm-house, and sounded angry and in pain. Not a very nice night to go out on the hills!

'We'll go now, I think,' said Julian, at last. 'It's quite dark, and getting late. Come on.'

They hadn't undressed, so they went down the stairs at once, and out of the back door as before, closing it silently behind them. They made their way through the farm-yard, not daring to shine their torches till they were well away from the house.

They had had a quick look at the front door, when they had stood in the hall. It was locked and bolted! Mr. Penruthlan was not out tonight, that was certain.

They walked steadily through the gale, gasping when it caught them full in the face. They each had their warm jerseys on, for it was quite cold, and the wind blew all the time.

Across the fields. Over one stile after another. Across more fields. The boys stopped once or twice to make sure they were right. They were relieved when they came to the great flock of sheep, and knew they must be near the shepherd's hut.

'There's the hut,' whispered Julian, at last. 'You can just see its dark outline. We must go quietly now.'

They stole by the hut. Not a sound came from inside, and no candle-light showed through the cracks. Old Grandad must be fast asleep! Julian pictured Yan curled up with him on their bed of old sheepskins.

The boys went quietly along. Now, they must make for the spot from which the old tower could be seen, and it must be the exact spot, for the tower could be seen from nowhere else.

They couldn't find it, or, if they had found it, and were standing on it, they were unable to see the tower far off in the darkness.

'If it didn't happen to be flashing a light, we wouldn't know if we were looking in the right direction or not!' said Julian. 'We'd never see it in the dark. Why didn't we think of that? Somehow I thought we'd see the tower whether it was lighted up or not. We're asses.'

They wandered about a little, continually looking in the direction where they thought the tower should be. But they saw nothing at all. What a waste of a long walk!

Then Julian suddenly gave an exclamation. 'Who's that? I saw you there! Who is it?'

Dick jumped. What was this now? Then someone sidled up against them both, and a voice spoke timidly.

'It's me, Yan!'

'Good gracious! You turn up everywhere!' said Julian. 'I suppose you were watching out for us.'
'Iss. Come with me,' said Yan, and tugged at Julian's arm. The two boys went with him, a few yards to the right, then higher up the hill. Then Yan stopped.

The boys saw the distant light at once. There was no doubt about it at all! It flashed continually, rather like a small lighthouse light. Each time it flashed they could see the faint outline of the tower.

'It seems to be some kind of signal,' said Julian. 'Flash - flash-flash-flash - flash-flash - flash. My word, how weird. Who's doing it, and why? Surely there are no wreckers nowadays!'

'Grandad says it's his old Dad,' said Yan, in an awed voice. Julian laughed.

'Don't be silly! All the same, it's a bit of a mystery, isn't it, Dick? Could any ship out at sea be deceived and come near to the shore, and be wrecked? It's a wicked night, just the night for great waves to pound a ship to pieces if it came near this coast.'

'Yes. Well, we shall hear tomorrow if there has been a wreck,' said Dick soberly. 'I hope there won't be. I can't bear thinking of it, anyway. Surely, surely there aren't wreckers here now!'

'If there are, they will be creeping down the hidden Wreckers' Way, wherever it is,' said Julian. 'And watching for the ship to crash to pieces. Then they will collect sacks upon sacks of booty and creep away back.'

Dick felt a chill of horror. 'Shut up, Ju!' he said, sharply. 'Don't talk like that. Now, what are we going to do about that light.'

'I'll tell you,' said Julian, firmly, 'We're going to find that tower and see what's going on. That's what we're going to do! And as soon as ever we can too, maybe tomorrow!'

Chapter 10

GETTING READY FOR THE SHOW

Julian and Dick watched the light for a little longer, and then turned to go back to the farm. The wind was so strong and so cold that even on that summer's night they found themselves shivering.

'I'm glad you found us, Yan,' said Dick, putting an arm round the small, shivering boy. 'Thanks for your help. We're going to explore that old tower. Would you like to show us the way to it?'

Yan shivered all the more, from fright as much as cold. 'No. I'm frit,' he said. 'I'm frit of that tower now.'

'What does he mean, frit?' said Dick. 'Short for frightened, I suppose! All right, Yan. You needn't come. It is pretty peculiar, I must admit. Now, go back to your hut.'

Yan shot off in the dark like a scared rabbit. The boys made their way home, not very cautiously, for they felt sure they were the only people out that night. But when they came to the farm-yard they saw something that made them stop suddenly.

'There's a light in the big barn!' whispered Dick. 'It's gone, no, there it is again. It's somebody with a torch, flashing it on and off. Who is it?'

'One of the Barnies, perhaps,' whispered back Julian. 'Let's go and see. We know the Barnies are sleeping in the near-by sheds tonight.'

They tiptoed to the barn and looked through a crack. They saw nothing at first. Then a torch flashed, shedding its light on some of the properties of the Barnies, stacked in a corner, scenery, dresses, coats, and other things.

'Somebody's going through the pockets!' said Julian, indignantly. 'Look at that! A thief!'

'Who is it?' said Dick. 'One of the Barnies pick-pocketing?'

For a moment or two the torch lighted up the back of the intruder's hand in the barn, and the boys stifled an exclamation. They knew that hand! It was covered with black hairs almost as thick as fur!

'Mr. Penruthlan!' whispered Dick. 'Yes, I see it's him now. Look at his enormous shadow. What's he doing? He must be mad, walking about at night on the hills, stealing into the barn, going through pockets. Look what he's doing now! Looking in the drawers of that chest the Barnies are going to use in one of their scenes. Yes, he's mad!'

Julian felt most uncomfortable. He didn't like spying on his host like this. What a strange man he was! He told untruths, he crept about at night, he went through people's pockets. Yes, he must be mad! Did Mrs. Penruthlan know? She couldn't know, or she would be unhappy, and she really seemed the most cheerful, gay little person in the world!

'Come on,' said Julian, in Dick's ear. 'He's going through everything! Though what he expects to find in the Barnies' stage clothes and properties, I don't know. He's got a kink! Come on, I really don't want to spot him taking something, stealing it. It would be so awkward if we had to say we saw him stealing.'

They left the barn and went back to the farmhouse, creeping in once more at the back door. They looked at the front door. It was shut, but no longer locked or bolted.

The boys went upstairs, puzzled. What a strange night! The howling wind, the flashing light, the furtive man in the barn, they didn't know what to make of it at all!

'Let's wake the girls and tell them,' said Julian. 'I feel as if I can't wait till the morning.'

George was awake and so was Timmy. Timmy had heard them going out, and had lain awake waiting for them to come back. He had stirred and had awakened George. She was quite prepared to hear a whisper at the door!

'Anne! George! We've got some news!' whispered Julian. Timmy gave a little welcoming whine and leapt off the bed. Soon Anne was awake, too, and the girls were listening in amazement at the boys' news.

They were almost as surprised to hear about Mr. Penruthlan in the barn as to hear about the light actually flashing in the tower.

'So it was true what old Grandad said, then?' whispered Anne. 'He had seen the light again. I do think it's weird, all this. Julian, you don't think we'll hear of a wreck tomorrow, do you? I couldn't bear it!'

'Nor could I,' said George, listening to the wind howling outside. 'Fancy being wrecked on a night like this, and being dashed on the rocks by those pounding waves. I feel as if we ought to rush off to the caves here and now and see if we can do any rescuing!'

'We wouldn't be much use,' said Dick. 'I doubt if we could even get near the cove on a night like this. The waves would run right up to the road that leads down to it.'

They talked and talked about everything. Then George yawned. 'We'd better stop,' she said. 'We'll never wake up tomorrow morning. We can't go and explore that tower tomorrow, Julian. The Barnies will be here, and we've promised Mrs. Penruthlan to help her.'

'It'll have to be next day, then,' said Julian. 'But I'm determined to go. Yan said he wouldn't show us the way. He said he was too 'frit'!'

'I feel pretty frit myself,' said George, settling down. 'I should have jumped out of my skin if I'd seen that light tonight.'

The boys stole back to their room. Soon they were in bed and asleep. The wind still howled round the house, but they didn't hear it. They were tired out with their long walk over the hills.

Next day was so busy that it was quite difficult to find time to remember the night's happenings! They were reminded of it by one thing, though!

Mrs. Penruthlan was seeing to their breakfast, and making bright conversation as usual. She was never at a loss for words, and chattered all day long either to the children or to the dogs.

'Did you sleep well with that howling gale blowing all night long?' she asked. 'I slept like a top. So did Mr. Penruthlan! He told me he never moved all night, he was that tired!'

The children kicked each other under the table, but said nothing. They knew quite a lot more about her husband's nights than she did!

After that they had very little time to think of anything but picking fruit, podding peas, rushing here and there, carrying things for the Barnies, helping them to put up benches, barrels, boxes and chairs for the audience to sit on, and even mending tears in some of the stage clothes! Anne had offered to sew on a button, and at once found herself overwhelmed with requests to mend this, that and the other!

It was an extremely busy day. Yan appeared as usual and was greeted uproariously by Timmy, of course. All the dogs loved him, but Timmy was quite silly with him. Mrs. Penruthlan sent Yan on endless errands, which he ran quickly and willingly.

'He may be a bit simple, but he's quick enough when he thinks there's some good food he's going to share!' she said. So it was 'Fetch this, Yan!' 'Do that, Yan!' all day long.

The Barnies worked hard, too. They had a quick rehearsal in which every single thing went wrong; the Guv'nor raved and raged and stamped, making Anne wonder why they didn't all run away and stay away!

First there was to be a kind of concert party such as pierrots give on the beaches. Then there was to be a play, most heart-rending and melodramatic, with villains and heroes and a heroine who was very hardly used. But everything came right for her in the end, Anne was relieved to find!

Clopper the horse was to have no definite performance of his own. He just wandered on and off the stage to get laughs and to please everyone, or to fill awkward gaps. There was no doubt he would do this to perfection!

Julian and Dick watched Mr. Binks and Sid doing a small rehearsal on their own in a corner of the farmyard. How well those back legs and front legs worked together! How that horse danced, trotted, galloped, marched, fell over, tied itself into knots, sat down, got up, went to sleep, and, in fact, did every comical thing that Sid and Mr. Binks could think of. They really were very, very funny.

'Let me try the head on, Mr. Binks,' begged Julian. 'Do let me. Just to feel what it's like.'

But it was no good. Sid wouldn't let him. Mr. Binks had no say in the matter at all. 'Orders are orders,' said Sid, picking up the head as soon as Mr. Binks took it off. 'I don't want to lose my job. The Guv'nor says if this horse's head is mislaid again, I'll be mislaid, too! So hands off Clopper!'

'Do you sleep with Clopper?' asked Dick, curiously. 'Having to take charge of a horse's head all the time must be a bore!'

'You get used to it,' said Sid. 'Yes, I sleep with old Clopper. Him and me have our heads on the pillow together. He sleeps sound, does old Clopper!'

'He's the best part of the show,' grinned Julian. 'You'll bring the barn down with Clopper tonight!'

'We always do,' said Mr. Binks. 'He's the most important member of the Barnies, and he gets paid the worst. Shame.'

'Yes, back-legs and front-legs are badly paid,' said Sid. 'They only count as one player, see, so we get half pay. Still, we like the life, so there you are!'

They went off together, Sid carrying the horse's head as usual under his arm. He really was a funny little man, cheery and silly and gay.

Julian suddenly remembered something at dinner time. 'Mrs. Penruthlan,' he said. 'I suppose that awful wind didn't cause any wrecks last night, did it?'

The farmer's wife looked surprised. 'No, Julian. Why should it? Ships keep right out to sea round these coasts now. The lighthouse warns them, you know. The only way any ship could come in now would be to nose into one of the caves at full tide, and then she'd have to be very careful of rocks. The fishermen know the rocks as well as they know the backs of their hands, and they come into the coves at times. But no other craft come now.'

Everyone heaved a sigh of relief. The flashing light hadn't caused a wreck last night, then. That was a mercy! They went on with their meal. Mr. Penruthlan was there, eating away as usual, and saying nothing at all. His jaws worked vigorously up and down, and it was impossible to think he had no teeth to chew with. Julian glanced at his hands, covered with black hairs. Yes, he had seen those hands last night, no doubt about that! Not wielding a knife and fork, but sliding into pockets.

The evening came at last. Everything was ready. A big table was placed in the kitchen, made of strong trestles and boards. Mrs. Penruthlan gave the two girls a most enormous white cloth to lay over it. It was bigger than any cloth they had ever seen!

'It's the one I use at harvest-time,' said the farmer's wife, proudly. 'We have a wonderful harvest supper then, on that same table, but we put it out in the big barn because there's not enough room here in the kitchen for all the farm workers. And we clear the table away afterwards and have a dance.'

'What fun!' said Anne. 'I do think people are lucky to live on a farm. There's always something going on!'

'Town folk wouldn't say that!' said Mrs. Penruthlan. 'They think the country is a dead-and-alive place, but, my word, there's more life about a farm than anywhere else in the world. Farm life's the real thing I always say!'

'It is,' agreed Anne, and George nodded, too. They had now spread out the snowy-white cloth and it looked lovely.

'That cloth's the real thing, too,' said Mrs. Penruthlan. 'It belonged to my great-great-great-grand-mother, and it's nearly two hundred years old! As white as ever and not a darn in it! It's seen more harvest suppers than any cloth made, and that's the truth!'

The table was laid with plates and knives and forks, cruets and glasses. All the Barnies had been invited, and there were the children, too, of course. One or two of the villagers were staying as well, to help. What a feast they would all have!

The larder was so crammed with food that it was difficult to get into it. Meat pies, fruit pies, hams, a great round tongue, pickles, sauces, jam tarts, stewed and fresh fruit, jellies, a great trifle, jugs of cream - there was no end to the things Mrs. Penruthlan had got ready. She laughed when she saw the children peeping there and marvelling.

'You won't get any high tea today,' she told them. 'You'll get nothing from dinner till supper, so that you can get up a good appetite and really eat well!'

Nobody minded missing high tea with that wonderful supper to come. The excitement grew as the time came near for the show. 'Here come the first villagers!' cried Julian, who was at the barn door to help to sell the tickets. 'Hurrah! It will soon begin! Walk up, everyone! Finest show in the world. Come along in your hundreds! Come along!'

Chapter 11

THE BARNIES - AND CLOPPER

When the big barn was full of villagers, and a few more boxes had been fetched for some of the extra children, the noise was tremendous. Everyone was laughing and talking, some of the children were clapping for the show to begin, and the excited farm dogs were yapping and barking at the top of their voices!

Timmy was excited, too. He welcomed everyone with a bark and a vigorous wag. Yan was with him, and George was sure that he was pretending that Timmy was his dog! Yan looked cleaner than usual. Mrs. Penruthlan had actually given him a bath!

'You don't come to the show and you don't come to the supper unless you bath yourself,' she threatened. But he wouldn't. He said he was 'frit' of the bath!

'I'll be drowned in there,' he said, backing away from it hurriedly. It was already half full of water for him!

'Frit, are you!' said Mrs. Penruthlan grimly, lifting him up and plunging him into the water, clothes and all. 'Well, you'll be fritter still now! Take your clothes off in the water and I'll wash them in the bath when you're clean. Oh, the dirty little varmint that you are!'

Yan screamed the place down as Mrs. Penruthlan scrubbed him and soaped him and flannelled him. He hit out at her, but she gave him one sound spank on his small behind, and he stopped very suddenly. He felt very much at her mercy, and decided not to annoy her in any way while he was in that dreadful bath!

She washed his ragged pants and shirt, too, and set them to dry. She wrapped him in an old shawl, and told him to wait till his things dried and then put them on.

'One of these days I'll make you some decent clothes,' she said. 'Little rascal that you are! What a mite of a body you've got. I'll need to feed you up a bit!'

Yan brightened up considerably. Feeding up was the kind of treatment he really liked!

Now he was down in the barn, welcoming everyone with Timmy, and feeling quite important. He yelled with delight when he saw his old great-grandfather coming along!

'Grandad! You said you was coming, but I didn't believe you. Come you in. I'll find you a chair.'

'And what's come over you, the way you look tonight?' said the old man, puzzled. 'What you done to yourself?'

'I've took a bath. See?' said Yan, sounding proud. 'Iss. I took a bath, Grandad. Same as you ought.'

Grandad aimed a cuff at him, and then nodded to various people he knew. He had his big old shepherd's crook with him, and he held on to it even when he sat down on a chair.

'Well, Grandad, it's nigh on twenty year since we saw you down hereabouts,' said a big, red-faced villager. 'What you been doing with yourself all these years?'

'Minding my business and minding my sheep,' said Grandad, in his slow, Cornish voice. 'Ay, and it'll mebbe twenty years afore you sees me again, Joe Tremayne. And if you want to know summat, I'll tell you this. It bain't the show I'm come for, it's the supper.'

Everyone roared with laughter, and Grandad looked as pleased as Punch. Yan looked at him proudly. His old Grandad was as good as anyone, any day!

'Sh! Sh! Show's going to begin!' said somebody, when they saw the curtain twitching. At once the talking and shuffling stopped, and all eyes turned to the stage. A faded, rather torn blue curtain was drawn across.

There came a chord from a fiddle behind the scenes, and then a gay tune sounded out. The curtain was drawn back slowly, halting on its rings here and there, and the audience gave a long sigh of delight. They had seen the Barnies many times but they never tired of them.

All the Barnies were on the stage, and the fiddler fiddled away as they struck up a rousing song with a chorus that all the villagers joined in most heartily. Old Grandad beat time, banging his crook on the floor.

Everything was applauded heartily. Then someone called out loudly. 'Where's old Clopper? Where be he?'

And old Clopper the horse came shyly on, looking out of the sides of his eyes at the audience, and being so very bashful that old Grandad almost fell off his chair with laughing.

The fiddle struck up again and Clopper marched in time to it. It grew quicker, and he ran. It grew quicker still and he galloped, and fell right off the stage.

'Hoo-hoo-hoo-hoo!' roared someone. 'HOO-HOO-HOO-HOO!' It was such an enormous guffaw that everyone turned round. It came from Mr. Penruthlan, who was writhing and wriggling in his seat as if he was in great pain. But he was only laughing at Clopper.

Clopper heard the giant of a laugh and put a hoof behind one ear to listen to it. Grandad promptly fell off his seat with joy. Clopper caught his back legs in his front legs and fell over too. There was such a pandemonium of screams and guffaws and yells from the delighted audience that it was surprising the roof didn't fall in.

'Off now,' said a firm voice at the side of the stage. Julian looked to see who it was, as Clopper obediently turned to shuffle off, waving one back leg to the admiring villagers. The voice came from the Guv'nor who was standing where he could watch the whole show in detail. His face was still unsmiling, even after Clopper's antics!

The show was a great success, although it could not have been simpler. The jokes were old, the play acted was even older, the singing was a bit flat, and the dancing not as good as the third form of a girls' school, but it was so merry and smiling and idiotic and good-natured that it went with a terrific swing from start to finish.

As for Clopper, it was his evening! Every time his head so much as looked in on the stage, the audience rocked with joy. They would, in fact, have been delighted to have had one actor only, all the evening, and that actor, Clopper, of course. Julian and Dick watched him, fascinated. How they both longed to try on those back and front legs, and put on the head, and do a little 'clopping' themselves!

'Sid and Binks are awfully good, aren't they?' said Dick. 'Gosh, I wish we could get hold of legs and a head and do that act at the Christmas school concert, Ju! We'd bring the house down. Let's ask Sid if we can have a shot some time.'

'He won't lend us the head,' said Julian. 'Still, we could do without that, and just try the legs. I bet we could think of some funny things to do, Dick!'

Everybody was sad when the curtain went across the stage, and the show was over. The fiddle struck up 'God Save the Queen', and everyone rose loyally to stand and sing every word lustily.

'Three cheers for the Barnies!' yelled a child, and the hip-hurrahing rose to the rafters. Grandad waved his crook too vigorously and hit a very large farmer on the back of his neck.

'Now, old Grandad!' said the farmer, rubbing his neck, 'you trying to pick a fight with me? No, no, I'd be afeared to take you on, I would. You'd get me by my hind leg with that crook like you do your sheep, and down I'd go!'

Grandad was delighted. He hadn't had such an evening for forty years! Maybe fifty. And now for that supper. That was what he had really come for. He'd show some of these sixty-year-old youngsters how to eat!

The villagers went home, talking and laughing. Two or three of the women stayed on to help. The Barnies didn't bother to change out of their acting clothes, but came into the kitchen as they were, grease-paint running down their cheeks in the heat. The barn had got very hot with so many people packed in close together.

The children were simply delighted with everything. They had laughed so much at Clopper that they felt quite weak. The play had amused them too, with its sighings and groanings and threats and tears and stridings around. Now they were more than ready for their supper!

The Barnies crowded round the loaded table, cracking jokes, complimenting Mrs. Penruthlan, smacking everyone on the back, and generally behaving like a lot of school children out for a treat. Julian looked round at them all. What a jolly lot! He looked for the Guv'nor, surely for once in a way he too would be smiling and cheerful.

But he wasn't there. Julian looked and looked again. No, he certainly wasn't there.

'Where's the Guv'nor?' he asked Sid, who was sitting next to him.

'The Guv'nor? Oh, he's sitting in solitary state in the barn,' said Sid, attacking an enormous slice of meat-pie laced with hard-boiled eggs. 'He never feeds with us, not even after a show. Keeps himself to himself, he does! He'll be having a whacking great tray of food all on his own. Suits me all right! I never did get on with the Guv'nor.'

'Where's Clopper - the horse's head, I mean?' asked Julian. He couldn't see it beside Sid anywhere. 'Is it under the table?'

'No. The Guv'nor's got it tonight. Said he wasn't going to have it rolled about under the table, or have jelly or gravy dropped all over it,' said Sid, taking six large pickled onions. 'My, Mrs. Penruthlan is a wonder! Why don't I marry someone like her, instead of getting thinner and thinner inside Clopper's back-legs?'

Julian laughed. He wondered who was going to take the Guv'nor's tray into the barn. He noticed that Mrs. Penruthlan was getting one ready, and he went over to her.

'Is that for the Guv'nor?' he asked. 'Shall I take it for you?'

'Oh, thank you, Julian,' said the busy farmer's wife, gratefully. 'Here it is, and ask Dick to carry in a bottle and a glass for him, will you? There's no more room on the tray.'

So Julian and Dick together went out to the barn with the food and drink. The wind still blew strongly and rain was beginning to fall again.

'There's no one here,' said Julian, looking round. He set down the tray, puzzled. Then he saw a note pinned on the curtain. He went to read it.

'Back in an hour,' he read. 'Gone for a walk. The Guv'nor.'

'Oh well, we'll leave the tray then,' said Julian. He and Dick were just turning to go when they caught sight of something, the back and front legs of Clopper the horse! They stopped, each with the same thought in his mind.

'Everyone at supper! The Guv'nor gone for an hour. Nobody would know if we tried on the legs!' They looked at one another, and read each other's mind. 'Let's have a go at being Clopper!'

'Come on, quick,' said Julian. 'You be the back legs and I'll be the front ones. Quick!'

They got into them hurriedly, and Julian managed to do up most of the zip. But it wasn't right without the head. Had the Guv'nor taken it with him? Surely not. It would be quite safe in the barn.

'There it is, on that chair under the shawl!' said Dick, and they galloped over to get it. Julian picked it up. It was rather heavier than he had imagined. He looked inside it to see how far his head went in it, wondering how to work the eyes and mouth.

He put his hand inside, and scrabbled about. A lid fell open in the side of the neck, and out came some cigarettes, scattering over the floor. 'Blow!' said Julian. 'I didn't know Mr. Binks kept his cigarettes in Clopper. Pick them up, Dick, and I'll put them back. Thanks.'

He put the cigarettes back in the little space, and shut the lid on them. Then he put the head carefully over his own. It felt extremely strange.

'There are eye-holes in the neck,' he said to Dick. 'That's how Mr. Binks knew where he was going. I kept wondering why he didn't bump into things more than he did! Now - I'm ready. The head seems to be on firmly. I'll count - one-two, one-two - and we'll walk in time. Don't let's start any funny tricks till we're used to Clopper. Does my voice sound funny inside the neck?'

'Most peculiar,' said Dick, who was now bending over so that his back made the horse's back, and his arms were round Julian's waist. 'I say, what's that?'

'Someone's coming, it's the Guv'nor coming back!' said Julian in alarm. 'Quick, gallop out of the door before we're caught.'

And so, to the Guv'nor's enormous surprise Clopper galloped very clumsily out of the barn door just as he was coming in, almost knocking him over. At first he didn't realize it was Clopper, then he let out a loud roar and gave chase.

'I can't see,' panted poor Julian. 'Where am I going? Oh thank goodness, it's an empty stable! Quick, let's un-zip ourselves, and you'll have to take this head off for me. I can't manage it myself.'

But alas and alack! The zip got stuck and wouldn't come undone. The boys tugged and pulled but it wasn't a bit of good. It looked as if they had got to be Clopper for the rest of the evening!

Chapter 12

A TRIP TO THE TOWER

'Blow this zip!' said Julian, desperately. 'It's got absolutely stuck! It's so difficult for us to undo it from the inside of the beastly horse. Oh, this head. I must get it off.'

He pushed at the head but somehow or other it had got wedged on him, and Julian felt that short of pulling his own head off he would certainly never get Clopper's off!

The horse sat down, exhausted, looking a very peculiar shape. Julian leaned the head against the wall of the stable and panted. 'I'm so hot,' he complained. 'Dick, for goodness sake think of something. We'll have to get help. But I daren't go back to the barn because of the Guv'nor, and we really can't appear in the kitchen like this. Everyone would have a fit, and Sid and Mr. Binks would be furious with us.'

'I think we were asses to try this,' said Dick, pulling viciously at the zip again. 'Ugh! What use are zips, I'd like to know. I feel most uncomfortable. Can't you get in some other position, Ju? I seem to be standing on my head or something.'

'Let's go and scout round the kitchen,' said Julian trying to get up. Dick tried to get up too, but they both fell down on top of one another. They tried again and this time stood up rather shakily.

'It's not as easy as it looks, is it, to be a two-man horse,' said Julian. 'I wish I could get these eye holes in the right place. I'm absolutely blind!'

However, he managed to adjust them at last, and the two boys made their way cautiously and clumsily out of the stable. They went carefully over the farm-yard, Julian counting one-two, one-two, under his breath so that they walked in time with one another.

They came to the kitchen door and debated whether to try and catch someone's attention without going in. There was a fairly large window near by, open because of the warmth of the kitchen.

Julian decided to take a look through to see if George or Anne were anywhere near. If so, he could call them outside.

But he reckoned without the clumsiness of the big head! It knocked against the window-frame, and everyone looked up. There were shrieks at once.

'A horse! Farmer Penruthlan, one of your horses is loose!' cried a villager who was helping with the supper. 'He looked in at the window!'

The farmer went out at once. Julian and Dick backed hurriedly away and trotted in very good style over the farm-yard. Where now? The farmer saw their moving figure in the darkness and went after them.

Trot-trot-trot went the horse desperately then gallop-gallop-gallop! But that finished them, because the back and front legs didn't gallop together, got entangled and down went the horse! The farmer ran up in alarm, thinking that his horse had fallen.

'Take your knee out of my mouth,' mumbled an angry voice, and the farmer stopped suddenly, astounded to hear a human voice coming from the horse. Then he realized what was happening - it was the stage horse with two people in it! Who? It sounded like Julian and Dick. He gave the horse a gentle kick.

'Don't,' said Dick's voice. 'For goodness' sake whoever it is, un-zip us! We're suffocating!'

The farmer let out a terrific guffaw, bent down and felt for the zip. One good pull and the horse's canvas skin came in half as the zip was undone.

The boys clambered out thankfully. 'Oh - er - thanks awfully, Mr. Penruthlan,' said Julian, rather embarrassed. 'We - er - we were just having a canter round.'

Mr. Penruthlan gave another hearty roar and went off towards the kitchen to finish his meal. Dick and Julian felt very thankful. They carried the legs and head of the horse cautiously towards the barn. They peeped in at a window. The Guv'nor was there, striding up and down, looking extremely angry.

Julian waited till he was at the far end of the barn, and then hurriedly pushed the legs and head in at the door, as quietly as he could. When the Guv'nor turned round to stride angrily back the first thing he saw was the bundle that was Clopper! He raced over to it at once, and looked out of the door.

But Julian and Dick had gone. They could own up the next day when things were not quite so exciting! They slid quietly into the kitchen, feeling hot and untidy, hoping that nobody would notice them.

George and Anne saw them at once. George came over. 'What have you been doing? You've been ages and ages. Do you want any more to eat before everything is finished up?'

'Tell you everything afterwards,' said Julian. 'Yes, we do want something to eat. I've hardly had a thing yet. I'm starving!'

Mr. Penruthlan was back in his place eating again. He pointed with his knife at the boys sliding into their seats. 'Ock-ock-oo,' he said, beginning to laugh, and added a few more equally puzzling words.

'Oh, they've been to help you catch the horse that peeped in at the window, have they?' said Mrs. Penruthlan, nodding. 'Which horse was it?'

'Clopper!' said the farmer, quite clearly, and gave a loud guffaw again. Nobody understood what he meant, so nothing more was said. George and Anne guessed, though, and grinned at the two boys.

It was a wonderful evening altogether, and everyone was sorry that it had to come to an end. The village women and the two girls stacked the dirty dishes and plates and the boys carried them to the sink to be washed. The Barnies gave a hand where they could, and the big kitchen was full of chatter and laughter. It was very pleasant indeed.

But at last the kitchen was empty again, and the big lamp turned out. The village women went home, the Barnies departed. Old Grandad took Yan's hand and went back to his sheep, saying dolefully that he'd 'et a mort too much and wouldn't be able to sleep a wink, so he wouldn't.'

'Never mind. It was worth it, Grandad,' said Mrs. Penruthlan, and shut and locked the kitchen door. She looked round, tired but happy. There was nothing she liked better than to spend hours upon hours preparing delicious dishes for people and then see them eaten in no time at all! The children thought she was truly wonderful.

They were soon all in bed and asleep. The Penruthlans were asleep, too. Only the kitchen cat was awake, watching for mice in the kitchen. She didn't like a crowd. She liked the kitchen to herself! Next day was fair and warm, though a stiff breeze still blew. Mrs. Penruthlan spoke to the four children at breakfast-time.

'I'll be busy today cleaning up the mess. How would you like to take a picnic lunch of some of the remains of the supper and stay out all day? It's a nice day, and you'll enjoy it.'

Nothing could be better! Julian had already planned to make his way to the old tower once used by the Wreckers, and explore it. Now they would have all day to do it in!

'Oh, yes, Mrs. Penruthlan, we'd love to do that,' he said. 'Let the girls get the picnic stuff ready for us. You've plenty to do!'

But no, Mrs. Penruthlan wouldn't let anyone deal with food but herself. She proceeded to pack up enough food for twelve people, or so Julian thought when he saw her preparations!

They set off together happily, with Timmy at their heels. The four farm dogs accompanied them for some way, tearing on in front and then tearing back trying to make Timmy as mad as they were. But Timmy was sedate, walking along as if to say, 'I'm taking these children for a walk, I've no time to play with you. You're only farm dogs!'

'Do we want Yan with us if he turns up?' asked George. 'Do we particularly want him to know what we are doing today?'

Julian considered. 'No, I don't think we do want him with us. We may find out something we don't want him to know, or to spread around.'

'Right,' said George. 'Well, just you send him off, then, if he comes. I'm fed up with him. Thank goodness he's a bit cleaner than he was!'

Yan did appear, of course. He came up silently on his bare feet. Nobody would have known he was trotting behind if it hadn't been for Timmy. Timmy quite happily left George's heels and went to say how-do-you-do to Yan, jumping up at him in delight.

George turned round to see where Timmy was, and saw Yan. 'Julian, there's Yan!' she said.

'Hallo, Yan,' said Julian. 'Buzz off today. We're going somewhere alone.'

'I come too,' said Yan, strutting along behind. He still looked fairly clean.

'No, you don't come too,' said Julian. 'You buzz off. See? Off you go. We don't want you today.'

Yan's face took on a sullen look. He turned to Anne. 'I come too?' he said, pleadingly.

Anne shook her head. 'No, not today,' she said. 'Another time. Take this sweet, Yan, and go away.'

Yan took the sweet and turned away, his face sulky. He disappeared over the field and was soon lost to sight.

The four children and Timmy went on together, glad of their warm jerseys when the wind blew strongly. Julian gave a sudden groan.

'I shall be jolly glad when we've had our lunch,' he said. 'This bag of food is so heavy it's cutting into my shoulders.'

'Well, let's wait till we get to the tower and we can put the bags down,' said Dick. 'We'll do a little exploring before we have our lunch. I should think Mrs. Penruthlan meant us to stay out to dinner, tea and supper, the amount she's packed for us!'

They hoped they were going in the right direction. They had looked at a map, and found various lanes which they thought would eventually lead to the tower, and had worked out which was the best direction to take.

Julian had his compass and was going by that, leading them down lanes, across fields, along little paths, and sometimes along no paths at all! He felt sure, however, that they were going right. They were making for the coast, anyway.

'Look, there are two hills side by side, or cliffs, are they?' said Anne, pointing. 'I believe they are the hills between which we saw that tower.'

'Yes, you're right,' said Dick. 'We're nearly there. I wonder how people got there when the tower and the house were lived in. There appears to be no proper road at all.'

They walked on, over a rough field. They soon found themselves in a very narrow, overgrown lane, deep-set between hedges that almost met overhead.

'A green tunnel,' said Anne, pleased. 'Look out for those enormous nettles, Ju.'

At the end of the lane an overgrown path swung sharply right, and there, not far from them, was the tower! They stood and stared at it. This was where the light had flashed a hundred years ago to bring ships to their doom, and where the light had flashed only the other night.

'The tower's falling into ruin,' said Dick. 'Large pieces have dropped out of it. And I should think the house is in ruin, too, though we can't see enough of it at the moment, just a bit of the roof. Come on. This is going to be fun!'

The tower didn't look the frightening thing it had seemed on the stormy night when the boys saw the flashing light. It just looked a poor old ruin. They made their way to it through high thistles, nettles and willow-herb.

'Doesn't look as if anyone has been here for years,' said Julian, rather puzzled. 'I rather wish we'd brought a scythe to cut down these enormous weeds! We can hardly get through them. I'm stung all over with nettles, too.'

They came to the house at last, and a poor, tumbledown ruin it was! The doors had fallen in, the windows were out of shape, and had no glass, the roof was full of holes. An enormous climbing rose rambled everywhere, throwing masses of old-fashioned white roses over walls and roof to hide the ugliness of the ruin.

Only the tower seemed still strong, except at the top, where parts of the wall had crumbled away and fallen. Julian forced his way through the broken doorway into the house. Weeds grew in the floor.

'There's a stone stairway going up the tower!' he called. 'And I say, look here! What's this on each stair?'

'Oil,' said George. 'Someone's been carrying oil up in a can, or a lamp, and has spilt it. Julian, we'd better be careful. That somebody may be here still!'

Chapter 13

IN THE WRECKERS' TOWER

Dick and Anne came hurriedly up to the old stone stairway when they heard what Julian and Georgie had said. Oil! That could only mean one thing, a lamp in the tower.

They all stood and looked at the big splashes of oil on each step.

'Come on up,' said Julian at last. 'I'll go first. Be careful how you go because the tower's in a very crumbly state.'

The tower was built at one end of the old house, and its walls were thicker than the house walls. The only entry to it was by a doorway inside the house. In the tower was a stone stairway that went very steeply up in a spiral.

'This must once have been the door of the tower,' said Dick, kicking at a great thick slab of wood that lay mouldering away beside the stone doorway. 'The tower doesn't seem to hold anything but this stone stairway, just a look-out, I suppose.'

'Or a place for signalling to ships to entice them on the rocks,' said George. 'Oh, Timmy, don't push past like that; you nearly made me fall, these stone steps are so steep.'

As Dick said, the tower seemed to hold nothing but a stairway spiralling up steeply. Julian came to the top first and gave a gasp. The view over the sea was astonishing. He could see for miles over the dark cornflower-blue waters. Near the coast the churning of the waves into white breakers and spray showed the hidden rocks that waited for unwary ships.

George came up beside him and stared in wonder, too. What a marvellous sight, blue sky, blue sea, waves pounding over the rocks, and white gulls soaring on the stiff breeze.

Then Dick came up, and Julian gave him a warning. 'Be careful. Don't lean on the walls at all, they're crumbling badly.'

Julian put out his hand and touched the top of the tower wall near him. It crumbled and bits fell away below.

Big pieces had fallen away here and there, leaving great gaps in the wall round the top of the tower. When Anne came up also, Julian took her arm, afraid that with such a crowd up there someone might stumble against a crumbling wall and fall from the tower.

George had hold of Timmy's collar and made him stand quite still. 'Don't you go putting your great paws up on the wall,' she warned him. 'You'll find yourself down in the nettles below in no time if you do!'

'You can quite well see what a wonderful place this is for flashing a light at night over the sea,' said Dick. 'It could be seen for miles. In the old days, when sailing ships got caught in the storms that rage round this coast at times, they would be thankful to see a guiding light.'

'But what a light!' said Julian. 'A light that guided them straight on to those great rocks! Let me see now. Are those the rocks near those coves we went to the other day?'

'Yes, I think so,' said Dick. 'But there are rocks and rocks, and caves and coves round here. It's difficult to tell if they are the same ones we saw.'

'The ships that sailed towards the light must have been wrecked on the rocks down there,' said Julian, pointing. 'How did the wreckers get there? There must have been a path from here somewhere.'

'The Wreckers' Way, do you think?' said Dick.

Julian considered. 'Well, I don't know. I imagine that the Wreckers' Way must have been a way leading to the sea from inland somewhere, certainly a way that was convenient for the villagers to use. No, I'll tell you what I think happened!'

'What?' said everyone.

'I think, on a stormy night long ago, the people who lived here in this house went up into the tower and flashed their false light to any ship that was sailing out on the waters. Then, in great excitement, they watched it sailing nearer and nearer, perhaps shown up by lightning, perhaps by the moon.'

Everyone imagined such a ship, and George shivered. Poor wretched ship!

'When the ship reached the rocks and crashed on them, the signallers in the tower gave a different signal, a signal to a watcher up there on the hills,' said Julian, pointing behind him. 'A watcher who was standing on the only spot from which the flash could be seen! May be the light gleamed steadily to entice a ship in, but was flashed in code to the watcher on the hills, and the flashing said, 'Ship on rocks. Tell the others, and come to the feast!' '

'How simply horrible!' said Anne. 'I can't believe it!'

'It is difficult to think anyone could be so heartless,' said Julian. 'But I think that's what happened. And then, I think, the people who lived in this house went down from here to the near-by coves and waited for their friends to come along the other way, the Wreckers' Way, wherever that is.'

'It must be a secret way,' said Dick. 'It must have been a way known only to those villagers who were wreckers. After all, wrecking was against the law, and so this whole business of showing lights and wrecking ships must have been kept a dead secret. We heard what old Grandad said, that every wrecker who knew the way had to vow he would tell no one else.'

'Old Grandad's father probably lived in this very house, and climbed the stone stairway on a wild night, and lighted the lamp that shone out over the stormy sea,' said Julian.

'That's why Yan said he was 'frit' of this tower,' said George. 'He thinks his Grandad's dad still lights it! Well, we know better. Somebody else lights it, somebody who can't be up to any good either!'

'And, don't let's forget, somebody who may still be about somewhere!' said Julian, lowering his voice suddenly.

'Gosh! yes,' said Dick, looking round the little tower as if he expected to see a stranger there, listening. 'I wonder where he keeps his lamp. It's not here.'

'The oil splashes are on almost every one of the stone steps,' said Anne. 'I noticed as I came up. I bet it's a big lamp. It has to give a light far out to sea!'

'Look, it must have been stood on this bit of the wall,' said Dick. 'There are some oily patches here.'

They all looked at the dark patches. Dick bent down and smelt them. 'Yes, paraffin oil,' he said.

George was looking at the wall on the other side of the tower. She called to the other three.

'And here's a patch on this side!' she said. 'I know what happened! Once a ship had been caught by the light and was on its way in, the men with the lamp put it on the other side of the tower to signal to the watcher on the hills, to tell him the ship was caught!'

'Yes. That's it,' said Anne. 'But who could it be? I'm sure nobody lives here, the place is an absolute ruin, open to the wind and the rain. It must be somebody who knows the way here, sees to the light, and does the signalling.'

There was a pause. Dick looked at Julian. The same thought came into their minds. They had seen somebody wandering out in the stormy night, twice!

'Could it be Mr. Penruthlan, do you suppose?' said Dick. 'We couldn't imagine why he was out here in the storm the first night we came out to watch for the light.'

'No, he's not the man with the light, he's the watcher on the hills!' said Julian. 'That's it! That's why he goes out on wild nights, to see if there's a signal from the tower, flashing to say that a ship is coming in!'

There was an even longer pause. Nobody liked that idea at all.

'We know he tells lies, we know he goes through people's pockets, because we saw him,' went on Julian after a few moments. 'He fits in well. He's the man who goes and stands in that special spot on the hills and watches for a light!'

'What does he do after that?' said Anne. 'Didn't we hear that there were no wrecks here now, because of the lighthouse higher up the coast? What's the point of it all, if there isn't a wreck?'

'Smuggling,' said Julian shortly. 'That's the point. Probably by motor-boat. They choose a wild night of storm and wind, when they will be neither seen nor heard, wait out at sea for the signalling light to show them all's clear, and then come in to one of these coves.'

'Yes, and I bet the Wreckers' secret way is used by someone who steals down to the cove and takes the smuggled goods!' said Dick, excited. 'Three or four people, perhaps, if the goods are heavy. Gosh! I'm sure we're right.'

'And it's the watcher on the hill who tells his friends, and down they go to the coves together. It's most ingenious,' Julian said. 'Nobody sees the light on the tower except the boat waiting, and nobody sees the signal inland except the one watcher on the hills. Absolutely fool-proof.'

'We are lucky to stumble on it,' said Dick. 'But what puzzles me is this. I'm pretty certain that the man who lights the lamp didn't come the way we came - we'd have seen trodden-down weeds or something. We should certainly have found some sort of a path his feet had made.'

'Yes. And there wasn't anything, not even a broken thistle,' said Anne. 'There must be some other way into this old house.'

'Of course there is! We've already said there must be a way for the man who lights the lamp to get down to the coves from here!' said George. 'Well, that's the way he gets here, of course. He comes up the passage from the cove. How stupid we are!'

This idea excited them all. Where was the passage? Nobody could imagine! It certainly wasn't in the tower, there was no room for anything in that small tower except for the spiral staircase leading to the top.

'Let's go down,' said Anne, and began to descend the steps. A slight noise below made her stop.

'Go on,' said George, who was just behind her. Anne turned a scared face to her.

'I heard a noise down there,' she whispered.

George turned to Julian immediately. 'Anne thinks there's somebody down there,' she said, in a low voice.

'Come back, Anne,' ordered Julian at once. Anne climbed back, still looking scared.

'Would it be the man who does the lamp?' she whispered. 'Do be careful, Julian. He can't be a nice man!'

'Nice! He must be a beast!' said George, scornfully. 'Are you going down, Ju? Look out, then.'

Julian peered down the stone steps. There was really nothing for it but to go down and see who was there. They couldn't possibly stay up in the tower all day long, hoping that whoever it was would go away!

'What sort of noise did you hear?' Julian asked Anne.

'Well, a sort of scuffling noise,' said Anne. 'It might have been a rat, of course, or a rabbit. It was just a noise, that's all. Something's down there, or somebody!'

'Let's sit down for a moment or two and wait,' said Dick. 'We'll listen hard and see if we can hear anyone.'

So they sat down cautiously, George with her hand on Timmy's collar. They waited and they listened. They heard the wind blowing round the old tower. They heard the distant gulls calling, 'ee-oo, ee-oo, ee-oo'. They heard the thistles rustling their prickles together down below.

But they heard nothing from the kitchen at the foot of the tower. Julian looked at Anne. 'No sound to be heard now,' he said. 'It must have been a rabbit!'

'Perhaps it was,' said Anne, feeling rather foolish. 'What shall we do then? Go down?'

'Yes. I'll go first though, with Timmy,' said Julian. 'If anyone is lying in wait, he'll be annoyed to see our Timmy. And Timmy will be even more annoyed to see him!'

Just as Julian was getting up, a noise was quite distinctly heard from below. It was, as Anne had described, a kind of scuffle, then silence.

'Well, here goes!' said Julian, and began to descend the steps. The others watched breathlessly. Timmy went with Julian, trying to press past him. He hadn't seemed worried about the noise at all! So perhaps it was only a rat or rabbit!

Julian went down slowly. Who was he going to find - an enemy, or a friend? Careful now, Julian, there may be somebody lying in wait!

Chapter 14

THE SECRET PASSAGE

Julian paused on the last step of the spiral staircase and listened. Not a sound came from the near-by room. 'Who's there?' said Julian, sharply. 'I know you're there! I heard you!'

Still not a sound! The kitchen, overgrown with weeds and dark with ivy and the white rambling rose, seemed to be listening to him, but there was no answer!

Julian stepped right into the room and looked round. Nothing was there - nobody was there! The place was absolutely empty and quiet. Julian went through a doorway into another room. That was empty, too. The old house only had four rooms altogether, two of them very tiny, and every one of them was empty. Timmy didn't seem disturbed at all, either, nor did he bark as he certainly would have done if there had been any intruder there.

'Well, Timmy, it's a false alarm,' said Julian, relieved. 'Must have been a rabbit, or even a bit of wall crumbling and falling. What are you sniffing at there?'

Timmy was sniffing with interest at a corner near the doorway. He stood and looked at Julian as if he would like to tell him something. Julian went over to see what it was.

There was nothing there except for some rather flattened weeds, growing through the floor. Julian couldn't think why Timmy should be interested. However, Timmy soon wandered away and went all round the place, wondering why they had come to such a peculiar house.

'Dick! Bring the girls down!' shouted Julian up the stone stairway. 'There doesn't seem to be anyone here, after all. It must have been some small animal that Anne heard.'

The others clattered down in relief. 'I'm sorry I gave you all a shock,' said Anne. 'But it did sound like somebody down there! However, I'm sure Timmy would have barked if so! He didn't seem at all disturbed.'

'No. I think we can safely say that it was a false alarm,' said Dick. 'What do we do next? Have our lunch? Or hunt about to see if we can find the entrance to the passage that leads from here down to the coves?'

Julian looked at his watch. 'It's not really time for lunch yet, unless you're all frightfully hungry,' he said.

'Well, I'm beginning to feel jolly hungry,' said Dick. 'But, on the other hand, I feel I can't wait to find that passage! Where on earth is the entrance?'

'I've been in all four rooms,' said Julian. 'None of them seems to have anything but weeds in, no old door leading out of the walls, no trapdoor. It's a puzzle.'

'Well, we'll all have a jolly good hunt,' said George. 'This is the sort of thing I like. Timmy, you hunt, too!'

They began to explore the four rooms of the old house. As weeds grew more or less all over the floor they felt that there could be no trapdoor. If there had been, and the man with the lamp used it, the weeds would surely have shown signs of it. But they grew quite undisturbed.

'Listen,' said Julian at last. 'I've got an idea. We'll make Timmy find the entrance.'

'How?' said George at once.

'Well, we'll make him smell the oil drips on the steps, and follow with his nose any others that have dripped in the weeds,' said Julian. 'I don't suppose the lamp dripped only on the steps. It must have dripped all the way from the passage entrance, wherever it is, to the top of the tower. Couldn't Timmy sniff them out? They would lead us to the entrance we're trying to find!'

'All right. But I'm beginning to believe there is no entrance,' said George, getting hold of Timmy's collar. 'We've looked over every single inch of this house. Come on, Tim, you've got to perform a miracle!'

Timmy's nose was firmly placed over the oil-drip on the bottom stair. 'Sniff it, Timmy, and follow,' said George.

Timmy knew perfectly well what she meant. George had trained him well! He sniffed hard at the oil and then started up the stone steps for the next oil patch. But George pulled him back.

'No, Tim. Not that way. This way. There must be other oil drips on the floor of the house.'

Timmy amiably turned the other way. He found an oil drip at once, on a patch of weeds growing on the floor. He sniffed it and went on to another and another.

'Good old Timmy,' said George, delighted. 'Isn't he clever, Ju? He's following where the man walked when he carried that lamp! Go on, Timmy, where's the next drip?'

It was an easy, strong-smelling trail for Timmy to follow! He followed it, sniffing, out of one room into another, smaller one. Then into a third, bigger one, which must have been the main room, for it had a very big fire-place. Timmy went straight to the fireplace, his nose to the ground. In fact, he went right into the hearth, and there came to a stop. He looked round at George and barked.

'He says the trail ends here,' said George, in excitement. 'So the entrance to the secret passage must be in this big fire-place!'

The others crowded to the hearth. Julian produced his torch and shone it up the chimney. It was an enormous one, though part of the top of it had now fallen away. 'Nothing there,' said Julian. 'But - hallo - what's this?'

He now shone his torch to the side of the big fireplace and saw a small, dark cavity there, barely big enough for a man to get into. 'Look!' he said, excited. 'I believe we've found it. See that small hole? Well, I bet if we crawl through that we'll find it's the way to the secret passage! Good old Timmy!'

'We shall get absolutely filthy,' said Anne.

'You would say that!' said George, scornfully. 'Who cares? This may be very important, mayn't it, Ju?'

'Rather!' said Julian. 'If we're on to what we think we are, and that's Smuggling with a big S, it is important. Well, what about it? Lunch first, or exploring that hole?'

'Exploring, of course,' said Dick. 'What about letting old Tim go first? I'll give him a leg-up.'
Timmy was hoisted up to the black hole, and disappeared into it with delight. Rabbits? Rats?
What were the children after? This was a fine game!

'Now I'll go,' said Julian, and clambered up. 'It's a bit difficult to squeeze into. Dick, you help Anne and George up next, and then you come.'

He disappeared, and one by one the others also hoisted themselves to the hole and crawled in, too. Anne wished she had shorts on, like George. Even a short skirt was a nuisance in performances of this kind!

The hole was merely an entrance to a narrow standing-place at the side of the chimney. Julian got down from the hole, and stood still for a moment, wondering if this was just an old hiding-place, and not an entrance to anywhere, after all. But then, just to the right of his feet, he saw another hole that dropped sharply downwards.

He flashed his torch down, and saw iron hand-grips at one side. He called back and told the others. Then he descended into the hole, at first using the grips for his feet and then for his hands as well.

The hole went down as straight as a well. It came to a sudden end, and Julian found himself standing on solid ground. He turned round, flashing his torch.

There was the passage, in front of him! It must be the one that led down to the coves, the one that the man with the lamp must have used long ago, when he went to gloat over the groaning ships on the rocks.

Julian could hear the others coming down the shaft. He suddenly thought of Timmy. Where was he? He must have fallen headlong down the hole and found himself suddenly at the bottom. Poor Tim! Julian hoped he hadn't hurt himself, but as he hadn't yelped, perhaps he had fallen like a cat, on his feet!

He called up to the others. 'I've found the passage. It starts at the bottom of the shaft. I'll go along it a little way and wait for you all to come. Then we can keep together in a line.'

Soon everyone was safely down the shaft. George began to worry about Timmy. 'He must have hurt himself, Ju! Falling all that way; Oh, dear, where is he?'

'We'll soon come across him, I expect,' said Julian. 'Now, keep close together, everybody. The path goes downwards pretty steeply, as you might expect.'

It certainly did. In places the four children almost slithered along. Then Julian discovered iron staples fixed here and there in the steepest places, and after that they held on to them in the most slippery spots.

'These iron staples would be jolly useful to anyone coming up,' said Julian. 'It would be almost impossible to climb up this passage without something to help the climber to pull himself up. Ah, here's a more level stretch.'

The level part soon became much wider. And then, quite suddenly, it became a cave! The four came out into it in surprise. It was rather low-roofed, and the walls were made of black rock, that glistened in the light of the torch.

'I wish I could find Timmy,' said George, uneasily. 'I can't even hear him anywhere!'

'We'll go on till we come to the cove,' said Julian. 'This must lead us right down to the shore, probably to the very cove where the ships were wrecked. Look, there's a kind of rocky arch leading out of this cave.'

They went through the archway and into yet another passage that wound between jutting rocks, which made it rather difficult to get through at times. Then suddenly the passage divided into two. One fork went meandering off towards the seaward side, the other into the cliff.

'Better take the seaward side,' said Julian. They were just going to take the right-hand passage when George stopped and clutched at Julian. 'Listen!' she said. 'I can hear Timmy!'

They all stopped and listened. George had the sharpest ears of the lot, and she could hear him barking. So could the others after a few moments. Bark-bark-bark! Bark-bark-bark! Yes, it was Timmy all right!

'Timmy!' yelled George, making the others jump almost out of their skins. 'TIMMY!'

'He can't hear you all this way away,' said Dick. 'Gosh, you made me jump. Come on, we'll have to take the cliff passage. Timmy's barking comes from that direction, not this.'

'Yes, I agree,' said Julian. 'We'll go and collect him, and then come back and take the other passage. I'm sure it leads down to the sea.'

They made their way along the left-hand passage. It was not difficult, because it was much wider than the one they had already come down. Timmy's barking became louder and louder as they went down. George whistled piercingly, hoping that Timmy would come rushing up. But he didn't.

'It's funny that he doesn't come,' said George, worried. 'I think he must be hurt. TIMMY!'

The passage wound round a corner, and then once more divided into two. To the children's surprise they saw a rough door set into the rocky wall of the passage on the left-hand side. A door! How very extraordinary!

'Look, a door!' said Dick, amazed. 'And a jolly stout one, too.'

'Timmy's behind it!' said George. 'He must have gone through it and it shut behind him. Timmy! We're here! We're coming!'

She pushed at the door, but it didn't open. She saw that it was lightly latched, and lifted the old iron latch. The door opened easily and all the four went through into a curious cave beyond. It was more like a low-roofed room!

Timmy flung himself at them as soon as they came through the door. He wasn't hurt. He was so pleased to see them that he barked the place down! 'Woof! WOOWOOF!'

'Oh, Timmy, how did you get here?' said George, hugging him. 'Did the door click behind you? My word, what a queer place this is! It's a storeroom - look at all the boxes and crates and things!'

They looked round the strange cave, and at that moment there was a soft click. Then something slid smoothly into place. Julian leapt to the door and tried to open it.

'It's locked! Somebody's locked it, and bolted it! I heard them. Let us out, let us out, I say!'

Chapter 15

LOCKED IN THE CAVE

Dick, George and Anne looked at one another in dismay. Someone must have been lying in wait for them, someone must have captured Timmy and shut him up. And now they were captured, too!

Timmy began to bark when Julian shouted. He ran to the door. Julian was hammering on it and even kicking it.

A voice came from the other side of the door, a drawling voice, sounding rather amused.

'You came at an awkward time, that's all, and you must remain where you are till tomorrow.'

'Who are you?' said Julian fiercely. 'How dare you lock us in like this!'

'I believe you have food and drink with you,' said the voice. 'I noticed the packs on your backs, which I presume contain food. That is lucky for you! Now be sensible. You must pay the penalty of being inquisitive!'

'You let us out!' shouted Julian, enraged at the cool voice with its impertinent tone. He kicked the door again out of temper, though he knew that it wasn't the slightest use!

There was no reply. Whoever it was outside the cave door had gone. Julian gave the door one last furious kick and looked round at the others.

'That fellow must have been watching us from somewhere. Probably followed us all the way to the old house, and saw the packs on our backs then. It must have been he that you heard down in the house when we were in the tower, Anne.'

Timmy barked again. He was still at the door. George called him. 'Tim! It's no use! The door's locked. Oh dear, why did we let you go into that hole first? If you hadn't run on ahead and somehow got yourself caught, you'd have been able to protect us when those men lay in wait!'

'Well, what do we do now?' said Anne, trying to sound brave.

'What can we do?' said George. 'Nothing at all! Here we are, locked and bolted in a cave inside the cliff, with nobody near except the fellow who locked us in. If anybody's got any good ideas I'd like to hear them!'

'You do sound cross!' said Anne. 'I suppose there isn't anything to do but wait till we're let out. I only hope that man remembers we're here. Nobody else knows where we are.'

'Horrid thought!' said Dick. 'Still, I've no doubt that Mrs. Penruthlan would raise the alarm, and a search-party would set out to find us.'

'What a hope they'd have!' said George. 'Even if they did trace us to the old tower, they wouldn't know the secret entrance to the passage!'

'Well, let's look on the cheerful side,' said Julian, undoing the pack from his back. 'Let's have some food.'

Everybody cheered up at once. 'I feel quite hungry,' said Anne in surprise. 'It must be past our dinner time now. Well, anyway, eating will be something to do!'

They had a very good meal and felt thankful that Mrs. Penruthlan had packed up so much food. If they were not going to be let out till the next day they would need plenty to eat!

They examined the boxes and crates. Some were very old. All were empty. There was a big seaman's chest there, too, with 'Abram Trelawny' painted on it. They lifted the lid. That was empty, too, save for one old brass button.

'Abram Trelawny,' said Dick, looking at the name. 'He must have been a sailor on one of the ships that the Wreckers enticed to the rocks. This chest must have been rolled up on the beach by the waves and brought up here. I dare say this cave was the place where the man who owned that old house took his share of the booty and hid it.'

'Yes, I think you're right,' said Julian. 'That is why it has a door that can be locked. The Wrecker probably stored quite a lot of valuable things here from different wrecks, and didn't want any other Wrecker to creep up from the cave and take them. What a hateful lot they must have been! Well, there doesn't seem anything of real interest here.'

It was very, very boring in the cave. The children used only one torch because they were afraid that if they used the two they had brought they might exhaust both batteries, and then have to be in the dark.

Julian examined the cave from top to bottom to see if there was any possible way of escape. But there wasn't. That was quite clear. The cave walls were made of solid rock, and there wasn't a hole anywhere through which to escape, big or small!

'That fellow said we'd come at an awkward time,' said Julian, throwing himself down on the ground. 'Why? Are they expecting some smuggled goods tonight? They've signalled out to sea twice already this week, as we know. Hasn't the boat they expected come along yet? If so, they must be expecting it tonight, and so we've come at an awkward time!'

'If only we weren't locked in this beastly cave!' said George. 'We might have spied on them and seen what they were up to, and might even have been able to stop them somehow, or get word to the police.'

'Well, we can't now,' said Dick gloomily. 'Timmy, you were an ass to get caught; you really were.'

Timmy put his tail down and looked as gloomy as Dick. He didn't like being in this low-roofed cave. Why didn't they open the door and go out? He went to the door and whined, scraping at it with his feet.

'No good, Tim. It won't open,' said Anne. 'I think he's thirsty, George.'

There was nothing for Timmy to drink except home-made lemonade, and he didn't seem to like that very much.

'Don't waste it on him if he doesn't like it,' said Julian hastily. 'We may be jolly glad of it ourselves tomorrow.'

Dick glanced at his watch. 'Only half past two!' he groaned. 'Hours and hours to wait. Let's have a game of some sort, noughts and crosses would be better than nothing.'

They played noughts and crosses till they were sick of them. They played word-games and guessing games. They had a light tea at five o'clock and began to wonder what Mrs. Penruthlan would think when they didn't turn up that evening.

'If Mr. Penruthlan is mixed up in this affair, and it's pretty certain that he is,' said Julian, 'he'll not be best pleased to be told to fetch the police to look for us! It's just the one night he won't want the police about!'

'I think you're wrong,' said George. 'I think he'd be delighted to have the police looking for lost children, and not poking their noses into his affairs tonight!'

'I hadn't thought of that,' said Julian. How slowly the time went by. They yawned, talked, fell silent, argued and played with Timmy. Julian's torch flickered out and they took Dick's instead.

'Good thing we brought two torches!' said Anne.

Half past nine came and they all began to feel sleepy.

'I vote we try to go to sleep,' said Dick, yawning hugely. 'There's a sandy spot over there, softer to lie on than this rock. What about trying to sleep?'

They all thought it was a good idea and went to the sandy spot. It certainly was better than the hard rock. They wriggled about in the sand and made dents for their bodies to lie in.

'It's still hard,' complained George. 'Oh, Timmy darling, don't snuffle all round my face. Lie down beside me and Anne and go to sleep, too!'

Timmy lay down on George's legs. He put his nose on his paws and heaved a huge sigh.

'I hope Timmy's not going to do that all night,' said Anne. 'What a draught!'

Although they thought they couldn't possibly go to sleep, they did. Timmy did, too, though he kept one ear open and one eye ready to open. He was on guard! No one could open that door or even come near it without Timmy hearing!

At about eleven o'clock Timmy opened one eye and cocked both ears. He listened, not taking his head off George's legs. He opened the other eye.

Then he sat up and listened harder. George woke up when he moved and stretched out a hand to Timmy. 'Tim, lie down,' she whispered. But Timmy didn't. He gave a small whine.

George sat up, fully awake. Why was Timmy whining? Was there something going on outside the door, men passing perhaps, on their way to the cove? Had the light been flashing out to sea and had it brought in the boat the men were waiting for?

She put her hand on Timmy's collar. 'What is it?' she whispered, expecting Timmy to growl when he next heard something. But he didn't growl. He whined again.

Then he shook off George's hand and went to the door. George switched on her torch, puzzled. Timmy scraped at the door and whined again. But still he didn't growl.

'Ju! I believe someone is at the door!' called George, suddenly, in a low voice. 'I believe Timmy can hear a search-party or something. Wake up!'

Everyone awoke suddenly. George repeated her words again. 'Timmy's not growling. That means it's not our enemies he hears,' she added. 'He'd growl like anything at the man who locked us in.'

'Be quiet for a moment and listen,' said Julian. 'Let's see if we can hear anything ourselves. We haven't got Timmy's sharp ears, but we might be able to hear something.'

They sat absolutely still, listening. Then Julian nudged Dick. He had heard something. 'Quiet!' he breathed. They listened again, hardly breathing.

They heard a little scrabbling noise at the door. Then it stopped. George expected Timmy to break out into a fusillade of barks at once, but he didn't. He stood there with his head on one side and his ears cocked. He gave an excited little whine and suddenly scraped at the door again.

Somebody whispered outside the door, and Timmy whined and ran to George and then back to the door again. Everyone was puzzled.

Julian got up and went to the door himself, his feet making no sound. Yes, there was most certainly somebody outside, two people, perhaps, whispering to one another?

'Who's there?' said Julian suddenly. 'I can hear you outside. Who is it?'

There was dead silence for a moment, and then a small familiar voice answered softly: 'It's me. Yan.'

'Yan! Gosh! Is it really you?'

'Iss.'

There was an amazed silence in the cave. Yan! Yan at this time of night outside the door of the very cave they were locked in! Were they dreaming?

Timmy went mad when he heard Yan speaking to Julian. He flung himself at the door, barking and yelping. Julian put his hand on his collar. 'Be quiet, idiot! You'll spoil everything! Be quiet!'

Timmy stopped. Julian spoke to Yan again. 'Yan, have you got a light?'

'No. No light. It is dark here,' said Yan. 'Can I come to you?'

'Yes, of course. Listen, Yan. Do you know how to unlock and unbolt a door?' asked Julian, wondering whether the half-wild boy knew even such simple things.

'Iss,' said Yan. 'Are you locked in?'

'Yes,' said Julian. 'But the key may be in the lock. Feel and see. Feel for the bolts, too. Slide them back and turn the key if there is one.'

The four in the cave held their breath as they heard Yan's hands wandering over the stout door in the dark, tapping here and there to find the bolts and the lock.

Then they heard the bolts being slid smoothly back. How they hoped their captor had left the key in the lock!

'Here is a key,' said Yan's voice suddenly. 'But it is so stiff. My hand isn't strong enough to turn it.'

'Try both hands at once,' said Julian urgently.

They heard Yan trying, panting with his efforts. But the key would not turn.

'Blow!' said Dick. 'So near and yet so far!'

Anne pushed Dick out of the way, an idea suddenly flooding into her mind. 'Yan! Listen to me, Yan. Take the key out of the lock and push it under the bottom of the door. Do you hear me?'

'Iss, I hear,' said Yan, and they heard him tugging at the key. There was a sharp noise as it came suddenly out of the lock. Then, lo and behold! It appeared under the bottom of the door, slid through carefully by Yan!

Julian snatched it up and put it into the lock his side. He turned the key, and unlocked the door.

What a wonderful bit of luck!

Chapter 16
WRECKERS' WAY

Julian flung open the door. Timmy leapt past him and yelped with delight to find Yan standing outside. He fawned on the boy and licked him, and Yan laughed.

'Let's get out of here, quick!' said Dick. 'That man may be along at any moment, you can't tell.'

'Right. Explanations later,' said Julian. He hustled everyone out, took the key from the inside lock and shut the door. He inserted the key into the outside lock and turned it. He shot the bolts, took out the key and put it into his pocket. He grinned at Dick.

'Now if that fellow comes along to see how we are he won't even know we're gone! He won't be able to get in to see if we're there or not.'

'Where shall we go now?' asked Anne, feeling as if she was in a peculiar kind of dream.

Julian stood and considered. 'It would be madness to go back up the passage and into the old house,' he said. 'If there's any signalling going on, and there's pretty certain to be, we shall be caught again. We'd be sure to make a noise scrambling out of that hole in the fire-place.'

'Well, let's take that other passage we saw, the righthand one,' said George. 'Look, there it is.' She shone her torch on it. 'Where does it lead to, Yan?'

'To the beach,' said Yan. 'I went down it when I was looking for you all, but you weren't there, so I came back and found that door. There is nobody on the beach.'

'Well, let's go down there, then,' said Dick. 'Once we feel we're out of danger's way we can plan what's best to do.'

They went along the other passage, their torch showing them the way. It was a steep tunnel, and they found it rather difficult going. Anne managed to give Yan a squeeze.

'You were clever to find us!' she said, and Yan gave her a smile which she couldn't see because of the dark.

They heard the sound of waves at last and came out into the open air. It was a windy night, but stars were shining in the sky, and gave quite a fair light after the darkness of the passage.

'Where are we exactly?' said Dick, looking round. Then he saw they were on the same beach as they had been a few days before, but a good way farther along.

'Can we get back to the farm from here?' said Julian, stopping to consider exactly where they were. 'Gosh! I think we'd better hurry. The tide's coming in! We'll be cut off if we don't look out!'

A wave ran up the sand almost to their feet. Julian took a quick look at the cliff behind them. It was very steep. They certainly couldn't climb it in the darkness! Would there be time to look for a cave to sit in till the tide went out again?

Another wave ran up, and Julian's feet felt suddenly wet. 'Blow!' he said. 'This is getting serious. The next big one will sweep us off our feet. I wish the moon was out. These stars give such a faint light.'

'Yan, is there a cave we can go to, a cave open to the air, not inside the cliff?' said George, anxiously.

'I take you back by the Wreckers' Way,' said Yan, surprisingly. 'Iss. You come with me.'

'Of course, you said you knew the Wreckers' Way,' said Julian, remembering. 'If it comes out near here, we're in luck's way! Lead on, Yan. You're a marvel! But do hurry, our feet got wet again just then, and at any moment a giant of a wave may come!'

Yan took the lead. He led them into cove after cove, and then came to a larger one than usual. He took them to the back of the cove, and led them a little way up a cliff path.

He came to a great rock. He squeezed behind it and the others followed one by one. Nobody could ever have guessed that there was a way into the cliff behind that rock.

'Now we are in the Wreckers' Way,' said Yan proudly, and led them on again. But suddenly he stopped and the others all bumped into one another. Timmy gave a short, warning bark, and George put her hand on his collar.

'Somebody comes!' whispered Yan, and pushed them back. Sure enough, they could hear voices in the distance. They turned and hurried back. They didn't want to walk into any more trouble!

Yan got to the front and led them back to the big rock. He was trembling. They all squeezed out behind it, and Yan went along the cliff face to a tiny cave, really only a big ledge with an overhanging roof. 'Sssssssss!' he said warningly, sounding like a snake!

They sat down and waited. Two men came out from behind the rock, one a big man, and one a small one. Nobody could see them clearly, but Julian hissed into Dick's ear: 'I'm sure that's Mr. Penruthlan! See how enormous he is!'

Dick nodded. It was no surprise to him to think that the giant farmer should be mixed up in this. The five children held their breath and watched.

Yan nudged Dick and pointed out to sea. 'Boat comes!' he whispered.

Dick could see and hear nothing. But in a few moments he did hear something, the whirr of a fast motor-boat! What sharp ears Yan must have! The others heard the noise, too, through the crashing of the waves on the rocks.

'No light,' whispered Yan, as the noise of the boat grew louder.

'He'll be on the rocks!' said Dick. But before the boat got to the rocks, the engine stopped. The children could just make out the boat now, swaying up and down beyond the barrier of rocks. Evidently it was not going to try and come any farther in.

Now the watchers could hear voices again. The two men who had come down Wreckers' Way were standing below the big rock that hid the entrance, talking. One leapt down to a rock farther down, and disappeared. The other man was left standing alone.

'It was the big man who leapt down,' whispered Julian. 'Where's he gone? Ah, there he is! You can just see him moving behind that rock down there. What's he got?'

'A boat!' whispered Yan. 'He has a boat down there, pulled up high out of reach of the big waves. There is a pool there. He is going to row out to the other boat.'

The children strained their eyes to watch. The sky was quite clear, but the only light they had was from the stars, and it was difficult to see anything more than moving shadows or outlines.

Then there came the sound of oars in rowlocks, and a moving black shadow of a rowing-boat and man could be seen faintly, going over the waves.

'Does he know the way through that mass of rocks?' wondered Dick. 'He must know this coast well to risk rowing out through rocks at high tide in the dead of night!'

'Why is he doing it?' asked Anne.

'He's getting smuggled goods from the motorboat,' said Julian. 'Goodness knows what! There, I've lost him in the darkness.'

So had everyone. They could no longer hear the oars either, for the crashing of the waves on the rocks drowned every other sound.

Beyond the rocks lay the motor-boat, but only Yan's sharp eyes could see it even faintly in the starlight. Once, in a sudden silence of the waves, there came the exchange of voices over the water.

'He's reached the motor-boat,' said Dick. 'He'll be back in a minute.'

'Look! The second man is going down to the cove now, going to help the first one in, I expect,' said Julian. 'What about us escaping through the Wreckers' Way while we've got the chance?'

'Good idea,' said George, scrambling up. 'Come on, Timmy! Home!'

They went to the great rock arid squeezed behind it once more into the entrance of the Wreckers' Way. Then, Yan once more leading, they went up the secret passage, flicking on the torch very thankfully.

'Where does the Wreckers' Way come out?' asked Anne.

'In a shed at Tremannon Farm,' said Yan, to the astonishment of everyone.

'Goodness, so it's very nice and handy for Mr. Penruthlan!' said George. 'I wonder how many times he has been up on the hills at night, and has been warned by the tower light to go down Wreckers' Way to the cove and collect smuggled goods from some boat or other! A very good scheme, it seems to me, and impossible for anyone to find out.'

'Except us!' said Dick in a pleased voice. 'We got on to it pretty well. There's not much we don't know about Mr. Penruthlan now!'

They went on and on. The passage was fairly straight and had probably been the bed of an underground stream at some time. The way was quite smooth to the feet.

'We've walked about a mile, I should think!' groaned Dick, at last. 'How far now, Yan? Shall we soon be back?'

'Iss,' said Yan.

Anne suddenly remembered that nobody knew how it was that Yan had found them that night. She turned to him.

'Yan, how did you find us tonight? It seemed like a miracle when we woke up to find you outside that locked door!'

'It was easy,' said Yan. 'You said to me: "Go away. Do not come with us today." So I went back a little way. But I followed you. I followed you to the old house, though I was frit.'

'I guess you were frit!' said Dick with a grin. 'Well, go on.'

'I hid,' said Yan. 'You went up into the tower a long time. I came out into the room below, and...'

'It was you we heard scuffling there, then!' said Anne. 'We wondered who it was!'

'Iss,' said Yan. 'I sat down on some weeds in a corner, and waited till you came down, and then I hid again; but I watched you through a hole from outside. I saw you go through the fire-place. One minute you were there. The next you were gone. I was frit.'

'I love that word!' said Dick. 'So it was you who flattened down that patch of weeds that Timmy sniped at? Well, what did you do next?'

'I was going to come too,' said Yan. 'But the hole was so dark and black. I stood in the fire-place for a long time, hoping you would come back.'

'Then what happened?' said Dick.

'Then I heard voices,' said Yan. 'I thought it was you all coming back. But it wasn't. It was men. So I ran away and hid in the nettles.'

'What a place to choose!' said George.

'Then I was hungry,' said Yan, 'and I went back to Grandad's hut for food. He cuffed me for leaving him, and he made me work for him all day. He was angry with me.'

'My word! So you've been on the hills all day, knowing we were down in that passage!' said Julian. 'Didn't you say anything to anyone?'

'I went down to Tremannon Farm to see if you were back when it grew dark,' said Yan. 'But you weren't there. Only the Barnies were there, giving another show. I didn't see Mr. or Mrs. Penruthlan. I knew then that you must still be down in that dark hole. I was afraid the men had hurt you.'

'So you came all the way again in the dark!' said Julian, astonished. 'Well, you've got pluck, I must say!'

'I was very frit,' said Yan. 'My legs shook at the knees like my old Grandad's. I climbed in at the hole, and at last I found you.'

'With no torch to light the way!' said Dick, and clapped the small boy on the back. 'You're a real friend, Yan! Timmy knew you all right when you came to the locked door. He didn't even bark! He knew it was you.'

'I wanted to save Timmy too,' said Yan. 'Iss. Timmy is my friend.'

George said nothing to that. She was thinking, rather unwillingly, that Yan was a remarkably brave young man, and that she had been silly and unkind to resent Timmy's liking for him. What a good thing he had liked Timmy!

Yan suddenly stopped. 'We are there,' he said. 'We are at Tremannon Farm. Look above your heads.'

Julian flashed his torch upwards, and stared. An open trapdoor was just above them.

'The trapdoor is open!' he said. 'Someone came down here tonight!'

'And we know who!' said Dick, grimly. 'Mr. Penruthlan and his friend! Where does that trapdoor lead to, Yan?'

'Into a corner of the machine shed,' said Yan. 'When the trapdoor is shut, it is covered with sacks of corn or onions. They have been moved to open the way down.'

They all climbed out. Julian flashed his torch round the shed. Yes, there were the machines and the tools. Well, who would have thought that the sacks he had seen in here the other day were hiding the trapdoor that led to the Wreckers' Way!

Chapter 17

LONG AFTER MIDNIGHT!

A rat suddenly shot out from a corner of the shed, and tore across to the open trapdoor. Timmy gave a bark and leapt after it. He just stopped himself from taking a header through the trapdoor by sliding along on all four feet and coming to a stop at the entrance.

He stood up and looked down the hole, his head cocked to one side.

'Look, he's listening,' said Anne. 'Is there someone coming, those men, perhaps, with the smuggled goods?'

'No, he's only listening for the rat,' said Julian.

'I tell you what we'll do! We'll shut the trapdoor and pile sacks and boxes and everything on top of it! Then when the men come up, they'll find themselves trapped. They won't be able to get out. If we can get the police in time, they'll be able to catch them easily.'

'Good idea!' said Dick. 'Super! How mad those two men will be when they come to the trapdoor and find it shut! They can't get out the other way because the tide's up.'

'I'd like to see Mr. Penruthlan's face when he sees the trapdoor shut, and feels a whole lot of things piled on top of it!' said Julian. 'He'll make a few more of his peculiar noises!'

'Ooh - ah - ock,' said Dick, solemnly. 'Come on, help me with the trapdoor, Ju, it's heavy.'

They shut the big trapdoor and then began to drag sacks, boxes and even some kind of heavy farm machine on top of the trapdoor. Now certainly nobody could open it from underneath.

They were hot and very dirty by the time they had finished. They were also beginning to feel very tired. 'Phew!' said Dick. 'I'm glad that's done. Now we'd better go to the farm-house and show ourselves to Mrs. Penruthlan.'

'Oh dear, do we tell her about her husband, and how he's mixed up in this horrid business?' said Anne. 'I do so like her. I expect she's very worried about us, too.'

'Yes. It's going to be a bit difficult,' said Julian, soberly. 'Better let me do most of the talking. Come on, we'll go. Don't make too much row or we'll set the dogs barking. I'm surprised they haven't yelled their heads off already!'

It was rather surprising. Usually the farm-dogs barked the place down if there was any unusual noise in the night. The five children and Timmy left the machine-shed and made their way towards the farmhouse. George pulled at Julian's arm.

'Look,' she said, in a low voice. 'See those lights up in the hills? What are they?'

Julian looked. He could see moving lights here and there up on the hills. He was puzzled. Then he made a guess. 'I bet Mrs. Penruthlan has sent out searchers for us,' he said, 'and they've got lanterns. They're hunting for us on the hills. Gosh, I hope all the Barnies aren't out after us too.'

They came to the farm-yard, moving very quietly. The big barn, used by the Barnies for their show, was in darkness. Julian pictured it full of benches, left from that night's show. The memory of Mr. Penruthlan turning out the pockets of the clothes left and hunting through the drawers in the chest used by the Barnies, came into his mind.

A sharp whisper made them stop very suddenly. George put her hand on Timmy's collar to stop him growling or barking. Who was this now?

None of the little company answered or moved. The whisper came again.

'Here! I'm here!'

Still nobody moved. They were all puzzled. Who was waiting there in the shadows, and whom was he waiting for? The whisper came again, a little louder.

'Here! Over here!'

And then, as if too impatient to wait any longer, the whisper moved out into the yard. Julian couldn't see who it was in the dark, and he quickly flashed his torch on the man.

It was the Guv'nor, grim-faced as ever! He flinched as the light fell on his face, took a few steps back and disappeared round a corner. Timmy growled.

'Well! How many more people wander about at night here?' said Dick. 'That was the Guv'nor. What was he doing?'

'I give it up,' said Julian. 'I'm getting too tired to think straight. I shouldn't be in the least surprised to see Clopper the horse peering round a corner at us, and saying 'Peep-bo, chaps!''

Everyone chuckled. It was just the kind of thing Clopper would do if he were really alive!

They came to the farm-house. It was full of light, upstairs and downstairs. The curtains were not drawn across the kitchen window and the children looked in as they passed. Mrs. Penruthlan was sitting there, her hands clasped, looking extremely worried.

They opened the kitchen door and trooped in, Yan too. Mrs. Penruthlan leapt up at once and ran to them. She hugged Anne, she tried to hug George, she said all kinds of things at top speed, and to the children's dismay they saw that she was crying.

'Oh, where have you been?' she said, tears pouring down her face. 'The men are out looking for you, and all the dogs, and the Barnies too. They've been looking for ages! And Mr. Penruthlan's not home, either. I don't know where he is, he's gone too! Oh, what a terrible evening. But thank goodness you're safe!'

Julian saw that she was terribly upset. He took her arm gently and led her to a chair. 'Don't worry,' he said. 'We're all safe. We're sorry you've been upset.'

'But where have you been?' wept Mrs. Penruthlan. 'I pictured you drowned, or lost on the hills, or fallen into quarries. And where is Mr. Penruthlan? He went out at seven and there's been not a sign of him since!'

The children felt uncomfortable. They thought they knew where Mr. Penruthlan was, getting smuggled goods from the motor-boat, and carrying them back with his friend, up the Wreckers' Way!

'Now just you tell me what you've been doing,' said Mrs. Penruthlan, drying her eyes, and sounding unexpectedly determined. 'Upsetting everybody like this!'

'Well,' said Julian, 'it's a long story, but I'll try to make it short. Strange things have been happening, Mrs. Penruthlan.'

He plunged into the whole story, the old tower, Grandad's tale of the flashing light, their journey to explore the tower, the secret passage to the wreckers' cove, their imprisonment and escape, and then Julian stopped.

How was he to tell poor Mrs. Penruthlan that one of the smugglers was her husband? He glanced at the others desperately. Anne began to cry, and George felt very much like it, too. It was Yan who suddenly spoke and broke the news.

'We seen Mr. Penruthlan in the cove,' he said, glad of a chance to put in a word. 'We seen him!'

Mrs. Penruthlan stared at Yan, and then at the embarrassed, anxious faces of the other children.

'You saw him in the cove?' she said. 'You didn't! What was he doing there?'

'We think, we think he must be one of the smugglers,' said Julian, awkwardly. 'We think we saw him get into a boat and row to the motor-boat beyond the rocks. If so, he - well - he may get into trouble, Mrs. Penru...'

He didn't finish, because, to his enormous surprise, Mrs. Penruthlan jumped up from her chair, and boxed his ears soundly. He hadn't even time to dodge.

'You wicked boy!' panted Mrs. Penruthlan, sounding suddenly out of breath. 'You bad, wicked boy, saying things like that about Mr. Penruthlan, who's the straightest, honestest, most God-fearing man who ever lived! Him a smuggler! Him in with those wicked men! I'll box your ears till you eat your words and serve you right!'

Julian dodged the second time, amazed at the change in the cheerful little farmer's wife. Her face was red, her eyes were blazing, and somehow she seemed to be taller. He had never seen anyone so angry in his life! Yan went promptly under the table.

Timmy growled. He liked Mrs. Penruthlan, but he felt he really couldn't allow her to set about his friends. She faced Julian, trembling with anger.

'Now you apologize!' she said. 'Or I'll give you such a drubbing as you've never had in your life before. And you just wait and see what Mr. Penruthlan will say when he comes back and hears the things you've said about him!'

Julian was much too big and strong for the farmer's wife to 'give him a drubbing' but he felt certain she would try, if he didn't apologize! What a tiger she was!

He put his hand on her arm. 'Don't get so upset,' he said. 'I'm very sorry to have made you so angry.'

Mrs. Penruthlan shook his hand off her arm. 'Angry! I should just think I am angry!' she said. 'To think anyone should say those things about Mr. Penruthlan. That wasn't him down in Wreckers' Cove. I know it wasn't. I only wish I knew where he was! I'm that worried!'

'He be down Wreckers' Way,' announced Yan from his safe vantage-point under the table. 'We put trapdoor down over he. Iss.'

'Down Wreckers' Way!' cried Mrs. Penruthlan and to the children's great relief she sank down into a chair again. She turned to Julian, questioningly.

He nodded. 'Yes. We came up that way from the beach - Yan knew it. It comes up in a corner of the machine-shed, through a trapdoor. We - er - we shut the trapdoor and piled sacks and things on it. I'm afraid, well, I'm rather afraid Mr. Penruthlan can't get out!'

Mrs. Penruthlan's eyes almost dropped out of her head. She opened and shut her mouth several times, rather like a goldfish gasping for breath. All the children felt most uncomfortable and extremely sorry for her.

'I don't believe it,' she said at last. 'It's a bad dream. It's not real. Mr. Penruthlan will come walking in here at any moment, at any moment, I tell you! He's not down in the Wreckers' Way. He's NOT a bad man. He'll come walking in, you just see!'

There was silence after this, and in the silence a sound could be heard. The sound of big boots walking over the farm-yard. Glomp-clomp-clomp-clomp!

'I'm frit!' squealed Yan, suddenly, and made everyone jump. The footsteps came round the kitchen wall, and up to the kitchen door.

'I know who that is!' said Mrs. Penruthlan, jumping up. 'I know who that is.'

The door opened and somebody walked in. Mr. Penruthlan!

His wife ran to him and flung her arms round him. 'You've come walking in! I said you would. Praise be that you've come!'

Mr. Penruthlan looked tired, and the children, quite dumb with amazement at seeing him, saw that he was wet through. He looked round at them in great surprise.

'What are these children up for?' he said, and they all gaped in surprise. Why, he was talking properly! His words were quite clear, except that he lisped over his s's.

'Oh, Mr. Penruthlan, the tales these bad children have told about you!' cried his wife. 'They said you were a smuggler. They said they'd seen you in Wreckers' Cove going out to a motor-boat to get smuggled goods, they said you were trapped in Wreckers' Way, they'd put the trapdoor down, and...'

Mr. Penruthlan pushed his wife away from him and swung round on the astounded children. They were most alarmed. How had he escaped from Wreckers' Way? Surely even his great strength could not lift up all the things they had piled on top of the trapdoor? How fierce this giant of a man looked, with his mane of black hair, his shaggy eyebrows drawn over his deep-set eyes, and his dense black beard!

'What's all this?' he demanded, and they gaped again at his speech. They were so used to his peculiar noises that it seemed amazing he could speak properly after all.

'Well, sir,' began Julian, awkwardly, 'we - er - we've been exploring that tower - and - er - finding out a bit about the smugglers, and we really thought we recognized you in Wreckers' Cove, and we thought we'd trapped you, and your friend, by shutting the trapdoor and...'

'This is important,' said Mr. Penruthlan, and his voice sounded urgent. 'Forget all this about thinking I'm a smuggler. You've got things wrong. I'm working with the police. It was someone else down in the cove, not me. I've been on the coast, it's true, watching out, and getting drenched, as you can see, all to no purpose. What do you know? What's this about the trapdoor? Did you really close it, and trap those men?'

All this was so completely astonishing that for a moment nobody could say a word. Then Julian leapt up.

'Yes, sir! We did put the trapdoor down, and if you want to catch those fellows, send for the police, and we'll do it! We've only got to wait beside the trapdoor till the smugglers come!'

'Right,' said Mr. Penruthlan. 'Come along. Hurry!'

Chapter 18

DICK GETS AN IDEA!

In the greatest surprise and excitement the five children rushed to the kitchen door to follow Mr. Penruthlan. Yan had scrambled out from beneath the table, determined not to miss anything. But at the door the farmer turned round.

'Not the girls,' he said. 'Nor you, Yan.'

'I'll keep the girls here with me,' said Mrs. Penruthlan, who had forgotten her dismay and anger completely in this new excitement. 'Yan, come here.'

But Yan had slipped out with the others. Nothing in the world would keep him from missing this new excitement! Timmy had gone too, of course, as excited as the rest.

'What goings-on in the early hours of the morning!' said Mrs. Penruthlan, sitting down suddenly again. 'To think that Mr. Penruthlan never told me he was working to find those smugglers! We knew it was going on, around this coast, and to think he was keeping a watch, and never told me!

Julian and Dick had quite forgotten that they felt tired. They hurried over the farm-yard with Mr. Penruthlan, Yan a little way behind, and Timmy leaping round like a mad thing. They came to the machine-shed and went in.

'We piled ...' began Julian, and then suddenly stopped. Mr. Penruthlan's powerful torch was shining on the corner where the trapdoor was fixed.

It was open! Unbelievably open! The sacks and boxes that the children had dragged over it were now scattered to one side.

'Look at that!' said Julian, amazed. 'Who's opened it? Sir, the smugglers have got out, with their smuggled goods, and they've gone. We're beaten!'

Mr. Penruthlan made a very angry noise, and flung the trapdoor shut with a resounding bang. He was about to say something more when there came the sound of voices not far off. It was the Barnies returning from their search for the children.

They saw the light in the shed and peered in. When they saw Julian and Dick they cried out in delight. 'Where were you? We've searched everywhere for you!'

Julian and Dick were so disappointed at finding their high hopes dashed that they could hardly respond to the Barnies' delighted greetings. They felt suddenly very tired again, and Mr. Penruthlan seemed all at once in a very bad temper. He answered the Barnies gruffly, said that everything was all right now, and any talking could be done tomorrow. As for him, he was going to bed!

The Barnies dispersed at once, still talking. Mr. Penruthlan silently led the way back to the farm-house with Julian and Dick trailing behind. Yan had gone like a shadow. As he was not at the farm-house when they walked wearily into the kitchen, Julian guessed that he had scampered back up the hills to old Grandad.

'Five past three in the morning,' said Mr. Penruthlan, looking at the clock. 'I'll sleep down here for an hour or two, wife, then I'll be up to milk the cows. Send these children to bed. I'm too weary to talk. Good-night.'

And with that he put his hand to his mouth and quite solemnly took out his false teeth, putting them into a glass of water on the mantelpiece.

'Oooh - ock,' he said to his wife, and stripped off his wet coat. Mrs. Penruthlan hustled Julian and the rest upstairs. They were almost dropping with exhaustion now. The girls managed to undress, but the two boys flopped on their beds and were asleep in half a second. They didn't stir when the cocks crew, or when the cows lowed, or even when the wagons of the Barnies came trundling out into the yard to be packed with their things. They were going off to play in another village barn that night.

Julian awoke at last. It took him a few moments to realize why he was still fully dressed. He lay and thought for a while, and a feeling of dejection came over him when he remembered how all the excitement of the day before had ended in complete failure.

If only they knew who had opened that trapdoor! WHO could it be?

And then something clicked in his mind, and he knew. Of course! Why hadn't he thought of it before? Why hadn't he remembered to tell Mr. Penruthlan about the Guv'nor standing in the shadows, and his whispered message: 'Here! I'm here!'

He must have been waiting for the smugglers to come to him, of course, he probably used local fishermen to row through the rocks to the motor-boat that had slunk over to the Cornish coast, and those fishermen used the Wreckers' Way so that no one knew what they were doing.

The Barnies often came to play at Tremannon Barn, nothing could be easier than for the Guv'nor to arrange for the smuggling to take place then, for the Wreckers' Way actually had an entrance in the shed near the big barn! If a stormy night came, all the better! No one would be about. He could go up on the hills and wait for the signal from the tower which would tell him that at last the boat was coming.

Yes, and he would arrange with the signaller too, to flash out the news that he, the Guv'nor, was at Tremannon again, and waiting! Who was the signaller? Probably another of the fishermen, descendants of the old Wreckers, and glad of a bit of excitement, and extra money.

Everything fell into place, all the odd bits and pieces of happenings fitted together like a jig-saw puzzle. Julian saw the clear picture.

Who would ever have thought of the owner of the Barnies being involved in smuggling? Smugglers were clever, but the Guv'nor was cleverer than most!

Julian heard the noise outside, and got up to see what it was. When he saw the Barnies piling their furniture on the wagons, he rushed downstairs, yelling to wake Dick as he went. He must tell Mr. Penruthlan about the Guv'nor! He must get him arrested! He had probably got the smuggled goods somewhere in one of the boxes on the wagons. What an easy way of getting it away unseen! The Guv'nor was cunning, there was no doubt about that.

With Dick at his heels, puzzled and surprised, Julian went to find Mr. Penruthlan. There he was, watching the Barnies getting ready to go, looking very dour and grim. Julian ran up to him.

'Sir! I've remembered something, something important! Can I speak to you?'

They went into a near-by field, and there Julian poured out all he had surmised about the Guv'nor.

'He was waiting in the dark last night for the smugglers,' said Julian. 'I'm sure he was. He must have heard us and thought we were the men. And it must have been he who opened the trapdoor, sir. When they didn't come, he must have gone to the trapdoor and found it shut, with things piled on it. And he opened it, and waited there till the men came and handed him the goods. And now he's got them hidden somewhere in those wagons!'

'Why didn't you tell me this last night?' said Mr. Penruthlan. 'We may be too late now! I'll have to get the police here to search those wagons, but if I try to stop the Barnies going now, the Guv'nor will suspect something and go off at once!'

Julian was relieved to see that Mr. Penruthlan had his teeth in again and could speak properly! The farmer pulled at his black beard and frowned. 'I've searched many times through the Barnies' properties to find the smuggled goods,' he said. 'Each time they've been here I've gone through everything in the dead of night.'

'Do you know what it is they're smuggling?' asked Julian. The farmer nodded.

'Yes. Dangerous drugs. Drugs that are sold at enormously high prices in the black market. The parcel wouldn't need to be very big. I've suspected one or other of the Barnies of being the receivers before this, and I've searched and searched. No good.'

'If it's a small parcel it could be hidden easily,' said Dick, thoughtfully. 'But it's a dangerous thing to hide. The Guv'nor wouldn't have it on him, would he?'

'Oh no, he would be afraid of being searched,' said Mr. Penruthlan. 'Well, I reckon I must let them go this time, and I must warn the police. If they like to search the wagons on the road, they're welcome. I can't get the police here in time to stop the wagons going off. We've got no telephone at the farm.'

Mr. Binks came up at that moment, carrying Clopper's front and back legs. He grinned at the boys. 'You led us a fine dance last night!' he said. 'What happened?'

'Yes,' said Sid, coming up with Clopper's ridiculous head under his arm as usual. 'Clopper was right worried about you!'

'Gosh, you didn't carry old Clopper's head all over the hills last night, did you!' said Dick, astonished.

'No. I left it with the Guv'nor,' said Sid. 'He took charge of his precious Clopper while I went gallivanting over the hills and far away, looking for a pack of tiresome kids!'

Dick stared at the horse's head, with its comical rolling eyes. He stared at it very hard indeed. And then he did a most peculiar thing!

He snatched the head away from the surprised Sid, and tore across the farm-yard with it! Julian looked after him in amazement.

Sid gave an angry yell. 'Now then! What do you think you're doing? Bring that horse back at once!'

But Dick didn't. He tore round a corner and disappeared. Sid went after him, and so did somebody else!

The Guv'nor raced across the yard at top speed, looking furious! He shouted, he yelled, he shook his fist. But when he and Sid got to the corner, Dick had disappeared!

'What's got into him?' said Mr. Penruthlan, amazed. 'What does he want to rush off with Clopper's head for? The boy must be mad.'

Julian suddenly saw light. He knew why Dick had snatched Clopper's head. He knew!

'Mr. Penruthlan, why does the Guv'nor always have someone in charge of Clopper's head?' he said. 'Maybe he hides something precious there, something he doesn't want anyone to find! Quick, let's go and see!'

Chapter 19

MOSTLY ABOUT CLOPPER

At that moment Dick appeared again, round another corner, still holding Clopper's head, with Sid and the Guv'nor hard on his heels. He hadn't been able to stop for a moment, or even to hide anywhere. He panted up to Mr. Penruthlan, and thrust the head at him.

'Take it. I bet it's got the goods in it!'

Then Sid and the Guv'nor raced up too, both in a furious rage. The Guv'nor tried to snatch Clopper away from the big farmer. But he was a small man and Mr. Penruthlan was well over six feet. He calmly held the horse's head out of reach with his strong right hand, and fended off the Guv'nor with the other.

Everyone ran up at once. The Barnies surrounded the little group in excitement, and one or two farm-men came up too. Mrs. Penruthlan and the girls, who were now up, heard the excitement and came running out as well. Hens scattered away, clucking, and the four dogs and Timmy barked madly.

The Guv'nor was beside himself with fury. He began to hit the farmer, but was immediately pulled away by Mr. Binks.

Then one of the farm-men shouldered his way through the excited crowd, and put his great hand on to the Guv'nor's shoulder. He held him in a grip of iron.

'Don't let him go,' said the farmer. He lowered Clopper's head and looked round at the puzzled Barnies.

'Fetch that barrel,' he said to Julian, and the boy got it at once, placing it in front of the farmer. The Guv'nor watched, his face going white.

'You leave that horse alone,' he said. 'It's my property. What do you think you're doing?'

'You say this horse is your property?' said the farmer. 'Is it entirely your property, inside as well as outside?'

The Guv'nor said nothing. He looked very worried indeed. Mr. Penruthlan turned the head upside down, and looked into the neck. He put his hand in and scrabbled about. He found the little lid and opened it. Out fell about a dozen cigarettes.

'They're mine,' said Mr. Binks. 'I keep them there. Anything wrong with that, sir? It's a little place the Guv'nor had made for me.'

'Nothing wrong with that, Mr. Binks,' said the farmer, and put his hand in again. He pulled at the lid, and ran his finger round the hole where Mr. Binks kept his cigarettes. The Guv'nor watched, breathing quickly.

'I can feel something, Guv'nor,' said Mr. Penruthlan, watching the man's face. 'I can feel a false bottom to this clever little space. How do I get it open, Guv'nor? Will you tell me, or do I smash Clopper up to find it?'

'Don't smash him!' said Sid and Mr. Binks together. They turned to the Guv'nor, puzzled. 'What's up?' said Sid. 'We never knew there was a secret about Clopper.'

'There isn't,' said the Guv'nor, stubbornly.

'Ah, I've found the trick!' said Mr. Penruthlan, suddenly. 'Now I've got it!' He worked his fingers about in the space that he had suddenly hit on, behind the place where Mr. Binks had his cigarettes. He pulled out a package done up in white paper, a small package, but worth many hundreds of pounds!

'What's this, Guv'nor?' he asked the white-faced man. 'Is it one of the many packets of drugs you've handled round this coast? Was it because of this secret of yours that you told Sid never to let Clopper out of his sight? Shall I open this packet, Guv'nor, and see what's inside?'

A murmur arose from the Barnies, a murmur of horror. Sid turned fiercely on the Guv'nor.

'You made me guard your horrible drugs, not Clopper! To think I've been helping you all this time, helping a man who's only fit for prison! I'll never work with Clopper again! Never!'

Almost in tears poor Sid pushed his way through the amazed Barnies and went off by himself. After a few moments Mr. Binks followed him.

Mr. Penruthlan put the white package into his pocket. 'Lock the Guv'nor up in the small barn,' he ordered. 'And you, Dan, get on your bike and get the police. As for you, Barnies, I don't know rightly what to say. You've lost your Guv'nor, but it's good riddance, I'll tell you that.'

The Barnies stared after the Guv'nor as he was dragged away by two farm-men, over to the small barn.

'We never liked him,' said one. 'But he had money to tide us over bad times. Money from smuggling in those wicked drugs! He used us Barnies as a screen for his goings-on. It's good riddance, you're right.'

'We'll manage,' said another Barnie. 'We'll get along. Hey, Sid, come back. Cheer up!'

Sid and Mr. Binks came back, looking rather solemn. 'We're not going to use Clopper any more,' said Sid. 'He'll bring us bad luck. We'll get a donkey instead, and work up another act. Mr. Binks says he couldn't wear Clopper again, and I feel the same.'

'Right,' said the farmer, picking up Clopper's head. 'Get the back and front legs. I'll take charge of old Clopper. I've always been fond of him, and he won't bring any bad luck to me!'

There was nothing more to be done. The Barnies said rather a forlorn good-bye. Sid and Mr. Binks shook hands solemnly with each of the children. Sid gave Clopper one last pat and turned away.

'We'll go off now,' said Mr. Binks. 'Thanks for everything, Mr. Penruthlan, sir. So long!'

'See you again when next you're by here,' said Mr. Penruthlan. 'You can have my barn any time, Sid.'

The Guv'nor was safely locked up, waiting for the police. Mr. Penruthlan picked Clopper up, legs and all, and looked down at the five children, for Yan was now with them.

He smiled at them all, looking suddenly quite a different man. 'Well, that's all finished up!' he said. 'Dick, I thought you'd gone mad when you went off with old Clopper's head!'

'It was certainly a bit of a brain-wave,' said Dick, modestly. 'It came over me all of a sudden. Only just in time, too, the Barnies were nearly on their way again!'

They went over to the farm-house. Mrs. Penruthlan had already run across. The girls guessed why, and they were right!

'I'm getting a meal for you!' she cried, as they came in. 'Poor children, not a mite to eat have you had today. No breakfast, nothing. Come away in and help me. You can turn out the whole larder if you like!'

They very nearly did! Ham and tongue and pies went on the table. Anne picked crisp lettuces from the garden and washed them. Julian piled tomatoes in a dish. George cooked a dozen hard-boiled eggs at the stove. A fruit-tart and a jam-tart appeared as if by magic and two great jugs of creamy milk were set at each end of the table.

Yan hovered around, getting into everybody's way, his eyes nearly falling out of his head at the sight of the food. Mrs. Penruthlan laughed.

'Get away from under my feet, you dirty little ruffian! Do you want to eat with us?'

'Iss,' said Yan, his eyes sparkling. 'ISS!'

'Then go upstairs and wash those dirty hands!' said the farmer's wife. And, marvel of marvels, Yan went off upstairs as good as gold, and came down with hands that really were almost clean!

They all sat down. Julian solemnly put a chair beside him, and arranged Clopper in such a way that it looked as if he were sitting down too! Anne gave a giggle.

'Oh, Clopper! You look quite real. Mr. Penruthlan, what are you going to do with him?'

'I'm going to give him away,' said the farmer munching as hard with his teeth as he did without them. 'To friends of mine.'

'Lucky friends!' said Dick, helping himself to a hard-boiled egg and salad. 'Do they know how to work the back and front legs, sir?'

'Oh yes,' said the farmer. 'They know fine. They'll do well with Clopper. There's only one thing they don't know. Haw-haw-haw!'

The children looked at him in surprise. Why the sudden guffaw?

Mr. Penruthlan choked, and his wife banged him on the back. 'Careful now, Mr. Penruthlan,' she said. 'Mr. Clopper's looking at you!'

The farmer guffawed again. Then he looked round at the listening children. 'I was telling you,' he said, 'there's only one thing these friends of mine don't know.'

'What's that?' asked George.

'Well, they don't know how to undo the zip!' said the farmer, and roared again till the tears came into his eyes. 'They don't know how to - how to - haw-haw-haw-haw - undo the ZIP!'

'Mr. Penruthlan now, behave yourself!' said his amused wife. 'Why don't you say straight out that you're giving Clopper to Julian and Dick, instead of spluttering away like that?'

'Gosh, are you really?' said Dick, thrilled. 'Thanks most awfully!'

'Well, you got me what I wanted, so it's only right and fair I should give you what you wanted,' said the farmer, taking another plate of ham. 'You'll do well with Clopper, you and your brother. You can give us a show one day before you leave for home. Haw-haw - Clopper's a queer one, see him looking at us now!'

'He winked!' said George, in an astonished voice, and Timmy came out from under the table to stare at Clopper with the others. 'I saw him wink!'

Well, it wouldn't be surprising if he did wink. He's really had a most exciting time!

THE END

Enid Blyton[®]

THE
FAMOUS
FIVE

FIVE GO TO MYSTERY MOOR

ENID BLYTON

FAMOUS FIVE 13

Five Go To Mystery Moor

Contents

| | | |
|----|-----------------------------|----|
| 1 | At The Stables | 2 |
| 2 | Julian, Dick - And Henry | 7 |
| 3 | Sniffer | 11 |
| 4 | A Bed In The Stable | 16 |
| 5 | George Gets A Headache! | 21 |
| 6 | A Grand Day | 25 |
| 7 | George, Sniffer And Liz | 30 |
| 8 | Sniffer Makes A Promise | 34 |
| 9 | The Blacksmith Tells A Tale | 39 |
| 10 | Sniffer's Patris | 44 |
| 11 | A Nice Little Plan | 49 |
| 12 | The Little Railway | 53 |
| 13 | A Noise In The Night | 58 |
| 14 | The Gypsies Are Not Pleased | 62 |
| 15 | A Startling Night | 67 |
| 16 | The Terrible Mist | 72 |
| 17 | Prisoners Together | 76 |
| 18 | George's Trick | 81 |
| 19 | Good Old Tim! | 85 |
| 20 | Excitement In The Morning | 91 |
| 21 | The End Of The Mystery | 96 |

Chapter 1
AT THE STABLES

'We've been here a week and I've been bored every single minute!' said George.

'You haven't,' said Anne. 'You've enjoyed all the rides we've had, and you know you've enjoyed messing about the stables when we haven't been out riding.'

'I tell you, I've been bored every single minute,' said George, quite fiercely. 'I ought to know, oughtn't I? That awful girl Henrietta too. Why do we have to put up with her?'

'Oh - Henry!' said Anne, with a laugh. 'I should have thought you'd find a lot in common with another girl like yourself, who would rather be a boy, and tries to act like one!'

The two girls were lying by a haystack eating sandwiches. Round them in a field were many horses, most of which the girls either rode or looked after. Some way off was an old rambling building, and by the front entrance was a great board.

Captain Johnson's Riding School

Anne and George had been staying there for a week, while Julian and Dick had gone to camp with other boys from their school. It had been Anne's idea. She was fond of horses, and had heard so much from her friends at school what fun it was to spend day after day at the stables, that she had made up her mind to go herself.

George hadn't wanted to come. She was sulky because the two boys had gone off somewhere without her and Anne, for a change. Gone to camp! George would have liked that, but girls were not allowed to go camping with the boys from Julian's school, of course. It was a camp just for the boys alone.

'You're silly to keep feeling cross because you couldn't go camping too,' said Anne. 'The boys don't want us girls round them all the time. We couldn't do the things they do.'

George thought differently. 'I can do anything that Dick and Julian do,' she said. 'I can climb, and bike for miles, can walk as far as they can, I can swim, I can beat a whole lot of boys at most things.'

'That's what Henry says!' said Anne, with a laugh. 'Look, there she is, striding about as usual, hands in her jodhpur pockets, whistling like the stable boy!'

George scowled. Anne had been very much amused to see how Henrietta and George hated one another at sight - and yet both had so very much the same ideas. George's real name was Georgina, but she would only answer to George. Henry's real name was Henrietta, but she would only answer to Henry, or Harry to her very best friends!

She was about as old as George, and her hair was short too, but it wasn't curly. 'It's a pity yours is curly,' she said to George, pityingly. 'It looks so girlish, doesn't it?'

'Don't be an ass,' George said, curtly. 'Plenty of boys have curly hair.'

The maddening part was that Henrietta was a wonderful rider, and had won all kinds of cups. George hadn't enjoyed herself a bit during that week at the stables, because for once in a way another girl had outshone her. She couldn't bear to see Henrietta striding about, whistling, doing everything so competently and quickly.

Anne had had many a quiet laugh to herself, especially when the two girls had each made up their minds not to call one another Henry and George, but to use their full names, Henrietta and Georgina! This meant that neither of them would answer the other when called, and Captain Johnson, the big burly owner of the riding-stables, got very tired of both of them.

'What are you behaving like this for?' he demanded one morning, seeing their sulky looks at one another at breakfast-time. 'Behaving like a couple of idiotic schoolgirls!'

That made Anne laugh! A couple of idiotic schoolgirls. My goodness, how annoyed both girls were with Captain Johnson. Anne was a bit scared of him. He was hot-tempered, out-spoken, and stood no nonsense at all, but he was a wonder with the horses, and loved a good, hearty laugh. He and his wife took either boys or girls for the holidays, and worked them hard, but the children always enjoyed their stay immensely.

'If it hadn't been for Henry, you'd have been perfectly happy this week,' said Anne, leaning back against the haystack. 'We've had heavenly April weather, the horses are lovely, and I like Captain and Mrs. Johnson very much.'

'I wish the boys were here,' said George. 'They would soon put that silly Henrietta in her place. I wish I'd stayed at home now.'

'Well, you had the choice,' said Anne, rather cross. 'You could have stayed at Kirrin Cottage with your father and mother, but you chose to come here with me, till the boys came back from camp. You shouldn't make such a fuss if things aren't exactly to your liking. It spoils things for me.'

'Sorry,' said George. 'I'm being a pig, I know, but I do miss the boys. We can only be with them in the hols and it seems funny without them. There's just one thing that pleases me here you'll be glad to know...'

'You needn't tell me, I know what it is!' said Anne, with a laugh. 'You're glad that Timmy won't have anything to do with Henry!'

'With Henrietta,' corrected George. She grinned suddenly. 'Yes, old Timmy's got some sense. He just can't stick her. Here, Timmy boy, leave those rabbit-holes alone and come and lie down for a bit. You've run for miles this morning when we took the horses out, and you've snuffled down about a hundred rabbit-holes. Come and be peaceful.'

Timmy left his latest rabbit-hole reluctantly and came to flop down beside Anne and George. He gave George a hearty lick and she patted him.

'We're just saying, Timmy, how sensible you are not to make friends with that awful Henrietta,' said George. She stopped suddenly at a sharp nudge from Anne. A shadow fell across them as someone came round the haystack.

It was Henrietta. By the annoyed look on her face it was clear that she had heard George's remark. She held out an orange envelope to George.

'A telegram for you, Georgina,' she said, stiffly. 'I thought I'd better bring it in case it was important.'

'Oh, thanks, Henrietta,' said George, and took the telegram. She tore it open, read it and groaned.

'Look at that!' she said to Anne and passed it to her. 'It's from Mother.'

Anne took the telegram and read it. 'Please stay another week. Your father is not well. Love from Mother.'

'What bad luck!' said George, a familiar scowl on her face. 'Just when I thought we'd be going home in a day or two, and the boys would join us at Kirrin. Now we'll be stuck here by ourselves for ages! What's the matter with Father? I bet he's only got a headache or something, and doesn't want us stamping about in and out of the house and making a noise.'

'We could go to my home,' said Anne. 'That's if you don't mind its being a bit upside down because of the decorating we're having done.'

'No. I know you want to stay here with the horses,' said George. 'Anyway your father and mother are abroad, we'd only be in the way. Blow, blow, blow! Now we'll have to do without the boys for another week. They'll stay on in camp, of course.'

Captain Johnson said, 'Yes, certainly the two girls could stay on. It was possible that they might have to do a bit of camping out if one or two extra children came, but they wouldn't mind that, would they?'

'Not a bit,' said George. 'Actually we'd rather like to be on our own, Anne and I. We've got Timmy, you see. So long as we could come in to meals and do a few jobs for you, we'd love to go off on our own.'

Anne smiled to herself. What George really meant was that she wanted to see as little of Henrietta as possible! Still, it would be fun to camp out if the weather was fine. They could easily borrow a tent from Captain Johnson.

'Bad luck, Georgina!' said Henry, who was listening to all this. 'Very bad luck! I know you're terribly bored here. It's a pity you don't really like horses. It's a pity that you-'

'Shut up,' said George, rudely and went out of the room. Captain Johnson glared at Henrietta, who stood whistling at the window, hands in pockets.

'You two girls!' he said. 'Why don't you behave yourselves? Always aping the boys, pretending you're so mannish! Give me Anne here, any day! What you want is your ears boxing. Did you take that bale of straw to the stables?'

'Yes,' said Henrietta, without turning.

'Yes, sir,' said Captain Johnson. 'If you want to act like a boy, be one, and say 'sir' when you speak to me, if you can't bother to remember I've got a name. It's...'

He broke off as a small boy came running in. 'Sir, there's a gypsy kid outside with a horse, a skewbald, a mangy looking thing. He says can you help him - the horse has got something wrong with its leg.'

'Those gypsies again!' said Captain Johnson. 'All right, I'll come.'

He went out and Anne went with him, not wanting to be left alone with the angry Henrietta. She found George outside with a small dirty gypsy boy and a patient little skewbald horse, its brown and white coat looking very flea-bitten.

'What have you done to your horse this time?' said Captain Johnson, looking at its leg. 'You'll have to leave it here, and I'll see to it.'

'Can't do that, sir,' said the boy. 'We're off to Mystery Moor again.'

'Well, you'll have to,' said Captain Johnson. 'It's not fit to walk. Your caravan can't go with the others, this horse isn't fit to pull it. I'll get the police to your father if you try to work this horse before it's better.'

'Don't do that!' said the boy. 'It's just that my Dad says we've got to go on tomorrow.'

'What's the hurry?' said Captain Johnson. 'Can't your caravan wait a day or two? Mystery Moor will still be there in two days time! It beats me why you go there, a desolate place like that, not even a farm or a cottage for miles!'

'I'll leave the horse,' said the boy, and stroked the skewbald's nose. It was clear that he loved the ugly little horse. 'My father will be angry, but the other caravans can go on without us. We'll have to catch them up.'

He gave a kind of half-salute to the captain and disappeared from the stable-yard, a skinny little sunburnt figure. The skewbald stood patiently.

'Take it round to the small stable,' said Captain Johnson to George and Anne. 'I'll come and see to it in a minute.'

The girls led the little horse away. 'Mystery Moor!' said George. 'What a queer name! The boys would like that, they'd be exploring it at once, wouldn't they?'

'Yes. I do wish they were coming here,' said Anne. 'Still, I expect they'll like the chance of staying on in camp. Come on, you funny little creature, here's the stable!'

The girls shut the door on the gypsy's pony and turned to go back. William, the boy who had brought the message about the horse, yelled to them.

'Hey, George and Anne! There's another telegram for you!'

The two hurried into the house at once. 'Oh, I hope Father is better and we can go home and join the boys at Kirrin!' said George. She tore open the envelope and then gave a yell that made Anne jump.

'Look, see what it says. They're coming here!' Anne snatched the telegram and read it.

'Joining you tomorrow. We'll camp out if no room. Hope you've got a nice juicy adventure ready for us! Julian and Dick.'

'They're coming! They're coming!' said Anne, as excited as George. 'Now we'll have some fun!'

'It's a pity we've no adventure to offer them,' said George. 'Still, you simply never know!'

Chapter 2

JULIAN, DICK - AND HENRY

George was quite a different person now that she knew her two cousins were coming the next day. She was even polite to Henrietta!

Captain Johnson scratched his head when he heard that the boys were arriving. 'We can't have them in the house, except for meals,' he said. 'We're full up. They can either sleep in the stables or have a tent. I don't care which.'

'There will be ten altogether then,' said his wife. 'Julian, Dick, Anne, George, Henry - and John, Susan, Alice, Rita and William. Henry may have to camp out too.'

'Not with us,' said George, at once.

'I think you're rather unkind to Henry,' said Mrs. Johnson. 'After all, you and she are very alike, George. You both think you ought to have been boys, and...'

'I'm not a bit like Henrietta!' said George, indignantly. 'You wait till my cousins come, Mrs. Johnson. They won't think she's like me. I don't expect they'll want anything to do with her.'

'Oh well, you'll just have to shake down together somehow, if you want to stay here,' said Mrs. Johnson. 'Let me see. I'd better get some rugs out. The boys will want them, whether they sleep in the stables or in a tent. Come and help me to look for them, Anne.'

Anne, George and Henry were a good bit older than the other five children staying at the stables, but all of them, small or big, were excited to hear about the coming of Julian and Dick. For one thing George and Anne had related so many of the adventures they had had with them, that everyone was inclined to think of them as heroes.

Henrietta disappeared after tea that day and could not be found. 'Wherever have you been?' demanded Mrs. Johnson when she at last turned up.

'Up in my room,' said Henrietta. 'Cleaning my shoes and my jods, and mending my riding-jacket. You keep telling me to, and now I've done it!'

'Aha! Preparing for the heroes!' said Captain Johnson, and Henry immediately put on a scowl very like the one George often wore.

'Nothing of the sort!' she said. 'I've been meaning to do it for a long time. If Georgina's cousins are anything like her I shan't be very interested in them.'

'But you might like my brothers,' said Anne, with a laugh. 'If you don't there'll be something wrong with you.'

'Don't be silly,' said Henrietta. 'Georgina's cousins and your brothers are the same people!'

'How clever of you to work that out,' said George. But she felt too happy to keep up the silly bickering for long. She went out with Timmy, whistling softly.

'They're coming tomorrow, Tim,' she said. 'Julian and Dick. We'll all go off together, like we always do, the five of us. You'll like that, won't you, Timmy?'

'Woof,' said Timmy approvingly and waved his plummy tail. He knew quite well what she meant.

Next morning George and Anne looked up the trains that arrived at the station two miles away.

'This is the one they'll come by,' said George, her finger on the timetable. 'It's the only one this morning. It arrives at half past twelve. We'll go and meet them.'

'Right,' said Anne. 'We'll start at ten minutes to twelve - we'll be in plenty of time then. We can help them with their things. They won't bring much.'

'Take the ponies up to Hawthorn Field, will you?' called Captain Johnson. 'Can you manage all four of them?'

'Oh yes,' said Anne pleased. She loved the walk to Hawthorn Field, up a little narrow lane set with celandines, violets and primroses, and the fresh green of the budding hawthorn bushes.

'Come on, George, let's catch the ponies and take them now. It's a heavenly morning.'

They set off with the four frisky ponies, Timmy at their heels. He was quite a help with the horses at the stable, especially when any had to be caught.

No sooner had they left the stables and gone on their way to Hawthorn Field than the telephone rang. It was for Anne.

'Oh, I'm sorry, she's not here,' said Mrs. Johnson, answering it. 'Who is it speaking? Oh, Julian her brother? Can I give her a message?'

'Yes, please,' said Julian's voice. 'Tell her we are arriving at the bus-stop at Milling Green at half past eleven, and is there a little hand-cart she and George could bring, because we've got our tent with us and other odds and ends?'

'Oh, we'll send the little wagon,' said Mrs. Johnson. 'The one that always goes to meet the train or the bus. I'll get George to meet you with Anne, they can drive it in. We're pleased you are coming. The weather's very good and you'll enjoy yourselves!'

'Rather!' said Julian. 'Thanks awfully for putting us up. We won't be any trouble, in fact we'll help all we can.'

Mrs. Johnson said good-bye and put down the receiver. She saw Henrietta passing outside the window, looking much cleaner and tidier than usual. She called to her.

'Henry! Where are George and Anne? Julian and Dick are arriving at the bus-stop at Milling Green at eleven-thirty and I've said we'll meet them in the little wagon. Will you tell George and Anne? They can put Winkie into the cart and trot him down to the bus-stop.'

'Right,' said Henry. Then she remembered that George and Anne had been sent up to Hawthorn Field with the four ponies.

'I say, they won't be back in time!' she called. 'Shall I take the wagon and meet them?'

'Yes, do. That would be kind of you, Henry,' said Mrs. Johnson. 'You'd better hurry, though. Time's getting on. Where's Winkie? In the big field?'

'Yes,' said Henry and hurried off to get him. Soon he was in the wagon shafts, and Henry was in the driving-seat. She drove off smartly, grinning to herself to think how cross George and Anne would be to find they had missed meeting the two boys after all.

Julian and Dick had already arrived at the bus-stop when Henry drove up. They looked hopefully at the wagon, thinking that perhaps one of the girls was driving into meet them.

'No go,' said Dick. 'It's somebody else, driving into the village. I wonder if the girls got our message. I thought they would meet us at the bus-stop here. Well, we'll wait a few minutes more.'

They had just sat down on the bus-stop seat again when the wagon stopped nearby. Henry saluted them.

'Are you Anne's brother?' she called. 'She didn't get your telephone message, so I've come with the wagon instead. Get in!'

'Oh, jolly nice of you,' said Julian, dragging his things to the wagon. 'Er - I'm Julian - and this is Dick. What's your name?'

'Henry,' said Henrietta, helping Julian with his things. She heaved them in valiantly, then clicked to Winkie to stand still and not fidget. 'I'm glad you've come. There are rather a lot of small kids at the stables. We'll be glad of you two! I say, Timmy will be pleased to see you, won't he?'

'Good old Tim,' said Dick, heaving his things in. Henry gave them a shove too. She wasn't very fat but she was wiry and strong. She grinned round at the boys. 'All set! Now we'll get back to the stables. Or do you want to have an ice-cream or anything before we start? Dinner's not till one.'

'No. We'll get on, I think,' said Julian. Henry leapt into the driver's seat, took the reins and clicked to Winkie. The boys were behind in the wagon. Winkie set off at a spanking pace.

'Nice boy!' said Dick to Julian, in a low voice, as they drove off. 'Decent of him to meet us.'

Julian nodded. He was disappointed that Anne and George hadn't come with Timmy, but it was good to be met by someone! It wouldn't have been very funny to walk the long road to the farm carrying their packs by themselves.

They arrived at the stables and Henry helped them down with their things. Mrs. Johnson heard them arriving and came to the door to welcome them.

'Ah, there you are. Come along in. I've a mid-morning snack for you, because I guessed you'd have had breakfast early. Leave the things there, Henry. If the boys sleep in one of the stables, there's no sense in bringing them into the house. Now, are George and Anne still not back? What a pity!'

Henry disappeared to put away the wagon. The boys went into the pleasant house and sat down to lemonade and home-made biscuits. They had hardly taken a bite before Anne came running in. 'Henry told me you'd come! Oh, I'm sorry we didn't meet you! We thought you'd come by train!'

Timmy came racing in, his tail waving madly. He leapt at the two boys, who were just giving Anne a hug each. Then in came George, her face one big beam.

'Julian! Dick! I am so glad you've come! It's been dull as ditch-water without you! Did anyone meet you?'

'Yes. An awfully nice boy,' said Dick. 'Gave us quite a welcome and dragged our packs into the wagon, and was very friendly. You never told us about him.'

'Oh, was that William?' said Anne. 'Well, he's only little. We didn't bother about telling you of the juniors here.'

'No, he wasn't little,' said Dick. 'He was quite big, very strong too. You didn't mention him at all.'

'Well, we told you about the other girl here,' said George. 'Henrietta, awful creature! Thinks she's like a boy and goes whistling about everywhere. She makes us laugh! You'll laugh too.'

A sudden thought struck Anne. 'Did the - er - boy who met you, tell you his name?' she asked.

'Yes, what was it now, Henry,' said Dick. 'Nice chap. I'm going to like him.'

George stared as if she couldn't believe her ears. 'Henry! Did she meet you?'

'No - not she - he,' corrected Julian. 'Fellow with a big grin.'

'But that's Henrietta!' cried George, her face flaming red with anger. 'The awful girl I told you about, who tries to act like a boy, and whistles and strides about all over the place. Don't tell me she took you in! She calls herself Henry, instead of Henrietta, and wears her hair short, and...'

'Gosh, she sounds very like you, George,' said Dick. 'Well, I never! It never occurred to me that he was a girl. Jolly good show she put up. I must say I liked him - her, I mean.'

'Oh!' said George really furious. 'The beast! She goes and meets you and never says a word to us, and makes you think she's a boy - and - and - spoils everything!'

'Hold your horses, George, old thing,' said Julian, surprised. 'After all, you've often been pleased when people take you for a boy, though goodness knows why. I thought you'd grown out of it a bit. Don't blame us for thinking Henry was a boy, and liking him - her, I mean.'

George stamped out of the room. Julian scratched his head and looked at Dick. 'Now we've put our foot in it,' he said. 'What an ass George is! I should have thought she'd have liked someone like Henry, who had exactly the same ideas as she has. Well, she'll get over it, I suppose.'

'It's going to be a bit awkward,' said Anne, soberly.

She was right. It was going to be very awkward!

Chapter 3

SNIFFER

As soon as George had gone out of the room, a scowl on her face, Henry walked in, hands in jodhpur pockets.

'Hallo!' said Dick, at once. 'Henrietta!'

Henry grinned. 'Oh, so they've told you, have they? I was tickled pink when you took me for a boy.'

'You've even got your riding jacket buttons buttoning up the wrong way,' said Anne, noticing for the first time. 'You really are a fathead, Henry. You and George are a pair!'

'Well, I look more like a real boy than George does, anyway,' said Henry.

'Only because of your hair,' said Dick. 'It's straight.'

'Don't say that in front of George,' said Anne. 'She'll immediately have hers cut like a convict or something, all shaven and shorn.'

'Well, anyway, it was jolly decent of Henry to come and meet us and lug our things about,' said Julian. 'Have a biscuit, anyone?'

'No thanks,' said Anne and Henry.

'Are we supposed to leave any for politeness sake?' said Dick, eyeing the plate. 'They're home-made and quite super. I could wolf the lot.'

'We aren't frightfully polite here,' said Henry, with a grin. 'We aren't frightfully clean and tidy, either. We have to change out of our jods at night for supper, which is an awful nuisance, especially as Captain Johnson never bothers to change his.'

'Any news?' asked Julian, drinking the last of the lemonade. 'Anything exciting happened?'

'No, nothing,' said Anne. 'The only excitement is the horses, nothing more. This is quite a lonely place, really, and the only exciting thing we've heard is the name of the big, desolate moor that stretches from here to the coast. Mystery Moor it's called.'

'Why?' asked Dick. 'Some long-ago mystery gave it that name, I suppose?'

'I don't know,' said Anne. 'I think only gypsies go there now. A little gypsy boy came in with a lame horse yesterday, and said his people had to go to Mystery Moor. Why they wanted to go to such a deserted stretch of land I don't know - no farms there, not even a cottage.'

'Gypsies have peculiar ideas sometimes,' said Henry. 'I must say I like the way they leave messages for any gypsy following - patrins, they're called.'

'Patrins? Yes, I've heard of those,' said Dick. 'Sticks and leaves arranged in certain patterns, or something, aren't they?'

'Yes,' said Henry. 'I know our gardener at home showed me an arrangement of sticks outside our back gate once, which he said was a message to any gypsy following. He told me what it meant, too!'

'What did it mean?' asked Julian.

'It meant 'Don't beg here. Mean people. No good!' ' said Henry, with a laugh. 'That's what he said, anyway!'

'We might ask the little gypsy boy who came with the skewbald horse,' said Anne. 'He'll probably show us some messages. I'd like to learn some. You never know when anything like that could come in useful!'

'Yes. And we'll ask him why the gypsies go to Mystery Moor,' said Julian, getting up and dusting the crumbs off his coat. 'They don't go there for nothing, you may be sure!'

'Where's old George gone?' asked Dick. 'I do hope she's not going to be silly.'

George was in one of the stables, grooming a horse so vigorously that it was most surprised. Swish-swish-swish-swish! What a brushing! George was working her intense annoyance out of herself. She mustn't spoil things for the boys and Anne! But oh, that horrible Henrietta, meeting them like that, pretending to be a boy. Heaving their luggage about, playing a joke on them! But surely they might have guessed!

'Oh, there you are, George, old thing,' said Dick's voice at the stable-door. 'Let me help. Gosh, aren't you brown! Just as many freckles as ever!'

George grinned unwillingly. She tossed Dick the brush. 'Here you are, then! Do you and Ju want to go riding at all? There are plenty of horses to choose from here.'

Dick was relieved to see that George appeared to have got over her rage. 'Yes. It might be fun to go off for the day. What about tomorrow? We might explore a little of Mystery Moor.'

'Right,' said George. She began to heave some straw about. 'But not with That Girl,' she announced, from behind the straw she was carrying.

'What girl?' asked Dick, innocently. 'Oh, Henry, you mean? I keep thinking of her as a boy. No, we won't have her with us. We'll be just the five as usual.'

'That's all right then,' said George happily. 'Oh, here's Julian. Give a hand, Ju!'

It was lovely to have the two boys again, joking, laughing, teasing. They all went out in the fields that afternoon and heard the tales of the camp. It was just like old times, and Timmy was as pleased as anyone else. He went first to one of the four, then to another, licking each one as he went, his tail wagging vigorously.

'That's three times you've smacked me in the face with your tail, Timmy,' said Dick, dodging it. 'Can't you look behind yourself and see where my face is?'

'Woof,' said Timmy happily, and turned round to lick Dick, wagging his tail in Julian's face this time!

Somebody squeezed through the hedge behind them. George stiffened, feeling sure that it was Henrietta. Timmy barked sharply.

It wasn't Henrietta. It was the little gypsy boy. He came up to them. There were pale streaks down his dirty little face, made by tears that had run through the dirt!

'I've come for the horse,' he said. 'Do you know where he is?'

'He's not ready for walking yet,' said George. 'Captain Johnson told you he wouldn't be. What's the matter? Why have you been crying?'

'My father hit me,' said the boy. 'He cuffed me and knocked me right over.'

'Whatever for?' asked Anne.

'Because I left the horse,' said the boy. 'My father said all it wanted was a bit of ointment and a bandage. He has to start off with the other caravans today, you see.'

'Well, you really can't have the horse yet,' said Anne. 'It isn't fit to walk, let alone drag a caravan. You don't want Captain Johnson to tell the police you're working it when it's not fit, do you? You know he means what he says?'

'Yes. But I must have the horse,' said the small gypsy. 'I daren't go back without it. My father would half kill me.'

'I suppose he doesn't care to come himself, so he sends you instead,' said Dick, in disgust.

The boy said nothing, and rubbed his dirty sleeve across his face. He sniffed.

'Get your hanky,' said Dick. 'Don't you ever wash your face?'

'No,' said the boy, looking quite surprised. 'Let me have my horse. I tell you, I'll be half killed if I go back without him.' He began to cry again.

The children felt sorry for him. He was such a thin, skinny misery of a boy, and goodness, how he sniffled all the time!

'What's your name?' asked Anne.

'Sniffer,' said the boy. 'That's what my father calls me.'

It was certainly a good name for him; but what a horrid father he must have!

'Haven't you got a proper name?' asked Anne.

'Yes. But I've forgotten it,' said Sniffer. 'Let me have my horse. I tell you, my father's waiting.'

Julian got up. 'I'll come and see your father and put some sense into him. Where is he?'

'Over yonder,' said Sniffer with a big sniff, and he pointed over the hedge. 'I'll come too,' said Dick. In the end everyone got up and went with Sniffer. They walked through the gate and saw a dark-faced, surly-looking man standing motionless not far off. His thick, oily hair was curly, and he wore enormous gold rings hanging from his ears. He looked up as the little company came near.

'Your horse isn't fit to walk yet,' said Julian. 'You can have it tomorrow or the next day, the Captain says.'

'I'll have it now,' said the man, in a surly tone. 'We're starting off tonight or tomorrow over the moor. I can't wait.'

'But what's the hurry?' said Julian. 'The moor will wait for you!'

The man scowled and shifted from one foot to another. 'Can't you stay for another night or two and then go after the others?' said Dick.

'Listen, Father! You go with the other caravans,' said Sniffer, eagerly. 'Go in Moses' caravan and leave ours here. I can put our horse into the shafts tomorrow, or may be the next day, and follow after!'

'But how would you know the way?' said George.

Sniffer made a scornful movement with his hand. 'Easy! They'll leave me patrins to follow,' he said.

'Oh yes,' said Dick, remembering. He turned to the silent gypsy fellow. 'Well, what about it? It seems that Sniffer here has quite a good idea, and you most certainly can't have the horse today anyway.'

The man turned and said something angry and scornful to poor Sniffer, who shrank away from the words as if they were blows. The four children couldn't understand a word, for it was all poured out in some gypsy talk that they could not follow. Then the man turned on his heel and without so much as a look at them, slouched away, his ear-rings gleaming as he went.

'What did he say?' asked Julian.

Sniffer gave one of his continual sniffs. 'He was very angry. He said he'd go with the others, and I could come on with Clip the horse, and drive our caravan,' he said. 'I'll be all right there tonight with Liz.'

'Who's Liz?' asked Anne, hoping that it was someone who would be kind to this poor little wretch.

'My dog,' said Sniffer, smiling for the first time. 'I left her behind because she sometimes goes for hens, and Captain Johnson, he doesn't like that.'

'I bet he doesn't,' said Julian. 'All right, that's settled then. You can come for Clip, or Clop, or whatever your horse is called, tomorrow, and we'll see if it's fit to walk.'

'I'm glad,' said Sniffer, rubbing his nose. 'I don't want Clip to go lame, see? But my father, he's fierce, he is.'

'So we gather,' said Julian, looking at a bruise on Sniffer's face. 'You come tomorrow and you can show us some of the patrins, the messages, that you gypsies use. We'd like to know some.'

'I'll come,' promised Sniffer, nodding his head vigorously. 'And you will come to see my caravan? I shall be all alone there, except for Liz.'

'Well, I suppose it would be something to do,' said Dick. 'Yes, we'll come. I hope it's not too smelly.'

'Smelly?' said Sniffer, surprised. 'I don't know. I will show you patrins there and Liz will show you her tricks. She is very very clever. Once she belonged to a circus.'

'We must certainly take Timmy to see this clever dog,' said Anne, patting Timmy, who had been hunting for rabbits and had only just come back. 'Timmy, would you like to go and visit a very clever dog called Liz?'

'Woof,' said Timmy, wagging his tail politely.

'Right,' said Dick. 'I'm glad you approve, Tim. We'll all try and come tomorrow, Sniffer, after you've been to see how Clip is getting on. I don't somehow think you'll be able to have him then, though. We'll see!'

Chapter 4

A BED IN THE STABLE

The boys slept in one of the stables that night. Captain Johnson said they could either have mattresses sent out, or could sleep in the straw, with rugs.

'Oh, straw and rugs, please,' said Julian. 'That's fine. We'll be as snug as anything with those.'

'I wish Anne and I could sleep in a stable too,' said George, longingly. 'We never have. Can't we, Captain Johnson?'

'No. You've got beds that you're paying for,' said the Captain. 'Anyway, girls can't do that sort of thing, not even girls who try to be boys, George!'

'I've often slept in a stable,' said Henrietta. 'At home when we've too many visitors, I always turn out and sleep in the straw.'

'Bad luck on the horses!' said George.

'Why?' demanded Henry at once.

'Because you must keep them awake all night with your snoring!' said George.

Henry snorted crossly and went out. It was maddening that she should snore at night, but she simply couldn't help it.

'Never mind!' George called after her. 'It's a nice manly snore, Henrietta!'

'Shut up, George,' said Dick, rather shocked at this sudden display of pettiness on George's part.

'Don't tell me to shut up,' said George. 'Tell Henrietta!'

'George, don't be an ass,' said Julian. But George didn't like that either, and stalked out of the room in just the same stiff, offended way that Henry had done!

'Oh dear!' said Anne. 'It's been like this all the time. First Henry, then George, then George, then Henry! They really are a couple of idiots!'

She went to see where the boys were to sleep. They had been told to use a small stable, empty except for the gypsy's horse that lay patiently down, its bandaged leg stretched out on the floor. Anne patted it and stroked it. It was an ugly little thing but its patient brown eyes were lovely.

The boys had heaps of straw to burrow into, and some old rugs. Anne thought it all looked lovely. 'You can wash and everything at the house,' she said. 'Then just slip over here to sleep. Doesn't it smell nice? All straw and hay and horse! I hope that gypsy's horse won't disturb you. He may be a bit restless if his leg hurts him.'

'Nothing will disturb us tonight!' said Julian. 'What with camp-life and open-air and wind-on-the-hills and all that kind of thing, we're sure to sleep like logs. I think we're going to enjoy it here, Anne, very quiet and peaceful!'

George looked in at the door. 'I'll lend you Timmy, if you like,' she said, anxious to make up for her display of temper.

'Oh, hallo, George! No thanks. I don't particularly want old Tim climbing over me all night long, trying to find the softest part of me to sleep on!' said Julian. 'I say, look, he's showing me how to make a good old burrow to sleep in! Hey, Tim, come out of my straw!'

Timmy had flung himself into the straw and was turning vigorously round and round in it as if he were making a bed for himself. He stood and looked up at them, his mouth open and his tongue hanging out at one side.

'He's laughing,' said Anne, and it did indeed look as if Timmy was having a good old laugh at them. Anne gave him a hug and he licked her lavishly, and then began to burrow round and round in the straw again.

Someone came up, whistling loudly, and put her head in at the door. 'I've brought you a couple of old pillows. Mrs. Johnson said you'd better have something for your heads.'

'Oh thanks awfully, Henry,' said Julian, taking them.

'How kind of you, Henrietta,' said George.

'It's a pleasure, Georgina,' said Henry, and the boys burst out laughing. Fortunately the supperbell went just then and they all went across the yard at once. Somehow everyone was always hungry at the stables!

The girls looked very different in the evening, because they had to change out of their dirty, smelly jodhpurs or breeches and put on dresses. Anne, Henry and George hurried to change before Mrs. Johnson rang the supperbell again. She always gave them ten minutes' grace, knowing that they might sometimes have a job to finish with the horses, but everyone was supposed to be at the table when the second supperbell had finished ringing.

George looked nice, because her curly hair went with a skirt and blouse quite well, but Henry looked quite wrong, somehow, in her frilly dress.

'You look like a boy dressed up!' said Anne, and this pleased Henry, but not George. The talk at the suppertable was mainly about all the wonderful things that Henry had done in her life. Apparently she had three brothers and did everything with them, and according to her own tales, she was considerably better than they were!

They had sailed a ship up to Norway. They had hiked from London to York.

'Was Dick Turpin with you?' inquired George, sarcastically. 'On his horse, Black Bess? I expect you got there long before him, didn't you?'

Henry took no notice. She went on with wonderful tales of her family's exploits, swimming across wide rivers, climbing Snowdon to the top, goodness, there wasn't a single thing she didn't seem to have done!

'You certainly ought to have been a boy, Henry,' said Mrs. Johnson, which was exactly what Henry wanted everyone to say!

'Henry, when you've told us the story of how you climbed Mount Everest and got there before anyone else, perhaps you would finish your plateful,' said Captain Johnson, who got very tired of Henry's tongue.

George roared with laughter, not that she thought it was very funny, but because she loved any chance to laugh at Henry. Henry tackled the rest of her food at top speed. How she did love to hold everyone spellbound with her extraordinary tales! George didn't believe a word, but Dick and Julian thought it quite likely that this tall, wiry girl could do things just as well as her brothers.

There were a few jobs to be done after supper, and Henry kept well away from George, knowing quite well that she would have a few cutting things to say. Well, she didn't care! Everyone else thought she was marvellous! She tore off her frilly dress and put on jodhpurs again, although it would only be a short time before they all went to bed.

George and Anne went with the boys to their stable. They were in pyjamas and dressing-gowns, both yawning as they went. 'Got your torches?' said George. 'We're not allowed to have candles in the stables, because of the straw, you know. Good night! Sleep well! And I hope that that fathead of a Henry doesn't come along early in the morning, whistling like a paper-boy, and wake you up!'

'Nothing will wake me up tonight, nothing at all!' said Julian, with a huge yawn. He lay down in the straw and pulled an old rug over him. 'Oh, what a bed! Give me stable straw every time to sleep in!'

The girls laughed. The boys really did look very comfortable. 'Sleep tight,' said Anne, and walked off with George to the house.

Soon all the lights were out everywhere. Henry was asleep and snoring as usual. She had to have a separate room, otherwise she kept everyone awake! But even so, Anne and George could hear her, snoring away - rrrumph - rrrumph! rrrumph - RRRRUMPH!

'Blow Henrietta!' said George, sleepily. 'What a row she makes. Anne, she's not to come with us when we go riding tomorrow. Do you hear, Anne?'

'Not very well,' murmured Anne, trying to open her eyes. 'G' night, George!'

Timmy was on George's feet as usual. He lay snuggled there, eyes shut and ears asleep too. He got as tired as everyone else, running over the hills all day, scrabbling at scores of rabbit-holes, chasing dozens of remarkably fleet-footed rabbits. But at night he too slept like a log.

Out in the stable the two boys slept peacefully, covered by the old rug. Nearby the little skewbald horse moved restlessly, but they heard nothing. An owl came swooping over the stable, looking for mice down below. It screeched loudly, hoping to scare a mouse into sudden flight. Then it would swoop down and take it into its talons.

Not even the screech awakened the boys. They slept dreamlessly, tired out.

The door of the stable was shut and latched. Clip, the horse, suddenly stirred and looked round at the door. The latch was moving! Someone was lifting it from the outside. Clip's pricked ears heard the sound of a little shuffle.

He watched the door. Who was coming? He hoped it was Sniffer, the boy he liked so much. Sniffer was always kind to him. He didn't like being away from Sniffer. He listened for the sniff-sniff that always went with the little gypsy boy, but he didn't hear it.

The door opened very slowly indeed. It gave no creak. Clip saw the night sky outside, set with stars. He made out a figure outlined against the darkness of the starry night, a black shadow.

Someone came into the stable, and whispered 'Clip!'

The horse gave a little whinny. It wasn't Sniffer's voice. It was his father's. Clip did not like him, he was too free with cuffs and kicks, and slashes with the whip. He lay still, wondering why the gypsy had come.

The man had no idea that Dick and Julian were sleeping in the stable. He had come in quietly because he had thought there might be other horses there, and he did not want to startle them and make them stamp about in fright. He had no torch, but his keen gypsy's eyes made out Clip at once, lying in his straw.

He tiptoed across to him and fell over Julian's feet, sticking out from the straw bed he was lying on. He fell with a thud, and Julian sat up very suddenly indeed, awake at once.

'Who's there! What is it?'

The gypsy shrank down beside Clip, keeping silent. Julian began to wonder if he had been dreaming. But his foot distinctly hurt him. Surely somebody had trodden on it, or fallen over it? He woke Dick.

'Where's the torch? Hello, look, the stable door is open! Quick, Dick, where on earth is the torch?'

They found it at last and Julian clicked it on. At first he saw nothing, for the gypsy was in Clip's stall, lying down behind the horse. Then the torch picked him out.

'Hallo! Look there - it's that gypsy, Sniffer's father!' said Julian. 'Get up, you! What on earth are you doing here, in the middle of the night?'

Chapter 5

GEORGE GETS A HEADACHE!

The man got up sullenly. His ear-rings shone in the light of the torch. 'I came to get Clip,' he said. 'He's my horse, isn't he?'

'You were told he wasn't fit to walk yet,' said Julian. 'Do you want him to go lame for life? You ought to know enough about horses to know when one can be worked or not!'

'I've got my orders,' said the man. 'I've got to take my caravan with the others.'

'Who said so?' said Dick, scornfully.

'Barney Boswell,' said the man. 'He's boss of our lot here. We've got to start off together tomorrow.'

'But why?' said Julian, puzzled. 'What's so urgent about all this? What's the mystery?'

'There ain't no mystery,' said the man, still sullen. 'We're just going to the moor.'

'What are you going to do there?' asked Dick, curiously. 'It doesn't seem to me to be the place to take a lot of caravans to. There's nothing there at all, is there? Or so I've heard.'

The man shrugged his shoulders and said nothing. He turned to Clip as if to get him up. But Julian rapped out at him at once.

'Oh no, you don't! If you don't care about injuring a horse, I do! You've only got to be patient for a day or two more, and he'll be quite all right. You're not to take him tonight. Dick, go and wake Captain Johnson. He'll know what to do.'

'No,' said the man, scowling. 'Don't go waking anybody. I'll go. But just you see that Clip is given to Sniffer as soon as it's possible, or I'll know the reason why! See?'

He looked at Julian in a threatening way.

'Take that scowl off your face,' said Julian. 'I'm glad you've seen sense. Clear out now. Go off with the others tomorrow and I'll see that Sniffer has the horse in a short time.'

The man moved to the door and slid out like a shadow. Julian went to watch him across the yard, wondering whether, out of spite, the man might try to steal a hen, or one of the ducks sleeping beside the pond.

But there was no sudden clucking, no loud quack. The man had gone as silently as he had come.

'Most peculiar, all this!' said Julian, latching the door again. He tied a piece of thick string over it his side, so that it could not be lifted from outside. 'There! Now if the gypsy comes again, he'll find he can't get in. What a nerve, coming here in the middle of the night like that!'

He got back into the straw. 'He must have fallen right over my foot,' he said, snuggling down. 'He woke me up with an awful jump. Good thing for Clip that we were sleeping out here tonight, or he'd be dragging along a heavy cart tomorrow, and going lame again. I don't like that fellow!' He fell asleep again and so did Dick. Clip slept too, his leg feeling easier. How glad he had been that day not to have to drag along the heavy caravan!

The boys told Captain Johnson next morning about the gypsy's midnight visit. He nodded. 'Yes, I ought to have warned you that he might come. They're not always very good to their horses. Well, I'm glad you sent him off. I don't reckon Clip's leg will be ready for walking on till the day after tomorrow. There's no harm in giving the poor creature a few days' rest. Sniffer can easily take the caravan on after the others.'

It looked as if that day was going to be fun. After all the horses had been seen to, and many odd jobs done, the four, with Timmy, planned to set out for a day's ride. Captain Johnson said he would let Julian ride his own sturdy cob and Dick took a bonny chestnut horse with four white socks. The girls had the horses they usually rode.

Henry hung about, looking very mournful. The boys felt quite uncomfortable. 'We really ought to tell her to come along too,' said Dick to Julian. 'It seems jolly mean to leave her behind with those little kids.'

'Yes, I know. I agree with you,' said Julian. 'Anne, come here! Can't you suggest to George that we take Henry too? She's longing to come, I know.'

'Yes. She is,' said Anne. 'I feel awful about it. But George will be mad if we ask Henry. They really do get across one another. I simply daren't ask George to let Henry come, Ju.'

'But this is silly!' said Julian. 'To think we don't dare to ask George to let somebody come! George will have to learn sense. I like Henry. She's boastful, and I don't believe half the tales she tells, but she's a sport and good fun. Hey, Henry!'

'Coming!' yelled Henry, and came running, looking very hopeful.

'Would you like to come with us?' said Julian. 'We're all going off for the day. Have you got any jobs to do, or can you come?'

'Can I come! Rather,' said Henry, joyfully. 'But - does George know?'

'I'll soon tell her,' said Julian, and went in search of George. She was helping Mrs. Johnson to get saddle-bags ready, full of food.

'George,' said Julian, boldly. 'Henry is coming too. Will there be enough food for everyone?'

'Oh! How nice of you to ask her!' said Mrs. Johnson, sounding very pleased. 'She's dying to come. She's been so good this week, too, while we've been shorthanded. She deserves a treat. Isn't that nice, George?'

George muttered something peculiar and went out of the room, her face scarlet. Julian stared after her, his eyebrows cocked in a comical manner.

'I don't somehow feel that George thinks it's nice,' he said. 'I feel as if we are in for an awkward day, Mrs. Johnson.'

'Oh, don't take any notice of George when she's silly,' said Mrs. Johnson, comfortably, filling another paper bag with delicious-looking sandwiches. 'And don't take any notice of Henry, either, when she's idiotic. There! If you get through all this food, I shall be surprised!'

William, one of the younger ones, came in just then. 'What a lot of food you've given them,' he said. 'Will there be enough left for us to have today?'

'Good gracious, yes!' said Mrs. Johnson. 'You think of nothing but your tummy, William! Go and find George and tell her the food is ready for her to put into the saddle-bags.'

William disappeared and then came back. 'George says she's got a headache and doesn't think she'll go on the ride,' he announced.

Julian looked startled and upset. 'Now you listen to me, Julian,' said Mrs. Johnson, beginning to insert the parcels of food carefully into the saddle-bags, 'just you leave her to her imaginary headache. Don't go fussing round her, and begging her to come and saying you won't have Henry. Just believe quite firmly in her headache, and go off by yourselves. It's the quickest way to make George see sense, believe me!'

'Yes. I think you're right,' said Julian, frowning. To think that George should behave like a sulky little girl, after all the adventures they had been through together! Just because of Henry. It really was absurd.

'Where is George!' he said to William.

'Up in her room,' said William, who had been engrossed in picking up and eating all the crumbs he could. Julian went out of the room and into the yard. He knew which window belonged to the room where George and Anne slept. He yelled up.

'I say, George! Sorry about your headache, old thing! Sure you don't feel like coming?'

'No!' came back an answering shout, and the window was shut down with a slam.

'Righto! Awfully disappointed and all that!' shouted Julian. 'Do hope your head will soon be better! See you later!'

No other reply came from the window, but, as Julian went across the yard to the stables, a very surprised face watched him go, from behind the bedroom curtains. George was extremely astonished to have been taken at her word, shocked at being left behind after all, and angry with Henry and everyone else for putting her into this fix!

Julian told the others that George had a headache and wasn't coming. Anne was most concerned and wanted to go and comfort her but Julian forbade her to.

'No. She's up in her room. Leave her alone, Anne. That's an order - see?'

'All right,' said Anne, half-relieved. She felt sure that George's headache was mostly temper, and she didn't at all want to go and argue with her for half an hour. Henry hadn't said a word. She had flushed with surprise when Julian had announced that George was not coming, and she knew at once that there was no real headache! She was George's headache, she knew that!

She went up to Julian. 'Look, I guess it's because you've asked me to come, that Georgina won't come with us. I don't want to spoil things. You go and tell her I'm not going after all.'

Julian looked at Henry gratefully. 'That's jolly nice of you,' he said. 'But we're taking George at her word. Anyway, we didn't ask you out of politeness. We wanted you to come!'

'Thanks,' said Henry. 'Well, let's go before anything else happens! Our horses are ready. I'll fix the saddle-bags.'

Soon all four were on their horses, and were walking over the yard to the gate. George heard the clippity-clop-clippity-clop of the hooves and peeped out of the window again. They were going after all! She hadn't thought they really would go without her. She was horrified.

Why did I behave like that? I've put myself in the wrong! thought poor George. Now Henrietta will be with them all day and will be as nice as possible, just to show me up. What an ass I am!

'Timmy, I'm an ass and an idiot, and a great big fathead! Aren't I?'

Timmy didn't think so. He had been puzzled to hear the others going off without him and George, and had gone to the door and whined. Now he came back to George and put his head on her knee. He knew George was not happy.

'You don't care how I behave, do you, Tim?' said George, stroking the soft, furry head. 'That's the best of a dog! You don't care if I'm in the wrong or not, you just love me all the same, don't you? Well, you shouldn't love me today, Tim. I've been an idiot!'

There was a knock at her door. It was William again. 'George! Mrs. Johnson says, if your headache is bad, undress and get into bed. But if it's better, come down and help with Clip, the gypsy's horse.'

'I'll come down,' said George, flinging away her sulks at one go. 'Tell Mrs. Johnson I'll go to the stable at once.'

'All right,' said the stolid William, and trotted off like a reliable little pony.

George went downstairs with Timmy, and into the yard. She wondered how far the others had gone. She couldn't see them in the distance. Would they have a good day together, with that horrid Henry? Ugh!

The others were almost a mile away, cantering easily. What fun! A whole day before them, on Mystery Moor!

Chapter 6 A GRAND DAY

'I think it's got a jolly good name, Mystery Moor,' said Dick, as the four of them went along. 'Look at it stretching for miles, all blazing with gorse.'

'I don't think it looks at all mysterious,' said Henry, surprised.

'Well, it's got a sort of quietness and broodiness,' said Anne. 'As if something big happened long ago in the past and it's waiting for something to happen again.'

'Quiet and broody? It sounds like one of the farmyard hens sitting on her eggs!' said Henry with a laugh. 'I think it might be a bit frightening and mysterious at night, but it's just an ordinary stretch of country in the day-time, fine for riding over. I can't think why it's called Mystery Moor.'

'We'll have to look it up in some book that tells about this part of the country,' said Dick. 'I expect it was called that because of some queer happenings or other, hundreds of years ago, when people believed in witches and things like that.'

They followed no road or path, but rode where they pleased. There were great stretches of wiry grass, masses of heather springing up afresh, and, blazing its gold everywhere on this lovely April day, was the gorse.

Anne sniffed continually as they rode past the gorse bushes. Dick looked at her.

'You sound like Sniffer!' he said. 'Have you got a cold?'

Anne laughed. 'No, of course not. But I do so love the smell of the gorse. What does it smell of? Vanilla? Hot coconut? It's a lovely warm smell!'

'Look! What's that moving over there?' said Julian, suddenly reining in his horse. They all strained their eyes to see.

'Why, it's caravans!' said Julian, at last. 'Of course! They were setting out today, weren't they? Well, they must find it very rough going, that's all I can say. There's no real road anywhere, as far as I can see.'

'Where can they be going?' wondered Anne. 'What's over in that direction?'

'They'll come to the coast if they keep on the way they are going,' said Julian, considering. 'Let's ride over and have a look at them, shall we?'

'Yes. Good idea!' said Dick. So they turned their horses' heads to the right, and rode towards the faraway caravans. These made quite a splash of colour as they went along. There were four of them - two red ones, a blue one and a yellow one. They went very slowly indeed, each pulled by a small, wiry horse.

'They all look like skewbalds, brown and white,' said Dick. 'It's funny that so many gypsies have skewbald horses. I wonder why it is?'

They heard shouting as they came near the caravans, and saw one man pointing them out to another. It was Sniffer's father!

'Look, that's the fellow who woke us up in the stable last night,' said Julian to Dick. 'Sniffer's father! What a nasty bit of work he is! Why doesn't he get a haircut?'

'Good morning!' called Dick, as they rode up to the caravans on their horses. 'Nice day!'

There was no answer. The gypsies driving their caravans and those walking alongside, looked sourly at the four riders.

'Where are you going?' asked Henry. 'To the coast?'

'It's naught to do with you,' said one of the gypsies, an old man with curly grey hair.

'Surly folk, aren't they?' said Dick to Julian. 'I suppose they think we're spying on them, or something. I wonder how they manage about food on this moor, no shops or anything. I suppose they take it all with them.'

'I'll ask them,' said Henry, not at all put off by the surly looks. She rode right up to Sniffer's father.

'How do you manage about food, and water?' she asked.

'We got food there,' said Snifler's father, jerking his head back towards one of the caravans. 'As for water, we know where the springs are.'

'Are you camping on the moor for a long time?' asked Henry, thinking that a gypsy's life might be a fine one, for a time! Fancy living out here on this lovely moor with gorse blazing gold all around, and primroses by the thousand in the sheltered corners!

'That's naught to do with you!' shouted the old man with curly grey hair. 'You clear off and let us alone!'

'Come on, Henry,' said Julian, swinging round to go off. 'They don't like us asking them questions. They think it's prying, not interest. May be they have lots of things to hide, and don't want us poking around - one or two chickens from a farm, a duck or so from some pond. They live from hand to mouth, these folk.'

Some dark-eyed children peered from the vans as they went by. One or two were running outside, but they sheered off like frightened rabbits when Henry cantered towards them.

'Oh well, they simply don't want to be friendly,' she said, and went to join the other three. 'What a strange life they lead, in their houses on wheels! Never staying anywhere for long, always on the move. Get up, there, Sultan. Go after the others!'

Her horse obediently followed the other three, taking care not to step into any rabbit-holes! What fun it was to be out here in the sunshine, jogging up and down on a horse's back, without a care in the world! Henry was very happy.

The other three were enjoying their day, but they were not quite so happy. They kept wondering about George. They missed Timmy too. He should be trotting beside them, enjoying the day as well!

They lost sight of the caravans after a time. Julian kept track of the way they went, half-afraid of being lost. He had a compass with him, and checked their direction continually. 'It would never do to have to spend a night out here!' he said. 'Nobody would ever find us!'

They had a magnificent lunch about half-past twelve. Really, Mrs. Johnson had surpassed herself! Egg and sardine sandwiches, tomato and lettuce, ham - there seemed no end to them! Great slices of cherry cake were added too, and a large, juicy pear each.

'I like this kind of cherry cake,' said Dick, looking at his enormous slice. 'The cherries have all gone to the bottom. They make a very nice last mouthful!'

'Any drinks?' said Henry, and was handed a bottle of ginger-beer. She drank it thirstily.

'Why does ginger-beer taste so nice on a picnic?' she said. 'Much nicer than drinking it sitting down in a shop, even if it's got ice in it!'

'There's a spring or something nearby,' said Julian. 'I can hear it bubbling.'

They all listened. Yes, there was a little bubbling, tinkling noise. Anne got up to trace it. She found it in a few minutes and called the others. There was a round pool, cool and blue, lying two or three feet down, and into it, from one side, fell a crystal clear spring of water, tinkling as it fell.

'One of the springs that the gypsies use, when they travel this deserted moor, I expect,' said Julian. He cupped his hands under the falling water and got his palms full. He carried the water to his mouth and sipped it.

'Delicious! Cool as an ice-box,' he said. 'Taste it, Anne.'

They rode a little farther, but the moor seemed the same everywhere, heather, wiry grass, gorse, a clear spring falling into a pool or tiny stream here and there, and a few trees, mostly silver birch.

Larks sang all the time, soaring high in the air, almost too far up to see.

'Their song falls down like raindrops,' said Anne, holding out her hands as if to catch them. Henry laughed. She liked this family, and was very glad they had asked her to come out with them. She thought George was silly to have stayed at the stables.

'I think we ought to go home,' said Julian at last, looking at his watch. 'We're a good way away. Let me see now. We want to make more or less for the setting sun. Come on!'

He led the way, his horse picking its own path over the heather. The others followed. Dick stopped after a while.

'Are you sure we're quite right, Ju? I don't somehow feel that we are. The moor is different here, rather sandy and not so much gorse.'

Julian stopped his horse and looked round and about. 'Yes, it does look a bit different,' he said. 'But yet we seem to be going in the right direction. Let's go a bit more to the west. If only there was something on the horizon to guide us. But this moor hasn't a thing that stands out anywhere!'

They went on again, and then Henry gave an exclamation. 'I say! What's this? Do come here.'

The two boys and Anne swerved over to Henry. She was now off her horse, and was bending over, scraping away at the heather.

'Look, it seems like rails, or something,' said Henry. 'Very old and rusty. But they can't be, surely?'

Everyone was now down on their knees, scraping sand and heather away. Julian sat back and considered.

'Yes, it's rails. Old ones, as you say. But what in the world were rails laid down here for?'

'I can't think,' said Henry. 'I only caught sight of them by chance, they're so overgrown. I couldn't believe my eyes!'

'They must lead from somewhere to somewhere!' said Dick. 'Perhaps there was a quarry, or something on the moor and they ran little engines with trucks there, to fetch the sand, and take it back to town to sell.'

'That's about it,' said Julian. 'It's very sandy here, as we noticed. Good, fine sand. May be there is a quarry on the moor. Well, that way, behind us goes right out on the moor, so this way must lead back to some town or village, probably Milling Green or somewhere like that.'

'Yes. You're right,' said Dick. 'In which case, if we follow the lines along, we'll get back to civilization sooner or later!'

'Well, seeing that we seem to be more or less lost, that would be quite a good idea!' said Henry. She mounted her horse again and rode along the lines.

'They're fairly easy to see!' she called. 'If you ride between them, that is, because they go so straight.'

The lines ran steadily over the moor, sometimes very overgrown, and in about half an hour's time Henry gave a cry and pointed forward. 'Houses! I thought we'd soon come to some place!'

'It is Milling Green!' said Julian, as the rails came to a sudden end, and they rode out into a small cart-road.

'Well, we haven't far to go now, to get to the stables,' said Henry, pleased. 'I say, wouldn't it be fun to follow those lines all across the moor and see where they really lead to?'

'Yes. We might do that one day,' said Julian. 'Gosh, it's getting late. I wonder how old George has been getting on today!'

They walked quickly along to the stables, thinking of George. Would she have retired to bed? Would she still be cross, or worse still, hurt and grieved? It was anybody's guess!

Chapter 7

GEORGE, SNIFFER AND LIZ

George had had quite an interesting day. First she had gone down to help Captain Johnson do Clip's leg again and bandage it up. The little skewbald stood very patiently, and George felt a sudden liking for the ugly little creature.

'Thanks, George,' said Captain Johnson, who, to her relief, had said nothing about her not having gone riding with the others. 'Now would you like to come and put jumps up for the youngsters? They're longing to do some more jumping.'

George found that it was quite amusing to teach the younger ones how to jump. They were so very very proud of themselves when they went over even a foot-high jump on their little ponies.

After that Sniffer arrived, accompanied by a peculiar little mongrel called Liz. Liz was a bit of a spaniel, a bit of a poodle, and odd bits of something else - and looked rather like a small, walking hearth-rug of black curly fur.

Timmy was amazed to see this walking mat, and sat and watched Liz sniffing here and there for some time, before he came to the conclusion that it really was some kind of dog. He gave a sharp little bark to see what this comical creature would do when she heard it.

Liz took no notice at all. She had unearthed a small bone, which smelt extremely interesting. Timmy considered that all bones within the radius of at least a mile belonged to him and him alone. So he ran over to Liz at once and gave a small, warning growl.

Liz immediately dropped the bone humbly at his feet, then sat up on her hind-legs and begged. Timmy eyed her in astonishment. Then Liz stood up on her hindlegs and walked daintily all round Timmy and back again.

Timmy was astounded. He had never seen a dog do that before. Could this hearthrug affair be a dog after all?

Liz saw that Timmy was really impressed, and went on with yet another trick she had learnt during the time she had been with the circus.

She turned head-over-heels, yapping all the time. Timmy retreated a few steps into the bushes. This was going too far! What was this animal doing? Trying to stand on its head?

Liz went on turning head-over-heels very rapidly and ended up almost on Timmy's front paws. He had now backed into the bush as far as he could.

Liz remained on her back, paws in air, tongue hanging out, panting. She gave a very small, beseeching whine.

Timmy bent his head down and sniffed at her paws. Behind him his tail began to move a little, yes, it had a wag in it! He sniffed again. Liz leapt on to her four feet and pranced all round Timmy, yapping as if to say 'Come on and play! Do come!'

And then suddenly Timmy fell upon the absurd little creature and pretended to worry it. Liz gave a delighted volley of yaps and rolled over and over. They had a marvellous game, and when it was all over, Timmy sank down panting for breath, in a sunny corner of the yard and Liz settled herself between his front paws, as if she had known him all her life!

When George came out of the stable with Sniffer, she could hardly believe her eyes. 'What's that Timmy's got between his paws?' she said. 'It's surely not a dog!'

'It's Liz,' said Sniffer. 'She can get round any dog there is, Master George! Liz! You're a monkey, aren't you! Walk, then, walk!'

Liz left Timmy and ran over to Sniffer, walking daintily on her hind legs. George laughed. 'What a funny little creature, like a bit cut out of a furry hearthrug!'

'She's clever,' said Sniffer and patted Liz. 'Well, Master George, when can I have Clip, do you think? My father has gone off with the other caravans and he's left me with ours. So it doesn't matter whether it's today or tomorrow, or even the next day.'

'Well, it won't be today, that's certain,' said George, pleased that Sniffer called her Master George not Miss. 'It might perhaps be tomorrow. Haven't you got a hanky, Sniffer? I never on my life heard anyone sniff as often as you do.'

Sniffer rubbed his sleeve across his nose. 'I never had no hanky,' he said. 'But I've got my sleeve, see?'

'I think you're quite disgusting,' said George. 'I'm going to give you one of my own hankies, and you're to use it. You're not to keep sniffing like that.'

'Didn't know I did,' said Sniffer, half sulkily. 'What's it matter, anyway?'

But George had gone indoors and up the stairs. She chose a large hanky, in red and white stripes. That would do nicely for Sniffer! She took it down to him. He looked at it in surprise.

'That's a scarf for my neck!' he said.

'No, it isn't. It's a hanky for your nose,' said George. 'Haven't you a pocket to put it in? That's right. Now, use it instead of sniffing, for goodness' sake!'

'Where are the others?' asked Sniffer, putting the hanky carefully into his pocket, almost as if it were made of glass.

'Gone riding,' said George, shortly.

'They said they would come and see my caravan,' said Sniffer. 'They said so!'

'Well, they won't be able to today,' said George. 'They'll be back too late, I expect. I'll come and see it, though. There's nobody in it, is there?'

George was not keen on meeting Sniffer's father or any other of his relations! He shook his head.

'No, it's empty. My father's gone, I told you, and my aunt and my grandma too.'

'What do you do on the moor?' asked George, as she followed Sniffer across the field and up the hill to where the caravans had stood. Now only one was left - Sniffer's.

'Play around,' said Sniffer, and gave an enormous sniff. George gave him a shove in the back.

'Sniffer! What did I give you the hanky for? Don't do that! It gets on my nerves!'

Sniffer used his sleeve at once, but fortunately George didn't notice. She had now come to the caravan and was staring at it. She thought of Sniffer's answer to her question a minute or two back.

'You said you just played around on the moor. But what does your father do, and your uncle and grandad and all the rest of the men? There's nothing to do there at all, as far as I can see, and no farmhouse to beg eggs or milk or anything from.'

Sniffer shut up like a clam. He was just about to sniff and thought better of it. He stared at George, his mouth set in an obstinate line.

George looked at him impatiently. 'Captain Johnson said you and your caravans went there every three months,' she said. 'What for? There must be some reason?'

'Well,' said Sniffer, looking away from her, 'we make pegs, and baskets, and...'

'I know that! All gypsies make things to sell,' said George. 'But you don't need to go into the middle of a deserted moor to make them. You can do them just as well in a village, or sitting in a field near a farmhouse. Why go to such a lonely place as the moor?'

Sniffer said nothing, but bent over a queer little arrangement of sticks set on the path beside his caravan. George saw them and bent over them too, her question forgotten.

'Oh! Is that a patrin? A gypsy message! What does it mean?'

There were two sticks, one long and one short, neatly arranged in the shape of a cross. A little farther up on the path were a few single, straight sticks, all pointing in the same direction. 'Yes,' said Sniffer, very glad to have the subject changed. 'It's our way of telling things to those who may come after us. See the sticks in the shape of the cross? That's a patrin that says we've been along this way and we're going in the direction that the long stick points.'

'I see,' said George. 'How simple! But what about these four straight sticks, all pointing the same way too. What do they mean?'

'They mean that the travellers went in caravans,' said Sniffer, giving a sudden sniff. 'See, four sticks, four caravans, going that way!'

'I see,' said George, making up her mind that she herself would evolve quite a few 'patrins' for use at school when they went for walks. 'Are there any more 'patrins' Sniffer?'

'Plenty,' said the boy. 'Look, when I leave here, I shall put a patrin like this!' he picked a large leaf from a nearby tree, and then a small one. He placed them side by side, and weighted them down with small stones.

'What in the world does that mean?' said George.

'Well, it's a patrin, a message, to say that me and my little dog have gone in the caravan too,' said Sniffer, picking up the leaves. 'Suppose my father came back to find me, and he saw those leaves there, he'd know I'd gone on with my dog. It's simple. Big leaf for me, little leaf for my dog!'

'Yes. I like it,' said George, pleased. 'Now let's look at the caravan.'

It was an old-fashioned kind of caravan, not very big, and with high wheels. The door and the steps down were in front. The shafts rested on the ground waiting for Clip to come back. The caravan was black, with red designs on it here and there.

George went up the steps. 'I've been inside a few caravans,' she said. 'But never one quite like this.'

She peeped in curiously. It certainly wasn't very clean, but it wasn't as dirty as she expected either.

'It's not smelly, is it?' said Sniffer, quite anxiously. 'I tidied it up today, seeing as how I thought you were all visiting me. That's our bed at the back. We all sleep on it.'

George stared at the big bunk-like bed stretched at the end of the caravan, covered with a bright quilt. She imagined the whole family sleeping there, close together. Well at least they would be warm in the winter.

'Don't you get hot in the summer, sleeping in this small caravan?' asked George.

'Oh no, only my grandma sleeps here then,' said Sniffer, swallowing a sniff in a hurry, before George could hear it. 'Me and the others sleep under the caravan. Then if it rains it don't matter.'

'Well, thanks for showing me so many things,' said George, looking round at the cupboards, the little locker-seats, and the over-big chest of drawers. 'How you all get in here is a miracle.'

She didn't go in. Even though Sniffer had tidied up, there was still a distinctly peculiar smell hanging about!

'Come and see us tomorrow, Sniffer,' she said, going down the steps. 'Clip may be all right by then. And Sniffer, don't you forget you've got a hanky now!'

'I won't forget,' said Sniffer, proudly. 'I'll keep it as clean as can be, Master George!'

Chapter 8

SNIFFER MAKES A PROMISE

George was feeling very lonely by the time the evening came. How had the others got on without her? Had they missed her at all? Perhaps they hadn't even thought of her!

'Anyway, they didn't have you, Timmy!' said George. 'You wouldn't go off and leave me, would you?'

Timmy pressed against her, glad to see that she was happier again. He wondered where the others were, and where they had gone to all day.

There was suddenly a clattering of hooves in the stableyard and George flew to the door. Yes, they were back! How should she behave? She felt cross and relieved and rather humble and glad all at once! She stood there, not knowing whether to frown or to smile.

The others made up her mind for her. 'Hallo, George!' shouted Dick. 'We did miss you!'

'How's your head?' called Anne. 'I hope it's better!'

'Hallo!' called Henry. 'You ought to have come. We've had a super day!'

'Come and help us stable the horses, George,' shouted Julian. 'Tell us what you've been doing!'

Timmy had sped over to them, barking in delight. George found her legs running towards them too, a welcoming smile on her face.

'Hallo!' she called. 'Let me help! Did you really miss me? I missed you too.'

The boys were very relieved to see that George was herself again. Nothing more was said about her headache! She busied herself unsaddling the horses and listening to their story of the day. Then she told them about Sniffer and his patrins, and how she had given him a brand-new handkerchief.

'But I'm sure he thinks he's got to keep it spotlessly clean!' she said. 'He never used it once when I was with him. There's the supper-bell, we'll only just be in time! Are you hungry?'

'You bet we are!' said Dick. 'Though after Mrs. Johnson's sandwiches I never thought I'd be able to eat any supper at all. How's Clip?'

'Never mind now. I'll tell you everything at supper,' said George. 'Do you want any help, Henry?' Henry was surprised to hear George call her Henry instead of Henrietta. 'No thanks - er - George,' she said. 'I can manage.'

It was a very jolly supper-time that evening. The youngsters were set at a table by themselves, so the older ones talked to their hearts' content.

Captain Johnson was very interested to hear about the old railway they had found. 'I never knew there was anything like that on the moors,' he said. 'Though, of course, we've only been here about fifteen years, so we don't know a great deal of the local history. You want to go and ask old Ben the blacksmith about that. He's lived here all his life, and a long life it is, for he's over eighty!'

'Well, we've got to take some of the horses to be shod tomorrow, haven't we?' said Henry, eagerly. 'We could ask him then! Why, he might even have helped to make the rails!'

'We saw the caravans, George, when we had got pretty far out on the moor,' said Julian. 'Goodness knows where they were heading for, towards the coast, I should think. What's the coast like beyond the moor, Captain Johnson?'

'Wild,' said the Captain. 'Great, unclimbable cliffs, and reefs or rocks stretching out to sea. Only the birds live there. There's no bathing, no boating, no beach.'

'Well, it beats me where those caravans are going,' said Dick. 'It's a mystery. They go every three months, don't they?'

'About that,' said Captain Johnson. 'I've no idea what the attraction of the moor is for the gypsies. It just beats me! Usually they won't go anywhere where there are not a few farms, or at least a small village where they can sell their goods.'

'I'd like to go after them and see where they are and what they're doing,' said Julian, eating his third hard-boiled egg.

'All right. Let's,' said George.

'But how? We don't know where they've gone,' said Henry.

'Well, Sniffer's going to join them tomorrow, or as soon as Clip is all right for walking,' said George. 'And he's got to follow the patrins left on the way by the others. He says that he looks at the places where fires have been made on the way, and beside them somewhere he will see the patrins, the sticks that point in the direction he must follow.'

'He's sure to destroy them,' said Dick. 'We couldn't follow them!'

'We'll ask him to leave his own patrins,' said George. 'I think he will. He's not a bad little boy, really. I could ask him to leave plenty of patrins, so that we could easily find the way.'

'Well, it might be fun to see if we could read the right road to go, just as easily as the gypsies do,' said Julian. 'We could make it a day's ride. It would be interesting!'

Henry gave a most enormous yawn, and that made Anne yawn too, though hers was a very polite one.

'Henry!' said Mrs. Johnson.

'Sorry,' said Henry. 'It just came almost like a sneeze does. I don't know why, but I feel almost asleep.'

'Go to bed then,' said Mrs. Johnson. 'You've had such a day of air and sunshine! You all look very brown too. The April sun has been as hot as June today.'

The five of them, and Timmy, went out for a last look at the horses, and to do one or two small jobs. Henry yawned again, and that set everyone else off, even George.

'Me for the straw!' said Julian, with a laugh. 'Oh, the thought of that warm, comfy straw bed is too good for words! You girls are welcome to the beds!'

'I hope Sniffer's Pa doesn't come in the middle of the night again,' said Dick.

'I shall tie up the latch,' said Julian. 'Well, let's go and say goodnight to Mrs. Johnson.'

It wasn't long before the three girls were in bed and the two boys cuddled down in the straw of the stable. Clip was there still, but he no longer fidgeted. He lay down quietly, and did not once move his bad leg. It was getting much better. He would certainly be able to go after the others the next day!

Julian and Dick fell asleep at once. No one came creeping in at the stable door that night. Nothing disturbed them until the morning, when a cock got into the stable through a window, sat on a rafter just above them, and crowed loudly enough to wake both boys with a jump.

'What's that!' said Dick. 'That awful screeching in my ear! Was it you, Ju?'

The cock crowed again and the boys laughed. 'Blow him!' said Julian, settling down again. 'I could do with another couple of hours sleep!'

That morning Sniffer came slipping in at the gate again. He never came boldly in, he slid through the hedge, or crept in at the gate, or appeared round a corner. He saw George and went over to her.

'Master George,' he called, much to Julian's amusement. 'Is Clip better?'

'Yes!' called back George. 'Captain Johnson says you can take him today. But wait a bit, Sniffer, I want to ask you something before you go.'

Sniffer was pleased. He liked this girl who had presented him with such a magnificent handkerchief. He took it carefully out of his pocket, hoping to please her.

'See,' he said. 'How clean it is! I have kept it very carefully.' He sniffed loudly.

'You're a fathead,' said George, exasperated. 'I gave it to you to use, not to keep clean in your pocket. It's to stop your sniffing. Honestly, you're a bit of a mutt, Sniffer. I shall take that hanky away if you don't use it!'

Sniffer looked alarmed. He shook it out carefully and then lightly touched his nose with it. He then folded it up conscientiously in the right creases and put it back into his pocket again.

'Now, NO sniffing!' commanded George, trying not to laugh. 'Listen, Sniffer, you know those patrins you showed me yesterday?'

'Yes, Master George,' said Sniffer.

'Well, will the other gypsies who have gone in front, leave you patrins to follow, so that you will know the way?' said George.

Sniffer nodded. 'Yes, but not many, because I have been that way twice before. They will only leave them in places where I might go wrong.'

'I see,' said George. 'Now Sniffer, we want to have a sort of game. We want to see which of us can follow patrins, and we want you to lay patrins for us quite often, on your way to your family today. Will you?'

'Oh yes, I will,' said Sniffer, quite proud to have a favour asked of him. 'I will lay the ones I showed you, the cross, the long sticks, and the big and little leaf.'

'Yes, do,' said George. 'That will mean that you have passed in a certain direction and you are a boy and a dog. That's right, isn't it?'

'Yes,' said Sniffer, nodding his head. 'You have remembered!'

'Right. And we're going to have a kind of game, trying to pretend we are travelling gypsies following others who have passed,' said George.

'You must not show yourselves when you come up to our caravans,' said Sniffer, looking suddenly alarmed. 'I should get into trouble for laying patrins for you.'

'All right. We'll be careful,' said George. 'Now let's go and get Clip.'

They fetched the patient little skewbald who came out gladly. He no longer limped, and his rest seemed to have done him good. He went off at a good pace with Sniffer. The last George heard of them was a very loud sniff indeed!

'Sniffer!' she shouted, warningly. He put his hand in his pocket and pulled out the hanky. He waved it gaily in the air, a sudden grin lighting up his face.

George went to find the others. 'Sniffer has taken Clip,' she said. 'What about going down to the blacksmith, and taking those horses that want shoeing?'

'Good idea,' said Julian. 'We can ask him all about Mystery Moor then, and the strange little railway line, or whatever it is! Come on.'

They took the horses that needed shoeing. There were six of them, so they each rode one, and Julian led the sixth. Timmy ran happily along beside them. He loved the horses, and they regarded him as a real friend, bending their long noses down to sniff at him, whenever he came near.

They went slowly down the long lane to the blacksmith's. 'There it is!' said George. 'A proper old smithy with a lovely fire! And there's the smith!'

Old Ben was a mighty figure of a man, even though he was over eighty. He didn't shoe many horses now, but sat in the sun, watching all that was going on. He had a great mane of white hair, and eyes that were as black as the coal he had so many times heated to a fiery flame.

'Good morning, young masters and Miss,' he said and Julian grinned. That would please George and Henry!

'We've got some questions to ask you,' said George, dismounting.

'Ask away!' said the old man. 'If it's about this place, there's nothing much old Ben can't tell you! Give Jim your horses. Now, ask away!'

Chapter 9

THE BLACKSMITH TELLS A TALE

'Well,' began Julian, 'we went riding on Mystery Moor yesterday, and for one thing we'd like to know if there is any reason for the curious name. Was there ever a mystery on that moor?'

'Oh, there be plenty of mysteries away there,' said Old Ben. 'People lost and never come back again, noises that no one could find the reason of...'

'What kind of noises?' said Anne, curiously.

'Ah now, when I were a boy, I spent nights up on that moor,' said old Ben, solemnly, 'and the noises that went on there! Screeches and howls and the like, and moans and the sweep of big wings...'

'Well, all that might have been owls and foxes and things like that,' said Dick. 'I've heard a barn-owl give a screech just over my head which made me nearly jump out of my skin. If I hadn't known it was an owl I'd have run for miles!'

Ben grinned and his face ran into a score of creases and wrinkles.

'Why is it called Mystery Moor?' persisted Julian. 'Is it a very old name?'

'When my Grandad was a boy it were called Misty Moor,' said the old blacksmith, remembering.

'See, Misty, not Mystery. And that were because of the sea-fogs that came stealing in from the coast, and lay heavy on the moor, so that no man could see his hand in front of his face. Yes, I've been lost in one of them mists, and right scared I was too. It swirled round me like a live thing, and touched me all over with its cold damp fingers.'

'How horrid!' said Anne with a shiver. 'What did you do?'

'Well, first I ran for my life,' said Ben, getting out his pipe and looking into the empty bowl. 'I ran over heather and into gorse. I fell a dozen times, and all the time the mist was feeling me with its damp fingers, trying to get me, that's what the old folk used to say of that mist, it was always trying to get you!'

'Still, it was only a mist,' said George, feeling that the old man was exaggerating. 'Does it still come over the moor?'

'Oh ay,' said Ben, ramming some tobacco into his pipe. 'Autumn's the time, but it comes sudden-like at any moment of the year. I've knowed it come at the end of a fine summer's day, creeping in stealthy-like, and my, if you don't happen to see it soon enough, it gets you!'

'What do you mean, it gets you?' said George.

'Well, it may last for days,' said old Ben. 'And if you're lost on them moors, you're lost proper, and you never come back. Ah, smile if you like, young sir, but I knows!' He went off into memories of long ago, looking down at his pipe. 'Let's see now, there was old Mrs. Banks, who went bilberry-picking with her basket on a summer's afternoon, and no one ever heard of her again, after the mist came down. And there was young Victor who played truant and went off to the moors, and the mist got him too.'

'I can see we'd better watch out for the mist if we go riding there,' said Dick. 'This is the first I've heard of it.'

'Yes. You keep your eyes skinned,' said old Ben. 'Look away to the coast-side and watch there, that's where it comes from. But there baint many mists nowadays, I don't know for why. No, now I think on it, there haven't been a mist, not a proper wicked one, for nigh on three years.'

'What I'd like to know is why was the name changed to Mystery Moor,' said Henry. 'I can understand its being called Misty Moor, but now everyone calls it Mystery, not Misty.'

'Well now, that must have been about seventy years ago, when I were a bit of a boy,' said Ben, lighting his pipe and puffing hard. He was enjoying himself. He didn't often get such an interested audience as this, five of them, including a dog who sat and listened too!

'That was when the Bartle Family built the little railway over the moor,' he began, and stopped at the exclamations of his five listeners.

'Ah! We wanted to know about that!'

'Oh! You know about the railway then!'

'Do go on!'

The blacksmith seemed to get some trouble with his pipe and pulled at it for an exasperatingly long time. George wished she was a horse and could stamp her foot impatiently!

'Well, the Bartle Family was a big one,' said Ben at last. 'All boys, but for one ailing little girl. Big strong fellows they were, I remember them well. I was scared of them, they were so free with their fists. Well, one of them, Dan, found a mighty good stretch of sand out there on the moor...'

'Oh yes, we thought there might have been a sand-quarry,' said Anne. Ben frowned at the interruption.

'And as there were nine or ten good strong Bartles, they reckoned to make a fine do of it,' said Ben. 'They got wagons and they went to and from the quarry they dug, and they sold their sand for miles around, good, sharp sand it were...'

'We saw some,' said Henry. 'But what about the rails?'

'Don't hurry him,' said Dick, with a frown.

'They made a mort of money,' said Ben, remembering. 'And they set to work and built a little railway to carry an injin and trucks to the quarry and back, to save labour. My, my, that were a nine days' wonder, that railway! Us youngsters used to follow the little injin, puffing along, and it were the longing of us all to drive it. But we never did. Them Bartles kept a big stick, each one of them, and they whipped the hide off any boy that got too near them. Fierce they were, and quarrelsome.'

'Why did the railway fall into ruin?' asked Julian. 'The rails are all overgrown with heather and grass now. You can hardly see them.'

'Well, now we come to that there Mystery you keep on about,' said Ben, taking an extra big puff at his pipe. 'Them Bartles fell foul of the gypsies up on the moor...'

'Oh, were there gypsies on the moor then?' said Dick. 'There are some now!'

'Oh ay, there's always been gypsies on the moor, long as I can remember,' said the blacksmith.

'Well, it's said them gypsies quarrelled with the Bartles, and it wasn't hard to do that, most people did! And the gypsies pulled up bits of the line, here and there, and the little injin toppled over and pulled the trucks with it.'

The children could quite well imagine the little engine puffing along, coming to the damaged rails and falling over. What a to-do there must have been up on the moor then!

'The Bartles weren't ones to put up with a thing like that,' said Ben, 'so they set about to drive all the gypsies off the moor, and they swore that if so much as one caravan went there, they'd set fire to it and chase the gypsies over to the coast and into the sea!'

'They must have been a fierce family,' said Anne.

'You're right there,' said Ben. 'All nine or ten of them were big upstanding men, with great shaggy eyebrows that almost hid their eyes, and loud voices. Nobody dared to cross them. If they did, they'd have the whole family on their door-step with sticks. They ruled this place, they did, and my, they were hated! Us children ran off as soon as we saw one coming round a corner.'

'What about the gypsies? Did the Bartles manage to drive them off the moor?' asked George, impatiently.

'Now you let me go my own pace,' said Ben, pointing at her with his pipe. 'You want a Bartle after you, young sir, that's what you want!' He thought she was a boy, of course. He did something to his pipe and made them all wait a little. Julian winked at the others. He liked this old fellow with his long, long memories.

'Now, you can't cross the gypsies for long,' said Ben, at last. 'That's a fact, you can't. And one day all them Bartles disappeared and never came back home. No, not one of them. All that was left of the family was little lame Agnes, their sister.'

Everyone exclaimed in surprise and old Ben looked round with satisfaction. Ah, he could tell a story, he could!

'But whatever happened?' said Henry.

'Well, no one rightly knows,' said Ben. 'It happened in a week when the mist came swirling over the moors and blotted everything out. Nobody went up there except the Bartles, and they were safe because all they had to do was to follow their railway lines there and back. They went up to the quarry each day the mist was there, and worked the same as usual. Nothing stopped them Bartles from working!'

He paused and looked round at his listeners. He dropped his voice low, and all five of the children felt little shivers up their backs.

'One night somebody in the village saw twenty or more gypsy caravans slinking through the village at dead of night,' said Ben. 'Up on the moor they went in the thick mist. Mebbe they followed the railway; nobody knows. And next morning, up to the quarry went the Bartles as usual, swallowed up in the mist.'

He paused again. 'And they never came back,' he said. 'No, not one of them. Never heard of again!'

'But what happened?' said George.

'Search-parties were sent out when the mist cleared,' said old Ben. 'But never one of the Bartles did they find, alive or dead. Never a one! And they didn't find any gypsy caravans either. They'd all come creeping back the next night, and passed through the village like shadows. I reckon them gypsies set upon the Bartles in the mist that day, fought them and defeated them, and took them and threw them over the cliffs into the roaring sea!'

'How horrible!' said Anne, feeling sick.

'Don't worrit yourself!' said the blacksmith. 'It all happened a mort of time ago, and there wasn't many that mourned them Bartles, I can tell you. Funny thing was, their weakly little sister, Agnes, she lived to be a hale old woman of ninety-six, and only died a few years ago! And to think them strong fierce brothers of hers went all together like that!'

'It's a most interesting story, Ben,' said Julian. 'So Misty Moor became Mystery Moor then, did it? And nobody ever really found out what happened, so the mystery was never solved. Didn't anyone work the railway after that, or get the sand?'

'No, not a soul,' said Ben. 'We was all scared, you see, and young Agnes, she said the railway and the trucks and injin could rot, for all she cared. I never dared to go near them after that. It was a long time before anyone but the gypsies set foot on Misty Moor again. Now it's all forgotten, the tale of the Bartles, but them gypsies still remember, I've no doubt! They've got long memories, they have.'

'Do you know why they come to Mystery Moor every so often?' asked Dick.

'No. They come and they go,' said Ben. 'They've their own queer ways. They don't belong anywhere, them folk. What they do on the moor is their own business, and I wouldn't want to poke my nose into it. I'd remember them old Bartles, and keep away!'

A voice came from inside the smithy, where Jim, the blacksmith's grandson, had been shoeing the horses. 'Grandad! You stop jabbering away there, and let the children come and talk to me! I've shod nearly all the horses.'

Ben laughed. 'You go along,' he said to the children. 'I know you like to be in there and see the sparks fly, and the shoes made. I've wasted your time, I have, telling you long-ago things. You go along into the smithy. And just you remember two things - watch out for that mist, and keep away from the gypsies on the moor!

Chapter 10

SNIFFER'S PATRINS

It was fun in the smithy, working the bellows, seeing the fire glow, and watching the red-hot shoes being shaped. Jim was quick and clever, and it was a pleasure to watch him.

'You been hearing Grandad's old stories?' he said. 'It's all he's got to do now, sit there and remember, though when he wants to he can make a horse-shoe as well as I can! There, that's the last one. Stand still, Sultan. That's right!'

The five children were soon on their way back again. It was a lovely morning, and the banks and ditches they passed were bright gold with thousands of celandines.

'All beautifully polished!' said Anne, picking two or three for her button-hole. It did look as if someone had polished the inside of each petal, for they gleamed like enamel.

'What a queer tale the old man told,' said Julian. 'He told it well!'

'Yes. He made me feel I don't want to go up on the moor again!' said Anne.

'Don't be feeble!' said George. 'It all happened ages ago. Jolly interesting too. I wonder if the gypsies who are there now know the story. May be their great-grand-parents were the ones who set on the Bartles that misty day!'

'Well, Sniffer's father looked sly enough to carry out a plan like that,' said Henry. 'What about us having a shot at following the way they went, and seeing if we can make out the patrins that Sniffer told George he would leave?'

'Good idea,' said Julian. 'We'll go this afternoon. I say, what's the time? I should think it must be half-past dinner-time!'

They looked at their watches. 'Yes, we're late, but we always are when we get back from the blacksmith,' said George. 'Never mind, I bet Mrs. Johnson will have an extra special meal for us!' She had! There was an enormous plate of stew for everyone, complete with carrots, onions, parsnips and turnips, and a date pudding to follow. Good old Mrs. Johnson!

'You three girls must wash up for me afterwards,' she said. 'I've such a lot to do today.'

'Why can't the boys help?' said George at once.

'I'll do all the washing-up,' said Anne with a sudden grin. 'You four boys can go out to the stables!'

Dick gave her a good-natured shove. 'You know we'll help, even if we're not good at it. I'll dry. I hate those bits and pieces that float about in the washing-bowl.'

'Will it be all right if we go up on the moors this afternoon?' asked George.

'Yes, quite all right. But if you want to take your tea, you'll have to pack it yourselves,' said Mrs. Johnson. 'I'm taking the small children out for a ride, and there's one on the leading-rein still, as you know.'

They were ready to set off at three o'clock with their tea packed and everything. The horses were caught in the field and got ready too. They set off happily.

'Now we'll see if we are as clever as we think we are, at reading gypsy patrins!' said George. 'Timmy, don't chase every rabbit you see, or you'll be left behind!'

They cantered up on to the moor, passing the place where the caravans had stood. They knew the direction they had taken, and here and there they saw wheel-marks. It was fairly easy to follow their trail, because five caravans made quite a path to follow.

'Here's where they camped first,' said Julian, riding up to a blackened spot that showed where a fire had been lighted. 'We ought to find a message left somewhere here.'

They searched for one. George found it. 'It's here, behind this tree!' she called. 'Out of the wind.'

They dismounted and came round George. On the ground was the patrin, the shape of a cross, the long stick pointing forwards, in the direction they were going. Other single sticks lay there, to show that a caravan had gone that way, and beside them were the large and the small leaf, weighted with tiny stones.

'What did those leaves show now, oh yes, Sniffer and his dog!' said Dick. 'Well, we're on the right way, though we'd know that anyhow, by the fire!'

They mounted again and went on. It proved quite easy to find and follow the patrins. Only once did they find any difficulty and that was when they came to a place, marked by two trees, where there was no apparent sign in the heather of any caravan marks.

'The heather's so jolly thick here that it's taken the caravans as if it were a feather-bed, springing up when they had gone, and giving no sign of where they had passed,' said Julian. He dismounted and had a good look round. No, there was no sign.

'We'll go on a little way,' he said. 'We may come to a camping place, then we'll know.'

But they came to no old camping place, and stopped at last in bewilderment. 'We've lost the trail,' said Dick. 'We're not such good gypsies after all!'

'Let's go back to those two trees,' said George. 'We can still just see them. If it's so easy to lose the way there, there might be a patrin, although there are no camp-marks. After all, a patrin is left to show the way, in case the ones following take the wrong route.'

So back they rode to the two trees, and there, sure enough, was Sniffer's patrin! Henry found it set carefully between the trees, so that nothing could disturb it.

'Here's the cross, and the single sticks, and the leaves!' she said. 'But look, the long stick of the cross points to the east and we went off to the north. No wonder we found no signs of the caravans!'

They set off to the east this time, across the thick, springy heather, and almost at once found signs of the passing of caravans, twigs broken off the bushes, a wheel rut on a soft piece of ground.

'We're right now,' said Julian, pleased. 'I was beginning to think it was all too easy for words! But it isn't!'

They rode for two hours, and then decided to have tea. They sat down in a little glade of silver birches, with an unexpected copse of pale primroses behind. Timmy had to make up his mind which to choose, a rabbit-chase, or titbits from the children's tea!

He chose both, racing after an imaginary rabbit, and then coming back for a sandwich!

'You know, it's a lot better for us when Mrs. Johnson makes sandwiches of tomato or lettuce or something like that,' said Henry. 'We do get them all then, but when we have meat or sardine or egg sandwiches Timmy gets as much as we do!'

'Well, surely you don't mind that, Henrietta,' said George at once. 'You make Timmy sound very greedy. After all, you don't need to give him any of your sandwiches!'

'Now, Georgina!' murmured Dick, in her ear.

'Sorry, Georgina,' said Henry, with a grin. 'I just can't help giving him a sandwich or two when he comes and sits down and looks at me so longingly.'

'Woof,' said Timmy, and at once sat down in front of Henry, his tongue out, and his eyes fixed unblinkingly on her.

'He sort of hypnotizes me,' complained Henry. 'Make him go away, George. I shan't be able to keep a single sandwich or bit of cake for myself. Go and stare at someone else, Timmy, for goodness' sake!'

Julian looked at his watch. 'I don't think we ought to spend too long over tea,' he said. 'I know we've got summertime now, and the evenings are nice and light, but we haven't reached the gypsy camp yet, and after that we've got to go all the way back. What about starting off again?'

'Right,' said everyone and remounted their horses. They set off through the heather. Soon they found it unexpectedly easy to follow the caravan route, because the soil became sandy, and there were many bare patches on which the marks of the wheels could plainly be seen.

'Goodness, if we go to the east much more, we'll come to the sea!' said Dick.

'No, it's still some miles away,' said Julian. 'Hallo, there's a little hill or something in the distance. First time we've seen anything but complete flatness!'

The wheel-marks led steadily towards the little hill, which, as they came near, seemed to grow considerably bigger. 'I bet the caravans are there,' said George. 'That hill would give a nice bit of shelter from the wind that came from the sea. I believe I can see one!'

George was right. The caravans were there. They showed up well against the hill, in their bright colours.

'They've even got up a washing-line as usual!' said Anne. 'Clothes flapping in the wind!'

'Let's go and ask if Clip is all right,' said Julian. 'It will be a very good excuse for going right up to the camp.'

So they cantered straight up to the little group of five caravans. Four or five men appeared as soon as they heard the sound of hooves. They looked silent and rather forbidding. Sniffer ran out and shouted.

'Hallo! Clip's fine! Quite all right again!'

His father gave him a push and said something sharp to him. He disappeared under the nearest caravan.

Julian rode up to Sniffer's father. 'Did I hear Sniffer say that Clip was quite all right?' he asked.

'Where is he?'

'Over there,' said the man, with a nod of his head. 'No need for you to see him. He's mended fine.'

'All right, all right! I'm not going to take him away from you!' said Julian. 'This is a nice sheltered place you've got, isn't it? How long are you staying?'

'What's that to do with you?' said an old gypsy, unpleasantly.

'Nothing,' said Julian, surprised. 'Just a polite question, that's all!'

'How do you get water?' called George. 'Is there a good spring here?'

There was no reply at all. The four or five men had now been joined by others, and there were three mangy-looking dogs growling round. Timmy was beginning to growl back.

'You'd better go before our dogs get at you,' said Sniffer's father, sourly.

'Where's Liz?' said George, remembering Sniffer's dog, but before she got an answer the three dogs suddenly made an attack on Timmy! They pounced on him and he had hard work to keep them off. He was far bigger than they were, but they were nippy little things.

'Call off those dogs!' yelled Julian, seeing that George was dismounting to go to Timmy's help. She would get bitten. 'Do you hear me? Call off those dogs.'

Sniffer's father whistled. The three dogs reluctantly left Timmy and went over to the men, their tails down. George had reached Tim and had now got her hand on his collar to stop him from chasing the other three dogs.

'Mount your horse, whistle Timmy, and we'll go,' shouted Julian, not at all liking the silent, sour-looking gypsies. George did as she was told. Timmy ran beside her, and they all cantered away from the unpleasant camp.

The men stood watching them in complete silence. 'What's up with them?' said Dick puzzled. 'Anyone would think they were planning another Bartle affair!'

'Don't!' said Anne. 'They're planning something, all alone out here, far away from anywhere! I shan't go near them again.'

'They thought we were prying and spying,' said Dick. 'That's all. Poor old Sniffer. What a life he has!'

'We couldn't even tell him that we found his patirns useful,' said George. 'Oh well, there's probably nothing in it, not even an adventure!'

Was she right or wrong? Julian looked at Dick and Dick looked back, his eyebrows raised. They didn't know. Oh well, time would tell!

Chapter 11
A NICE LITTLE PLAN

The five of them told Captain and Mrs. Johnson about their afternoon's experience, as they were having supper.

'Patrins!' said Mrs. Johnson. 'So Sniffer told you about those? But I really don't think you should visit the gypsy camp. Those particular gypsies are a surly, bad-tempered lot.'

'Did you ever hear the tale of the Big Bartles?' said Henry, getting ready to relate it, and add little bits of her own, here and there!

'No. But it can wait, I'm sure,' said Mrs. Johnson, knowing Henry's habit of leaving her food quite uneaten once she began on some marvellous tale. 'Is it one of your tales? You can tell it after supper.'

'It's not Henry's tale,' said George, annoyed that Henry should get all the limelight again, and take the blacksmith's tale for her own. 'It's one old Ben told us. Ju, you tell it!'

'Nobody is to tell it now,' said Captain Johnson. 'You came in late for supper, we waited for you, and the least you can do is to get on with your eating.'

The five juniors at the other table were disappointed. They had hoped to hear another of Henry's marvellous stories. But Captain Johnson was hungry and tired.

'Old Ben is a great age, as you said,' began Henry, after a few mouthfuls. 'He -'

'Not another word, please, Henrietta,' said the captain, curtly. Henry went red and George grinned, kicking at Dick under the table. Unfortunately she kicked Henry instead, and the girl glared at her for a whole minute.

'Oh dear!' thought Anne. 'Just as we'd had such a lovely day! I suppose we're all tired and scratchy.'

'Why did you kick me?' began Henry in a cross voice, as soon as she and George left the table with the others.

'Shut up, you two,' said Julian. 'She probably meant to kick me or Dick, not you.'

Henry shut up. She didn't like Julian to tick her off. George looked mutinous and went off with Timmy.

Dick yawned. 'What jobs are there to do, if any?' he said. 'Don't say there's washing-up again. I feel I might break a few things.'

Mrs. Johnson heard him and laughed. 'No, there's no washing-up. The woman has come in to do it tonight. Have a look at the horses - and see that Jenny the mare is not with Flash, you know she doesn't like her for some reason, and will kick out at her. She must always be kept in another field.'

'That's all right, Mrs. Johnson,' said William, suddenly appearing, stolid and competent as ever. 'I've seen to that. I've seen to everything, really.'

'You're better than any stable-boy, William,' said Mrs. Johnson, smiling at him. 'I wish you'd take a permanent job here!'

'I wish you meant that,' said William, earnestly. There was nothing he would have liked better! He went off looking pleased.

'I think you'd better all go to bed then, as William appears to have done everything necessary,' said Mrs. Johnson. 'Any plans for tomorrow?'

'Not yet,' said Julian, trying to stop a yawn. 'So if you want anything done, we'll do it.'

'We'll see what tomorrow brings,' said Mrs. Johnson and said good night. The boys said good night to the three girls and went off to the stable.

'Gosh, we've forgotten to undress and wash and everything,' said Julian, half-asleep. 'What's the matter with us at this place? I can't seem to keep my eyes open after half-past eight!'

The next day certainly brought a few things. It brought a letter for Henry that filled her with disgust. It brought two letters for Mrs. Johnson that made her start fussing and worrying. It brought a telegram for Captain Johnson that sent him down to the station at once.

Henrietta's letter was from two of her great-aunts. They announced that as they would be near the stables that day and the following, they would like to fetch her and take her out with them.

'Blow!' said Henrietta, ungratefully. 'Great-Aunts Hannah and Lucy would choose this very week to come along and see me! Just when Julian and Dick are here, and everything is such fun. Can't I phone and say I'm too busy, Mrs. Johnson?'

'Certainly not,' said Mrs. Johnson, shocked. 'That would be very rude, Henry, and you know it. You're having the whole of the Easter holidays here, and yet you think you can't spare two days. As a matter of fact I shall be glad if your aunts do take you off my hands for a couple of days.'

'Why?' asked Henry, astonished. 'Have I been a nuisance?'

'Oh no, but I've had two letters this morning telling me that four children are coming unexpectedly,' said Mrs. Johnson. 'They were not supposed to come till three of the others left this week-end, but there you are! These things happen. Where I am to put them I really don't know!

'Oh dear!' said Anne. 'Do you think Dick and Julian ought to go home, Mrs. Johnson? You didn't plan for them, you know, they just came.'

'Yes. I know,' said Mrs. Johnson. 'But we're more or less used to that, and I do like having bigger boys, I must say, they're such a help. Now let me see. What can we do?'

Captain Johnson came in, looking hurried. 'I've just had a telegram, dear,' he said. 'I've got to go down to the station. Those two new horses have arrived. Two days before I wanted them - what a nuisance!'

'This is one of those days!' said Mrs. Johnson, desperately. 'Good gracious, how many shall we be in the house? And however many horses shall we have? No, I can't count this morning. I'm all muddle-headed!'

Anne felt that it was a pity that she and George and the boys couldn't immediately pack and go home. After all, poor Mrs. Johnson had thought that she and George would have gone home three or four days ago, and instead of that they had stayed on and the boys had arrived as well!

Anne hurried to find Julian. He would know what to do. She found him with Dick, carrying straw for the stables.

'Julian! Listen! I want to talk to you,' said Anne. Julian let the load of straw slip to the ground, and turned to Anne.

'What's up?' he said. 'Don't tell me it's a row between George and Henry again, because I shan't listen!'

'No. Nothing like that,' said Anne. 'It's Mrs. Johnson. She's got four children coming unexpectedly, before the others go. She's in a great state about it, and I wondered what we could do to help. You see, she didn't expect any of us four to be here this week.'

'No. That's true,' said Julian, sitting down on his straw. 'Let's think hard.'

'It's easy!' said Dick. 'We'll simply take our tents, some food, and go and camp out on the moor by some spring. WHAT could be nicer?'

'Oh yes!' said Anne, her eyes shining. 'Oh Dick, that's a marvellous idea! Mrs. Johnson will get rid of us all and Timmy too, then, and we would have a lovely time all by ourselves!'

'Killing quite a lot of birds with one stone!' said Julian. 'We've got a couple of tents in our kit, Anne. Very small ones, but they'll do. And we can borrow rubber sheets to put on the heather, though it's as dry as a bone, as far as I can see!'

'I'll go and tell George!' said Anne, joyfully. 'Let's go today, Julian, and be out of the way before the new children come. Captain Johnson's got two new horses coming too. He'll be very glad to have a few of us out of the way!'

She flew off to tell George. George was busy polishing some harness, a job she liked very much. She listened to Anne's excited tale. Henry was there too, looking gloomy. She looked gloomier still at the end.

'It's too bad,' she said, when Anne had finished. 'I could have come with you if it hadn't been for these great-aunts of mine. WHY did they have to come just at this very moment! Don't you think it's maddening?'

Neither Anne nor George thought it was maddening. They were secretly very pleased indeed to think that they could once more go off entirely on their own, with Timmy, as they had so often done before. But they would have had to ask Henry if her aunts hadn't written at this very lucky moment!

George didn't like to show how delighted she was to think of going off camping on the moor. She and Anne did a little comforting of poor Henry and then went off to make arrangements with Mrs. Johnson.

'Well, that's a very bright idea of Dick's!' she said in delight. 'It solves a whole lot of problems. And I know you don't mind. You're thrilled at the chance, aren't you! It's really very helpful. I only wish poor Henry could go too, but she must go out with her old great-aunts. They adore her!'

'Of course she must,' said George, solemnly. She and Anne exchanged a look. Poor Henry. But really, it would be very nice to be without her for a little while.

Everyone began to be suddenly very busy. Dick and Julian undid their packs to find out exactly what was in them. Mrs. Johnson looked out rubber sheets and old rugs. She was a wonder at producing things like that!

William wanted to go with them and help to carry the things, but nobody wanted his help. They just wanted to be off and away by themselves, just the Five and nobody else! Timmy caught the excitement too and his tail thumped and wagged the whole morning.

'You'll be pretty well loaded,' said Mrs. Johnson, doubtfully. 'It's a good thing that fine weather is forecast, or you'd have to take macs as well. Still, I imagine you won't go very far on the moors, will you? You can easily get back to the stable if you have forgotten anything, or want more food.'

They were ready at last, and went to find Henry to say good-bye. She stared at them mournfully. She had changed into a smart little coat and dress. She looked completely different and very gloomy.

'What part of the moor are you going to?' she asked eagerly. 'Up the railway?'

'Yes. We thought we would,' said Julian. 'Just to see where it goes to. And it's a nice straight way to follow. We can't lose our way if we keep near the railway!'

'Have a good time, Henry,' said George, with a grin. 'Do they call you Henrietta?'

'Yes,' said poor Henry, putting on a pair of gloves. 'Well, good-bye. For goodness' sake don't stay away too long. Thank goodness you're all such a hungry lot. You'll simply have to come back and get more food in a couple of days!'

They grinned and left her, Timmy at their heels. They made their way to the moor, intending to cut out the part of the railway that ran to Milling Green, and join it some way before that.

'Now we're off,' said George, contentedly. 'Without that chatterbox of a Henry.'

'She's really not too bad,' said Dick. 'All the same, it's fine to be on our own, just the Famous Five together!'

Chapter 12

THE LITTLE RAILWAY

It was a very hot day. The five had had their lunch before they started, as Mrs. Johnson said it would be easier to carry that inside than outside!

Even Timmy carried something. George said that he ought to do his share, and had neatly fastened a bag of his pet biscuits on his back.

'There now!' she said. 'You've got your load too. No, don't try and sniff the biscuits all the time, Timmy. You can't walk with your head screwing round like that. You ought to be used to the smell of biscuits by this time!'

They set off to the railway line, or where they hoped it would be. It took a little time to discover it running under the heather. Julian was glad. He didn't want to walk right into Milling Green to find the beginning of it and then walk all the way up again!

Anne found it by tripping over it! 'Oh!' she said, 'here it is! I caught my foot in a bit of rusty line. Look you can hardly see it!'

'Good,' said Julian, and stepped in between the narrow pair of old, rusty lines. In some places they had rusted away, and there were gaps. In other places the heather had grown completely over the lines, and unless the children had known that they must keep straight forward, they would have lost them completely. As it was they sometimes missed them and once had to do quite a bit of scrabbling about in the heather to see if they could feel them.

It was very hot. Their packs began to feel distinctly heavy. Timmy's biscuits began to slide round his body and eventually hung below his tummy. He didn't like that, and George suddenly spied him sitting down trying to prise open the bag with his teeth!

She put down her own pack and adjusted Timmy's. 'If only you didn't keep chasing rabbits, and making your pack swing about, it wouldn't slip,' she said. 'There now, it's all right again, Tim. Walk to heel and it won't slip any more.'

They went on and on up the railway lines. Sometimes the rails took a curve round an unexpected rock. Soon the soil began to look sandy, and the heather did not grow so thickly. It was easier to see the lines, though in some places the sand had sifted over them and hidden them.

'I really must have a rest!' said Anne, sitting down in some heather. 'I feel I want to pant and hang my tongue out like Timmy!'

'I wonder how far these lines go,' said Dick. 'It's so very sandy now underfoot that I feel we must be getting near the quarry!'

They lay back in the heather and felt very sleepy. Julian yawned and sat up.

'This really won't do!' he said. 'If we fall asleep we'll never want to start off with our heavy packs again. Stir yourselves, lazy-bones!'

They all got up again. Timmy's biscuits had slithered round to his tummy once more, and George had to put them right again. Timmy stood quietly, panting, his tongue hanging out. He thought the biscuits were a great nuisance. It would be much easier to eat them!

The sand got deeper and soon there were big sandy patches with no heather or grass at all. The wind blew the sand up in the air, and the five found that they had to shut their eyes against it.

'I say! The lines end here!' said Julian, stopping suddenly. 'Look, they're broken, wrenched out of place, the engine couldn't go any farther.'

'They may appear again a bit farther on,' said Dick, and went to look. But he couldn't find any, and came back to look at the lines again.

'It's funny,' he said. 'We aren't at any quarry yet, are we! I quite thought that the line would run right to the quarry, the trucks would fill up there, and the engine would pull them back to Milling Green. Where is the quarry? Why do the lines stop so suddenly here?'

'Yes. The quarry should be near here, shouldn't it?' said Julian. 'Well, there simply must be more lines somewhere! Ones that go to the quarry. Let's look for the quarry first, though. We ought to see that easily enough!'

But it wasn't really very easy to find because it was behind a great mass of thick tall gorse-bushes. Dick rounded them and stopped. Behind the enormous spread of bushes was a great pit, a sandy pit, quarried and hollowed for its beautiful sand.

'Here it is!' called Dick. 'Come and look! My word, there's been some quarrying here for sand. They must have taken tons and tons out of it!'

The others came to look. It certainly was an enormous pit, deep and wide. They put their packs beside it and leapt down. Their feet sank into the fine sand.

'The sides are pitted with holes,' said Dick. 'I bet hundreds of sand-martins nest here in May!'

'There are even some caves,' said George, in surprise. 'Sand-caves! Well, we can easily shelter here if we have rain. Some of these caves seem to go quite a long way back.'

'Yes. But I'd be a bit afraid of the sand falling in and burying me, if I crawled in,' said Anne. 'It's quite loose, look!' She scraped some down with her hand.

'I've found the lines!' called Julian. 'Here, look. The sand has almost covered them. I trod on a rail and it was so rotten it broke beneath my foot!'

The others went to see, Timmy too. He was quite delighted with this place. The rabbit-holes in it! What fun he was going to have!

'Let's follow these lines,' said Julian. So they kicked away the sand from the rails and followed them slowly out of the quarry and towards the ends of the other broken lines.

About ten yards from these the lines they were following were wrenched apart. Some were flung into nearby heather, and could be seen there, bent and rusty.

The children stared at them. 'I guess the gypsies did that, when the Bartles were here years ago,' said Dick. 'The day they attacked them perhaps. I say look, whatever's that great lump over there, with gorse growing over it?'

They went to see. Timmy saw the lump and couldn't make it out. He growled warningly at it.

Julian took up a broken piece of rail and forced back the gorse bush that had grown over and around the great lump, almost hiding it.

'See what it is?' he said, startled.

They all stared. 'Why, it's the engine! The little 'injin' old Ben the blacksmith told us about!' said Dick. 'It must have run right off the broken lines and over-turned here, and through the years these great gorse-bushes grew up and hid it. Poor old engine!'

Julian forced the gorse back a little more. 'What a funny old-fashioned affair!' he said. 'Look at the funnel, and the fat little boiler. And see, there's the small cab. It can't have had much power, only just enough to puff along with a few trucks!'

'What happened to the trucks?' wondered Anne.

'Well, they would be easy enough to set upright again and put on the rails, and hand-pushed to Milling Green,' said Dick. 'But this engine couldn't be lifted, except by some kind of machinery. Not even a dozen men could lift it and set it on the rails!'

'The gypsies must have set on the Bartles in the mist, having first broken up the lines so that the engine would run off and overturn,' said Julian. 'They may even have used the broken rails to attack them with. Anyway, they won the battle, because not one of the Bartles ever returned.'

'Some of the villagers must have gone to see what became of them and have got the trucks back on the lines and pushed them to Milling Green,' said George, trying to reconstruct the long-ago happenings in her mind. 'But they couldn't do anything about the engine.'

'That's about it,' said Julian. 'My word, what a shock for the Bartles when they saw the gypsies creeping out at them from the mist, like shadows!'

'I hope we don't dream about this tonight,' said Anne.

They went back to the quarry. 'This wouldn't be a bad place to camp in,' said Dick. 'The sand is so dry and so soft. We could make lovely beds for ourselves. We wouldn't need the tents up, either, because the sides of the quarry shelter us beautifully from the wind.'

'Yes. Let's camp here,' said Anne, pleased. 'There are quite a lot of nice holes to store our things in.'

'What about water?' asked George. 'We want to be fairly near it, don't we? Timmy, find some water! Drink, Timmy, drink! Aren't you thirsty! Your tongue looks as if it is, the way you are hanging it out like a flag!'

Timmy put his head on one side as George talked to him. Water? Drink? He knew what both those words meant! He ran off, sniffing the air. George watched him.

He disappeared round a bush and was away for about half a minute. When he came back George gave a pleased shout.

'He's found some water! Look - his mouth is all wet! Timmy, where is it?'

Timmy wagged his tail vigorously, glad that George was pleased with him. He ran round the bush again and the others followed.

He led them to a little green patch and stopped. A spring bubbled up like a small fountain, dancing a little in the sunshine. The water fell from it into a little channel it had made for itself in the sand, ran away for a short distance, and then disappeared underground again.

'Thank you, Tim,' said George. 'Julian, is the water all right to drink here?'

'Well I can see some that is!' said Julian, pointing to the right. 'The Bartles must have put a pipe in that bank, look, and caught another spring there, a much bigger one. It's as clear as can be. That will do fine for us!'

'Good,' said Anne, pleased. 'It's hardly any way from the quarry. It's as cold as ice, too - feel!'

They felt, and then they drank from their palms. How cold and pure! The moor must be full of these little bubbling springs, welling up from underground. That explained the brilliant green patches here and there.

'Now let's sit down and have some tea,' said Anne, unpacking the bag she had carried. 'It's too hot to feel really hungry.'

'Oh no, it isn't,' said Dick. 'Speak for yourself, Anne!'

They sat in the sunny quarry, the sand warm to their legs. 'Far away from everybody!' said Anne, pleased. 'Nobody near us for miles!'

But she wasn't quite right. There was somebody much nearer than she thought!

Chapter 13
A NOISE IN THE NIGHT

It was Timmy who first knew there was somebody not far off. He pricked up his ears and listened. George saw him.

'What is it, Tim?' she said. 'Nobody is coming here, surely?'

Timmy gave a tiny growl, as if he were not quite sure of himself. Then he leapt up, his tail wagging, and tore out of the quarry!

'Where's he gone to?' said George astonished. 'Gosh, here he is, back again!'

So he was, and with him was a funny little hearthrug of a dog - yes, Liz! She was not quite sure of her welcome and crawled up to the children on her tummy, looking more like a hearthrug than ever!

Timmy leapt round her in delight. She might have been his very best friend, he was so delighted! George patted the funny little dog and Julian looked thoughtful.

'I hope this doesn't mean that we are anywhere near the gypsy camp,' he said. 'It's quite likely that the lines might end somewhere near them. I've rather lost my sense of direction.'

'Oh goodness, I do HOPE we're not near their camp!' said Anne, in dismay. 'Those old-time gypsies must have camped pretty near to the Bartles' quarry before they attacked them, so perhaps the present camp is near too.'

'Well, what's it matter if it is?' said Dick. 'Who's afraid of them? I'm not!'

They all sat still, thinking hard, Liz licking Anne's hand. And in the silence they heard an all-too-familiar sound.

Sniff! Sniff!

'Sniffer!' called George. 'Come on out, wherever you are hiding. I can hear you!'

A pair of legs stuck out from a great clump of heather at the edge of the quarry, and then the whole of Sniffer's wiry little body slithered out and down into the sand. He sat there, grinning at them, half-afraid to come any nearer in case they were cross with him.

'What are you doing here?' said Dick. 'Not spying on us, I hope?'

'No,' said Sniffer. 'Our camp isn't very far away. Liz heard you, I think, and ran off. I followed her.'

'Oh blow. We hoped we weren't near anyone else,' said George. 'Does anyone at your camp know we're here.'

'Not yet,' said Sniffer. 'But they'll find out. They always do. I won't tell, though, if you don't want me to.'

Dick tossed him a biscuit. 'Well, keep your mouth shut if you can,' he said. 'We're not interfering with anyone and we don't want anyone interfering with us. See?'

Sniffer nodded. He suddenly put his hand in his pocket and pulled out the red and white hanky that George had given him. It was still clean and beautifully folded.

'Not dirty yet!' he said to George.

'Well, it ought to be,' said George. 'It's for your sniffs. Now don't use your coat-sleeve.'

Sniffer simply could not understand why he should use a beautiful clean hanky when he had a dirty coat-sleeve. He put the hanky carefully back into his pocket.

Liz ran to him and fawned on him. Sniffer fondled the peculiar little creature, and then Timmy went over and played with them both. The four finished their tea, threw Sniffer one last biscuit, and got up to put their things away safely. Now that Sniffer was about, and the gypsy camp near, they didn't feel it was terribly safe to leave anything unguarded or unhidden.

'Scoot off, now, Sniffer,' said Julian. 'And no spying on us, mind! Timmy will know immediately you arrive anywhere near, and come hunting for you. If you want to see us, give a whistle when you get near. No creeping or slipping into the quarry. Understand?'

'Yes,' said Sniffer, standing up. He took the hanky from his pocket again, waved it at George, and disappeared with Liz at his heels.

'I'm just going to see exactly how near to the gypsy camp we are,' Julian said. He walked to the entrance of the quarry and up on to the moor. He looked in the direction that Sniffer had gone. Yes, there was the hill in the shelter of which the gypsies had their caravans. It wasn't more than a quarter of a mile away. Blow! Still, it was far enough for the gypsies not to discover them, unless by chance.

'Or unless Sniffer gives the game away,' thought Julian. 'Well, we'll spend the night here, anyway, and we can move off somewhere else tomorrow if we feel like it.'

They felt rather energetic that evening and played a ball game in the quarry, in which Timmy joined wholeheartedly. But as he always got the ball before anyone else did they had to tie him up in order to get a game themselves. Timmy was very cross. He turned his back on them and sulked.

'He looks like you now, George,' said Dick, grinning, and got the ball bang on the side of his head from an angry George!

Nobody wanted much supper. Julian took a little aluminium jug to the spring and filled it once for everyone. It really was lovely water from that bubbling spring!

'I wonder how Henry's getting on,' said Anne. 'Spoilt to bits by her great-aunts. I expect. Didn't she look odd in proper clothes, gloves and all!'

'Yes, she ought to have been a boy,' said Dick. 'Like you, George,' he added hastily. 'Both of you are real sports, plucky as anything.'

'How do you know Henry's plucky?' said George, scornfully. 'Only by her silly tales! I bet they're all made-up and exaggerated.'

Julian changed the subject. 'Shall we want rugs tonight, do you think?' he said.

'Rather! It may be warm now, and the sand is hot with the sun, but it won't be quite so nice when it's gone down,' said Anne. 'Anyway we can always creep into one of those cosy little caves if we feel chilly. They're as warm as toast. I went into one, so I know.'

They settled down quite early to sleep. The boys took one side of the quarry, the girls the other. Tim, as usual, was on George's feet, much to Anne's discomfort.

'He's on mine too,' she complained to George. 'He's so long, he stretches over my feet as well. Move him, George.'

So George moved him, but as soon as Anne was asleep he stretched out again and lay on both girls' legs. He slept with one ear open.

He heard a scurrying hedgehog. He heard all the rabbits out for a night-time game. He heard the frogs in a far-off pool croaking in the night. His sharp ear even heard the tinkle of the little spring outside the pit.

Nobody moved in the quarry. There was a small moon but it gave very little light. The stars that studded the sky seemed to give more light than the moon.

Timmy's one open ear suddenly pricked itself right up. Then the other ear stood up too. Timmy was still asleep but his ears were both listening very hard!

A low, humming sound came slowly over the night. It came nearer and nearer. Timmy awoke properly and sat up, listening, his eyes wide open now.

The sound was now very loud indeed. Dick awoke and listened. What was that noise? An aeroplane? It must be jolly low! Surely it wasn't about to land on the moor in the dark!

He woke Julian and they both got up and went out of the quarry. 'It's an aeroplane all right,' said Dick, in a low voice. 'What's it doing? It doesn't seem to be going to land. It's gone round in a low circle two or three times.'

'Is it in trouble, do you think?' asked Julian. 'Here it comes again.'

'Look, what's that light over there?' suddenly said Dick, pointing to the east. 'See, that sort of glow. It's not very far from the gypsies' camp.'

'I don't know,' said Julian, puzzled. 'It's not a fire, is it? We can't see any flames and it doesn't seem to flicker like a fire would.'

'I think it may be some sort of guide to that plane,' said Dick. 'It seems to be circling round and about over the glow. Let's watch it.'

They watched it. Yes, it did seem to be circling round the glow, whatever it was, and then, quite suddenly it rose in the air, circled round once more and made off to the east.

'There it goes,' said Dick, straining his eyes. 'I can't tell what kind it is, except that it's very small.'

'What can it have been doing?' said Julian, puzzled. 'I thought the glow might have been to guide it in landing, though where it could land here in safety I simply don't know. But it didn't land at all, it just circled and made off.'

'Where would it have come from?' said Dick. 'From the coast, I suppose, from over the sea, do you think?'

'I simply don't know,' said Julian. 'It beats me! And why should the gypsies have anything to do with it? Gypsies and planes don't seem to mix, somehow.'

'Well, we don't know that they do have anything to do with the plane, except that we saw that glow,' said Dick. 'And that's going now, look.'

Even as they watched, the bright glow died completely away. Now the moor lay in darkness again.

'Funny,' said Julian, scratching his head. 'I can't make it out. It's true that the gypsies may be up to something, the way they come out here secretly, apparently for no purpose at all, and also they don't want us snooping round, that's clear.'

'I think we'd better try and find out what that glow is,' said Dick. 'We could have a bit of a snoop tomorrow. Or perhaps Sniffer could tell us.'

'He might,' said Julian. 'We'll try him. Come on, let's get back into the quarry. It's cold out here!' The quarry struck quite warm to them as they went down into it. The girls were sound asleep still. Timmy, who had been with them, did not wake them. He had been as puzzled as Julian and Dick over the low-flying plane, but he had not barked at all. Julian had been glad about that. Timmy's bark might have carried right over to the gypsy camp and warned it that someone was camping near.

They got back under their rug, keeping close to one another for warmth. But they soon lost their shivers, and Dick threw off his share of the rug. In a few minutes they were asleep.

Timmy awoke first and stretched himself out in the warm morning sunshine. Anne sat up with a little scream. 'Oh Timmy, don't! You nearly squashed me to bits. Do that to George if you must stretch yourself all over somebody!'

The boys awoke then, and went to the spring to splash their faces and bring back a jugful of water to drink. Anne got the breakfast, and over it the boys told the girls of the aeroplane in the night.

'How queer!' said Anne. 'And that glow too. It must have been a guide of some sort to the plane. Let's go and see where it was. It must have been a fire of some kind!'

'Right,' said Dick. 'I vote we go this morning, but we'll take Tim with us in case we meet those gypsies!'

Chapter 14

THE GYPSIES ARE NOT PLEASED

Julian and Dick went to stand where they had stood the night before, trying to see exactly in what direction the glow had been.

'I think it was beyond the gypsies' camp, to the left,' said Julian. 'What do you think, Dick?'

'Yes. That's about it,' said Dick. 'Shall we go now?' He raised his voice. 'We're going, George and Anne. Are you coming? We can leave our stuff here, tucked away in the caves because we shan't be very long.'

George called back. 'Julian, I think Timmy's got a thorn in his foot or something. He's limping. Anne and I think we'll stay here with him and try to get it out. You go, but for goodness' sake don't get into trouble with the gypsies!'

'We shan't,' said Julian. 'We've as much right on this moor as they have and they know it. All right, we'll leave you two here then with Timmy. Sure you don't want any help with his paw?'

'Oh no,' said George. 'I can manage, thank you.'

The two boys went off, leaving Anne and George fussing over Timmy's paw. He had leapt into a gorse bush after a rabbit and a thorn had gone right into his left fore-paw. Then it had broken off, leaving the point in poor Timmy's pad. No wonder he limped! George was going to have quite a time trying to ease out the bit of thorn.

Julian and Dick set off over the moor. It was a day like summer, far too warm for April. There was not a single cloud to be seen in the sky, which was as blue as forget-me-nots. The boys felt too hot in their pullovers and longed to take them off. But that would mean carrying them, which would be an awful nuisance.

The gypsy camp was not really far away. They soon came near to the curious hill that stood up from the flatness of the moor. The caravans still stood in its shelter, and the boys saw that a little group of men were sitting together, talking earnestly.

'I bet they're having a jaw about that aeroplane last night,' said Dick. 'And I bet it was they who set that light or fire, or whatever it was, to guide it. I wonder why it didn't land.'

They kept in the shelter of big gorse bushes, as they skirted the camp. They were not particularly anxious to be seen. The dogs, sitting round the group of men, apparently did not see or hear them, which was lucky.

The boys made their way towards the place where they thought they had seen the glow, some way to the left of the camp, and beyond it.

'Doesn't seem to be anything out of the ordinary anywhere,' said Julian, stopping and looking round. 'I was expecting to see a big burnt patch, or something.'

'Wait - what's in that dip over there?' said Dick, pointing to where the ground seemed to dip downwards. 'It looks like another old quarry, rather like the one we're camping in, but smaller, much smaller. I bet that's where the fire was!'

They made their way to the quarry. It was much more overgrown than theirs was, and was evidently one that had been worked at an earlier time. It dipped down to quite a pit in the middle and set there was something unusual. What was it?

The boys scrambled down into the pit-like quarry and made their way to the middle. They stared at the big thing that was set there, pointing to the sky.

'It's a lamp, a powerful lamp of some kind,' said Dick. 'Like those we see making a flare-path at an aerodrome, guiding planes in to land. Fancy seeing one here!'

'How did the gypsies get it?' wondered Dick, puzzled. 'And why signal to a plane that doesn't land? It looked as if it wanted to, circling round low like that.'

'May be the gypsies signalled that it wasn't safe to land for some reason,' said Julian. 'Or perhaps they were going to give something to the pilot and it wasn't ready.'

'Well, it's a puzzle,' said Dick. 'I can't imagine what's going on. Something is, that's certain. Let's snoop round a bit.'

They found nothing else, except a trail that led to the lamp and back. Just as they were examining it, a shout came to their ears. They swung round - and saw the figure of a gypsy at the edge of the pit.

'What are you doing here?' he shouted, in a harsh voice. He was joined by a few others, and they all looked threateningly at Julian and Dick as they climbed out of the pit.

Julian decided to be honest. 'We're camping out on the moor for a night or two,' he said, 'and we heard a plane last night, circling low. We also saw a glow that appeared to be guiding it, and we came along to see what it was. Did you hear the plane?'

'Mebbe we did and mebbe we didn't,' said the nearest gypsy, who was Sniffer's father. 'What of it? Planes fly over this moor any day!'

'We found that powerful lamp,' said Dick, pointing back at it. 'Do you know anything about that?'

'Nothing,' said the gypsy scowling. 'What lamp?'

'Well, as far as I can see there's no charge for looking at it,' said Julian. 'Go and have a squint, if you don't know anything about it! But I can't believe that you didn't see the light it gave last night! It's a jolly good place to hide it, I must say.'

'We don't know anything about any lamp,' said another gypsy, the old one with grey hair. 'This is our usual camping-place. We don't interfere with anything or anybody - unless they interfere with us. Then we make them sorry for it.'

The boys at once thought of the long-ago mystery of the disappearance of the Bartles. They felt quite uncomfortable.

'Well, we're going now, so don't worry,' said Julian. 'We're only camping for a night or two, as I said. We won't come near here again, if you object to us.'

He saw Sniffer creeping up behind the men, with Liz, who for some reason of her own, was walking sedately on her hind-legs. Sniffer pulled at his father's arm.

'They're all right,' he said. 'You know our Clip got his leg made better at the stables. They're all right!'

All he got was a savage cuff that sent him to the ground, where he rolled over and over. Liz dropped down on all fours and went to lick him.

'Here, I say!' said Julian, shocked. 'Leave that kid alone! You've no right to hit him like that!'

Sniffer set up such a yelling that some of the women left the caravans not far off and came running to see what was up. One of them began to shout at Sniffer's father and he shouted back. Soon there was quite a row going on between the men and the angry women, one of whom had picked up poor Sniffer and was dabbing his head with a wet cloth.

'Come on, it's a good time to go,' said Julian to Dick. 'What an unfriendly lot they are, except poor Sniffer, and he was doing his best for us, poor kid.'

The two boys went off quickly, glad to be away from the men and their dogs. They were puzzled about everything. The men said they knew nothing about the lamp, but they must know something about it. Nobody but a gypsy could have lighted it last night.

They went back to the girls and told them what had happened. 'Let's get back to the stables,' said Anne. 'There's something queer going on. We'll be in the middle of an adventure before we know where we are!'

'We'll stay one more night,' said Julian. 'I want to see if that plane comes again. Those gypsies don't know where we're camping and though Sniffer knows, I'm pretty sure he won't tell. It was plucky of him to try and stick up for us to his father.'

'All right. We'll stay,' said George. 'I'm not particularly anxious for Timmy to have that long walk home today. I think I've got most of that thorn out of his pad, but he still won't put his foot to the ground.'

'He's jolly clever at running about on three legs,' said Dick, watching Timmy tearing round the quarry, sniffing as usual for rabbits.

'The amount of quarrying that Timmy has done in this pit already is colossal!' said Julian, staring round at the places where Timmy had tried to get in at some rabbit-hole and scabbled out big heaps of sand. 'He would have been a great help to the Bartles when they dug out sand! Poor old Tim - your bad foot has stopped you scraping for rabbits, hasn't it!'

Timmy ran over on three legs. He enjoyed all the fussing he got when anything happened to him. He meant to make the most of his bad foot!

They had a very lazy day indeed. It really was too hot to do anything much. They went to the little spring and sat with their feet in the rivulet it made - it was deliciously cool! They went and had a look at the old engine again, lying on its side, half-buried.

Dick scraped away a lot of the sand that had seeped into the cab. Soon they were all helping. They uncovered the old handles and levers and tried to move them. But they couldn't of course.

'Let's go round to the other side of the gorse bush and see if we can see the funnel again,' said Dick, at last. 'Blow these thorns. I'm getting pricked all over. Timmy's very sensible, sitting there, not attempting to examine this old Puffing Billy!'

They had to cut away some of the gorse before they could examine the funnel properly. Then they exclaimed in wonder.

'Look! It's very like the long funnel that Puffing Billy had, you know, one of the first engines ever made!'

'It's filled with sand,' said Dick, and tried to scrape it out. It was fairly loose, and soon he was able to peer down the funnel quite a long way.

'Funny to think of smoke puffing out of this queer old funnel,' said Dick. 'Poor old engine, lying here for years, quite forgotten. I'd have thought someone would rescue it!'

'Well, you know what the blacksmith told us,' said George. 'The Bartle sister that was left wouldn't have anything more to do with the railway or the engine or the quarry. And certainly nobody could move this great thing on their own.'

'I shouldn't be surprised if we're the only people in the world who know where the old engine is,' said Anne. 'It's so overgrown that nobody could see it except by accident!'

'I feel jolly hungry, all of a sudden,' said Dick, stopping his work of getting sand off the engine.

'What about something to eat?'

'We've got enough to last for a day or two more,' said Anne. 'Then we'll have to get something else - or go back to the stables.'

'I must spend one more night here,' said Julian. 'I want to see if that plane returns again.'

'Right. We'll all watch this time,' said George. 'It will be fun. Come on, let's go and get something to eat. Don't you think that's a good idea, Timmy?'

Timmy certainly did. He limped off at top speed on three legs, though really his right fore-paw no longer hurt him. Timmy, you're a fraud!

Chapter 15

A STARTLING NIGHT

No gypsies came near them that day, not even Sniffer. The evening was as lovely as the day had been, and almost as warm.

'It's extraordinary!' said Dick, looking up into the sky. 'What weather for April! The bluebells will be rushing out soon if the sun goes on being as hot as this!'

They lay on the sand in the quarry and watched the evening star shine in the sky. It looked very big and bright and round.

Timmy scabbled round in the sand. 'His paw is much better,' said George. 'Though I notice that he still sometimes holds it up.'

'Only when he wants you to say 'Poor Timmy, does it hurt!' ' said Dick. 'He's a baby, likes to be fussed!'

They talked for a while and then Anne yawned. 'It's early, I know - but I believe I'm going to sleep.'

There was soon a trek to the spring, and everyone sluiced themselves in the cool water. There was only one towel between them, but that did very well. Then they settled down in their sandy beds. The sand was beautifully warm and they did not bother about putting down the rubber sheets. There could not possibly be any dampness in that quarry after it had been baked so much by the hot sun!

'I hope we wake when that plane comes, if it does come,' said Julian to Dick, as they lay without any covering in their soft, sandy bed. 'My goodness, isn't it hot! No wonder Timmy's panting over there!'

They went to sleep at last, but Dick awoke suddenly, feeling much too hot. Phew! What a night! He lay looking up at the brilliant stars, and then shut his eyes again. But it was no use, he couldn't go to sleep.

He sat up cautiously, so as not to awake Julian. I think I'll just go and have a squint to see if that big lamp is lighted again, down in that pit by the gypsy camp, he thought.

He went to the edge of the quarry and climbed up. He looked towards the gypsy camp and gave a sudden exclamation. Yes! he thought. It's glowing again! I can't see the lamp, of course, but its light is so jolly powerful that I can easily see the glow it makes. It must be very bright, looked down on from the sky. I wonder if the plane is due to come now that the lamp is lighted.

He listened, and yes, he could distinctly hear a low humming noise from the east. It must be the plane coming again? Would it land this time, and if so, who was in it?

He ran to wake Julian and the girls. Timmy was alert at once, wagging his tail excitedly. He was always ready for anything, even in the middle of the night! Anne and George got up too, very thrilled.

'Is the lamp really alight again? And I can hear the plane too now! Oh, I say! This is exciting! George, Timmy won't bark and give us away, will he?'

'No. I've told him to be quiet,' said George. 'He won't make a sound. Listen, the plane is coming nearer!'

The noise was now loud enough for them to search the starry sky for the plane. Julian gave Dick a nudge. 'Look, you can just see it, straight over where the gypsy camp is!'

Dick managed to pick it out. 'It's very small,' he said. 'Smaller even than I thought it was last night. Look, it's coming down!'

But it wasn't. It merely swept low, and then went round in a circle, as it had done the night before. It rose a little again and then came in low once more, almost over the boys' heads.

Then something extraordinary happened. Something fell not far from Julian, something that bounced and then came to rest! It made a thud as it fell, and all four jumped. Timmy gave a startled whine.

Thud! Something else fell. Thud, thud, thud! Anne gave a squeal. 'Are they trying to bomb us or something. Julian, what are they doing?'

Thud! Thud! Julian ducked at the last two thuds, they sounded so near. He took hold of Anne and pulled her down into the quarry, calling to Dick and George.

'Get down here, quickly! Force yourselves into the caves somewhere! We shall get hit!'

They ran across the quarry as the plane swooped round in a circle once more and then again began dropping the things that went 'thud! thud!'. Some even fell into the quarry this time. Timmy got the shock of his life when one bounced in front of his nose and rolled away. He yelped and tore after George.

Soon they were all safely squeezed into the little caves that lined the sides of the quarry. The plane swept round once more, up and then round, and the thud-thudding began again. The four could hear that some of the thuds were actually in the quarry again and they were thankful they were well sheltered.

'Well, nothing is exploding,' said Dick, thankfully. 'But what on earth is the plane dropping? And why? This is a most peculiar adventure to have.'

'It's probably a dream,' said Julian, and laughed. 'No, not even a dream could be so mad. Here we are, snuggling into sandy caves in a quarry on Mystery Moor, while a plane drops something all round us in the middle of the night! Quite mad.'

'I believe the plane's going away now,' said Dick. 'It's circled round but hasn't dropped anything. Now it's climbing, it's going away! The engine doesn't sound nearly so loud. Goodness, when we were standing out there at the edge of the quarry, I almost thought the plane would take my head off; it was so low!'

'I thought that too,' said Anne, very glad that there was to be no more swooping down and dropping dozens of unknown things. 'Is it safe to go out?'

'Oh yes,' said Julian, scrambling out of the sand. 'Come on. We shall easily hear if the plane comes back again. I want to see what it has dropped!'

In great excitement they ran to get the parcels. The stars gave so much light on that clear night that the four did not even need a torch.

Julian picked up something first. It was a firm, flattish parcel, done up well, sewn into a canvas covering. He examined it.

'No name. Nothing,' he said. 'This is most exciting. Let's have three guesses what's inside.'

'Bacon for breakfast, I hope!' said Anne at once.

'Idiot,' said Julian, getting out a knife to slit the string threads that sewed up the canvas. 'I guess it's smuggled goods of some sort. That's what that plane was doing, I should think, flying over from France, and dropping smuggled goods in a pre-arranged place, and I suppose the gypsies pick them up, and take them away, well hidden in their caravans, to deliver them somewhere. Very clever!

'Oh Julian, is that the explanation?' said Anne. 'What would be in the parcels then, cigarettes?'

'No,' said Julian. 'The parcels wouldn't be so heavy if they only contained cigarettes. There, I've slit the threads at last!'

The others crowded round to see. George took her torch out of her pocket so that they could see really well. She flashed it on.

Julian ripped off the canvas covering. Next came some strong brown paper. He ripped that off too.

Then came strong cardboard, tied round with string. That was undone as well, and the cardboard fell to the ground.

'Now, what have we got?' said Julian, excited. 'Thin sheets of paper, dozens and dozens of them packed together. Shine your torch nearer, George.'

There was a silence as all the four craned over Julian's hands.

'Whew! I say! Gosh, do you see what they are?' said Julian, in awe. 'American money, dollar notes. But look what they are, one hundred-dollar notes! And my word there are scores and scores of them in this one packet.'

The four stared in amazement as Julian riffled through the packet of notes. However much would they be worth?

'Julian, how much is a hundred-dollar note worth in our money?' asked George.

'About forty pounds I think,' said Julian. 'Yes, just about that. Gosh, and there are scores in this one packet, and we know they dropped dozens of the packets too. Whatever is it all about?'

'Well, there must be thousands and thousands of dollars lying around us, here in the quarry and outside it,' said George. 'I say! Surely this isn't a dream?'

'Well, I must say it's a very extravagant kind of dream, if so,' said Dick. 'A dream worth thousands of pounds isn't very usual. Ju, hadn't we better get busy picking up these parcels?'

'Yes. We certainly had,' said Julian. 'I'm beginning to see it all now. The smugglers come over in a plane from France, say, having previously arranged to drop these packets in a lonely spot on this moor. The gypsies are in the plot to the extent that they light the guiding lamp and pick up the parcels.'

'I see, and then they quietly pack them into their caravans, slip off the moor, and deliver them to somebody else, who pays them well for their trouble,' said Dick. 'Very smart!'

'That's about it,' said Julian. 'But I can't for the life of me see why dollar notes have to be smuggled here. They can be brought freely enough into the country - why smuggle them?'

'Stolen ones, perhaps?' said George. 'Oh well, its quite beyond me. What a thing to do! No wonder the gypsies didn't want us around.'

'Better buck up and collect all these parcels and clear off back to the stables with them,' said Julian, picking up one near him. 'The gypsies will be after them, there's no doubt about that! We must be gone before they come.'

The four of them went about looking for the parcels. They found about sixty of them, and they made quite a heavy load.

'We'll put them somewhere safe, I think,' said Julian. 'What about stuffing them into one of the sand-caves? I don't very well see how we can carry them like this.'

'We could put them in the rugs and tie up the ends and carry them like that,' said George. 'It would be mad to leave them hidden somewhere in this quarry. It's the first place the gypsies would search.'

'All right. We'll follow your idea,' said Julian. 'I think we've about collected all the packets there are. Get the rugs.'

George's idea proved to be a good one, Half the parcels were rolled into one rug, and tied up, and half into the other.

'Good thing the rugs are nice and big,' said Dick tying his up strongly. 'Now I can just about manage mine nicely on my back. You all right, Ju?'

'Yes, come along, you girls,' said Julian. 'Follow behind us. We'll go down the railway line. Leave everything else here. We can easily get it another time. We must leave before the gypsies come.'

Timmy began to bark suddenly. 'That must mean the gypsies are coming,' said Dick. 'Come on, quick! Yes I can hear their voices - for goodness' sake, HURRY!'

Chapter 16
THE TERRIBLE MIST

Yes, the gypsies were certainly coming! Their dogs were with them, barking. The four children hurried out of the quarry with Timmy at their heels, quite silent.

'Those fellows may not know we were camping in the quarry,' panted Dick. 'They may just be coming to find the parcels, and while they are hunting around, we may be able to get a good start. Buck up!'

They set off to where the lines ended, near where the old engine lay half-buried. The gypsy dogs heard them and set up a yelping and howling. The gypsies stopped to see what had excited them. They spied shadows moving in the distance, the four children slipping away from the quarry. One of the men shouted loudly.

'Hey you - stop! Who are you? Stop, I say!'

But the five didn't stop. They were now stumbling between the railway lines, glad of George's torch, and Anne's. The boys could not have held one for it was all they could do to hang on to the heavy-laden rugs.

'Quick, oh quick!' whispered Anne, but it was impossible to go very quickly.

'They must be catching us up,' said Julian, suddenly. 'Look round and see, George.'

George looked round. 'No, I can't see anyone,' she said. 'Julian, everywhere looks peculiar. What's happening? Julian, stop. Something queer is happening!'

Julian stopped and looked round. His eyes had been fixed on his feet, trying to see where he was going without stumbling. Anne had shone her torch down for him but it was still difficult to get along properly. Julian gazed all round, wondering what George meant.

Then he gave a gasp. 'Gosh! How queer! There's a mist come up, look. It's even blotted out the stars. No wonder it seems so jolly dark all of a sudden.'

'A mist!' said Anne, scared. 'Not that awful mist that sometimes covers the moor! Oh Julian, is it?'

Julian and Dick watched the swirling mist in astonishment. 'It's come from the sea,' Julian said. 'Can't you smell the salt in it? It's come just as suddenly as we've been told it comes, and look, it's getting thicker every minute!'

'What a good thing we're on the railway lines!' said George. 'What shall we do? Go on?'

Julian stood and thought. 'The gypsies won't come after us in this mist,' he said. 'I've a good mind to hide this money somewhere, and then walk back to get the police. If we keep on the lines we can't go wrong. But we must be sure not to leave them, or we'll be completely lost!'

'Yes, let's do that,' said Dick, who was heartily sick already of lugging along his heavy load. 'But where do you propose to hide them, Ju? Not in the quarry! We'd have to walk through this awful mist to do that, and we'd get lost at once.'

'No. I've thought of a fine place,' said Julian, and he lowered his voice. 'Remember that old engine, fallen on its side? Well, what about stuffing these packets all the way down that great long funnel, and then stopping the top of it up with sand? I bet you anything you like that nobody would find the packets there.'

'Grand idea!' said Dick. 'The gypsies will be sure we've gone off carrying the money, and they'll not hunt about for it long, once they find the dropped packets are all gone. We'll be half-way home by the time they try to catch us, if they dare to brave this mist.'

Anne and George thought Julian's idea was first-rate, a stroke of genius. 'I'd never, never have thought of the engine funnel!' said Anne.

'Now, there's no need for you two girls and Timmy to walk all the way to the engine with us,' said Julian. 'You sit down here on the lines, and wait for us to come back. We shan't be long. We'll walk straight up the railway, find the engine, pack the money into the funnel, and walk back.'

'Right,' said George, squatting down. 'Bring the rugs back with you, though. It's cold now!'

Julian and Dick went off together, with Anne's torch. George kept hers. Timmy pressed close against her, astonished at the thick mist that had so suddenly swirled up and around them.

'That's right. Keep close to us and keep us warm, Tim,' said George. 'It's jolly cold now. This mist is damp!'

Julian stumbled along, keeping a look-out for the gypsies. He could see nothing of them, but then, if they had been only two feet away he could not have seen anything of them in the mist! It seemed to get thicker and thicker.

I know what old Ben meant now, when he said that it had damp fingers, thought Julian, feeling little touches like fingers on his face, hands and legs as the mist wreathed itself round him.

Dick nudged him. 'Here we are,' he said. 'The lines are broken here. The engine should be just over there, a yard or two away.'

They stepped cautiously away from the lines. The big gorse-bush could not be seen, but it could be felt! Julian felt thorns pricking his legs, and knew he was beside it.

'Shine your torch here, Dick,' he whispered. 'That's right. There's the cab of the engine, see? Now let's circle the bush, and we'll come to the funnel.'

'Here it is,' said Dick, in a few moments. 'Look! Now then, let's do a bit of work, shoving these packets down. Gosh, what a lot of them there are! I hope the funnel will take them all.'

They spent ten minutes ramming the packets into the wide funnel. Down they went to the bottom! More and more followed and then, at last, the final one was shoved in and rammed down.

'That's the lot,' said Dick, relieved. 'Now we'll pack some sand in. Gosh, isn't this bush full of prickles! It's really spiteful!'

'The packets almost fill the funnel,' said Julian. 'Hardly any room for sand. Still, we can put in enough to hide the money all right. There that's done. Now pull this gorse-branch over the top of the funnel. My word, I never knew a bush so set with spines! I'm scratched to bits!'

'Can you hear anything of the gypsies?' asked Dick, in a low voice, as they prepared to go back to the lines.

They listened. 'Not a thing,' said Julian. 'It's my belief they're scared of this mist, and are lying low till it clears.'

'They may be in the quarry,' said Dick. 'Waiting there in safety. Well, long may they be there! They won't get the money now!'

'Come on,' said Julian, and walked round the bush. 'It's just about here that we step out to get to the lines. Take my arm. We mustn't get separated. Did you ever see such a mist in your life? It's the thickest fog I ever knew. We can't even see our feet in the light of the torch now.'

They took a few steps and then felt about for the rails. They couldn't feel even one. 'A bit farther, I think,' said Julian. 'No, this way.'

But they still couldn't find the railway lines. Where were the wretched things? A small feeling of panic came into Julian's mind. Which way should they step now, to find the rails? How had they gone wrong?

Now both boys were on hands and knees, feeling for the broken rails. 'I've got one,' said Dick.

'No, blow, it isn't. It's a bit of wood, or something. For goodness' sake, keep close to me, Ju.'

After ten minutes' search, the two boys sat back on their heels, the little torch between them.

'Somehow we've just missed those two or three correct steps from the gorse-bush to the rails,' said Julian. 'Now we're done! I don't see anything for it but to wait till the mist clears.'

'But what about the two girls?' said Dick, anxiously. 'Let's try a bit longer. Look, the mist is clearing a little there. Let's go forward and hope we'll stumble over the lines soon. If the mist does clear, we shall soon be able to get our bearings.'

So they went forward hopefully, seeing the mist clear a little in front of them, so that the torch made a longer beam for them to see by. Now and again, when their feet knocked against something hard, they felt for the rails. But they could not find even one!

'Let's shout,' said Julian, at last. So they shouted loudly. 'George! Anne! Can you hear us?' They stood and listened. No answer.

'GEORGE!' yelled Dick. 'TIMMY!'

They thought they heard a far-off bark. 'That was Timmy!' said Julian. 'Over there!'

They stumbled along and then shouted again. But this time there was no bark at all. Not a sound came out of that dreadful mist, which had now closed tightly round them again.

'We'll be walking in it all night long,' said Julian, desperately. 'Why did we leave the girls? Suppose this frightful fog doesn't clear by tomorrow? Sometimes it lasts for days.'

'What a horrible idea,' said Dick, lightly, sounding much more cheerful than he felt. 'I don't think we need worry about the girls, Ju. Timmy's with them and he can easily take them back to the stables across the moor, in the mist. Dogs don't mind fogs.'

Julian felt most relieved. He hadn't thought of that. 'Oh yes, I'd forgotten old Tim,' he said. 'Well, seeing that the girls will probably be all right with Timmy to guide them, let's sit down somewhere and have a rest. I'm tired out!'

'Here's a good thick bush,' said Dick. 'Let's get into the middle of it if we can, and keep the damp out of us. Thank goodness it's not a gorse-bush!'

'I wish I knew if the girls had had the sense not to wait for us any longer, but to try to find their way back down the lines,' said Julian. 'I wonder where they are now?'

Anne and George were no longer where Julian and Dick had left them! They had waited and waited, and then had become very anxious indeed.

'Something's happened,' said George. 'I think we ought to go and get help, Anne. We can easily follow the railway down to where we have to break off for the stable. Timmy will know, anyway. Don't you think we ought to go back and get help?'

'Yes, I do,' said Anne, getting up. 'Come on George. Gosh, this mist is worse than ever! We'll have to be careful we don't lose the lines! Even Timmy might find it hard to smell his way in this fog!'

They got up. Anne followed George and Timmy followed behind, looking puzzled. He couldn't understand this night-time wandering about at all!

Anne and George kept closely to the railway lines, walking slowly along, shining the light of the torch downwards, and following carefully.

After a time George stopped, puzzled. 'This line's broken here,' she said. 'There's no more of it. That's funny, I don't remember it being as badly broken as this. The lines simply stop. I can't see any more.'

'Oh George!' said Anne, peering down. 'Do you know what we've done. We've come all the way up the lines again - instead of going down them, homewards! How could we have been so mad? Look, this is where they break off; so the old engine must be somewhere near, and the quarry!'

'Blow!' said George, quite in despair. 'What asses we are. It shows how we can lose our sense of direction in a mist like this.'

'I can't see or hear anything of the boys,' said Anne, fearfully. 'George, let's go to the quarry and wait there till daylight comes. I'm cold and tired. We can squeeze into one of those warm sand-caves.'

'All right,' said George, very much down in the dumps. 'Come along, and for goodness' sake don't let's lose our way to the quarry!'

Chapter 17

PRISONERS TOGETHER

The two girls and Timmy made their way carefully, hoping to come across the lines that led to the quarry. They were lucky. They went across the gap in the lines where once long ago the gypsies had wrenched out the rails, and came to where they began again, and led to the edge of the quarry.

'Here they are!' said George, thankfully. 'Now we're all right. We've only just got to follow these and we'll be in the quarry. I hope it will be warmer than here. Brrrr! This mist is terribly cold and clammy.'

'It came up so suddenly,' said Anne, shining her torch downwards. 'I couldn't believe my eyes when I looked round and saw it creeping up on us. I...'

She stopped suddenly. Timmy had given a low growl. 'What's up, Tim?' whispered George. He stood quite still, his hackles up and his tail motionless. He looked steadfastly into the mist.

'Oh dear. What can be the matter now?' whispered Anne. 'I can't hear a thing, can you?'

They listened. No, there was nothing to hear at all. They went on into the quarry, thinking that Timmy might have heard a rabbit or hedgehog, and growled at it as he sometimes did.

Timmy heard a sound and ran to the side, lost in the mist at once. He suddenly yelped loudly, then there was a heavy thud, and no more sound from Timmy!

'Timmy! What's happened! Timmy, come here!' shouted George, at the top of her voice. But no Timmy came. The girls heard the sound of something heavy being dragged away, and George ran after the sound.

'Timmy! Oh Timmy, what's happened!' she cried. 'Where are you? Are you hurt?'

The mist swirled round, and she tried to beat against it with her fists, angry that she could not see. 'Tim! Tim!'

Then a pair of hands took her arms from behind and a voice said, 'Now you come with me! You were warned not to snoop about on the moor!'

George struggled violently, less concerned for herself than for Timmy.

'Where's my dog?' she cried. 'What have you done to him?'

'I knocked him on the head,' said the voice, which sounded very like Sniffer's father. 'He's all right, but he won't feel himself for a bit! You can have him back if you're sensible.'

George wasn't sensible. She kicked and fought and wriggled and struggled. It was no use. She was held in a grip like iron. She heard Anne scream once and knew that she had been caught too.

When George was too tired to struggle any more, she was led firmly out of the quarry with Anne.

'Where's my dog?' she sobbed. 'What have you done with him?'

'He's all right,' said the man behind her. 'But if you make any more fuss I'll give him another blow on the head. NOW will you be quiet.'

George was quiet at once. She was taken with Anne across the moor for what seemed like miles, but was really only the fairly short distance between the quarry and the gypsies' camp.

'Are you bringing my dog?' asked George, unable to contain her fears about Timmy.

'Yes. Somebody's got him,' said her captor. 'You shall have him back safe and sound, if you do what you're told!'

George had to be content with that. What a night! The boys gone, Timmy hurt, she and Anne captured, and this horrible, wreathing mist all the time!

The mist cleared a little as they came near to the gypsy camp. The hill behind seemed to keep it off. George and Anne saw the light of a fire, and of a few lanterns here and there. More men were gathered together, waiting. Anne thought she could see Sniffer and Liz in the background but she couldn't be sure.

'If only I could get hold of Sniffer,' she thought. 'He would soon find out if Timmy is really hurt. Oh Sniffer, do come nearer if it's you!'

Their captors took them to the little fire, and made both girls sit down. One of the men there exclaimed in surprise.

'But these are not those two boys! This is a boy and a girl, not as tall as the others were!'

'We're two girls,' said Anne, thinking that the men might treat George less roughly if they knew she was not a boy. 'I'm a girl and so is she.'

She got a scowl from George, but took no notice. This was not the time to pretend anything. These men were ruthless, and very angry. They thought their plans had gone wrong, all because of two boys. Perhaps when they found they had got two girls, they would let them go.

The men began to question them. 'Where are the boys then?'

'We've no idea! Lost in the mist,' said Anne. 'We all went out to go back home, and got separated, so George, I mean Georgina, and I went back to the quarry.'

'Did you hear the plane?'

'Of course!'

'Did you see or hear it dropping anything?'

'We didn't see anything drop, we heard it,' said Anne. George stared at her furiously. Why was Anne giving all this away? Perhaps she thought that Timmy would be given back to them if they proved helpful? George immediately changed her mind about feeling cross with Anne. If only Timmy were all right!

'Did you pick up what the plane dropped?' The man rapped out the question so sharply that Anne humped. What should she say?

'Oh yes,' she heard herself saying. 'We picked up a few queer parcels. What was in them, do you know?'

'Never you mind,' said the man. 'What did you do with the parcels?'

George stared at Anne, wondering what she was going to say. Surely, surely she wouldn't give that secret away?

'I didn't do anything with them,' said Anne, in an innocent voice. 'The boys said they would hide them. So they went off into the mist with them, but they didn't come back. So George and I went to the quarry again. That's when you caught us.'

The men talked among themselves in low voices. Then Sniffer's father turned to the girls again.

'Where did the boys hide these packets?'

'How do I know?' said Anne. 'I didn't go with them. I didn't see what they did with them.'

'Do you think they will still have got them with them?' asked the man.

'Why don't you go and find the boys and ask them?' said Anne. 'I haven't seen or heard of the boys since they left us and went into the mist. I don't know what became of them or the parcels!'

'They're probably lost somewhere on the moors,' said the old, grey-haired gypsy. 'With the packets! We'll look for the boys tomorrow. They won't get home in this! We'll fetch them back here.'

'They wouldn't come,' said George. 'As soon as they saw you, they'd run. You'd never catch them. Any way they'd get back home as soon as the mist cleared.'

'Take these girls away,' said the old gypsy, sounding tired of them. 'Put them in the far cave, and tie them up.'

'Where's my dog?' shouted George, suddenly. 'You bring me my dog!'

'You haven't been very helpful,' said the old gypsy. 'We'll question you again tomorrow, and if you are more helpful, you shall have your dog.'

Two men took the girls away from the fire and over to the hill. A large opening led into the queer hill. One of the men had a lantern and led the way, the other man walking behind.

A passage led straight into the hill. There was sand underfoot, and it seemed to Anne as if even the walls were made of sand. How strange!

The hill was honeycombed with passages. They criss-crossed and forked like burrows in a rabbit-warren. Anne wondered however the men could find their way!

They came at last to a cave that must have been right in the heart of the hill, a cave with a sandy floor, and a post that was driven deeply into the ground.

Ropes were fastened firmly to it. The two girls looked at them in dismay. Surely they were not going to be tied up like prisoners!

But they were! The ropes were fastened firmly round their waists and knotted at the back. The knots were gypsy knots, firm, tight and complicated. It would take the girls hours to unpick those, even supposing they could manage to reach right round to their backs!

'There you are,' said the men, grinning at the two angry girls. 'May be in the morning you will remember where those packets were put?'

'You go and get my dog,' ordered George. But they only laughed loudly and went out of the cave. It was stuffy and hot in there. George was worried to death about Timmy, but Anne was almost too tired to think.

She fell asleep, sitting up uncomfortably with the ropes round her waist, and the knots digging into her back. George sat brooding. Timmy - where was he? Was he badly hurt? George was very miserable indeed.

She didn't go to sleep. She sat there, worrying, wide awake. She made an attempt to get at the knots behind her, but it was no use, she couldn't.

Suddenly she thought she heard a noise. Was that someone creeping up the passage to the cave? She felt frightened. Oh, if only Timmy were here!

Sniff! Sniff!

'Gracious goodness, it must be Sniffer!' thought George, and at that moment she almost loved the dirty little gypsy boy!

'Sniffer!' she called quietly, and put on her torch. Sniffer's head appeared and then his body. He was crawling quietly up the passage on all fours.

He came right into the cave, and stared at her and the sleeping Anne. 'I've sometimes been tied up here too,' he said.

'Sniffer, how is Timmy?' asked George, anxiously. 'Tell me, quickly!'

'He's all right,' said Sniffer. 'He's just got a bad cut on his head. I bathed it for him. He's tied up too, and he's mad about it!'

'Sniffer, listen, go and get Timmy and bring him to me,' said George, breathlessly. 'And bring me a knife too, to cut these ropes. Will you? Can you?'

'Oooh, I dunno,' said Sniffer, looking frightened. 'My father would half kill me!'

'Sniffer, is there anything you want, anything you've always wanted?' said George. 'I'll give it to you if you do this for me. I promise you!'

'I want a bike,' said Sniffer, surprisingly. 'And I want to live in a house, and ride my bike to school.'

'I'll see that you have what you want, Sniffer,' said George, wildly. 'Only, do, do go and get Timmy, and a knife! You got here without being seen, you can surely get back again safely with Timmy. Think of that bike!'

Sniffer thought of it. Then he nodded and disappeared down the passage as silently as he had come.

George waited and waited. Would he bring dear old Timmy to her, or would he be caught?

Chapter 18

GEORGE'S TRICK

George sat in the darkness of the cave, hearing Anne's peaceful breathing nearby, waiting for Sniffer to come back. She was longing to see Timmy again. Was the cut on his head very bad?

A thought came into her mind. She would send Timmy back to the stables with a note! He was very clever, he knew what to do when he had a note tied to his collar. Then help would come very quickly indeed. Timmy would know his way all right out of this hill, once he had been in it! Ah, here was Sniffer coming back again. Was Timmy with him? She heard Sniffer's sniff-sniff-sniff, but no sound of Timmy. Her heart sank.

Sniffer appeared cautiously in the cave.

'I didn't dare to take Timmy,' he said. 'My father has him tied up too near to him, and I'd have waked him. But I've brought you a knife, look.'

'Thank you, Sniffer,' said George, taking the knife and putting it into her pocket. 'Listen, there's something important I'm going to do and you've got to help.'

'I'm scared,' said Sniffer. 'I'm real scared.'

'Think of that bicycle,' said George. 'A red one, perhaps, with silver handles?'

Sniffer thought of it. 'All right,' he said. 'What are you going to do?'

'I'm going to write a note,' said George, feeling in her pocket for her note-book and pencil. 'And I want you to tie it on to Timmy's collar, under his chin, and set him free somehow. Will you do that? He'll run off back to the stables with the note, and then Anne and I will be rescued, and you will get the most beautiful bicycle in the world!'

'And a house to live in,' said Sniffer, at once. 'So's I can ride my bike to school?'

'All right,' said George, hoping that somehow he could have that too. 'Now, wait a minute.'

She scribbled the note, but she had hardly written more than a few words, when a sound came up the passage. Someone was coughing.

'It's my father!' said Sniffer, in fright. 'Listen, if you cut your ropes and escape, can you find your way out from here? It's very twisty and turny.'

'I don't know. I don't think I can!' whispered George, in a panic.

'I'll leave patrins for you!' said Sniffer. 'Look out for them! Now I'm going to slip into the cave next door, and wait till my father's finished talking to you. Then I'll go back to Timmy.'

He slipped out just in time. The lantern shone into George's cave and Sniffer's father stood there.

'Have you seen Sniffer?' he asked. 'I missed him when I woke just now. If I catch him in here I'll whip him till he squeals.'

'Sniffer? He's not here,' said George, trying to sound surprised. 'Look round the cave and see!'

The man caught sight of the note-book and pencil in George's hand. 'What's that you're writing?' he said suspiciously and took it from her.

'So you're writing for help, are you!' he said. 'And how do you think you're going to get help. I'd like to know? Who's going to take this note home for you? Sniffer?'

'No,' said George, truthfully.

The man frowned as he looked again at the note. 'Look here,' he said, 'you can write another note, to those two boys. And I'll tell you what to say.'

'No,' said George.

'Oh yes, you will,' said the man. 'I'm not going to hurt those boys. I'm just going to get back those packets from wherever they are hidden. Do you want your dog back safely?'

'Yes,' said George, with a gulp.

'Well, if you don't write this note you won't see him again,' said the man. 'Now then, take your pencil and write in that note-book of yours.'

George took up her pencil. 'This is what you must write,' said the man, frowning as he thought hard.

'Wait a minute,' said George. 'How are you going to get this note to the boys? You don't know where they are! You won't be able to find them if this mist still goes on.'

The man scratched his head and thought.

'The only way to get the note to them is to tie it on my dog's collar and send him to find them,' said George. 'If you bring him here to me I can make him understand. He always does what I tell him.'

'You mean he'll take the note to whoever you tell him to take it?' said the man, his eyes gleaming. 'Well, write it then. Say this:

'We are prisoners. Follow Timmy and he will bring you to us and you can save us.' Then sign your name, whatever it is.'

'It's Georgina,' said George, firmly. 'You go and get my dog while I write the note.'

The man turned and went. George looked after him her eyes bright. He thought he was making her play a trick on Julian and Dick, to bring them here so that they could be threatened and questioned about the packets, and where they were hidden!

'But I'm going to play a trick on him,' thought George. 'I'm going to tell Timmy to take the note to Henry, and she'll be suspicious and get Captain Johnson to follow Tim back here, and that will give the gypsies an awful shock! I expect the Captain will be sensible enough to get the police as well. Aha, I'm playing a trick too!'

In ten minutes' time Sniffer's father returned with Timmy. It was a rather subdued Timmy, with a very bad cut on his head, which really needed stitching. He pattered soberly across to George, and she flung her arms round his neck and cried into his thick hair.

'Does your head hurt you?' she said. 'I'll take you to the vet when I get back, Tim.'

'You can get back as soon as we've got those two boys here and they've told us where those packets are hidden,' said the man.

Timmy was licking George as if he would never stop, and his tail waved to and fro, to and fro. He couldn't understand what was happening at all! Why was George here? Never mind, he was with her again. He settled down on the floor with a thump and put his head on her knee.

'Write the note,' said the man, 'and tie it on to his collar, on the top, so that it can easily be seen.'
'I've written it,' said George. The gypsy held out a dirty hand for it and read it.

'We are prisoners. Follow Timmy and he will bring you to us and you can save us.'

Georgina.'

'Is that really your name, Georgina?' asked the man. George nodded. It was one of the few times she ever owned to a girl's name!

She tied the note firmly to Timmy's collar, on the top of his neck. It was quite plainly to be seen. Then she gave him a hug and spoke urgently to him.

'Go to Henry, Tim, go to HENRY. Do you understand, Timmy dear, take this note to HENRY.'
She tapped the paper on his collar as he listened to her. Then she gave him a push. 'Go along. Don't stay here any longer. Go and find HENRY.'

'Hadn't you better tell him the other boy's name too?' said the man.

'Oh no, I don't want to muddle Timmy,' said George hastily. 'Henry, Henry, HENRY!'

'Woof,' said Timmy, and George knew that he understood. She gave him another push. 'Go, then,' she said. 'Hurry!'

Timmy gave her rather a reproachful look as if to say, 'You haven't let me stay with you very long!' Then he padded off down the passage, the note showing clearly on his collar.

'I'll bring the boys up here as soon as they come with the dog,' said the man, and he turned on his heel, and went out. George wondered if Sniffer was still about and she called him. But there was no answer. He must have slipped away down the passages back to his caravan.

Anne woke up then, and wondered where she was. George switched on her torch again and explained all that had happened.

'You should have wakened me,' said Anne. 'Oh blow these ropes. They're so uncomfortable.'

'I've got a knife now,' said George. 'Sniffer gave it to me. Shall I cut our ropes?'

'Oh yes!' said Anne, in delight. 'But don't let's try and escape yet. It's still night-time and if that mist is about, we'll only get lost. We can pretend we're still tied up if anyone comes.'

George cut her own ropes with Sniffer's exceedingly blunt knife. Then she cut Anne's. Oh, what a relief to lie down properly, and not to have to sit up all the time and feel the knots at the back!

'Now do remember, if we hear anyone coming, we must tie the ropes loosely round us,' she said.

'We will stay here till we know it's day, and perhaps we can find out if the mist is still about, or if it's gone. If it's gone, we'll go.'

They fell asleep on the sandy floor, both glad to lie down flat. Nobody came to disturb them, and they slept on and on, tired out.

Where were the boys? Still under the bush, half-sleeping, half-waking, for they were cold and uncomfortable. They hoped the girls were now safely at home. They must have gone right down the railway, and made their way back to the stables, thought Julian, every time he awoke. I do hope they are safe and Timmy too. Thank goodness he is with them.

But Timmy wasn't with them, of course. He was padding across the misty moor all by himself, puzzled, and with a badly-aching head. Why had George sent him to Henry? He didn't like Henry. He didn't think that George did, either. And yet she had sent him to find her. Very strange!

Still, George had given him his orders, and he loved her and always obeyed her. He padded over the heather and grass. He didn't bother about keeping to the railway line. He knew the way back without even thinking about it!

It was still night, though soon the dawn would come. But the mist was so thick that even the dawn would not be able to break through it. The sun would have to remain hidden behind the thick swathes of mist.

Timmy came to the stables. He paused to remember which was Henry's bedroom. Ah yes, it was upstairs, next to the room that Anne and George had had.

Timmy leapt into the kitchen through a window left open for the cat. He padded upstairs and came to Henry's room. He pushed at the door and it opened.

In he went and put his paws on her bed. 'Woof,' he said in her ear. 'Woof! Woof! Woof!'

Chapter 19

GOOD OLD TIM!

Henry had been fast asleep and snoring. She awoke with a tremendous jump when she felt Timmy's paw on her arm and heard his sharp little bark.

'Oooh! What is it?' she said, sitting up straight in bed and fumbling for her torch. She was quite panic-stricken. She switched on the torch with trembling fingers and then saw Timmy, his big brown eyes looking at her beseechingly.

'Why, Timmy!' said Henry, in amazement, 'Timmy! Whatever are you doing here? Have the others come back? No, they couldn't have, not in the middle of the night! Why have you come then, Timmy?'

'Woof,' said Timmy, trying to make her understand that he was bringing a message. Henry put out her hand to pat his head, and suddenly caught sight of the paper tied to his collar at the back.

'What's this on your collar?' she said, and reached out for it. 'Why, it's paper. Tied on, too. It must be a message!'

She untied the piece of paper and unrolled it. She read it.

'We are prisoners. Follow Timmy and he will bring you to us and you can save us.'

Georgina.'

Henry was astounded. She looked at Timmy and he looked back, wagging his tail. He pawed at her arm impatiently. Henry read the note again. Then she pinched herself to make sure she was not dreaming.

'We are prisoners. Follow Timmy and he will bring you to us and you can save us.'

Georgina.'

'Oooh, no, I'm awake all right,' she said. 'Timmy, is this note true? Are they prisoners? And who does 'we' mean? George and Anne, or the whole four? Oh, Timmy, I do wish you could speak!'

Timmy wished the same! He pawed energetically at Henry. She suddenly saw the cut on his head and was horrified.

'You're hurt, Timmy! Oh, you poor, poor thing. Who did that to you? You ought to have that wound seen to!'

Timmy certainly had a very outsize headache, but he couldn't bother to think about that. He gave a little whine and ran to the door and back.

'Yes, I know you want me to follow you, but I've got to think,' said Henry. 'If Captain Johnson was here I'd go and fetch him. But he's away for the night, Timmy. And I'm sure Mrs. Johnson would have the fright of her life if I fetched her. I simply don't know what to do.'

'Woof,' said Timmy, scornfully.

'It's all very well to say 'Woof' like that,' said Henry, 'but I'm not as brave as you are. I pretend I am, Timmy, but I'm not really. I'm afraid of following you! I'm afraid of going to find the others. I might be caught too. And there's a terrible mist, Timmy, you know.'

Henry slid out of bed, and Timmy looked suddenly hopeful. Was this silly girl going to make up her mind at last?

'Timmy, there's no grown-up here tonight except Mrs. Johnson, and I really can't wake her,' said Henry. 'She's had such a very hard, busy day. I'm going to dress, and then get William. He's only eleven, I know, but he's very sensible, and he's a boy. He'll know what to do. I only pretend to be a boy.'

She dressed quickly in her riding things and then set off to William's room. He slept by himself across the landing. Henry walked in and switched on her torch.

William awoke at once. 'Who's there?' he demanded, sitting up at once. 'What do you want?'

'It's me. Henry,' said Henry. 'William, a most extraordinary thing has happened. Timmy has arrived in my room with a note on his collar. Read it!'

William took the note and read it. He was most astonished. 'Look,' he said, 'George has signed herself Georgina. She wouldn't do that unless things were very urgent. She never, never lets herself be called anything but George. We'll have to follow Tim and go, at once, too'

'But I can't walk miles in a mist over the moor,' said Henry, in a panic.

'We don't need to. We'll saddle our horses and go on those,' said William, beginning to dress, and sounding very sensible indeed. 'Timmy will lead the way. You go and get the horses out. Do buck up, Henry. The others may be in danger. You're acting like a Henrietta!'

That made Henry cross. She went out of the room at once and down into the yard. What a pity Captain Johnson happened to be away just that night. He would have decided everything at once. Courage came to her when she got the horses. They were surprised but quite willing to go for a nighttime ride, even in this thick mist! William came up in a very short time with Timmy behind him. Timmy was delighted to have William with him. He liked him, but he was not very fond of Henry.

He ran forward, just in front of the horses, and they followed behind. Both Henry and William had excellent torches, and kept them shining downwards, so that they should not miss Timmy. He did go out of sight once or twice, but came back immediately, when he heard the horses stopping.

Over the moor they rode. They didn't follow the railway, of course. Timmy didn't need to. He knew the way perfectly!

Once he stopped and sniffed the air. What had he smelt? Henry and William had no idea, but Timmy was puzzled by what he had smelt on the misty air.

Surely he had smelt the smell of the two boys, Julian and Dick? It had come on the air for a moment or two, and Timmy was half-inclined to follow it and see if the smell was right. Then he remembered George and Anne and went on through the swirling mist.

The boys were actually not very far away when Timmy smelt them. They were still in the middle of the bush, trying to keep warm, and sleep. If only they had known that Timmy was near, with Henry and William! But they didn't.

Timmy led the way. Soon they came to the quarry, but did not see it because of the mist. They went round it, led by Timmy, and rode towards the gypsy camp. Timmy slowed down, and they took warning.

'He's getting near wherever he wants to take us,' whispered William. 'Had we better dismount and tie the horses up, do you think? Their hooves may give a warning that we are near.'

'Yes. Yes, William,' said Henry, thinking that the boy was really very sensible. They dismounted quietly and tied the horses to a nearby birch tree.

They were quite near the hill in front of which was the gypsy camp. The mist was not so thick here, and the two suddenly caught sight of a dark, shadowy caravan, outlined against a campfire, left burning nearby.

'We'll have to be very quiet,' whispered William. 'Timmy's brought us to the gypsy camp on the moor. I had an idea that he would. The others must be held prisoner somewhere near - be as quiet as you can.'

Timmy watched them dismount. He hung his head, panting, his tail down. His head was hurting him very much, and he felt decidedly queer and giddy. But he must get to George, he must!

He led the way to the opening in the hill. William and Henry were most astonished. They followed Timmy through the maze of passages, wondering how he knew the way so surely. But Timmy didn't falter. He only needed to go somewhere once, and after that he never forgot the way!

He was going very slowly now, and his legs felt queer and shaky. He wanted to lie down and put his aching head on his paws. But no, he must find George. He must find George.

George and Anne were lying in the little cave, asleep. They were uncomfortable, and the cave was hot, so they were restless, waking up every few minutes. But both were asleep when Timmy walked slowly into the cave, and flopped down beside George.

George awoke when she heard William and Henry come into the cave. She thought it might be Sniffer's father coming back, and she hastily put the ropes round her waist so that she would look as if she were still tied up. Then she heard Timmy panting, and switched on her torch eagerly.

It showed her Timmy, and Henry and William! Henry was full of amazement when she saw George and Anne with ropes round their waists. She gaped at them.

'Oh Timmy darling, you fetched help!' said George, putting her arms round his neck. 'Oh Henry, I'm so glad you've come. But didn't you bring Captain Johnson too?'

'No. He's away,' said Henry. 'But William's here. We rode, and Timmy guided us. Whatever's happened, George?'

Anne awoke just then, and couldn't believe her eyes when she saw the visitors! There was a hasty discussion, and then William spoke firmly.

'If you want to escape, you'd better come now, while the gypsy camp is asleep. Timmy can guide us out of this rabbit-warren of a hill. We'd never be able to find our way out alone. Come on!'

'Come on, Tim,' said George, shaking him gently. But poor old Timmy was feeling very peculiar. He couldn't see things properly. George's voice sounded blurred to him. His head felt as heavy as lead, and somehow his legs wouldn't carry him. The blow on his head was taking real effect now, and the hurried journey over the moor and back was making it worse.

'He's ill!' said George, in a panic. 'He can't get up! Oh Timmy, what's the matter?'

'It's that cut on his head,' said William. 'It's pretty bad, and he's worn out with coming to fetch us and running all the way back again. He can't possibly guide us back, George. We'll have to do the best we can by ourselves.'

'Oh, poor, poor Timmy!' said Anne, horrified at seeing the dog stretched out quite limp, on the floor of the cave. 'George, can you carry him?'

'I think so,' said George, and she lugged him up in her arms. 'He's awfully heavy, but I think I can just manage him. Perhaps the fresh air will revive him when we get outside.'

'But George, we don't know our way out of here,' said Anne, fearfully. 'If Timmy can't lead us, we're lost! We'd end up by wandering miles and miles inside this hill and never getting out!'

'Well, we'll simply have to make a shot at it,' said William. 'Come on, I'll lead the way. We really MUST go!'

He went out of the cave and down a passage; the others followed. George carrying the limp Timmy. But very soon William came to a fork and stopped.

'Oh dear - do we go to the left or the right?' he wondered.

Nobody knew. George shone her torch here and there, trying to remember. The beam of light picked up something on the ground nearby.

It was two sticks, one short and one long, in the shape of a cross! George gave an exclamation.

'Look - a patrin! Left by Sniffer to show us the way out. We have to take the passage that the long stick points to! Oh, I hope that Sniffer has left patrins at every corner and every fork!'

They took the right-hand way and went on, their torches making long beams in the darkness, and at every place where they might go wrong, they saw a patrin, a message left by Sniffer to show them the right way to go.

'Another cross, we go this way,' said Anne.

'Here's a patrin again, we take this fork!' said George. And so it went on until they came safely to the entrance of the hill. How thankful they were to see the mist. At least it meant that they were in the open air!

'Now to get to the horses,' said William. 'They will each have to carry two of us at once, I'm afraid.'

And then, just as they were making their way to where they had left the horses, the gypsies' dogs began to bark the place down!

'They've heard us!' said William, desperately. 'Buck up! We'll be stopped if we don't get off at once!'

Then a voice shouted loudly. 'I can see you over there, with your torches! Stop at once! Do you hear me? STOP!'

Chapter 20

EXCITEMENT IN THE MORNING

The dawn was coming now. The mist was no longer full of darkness, but was white, and thinning rapidly. The four children hurried to the horses, which were stamping impatiently by the trees. George couldn't go very fast because of Timmy. He really was very heavy.

Suddenly he began to struggle. The fresh, cool air had revived him and he wanted to be set down. George put him down thankfully, and he began to bark defiantly at the gypsies who were now coming out of their caravans, their dogs with them.

The four children mounted hurriedly and the horses were surprised at the double weight. William swung his horse's head round and set off with George sitting behind him. Henry took Anne. Timmy, feeling much better, ran after them, his legs no longer feeling so shaky.

The gypsies ran too, shaking their fists and shouting. Sniffer's father was amazed beyond measure. Why, there were the two girls he had tied up - and that dog he had sent off to trick the other two boys on the moor.

Then who were these on horse-back, and how had they found their way to the hill? How had the prisoners been able to find their way out of the hill, too? That was a real puzzle to Sniffer's father.

The gypsies tore after the horses, but the dogs contented themselves with excited barks. Not one of them dared to go after Timmy. They were afraid of him.

The horses went off as fast as they dared in the mist, Timmy running in front. He seemed very much better, though George was afraid it was only the excitement that now kept him going. She glanced back at the gypsies. They would never catch up now, thank goodness!

Somewhere behind the mist the sun was shining. Soon it would disperse the strange fog that had come up so suddenly from the sea. She glanced down at her watch. Good gracious, could it really be almost six o'clock in the morning. It was tomorrow now!

She wondered what had happened to Julian and Dick.

She thought of Sniffer gratefully, and all those patris he had left in the hill. They would never have got out but for those. She thought of Henry and William, and gave William a sudden tight hug round the waist for coming out in the middle of the night and rescuing them!

'Where are Julian and Dick, do you suppose?' she said to William. 'Do you think they are still lost on the moor? Ought we to shout, and look for them?'

'No,' called back William over his shoulder. 'We're going straight back to the stables. They can look after themselves!'

Dick and Julian had certainly tried to look after themselves, that cold, misty night, but not very successfully. By the time that their torch showed them that it was a quarter to five by their watches, they had had enough of the bush they were in. If only they had known it, Henry and William, with Timmy, were just then riding over the moor, not a great distance from where they were!

They got out of the bush, damp and stiff. They stretched themselves and looked into the dark night, still full of mist.

'Let's walk,' said Julian. 'I can't bear keeping still in this mist. I've got my compass. If we walk due west we should surely come to the edge of the moor, not far from Milling Green.'

They set off stumbling in the now dim light of the torch, whose battery was getting low. 'It will give out soon,' groaned Dick, giving it a shake. 'Blow the thing! It hardly gives us any light now, and we simply must keep looking at the compass.'

Julian tripped against something hard and almost fell. He snatched the torch from Dick. 'Quick, let me have it!'

He shone it on what had tripped him and gave a delighted exclamation. 'Look, it's a rail! We're on the railway line again. What a bit of luck!'

'I should think so!' said Dick, relieved. 'This torch is just about finished. Now, for GOODNESS' sake don't let's lose this railway line. Stop at once if you can't feel it with your foot.'

'To think we were so jolly near the line after all, and didn't know it!' groaned Julian. 'We could have been back at the stables ages ago. I do hope the girls got back safely and didn't alarm anyone about us. They'd know we would come back as soon as it was daylight, anyhow, if we could follow the lines!'

They stumbled in at the stables' entrance about six o'clock, tired out. Nobody was yet up, it seemed. They found the garden door open, left ajar by William and Henry, and went up to the girls' room, hoping to find them in bed.

But the beds were empty of course. They went to Henry's room, to ask her if she had heard anything of the girls, but her bed, though slept in, was empty too!

They went across the landing to William's room. 'He's gone as well!' said Dick, in great astonishment. 'Where are they all?'

'Let's wake Captain Johnson,' said Julian, who had no idea that the Captain was away for the night. So they awakened a very startled Mrs. Johnson, and almost scared the life out of her, for she thought they were far away, camping on the moor!

She was even more startled when she heard their tale and realized that George and Anne were missing. 'Where are the girls, then!' she said, flinging on a dressing-gown. 'This is serious, Julian. They might be completely lost on the moor, or those gypsies might have got them! I must telephone my husband, and the police too. Oh dear, oh dear, why did I ever let you go camping out!'

She was in the middle of telephoning, with Julian and Dick beside her, looking very anxious indeed, when the sound of horses' hooves came in the yard below.

'Now goodness me! Who's that?' said Mrs. Johnson. 'Horses! Who's riding them at this time of the morning!'

They all went to the window and looked down into the yard. Dick gave a yell that almost made Mrs. Johnson fall out of the window!

'Anne! George! Look, there they are, and Timmy too. And gosh, there's Henry, and William! What is all this!'

Anne heard the yell and looked up. Tired as she was, she gave a cheerful wave and a grin. George gave a shout.

'Oh Julian! Oh Dick, you're back then! We did hope you would be. After you left us we went back up the lines the wrong way and arrived at the quarry again!'

'And the gypsies took us prisoners,' yelled Anne.

'But - but - how do Henry and William come into this?' said poor Mrs. Johnson, thinking she must really still be asleep. 'And what's the matter with Timmy?'

Timmy had suddenly flopped on the ground. The excitement was over, they were home, now he could put his poor aching head on his paws and sleep!

George was off her horse immediately. 'Timmy! Darling Timmy! Brave Timmy! Help me, William. I'll take him upstairs to my room and see to that cut.'

By this time all the other children were awake and there was such a pandemonium going on that Mrs. Johnson couldn't make herself heard.

Children in dressing-gowns and without, children shouting and yelling, children pouring into the yard and asking questions; William trying to quiet the two horses which were getting very excited at all this sudden clamour; and all the cocks round about crowing their heads off! What an excitement!

The sun suddenly shone out brilliantly, and the last wisps of mist disappeared. 'Hurrah! That mist has gone!' shouted George. 'The sun's out. Cheer up, Timmy. We'll all be all right now!'

Timmy was half-carried, half-dragged up the stairs by William and George. George and Mrs. Johnson examined his cut head carefully, and bathed it.

'It really should have been stiched up,' said Mrs. Johnson, 'but it seems to be healing already. How wicked to hit a dog like that!'

Soon there was the sound of horse's hooves again in the yard, and Captain Johnson arrived, looking very anxious. At almost the same moment a car slid in at the gates, a police car, with two policemen who had been sent to inquire about the missing girls! Mrs. Johnson had forgotten to telephone again to say they had arrived.

'Oh dear, I'm so sorry to have bothered you,' said Mrs. Johnson to the police sergeant. 'The girls have just arrived back, but I still don't know what has really happened. Still, they're safe, so please don't bother any more.'

'Wait!' said Julian, who was in the room, too. 'I think we shall need the police! Something very peculiar has been happening up on the moor.'

'Really, sir? What's that?' said the sergeant, taking out a note-book.

'We were camping there,' said Julian. 'And a plane came over, very low, guided by a lamp set in a sandpit by the gypsies.'

'A lamp set by the gypsies!' said the sergeant, surprised. 'But why should they need to guide a plane? I suppose it landed?'

'No. It didn't,' said Julian. 'It came again the next night, and did exactly the same thing, swooping low and circling. But this time it dropped packages, sir!'

'Oh, it did, did it?' said the sergeant, more interested. 'For the gypsies to pick up, by any chance?'

'Yes, sir,' said Julian. 'But the plane's aim wasn't very good, and the packets fell all round us and almost hit us. We ran for shelter, because we didn't know if there were any explosives or not!'

'Did you pick up any of the packages?' asked the sergeant. Julian nodded.

'Yes, we did, and I opened one.'

'What was in it?'

'Paper money, dollars!' said Julian. 'In one packet alone there were scores of notes and each note was for a hundred dollars, about forty pounds a time! Thousands of pounds-worth thrown all around us!'

The sergeant looked at his companion. 'Ha! Now we know! This explains a lot that has been puzzling us, doesn't it, Wilkins?'

Wilkins, the other policeman, nodded grimly. 'It certainly does. So that's what happens! That's how the gang get the dollars over here, from that printing-press in North France. Just a nice little run in a plane!'

'But why do they throw the packets down for the gypsies to collect?' asked Julian. 'Is it so that they can give them to someone else? Why don't they bring them openly into the country? Surely anyone can bring dollars here?'

'Not forged ones, my lad,' said the sergeant. 'These will all be forged, you mark my words. The gang have got a headquarters near London, and as soon as those packets are handed over to them by one of the gypsies, they will set to work passing them off as real ones, paying hotel bills with them, buying all kinds of goods and paying for them in notes that aren't worth a penny!'

'Whew!' said Julian. 'I never thought of them being forged!'

'Oh yes. We've known of this gang for some time, but all we knew was that they had a printing-press to print the notes in North France, and that somehow the rest of the gang here, near London, received them and passed them off as real ones,' said the sergeant. 'But we didn't know how they were brought here, nor who took them to the gang near London.'

'But now we know all right!' said Wilkins. 'My word, this is a pretty scoop, Sergeant. Good kids these, finding out what we've been months trying to discover!'

'Where are these packages?' said the sergeant. 'Did you hide them? Did the gypsies get them?'

'No, we hid them,' said Julian. 'But I guess the gypsies will be hunting all over the place for them today, so we'd better get on the moors quick, Sergeant.'

'Where did you hide them?' said the sergeant. 'In a safe place, I hope!'

'Oh very!' said Julian. 'I'll call my brother, Sergeant. He'll come with us. Hey, Dick! Come on in here, and you'll hear a very interesting bit of news!'

Chapter 21

THE END OF THE MYSTERY

Mrs. Johnson was amazed to hear that the police wanted Julian and Dick to go out on the moors again.

'But they're tired out!' she said. 'They need something to eat. Can't it wait?'

'I'm afraid not,' said the sergeant. 'You needn't worry, Mrs. Johnson. These boys are tough!'

'Well actually I don't think that the gypsies can possibly find the packets,' said Julian. 'So it wouldn't matter if we had a bite to eat. I'm ravenous!'

'All right,' said the big policeman, putting away his note-book. 'Have a snack and we'll go afterwards.'

Well, of course, George, Anne and Henry all wanted to go too, as soon as they heard about the proposed jaunt over the moors!

'What! Leave us out of that!' said George, indignantly. 'What a hope! Anne wants to come too.'

'So does Henry,' said Anne, looking at George, 'even though she didn't help to find the packages of notes.'

'Of course Henry must come,' said George at once, and Henry beamed. George had been very struck indeed with Henry's courage in coming with William to rescue her and Anne, and very pleased that she hadn't boasted about it! But Henry knew that William was the one mostly to praise, and she had been unexpectedly modest about the whole affair.

It was quite a large party that set off after everyone had made a very good breakfast. Mrs. Johnson had set to work cooking huge platefuls of bacon and egg, exclaiming every now and again when she thought of all that had happened up on the moors.

'Those gypsies! And fancy that plane coming like that - dropping money all over the place! And the gypsies tying up Anne and George in that hill. I never heard anything like it in my life!'

Captain Johnson went with the party too. He could hardly believe the extraordinary tale that the four had to tell, five, with old Timmy! Timmy now had a beautiful patch on his head, and was feeling extremely important. Wait till Liz saw that!

Ten people set out, including Timmy, for William had been included in the party too. He tried to guess where Julian had hidden the notes, but he couldn't, of course. Julian firmly refused to tell anyone. He wanted it to be a real surprise.

They came to the quarry at last, having walked all the way up the old railway line. Julian stood on the edge of the quarry and pointed out the gypsy camp.

'Look, they're leaving,' he said. 'I bet they were afraid we'd spread the news of their behaviour, after the girls escaped.'

Sure enough, the caravans were moving slowly away.

'Wilkins, as soon as you get back, give word to have every gypsy watched if he leaves the caravans,' said the sergeant. 'One of them is sure to have arranged a meeting-place to give the gang the packets dropped from the plane, and if we watch those caravans, and every gypsy in them, we'll soon be able to put our hands on the gang that spends the forged notes.'

'I bet it's Sniffer's father,' said Dick. 'He's the ringleader, anyway.'

They watched the caravans move away one by one. Anne wondered about Sniffer. So did George. What had she promised him last night, if he would help them? A bicycle, and to live in a house so that he could ride it to school! Well, it wasn't likely she would ever see the dirty little boy again, but if she did she would certainly have to keep her word!

'Now, where's this wonderful hiding-place?' asked the sergeant, as Julian turned from watching the caravans. He had tried to make out Sniffer and Liz, but the vans were too far away.

'Follow me!' said Julian, with a sudden grin and led the way back up the lines to where they broke off. The gorse-bush was there, and the old engine lay on its side as before, almost hidden.

'Whatever's that?' said the sergeant, surprised.

'It's the old Puffing Billy that used to pull the trucks of sand from the quarry,' said Dick. 'Apparently there was a quarrel long ago between the owners of the quarry and the gypsies, and the gypsies pulled up the lines and the engine ran off and fell over. There it's been ever since, as far as I can see!'

Julian went round to the funnel-end, and bent back the prickly gorse-branch that hid it. The sergeant looked on in surprise. Dick scraped the sand out of the top of the funnel and then pulled out one of the packages. He had been afraid they would not be there.

'Here you are!' he said, and tossed the packet to the sergeant. 'There are plenty more. I'll come to the one we opened in a minute - yes - here it is.'

The sergeant and Wilkins were amazed to see the packages hauled up from such a peculiar hiding-place. No wonder the gypsies hadn't found them. Nobody would ever have looked down the funnel of the old engine, even if they had spotted it, half-buried as it was.

The sergeant looked at the hundred-dollar notes in the opened parcel and whistled. 'My word, this is it! We've seen these before, beautiful forgeries they are! If the gang had got rid of this lot, a great many people would have suffered. The money is worth nothing! How many packets did you say there were?'

'Dozens!' said Dick, and pulled more of them out of the funnel. 'Gosh, I can't reach the ones at the bottom.'

'Never mind,' said the sergeant. 'Put some sand in to hide them and I'll send a man to poke the rest out with a stick. The gypsies have gone and they are the only people likely to hunt for them. This is a wonderful scoop! You kids have certainly put us on to something.'

'I'm glad,' said Julian. 'I say, we'd better collect all the things we left here yesterday, hadn't we? We went off in rather a hurry, you see, Sergeant, and left our things in the quarry.'

He and George went into the quarry to collect the things they had left there. Timmy went with them. He suddenly growled, and George stopped, her hand on his collar.

'What's up, Tim? Ju, there must be somebody here! Is it one of the gypsies, do you think?'

Then Timmy stopped growling and wagged his tail. He dragged away from George's hand and ran over to one of the little caves in the sandy walls. He looked most peculiar with the patch on his head.

Out of the cave came Liz! As soon as she saw Timmy she began to turn head-over-heels as fast as she could. Timmy stared in wonder - what a dog! How could she turn somersaults like that?

'Sniffer!' called George. 'Come on out. I know you're there!'

A pale, worried face looked out of the cave. Then Sniffer's thin, wiry little body followed, and soon he was standing in the quarry, looking scared.

'I got away from them,' he said, nodding his head towards where the gypsy camp had been. He went up to George, and gave a sniff.

'You said I could have a bike,' he said.

'I know,' said George. 'You shall have one, Sniffer. If you hadn't left us patrins in that hill, we'd never have escaped!'

'And you said I could live in a house and ride my bike to school,' said Sniffer urgently. 'I can't go back to my father, he'd half-kill me now. He saw those patrins I left in the hill and he chased me all over the moor for miles. But he didn't catch me. I hid.'

'We'll do the best we can for you,' promised Julian, sorry for this little waif. Sniffer sniffed.

'Where's that hanky?' demanded George. He pulled it out of his pocket, still clean and folded. He beamed at her.

'You're quite hopeless,' said George. 'Listen, if you want to go to school, you'll have to stop that awful sniff and use your hanky. See?'

Sniffer nodded, but put the hanky carefully back into his pocket. Then the sergeant came into the quarry and Sniffer fled at the sight of him!

'Funny little thing,' said Julian. 'Well, I should imagine that his father will be sent to prison for his share in this affair, so Sniffer will be able to get his wish and leave the caravan life to live in a house. We might be able to get him into a good home.'

'And I shall keep my word, and take some money out of my savings-bank and buy him a bicycle,' said George. 'He deserves it! Oh, do look at Liz - simply adoring Timmy and his patch. Don't look so important, Tim - it's only a patch on your cut!'

'Sniffer!' called Julian. 'Come back. You needn't be afraid of this policeman. He is a friend of ours. He'll help us to choose a bicycle for you.'

The sergeant looked extremely surprised at this remark, but at any rate it brought Sniffer back at once!

'Well, we'll go back now,' said the sergeant. 'We've got what we want, and Wilkins has already started back to get somebody on to watching the gypsies. Once we find out who they have to report to about this forged money we shall feel happy.'

'I hope Wilkins went along down the railway,' said Julian. 'It's so easy to get lost on this moor.'

'Yes. He had the sense to do that, after hearing how you got lost!' said the sergeant. 'It's wonderful up here, isn't it, so peaceful and quiet and calm.'

'Yes, you'd never think that mysteries could happen up here, would you?' said Dick. 'Old ones, and new ones! Well, I'm glad we happened to be mixed up in the newest one. It was quite an adventure!'

They all went back to the stables, to find that it was now almost dinner-time and that everyone had a very large appetite to match the very large dinner that Mrs. Johnson had got ready. The girls went upstairs to wash. George went into Henry's room.

'Henry,' she said, 'thanks most awfully. You're as good as a boy any day!'

'Thanks, George,' said Henry, surprised. 'You're better than a boy!'

Dick was passing the door and heard all this. He laughed, and stuck his head in at the door.

'I say do let me share in these compliments!' he said. 'Just tell me I'm as good as a girl, will you?'
But all he got was a well-aimed hair-brush and a shoe, and he fled away, laughing.

Anne gazed out of her bedroom window over the moor. It looked so peaceful and serene under the April sun. No mystery about it now!

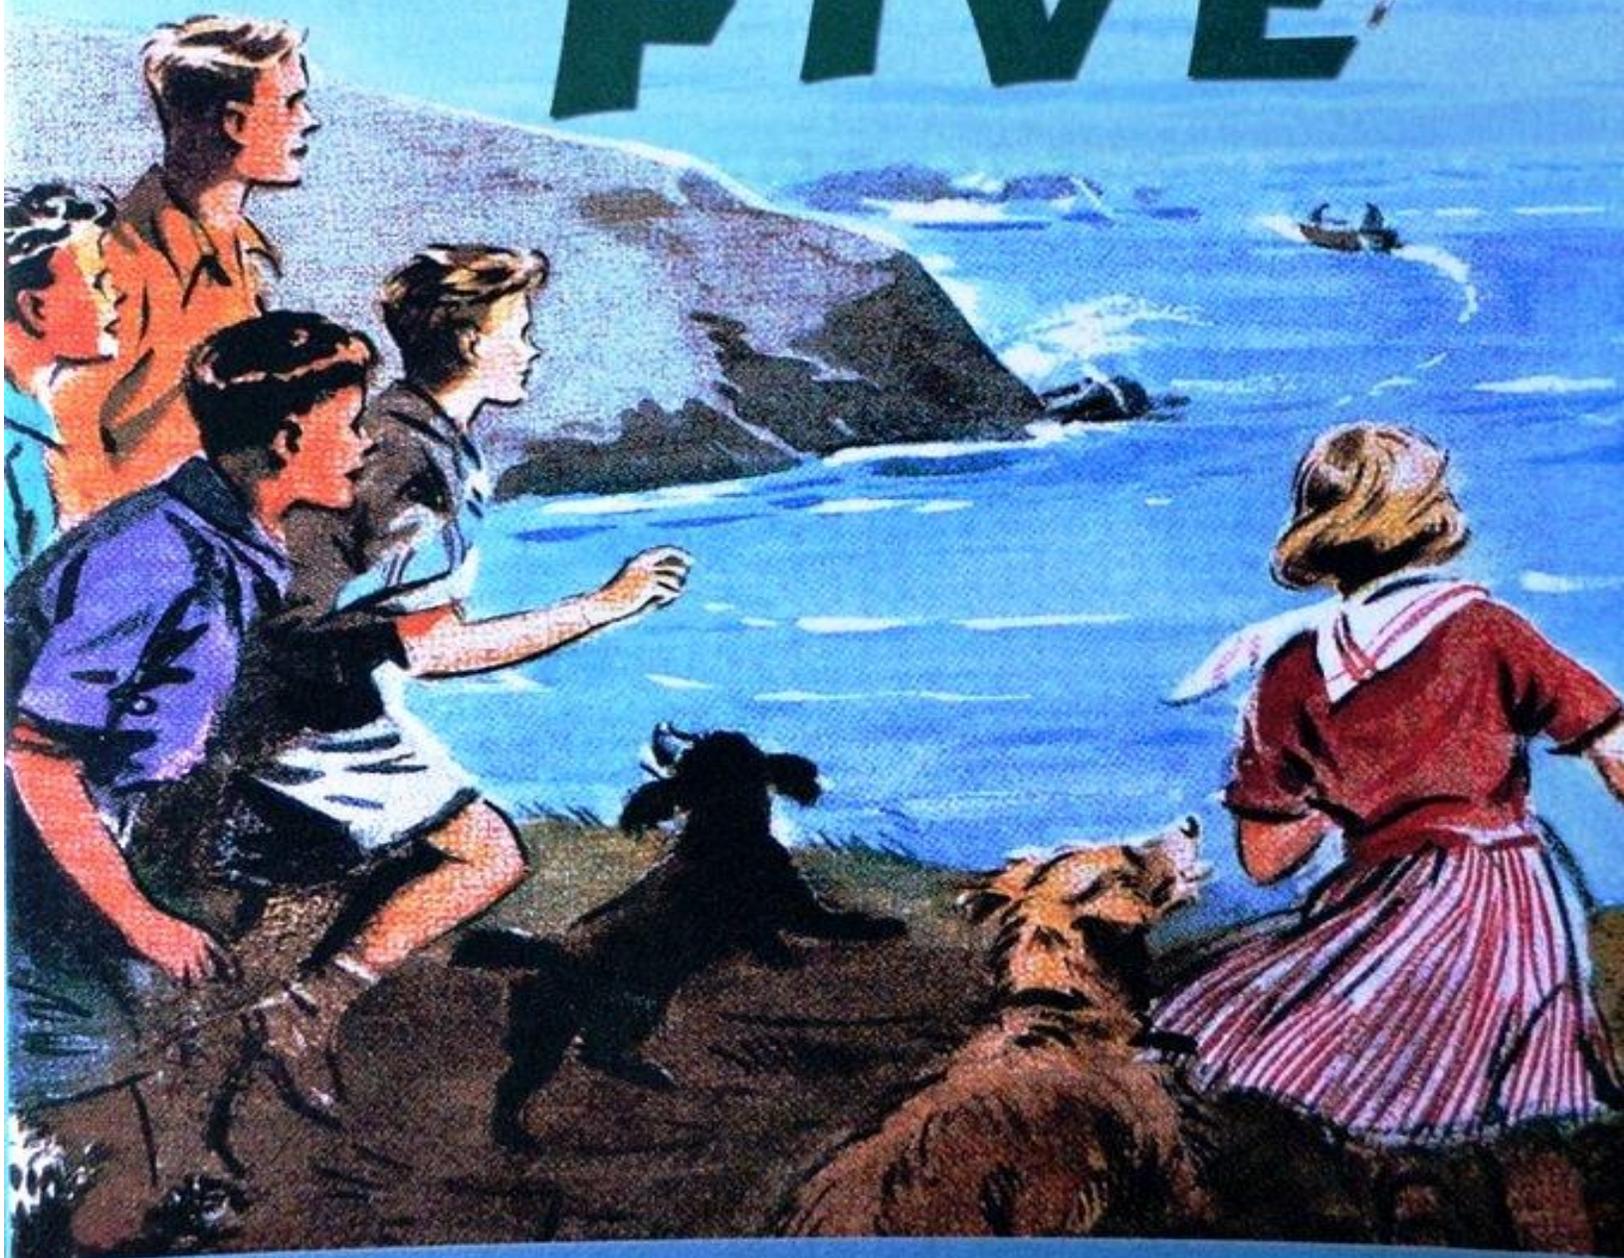

'All the same, it's a good name for you,' said Anne. 'You're full of mystery and adventure, and your last adventure waited for us to come and share it. I really think I'd call this adventure 'Five Go To Mystery Moor'.'

It's a good name, Anne. We'll call it that too!

THE END

Enid Blyton[®]

THE FAMOUS
FIVE

FIVE HAVE PLENTY OF FUN

ENID BLYTON

FAMOUS FIVE 14

Five Have Plenty Of Fun

Contents

| | | |
|----|----------------------------------|----|
| 1 | At Kirrin Cottage | 2 |
| 2 | A Visitor In The Night | 6 |
| 3 | Annoying News | 11 |
| 4 | Berta | 16 |
| 5 | In The Morning | 20 |
| 6 | A Few Upsets | 24 |
| 7 | A Little Conference | 29 |
| 8 | A Transformation | 34 |
| 9 | A Sudden Telephone Call | 38 |
| 10 | A Puzzling Thing | 43 |
| 11 | On Kirrin Island Again | 48 |
| 12 | Very Suspicious | 52 |
| 13 | A Horrid Shock | 57 |
| 14 | Where Is George? | 61 |
| 15 | Discoveries In The Wood | 66 |
| 16 | Jo! | 71 |
| 17 | To Gringo's Fair | 76 |
| 18 | Spiky Is Very Helpful | 80 |
| 19 | An Exciting Plan | 85 |
| 20 | A Thrilling Time | 89 |
| 21 | Most Unexpected! | 94 |
| 22 | 'These Kids Sure Are Wunnerful!' | 98 |

Chapter 1
AT KIRRIN COTTAGE

'I feel as if we've been at Kirrin for about a month already!' said Anne, stretching herself out on the warm sand, and digging her toes in. 'And we've only just come!'

'Yes - it's funny how we settle down at Kirrin so quickly,' said Dick. 'We only came yesterday, and I agree with you, Anne - it seems as if we've been here ages. I love Kirrin.'

'I hope this weather lasts out the three weeks we've got left of the holiday,' said Julian, rolling away from Timmy, who was pawing at him, trying to make him play. 'Go away, Timmy. You're too energetic. We've bathed, had a run, played ball - and that's quite enough for a little while. Go and play with the crabs!'

'Woof!' said Timmy, disgusted. Then he pricked up his ears as he heard a tinkling noise from the promenade. He barked again.

'Trust old Timmy to hear the ice-cream man,' said Dick. 'Anyone want an ice-cream?'

Everyone did, so Anne collected the money and went off to get the ice-creams, Timmy close at her heels. She came back with five cartons of ice-cream, Timmy jumping up at her all the way.

'I can't think of anything nicer than lying down on hot sand with the sun on every part of my body, eating an ice-cream, and knowing there are still three weeks' holiday in front of us - at Kirrin too!' said Dick.

'Yes. It's heaven,' said Anne. 'It's a pity your father has visitors today, George. Who are they? Have we got to dress up for them?'

'I don't think so,' said George. 'Timmy, you've eaten your ice-cream in one gulp. What a frightful waste!'

'When are these people coming?' asked Dick.

'About half past twelve,' said George. 'They're coming to lunch - but thank goodness Father told Mother he didn't want a pack of children gobbling all round him and his friends at lunch, so Mother said we could go in at half past twelve, say how-do-you-do and then clear off again with a picnic basket.'

'I must say I think your father has some good ideas at times,' said Dick. 'I suppose they are some scientist friends of his?'

'Yes. Father's working on some great scheme with these two men,' said George. 'One of them's a genius, apparently, and has hit on an idea that's too wonderful for words.'

'What kind of modern idea is it?' said Julian, lazily, holding out his finger-tips for Timmy to lick off smears of ice-cream. 'Some space-ship to take us on day-trips to the moon - or some new bomb to set off - or...'

'No, I think it's something that will give us heat, light and power for almost nothing!' said George. 'I heard Father say that it's the simplest and best idea anyone had ever worked out, and he's awfully excited about it. He called it a 'gift to mankind' and said he was proud to have anything to do with it.'

'Uncle Quentin is very clever, isn't he?' said Anne. George's father was the uncle of Julian, Dick and Anne, and they were cousins to George - short for Georgina. Once more they had all come down to Kirrin for part of their holiday, the last three weeks.

George's father was certainly clever. All the same, George sometimes wished that he was a more ordinary parent, one who would play cricket or tennis with children, and not be so horrified at shouting and laughter and silly jokes. He always made a fuss when George's mother insisted that George should have her cousins to stay.

'Noisy, rowdy, yelling kids!' he said. 'I shall lock myself in my study and stay there!'

'All right, dear,' said his wife. 'You do that. But you know perfectly well that they will be out practically all day long. George must have other children to stay sometimes, and her three cousins are the nicest ones I know. George loves having them here.'

The four cousins were very careful not to upset George's father. He had a very hot temper and shouted at the top of his voice when he was angry. Still, as Julian said, he really couldn't help being a genius, and geniuses weren't ordinary people.

'Especially scientific geniuses who might easily blow up the whole world in a fit of temper,' said Julian, solemnly.

'Well, I wish he wouldn't keep blowing me up if I let a door bang, or set Timmy barking,' said George.

'That's only to keep his hand in,' said Dick. 'Just a bit of practice at blowing up!'

'Don't be an ass,' said George. 'Does anyone feel like another bathe?'

'No. But I don't mind going and lying in the very edge of the sea, and letting the waves there just curl over me,' said Dick. 'I'm absolutely baked lying here.'

'It sounds lovely,' said Anne. 'But the hotter you are the colder the water feels.'

'Come on!' said Dick, getting up. 'I shall hang my tongue out and pant like Timmy soon.'

They all went down to the edge of the water and lay down flat in the tiny curling waves there. Anne gave a little shriek.

'It feels icy! I knew it would. I can't lie down in it yet - I can only sit up!'

However they were soon all lying full-length in the shallow waves at the edge of the sea, sliding down the sand a little every now and again as the tide ebbed farther from them. It was lovely to feel the cool fingers of the sea on every part of them.

Suddenly Timmy barked. He was not in the water with them, but was just at the edge. He thought that lying down in the sea was quite unnecessary! George raised her head.

'What's the matter?' she said. 'There's nobody coming.'

But Dick had heard something too. He sat up hurriedly. 'Gosh, I believe that's someone ringing a bell for us. It sounds like the bell from Kirrin Cottage!'

'But it can't be dinner-time yet!' said Anne in dismay.

'It must be,' said Julian, leaping up. 'Blow! This is what comes of leaving my watch in my blazer pocket! I ought to have remembered that time at Kirrin goes more quickly than anywhere else!'

He ran up the beach to his blazer and took his wristwatch from the pocket. 'It's one o'clock!' he yelled. 'In fact, it's a minute past. Buck up, we'll be awfully late!'

'Blow!' said George. 'Mother won't be at all pleased with us, because those two scientist people will be there!'

They collected their blazers and tore up the beach. It was not very far to Kirrin Cottage, fortunately, and they were soon running in at the front gate. There was a very large car outside, one of the latest American models. But there was no time to examine it!

They trailed in quietly at the garden door. George's mother met them, looking rather cross.

'Sorry, Aunt Fanny,' said Julian. 'Please forgive us. It was my fault entirely. I'm the only one with a watch.'

'Are we awfully late?' asked Anne. 'Have you begun lunch yet? Would you like us just to take our picnic basket and slip off without interrupting?'

'No,' said her aunt. 'Fortunately your uncle is still shut up in his study with his friends. I've sounded the gong once but I don't expect they've even heard it! I rang the bell for you because I thought that any moment they might come out, and your uncle would be cross if you weren't there just to say how-do-you-do!

'But Father's friends don't usually want to see us,' said George, surprised.

'Well, one of them has a girl a bit younger than you, George - younger than Anne too, I think,' said her mother. 'And he specially asked to see you all, because his daughter is going to your school next term.'

'We'd better buck up and have a bit of a wash then,' said Julian - but at that very moment the study door opened, and his Uncle Quentin came out with two men.

'Hallo - are these your kids?' said one of the men, stopping.

'They've just come in from the beach,' said Aunt Fanny hurriedly. 'I'm afraid they are not really fit to be seen. I...'

'Great snakes!' said the man, 'don't you dare to apologise for kids like these! I never saw such a fine lot in my life - they're wunnerful!'

He spoke with an American accent, and beamed all over his face. The children warmed to him at once. He turned to George's father. 'These all yours?' he asked. 'I bet you're proud of them! How did they get that tan - they look like Red Indians! My, my - wish my Berta looked like that!'

'They're not all mine,' said Uncle Quentin, looking quite horrified at the thought. 'Only this one is mine,' and he put his hand on George's shoulder. 'The others are nephews and a niece.'

'Well, I must say you've got a fine boy,' said the American, ruffling George's short curls. As a rule she hated people who did that, but because he mistook her for a boy, she grinned happily!

'My girl's going to your school,' he said to Anne. 'Give her a bit of help, will you? She'll be scared stiff at first.'

'Of course I will,' said Anne, taking a liking to the huge loud-voiced American. He didn't look a bit like a scientist. The other man did, though. He was round-shouldered and wore owl-like glasses, and, as Uncle Quentin often did, he stared into the distance as if he was not hearing a single word that anyone said.

Uncle Quentin thought this gossiping had lasted long enough. He waved the children away.

'Come and have lunch,' he said to the other men. The second man followed him at once, but the big American stayed behind. He thrust his hands into his pocket and brought out a pound note. He gave it to Anne.

'Spend that on yourselves,' he said. 'And be kind to my Berta, won't you?'

He disappeared into the dining-room and shut the door with a loud bang. 'Goodness - what will Father say to a bang like that!' said George, with a sudden giggle. 'I like him, don't you? That must be his car outside. I can't imagine the other man even riding a bicycle, let alone driving a car!'

'Children - take your picnic basket and go!' said Aunt Fanny, urgently. 'I must run and see that everything is all right!'

She thrust a big basket into Julian's hands, and disappeared into the dining-room. Julian grinned as he felt the weight of the basket.

'Come along,' he said. 'This feels good! Back to the beach, everyone!'

Chapter 2

A VISITOR IN THE NIGHT

The Five were on the beach in two minutes, and Julian undid the basket. It was full of neatly packed sandwiches, and packets of biscuits and chocolate. A bag contained ripe plums, and there were two bottles of lemonade.

'Home-made!' said Dick, taking it out. 'And icy-cold. And what's this? A fruit cake - a whole fruit cake - we're in luck.'

'Woof,' said Timmy, approvingly, and sniffled inside the basket.

Wrapped in brown paper were some biscuits and a bone, together with a small pot of paste. George undid the packet. 'I packed these for you, Timmy,' she said. 'Say thank you!'

Timmy licked her so lavishly that she cried out for mercy. 'Pass me the towel, Ju!' she said. 'Timmy's made my face all wet. Get away now, Timmy - you've thanked me quite enough! Get away, I said. How can I spread paste on your biscuits if you stick your nose into the pot all the time?'

'You spoil Timmy dreadfully,' said Anne. 'All right, all right - you needn't scowl at me, George! I agree that he's worth spoiling. Take your bone a bit farther away from me, Tim - it's smelly!'

They were soon eating sardine sandwiches with tomatoes, and egg-and-lettuce sandwiches after that. Then they started on the fruit cake and the lemonade.

'I can't think why people ever have table-meals when they can have picnics,' said Dick. 'Think of Uncle and Aunt and those two men tucking into a hot meal indoors on a day like this. Phew!'

'I liked that big American,' said George.

'Aha! We all know why,' said Dick, annoyingly. 'He thought you were a boy. Will you ever grow out of that, George?'

'Timmy's trying to get at the cake!' said Anne. 'Quick, George, stop him!'

They all lay back on the sand after their picnic, and Julian began a long story of some trick that he and Dick had played on their form-master at school. He was most annoyed because nobody laughed at the funny part, and sat up to see why.

'All asleep!' he said, in disgust. Then he cocked his head just as Timmy pricked up his ears. A loud roaring noise came to him.

'Just the American revving up his car, do you think, Tim?' said Julian. The boy stood up and saw the great car tearing down the sea road.

The day was too hot to do anything but laze. The Five were quite content to do that on their first day together again. Soon they would want to plan all kinds of things, but the first day at Kirrin was a day for picking up old threads, teasing Timmy, getting into the 'feel' of things again, as Dick said.

Dick and Julian had been abroad for four weeks, and Anne had been away to camp and had had a school friend to stay with her at home afterwards. George had been alone at Kirrin so it was wonderful to all the Five to meet together once more for three whole summer weeks. At Kirrin too, Kirrin by the sea, with its lovely beach, its fine boating - and its exciting little island across Kirrin Bay!

As usual the first day or two passed in a kind of dream, and then the children began to plan exciting things to do.

'We'll go to Kirrin Island again,' said Dick. 'We've not been there for ages.'

'We'll go fishing in Lobster Cove,' said Julian.

'We'll go and explore some of the caves in the cliffs,' said George. 'I meant to do that these hols, but somehow it's no fun going alone.'

On the third day, just as they were finishing making their beds, the telephone bell rang.

'I'll go!' yelled Julian to his aunt, and went to answer it. An urgent voice spoke at the other end.

'Who's that? Oh, you, Julian - you're Quentin's nephew, aren't you? Listen, tell your uncle I'm coming over tonight - yes, tonight. Latish, say. Tell him to wait up for me. It's important.'

'But, won't you speak to him yourself?' said Julian, surprised. 'I'll fetch him, if you'll...'

But the line had gone dead. Julian was puzzled. The man hadn't even given his name - but Julian had recognised the voice. It was the big, cheery American who had come to see his uncle two days before! What had happened? What was all the excitement about?

He went to find his uncle but he was not in his study. So he found his aunt instead.

'Aunt Fanny,' he said, 'I think that was the big American on the phone - the one who came to lunch the other day. He said I was to tell Uncle Quentin that he was coming here tonight - late, he said - and that Uncle was to wait up for him, because it was important.'

'Dear me!' said his aunt, startled. 'Is he going to stay the night then? We've no bedroom free now you and the others are here.'

'He didn't say, Aunt Fanny,' said Julian. 'I'm awfully sorry not to be able to tell you any details - but just as I was saying I'd fetch Uncle Quentin, he rang off - in the very middle of what I was saying.'

'How mysterious!' said his aunt. 'And how annoying. How can I put him up, if he wants to stay? I suppose he'll come roaring down at midnight in that enormous car of his. I only hope nothing's gone wrong with this latest work your uncle is doing. I know it's tremendously important.'

'Perhaps Uncle will know the American's telephone number and he can ring him up to find out a bit more,' said Julian, helpfully. 'Where is Uncle?'

'He's gone down to the post-office, I think,' said his aunt. 'I'll tell him when he gets back.'

Julian told the others about the mysterious phone call. Dick was pleased.

'I didn't have a chance of getting a good look at that enormous car the other day,' he said. 'I think I'll keep awake tonight till the American comes and then nip down and have a look at it. I bet it's got more gadgets on the dashboard than any car I've ever seen!'

Uncle Quentin appeared to be as surprised as anyone else at the phone call, and was inclined to blame Julian for not finding out more details.

'What's he want now?' he demanded, almost as if Julian ought to know! 'I fixed everything up with him the other day. Everything! Each of us three has his own part to do. Mine's the least important, as it happens - and his is the most important. He took all the papers away with him; he can't have left any behind. Coming down in the middle of the night like this - quite extraordinary!

None of the children except Dick meant to stay awake and listen for the American's coming. Dick put on his bed-light and took up a book to read. He knew he would fall asleep and not wake up for any noise, if he didn't somehow keep himself wide awake!

He listened as he read, his ear alert to hear the coming of any car. Eleven o'clock came - then midnight struck. He listened to the twelve dongs from the big grandfather clock in the hall. Goodness - Uncle Quentin wouldn't be at all pleased that his visitor was so late!

He yawned, and turned over his page. He read on and on. Half past twelve. One o'clock. Then he thought he heard a sound downstairs and opened his door. Yes - it was Uncle Quentin in his study. Dick could hear his voice.

'Poor old Aunt Fanny must be up too,' he thought. 'I can hear their voices. Gosh, I shall soon fall asleep over my book. I'll slip down and out into the garden for a breath of fresh air. I shall keep awake then.'

He put on his dressing-gown and went quietly down the stairs. He undid the bolt of the garden door and slipped out. He stood listening for a moment, wondering if he would hear the roar of the American's car in the stillness of the night.

But all he heard was the sound of the tyres of a bicycle on the road outside. A bicycle! Who was riding about at this time of night? Perhaps it was the village policeman?

Dick stood in the shadows and watched. A man was on the bicycle. Dick could just make him out dimly, a big black shadow in the starlit night. To the boy's enormous surprise, he heard the sound of the man dismounting, then the swish of the leaves in the hedge as the bicycle was slung there.

Then someone came quietly up the path and went round to the window of the study. It was the only room in the house that was lighted. Dick heard a tapping on the window, and then it was opened cautiously. His uncle's head appeared.

'Who is it?' he said, in a low tone. 'Is it you, Elbur?'

It apparently was. Dick saw that it was the big American who had visited his uncle two days before. 'I'll open the door,' said his aunt, but Elbur was already putting his leg across the window-sill!

Dick went back to bed, puzzled. How strange! Why should the American come so secretly in the night, why should he ride a bicycle instead of driving his car? He fell asleep still wondering.

He did not know whether the American rode away again, or whether his aunt made a bed for him on a couch downstairs. In fact, when he awoke the next morning, he really wondered if it had all been a dream.

He asked his aunt, when he went down to breakfast. 'Did that man who telephoned come last night?' he said.

His aunt nodded her head. 'Yes. But please say nothing about it. I don't want anyone to know. He's gone now.'

'Was it important?' asked Dick. 'Julian seemed to think it was, when he answered the phone.'

'Yes - it was important,' said Aunt Fanny. 'But not in the way you think. Don't ask me anything now, Dick. And keep out of your uncle's way. He's rather cross this morning.'

'Then something must have gone wrong with this new work he's doing,' thought Dick, and went to warn the others.

'It sounds rather exciting,' said Julian. 'I wonder what's up?'

They kept out of Uncle Quentin's way. They heard him grumbling loudly to his wife about something, they heard him slam down his desk-lid as he always did when he was bad-tempered, and then he settled down to his morning's work.

Anne came running to the others after a time, looking surprised. 'George! I've just been into our room and what do you think! Aunt Fanny's put a camp-bed over in the corner - a camp-bed made up with blankets and everything! It looks an awful squash with two other beds as well in the room - mine and yours!'

'Gosh - someone else is coming to stay then - a girl,' said Dick. 'Or a woman. Aha! I expect it's a governess engaged to look after you and Anne, George, to see that you behave like little ladies!'

'Don't be an idiot,' said George, surprised and cross at the news. 'I'm going to ask Mother what it's all about. I won't have anyone else in our room. I just will not!'

But just as she was marching off to tell her mother this, the study door downstairs opened and her father bellowed into the hall, calling his wife.

'Fanny! Tell the children I want them. Tell them to come to my study AT ONCE!'

'Gracious - he does sound cross. Whatever can we have done?' said Anne, scared.

Chapter 3
ANNOYING NEWS

The four children and Timmy trooped down the stairs together. George's mother was in the hall, just going to call them.

'Oh, there you are,' she said. 'Well, I suppose you heard that you're wanted in the study. I'm coming too. And listen - please don't make any more fuss than you can help. I've had quite enough fuss made by Quentin!'

This was very mysterious! What had Aunt Fanny to do with whatever trouble there was? Into the study went the Five, Timmy too, and saw Uncle Quentin standing on the hearthrug looking as black as thunder.

'Quentin, I could have told the children,' began his wife, but he silenced her with a scowl exactly like the one George sometimes put on.

'I've got something to say to you,' he began. 'You remember those two friends of mine - scientists working on a scheme with me - you remember the big American?'

'Yes,' said everyone.

'He gave us a whole pound,' said Anne.

Uncle Quentin took no notice of that remark. 'Well,' he said, 'he's got a daughter - let's see now - she's got some silly name...'

'Berta,' said his wife.

'Don't interrupt me,' said Uncle Quentin. 'Yes, Berta. Well, Elbur, her father, has been warned that she's going to be kidnapped.'

'Whatever for?' said Julian, amazed.

'Because it so happens that her father knows more secrets about a new scheme we're planning than anyone else in the world,' said his uncle. 'And he says, quite frankly, that if this girl - what's her name now...'

'Berta,' said everyone, obligingly.

'That if this Berta is kidnapped, he will give away every single secret he knows to get her back,' said Uncle Quentin. 'Pah! What's he made of? Traitor to us all! How can he even think of giving away secrets for the sake of a silly girl?'

'Quentin, she's his only child and he adores her,' said Aunt Fanny. 'I should feel the same about George.'

'Women are always soft and silly,' said her husband, in a tone of great disgust. 'It's a good thing you don't know any secrets - you'd give them away to the milkman!'

This was so ridiculous that the children laughed. Uncle Quentin glared at them.

'This is no laughing matter. It has been a great shock to me to be told by one of the leading scientists of the world that he feels certain he might give all our secrets to the enemy if this - this...'

'Berta,' said everyone again, at once.

'If this Berta was kidnapped,' went on Uncle Quentin. 'So he came to ask if we'd take this - this Berta into our own home for three weeks. By that time the scheme will be finished and launched, and our secrets will be safe.'

There was a silence. Nobody looked very pleased. In fact, George looked furious. She burst out at last.

'So that's who the bed is for in our room! Mother, have we got to be squashed up with nowhere to move about the room, for three whole weeks? It's too bad.'

'For once you and I agree, George,' said her father. 'But I'm afraid you'll have to put up with it. Elbur is in such a state about this kidnapping warning that he couldn't be reasoned with. In fact he threatend to tear up all his figures and diagrams and burn them, if I didn't agree to this. That would mean we couldn't get on with the scheme.'

'But why has she got to come here?' said George, fiercely. 'Why put her on to us? Hasn't she any relations or friends she can go to?'

'George, don't be so fierce,' said her mother. 'Apparently Berta has no mother, and has been everywhere with her father. They have no relations in this country - and no friends they can trust. He won't send her back to America because he has been warned by the police that she might be followed there - and at the moment he can't leave this country himself to go with her.'

'But why choose us?' said George again. 'He doesn't know a thing about us!'

'Well,' said her mother, with a small smile, 'he met you all the other day, you know - and he was apparently very struck with you - and especially with you, George, though I can't imagine why. He said he'd rather his Berta was with you four than with any other family in the world.'

She paused and looked at the four, a harassed expression on her face. Julian went over to her.

'Don't you worry!' he said. 'We'll look after Berta! I won't pretend I'm pleased at having a strange girl to join us these last three precious weeks - but I can see her father's point of view - he's scared for Berta, and he's scared he might find himself spilling the beans if anything happened to her! It might be the only way he could get her back.'

'To think of such a thing!' burst out Uncle Quentin. 'All the work of the last two years! The man must be mad!'

'Now Quentin, don't think any more about it,' said his wife. 'I'm glad to have the child here. I would hate George to be kidnapped, and I know exactly how he feels. You won't even notice she's here. One more will make no difference.'

'So you say,' grumbled her husband. 'Anyway, it's settled.'

'When is she coming?' asked Dick.

'Tonight. By boat,' said his uncle. 'We'll have to let Joan the cook into the secret - but nobody else. That's understood, isn't it?'

'Of course,' said the four at once. Then Uncle Quentin sat down firmly at his desk, and the children went hurriedly out of the room, Aunt Fanny behind them, and Timmy pushing between their ankles.

'It's such a pity, and I'm so sorry,' said Aunt Fanny. 'But I do feel we can't do anything else.'

'I bet Timmy will hate her,' said George.

'Now don't you go and make things difficult, George, old thing,' said Julian. 'We're all agreed it can't be helped, so we might as well make the best of it.'

'I hate making the best of things,' said George, obstinately.

'Well,' said Dick, amiably, 'Julian and Anne and I could go back home and take Berta with us if you hate everything so much. I don't particularly want to stay here for three weeks if you're going to put on a Hate all the time.'

'All right, I won't,' said George. 'I'm only letting off steam. You know that.'

'I'm never sure, with you,' said Dick, with a grin. 'Well, look - let's not spoil this one day when we will be by ourselves!'

They all tried valiantly to have as good a time as possible, and went out in George's boat for a long row to Lobster Cove. They didn't do any fishing there, but bathed from the boat instead, in water as green and clear as in an open-air bath. Timmy didn't approve of bathing from boats. It was quite easy to jump out of the boat into the water - but he found it extremely difficult to jump in again!

Aunt Fanny had again packed them a wonderful lunch. 'An extra good one to make up for a disappointment,' she said, smiling. Anne had given her a hug for that. Here they had all been making such a fuss about having someone extra - and Aunt Fanny had been the only one to feel a real kindness for a child in danger.

They had enough food for tea too, and did not get home until the evening. The sea was calm and blue, and the children could see almost to the bottom of the water, when they leaned over the side of the boat. The sky was the colour of harebells as they rowed into the bay and up to the beach.

'Will Berta be there yet, do you suppose?' said George, mentioning the girl for the first time since they had set out that morning.

'I shouldn't think so,' said Julian. 'Your father said she would be coming tonight - and I imagine that, as she's coming by boat, it will be dark - so that she won't be seen.'

'I expect she'll be feeling very scared,' said Anne. 'It must be horrid to be sent away to a strange place, to strange people. I should hate it!'

They beached the boat and left it high and dry. Then they made their way to Kirrin Cottage. Aunt Fanny was pleased to see them.

'You are in nice time for supper,' she said. 'Though if you ate all I gave you today for your picnics, you'll surely find it difficult to eat very much supper.'

'Oh, I'm terribly hungry,' said Dick. He sniffed, holding his nose up in the air just as Timmy often did. 'I believe you've been making your special tomato soup, with real tomatoes, Aunt Fanny!'

'You're too good at guessing,' said his aunt with a laugh. 'It was meant to be a surprise! Now go and wash and make yourselves tidy.'

'Berta hasn't come yet, I suppose, has she?' asked Julian.

'No,' said his aunt. 'And we'll have to think of another name for her, Julian. It would never do to call her Berta now.'

Uncle Quentin didn't appear for supper. 'He is having his in the study by himself,' said Aunt Fanny.

There was a sigh of relief. Nobody had looked forward to seeing Uncle Quentin that night. It took him quite a long time to get over any annoyance!

'How sunburnt you all are!' said Aunt Fanny, looking round the table. 'George, your nose is beginning to peel.'

'I know,' said George. 'I wish it didn't. Anne's never does. Gosh, I'm sleepy!'

'Well, go to bed as soon as you've finished your supper,' said her mother.

'I'd like to. But what about this Berta?' said George. 'What time is she coming? It would be rather mean to be in bed when she arrives.'

'I've no idea what time she will come,' said her mother. 'But I shall wait up, of course. There's no need for anyone else to. I expect she'll be tired and scared, so I shall give her something to eat - some of the tomato soup, if you've left any! - and then pop her into bed. I expect she would be quite glad not to have to meet any of you tonight.'

'Well - I shall go to bed,' said Dick. 'I heard Mr. Elbur arriving last night, Aunt Fanny, and it was pretty late, wasn't it? I can hardly keep my eyes open tonight.'

'Come on, then - let's all go up,' said Julian. 'We can read if we can't sleep. Good night, Aunt Fanny. Thank you for that lovely picnic food again!'

All the four went upstairs, Anne and Dick yawning loudly, and setting the others off too. Timmy padded behind them, quite glad that George was going to bed so early.

They were all asleep in ten minutes. The boys slept like logs and didn't stir at all. The girls fell fast asleep for about four hours - and then George was awakened by hearing Timmy growl. She sat up at once.

'What is it?' she said. 'Oh - is it Berta arriving, Tim? Let's keep quiet and see what she's like!'

After a minute Timmy growled again. George heard the sound of quiet footsteps on the stairs. Then the bedroom door was slid softly open, and two people stood in the light of the landing lamp. One was Aunt Fanny.

The other, of course, was Berta.

Chapter 4

BERTA

George sat up in bed and stared at Berta. She looked very peculiar indeed. For one thing she was so bundled up in coats and wraps that it was difficult to see if she was fat or thin, tall or short, and for another thing she was crying so bitterly that her face was all screwed up.

Anne didn't wake up. Timmy was so astonished that, like George, he simply sat and stared.

'Tell Timmy not to make a sound,' whispered George's mother, afraid that the dog might bark the house down, once he began.

George laid a warning hand on Timmy. Her mother gave Berta a little push farther into the room. 'She's been terribly seasick, poor child,' she told George. 'And she's scared and upset. I want her to get into bed as soon as possible.'

Berta was still sobbing, but the sobs grew quieter as she began to feel less sick. George's mother was so kind and sensible that she felt comforted.

'Let's take these things off,' she said to Berta. 'My word, you are bundled up! But if you came in an open motorboat I expect you needed them.'

'What am I to call you?' asked Berta, with one last sniff.

'You'd better call me Aunt Fanny, as the others do, I think,' said George's mother. 'I expect you know why you've come to stay with us for a while, don't you?'

'Yes,' said Berta. 'I didn't want to come. I wanted to stay with my father. I'm not afraid of being kidnapped. I've got Sally to look after me.'

'Who's Sally, dear?' asked Aunt Fanny, taking a coat or two off Berta.

'My dog,' said Berta. 'She's downstairs in the basket I was carrying.'

George pricked up her ears at that bit of news! 'A dog!' she said. 'We can't have a dog here. Mine would never allow that. Would you, Timmy?'

Timmy gave a small wuff. He was watching this night arrival with great interest. Who was she? He was longing to get down from George's bed and go to sniff at her, but George had her hand on his collar.

'Well, I've brought my dog, and I just reckon she'll have to stay now,' said Berta. 'The boat's gone back. Anyway, I wouldn't go anywhere without Sally. I told my father that, and he said all right then, take her with you! So I did.'

'Mother, tell her how fierce Timmy is and that he would fight any other dog who came here,' said George, urgently. 'I won't have anybody else's dog at Kirrin Cottage.'

To George's annoyance her mother took not the slightest notice. She went on helping Berta take off scarves and leggings and goodness knows what. George wondered how anyone could possibly exist in all those clothes on a warm summer's night.

At last Berta stood in a simple jersey and skirt, a slim, pretty little girl with large blue eyes and wavy golden hair. She shook back her hair and rubbed her face with a hanky.

'Thank you,' she said. 'Can I get Sally my dog now?'

'Not tonight,' said Aunt Fanny. 'You see, you are to sleep in that little camp-bed over in the corner - and I can't let you have your dog here too, because she and Timmy might fight unless we introduce them to one another properly. And there is no time to bother about that tonight. Do you feel hungry now? Would you like some tomato soup and biscuits?'

'Yes, please. I do feel a bit hungry,' said Berta. 'I've been so sick on that awful bumpy boat that I don't expect there's anything left inside me at all!'

'Well, look - you unpack your little night-case, and have a wash in the bathroom if you want to, and then get into your pyjamas,' said Aunt Fanny. 'Then hop into bed and I'll bring you up some soup.'

But one look at the scowling George made her change her mind. Better not leave poor Berta with an angry George on her very first night!

'I think perhaps I won't get the soup myself,' she said. 'George, you go and get it, will you? It's warming up in the saucepan on the stove downstairs. You'll see the little soup-cup on the table, and some biscuits too.'

George got out of bed, still looking very mutinous. She watched Berta shake out a nightdress from her night-case and pursed up her lips.

'She doesn't even wear pyjamas!' she thought. 'What a ninny! And she's had the sauce to bring her own dog, too - spoiled little thing! I wonder where it is? I've a good mind to have a look at it when I'm downstairs.'

But her mother had an idea that George might do that and she went to the door after her. 'George!' she said, warningly, 'I don't want you to open the dog's basket downstairs. I'm not having any dog-fights tonight. I shall put him in Timmy's kennel outside before I go to bed.'

George said nothing but went on downstairs. The soup was just about to boil and she whipped it off the stove at once. She poured it into the little soup-cup, placed it on the saucer, and put some biscuits on the side.

She heard a small whimpering sound, and turned round. It came from a fairly large basket over in the corner. George was terribly tempted to go and undo it - but she knew perfectly well that if the new dog ran upstairs to find its mistress, Timmy would bark and wake everybody up! It wasn't worth risking.

She took up the soup. Berta was now in the camp-bed and looked very cosy. Anne was still sleeping peacefully, quite undisturbed by all that was going on. Timmy had taken the opportunity of jumping off George's bed and had gone to examine this newcomer. He sniffed her delicately, and Berta put out her hand and stroked his head.

'What lovely eyes he's got,' she said. 'But he's a mongrel, isn't he? A sort of mixture-dog.'

'Don't you say anything like that to George,' said Aunt Fanny. 'She adores Timmy. Now - do you feel better? I hope you'll be happy with us, Berta, dear - I am sure you didn't want to come - but your father was so worried. And it will be nice for you to get to know Anne and Georgina before you go to their school next term.'

'Oh - was that Georgina - the one you called George?' said Berta in surprise. 'I wasn't really sure if she was a boy or not. My father told me there were three boys here and one girl - and that's the girl, isn't it - in bed there?'

She pointed to Anne. Aunt Fanny nodded. 'Yes, that's Anne. Your father thought George was a boy, that's why he told you there were three boys and only one girl here, I suppose. The two boys are in the next room.'

'I don't like George very much,' said Berta. 'She doesn't want me here, does she - or my dog?'

'Oh, you'll find George great fun when you get to know her,' said Aunt Fanny. 'Here she comes now with your soup.'

George came in with the soup, and was not at all pleased to see Timmy standing by the camp-bed, being petted by Berta. She set the soup down sharply, and pushed Timmy away.

'Thank you,' said Berta, and took the soup-cup eagerly into her hands. 'What lovely soup!' she said. George got into bed and turned over on her side. She knew she was behaving badly, but the thought of someone daring to bring another dog to live at Kirrin Cottage was more than she could bear.

Timmy leapt up to lie at her feet as usual. Berta looked at this with much approval.

'I'll have Sally on my feet tomorrow!' she said. 'That's an awfully good idea. Pops - that's my father - always let me have Sally in my room, but she had to be in her basket, not on my bed. Tomorrow night she can sleep on my feet, like Timmy does on George's.'

'She will not,' said George, in a fierce voice. 'No dog sleeps in my bedroom except Timmy.'

'Now don't talk any more,' said Aunt Fanny, hurriedly. 'We can settle everything tomorrow when you're not so tired. I'll look after Sally tonight for you, I promise. Lie down now and go to sleep. You look as if you're half asleep already!'

Berta was suddenly overcome with sleep and flopped down into bed. Her eyes closed, but she managed to force them open and look up at George's mother.

'Good night, Aunt Fanny,' she said, sleepily. 'That's what I was to call you, wasn't it? Thank you for being so kind to me.'

She was asleep almost before she had finished speaking. Aunt Fanny took up the soup-cup and went to the door. 'Are you awake, George?' she said.

George lay absolutely still. She knew that her mother was not pleased with her. It would be better to pretend to be fast asleep!

'I am sure you are awake,' said her mother. 'And I hope you are ashamed of yourself. I shall expect you to make up for this silly behaviour in the morning. It is a pity to behave in such a childish manner!'

She went out of the room, closing the door softly. George put out her hand to Timmy. She was ashamed of herself, but she wasn't at all certain that she would behave better in the morning. That silly, sappy girl! Her dog would be as silly as herself, she was sure! And Timmy would simply hate having another dog in the house. He would probably growl and snarl to such a degree that Berta would be forced to send her dog away.

'And a good thing too,' murmured George, as Timmy licked her fingers lovingly. 'You don't want another girl in the house or another dog either, do you Timmy? Especially a girl like that!'

Aunt Fanny saw to Berta's dog, and put her safely into Timmy's kennel outside. It had a little door to it, which could be shut, so the dog was safe there, and would not be able to run out.

She went back into the house, cleared up Berta's belongings a little, for they had been thrown higgledy-piggledy into the room, and then turned out the light.

She went upstairs to bed. Her husband had slept soundly all through Berta's late arrival. He had been very sure that he would wake up and welcome the girl as well as his wife, but he hadn't even stirred!

Aunt Fanny was glad. It was much easier for her to deal with a seasick, frightened girl by herself. She climbed thankfully into bed and lay down with a sigh.

'Oh dear - I don't look forward to the morning! What will happen then, with George in this mood, and two dogs to sort out? Berta seems a nice little thing. Well - perhaps they will all get on better than I think!'

Yes - things wouldn't be too easy in the morning. That was quite certain!

Chapter 5

IN THE MORNING

George was the first to wake up in the morning. She at once remembered the events of the night before and looked across at Berta in the camp-bed. The girl was asleep, her wavy golden hair spread over the pillow. George leaned across Anne's bed and gave her a sharp nudge.

Anne woke up at once and gazed sleepily at George. 'What's the matter, George? Is it time to get up?'

'Look over there,' whispered George, nodding her head towards Berta. Anne turned over and looked. Unlike George she liked the look of Berta. Her sleeping face was pleasant and open, and her mouth turned up, not down. Anne couldn't bear people whose mouths turned down.

'She looks all right,' whispered back Anne. George frowned.

'She howled like anything when she came,' she told Anne. 'She's a real baby. And she's brought a dog!'

'Goodness - Timmy won't like that,' said Anne, startled. 'Where is it?'

'Down in Timmy's kennel,' said George, still whispering. 'I haven't seen it. It was in a closed basket last night and I didn't dare open it in case it tore upstairs and had a row with Tim. But it can't be very big. I expect it's a horrible Peke, or some silly little lap-dog.'

'Pekes aren't horrible,' said Anne. 'They may be small and have funny little pug-noses, but they're awfully brave. Fancy having another dog! I can't think what Timmy will say!'

'It's a pity Berta isn't our kind,' said George. 'Look at her pale face - not a scrap of sun-tan! And she looks weedy, doesn't she? I'm sure she couldn't climb a tree, or row a boat, or...'

'Sh! She's waking up,' said Anne warningly.

Berta yawned and stretched herself. Then she opened her eyes and looked round. At first she had no idea where she was, and then she suddenly remembered. She sat up.

'Hallo!' said Anne, and smiled at her. 'You weren't here when I came to bed last night. I was surprised to see you this morning.'

Berta took an immediate liking to Anne. 'She's got kind eyes,' she thought. 'She's not like the other girl. I like this one!'

She smiled back at Anne. 'Yes - I came in the middle of the night,' she said. 'I came by motor-boat, and the sea was so bumpy that I was frightfully sick. My father didn't come with me but a friend of his did, and he carried me from the boat to Kirrin Cottage. Even my legs felt sea-sick!'

'Bad luck!' said Anne. 'You didn't really enjoy the adventure then!'

'No. I can do without adventures!' said Berta. 'I'm not keen on them. Especially when Pops gets all excited and worried about me - he fusses round me like a hen, dear old Pops. I shall hate being away from him.'

George was listening to all this. Not keen on adventures! Well, a girl like that wouldn't be, of course!

'I'm not very keen on adventures either,' said Anne. 'We've had plenty, goodness knows. I prefer adventures when they're all over!'

George exploded. 'Anne! How can you talk like that! We've had some smashing adventures, and we've enjoyed every one of them. If you feel like that we'll leave you out of the next one.'

Anne laughed. 'You won't! An adventure comes up all of a sudden, like a wind blowing up in the sky, and we're all in it, whether we like it or not. And you know that I like sharing things with you. I say - isn't it time we got up?'

'Yes,' said George, looking at the clock on the mantelpiece. 'Unless Berta wants to have her breakfast in bed? I bet she always does at home.'

'No, I don't. I hate meals in bed,' said Berta. 'I'm going to get up.'

She leapt out of bed and went to the window. Immediately she saw the wide sweep of the bay, sparkling in the morning sun, as blue as cornflowers. The sea-sparkle was reflected into the bedroom, and made it very bright indeed.

'Oh! I wondered why our room was so full of brilliant light,' said Berta. 'Now I know! What a view! Oh, how lovely the sea looks this morning! And what's that little island out there? What a lovely place it looks.'

'That's Kirrin Island,' said George, proudly. 'It belongs to me.'

Berta laughed, thinking that George was joking. 'Belongs to you! I bet you wish it did. It's really wunnerful!'

'Wunnerful!' said George imitating her. 'Can't you say 'wonderful'? It's got a D in the middle, you know.'

'Yes. I'm always being told things like that,' said Berta, still staring out of the window. 'I had an English governess and she tried to make me speak like you do. I do try, because I've got to go to an English school. My, my - I wish that island belonged to me. I wonder if my Pops could buy it.'

George exploded again. 'Buy it! You donkey, I told you it was mine, didn't I?'

Berta turned round in surprise. 'But - you didn't mean it, did you?' she said. 'Yours? But how could it be?'

'It is George's,' said Anne. 'It has always belonged to the Kirrin family. That's Kirrin Island. George's father gave it to her, after an adventure we once had.'

Berta stared at George in awe. 'Great snakes! So it is yours! Aren't you the lucky one! Will you take me to visit it?'

'I'll see,' said George gruffly, glad to have impressed this American girl so much. Getting her 'Pops' to buy the island indeed! George snorted to herself. What next!

A shout came from the next room. It was Julian. 'Hey, you girls! Are you getting up? We're all too late for a bathe before breakfast this morning. Dick and I have only just woken up.'

'Berta's here!' shouted back Anne. 'We'll get dressed, all of us, and then we'll introduce Berta to you.'

'Are they your brothers?' asked Berta. 'I haven't got any. Or sisters either. I shall be pretty scared of them.'

'You won't be scared of Julian and Dick,' said Anne, proudly. 'You'll wish you had brothers like them. Won't she, George?'

'Yes,' said George, shortly. She was feeling rather annoyed just then because Timmy was standing by Berta, wagging his plummy tail. 'Come here, Timmy. Don't make a nuisance of yourself.'

'Oh, he's not,' said Berta, and patted his big head. 'I like him. He seems simply ENORMOUS after my Sally. But you'll love Sally, George, you really will. Everyone says how sweet she is - and I've trained her beautifully.'

George took no interest in these remarks at all. She flounced off to wash in the bath-room, but Julian and Dick were there, and there was a lot of yelling and shouting as George tried to make them hurry up and get out. Berta laughed.

'That sounds nice and family-like,' she said. 'You don't get that sort of thing if you're an only child. What do I wear here?'

'Oh - something very simple,' said Anne, looking at the suitcase open on the floor, showing a collection of Berta's clothes. 'That shirt and those jeans will do.'

They were ready just as the gong rang for breakfast. A delicious smell of frying bacon and tomatoes came up the stairs, and Berta sniffed in delight.

'I do like English breakfast,' she said. 'We haven't gotten around to a proper breakfast in America yet! That's bacon and tomatoes I smell, isn't it? My English governess always said that bacon and eggs made the best breakfast in the world, but I guess the one we're going to have will taste pretty good.'

Uncle Quentin was at the table when the children came down. He looked most surprised to see Berta, having quite forgotten that she was coming. 'Who's this?' he said.

'Now Quentin - don't pretend you don't know!' said his wife. 'It's Elbur's girl - your friend Elbur. She came in the middle of the night, but I didn't wake you, you were so sound asleep.'

'Ah yes,' said Uncle Quentin, and he shook hands with the rather scared Berta. 'Glad to have you here, er - let me see now - what's your name?'

'Berta,' said everyone in a chorus.

'Yes, yes - Berta. Sit down, my dear. I know your father well. He's doing some wonderful work.'

Berta beamed. 'He's always at work!' she said. 'He works all through the night sometimes.'

'Does he? Well, what a thing to do!' said Uncle Quentin.

'It's a thing you often do yourself, Quentin,' said his wife, pouring out coffee. 'Though I don't suppose you even realize it.'

Uncle Quentin looked surprised. 'Do I really? Bless us all! Don't I go to bed some nights then?' Berta laughed. 'You're like my Pops! Sometimes he doesn't know what day of the week it is, even! And yet he's supposed to be one of the cleverest guys in the world!'

'Guy?' said Uncle Quentin, surprised, immediately thinking of Firework Night. Everyone laughed. Anne patted her uncle's knee. 'It's all right, Uncle,' she said, 'he's not going to sit on the top of a bonfire!'

But Uncle Quentin was not listening. He had suddenly seen a letter marked 'IMPORTANT' on the top of his pile of correspondence, and he picked it up.

'Well, unless I'm much mistaken, here's a letter from your father,' he said to Berta. 'I'll see what he says.'

He opened the letter and read it to himself. Then he looked up. 'It's all about you - er - er...'

'Her name's Berta,' said Aunt Fanny, patiently.

'About you, Berta,' said Uncle Quentin. 'But I must say your father has some very strange ideas. Yes, very strange.'

'What are they?' asked his wife.

'Well - he says she must be disguised - in case anyone comes to find her here,' said Uncle Quentin. 'And he wants her name changed - and, bless us all, he wants us to buy her boys' clothes - and cut her hair short - and dress her up as a boy!'

Everyone listened in surprise. Berta gave a little squeal.

'I won't! I WON'T be dressed up as a boy! I won't have my hair cut off. Don't you dare to make me! I WON'T!'

Chapter 6

A FEW UPSETS

Berta looked so upset that Aunt Fanny acted quickly and firmly. 'Don't bother about that letter now, Quentin,' she said. 'We'll go through it afterwards and decide what to do. Let's have our breakfast in peace.'

'I won't have my hair cut off,' said Berta, again. Uncle Quentin was not used to being defied openly like this, and he scowled. He looked at his wife.

'Surely you are not going to let this - er what's her name now - Bertha...'

'Berta,' said everyone automatically.

'I said that we would not discuss this till after breakfast,' said Aunt Fanny, in the kind of voice that made everyone, including Uncle Quentin, quite certain that she meant what she said. Her husband folded up the letter and opened the next one, frowning. The children looked at one another.

Berta to be a boy! Goodness! If ever anyone looked less like a boy it was Berta! George was most annoyed. She loved to dress like a boy, but she didn't feel inclined to urge anyone else to! She looked at Berta, who was eating her breakfast with tears in her eyes. What a baby! She wouldn't even look like a boy, if she was dressed in boys' clothes. She would just look absolutely silly.

Julian began a conversation with his aunt about the garden. She was grateful to him for breaking up the sudden awkwardness caused by the letter. She was very fond of Julian. 'I can always depend on him,' she thought, and talked gladly of the garden fruit, and who would pick the raspberries for lunch and whether the wasps would eat all the plums or not!

Dick joined in, and Anne, and soon Berta did too. Only George and her father remained gloomy. They both looked so exactly alike in solemn, rather frowning expressions that Julian nudged Dick and nodded towards them.

Dick grinned. 'Like father, like daughter!' he said. 'Cheer up, George. Don't you like your breakfast?'

George was just about to answer crossly when Anne gave an exclamation. 'Oh, look at Uncle Quentin! He's putting mustard on his toast - Aunt Fanny, stop him - he's just going to eat it!'

Everyone roared with laughter. Aunt Fanny managed to smack her husband's hand down from his mouth, just as he was putting his toast and mustard up to it, reading a letter at the same time.

'Hey - what's the matter?' he said, startled.

'Quentin - that's the second time this month you've spread your toast with mustard instead of with marmalade,' said his wife. 'Do have a little sense.'

After that everyone became very cheerful. Uncle Quentin laughed at himself, and George saw the funny side and laughed loudly too, which made Timmy bark, and Berta giggled. Aunt Fanny was quite relieved that her husband had done such a silly thing.

'Do you remember when Father poured custard all over his fried fish once?' George said, entering into the talk for the first time. 'And he said it was the best egg-sauce he had ever tasted?' The conversation was very animated after that, and Aunt Fanny felt happier. 'You girls can clear away and wash up the breakfast things for Joan,' she said. 'Or two of you can and the other can make the beds with me.'

'What about my little dog?' said Berta, suddenly remembering her again. 'I haven't seen her yet, because I was only just in time for breakfast. Where is she?'

'You can go and get her now,' said Aunt Fanny. 'We've all finished. Are you going to start your work, Quentin?'

'Yes, I am,' said her husband. 'So I don't want any yelling or shouting or barking outside my study door.'

He got up and went out of the room. Berta stood up too. 'Where's the kennel?' she said.

'I'll show you,' said Anne. 'We'll go and get your dog and introduce it to Timmy. Coming, George?'

'You can bring the dog in here, and we'll see what Timmy says,' said George, going all gloomy again. 'If he doesn't like the dog - and he won't - it will have to live out in the kennel.'

'Oh no,' said Berta, at once.

'Well, you don't want Timmy to eat it, do you?' said George. 'He's very jealous of other dogs in the house. He might go for yours and savage it.'

'Oh no!' said Berta, again, looking upset. 'Timmy's nice. He's not a fierce dog.'

'That's all you know!' said George. 'Well, I've warned you.'

'Come on,' said Anne, pulling at Berta's sleeve. 'Let's go and fetch Sally. She must be wondering why nobody bothers about her. I bet Timmy won't mind terribly.'

As soon as the two had gone out, George spoke in Timmy's ear. 'You don't like strange dogs who want to come and live here, do you, Tim? You'll growl and snarl like anything, won't you? Growl your very fiercest! I know you won't bite but if you could just growl your loudest, that will be enough. Berta will make that Sally-dog live out of doors then!'

Soon she heard footsteps returning, and Anne's voice exclaiming in delight.

'Oh, she's sweet! Oh, what a darling! Sally, you're a pet! Julian, Dick, Aunt Fanny - do come and see Berta's dog!'

Everyone came into the room, led by Berta and Anne. Berta held the dog in her arms.

It was a tiny black poodle, whose woolly fur was cut away here and there to give it a very fashionable look. Sally was certainly an attractive little thing! Her sharp little nose sniffed all the time she was carried into the room, and her quick little eyes looked everywhere.

Berta put her down, and the little poodle stood there, poised on her dainty feet like a ballet dancer about to perform. Everyone but George exclaimed in delight.

'She's a poppet!'

'Sally! Sally, you're a pet!'

'Oh, a poodle! I do love poodles! They look so knowing.'

Timmy stood by George, sniffing hard to get the smell of this new dog. George had her hand on his collar in case he sprang. His tail was as stiff as a ramrod.

The poodle suddenly saw him. She stared at him out of bright little eyes, quite unafraid. Then she pulled away from Berta's hand and trotted right over to Timmy, her funny little tail wagging merrily.

Timmy backed a little in surprise. The poodle danced all round him on her toes, and a little whimpering bark, which said as plainly as possible, I want to play with you!

Timmy sprang. He leapt in the air and came down with a thud on his big paws, and the little poodle dodged. Timmy's tail began to wag wildly. He sprang again in play, and almost knocked the little poodle over. He barked as if to say 'Sorry, I didn't mean that!'

Then he and the poodle played a most ridiculous game of dodge and run, and although one or two chairs went flying nobody minded - they were all laughing so much at the sight of the quick little poodle leading Timmy such a dance.

At last Sally was tired and sat down in a corner. Timmy pranced about in front of her, showing off. Then he went up to her and sniffed her nose. He licked it gently, and then lay down in front of her, gazing at her adoringly.

Anne gave a little squeal of laughter. 'He's gazing at Sally exactly as he gazes at you, George!' she cried.

But George was not at all pleased. In fact she was quite astounded. To think that Timmy should welcome another dog! To think that he should behave like this when she had told him to do the opposite!

'Aren't they sweet together?' said Berta, pleased. 'I thought Timmy would like Sally. Of course Sally is a pedigree dog, and cost a lot of money - and Timmy's only a mongrel. I expect he thinks she's wunnerful.'

'Oh, Tim may be a mongrel, but he's absolutely wunnerful too,' said Dick, hastily, pronouncing the word like Berta, to try and get a laugh. He saw George's scowl, and knew how cross she felt at hearing her beloved Timmy compared with a pedigree dog. 'He's a magnificent fellow, aren't you, Timmy?' went on Dick. 'Sally may be a darling, but you're worth more than a hundred darlings, aren't you?'

'I think he's beautiful,' said Berta, looking down at Timmy. 'He's got the loveliest eyes I ever did see.'

George began to feel a little better. She called Timmy. 'You're making rather a fool of yourself,' she said to him.

'Now that Timmy and Sally are going to be friends, can I have Sally to sleep on my bed at night, like George has Timmy?' said Berta. 'Please say yes, Aunt Fanny.'

'No,' said George at once. 'Mother, I won't have that. I won't!'

'Well, we'll see what we can do about it,' said her mother. 'Sally was quite happy in the kennel last night, I must say.'

'I'm going to have her sleep with me,' said Berta, scowling at George. 'My father will pay you a lot of money to make me happy. He told me he would.'

'Don't be silly, Berta,' said Aunt Fanny, firmly. 'This isn't a question of money. Now, leave this for a little while, please, and go and do your jobs, all of you. And then we must consider your father's letter, Berta, and see exactly what he wants done. We must certainly try to follow his advice about you.'

'But I don't want to...' began Berta, and then felt a firm hand on her arm. It was Julian.

'Come on, kid,' he said. 'Be your age! Remember you're a guest here and put on a few of your best manners. We like American children - but not spoilt ones!'

Berta had quite a shock to hear Julian speaking like this. She looked up at him and he grinned down at her. She felt near tears, but she smiled back.

'You haven't any brothers to keep you in your place,' said Julian, linking his arm in hers. 'Well, from now on, while you're here, Dick and I are your brothers, and you've got to toe the line, just like Anne. See? What about it?'

Berta felt that there was nothing in the world she would like better than having Julian for a brother! He was big and tall and had twinkling kindly eyes that made Berta feel he was as responsible and trustable as her father.

Aunt Fanny smiled to herself. Julian always knew the best thing to say and do. Now he would take Berta in hand and see that she didn't upset the household too much. She was glad. It wasn't easy to run a big family like this, with a scientist husband to cope with, unless everyone pulled together!

'You go and help Aunt Fanny with the beds,' said Julian to Berta. 'And take your Sally-dog with you. She's great! But so is Timmy, and don't you forget it!'

Chapter 7

A LITTLE CONFERENCE

Peace reigned in the house for a little while. George and Anne went to help the cook with the washing-up. Joan was pleased, because with eight people in the house, including herself, there was a lot to do.

She had been very astonished that morning to find a fifth child added to the household, but had been told that after breakfast she could go into the sitting-room and hear an explanation. Joan must certainly be in the secret too!

Upstairs Berta was helping with the beds - not very successfully because she was not used to doing things for herself. But she was very willing to learn and Aunt Fanny was quite pleased with her. Timmy and Sally darted about together and made things rather more difficult than they need have been, popping under beds and out again at top speed.

'I'm glad Timmy likes Sally,' said Berta. 'I knew he would. I can't think why George thought he wouldn't. George is funny, I think.'

'Not really,' said Aunt Fanny. 'She hasn't any brothers or sisters to rub off her corners, and she didn't even know her three cousins till a few years ago, or go to school. Lonely people aren't so easy to get on with as others - but she is great fun now, as you will soon find out.'

'I'm an only child too,' said Berta. 'But I've always had plenty of other children to play with. My Pops saw to that. He's wunnerful - I mean wonDERful. I'll say that word 'wonDERful' twenny times, then maybe, I'll get it right.'

'Well, say the word 'twenty' as well!' said Aunt Fanny. 'It has a letter T at the end as well as at the beginning, you know. It's 'twenTY' not 'twenny'. But don't make yourself too English. It's nice to have a change!'

'WonDERful, wonDERful, wonDERful! TwenTY, twenTY!' chanted Berta, as she made the beds. Dick looked into the room and chuckled.

'Great snakes!' he said, with a grin, and an American accent. 'You shore are wunnerful, baby!'

'Don't be so silly, Dick,' said his aunt, laughing. 'Now - I think we've finished all we have to do, Berta. We'll go downstairs and have a conference. Tell the others, will you?'

Berta, followed closely by Sally, who was also followed closely by an adoring Timmy, went to tell Dick and Julian, and then George and Anne. George was not too pleased with Timmy.

'Where have you been?' she said. 'Can't you stop running about after Sally? She'll get very very tired of you!'

'Wuff!' said Sally, in a high little bark, not at all like Timmy's deep 'Woof!'

Soon all five children and the two dogs, and also Joan, were in the sitting-room with Aunt Fanny. Berta began to look a little nervous. Aunt Fanny had the letter that Berta's father had sent. She did not read it out to the children, but told them what was in it. She also explained to Joan about Berta.

'Joan, you have always known what important work the master does,' she said. 'Well, Miss Berta's father does the same kind of work in America, and he and the master are working on a great new scheme together.'

'Oh yes, Mam,' said Joan, very much interested.

'Berta's father has been warned by the police that it is possible Berta may be kidnapped and held to ransom, not for money, but for the scientific secrets that he knows,' went on Aunt Fanny. 'So she has been sent to us to be kept safe for three weeks. By that time the scheme will be finished and made public. Berta is going to the same school as Miss Anne and Miss George, and it is a good idea to let them know one another first.'

Joan nodded. 'I understand that, Mam,' she said. 'I think we can keep Miss Berta safe, don't you?'

'Yes,' said Aunt Fanny. 'But her father has now put up some further ideas that he wants us to follow. He says it would be best to disguise her as a boy...'

'Jolly good idea,' interrupted Dick.

'And to give her another name - a boy's name,' said Aunt Fanny. 'He wants her to have her hair cut short and...'

'Oh please not that!' begged Berta, shaking back her fair, wavy hair. 'I'd hate it. Girls with short hair like boys look so silly, they...'

Anne nudged her and frowned. Berta stopped hurriedly, remembering that George had curly hair cut as short as any boy.

'I think we'll have to do what your father says,' said Aunt Fanny. 'This is very important, Berta. You see, if anyone should come here looking for you, thinking of kidnapping, they would never recognize you if you were looking exactly like a boy.'

'But my hair,' said Berta, almost in tears. 'How could Pops say I'm to have my hair off? He always said it was wunnerful!'

Nobody liked to point out that there was a D in wonderful just then! Berta was really so very upset about her hair.

'Your hair will grow quickly enough,' said Aunt Fanny.

'Her head's a good shape,' said Julian, looking at it consideringly. 'She should look nice with short hair.'

Berta cheered up. If Julian thought that, then it wouldn't be so bad.

'But what about clothes?' she said, remembering this point with a look of horror. 'Girls look frightful in boy's clothes. Pops always said so till now.'

'You won't look any worse than George does,' said Dick. 'She's got on a boy's jersey, boy's jeans and boy's shoes this very minute!'

'I think she looks awful,' said Berta, obstinately, and George scowled.

'Well, I think you'd look horrible,' she said. 'You wouldn't even look like a boy, you'd look little-girlish, silly little sissy-boy. I think it's a fat-headed idea to put you into boys' clothes!'

'Aha! Our George wants to be the only one!' said Dick, slyly, and quickly got out of the way of a punch from the furious George.

'Well,' said Julian, 'I'll go out and buy some things for Berta this morning, so that's settled. What about her hair? Shall I cut it short?'

Aunt Fanny was amused at Julian's high-handed way of dealing with Berta and her troubles, and even more amused to see that Berta did not even argue with Julian.

'You can certainly go shopping for Berta if you like,' she said. 'But I'd rather you didn't cut her hair. You'd make her look a scarecrow!'

'I don't mind if Julian cuts it,' said Berta, surprisingly meek all at once.

'I shall cut it for you myself,' said Aunt Fanny. 'Now - what about a boy's name? We can't call you Berta any more, that's certain.'

'I'd rather not have a boy's name,' said Berta. 'It's silly for a girl to be called by a boy's name, like George.'

'If you mean to be rude to me, I'll ...' began George, but got no farther. Julian and Dick had burst into laughter.

'Oh George - you and Berta will be the death of us!' said Julian. 'Here are you doing all you can to pretend to be a boy - and here is Berta doing all she can to get out of it? For goodness' sake, let's settle the matter without any more bickering. We'll call Berta Robert.'

'No - that's too like Berta,' said Dick. 'It ought to be a completely different name. We'll call her a good plain boy's name like Jim or Tom or John.'

'No,' said Berta. 'I don't like any of them. Let me have my second name, please.'

'What's that? Another girl's name?' asked Julian.

'Yes. But it's used for a boy too, only then it's spelt differently,' said Berta. 'It's Lesley. It's a nice name, I think.'

'Lesley. Yes - it rather suits you,' said Julian. 'It suits you better than Berta. We'll call you Lesley - and people will think it's Leslie spelt l-i-e at the end, and not l-e-y. All right. Everything's settled.'

'Not quite,' said his aunt. 'I just want to say that you mustn't let Berta - I mean Lesley - out of your sight at all. And you must report at once any mysterious happening or any stranger you see. The local police here know that we have Lesley with us, and why - and anything can be reported to them at once. They also are keeping a good look-out, of course.'

'This almost sounds as if we're in the middle of an adventure!' said Dick, looking pleased.

'I hope not,' said his aunt. 'I don't imagine that anyone will ever guess Berta - I mean Lesley - is anything more than she will appear to be - a boy friend of yours and Julian's, come to stay for a while. Dear me, it's going to be difficult to refer to HER and HIM all the time!'

'It certainly is,' said Julian, standing up. 'If you'll give me some money, Aunt Fanny, I'll go and do a little shopping for Lesley. What size do you think HE needs?'

Everyone laughed. 'HE wears size three shoes,' said Joan, smiling. 'I noticed that this morning.'

'And HE will have to get used to doing his coat buttons up on the right-hand side instead of on the left,' said Anne, joining in the fun.

'SHE will soon get used to that?' said George. 'Won't SHE, Timmy?'

'Don't spoil it all now, George,' said Julian. 'A slip of the tongue, saying SHE instead of HE, might lead to danger for her - I mean Lesley.'

'Yes, I know,' said George. 'It's just that she'll never look like a boy, and...'

'I don't want to look like a boy,' said Berta. 'I think you look...'

'Here we go again!' said Julian. 'Stop it, Lesley, stop it, George. George, you'd better come out and help me to get the things for Lesley. Come on. And take that scowl off your face. You look like a sulky girl!'

That made George alter her face at once. She couldn't help grinning at the artful Julian.

'I'm coming,' she said, 'Good-bye, Berta. When we come back, you'll be Leslie, haircut and all!'

She and Julian went off. Anne fetched her aunt's sharpest scissors and draped a big towel round Berta's shoulders. Berta looked as if she was going to cry.

'Cheer up,' said Dick. 'You're going to look angelic with short hair! Begin, Aunt Fanny. Let's see what she's like with shorn locks.'

'Sit quite still,' said Aunt Fanny and began. Clip-clip-clip! The wavy golden hair fell to the floor in big strands and Berta began to weep in earnest. 'My hair! I can't bear this. Oh, my hair!'

Soon most of it was on the floor, and Aunt Fanny began to clip what was left as best she could, to make it look as boyish as possible. She made a very good job of it indeed. Dick and Anne watched with the greatest interest.

'There! It's done!' said Aunt Fanny at last. 'Stop crying, Lesley - and let's have a look at you!'

Chapter 8
A TRANSFORMATION

Berta stood in the middle of the floor, blinking her tears away. Anne gave a gasp.

'You know - it's very odd - but she does look rather like a boy - a very, very good-looking boy!'

'An angelic boy,' said Dick. 'A choirboy or something. She looks smashing! Who would have thought it?'

Aunt Fanny was very struck with Berta's appearance too. 'It's certainly very odd,' she said. 'But there's no doubt about it - when she's - I mean he's - dressed in boy's clothes, he'll make a fine boy. Better than George, actually, because her hair's really too curly for a boy.'

Berta went to the looking-glass on the wall. She gave a wail. 'I look awful! I don't know myself! Nobody would EVER recognize me!'

'Splendid!' said Dick, at once. 'You've hit the nail right on the head. Nobody would recognize you now. Your father was quite right to say, cut your hair off and dress up as a boy. Any prowling kidnapper would never think you were Berta, the pretty little girl.'

'I'd rather be kidnapped than look like this,' wept Berta. 'What will the girls at your school say, Anne, when they see me?'

'They don't say anything to George about her short hair, and they won't say anything to you,' said Anne.

'Stop crying, Bert - er - Lesley,' said Aunt Fanny. 'You make me feel quite miserable. You've been very good to stand so still all that time. Now I really must think of a little reward for you.'

Berta stopped crying at once. 'Please,' she said, 'there's only one thing I want now. I want Sally-dog to sleep with me.'

'Oh dear, Ber - er Lesley - I really can't have another dog in that little bedroom,' said poor Aunt Fanny. 'And George would make things most unpleasant if I did.'

'Aunt Fanny - Sally is a very very good guard for me,' said Berta. 'She barks at the very slightest sound. I'd feel safe with her in the bedroom.'

'I'd like you to have her,' said Aunt Fanny, 'but...'

Joan had come into the room to put away some things and had heard the conversation. She stared in admiration at Berta's neat golden head, and then made a suggestion. 'If you'll excuse me, Mam,' she said, 'Miss Berta could have her camp-bed in my room. I don't mind the dog a bit, she can have her and welcome, he's a pet, that little poodle. It's very crowded in the girls' room now, with three beds in it, and my room's a nice big one. So, if Miss Berta doesn't mind sharing it, she's welcome.'

'Oh Joan - that's good of you,' said Aunt Fanny, relieved at such a simple solution. 'Also, your room is up in the attic - it would be very difficult for kidnappers to find their way there - and nobody would think of looking into your room for one of the children.'

'Thank you, Joan, you're just wunnerful!' said Berta, in delight. 'Sally, do you hear that? You'll be sleeping on my feet tonight, like Timmy does on George's.'

'I don't really approve of that, you know, Berta,' said Aunt Fanny. 'Oh dear - I called you Berta again. Lesley, I mean. What a muddle I'm going to get into! Anne, get the dustpan and sweep up the hair on the floor.'

When Julian and George came back there was no sign of the golden hair on the floor. They put their parcels down on the table and shouted for Aunt Fanny. 'Mother!' called George. 'Aunt Fanny!' shouted Julian.

She came running downstairs with Berta and Anne and Dick. Julian and George looked at Berta, thunderstruck. 'Gosh - is it really you, Berta?' said Julian. 'I simply don't recognize you!'

'Why - you do look like a boy!' said George. 'I never thought you would.'

'A jolly good-looking boy,' said Julian. 'Well, your father was right. It's the best disguise you could have!'

'Where are the clothes?' asked Berta, rather pleased at all the interest in her looks. They opened the parcels and pulled out the things.

They were not really very exciting - a boy's blazer in navy blue, two pairs of boy's jeans, two grey jerseys, a few shirts, a tie and a pull-over without sleeves.

'And shoes and socks,' said George. 'But we decided you'd got plenty of socks that would do, so we only bought one pair of those. Oh - and here's a boy's grey felt hat in case the sun's too hot - and a cap!'

Berta put on the cap at once. There were squeals of laughter from everyone. 'It suits her! She's got it on at just the right angle. She looks a real boy!'

'You put it on, George,' said Berta, and George took it, eager to share in the admiration. But it looked ridiculous on her curls, and wouldn't sit down flat as it should. Everyone hooted.

'It makes you look a girl! Take it off!'

George took it off in disappointment. How very aggravating that this girl Berta should make a better boy than she did! She threw the cap on the table, half-cross that they had bought it.

'Go upstairs and put some of the things on,' said Aunt Fanny, amused at all these goings-on. Up went Berta obediently, and soon came down again, neatly arrayed in jeans, grey shirt and blue tie.

Everyone roared with laughter. Berta was now quite enjoying herself and paraded round the room, her cap tilted on one side of her head.

'She looks like a very tidy, neat little boy, a good and most angelic child!' said Julian. 'Dear Lesley, you must get yourself just a little dirty - you look too good to be true.'

'I don't like getting dirty,' said Berta. 'I think...'

But what she thought nobody knew because at that moment the door opened and Uncle Quentin came into the room.

'I'd like to know how you think I can do my work with all this hooting and cackling going on,' he began, and then he suddenly saw Berta, and stopped.

'Who's this?' he said, looking Berta up and down.

'Don't you know, Father?' said George.

'Of course not. Never seen him in my life before!' said her father. 'Don't tell me it's somebody else come to stay.'

'It's Berta,' said Anne, with a giggle.

'Berta - now who's Berta?' said Uncle Quentin, frowning. 'I seem to have heard that name before.'

'The girl you thought might be kidnapped,' explained Dick.

'Oh Berta - Elbur's girl!' said Uncle Quentin, 'I remember her all right. But who's this? This boy? I've never seen him before. What's your name, boy?'

'Lesley,' said Berta. 'But I was Berta when you saw me at breakfast.'

'Good heavens!' said Uncle Quentin amazed. 'What a - what a transformation! Why, your own father wouldn't know you. I hope I remember who you are. Keep reminding me, if I don't.'

Off he went, back to his study. The children laughed, and Aunt Fanny had to laugh too.

'By the way,' she said, 'I want you all to have lunch at home today, because it's really too late now to start making sandwiches for a picnic; it's only cold ham and salad, so don't get too hungry, will you?'

'Is there time for a bathe?' asked Julian, looking at his watch.

'Yes - if you'll come in about twelve o'clock and pick the fruit for a pudding for lunch,' said his aunt. 'It takes ages to pick enough for eight people, and Joan and I have a lot to do today.'

'Right. We'll go for a bathe now, and then we'll ALL pick fruit,' said Julian. 'Bags I pick the plums. The raspberries are such fiddley little things.'

'Have you a swim-suit, Berta, I mean Lesley?' asked George.

'Yes. It's an absolutely plain one, like a boy's, so I'll be all right in it,' said Berta. 'Hurray, I shan't need to wear a cap. Boys never do.'

Berta's cases were now all in Joan's big room and she ran to get into her swim-suit.

'Bring your blazer and a towel,' yelled George, and went into her own room with Anne.

'I bet Berta can't swim,' she said. 'That will be a pity, because most boys swim well. We'll have to teach her.'

'Well, don't duck her too often!' said Anne, seeing a look in George's eye that was not too kindly.

'Blow - my swim-suit isn't here - I'm sure I brought it in from the clothes-line.'

It took quite a while to find it, and the boys and Berta had already gone down to the beach with Sally by the time Anne and George were ready to follow with the impatient Timmy.

They were down on the beach at last, and there was Sally-dog guarding the blazers belonging to Julian, Dick and Berta. She was lying on them, and she even dared to growl at Timmy when he came near.

George laughed. 'Growl back, Timmy! Don't let a little snippet like that cheek you. Growl back!' But Timmy wouldn't. He just sat down out of reach of Sally, and looked at her sadly. Wasn't she friends with him any more?

'Where are the others?' said Anne, shading her eyes from the glare of the sun and looking out to sea. 'Goodness, how far out they've swum! That can't be Berta with them, surely!'

George looked out over the stretch of blue sea at once. She saw three heads bobbing. Yes, Berta was out there!

'She must be a jolly good swimmer,' said Anne, admiringly. 'I couldn't swim out as far as that. We were wrong about Berta. She swims like a fish!'

George said nothing. She ran to the waves, plunged through a big one just as it was curling over, and swam out strongly. She couldn't believe that it was Berta out there! And if it was, the boys must be helping her!

But it was Berta. Her golden head glistened wet in the water, and she shouted in glee as she swam.

'This is great! This is wunnerful! Gee, I'm enjoying this! Hi there, George - isn't the water warm?'

Julian and Dick grinned round at the panting George. 'Lesley's a fine swimmer,' said Dick. 'Gosh, I thought she was going to race me at one time. She'd beat you, George!'

'She wouldn't,' said George, but all the same she didn't challenge Berta to race!

It was fun to be five, fun to chase one another in the sea, to swim under the water and grab somebody's leg. And Anne laughed till she choked when she saw somebody heave themselves out of the water right on to George's back, and duck her well and truly.

It was Berta! And what was more, the angry George couldn't catch her afterwards. Berta could swim much too fast!

Chapter 9

A SUDDEN TELEPHONE CALL

Berta soon settled down happily with the Five. George couldn't bear to think that the girl had to be dressed like a boy, but her jealousy wore off a little as the days went by - though she couldn't help feeling annoyed that Berta proved to be such a good swimmer!

She could dive well too, and swim under water even longer than the boys could, much to their surprise.

'Oh well, you see, back home, we've got a pool in our garden,' she said. 'A wonDERful pool, gee, you should see it. And I learnt to swim in it when I was two. Pops always called me a water-baby.'

Berta ate just as much as the others, although she was not so sturdy and well built. She was loud in her praise of the meals, and this pleased Aunt Fanny and Joan very much.

'You're getting fatter, Lesley,' said Aunt Fanny a week later, looking at her as she sat eating her lunch with the others. 'And what is better still - you're getting a really good sun-tan. You're almost as brown as the others!'

'Yes. I thought so too,' said Berta, pleased.

'It's a good thing you caught the sun so easily,' said Aunt Fanny. 'Now, if any kidnappers come round looking for a long-haired pale-faced American girl, they would take one look at the lot of you and off they would go! Nobody would guess you were Berta!'

'All the same, I'd much rather be Berta,' said Berta. 'I still don't like pretending to be a boy. It's silly, and it makes me feel silly. Anyway, thank goodness my hair's growing a bit longer. I don't look quite so much like a boy now!'

'Dear me, you're right,' said Aunt Fanny, and everyone looked at Berta. 'I shall have to cut it short again.'

'Gosh!' said Berta, 'why did I say that? You wouldn't have noticed if I hadn't mentioned it. Let it grow again, please, Aunt Fanny. I've been here a week and there isn't even a smell of a kidnapper - and I reckon there won't be either!'

But Aunt Fanny was firm about the hair, and after the meal she made Berta stand still while she clipped it a little shorter. It was not a bit curly like George's, and now that it was short, the wave had almost gone from it. She really did look like a good clean little boy!

'Rather a wishy-washy one!' said George, unkindly, but everyone knew what she meant.

Sally the poodle was a great success. Even George couldn't go on disliking the happy, dancing little dog. She trotted and capered about on her slim little legs, and Timmy was her adoring slave. 'She always looks as if she's running about on tiptoe,' said Anne, and so she did. She made friends with everyone, even the paper-boy, who was really scared of dogs.

Uncle Quentin was the only one who didn't get used to Berta and Sally. When he met them together, Berta so like a small boy, Sally at her heels, he stopped and stared.

'Now let me see - who are you?' he said. 'Yes - you're Berta!'

'No - he's LESLEY!' everyone would say.

'You must not call her Berta, dear,' said his wife. 'You really must not. It's a funny thing that you never could remember she was Berta, and now that we've made her into Lesley, you immediately remember she's Berta!'

'Well, I must say you've made her look exactly like a boy,' said Uncle Quentin, much to George's annoyance. George was beginning to be afraid that Berta looked more boyish than she did! 'Well, I hope you're having a good time with the others, er - er...'

'Lesley is the name,' said Aunt Fanny with a little laugh. 'Quentin, do try and remember.'

Another day passed peacefully by, and the five children and two dogs were out of doors all day long, swimming, boating, exploring, really enjoying themselves.

Berta wanted to go over to Kirrin Island, but George kept making excuses not to go. 'Don't be mean,' said Dick. 'We all want to go. It's ages since we went. It's just that you don't want to let Lesley do something she'd like to do!'

'It isn't,' said George. 'Perhaps we'll go tomorrow.'

But when tomorrow came something happened that upset their plans for going to Kirrin Island. A telephone call came for Uncle Quentin, and immediately he was in a panic.

'Fanny! Fanny, where are you?' he called. 'Pack my bag at once. At once, do you hear?'

His wife came running down the stairs at top speed. 'Quentin, why? What's happened?'

'Elbur's found a mistake in our calculations,' said Uncle Quentin. 'What nonsense! There's no mistake. None at all.'

'But why can't he come here and work it out with you?' asked his wife. 'Why have you got to rush off like this? Tell him to come here, Quentin. I'll find him a bed somehow.'

'He says he doesn't want to, while his daughter - his daughter - what's her name now?'

'Lesley,' said his wife. 'All right, don't bother to explain. I see now that it would be foolish for him to come while Lesley's here - she'd be calling him Pops, and...'

'Pops?' said her husband, startled. 'What do you mean - Pops?'

'It's what she calls her father, dear,' said Aunt Fanny, patiently. 'Anyway, he's quite right. It would be foolish to hide Lesley here so well, and then have everyone hear her calling him Pops, and him calling her Berta - if any kidnappers followed him, they would soon find out where his daughter was - here, with our four!'

'Yes - that's what I was trying to tell you,' said her husband, impatiently. 'Anyway I must go to Elbur straightaway. So pack my bag, please. I'll be back in two days' time.'

'In that case I'll go with you, Quentin,' said his wife. 'I could do with a quiet two days - and you're not much good when you're alone, are you - losing your socks, and forgetting to have your shoes cleaned, and...'

Her husband gave a sudden smile that lighted up his face and made him seem quite young. 'Will you really come with me? I thought you'd hate to leave the children.'

'It's only for two days,' said his wife. 'And Joan is very good with them. I'll arrange that they shall go out on all-day picnics in the boat - they'll be quite safe then. If any kidnappers were around they'd find it difficult to snatch Lesley out of a boat! But I'm beginning not to believe that tale of Elbur's. He just got into a panic when he heard the rumour, I expect.'

The children were told of the sudden decision when they got back to lunch that day. Joan had to tell them, because Aunt Fanny and her husband had already departed, complete with two suitcases, one containing precious papers and the other clothes for two days.

'Gosh!' said Julian, surprised. 'I hope nothing horrid's happened.'

'Oh no - it was just a sudden telephone call from Master Lesley's father,' said Joan, smiling at Berta. 'He had to see your uncle in a hurry - about some figures.'

'Why didn't Pops come down here - then he could have seen me?' demanded Berta at once.

'Because everyone would have known who you are, then,' said Dick. 'We're hiding you, don't forget!'

'Oh yes - well I do believe I had forgotten,' said Berta, rather surprised at herself. 'It's so lovely down here in Kirrin with you all. The days seem to swim by!'

'Your mother said you had better go off on all-day picnics in the boat,' said Joan to George. 'That was to make things easy for me, of course. But I don't mind what you do - you can come back to lunch each day, if you like.'

'I do so like you, Joan!' said Berta, giving the surprised cook a sudden hug. 'You're a real honey!'

'In fact, she's quite wunnerful!' said Dick. 'It's all right, Joan - we'll go out for the mid day meal, and for tea, till my aunt comes back. And we'll make the sandwiches and pack up everything ourselves.'

'Well, that's nice of you,' said Joan. 'Why don't you go across to Kirrin Island for the day? Master Lesley keeps wanting to go.'

Berta grinned at Joan. It always struck her as extremely funny to be called Master Lesley, and Joan never once forgot.

'We'll go if the boat is ready,' said George, rather reluctantly. 'You know James is mending one of the row-locks. We'll go and see if it's finished.'

They all went to see, but James was not there. His father was working on another boat, over by the jetty, and he called to them.

'Do you want my James? He's gone off in his uncle's boat for a day's fishing. He said to tell you the row-lock's not mended yet, but he'll do it for certain tonight when he comes back.'

'Right. Thank you,' called back Julian. Berta looked very disappointed. 'Cheer up,' he said. 'We'll be able to go tomorrow.'

'We shan't,' said Berta, mournfully. 'Something else will happen to prevent us - or George will think of another excuse not to go. Gee, if I had a wunnerful - wonDERful - island like that, I'd go and live on it.'

They went back to Kirrin Cottage and packed up a very good lunch for themselves. Berta's father had sent down a parcel of American goodies three days before, and they meant to try them.

'Snick-snacks!' said Dick, reading the name on a tin. 'Shrimp, lobster, crab and a dozen other things all in one tin. Sounds good. We'll make sandwiches with this!'

'Gorgies,' said Anne, reading the name on another tin. 'What a peculiar name! Oh - I suppose it's something you gorge yourself with. Let's open it.'

They opened half a dozen tins with most exciting names and made themselves so many sandwiches that Joan exclaimed in amazement. 'However many have you made for each of you?'

'Twenny each - I mean twenTY,' said Berta. 'But we won't be back to lunch or tea, Joan. I guess we'll be plenny hungry.'

'PlenTy!' chorused everyone, and Berta obediently repeated the word, a grin on her sun-tanned face.

What a day they had! They walked for miles and picnicked in a shady wood near a little stream that bubbled along near by, sounding very cool and enticing. They decided to sit with their feet in it as they ate, and Anne gave continual little squeals because she said the water tickled the soles of her feet.

They were so tired when they got home that night that it was all they could do to eat their supper and stagger upstairs to bed.

'I shan't wake till half past twelve tomorrow morning,' yawned Dick. 'Oh my poor feet! Gosh, I'm so tired I shall probably fall asleep cleaning my teeth.'

'What a peaceful night!' said Anne, looking out of her window. 'Well - sleep tight, everyone. I don't expect any of us will open an eye till late tomorrow morning. I know I shan't!'

But she did. She opened both eyes very wide indeed in the middle of the night.

Chapter 10

A PUZZLING THING

All was quiet in Kirrin Cottage. The two boys slept soundly in their room, and George and Anne slept without stirring in theirs. Berta was up in Joan's attic room, and hadn't moved since she had flopped into bed.

Timmy was on George's feet, as usual, and Sally the poodle was curled up in the crook of Berta's knees, looking like a ball of black wool! Nobody stirred.

A black cloud crept up the sky and blotted out the stars one by one. Then a low roll of thunder came. It was far off, and only a rumble, but it woke both the dogs, and it woke Anne too.

She opened her eyes, wondering what the noise was. Then she knew - it was thunder.

'Oh, I hope a storm won't come and break up this wonderful weather!' she thought, as she lay and listened. She turned towards the open window and looked for the stars, but there were none to see.

'Well, if a storm's coming, I'll go and watch it at the window,' thought Anne. 'It should be a magnificent sight over Kirrin Bay. I'm so hot too - I'd like a breath of fresh air at the window!'

She got quietly out of bed and padded over to the open window. She leaned out, sniffing the cool air outside. The night was very dark indeed, because of the great black cloud.

The thunder came again, but not very near - just a low growl. Timmy jumped off George's bed and went to join Anne. He put his great paws up on the windowsill and looked out solemnly over the bay.

And then both he and Anne heard another sound - a faraway chug-chug-chug-chug-chug.

'It's a motor-boat,' said Anne, listening. 'Isn't it Timmy? Someone's having a very late trip! Can you see any ship-lights, Tim? I can't.'

The engine of the motor-boat cut out just then, and there was complete silence except for the swish-swash-swish of the waves on the beach. Anne strained her eyes to see if she could spot any light anywhere to show where the motor-boat was. It sounded quite far out on the bay. Why had it stopped on the water? Why hadn't it gone to the jetty?

Then she did see a light, but a very faint one, right out at the entrance of the bay, about the middle. It shone for a while, moved here and there, and then disappeared. Anne was puzzled.

'Surely that's just about where Kirrin Island is?' she whispered to Timmy. 'Is anyone there? Has the motor-boat gone there, do you suppose? Well, we'll listen to see if it leaves again and goes away.'

But no further sound came from across the bay, and no light shone either. 'Perhaps the motor-boat is behind Kirrin Island,' thought Anne, suddenly. 'And then I wouldn't be able to see any lights on it - the island would hide the boat and its lights. But what was that moving light I saw? Was it someone on the island? Oh dear, my eyes are getting so sleepy again that I can hardly keep them open. Perhaps I didn't hear or see anything after all!'

There was no more thunder, and no lightning at all. The big black cloud began to thin out and one or two stars appeared in the gaps. Anne yawned and crawled into bed. Timmy jumped back on George's bed and curled himself up with a little sigh.

In the morning Anne had almost forgotten her watch at the open window the night before. It was only when Joan mentioned that a big storm had burst over a town fifty miles away that Anne remembered the thunder she had heard.

'Oh!' she said, suddenly. 'Yes - I heard thunder too, and I got out of bed, hoping to watch a storm. But it didn't come. And I heard a motor-boat far out on the bay, but I couldn't see any lights - except for a faint, moving one I thought was on Kirrin Island.'

George sat up in her chair as if she had had an electric shock. 'On Kirrin Island! Whatever do you mean? Nobody's there. Nobody's allowed there!'

'Well - I may have been mistaken,' said Anne. 'I was so very sleepy. I didn't hear the motor-boat go away. I just went back to bed.'

'You might have waked me, if you thought you saw a light on my island,' said George. 'You really might!'

'Oh, Miss Anne - it wouldn't be kidnappers, would it!' said Joan, at once.

Julian laughed. 'No, Joan. What would be the use of them going to Kirrin Island? They couldn't do any kidnapping there, in full view of all the houses round the bay!'

'I guess it was only a dream, Anne,' said Berta. 'I guess you heard the thunder in your sleep and it turned into the sound of a motor-boat chugging - dreams do that sort of thing. I know once I left the tap running in my basin when I went to sleep, and I dreamed all night long I was riding over the Niagara Falls!'

Everyone laughed. Berta could be very droll at times. 'If the boat's ready, we'll certainly go over to Kirrin Island today,' said George. 'If any trippers are there I'll send Timmy after them!'

'There will only be the rabbits,' said Dick. 'I wonder if there are still hundreds there - my word, last time we went they were so tame that we nearly fell over them!'

'Yes - but we didn't have Timmy with us,' said Anne. 'George, it will be nice to go to Kirrin Island again. We'll have to tell Lesley about the adventures we've had there.'

They washed up after breakfast, made the beds and did their rooms. Joan put her head round Julian's bedroom door.

'Will you want a packed lunch for a picnic again, Master Julian?' she said. 'If you don't, I can get you a nice bit of cold ham for lunch. The grocer's just rung up.'

'If the boat's mended, we're going over to the island, Joan,' said Julian. 'And then we'd like a packed lunch. But if we don't go, we'll stay for lunch. It will be easier for you in a way, won't it? We all got up so late this morning that there's not much time to make sandwiches and pick fruit and so on.'

'Well, you tell me, as soon as you know about the boat,' said Joan, and disappeared.

George came in. 'I'm going to see if the boat is mended,' she said. 'I'll only be gone a minute. Joan wants to know.'

She was back almost at once. 'It's not ready,' she said, disappointed. 'But it will be ready at two o'clock this afternoon. So we'll have lunch here, shall we, and then go over to the island afterwards. We'll pack up a picnic tea.'

'Right,' said Julian. 'I vote we bathe from the beach this morning, then. The tide will be nice and high and we can have some fun with the big breakers.'

'And also keep an eye on James to see that he keeps his word about the boat,' said Dick.

So, when all their jobs were finished - and they were very conscientious about them - the five children and the two dogs went off down to the beach. It was a little cooler after the thunder, but not much, and they were quite warm enough in their swim-suits, with a blazer to wear after a bathe.

'There's nothing nicer than to feel hot and go into the sea and get cool, and then come out and get hot in the sun again, and then go back into the sea,' began Berta.

'You say that every single day!' said George. 'It's like a gramophone record! Still, I must say that I agree with you! Come on - let's have a jolly good swim!'

They all plunged through the big, curling breakers, squealing as the water dashed over their bodies, cold and stinging. They chased one another, swam under water and grabbed at the legs swimming there, floated on their backs, and wished they hadn't forgotten to bring the big red rubber ball with them. But nobody wanted to go and fetch it so they had to do without it.

Timmy and Sally raced about in the shallow waves at the edge of the sea. Timmy was a fine swimmer, but Sally didn't much like the water, so they always played together at the edge. They really were most amusing to watch.

The dogs were glad when the children came panting out of the water. They lay down on the warm beach and Timmy flopped down beside George. She pushed him away.

'You smell of seaweed,' she said. 'Pooh!'

After a while Dick sat up to pull on his blazer. He gazed over the bay to where Kirrin Island lay basking in the sun and gave a sudden exclamation.

'I say! Look, all of you!'

Everyone sat up. 'There's someone on Kirrin Island, though we can't see them,' said Dick. 'Someone lying down, looking through binoculars at our beach. Can you see the sun glittering on the glasses?'

'Yes!' said Julian. 'You're right! Someone must be using binoculars to examine this beach. We can't see them as you say - but it's easy enough to see the sunlight glinting on the glasses. Gosh, what cheek!'

'Cheek!' said George, her face crimson with rage. 'It's a lot more than cheek! How dare people go on my island and use it to spy on people on the beach? Let's spy on them! Let's get our own field-glasses and look through them. We'll see who it is, then!'

'I'll get them,' said Dick and ran off to Kirrin Cottage. He felt worried. It seemed a strange thing to do - to spy on people sitting on the beach round the bay, using binoculars on Kirrin Island. What was the reason?

He came back with the binoculars, and handed them to Julian. 'I think they've gone now, whoever it was,' said Julian. 'I don't mean gone off the island, but gone somewhere else on it. We can't see the glint of the sun on their glasses any more.'

'Well, buck up and see if you can spy anyone through our glasses,' said George, impatiently.

Julian adjusted them, and gazed through them earnestly. The island seemed very near indeed when seen through the powerful glasses. Everyone watched him anxiously.

'See anyone?' asked Dick.

'Not a soul,' said Julian, disappointed. He handed the glasses to the impatient George, who put them to her eyes at once. 'Blow!' she said. 'There's not a thing to be seen, not a thing. Whoever it was has gone into hiding somewhere. If it's trippers having a picnic there I'll be absolutely furious. If we see smoke rising we'll know it is trippers!'

But no smoke arose. Dick had a turn at looking through the glasses, and he looked puzzled. He took them down from his eyes and turned to the others.

'We ought to be able to see the rabbits running about,' he said. 'But I can't see a single one. Did either of you, Julian and George?'

'Well - now I come to think of it - no, I didn't,' said Julian, and George said the same.

'They were frightened by whoever was there, of course,' said Dick. 'I suppose it will be all right to take Lesley with us when we go to the island this afternoon? I mean - it's just a bit queer that anyone should be using the island to spy from.'

'Yes. I see what you mean,' said Julian. 'If it occurred to the kidnappers, whoever they are, that Berta might be down here with us, it would be quite a good idea on their part to land on the island and use it as a place from which to spy on the beach. They would guess we would come down to bathe every day.'

'Yes. And they would see five children instead of four and would begin to make inquiries about the fifth!' said Dick. 'They would hope actually to see Berta on the beach - they've probably got a photograph of her - and they would be looking for a girl with long wavy hair.'

'And there isn't one!' said Anne. 'Mine's not wavy and it's not right down to my shoulders as Lesley's was. How muddled they would be!'

'There's one thing that would tell them that Berta was here though,' said Julian, suddenly. He pointed to Sally.

'Good gracious, yes!' said Dick. 'Sally would give the game away all right! Whew! We'll have to think about all this!'

Chapter 11
ON KIRRIN ISLAND AGAIN

George wanted to get her boat and go across to the island immediately. She was so furious at the thought of anyone else being there without permission that all she wanted to do was to chase them away.

But Julian said no. 'For one thing the boat won't be ready till two,' he said. 'For another thing we've got to consider whether it's a sensible thing to do, to go to the island if possible kidnappers are here, on the lookout for Berta - Lesley, I mean.'

'We could go without her,' said George. 'We could leave her safely with Joan.'

'That would be a foolish thing to do,' said Dick. 'Anyone watching us coming across in the boat would see that one of the five was missing, and would guess at once it was Berta. If we go, all of us must go.'

'Actually I think it might be a good thing to go,' said Julian. 'Carry the war right into the enemy's camp, so to speak - if there are enemies! It would be a most useful thing if we could see what they are like and give a description to the police. I rather vote we go.'

'Oh yes!' said Dick. 'Anyway, we'll have Tim with us. He can deal with any bad behaviour on the part of the intruders!'

'I don't really think it's anybody but trippers,' said Julian. 'I think we're making too much of the whole thing just because someone gazed at the beach through glasses!'

'Remember that I think I saw a light on the island last night,' Anne reminded him.

'Yes, I'd forgotten that,' said Julian, looking at his watch. 'It's almost lunch-time. Let's go and have something to eat, and then fetch the boat. James is working on it now. We'll give him a shout to see if it will be ready at two.'

James was hailed, and he shouted back. 'Yes, sir! Be ready sharp at two o'clock, if you want her. I've done one or two little jobs on her besides the rowlock.'

'That's good,' said Dick, and they walked back to Kirrin Cottage. 'Well - we'll soon find out who's on your island, George - and if they are obstinate about leaving, we'll have a little fun with Timmy! He can round them up all right, can't you, Tim!'

'So could Sally,' said Berta. 'Sally's teeth aren't very big, but they're sharp. She once went for a man who accidentally pushed into me, and you should have seen the nips she gave him, all down his leg!'

'Yes. Sally would come in useful,' said Dick. George looked rather scornful. 'That silly little poodle!' she thought. 'A fat lot of good she would be! Timmy's worth a hundred of her!'

Joan had a fine lunch ready for them - ham and salad and new potatoes piled high in a big dish. There were firm red tomatoes from the greenhouse, and lettuces with enormous yellow-green hearts, crisp radishes, and a whole cucumber ready for anyone to cut as they liked. Slices of hard-boiled egg were mixed in with the salad, and Joan had put in tiny boiled carrots and peas as well.

'What a salad!' said Dick. 'Fit for a king!'

'And big enough for several kings!' said Anne. 'How many potatoes, Ju? Small or large ones?'

Julian looked at the piled-up dish. 'Ha - I can really go for these potatoes!' he said. 'I'll have three large and four small.'

'What's for pudding?' asked Berta. 'I like this kind of salad so much that I might not have room for a stodgy sort of pudding.'

'It's fresh raspberries from the garden, sugar and home-made ice-cream,' said Joan. 'I didn't think you'd want a hot pudding. My sister came to see me this morning, so I got her to pick the raspberries for me.'

'I can't think of a nicer meal than this,' said Berta, helping herself to the salad. 'I really can't. I like your meals better than the ones we have at home in America.'

'We'll turn you into a proper little English boy before you know where you are!' said Dick.

They told Joan about what they had seen that morning on the island. She took a grave view of it at once.

'Now you know what your aunt said, Master Julian,' she said. 'The police have got to have a report of anything suspicious. You'd better ring them up.'

'I will when we've been over to the island and back,' said Julian. 'I don't want to look an ass, Joan. If it's only harmless trippers who don't know any better there's no need to bother the police. I promise to ring the police if we find anything suspicious.'

'I think you ought to ring them now,' said Joan. 'And what's more I don't think you ought to go over to the island if you're suspicious of the people there.'

'We'll have Timmy with us,' said Dick. 'Don't worry.'

'And Sally too,' added Berta at once.

Joan said no more, but went out to get the raspberries and ice-cream, looking worried. She brought in an enormous glass dish of fresh red raspberries and another dish of creamy-looking ice-cream blocks from the refrigerator.

A sigh of admiration went up from everyone. 'Who could want anything better?' said Dick. 'And that ice-cream - how do you get it like that, Joan - not too frozen and not too melty? Just how I like it. I do hope some American doesn't get hold of you and whisk you away across the ocean - you're worth your weight in gold!'

Joan laughed. 'You say such extravagant things, Master Dick - and all because of an ordinary dish like raspberries and ice-cream. Get along with you! Master Lesley will tell you there's nothing clever about raspberries and cream.'

'I agree with every word the others say,' said Berta fervently. 'You're wunnerful, you're a honey, you're...'

But Joan had run out of the room, laughing, very pleased. She didn't mind what she did for children like these!

After they had finished lunch, they went down to the beach. James was still with the boat.

'She's finished!' he called. 'You going out in her now? I'll give you a hand down with her, then.'

Soon all five children and the dogs as well were in George's boat. The boys took the oars and began to pull hard towards the island. Timmy stood at the prow as he loved to do, fore-paws on the edge of the boat, looking out across the water.

'He fancies himself as a figure-head,' said Dick. 'Ah, here comes Sally - she wants to be one too. Mind you don't fall overboard, Sally, and get your pretty feet wet. You'll have to learn to swim if you do!'

Sally stood close beside Timmy, and both dogs looked eagerly towards the island - Timmy because he knew there were hundreds of rabbits there, and Sally because for her it was still quite an adventure to go out in a boat like this.

Berta, too, gazed eagerly at the little island as they drew near. She had heard so many tales about it now! She looked especially at the old castle rising up from it. It was in ruins, and Berta thought it must be very old indeed. Like all Americans, she loved old buildings and old customs. How lucky George was to own an island like this!

Rocks guarded the island, and the sea ran strongly over them, sending up spray and foam.

'However are we going to get safely to the shore of the island?' said Berta, rather alarmed at the array of fierce-looking rocks that guarded it.

'There's a little cove we always use,' said George. She was at the tiller, and she steered the boat cleverly in and out of the rocks.

They rounded a low wall of very sharp rocks and Berta suddenly saw the little cove.

'Oh - is that the cove you mean?' she said. 'Why, it's like a little harbour going right up to that stretch of sand!'

There was a smooth inlet of water running between rocks, making a natural little harbour, as Berta said. The boat slid smoothly into the inlet and up to the beach of sand.

Dick leapt out and pulled it up the shore. 'She's safe here,' he told Berta. 'Welcome to Kirrin Island!'

Berta laughed. She felt very happy. What a truly wonderful place to come to!

George led the way up the sandy beach to the rocks behind, and they climbed over them. They stopped at the top, and Berta exclaimed in amazement.

'Rabbits! Thousands of them! Simply thousands. My, my, I never saw such tame ones in my life. Will they let me pick them up?'

'No,' said George. 'They're not as tame as that! They'll run away when we go near - but they will probably not go into their holes. They know us - we've so often been here.'

Sally the poodle was amazed at the rabbits. She couldn't believe her eyes. She stood close beside Berta, staring at the scuttling rabbits, her nose twitching as she tried to get their smell. She simply couldn't understand why Timmy didn't run at them.

Timmy stood quite still beside George, his tail down, looking very mournful. A visit to Kirrin Island was not such a pleasure to him as to the children, because he wasn't allowed to hunt the rabbits. What a waste of rabbits!

'Poor old Tim! Look at him!' said Julian. 'He looks the picture of misery. Look at Sally, too - she's longing to go after the rabbits, but she doesn't think it's good manners to chase them till Timmy does!'

Good manners or not, little Sally could bear it no longer! She suddenly made a dart at a rabbit who had come temptingly near, and it leapt into the air in fright.

'Sally!' called George, in a most peremptory manner. 'NO! You're not to chase my rabbits! Tim - go and fetch her here!'

Timmy went off to Sally and gave a tiny little growl. Sally looked at him in amazement. Could her friend Timmy really be growling at her? Timmy began to push himself against her and she found herself shepherded over to George.

'Good dog, Timmy,' said George, pleased to have shown everyone how obedient he was. 'Sally, you mustn't chase these rabbits, because they are too tame! They haven't learnt to run away properly yet, because not many people come here and frighten them.'

'Whoever was here this morning scared them all right,' said Julian, remembering. 'Gosh, don't let's forget there may be people here. Well - I can't see anyone so far!'

They went cautiously forward, towards the old castle. Timmy running ahead. Then Julian stopped and pointed to the ground.

'Cigarette ends - look! Fresh ones, too. There are people here, that's certain. Walk ahead of us, Tim.'

But at that moment there came the sound that Anne had heard the night before - the sound of a motor-boat's engine. R-r-r-r-r-r-r!

'They're escaping!' cried Dick. 'Quick, run to the other side of the island! We may see them then!'

Chapter 12

VERY SUSPICIOUS

The children, with the two dogs barking excitedly, ran to the other, seaward side of the island. Great rocks lay out there, and the sea splashed over them.

'There it is - a motor-boat!' cried Dick. They all stood and watched the boat riding over the sea at a very fast speed.

'Where are the glasses - did we bring them with us?' said Julian. 'I'd like to focus them on the boat and see if I can read the name - or even see the men in it!'

But the glasses had been left behind at Kirrin Cottage - what a pity!

'They must have anchored their motor-boat out there, and somehow clambered inshore over the rocks,' said George. 'It's a dangerous thing to do if you don't know the best way.'

'Yes - and if they came last night, as I think they must have done, because I'm sure now it was the engine of the motor-boat that I heard,' said Anne, 'if they came last night, they must have clambered to the shore in the dark. I wonder they managed it!'

'It must have been the light of a lantern or a torch you saw on the island in the night,' said Julian. 'They probably didn't want to be seen arriving on the island, and that's why they went to the other side, the seaward side. I wonder if they were men spying to find out if Berta is with us or not.'

'Let's snoop around a bit more and see if we can find anything else,' said Anne. 'The motor-boat is almost out of sight now.'

They went back to the other side of the island. Berta looked with awe at the old ruined castle in the middle. Jackdaws circled round a tower, calling loudly. 'Chack-chack-chack!'

'Once upon a time my castle had strong walls all round it,' said George. 'And there were two great towers. One's almost in ruins, as you can see, but the other is fairly good. Come right into the castle.'

Berta followed the others in, struck dumb with awe. To think that this island, and this wonderful old ruined castle, belonged to George! How very, very lucky she was!

She went through a great doorway, and found herself in a dark room, with stone walls enclosing it. Two narrow, slit-like windows brought in all the light there was.

'It's strange and old and mysterious,' said Berta, half to herself. 'It's asleep and dreaming of the old days when people lived here. It doesn't like us being here!'

'Wake up!' said Dick. 'You look quite dopey!' Berta shook herself and looked round again. Then she went on through the castle and looked at other rooms, some without roofs, some without one or two of their walls.

'It's a honey of a castle!' she said to George. 'A real honey. Wunnerful. WonDERful.'

They wandered all round, showing the awe-struck Berta everything. 'We'll show you the dungeons too,' said George, very pleased to be impressing Berta so much.

'Dungeons! You've got dungeons too - oh, of course, you told me about them,' said Berta. 'Dungeons! You don't say! My my, I'll never forget this afternoon.'

As they walked over the old courtyard Timmy suddenly growled and stood still, his tail down, the hackles on his neck rising. Everyone automatically stood still too.

'What is it, Tim?' asked George, in a whisper. Timmy's nose was pointing towards the little harbour where they had left their boat.

'There must be someone there,' said Dick. 'Don't say they're going off with our boat!'

George gave a scream. Her boat! Her precious boat! She set off at top speed with Timmy bounding in front.

'Come back, George - there may be danger!' shouted Julian, but George didn't listen. She ran over the rocks that led down to the little harbour-beach, and then stopped still in surprise.

Two policemen were walking up the sandy beach! Their boat was drawn up beside George's. They saluted her and grinned.

'Afternoon, Miss George!'

'What are you doing on my island?' demanded George, recognising them. 'Why have you come here?'

'Someone reported suspicious people on the island,' said the first policeman.

'Who did?' said George. 'Nobody knew about it but us!'

'I bet I know who reported it,' said Dick suddenly. 'Joan did! She didn't like us going off by ourselves; she said we ought to telephone the police.'

'That's right,' said the policeman. 'So we came to see for ourselves. Found anyone?'

Julian took command then, and related how they had first seen the cigarette ends, and then heard the motor-boat starting up, and had gone to see it roaring away from the island.

'Ah,' said both policemen, profoundly. 'Ah!'

'What do you mean - 'AH'?' asked Dick.

'Fred here heard a motor-boat somewhere in the bay in the night,' said the first man. 'What was it doing there, I'd like to know?'

'So would we,' said Julian. 'We saw someone on the island looking through binoculars at the beach this morning.'

This brought forth two more 'Ahs', and the policemen exchanged glances.

'Good thing you've got a couple of dogs with you,' said the one called Fred. 'Well - we'll just have a bit of a look round, and then we'll go back on our beats again. And mind you ring us up next time anything turns up, Miss George, see?'

Off they went together, looking closely at the ground. They found the cigarette ends and picked them up. Then on they went again.

'Let's go back,' said George, in a low voice. 'It spoils things if other people are on the island. I don't want to have a picnic here now. We'll go off in the boat somewhere and have a picnic tea in a cove.'

So they dragged the boat down to the water and jumped in. Sally was very pleased to be back in the boat and ran from end to end wagging her stiff little tail in delight. Timmy followed her up and down and got in everyone's way.

'How can I row if you keep on jumping over me, Timmy?' complained Dick. 'Sally, you're just as bad. Berta, are you all right? You look a bit green?'

'It's only excitement and the bumpy bit past the rocks,' said Berta, anxious not to appear seasick in front of the others. 'I'll be all right as soon as we get on to calm waters.'

But she wasn't, so it was regretfully decided that they must row to the shore. They had a lazy tea on the beach, and Berta recovered enough to join in heartily.

'Anyone got room for an ice-cream?' asked Anne. 'Because if so I'll stroll down to the shops and get some. I want to buy a new pair of shoe-laces too. One of mine broke this morning.'

Everyone appeared to have room for an ice-cream, so Anne set off with Sally, who wanted to come with her. She went to the draper's and got the laces, and then went to the tea-shop that sold ices.

'Seven, please,' she said. The girl in the shop smiled.

'Seven! You used to ask for five.'

'Yes, I know. But we've got someone staying with us - and another dog,' explained Anne. 'And both dogs like ice-creams.'

'That reminds me - someone was in my shop yesterday asking about your uncle,' said the girl. 'He said he knew him. He wanted to know how many children were staying at Kirrin Cottage, and I thought only the four of you were there - and Timmy, of course. He seemed surprised, and said, surely there was another girl?'

'Good gracious!' said Anne, startled. 'Did he really? How inquisitive! What did you say then?'

'I just said there were two boys and a girl, and a girl who liked to dress as a boy,' said the girl.

Anne was glad to think the shop-girl hadn't known about Berta. 'What was the man like?' she asked.

'Quite ordinary,' said the girl, trying to remember. 'He wore dark glasses like so many visitors do in the bright sun. I noticed he had a large gold ring on his finger when he paid my bill. That's all I can remember.'

'Well, if anyone else asks you about us, just say we've got a friend staying with us called Lesley,' said Anne. 'Good-bye.'

She went off at top speed, anxious to tell the others. The man in the tea-shop must have been one of those who had gone to the island to watch the beach - he might have been staring at the five of them as they had played together. He must be one of the men now in the motor-boat. Anne didn't like it, and it made her feel very uneasy.

She told the others what the shop girl had said as they sat in the sand and ate their ice-creams. Timmy gobbled his almost at once, and sat patiently watching for Sally to deal with hers, hoping that she would leave some.

All the four listened intently to Anne's little story.

'That settles it,' said Dick. 'Those men are certainly snooping round trying to find out if Lesley is here.'

'They are getting uncomfortably close,' said Julian.

'Still, your uncle and aunt come back tomorrow,' said Berta. 'We'll tell them, and maybe they'll have some good plan.'

'I hope those men don't know that they are away,' said Dick, uneasily. 'I think we'll have to keep a pretty close watch from now on. I wonder if Berta ought to stay on here with us.'

'See what Father says tomorrow,' said George. So it was decided that nothing should be done except to keep a sharp look-out until George's parents came back. They all went back rather soberly to Kirrin Cottage and told Joan what had happened on the island.

'You telephoned to the police, Joan!' said Dick, shaking his finger at her.

'I did. And I was right to,' said Joan. 'And what's more Master Lesley's bed is going to be moved away from the window tonight and the window's going to be fastened even if we melt, and the door will be locked.'

'I'll lend you Timmy, too, if you like,' said George. 'He can sleep in the room with Sally. You ought to be safe then!'

She really only meant it as a joke, but to her surprise Joan accepted at once. 'Thank you, Miss,' she said. 'I'd be glad of Timmy. I feel all of a dither, left on my own like this, and kidnappers closing in on us!'

Julian laughed. 'Oh, it's not so bad as that, Joan! Only one more night and Uncle Quentin and Aunt Fanny will be back.'

'Oh - I quite forgot to tell you,' said Joan. 'Look, there's a telegram come. They're staying away a whole week! That's why I feel so scared. A week - well a lot can happen in a week!'

Chapter 13

A HORRID SHOCK

Julian was not very happy to hear that his aunt and uncle were staying away for a week. He picked up the telegram. It was addressed to George, but Joan had opened it.

'Not returning for a week,' it said. 'Complications have arisen, Hope all goes well. Love from Mother.'

There was no address. How annoying! Now Julian couldn't even let them know that he was feeling uneasy. He made up his mind to guard Berta every minute! Thank goodness they had Timmy. Nobody would dare to do any kidnapping under Timmy's eye!

He thought it was a good idea to put Timmy in Joan's room that night with Berta. In fact, if George would agree, it would be best to do that each night. He thought it would not be wise to ask George now, though, because he could see that she was half sorry she had made the offer to Joan!

Julian was quite fussy that evening. He insisted on the blinds being drawn when they sat down to play cards after their supper. He would not let Berta take Sally out for a run, but took her himself, watching for any strange person as he went down the lane.

'You're making me feel quite scared!' said Anne with a laugh. 'Oh Ju, it's so hot in this room. Do, do let's have the blind up for a few minutes and let some air in. I shall begin to sizzle if we don't. Timmy would soon growl if there was anyone outside.'

'All right,' said Julian and drew up the blind. It was dark outside now, and the light streamed out.

'That's better,' said Anne, mopping her wet forehead. 'Now, whose turn is it? Yours, George.'

They sat round the table, playing. Julian and Berta sat side by side, as Julian was helping her in a new game of cards. She looked exactly like a very earnest little boy, with her straight close-cut fair hair. George sat opposite the window with Dick on one side of her and Anne on the other.

'Your turn, Dick,' said George. 'Do buck up, you're slow tonight.' She sat and waited, looking out of the window into the darkness.

Then suddenly she slammed down her cards and leapt up, shouting. Everyone jumped almost out of their skins.

'What is it, what is it, George?' cried Julian.

'Out there - look - a face! I saw a face peeping in at us - the light of the window just caught it! Timmy, Timmy! Quick, go after him!'

But Timmy wasn't there! Nor was Sally. George called frantically again. 'TIMMY! Come here, quickly. Oh, blow him, that fellow will get away. TIM!'

Timmy came bounding up the hall and into the sitting-room, barking. Sally followed behind.

'Where were you! Fathead!' cried George furiously. 'Jump out of the window - go on - chase him, find him!'

Timmy leapt out of the window and Sally tried to do the same, but couldn't. She barked and yelped, trying again and again to jump out. Joan came running in, panic-stricken, wondering what was happening.

'Listen,' said Julian, suddenly. 'Shut up, Sally, Listen!'

They were all suddenly quiet, Sally too. There was the sound of a car being revved up down the lane, and then the sound died down as the car sped away.

'He's got away, whoever he was,' said Dick, and sat down suddenly. 'Gosh, I feel as if I'd been running a mile. You nearly scared the life out of me when you slammed down your cards like that, George, and yelled in my ear.'

Timmy leapt in at the window at that moment and Dick almost jumped out of his skin again. So did everyone else, including Sally, who fled behind the sofa in panic.

'What's all this about?' said Joan, quite fiercely. 'Really!'

George was in a tearing rage - with Timmy of all things! She shouted at the surprised dog and he put his tail down at once.

'Where were you? Why did you slink out of the room into the kitchen? How dare you leave me and go off like that? Just when we needed you! I'm ashamed of you, Timmy - you could have caught that fellow easily!'

'Oh don't,' said Berta, almost in tears. 'Poor Timmy! Don't George!'

Then George turned on Berta. 'You just let me scold my own dog if he needs it! And you go and scold yours too. I bet Timmy followed your horrid little woolly pet out into the kitchen - it was her fault, not his!'

'Shut up, George,' said Julian. 'Your temper gets us nowhere. Calm down and let's hear what you saw. CALM DOWN, I say.'

George stared at him, about to retort with something defiant. Then Timmy gave a small whimper - his heart was almost broken to hear George - George, his beloved mistress - rave at him in such anger. He had no idea what he had done to displease her.

The whimper brought George to her senses. 'Oh Timmy!' she said, and knelt down and flung her arms round his neck. 'I didn't mean to shout at you. I was so angry because we missed our chance of getting that man who was peeping in at us. Oh Timmy, it's all right, it really is.'

Timmy was extremely glad to hear it. He licked George lavishly, and then lay down by her very soberly. He wished he knew what all the excitement was about.

So did Joan. She thumped on the table to get everyone's attention, and at last got Julian to explain everything to her. She stared out of the window, half-thinking that she could see faces in the darkness outside. She drew the blind down sharply.

'We'll go to bed,' she said. 'All of us. I don't like this. I shall ring up the police and warn them. Master Lesley, you come with me straightaway now.'

'I think perhaps you're right, Joan,' said Julian. 'I'll lock up everywhere. Come on, girls.'

Timmy was astonished and upset to find himself handed over to Joan and Berta. Was George still cross with him then? It was a very, very long time since he had slept away from her at night. He cheered up a little when he saw that Sally was going to be with him, and trotted rather mournfully up the attic stairs to Joan's room.

Joan soon got Berta into bed, and then undressed herself. She fastened the window and locked the door. She gave Timmy a rug in a corner, and Sally jumped up on Berta's bed as usual.

'Now we ought to be quite safe!' said Joan, and settled creakingly into her bed.

On the floor below the two boys followed the same procedure, and so did Anne and George. Doors were locked and windows fastened, though it was a hot night and they were all sure they would be melted by the morning. George couldn't bear to think of Timmy with Berta and Joan - especially as she had been so very cross with him. She lay in bed, full of remorse. Dear, kind, faithful Timmy - how could she have shouted at him like that?

'Do you suppose Timmy is feeling very upset?' she said, when she and Anne were in bed.

'A bit, perhaps,' said Anne. 'But dogs are very forgiving.'

'I know. That somehow makes it worse,' said George.

'Well, you really shouldn't get into such tempers,' said Anne, seizing the opportunity to tell George a few home truths. 'I thought you were getting over the tantrums you used to have. But these hols you've been pretty bad. Because of Berta, I suppose.'

'I wish I could go up and say good night to Timmy,' George began again, after a few minutes' silence.

'Oh for goodness' sake George!' said Anne, sleepily. 'Do be sensible. You can't go and bang on Joan's door and ask for Timmy - you'd scare them to death!'

Anne fell asleep, but George didn't. Then suddenly she heard the sound of a door being unlocked, and sat up. It sounded as if it came from the attic. Was it Joan unlocking her door? What did she want?

A cautious little knock came at George's door. 'Who is it?' said George.

'Me. Joan,' said Joan's voice. 'I've brought Sally down, Miss George. Timmy keeps trying to get up on Miss Berta's bed to be with Sally, and she simply can't go to sleep, her camp-bed is too small to hold all three of them. So will you have Sally, please?'

'Oh blow!' said George, and went to open her door. 'How's Timmy?' she said, in a low voice.

'All right,' said Joan. 'He'll be annoyed I've taken Sally away. I'm glad to have him up here tonight with all these goings on!'

'Is he - is he happy, Joan?' asked George, but Joan had turned away and didn't hear. George sighed. Why had she offered to let Joan and Berta have Timmy tonight of all nights, when she had scolded him so unfairly? Now she had got to have this silly little Sally instead!

Sally whimpered. She didn't like being away from Berta, and she was not fond of George. She wriggled out of George's arms and ran round the room, still whimpering.

Anne woke up with a jump. 'Whatever's going on?' she said. 'Why - it's Sally in the room! How did she get here?'

George told her, sounding very cross. 'Well, I hope she'll settle down,' said Anne. 'I don't want her to whimper and run round the bedroom all night long.'

But Sally wouldn't settle down. Her whimpering became louder, and when she took a flying jump on to George's bed and landed right on George's middle, the girl had had enough of it. She sat up and spoke in a fierce whisper.

'You little idiot! I'm jolly well going to take you downstairs and put you into Timmy's kennel!'

'Good idea,' said Anne, sleepily. George picked up the lively little poodle and went out of the room, shutting the door softly. Anne promptly went to sleep again.

George crept down the stairs and went to the garden door. She undid it and walked out in dressing-gown and pyjamas, her curly hair all tousled, carrying the whimpering little dog.

Suddenly she felt Sally stiffen in her arms, and growl. Grrrrrr! George stood quite still. What had Sally heard?

Then things happened very suddenly indeed. A torch was flashed in her face, and before she could cry out, a cloth was thrown over her head so that she could not make a sound.

'This is the one!' said a low voice. 'The one with curly hair! And this is her dog, the poodle. Put him in that kennel, quick, before he barks the place down.'

Sally, too scared even to growl, was pushed into the kennel and the door shut on her. George, struggling and trying vainly to call out, was lifted off her feet and carried swiftly down to the front gate.

The garden door swung creaking to and fro in the night wind. Sally whimpered in her kennel. But no one heard either door or dog. Everyone in Kirrin Cottage was sound asleep!

Chapter 14

WHERE IS GEORGE?

Next morning, about half past seven, Joan went downstairs as usual. Berta was awake and decided to fetch Sally from George's bedroom. She put on her dressing-gown and padded downstairs with Timmy behind her, to George's room on the floor below. The door was shut, and she knocked gently.

'Come in,' said Anne's sleepy voice. 'Oh, it's you, Berta.'

'Yes. I've come for Sally,' said Berta. 'Hallo - where's George?'

Anne looked at the empty bed beside hers. 'I don't know. The last thing I heard of her was in the middle of the night when we got cross because Sally wouldn't settle down, and George said she would take her down to the kennel.'

'Oh. Well, probably George has gone down to fetch her back,' said Berta. 'I'll go up and dress. It's a heavenly morning again. Are you going to bathe before breakfast, because if so I'll just put on my swim-suit.'

'Yes. I think we might today - we're nice and early,' said Anne, scrambling out of bed. 'Go and wake the boys. Timmy, go down and find George.'

Dick and Julian were awake, and quite ready for a before-breakfast bathe. Anne joined them as they went downstairs. Berta had already gone down and had discovered Sally in the kennel, most excited to see her. She pranced round barking happily.

Timmy came up to the children, looking puzzled. He had hunted everywhere for George and hadn't found her. 'Woof,' he said to Anne. 'Woof, woof!' It was just as if he were saying, 'Please, where is George?'

'Haven't you found George yet?' said Anne in surprise. She called to Joan. 'Joan, where's George? Has she gone down to bathe already?'

'I haven't seen her,' said Joan. 'But I expect she has because the garden-door was open when I came down, and I guessed one of you had gone for an early bathe.'

'Well, George must be down on the beach, then,' said Anne, feeling rather puzzled. 'Why hadn't George wakened her and told her to come too?'

Soon all four were on the beach with the two dogs, Sally very happy to be with Berta again, and Timmy very downcast and puzzled. He stood staring up the beach and down, looking quite lost.

'I can't see George anywhere,' said Dick, suddenly feeling scared. 'She's not in the sea.'

They all gazed over the water, but no one was bathing that morning. Anne turned to Julian in sudden panic.

'Ju! Where is she?'

'I wish I knew,' said Julian, anxiously. 'She's not here. And she hasn't gone out in her boat - it's over there. Let's go back to the house.'

'I don't think George would have gone for an early bathe without telling me,' said Anne. 'And I also think I would surely have woken up just for a moment when she came back after taking Sally down - oh Julian, I think something happened when she went downstairs with Sally late last night!'

'I've been thinking that too,' said Julian soberly. 'We know that there was someone about last night, because George saw a face outside the window. Let's go back to the house and see if we can spot anything to help us near the garden door or the kennel.'

They went back, looking very anxious. As soon as they began to look about near the kennel, Anne gave an exclamation and bent down. She picked up something and held it out to the others without a word.

'What is it - gosh, it's the girdle off George's dressing-gown!' said Dick, startled. 'That proves it! George was caught when she came down to put Sally into her kennel!'

'They must have thought she was me,' said Berta, in tears. 'You see - she was carrying Sally and they know Sally belongs to me - and she has short hair too and dresses like a boy in the daytime.'

'That's it!' said Julian. 'Actually you look like a boy in your boy's things, but George doesn't - and the kidnappers are looking for a girl dressed as a boy - and George fitted the bill nicely, especially as she had the poodle with her. She's been kidnapped!'

'And will my father get the usual note to say his daughter will not be harmed if he does what the kidnappers want, and hands over this new secret?' said Berta.

'Sure to,' said Julian.

'What will they say when they know they've got George, not me?' asked Berta.

'Well...' said Julian, considering. 'I really don't know. They might try the same thing with Uncle Quentin, but of course, he hasn't got the figures they want.'

'What about Berta now?' asked Dick. 'Once those men find they've got the wrong girl, they'll be after Berta in a trice!'

'George won't tell them,' said Anne, at once. 'She'll know that Berta would be in immediate danger if she did tell them - so she'll say nothing as long as she can.'

'Would she really?' said Berta, wonderingly. 'She's brave, isn't she? She could get herself set free at once if she said she wasn't me, and proved it. Gee, she's wunnerful if she could do a thing like that!'

'George is brave all right,' said Dick. 'As brave as any boy could be when she's in a fix! Julian, let's go and tell Joan. We've GOT to make up our minds what we are going to do about this - and also, we must safeguard Berta somehow. She can't possibly wander round with us any more.'

Berta all at once began to feel scared. George's sudden disappearance had brought home to her the very real danger she was in. She had not really believed in it before. She looked over her shoulder and all round and about as if she expected someone to pounce on her.

'It's all right, Berta - there's no one here at present!' said Dick, comfortingly. 'But you'd better get indoors, all the same. I don't think George would give away the fact that she wasn't you, but the men might find out some other way - and back they would come, hotfoot!'

Berta raced indoors as if someone was chasing her! Julian shut and locked the garden door and called Joan.

They had a very serious conference indeed. Joan was horrified. She wept when she heard that George must have been kidnapped in the middle of the night. She wiped her eyes with her apron.

'I said we must lock the doors and the windows, I said we must tell the police - and then Miss George has to go down all by herself into the garden!' she said. 'If only she hadn't had the poodle with her! No wonder they thought she was Berta, with Sally in her arms.'

'Listen, Joan,' said Julian. 'There are a lot of things to do. First we must tell the police. Then somehow we must contact Aunt Fanny and Uncle Quentin - it's so like them not to give us an address! Then we must most certainly decide about Berta. She must be well hidden away somewhere.'

'Yes. That's certain,' said Joan, wiping her eyes again. She sat and thought for a minute, and then her face lightened.

'I know where we could hide her!' she said. 'You remember Jo - the little gypsy girl you've had one or two adventures with?'

'Yes,' said Julian. 'She lives with your cousin now, doesn't she?'

'She does,' said Joan. 'And my cousin would have Berta straightaway if she knew about this. She lives in a quiet little village where nothing ever happens, and nobody would think anything of my cousin having a child to stay with Jo. She often does.'

'It really seems an idea,' said Dick. 'Doesn't it, Julian? We've simply got to get Berta away at once. We could trust Jo to look after her, too - Jo's as sharp as a packet of needles!'

'The police would know, too,' said Julian, 'and would keep an eye on her as well. Joan, can you ring up and get a taxi and take Berta now, this very minute?'

'It'll be a surprise for my cousin, my arriving this time of the morning,' said Joan, standing up and taking off her apron, 'but she's quick on the uptake, and she'll do it, I know. Master Lesley, get a few things together - nothing posh, mind, like your silver hairbrush.'

Berta looked extremely scared by now, and was inclined to refuse to go. Julian put his arm round her.

'Look,' he said, 'I bet George is holding her tongue so that we can get you away in safety before the men tumble to the fact that they've got the wrong boy - so you can play up, too, can't you, and be brave?'

'Yes,' said Berta, looking up at Julian's kind, serious face. 'I'll do what you say - but what's this Jo like? Joan said she was a little gypsy girl. I don't like gypsies.'

'You'll like this one all right,' said Julian. 'She's a pickle and a scamp and a scallywag - but her heart's in the right place - isn't it, Joan?'

Joan nodded. She had always been fond of the reckless, cheeky little Jo, and it was she who had found a home for her when Jo's father had had to go to prison. 'Come on, Master Lesley,' she said. 'We must hurry. Master Julian, is she to go as a girl or a boy now - we've got to decide that too.'

'A girl, please - please, please, a girl!' said Berta, at once.

Julian considered. 'Yes, I think you're right,' he said. 'You'd better be a girl now - but for goodness' sake don't call yourself Berta yet.'

'She can be Jane,' said Joan, firmly. 'That's a nice name, but quite ordinary enough for nobody to notice. Berta is too noticeable a name. Come along, now - we'll have to pick out your simplest clothes!'

'Now I'll ring up the police,' said Julian, 'and also ring for a taxi.'

'No, don't get a taxi for us,' said Joan. 'I don't want to arrive at my cousin's little cottage in a taxi, and make everyone stare! Jane and I will catch the market bus and people will think I'm going off to market. We can get another bus there, that will take us almost all the way to my cousin's. We've only to walk down the lane then.'

'Good idea,' said Julian, and went to the telephone. He got hold of the police sergeant, and told his tale. The man showed not the least excitement, but took down quickly all that Julian told him. 'I'll be up in ten minutes,' he said. 'Wait in till I come.'

Julian put down the receiver. Dick and Anne were watching him with troubled eyes. What was happening to George? Was she frightened - or furious - or perhaps hurt?

Timmy was absolutely miserable. He knew by now that something had happened to George. He had gone a dozen times to the place where her dressing-gown girdle had been found, and had sniffed round disconsolately.

Sally knew he was unhappy and trotted after him soberly. When he lay down she lay down beside him. When he got up, she got up too. It would have been amusing to watch if anyone had felt like being amused. But nobody felt that way!

Footsteps came up the path. 'The police!' said Julian. 'They've not been long!'

Chapter 15

DISCOVERIES IN THE WOOD

The sergeant had come and also a constable. Anne felt comforted when she saw the big, solid, responsible-looking men. Julian took them into the sitting-room, and began to tell all that had happened.

In the middle of it there came the sound of footsteps racing down the stairs, and up the hall. 'We're just off!' shouted Joan's voice. 'Can't stop to say good-bye, or we shall miss the bus!'

Down the garden path rushed Joan, carrying a small suitcase of her own, which she had lent Berta, because Berta's was too grand. In it she had packed the very simplest of Berta's clothes, but secretly she had thought that she would tell her cousin to dress Berta in some of Jo's things.

Berta ran behind her - a different Berta now, dressed in a frock instead of jeans and jersey. She waved to the others as she went, trying to smile.

'Good old Berta!' said Dick. 'She's got quite a lot in her, that kid.'

'In fact, she's quite a honey!' said Julian, trying to make Anne smile.

'What's all that?' said the sergeant, in surprise, nodding his head towards the front path, down which Joan and Berta had just rushed.

Julian explained. The sergeant frowned. 'You shouldn't have arranged about that till you'd consulted us,' he said. Julian was quite taken aback.

'Well, you see,' he said, 'it seemed to me that I must get Berta out of the house and hidden away at once in case the kidnappers realised quickly that they'd got the wrong girl.'

'That's so,' said the sergeant. 'Still, you should have consulted us. It seems quite a good idea to put her in that quiet village, with Jo to see to her - she's sharp, that Jo. I wouldn't put it past her to hoodwink the kidnappers any day! But this is a very serious business, you realise, Master Julian - it can't be dealt with by children.'

'Can you get George back?' asked Anne, breaking in with the question she had been longing to ask ever since the police came.

'May be,' said the sergeant. 'Now I'll get in touch with your aunt and uncle, Master Julian, and with Mr. Elbur Wright, and...'

The telephone rang just then and Anne answered it. 'It's for you, Sergeant,' she said, and he took the receiver from her.

'Ha. Hm. Just so. Yes, yes. Right. Ha. Hm.' The sergeant replaced the receiver and went back to Julian and the others. 'News has just come in that the kidnappers have contacted Mr. Elbur Wright, and told him they've got his daughter Berta,' he said.

'Oh! And have they demanded that he shall tell them the secret figures he knows?' asked Julian.

The sergeant nodded. 'Yes. He's almost off his head with shock! He's promised to give them all they want. Very foolish!'

'Gosh - you'd better tell him it's not Berta they've got, but George,' said Dick. 'Then he'll sit tight!'

The sergeant frowned. 'Now, you leave this to us,' he said, ponderously. 'You'll only hinder us if you interfere or try meddling on your own. You just sit back and take things easy.'

'What! With George kidnapped and in danger?' exploded Dick. 'What are you going to do to get her back?'

'Now, now!' said the sergeant, annoyed. 'She is in no danger - she's not the person they want. They will free her as soon as they realise that.'

'They won't,' said Dick. 'They'll get on to her father and make him give up a few secrets!'

'Well, that will give us a little more time to find these men,' said the irritating sergeant, and he stood up, big and burly in his navy blue uniform. 'Let me know at once if you have any other news, and please do not try to meddle. I assure you that we know the right things to do.'

He went out with the constable. Julian groaned. 'He doesn't see that this is urgent. It's so complicated too - the wrong girl kidnapped, the wrong father informed, the right one not at all inclined to give up powerful secrets - and poor old George not knowing what is happening!'

'Well, thank goodness we got Berta out of the way,' said Dick. 'Anne, you look queer - are you all right?'

'Yes. I think I'm just shocked - and oh dear, I feel awfully empty!' said Anne, pressing her tummy.

'Gosh - we forgot all about breakfast!' said Dick staring at the clock. 'And it's almost ten o'clock now! What have we been doing all this time? Come on, Anne - get us some food, there's a dear. We shall all feel better then.'

'I'm so sorry for poor old Timmy and little Sally,' said Anne, going into the kitchen. 'Timmy, darling, don't look at me like that! I don't know where your beloved George is, or I'd take you to her straight away! And Sally, you will have to put up with me for a little while, because although I do know where Berta is, I can't possibly take you there!'

They were soon sitting down to a plain breakfast of boiled eggs, toast and butter. It seemed queer only to be three. Dick tried to make conversation, but the other two were very quiet. Timmy sat under the table with his head on Anne's foot, and Sally stood beside her, paws on her knee. Anne comforted both the mournful dogs as best she could!

After breakfast Anne went to wash up and make the beds, and the boys went outside to have another look at the place where George's dressing-gown girdle had been found. Sally and Timmy came with them.

Timmy sniffed around a good bit, and then, nose to ground, went down the garden path to the front gate, and then pushed it open and went through it. Nose to ground he went down the lane and turned off into a little path.

'Dick - he's following some kind of trail,' said Julian. 'I'm certain it's George's. Even if somebody carried her away, Timmy is clever enough to know George might be with him - he might just get a whiff of her.'

'Come on then - let's follow Timmy,' said Dick, and the boys and Sally went along the little path, hot on Timmy's track. Timmy began to run, and Dick called to him.

'Not so fast, old boy! We're coming too.'

But Timmy did not slow down. Whatever it was he smelt, the scent was quite strong. The boys ran after him, beginning to feel excited.

But soon Timmy came to a full stop, in a little clearing in the wood. Dick and Julian panted up to where he was nosing round. He looked up at them forlornly. Evidently the scent came to an end there.

'Car-tracks!' said Dick, pointing down to where the dampish grass under a great oak tree had been rutted with big tyre-marks. 'See? The men brought a car here and hid it, then crept through the woods to Kirrin Cottage, and waited for a chance to get Berta. They got George instead - but they wouldn't have got anyone if only George hadn't been ass enough to take Sally to the kennel! The house was well and truly locked and bolted!'

Julian was looking at the wheel-tracks. 'These tracks were made by very big tyres,' he said. 'It was a car - and I rather think these are American tyre-marks. I can check that when I get back - I'll go and ask Jim, at the local garage - he'll know. I'll just sketch one quickly.'

He took out a notebook and pencil and began to sketch. Dick bent down and looked more carefully at the tracks. 'There is quite a lot of criss-crossing of tracks,' he said. 'I think the men came here and waited. Then, when they got George, they must have pushed her into the car, and turned it to go back the way they came - see, the tracks lead down that wide path over there. They made a mess of the turning, though - bumped into this tree, look - there's a mark right across it.'

'Where?' said Julian at once. 'Yes - a bright blue mark - the car was that colour - or the wings were, at any rate. Well, that's something we've learnt! A big blue car, probably American. Surely the police could trace that?'

'Timmy's still nosing round, the picture of misery,' said Dick. 'Poor old Tim. I expect he knows George was pushed into a car just there. Hallo - he's scraping at something!'

They ran to see what it was. Timmy was trying to get at some small object embedded in a car-rut. Evidently, in turning, the car had run over whatever it was.

Dick saw something broken in half - something green. He picked up the halves. 'A comb! Did George have a little green comb like this?'

'Yes. She did,' said Julian. 'She must have thrown it down when she got near to the car - to show us she was taken here - hoping we would find it. And look, what's that?'

It was a handkerchief hanging on a gorse bush. Julian ran to it. It had the initial G on it in blue.

'Yes, it's George's,' he said. 'She's got six of these, all with different-coloured initials. She must have thrown this out too. Quick, Dick, look for anything else she might have thrown out of the car, while they were trying to turn it. They would probably put her in the back, and she would just have had a chance to throw out anything she had in her dressing-gown pocket, to let us know she was here if we came along this way.'

They searched for a long time. Timmy found one more thing, again embedded in a car-rut - a boiled sweet wrapped in cellophane paper.

'Look!' said Dick, picking it up. 'One of the sweets we all had the other night! George must have had one in her dressing-gown pocket! If only she had had a pencil and bit of paper - she might have had time to write a note too!'

'That's an idea!' said Julian. 'We'll hunt even more carefully'

But although they searched every bit of ground and every bush, there was no note to be found. It was too much to hope for!

'Let's just follow the car-tracks and make sure they reached the road,' said Julian. So they followed them down the wide woodland path.

At the side, a little way along, a piece of paper blew in the wind, hopping an inch or two each time the breeze flapped it. Dick picked it up - and then looked at Julian excitedly.

'She did have time to write a note! This is her writing. But there's only one word, look - whatever does it mean?'

Julian and Dick frowned over the piece of paper. Yes, it was George's writing - the G was exactly like the way she always wrote the big G at the beginning of her signature.

'Gringo,' read Julian. 'Just that one word. Gringo! What does it mean? It's something she heard them say, I suppose - and she just had time to write it and throw out the paper. Gringo! Timmy, what does Gringo mean?'

Chapter 16

JO!

Dick and Julian went back to Kirrin Cottage with the two disconsolate dogs. They showed Anne the things they had found, and she too puzzled over the word Gringo.

'We'll have to tell the police what you have discovered,' she said. 'They might trace the car, and they might know who or what Gringo is.'

'I'll telephone them now,' said Julian. 'Dick, you go down to the garage with this sketch of the tyre-mark, and see if it's an American design.'

The police were interested but not helpful. The sergeant said he would send his constable up to examine the place where the car had stood in the clearing, and gave it as his opinion that the bit of paper wasn't much use, as the boys had found it some way from the turning-place of the car.

'Your cousin wouldn't be able to throw it out of the window once the car was going,' he said.

'There would be sure to be someone in the back with her. The only reason she could throw things out at the clearing would be because the second fellow - and there would certainly be two - would be guiding the other man in the turning of the car.'

'The wind might have blown the note along the path,' said Julian. 'Anyway, I've given you the information.'

It was a very miserable day, although the sun shone down warmly, and the sea was blue and most inviting. But nobody wanted to bathe, nobody really wanted to do anything but talk and talk about George and what had happened, and where she could be at that moment!

Joan came back in time to get their lunch, and was pleased to find that Anne had done the potatoes and prepared a salad, and that Dick had managed to pick some raspberries. They were very glad to see Joan. She was someone sensible and comforting and matter-of-fact.

'Well, Miss Jane is now safely in my cousin's cottage,' she said. 'She was very miserable but I told her she must smile and play about, else the neighbours would wonder about her. I put her into some of Jo's clothes - they fitted her all right. Hers are too expensive-looking, and would make people talk!'

They told Joan what they had discovered in the clearing that morning. She took the note and looked at it. 'Gringo!' she said. 'That's a queer word - sounds like a gypsy word to me. It's a pity Jo isn't here - she might tell us what it means!'

'Did you see Jo?' asked Dick.

'No. She was out shopping,' said Joan, lifting the lid to look at the potatoes. 'I only hope she gets on with Miss Jane all right. Really, it's getting very difficult to remember that child's change of names!'

The only fresh news that day was a worried telephone-call from Aunt Fanny. She was shocked and amazed at the news she had heard. 'Your uncle has collapsed!' she said. 'He has been working very hard, you know, and now this news of George has been quite the last straw. He's very ill. I can't leave him at the moment - but anyway we couldn't do anything! Only the police can help now. To think those horrible men took George by mistake!'

'Don't worry too much, Aunt Fanny,' said Julian. 'We've hidden Berta away safely, and I expect the men will free George as soon as she tells them she's the wrong girl.'

'If she does tell them!' said Dick, under his breath. 'She might not, for Berta's sake, for a few days at any rate!'

Everyone went miserable to bed that night. Anne took Timmy and Sally with her, for both were so forlorn that she couldn't bear to do anything else. Timmy wouldn't eat anything at all, and Anne was worried about him.

Julian could not go to sleep. He tossed and turned, thinking about George. Hot-tempered, courageous, impatient, independent George! He worried and worried about her, wishing he could do something!

A small stone suddenly rattled against his window! He sat up, alert at once. Then something fell right into the room, and rolled over the floor. Julian was at the window in a trice. Who was throwing pebbles at his window?

He leaned out. A voice came up to him at once. 'Is it you, Dick?'

'Jo! What are you doing here?' said Julian, startled. 'It's Julian speaking. Dick's asleep. I'll wake him, and let you in.'

But he did not need to go down and let Jo in. She was up a tree outside the window and across some ivy and on his window-sill before he had even shaken Dick awake!

She slid into the room. Julian switched on his light. There was Jo, sitting at the end of Dick's bed, the familiar cheeky grin on her face! She was very brown, but still showed her freckles, and her hair was as short and curly as ever.

'I had to come,' she said. 'When I got home from shopping, there was this girl Jane! She told me all about how George had been captured in mistake for her - and when I said to her, 'You go straightaway and say you're safe and sound, and it's all a mistake, and George has got to be set free!' she wouldn't! She just wouldn't! All she did was to sit and cry. Little coward!'

'No, no, Jo,' said Dick, and tried to explain everything to the indignant girl. But he could not convince her.

'If I was that girl Jane I wouldn't let someone stay kidnapped because of me,' she said. 'I don't like her, she's silly. And I'm supposed to keep an eye on her! Phoo! Not me! I'd like her to be kidnapped, the way she's behaving about George.'

Julian looked at Jo. She was very, very loyal to the Five, and proud of being their friend. She had been in two adventures with them now, an artful little gypsy girl, but a very loyal friend. Her father was in prison, and she was living with a cousin of Joan's, and, for the first time in her life, going to school to learn lessons!

'Listen, Jo - we've found out a few more things since Berta - I mean Lesley - no, I don't, I mean Jane...'

'What do you mean?' said Jo, puzzled.

'I mean Jane,' said Julian. 'We've found out something else since Joan parked Jane with her cousin this morning.'

'Go on, tell me,' said Jo. 'Have you found out where George is? I'll go and break in and get her out, if you do!'

'Oh Jo - it's no use just being fierce,' said Dick. 'Things are not so easy as all that!'

'George threw out a bit of paper with this written on it,' said Julian, and he put it before Jo. 'See? Just that one word - 'Gringo'. Does it mean anything to you?'

'Gringo?' said Jo. 'That rings a bell! Let's see now - Gringo!'

She frowned as she thought hard. Then she nodded. 'Oh yes, I remember now. A Fair came to the town a few weeks back - the big town not far from our village. It was called Gringo's Great Fair.'

'Where did it go?' asked Dick, eagerly.

'It was going to Fallenwick, then to Granton,' said Jo. 'I made friends with the boy whose father owned the roundabout, and gosh, I had about a hundred free rides.'

'You would!' said both boys together, and Jo grinned.

'Do you suppose this Gringo, who runs the Fair, could be anything to do with the name Gringo that George wrote on this paper?' said Julian.

'I dunno!' said Jo. 'But if you like I can go and find the Fair and get hold of Spiky - that's the roundabout boy - and see if I can find out anything. I know Spiky said Gringo was a real horror to work for, and thought himself as good as a lord!'

'Had he a car - a big car?' asked Dick, suddenly.

'I dunno that either,' said Jo. 'I can find out. Here - I'll go now! You lend me a bike and I'll bike to Granton?'

'Certainly not,' said Julian, startled at the idea of Jo biking the twelve miles to Granton in the middle of the night.

'All right,' said Jo, rather sulkily. 'I just thought you'd like me to help. It might be that this Gringo has got George somewhere. He was the kind of fellow who was a go-between, if you know what I mean.'

'How?' asked Dick.

'Well, Spiky said that if anyone wanted something dirty done, this Gringo just held out his hand, and if a wad of notes was put into it, he'd do it, and nothing said!' said Jo.

'I see,' said Julian. 'Hm - it sounds as if kidnapping would be right up his street, then.'

Jo laughed scornfully. 'That would be nothing to him - chicken-feed. Come on, Julian - let me have a lend of your bike.'

'NO,' said Julian. 'Thanks very, very much, but I'm not letting anyone ride to a Fair in the middle of the night to find out if a fellow called Gringo has anything to do with George. I can't believe he has, either - it's too far-fetched.'

'All right. But you asked me if the name meant anything to me,' said Jo, sounding offended. 'Anyway, it's a common enough nickname in the Circus world and the Fair world too. There's probably a thousand Gringos about!'

'It's time you went back home,' said Julian, looking at his watch. 'And be decent to Berta - I mean Jane - please, Jo. You can come over tomorrow to see if there's any more news. How did you get here tonight, by the way?'

'Walked,' said Jo. 'Well - ran, I mean. Not by the roads, though - they take too long. I go like the birds do - as straight as I can, and it's much shorter!'

Dick had a sudden picture of the valiant little Jo speeding through woods and fields, over hills and through valleys, as straight as a crow flying homewards. How did she find her way like that? He knew he would never be able to!

Jo slipped out over the window-sill, and down the tree, as easily as a cat. 'Bye!' she said. 'See you soon.'

'Give our love to Jane,' whispered Dick.

'Shan't!' said Jo, much too loudly, and disappeared.

Julian switched out the light. 'Whew!' he said, 'I always feel as if I've been blown about by a strong, fresh wind when I see Jo. What a girl! Fancy wanting to ride all the way to Granton tonight, after running all the way here from Berta's!'

'Yes. I'm jolly glad you wouldn't let her take your bike,' said Dick. 'It's a good thing she wouldn't dare to disobey you!'

He got into bed - and just at that very moment the two boys heard a loud ringing noise. Dick sat up straightaway.

'Well I'm blowed!' he said. 'The little wretch!'

'What's up?' said Julian, and then he too realised what the ringing was - a Bicycle Bell. Yes, a bell rung loudly and defiantly by someone cycling swiftly along the sea-road towards Granton!

'It's Jo!' said Dick. 'And she's taken my bike! I know its bell. Gosh, won't I rub her face in the mud when I get hold of her!'

Julian gave a loud guffaw. 'She's a monkey, a gallant, plucky, loyal, aggravating monkey. What a cheek she's got! She didn't dare to take my bike when I'd said no - so she took yours. Well - we can't do a thing about it now. What that roundabout boy is going to think when he's awakened in the middle of the night by Jo, I cannot imagine.'

'He's probably used to her,' said Dick. 'Well, let's go to sleep. I wonder if George is asleep or awake? I hate to think of her a prisoner somewhere.'

'I bet Timmy hates it more than we do,' said Dick, hearing a long-drawn whimper from the next room. 'Poor old Tim. He can't go to sleep either!'

Dick and Julian managed to go to sleep at last, both thinking of a speedy little figure on a bicycle, racing through the night to ask questions of a roundabout boy called Spiky!

Chapter 17
TO GRINGO'S FAIR

At half past seven next morning Joan came running upstairs to Julian's bedroom, a piece of paper in her hand. She knocked on the door.

'Master Julian! A dirty little note was on the front door mat when I got down this morning. It's folded over with your name on the outside.'

Julian was out of bed in a trice. A note from the kidnappers perhaps? No - it couldn't be. They wouldn't write to him!

It was from Jo! She had scribbled it so badly that Julian could hardly read it.

'Julian, I saw Spiky, he's coming to the beech at levven I took Dick's bike to go home on I will bring it back at levven, don't be too cross. Jo.'

'I suppose 'beech' doesn't mean a tree, it means the beach, the sands,' said Dick. 'And 'levven' means eleven o'clock. Little scallywag - I hope she hasn't damaged my bike in any way.'

Jo hadn't. She had actually managed to find time to clean it before she left home, and arrived with it so bright and gleaming that Dick hadn't the heart to scold her!

She was early so she came to the house instead of the beach. She rode through the gate and up the front path and Timmy ran to greet her with a volley of delighted barks. He liked Jo - in fact he really loved the little gypsy girl. She certainly had a way with animals! Sally followed, dancing on her tiptoes as usual, ready to welcome as a friend anyone that Timmy liked.

Dick hailed Jo from the front door as she came up. 'Hallo, bicycle-stealer! My word, what's happened to my bike - have you spring-cleaned it?'

Jo grinned, looking at Dick warily. 'Yes. I'm sorry I took it, Dick.'

'You're not a bit sorry - but I'll forgive you,' said Dick, grinning too. 'So you got to the Fair safely after all?'

'Oh yes - and I woke up Spiky - he wasn't half surprised,' said Jo. 'But his Pa was sleeping in the same caravan as he was, so I couldn't say much. I just told him to be on Kirrin Beach at eleven. Then I rode back home. I ought to have left your bike on the way back, but I was a bit tired, so I rode home, instead of walking.'

'You can't have had much sleep last night,' said Julian, looking at the sunburnt girl with her untidy curly hair. 'Hallo - who's that?'

A short, plump boy was hurrying past the gate. He had a mop of black hair which stuck up into curious spikes of hair at the crown.

'Oh - that's Spiky!' said Jo. 'He's on time, isn't he? He's called Spiky because of his hair. You won't believe it, but he spends a fortune on hair-oil, trying to make those spiky bits go flat. But they won't.' She called loudly.

'Spiky! Hey, SPIKY!'

Spiky turned at once. He had a pleasant, rather lopsided face, and eyes as black as currants. He stood staring at Jo and the boys. 'I'm just off to the beach,' he said.

'Right. We're coming too,' said Jo, and she and the boys went to join. They met the ice-cream man on the way and Julian bought an ice-cream for each of them.

'Coo - thanks,' said Spiky, pleased. He was rather shy of Dick and Julian, and wondered very much why he had been asked to come.

They sat down on the beach. 'I wasn't half scared when you came tapping at the window last night,' he said to Jo, licking his ice-cream with a very pink tongue. 'What's it all about?'

'Well,' said Julian, cautiously, 'we're interested in somebody called Gringo.'

'Old Gringo?' said Spiky. 'A lot of people's interested in Gringo. Do you know what we say at the Fair? We say Gringo ought to put up a notice. 'All dirty work done here!' He's a bad lot, Gringo is - but he pays us well, even if he makes us work like slaves.'

'He owns the Fair, doesn't he?' said Julian, and Spiky nodded. 'I expect he uses it as a cover for all his other, bigger jobs,' Julian said to Dick. He looked at the plump, black-eyed boy, wondering how far he could trust him. Jo saw the look and knew what it meant.

'He's all right,' she said, nodding towards Spiky. 'You can say what you like. He's an oyster, he is. Ain't you, Spiky?'

Spiky grinned his lop-sided grin. Julian decided to trust him, and speaking in a low voice that really thrilled Spiky, he told him about the kidnapping of George. Spiky's eyes nearly fell out of his head.

'Coo!' he said. 'I bet old Gringo's at the bottom of that. Last week he went off up to London - he told my Pa he was on to a big job - an American job, he said it was.'

'Yes - it sounds as if it all fits,' said Julian. 'Spiky, this kidnapping happened the night before last. Did anything unusual occur in the Fair camp, do you know? It must have happened in the middle of the night.'

Spiky considered. He shook his head. 'No - I don't think so. Gringo's big double-caravan is still there - so he can't have gone. He had it moved right away from the camp yesterday morning - said there was too much noise for his old Ma, who lives in his posh caravan and looks after him. We was all glad it was moved - now he can't spy on us so easily!'

'I suppose you...' began Julian, and then stopped as Dick gave an exclamation.

'I've got an idea!' he said. 'Suppose that caravan was moved for another reason - suppose someone was making a row inside the van - someone shouting for help, say! Gringo would have to move it away from the rest of the camp in case that someone was heard.'

There was a pause, and then Spiky nodded. 'Yes. It could be,' he said. 'I've never known Gringo move his caravan away from the camp before. Shall I do a bit of snooping for you?'

'Yes,' said Julian, excited. 'My word - it would be a bit of luck if we could find George so quickly - and so near us too! A Fair camp would be a fine place to hide her, of course. Thank goodness we found that bit of paper with 'Gringo' written on it!'

'Let's all go to the Fair this afternoon,' said Dick. 'Timmy too. He'd smell out George at once.'

'Hadn't we better tell the police first?' said Julian. At once Spiky and Jo got up in alarm. Spiky looked as if he were going to run away immediately!

'Don't you get the police, Julian!' said Jo urgently. 'You won't get anything more out of Spiky, if you do. Not a thing.'

'I'm going,' said Spiky, still looking terrified.

'No, you're not,' said Dick, and caught hold of him. 'We shan't go to the police. They might frighten off Gringo and make him smuggle George away at once. I've no doubt he has plans to do so at any minute. We shan't say a word, so sit down and be sensible.'

'You can believe him,' Jo told Spiky. 'He's straight, see?'

Spiky sat down, still looking wary. 'If you're coming to the Fair, come at four,' he said. 'It's half-day closing today for the towns around, and the place will be packed. If you want to do any snooping, you won't be noticed in that crowd.'

'Right,' said Julian. 'We'll be there. Look out for us, Spiky, in case you've got any news.'

Spiky then left, and the boys couldn't help smiling at his back view - the spikes of hair at the top of his head were so very noticeable!

'You'd better stay to lunch with us, Jo,' said Dick, and the delighted girl beamed all over her face.

'Will Joan's cousin mind you not being back to dinner?' asked Julian.

'No. I said I wouldn't be back all day,' said Jo. 'It's still school holidays, you see. Anyway, I can't stand that Jane - she moons about all the time - and she's got some of my clothes on, too.'

Jo sounded so indignant about Berta that the boys had to laugh. They all went back to Kirrin Cottage, and found Joan and Anne hard at work in the house.

'Well, you monkey!' said Joan to Jo. 'Up to tricks as usual, I hear. Throwing stones at people's windows in the middle of the night. You just try that on my window and see what happens to you! Now, put on that apron, and help round a bit. How's Miss Jane?'

Joan was most excited to hear about the boys' latest ideas as to where George might be. Julian gave her a warning.

'But no ringing up the police behind our backs this time, Joan,' he said. 'This is something best done by Dick and me.'

'Can't I come with Sally?' asked Anne.

'We can't possibly take Sally,' said Dick, 'in case Gringo's about and recognises her. So you'd better stay and look after her, and we'll take Timmy. He would be sure to smell where George is, if she's hidden anywhere in the camp. But I think she's probably in Gringo's own caravan.'

Timmy pricked up his ears every time he heard George's name mentioned. He was a very miserable dog indeed, and kept running to the front gate, hoping to see George coming along. Whenever they missed him, they knew where to find him - lying mournfully on George's empty bed - probably with an equally mournful Sally beside him!

The boys and Jo set off to the Fair about half past three, on their bicycles. Jo rode Anne's this time, and Timmy ran valiantly beside them. Jo glanced at Dick's bicycle from time to time, proud of its brilliant look - how well she had cleaned it that morning!

They came to the Fair. 'You can put your bikes up against Spiky's caravan,' said Jo. 'They'll be safe there. Will you pay, and then we'll get in straightaway? You needn't pay for me - I'm going through the gap in the hedge. I'm Spiky's friend, so it's all right.'

She gave Dick her bicycle and disappeared. Julian paid and went in at the gate. They saw Jo waving wildly to them from the side of the big field and wheeled the three bicycles over to her, Timmy following closely at their heels.

'Hallo!' said Spiky, appearing suddenly. 'See you soon! I've got to go and 'tend to the roundabout. I've got a bit of news, but not much. That's Gringo's caravan over there, the double-one, big van in front, little van behind.'

He nodded his head to where a most magnificent caravan stood, right away from the rest of the camp. There were people milling about all round the other vans, but there was nobody at all by Gringo's. Evidently no one dared to go too near.

'I vote we buy a ball at one of the stands, and then go and play near Gringo's caravan,' said Dick, in a low voice. 'Then one of us will throw the ball too hard and it will go near the van - and we'll somehow manage to get a peep inside. Timmy can go sniffing round while we play. If George is there he'll bark the place down.'

'Jolly good idea!' said Julian. 'Come on, Jo! And keep your eyes open all the time in case you've got to warn us of danger.'

Chapter 18

SPIKY IS VERY HELPFUL

The two boys and Jo, with Timmy at their heels, wandered round the Fair to find somewhere to buy a ball. There seemed to be none for sale, so they had a go at a Hoopla stall, and Julian managed to get a ring round a small red ball. Just the thing!

It was a big and noisy Fair, and hundreds of people from the near-by towns had come on this shops' closing day to enjoy the fun. The roundabout played its loud, raucous music all the time, swings went to and fro, the dodgem cars banged and bumped one another as usual, and men went round shouting their wares.

'Balloons! Giant balloons! Three pence each!'

'Ice-cream! All flavours.'

'Tell your fortune, lady? I'll tell it true as can be!'

Jo was very much at home in the Fair. She had been brought up in one, and knew all the tricks of the trade. Timmy was rather amazed at the noise, and kept close to the boys, his tail still down because he could not forget that George was missing.

'Now let's play our little game of ball,' said Julian. 'Come on, Tim - and if we get into any trouble, just growl and show your teeth, see?'

The three of them, with Timmy, went to the clear space of field that separated the magnificent caravan from the rest of the Camp. A man at a near-by stall called to them.

'Hey! You'll get into trouble if you play there!' But they took no notice and he shrugged his shoulders and began to shout his wares.

They threw the ball to one another, and then Julian flung it so wildly that it ran right up to the wheels of the front caravan of the pair. In a trice Dick and Jo were after it. Jo leapt up on a wheel and looked in at the big window, while Dick ran to the small van that was attached behind the big one.

A quick glance assured Jo that the big caravan was empty. The interior was furnished in a most luxurious way and looked like a very fine bed-sitting-room. She leapt down.

Dick peered into the window of the smaller van. At first he thought there was no one there - and then he saw a pair of very fierce, angry eyes looking at him - the eyes of a small, bent old woman with untidy hair. She looked rather like a witch, Dick thought. She was sitting sewing in a bunk, and, as he looked in, she shook her fist at him and called out something he couldn't hear.

He jumped down and joined the others. 'No one at all in the big van,' said Jo.

'Only a witch-like old woman in the other,' reported Dick, in deep disappointment. 'Unless George is pushed under a bunk or squashed into a cupboard, she's certainly not there!'

'Timmy doesn't seem interested in the caravans at all, does he?' said Julian. 'I'm sure if George really was in one of those caravans, he'd bark and try to get inside.'

'Yes - I think he would,' said Dick. 'Hallo, there's somebody coming out of the second van. It's the old lady! She's in a fine old temper!'

So she was! She came down the steps to the van, shouting and shaking her fist at them. 'Tim - go and find, go and find - in that van!' said Julian, suddenly, as the old woman came towards them.

The three of them stood their ground as the old woman came right up. They couldn't understand a word she said, partly because she had no teeth, and partly because she spoke a mixture of many languages. Anyway, it was quite obvious that she was ticking them off for daring to play near the two vans.

Timmy had understood what Julian had said, and had slipped inside the second van. He was there for half a minute, and then he barked. The boys jumped, and Dick made a move towards the van.

Then Timmy appeared, dragging something behind him with his teeth. He tried to bark at the same time, but he couldn't. He dragged the coat-like thing right down to the ground before the old woman was on him, screaming in a high voice, and hitting him. She pulled the garment away and went up the steps, kicking out at the surprised Timmy as he tried to pull it away. The door slammed.

'If that old woman hadn't been old, Timmy would have soon shown her he was top dog!' said Dick. 'Whatever was he pulling out of the van?'

'Come over here, out of sight of the van,' said Julian, urgently. 'Didn't you recognise it, Dick? It was George's dressing-gown!'

'My word!' said Dick, stopping in surprise. 'Yes, you're right - it was. Whew! What does that mean exactly? George certainly isn't in those vans, or Timmy would have found her.'

'I sent him in to see if he could smell that George had been hidden there,' said Julian. 'I thought he would bark excitedly if he smelt her scent anywhere - on the bunk, perhaps. I never guessed he'd find her dressing-gown and drag it out to show us!'

'Good old Timmy! Clever old Timmy!' said Dick, patting the dog, whose tail was now at half-mast instead of right down. He had at least found George's dressing-gown - but how surprising to find it in that caravan!

'Why on earth didn't they take the dressing-gown with them, when they took George off?' wondered Julian. 'There's no doubt that she has been in that caravan - she was taken straight there the night before last, I expect. Where is she now?'

'She must have been dressed differently,' said Dick. 'They must have had to dress her properly, when they took her somewhere else. After all, she was only in pyjamas and dressing-gown.'

Jo was listening to all this, puzzled and worried. She nudged Dick. 'Spiky's beckoning to us,' she said. They went over to the roundabout boy, whose father was now in charge of the noisy machine.

Spiky took them into his caravan, a small and rather dirty one, in which he lived with his father.

'I saw Gringo's old Ma chasing you!' he said with his lop-sided grin. 'What was your dog dragging out of the van?'

They told him. He nodded. 'I've been asking round a bit, cautious-like,' he said. 'Just to see if anyone had heard anything from Gringo's caravan - and the fellow whose caravan is nearest told me he heard shouts and yells two nights ago. He reckoned it was someone in Gringo's van - but he's too scared of Gringo to go and interfere, of course.'

'That would be George yelling,' said Dick.

'Well, then Gringo's vans were moved the next day right away from the other vans,' said Spiky. 'And this afternoon, before the Fair opened, Gringo got his car and towed the little van - the second one - out of the field, and set off with it. We all wondered why, but he told somebody it needed repairing.'

'Whew! And George was inside!' said Dick. 'What a cunning way of moving her off to another hiding-place.'

'When did the van come back?' asked Julian.

'Just before you came,' said Spiky. 'I don't know where it went. It was gone an hour, I should think.'

'An hour,' said Dick. 'Well, suppose it goes at an average of 25 miles an hour - you can't go very fast if you are towing something - that would mean he had gone somewhere about 12 miles or so away, and come back the same distance - making about an hour's drive, allowing for a stop when they arrived at the place they had to leave her at.'

'Yes,' said Julian. 'But there are lots of places within the radius of 12 miles!'

'Where's Gringo's car?' said Dick suddenly.

'Over there, under that big tarpaulin,' said Spiky. 'It's a silver-grey one - American and very striking. He thinks the world of it, Gringo does.'

'I'm going to have a peep at it,' said Julian, and strode off. He came to the tarpaulin, which covered the car right to the ground. He lifted it and was just about to look under it when a man ran up, shouting.

'Here, you! Leave that alone! You'll be turned out of the Fair if you mess about with things that don't concern you!'

But Timmy was with Julian, and he turned and growled so fiercely that the man stopped in a hurry. Julian had plenty of time to take a good look under the tarpaulin!

Yes - the car was silver-grey, a big American one - and the wings were bright blue! Julian took a quick look at the two left-hand ones and saw a deep scratch on one of them. Before he dropped the tarpaulin he had time to glance at the tyres. He was sure they had the same pattern as those shown in the wheel-tracks he had sketched! He had checked the sketch with Jim, at Kirrin Garage, who had told him they were an American design.

Yes - this was the car that had hidden in the clearing the night before last - the car that had turned with difficulty and made those deep ruts - the car that had taken George away, and this afternoon had towed away the caravan with her inside, to hide her somewhere else.

He dropped the tarpaulin and walked back to the others, excited, taking no notice of the rude things that the near-by man called out to him.

'It's the car, all right,' said Julian. 'Now - WHERE did it go this afternoon? If only we could find out!'

'It's such a very striking car that anyone would notice it - especially as it was towing a rather nice little caravan,' said Dick.

'Yes - but we can't go round the countryside asking everyone we meet if they've noticed a silver-grey car with blue wings,' said Julian.

'Let's go back home and get a map and see the lie of the country round about,' said Dick. 'Spiky, which way did the car turn when it went out of the field-gate?'

'Towards the east,' said Spiky. 'On the road to Big Twillingham.'

'Well, that's something to know,' said Dick. 'Come on, let's get our bikes. Thanks most awfully, Spiky. You've been a terrific help. We'll let you know what happens.'

'Call on me if ever you want more help,' said Spiky, proudly, and gave them a smart little salute, bobbing his head so that his spikes of hair shook comically.

The three of them rode off, with Timmy running beside them again. As soon as they got home they told Anne and Joan all they had found out. Joan was for ringing up the police at once again, but Julian stopped her.

'I think perhaps we can do this next bit of work better than they can,' he said. 'We're going to try and find out where the car went, Joan. Now - where are the maps of the district?'

They found them and began to pore over them. Jo was quite lost when it came to map-reading. She could find her way anywhere, day or night - but not with a map!

'Now - here's the road to Big Twillingham and Little Twillingham,' he said. 'Let's list carefully all the roads the car could take from there. My word - it's a job!'

Chapter 19

AN EXCITING PLAN

After fifteen minutes they had six towns on their list, all of which could have been reached in about half-an-hour from Big Twillingham, which was two miles away from the Fair.

'And now what do you propose to do, Ju?' asked Dick. 'Bike over to all the towns and ask if anyone has seen the car?'

'No. We can't possibly do that,' said Julian. 'I'm going down to the garage to see our friend Jim, and get his help! I'm going to ask him to ring up any friends he has in the garages in those towns, and ask if they've seen the car passing through.'

'Won't he think it's a bit funny?' asked Anne.

'Yes. But he won't mind how funny it is if we pay the telephone-calls and give him fifty pence for his trouble!' said Julian, folding up the map. 'And what's more he won't ask any questions either. He'll probably think it's some silly bet we've got on with one another.'

Jim was quite willing to ring up the garages for them. He knew boys working in main garages in four of the towns, and he knew the hall-porter of a hotel in the fifth town. But he knew no one in the sixth.

'That don't matter!' he said. 'We'll ring up the garage in the High Street there, and just ask whoever comes to the phone.'

Jim rang up the garage in Hillingford, and had a rather cheeky conversation with his friend there. He put the receiver down. 'No go,' he said. 'He says no car like that came through Hillingford, or he'd have noticed it that time of day. I'll ring up Jake at Green's Garage in Lowington now.'

'That's no go, either,' he said, after a minute's telephone conversation. 'I'll try my hall-porter now. He's a cousin of mine.'

The hall-porter had some news. 'Yes!' Jim kept saying. 'Yes, that's the one! Yes, yes! You heard him say that, did you? Thanks most awfully.'

'What is it?' asked Dick, eagerly, when Jim at last put down the receiver.

'Pat - that's the hall porter - says he was off duty this afternoon, and went to buy some cigarettes at a little shop in the main street of Graysfield, where his hotel is - and as he stood talking to the fellow in the shop an enormous car drew up at the kerb - silver-grey, with blue wings - an American car, left-hand drive and all.'

'Yes - what next?' said Julian, eagerly.

'Well, the driver got out to get some cigarettes at the shop. He had dark glasses on, and a big gold ring on his finger - Pat noticed that...'

'That must be the man who asked about us at the tea-shop in Kirrin!' said Julian, remembering. 'Go on, Jim - this is wonderful!'

'Well, Pat's interested in big cars, so he went out and had a good look at it,' said Jim. 'He said the car had its blinds drawn down at the back, so he couldn't see inside. The fellow with the dark glasses came out and got into the driver's seat again. He called out to whoever was behind and said 'Which way now?'

'Yes, yes - did he hear the answer?' said Julian.

'Somebody called back and said, 'Not far now. Into Twining, turn to the left, and it's the house on the hill.'

'Well! Of all the luck!' said Dick. 'Would that be where G ...' He stopped at a sharp nudge from Julian, and remembered that he mustn't give too much away to the helpful Jim.

Julian passed over fifty pence to the pleased garage boy, who pocketed it at once, grinning. 'Now, you just come along to me if you want to know about any more cars,' he said. 'I'll phone all over the place for you! Thanks a lot!'

They sped back to Kirrin Cottage, too excited even to talk. They flung their bicycles against the wall and ran in to tell Anne and Joan. Timmy and Sally sensed their excitement and danced round, barking loudly.

'We know where George is!' cried Dick. 'We know, we know!'

Joan and Anne listened eagerly. 'Well, Master Julian,' said Joan, in admiration, 'it was really smart of you to make Jim phone up like that. The police couldn't have done better. What are you going to do now? Ring up that sergeant?'

'No,' said Julian. 'I'm so afraid that if the police get moving on this now, they'll alarm Gringo and he'll spirit George away somewhere else. Dick and I will go to this place tonight, and see if we can't get hold of George and bring her back! After all - it's only an ordinary house, I imagine - and as Gringo doesn't suspect that anyone knows where George is, he won't be on the look out!'

'Good!' said Dick. 'Good, good, good!'

'I'm coming too,' said Jo.

'You are not,' said Julian, at once. 'That's flat - you are NOT COMING, Jo. But I shall take Timmy, of course.'

Jo said no more, but looked so sulky that Anne laughed. 'Cheer up, Jo. You can keep me and Sally company. Oh Julian - wouldn't it be wonderful to find George and rescue her!'

There was more map-reading as the boys decided which was the best way to bicycle over to Graysfield. 'Look out the best torches we've got, Anne, will you?' said Dick. 'And let me see - how can we bring George back once we've got her? On my bike-step, I think, though I know it's not allowed. But this is very urgent. We can't very well take a third bike with us. Gosh, isn't this exciting!'

'We really ought to ring up the police,' said Joan, who kept saying this at intervals.

'Joan, you sound like a parrot!' said Julian. 'If we're not back by morning you can ring up all the police in the country if you want to!'

'There's been another phone-call from your aunt today, Master Julian - I nearly forgot to tell you,' said Joan. 'Your uncle is better and they are coming home as soon as possible.'

'Not this evening, I hope,' said Julian, in alarm. 'Did they tell you anything about Mr. Elbur Wright - Berta's father?'

'Oh, he's hanging on to his secrets quite happily now that he knows it isn't Berta who is kidnapped,' said Joan. 'I don't know if the kidnappers even know they've got the wrong girl yet. It's all very hush-hush. Even your uncle and aunt are having to obey the police. Your poor aunt is so terribly upset about George.'

'Yes. She must be frightfully worried,' said Julian, soberly. 'We've had so much excitement today that I've almost forgotten to worry. And anyway when you're able to do something, things don't seem so bad.'

'You be careful you don't go and do too much and land yourself in trouble,' said Joan, darkly.

'I'll be careful!' said Julian, winking at Dick. 'I say - isn't it nearly supper-time? I feel awfully hungry.'

'Well, we haven't had any tea,' said Dick. 'How extraordinary to have forgotten about tea. No wonder we're hungry.'

'Would you like bacon and eggs for a treat?' said Joan, and there was a chorus of approval at once. Timmy and Sally wagged their tails as if Joan's question applied to them too!

'We'll set off as soon as it's dark,' said Julian. 'Jo, you'd better go home after supper. They'll be worrying about you.'

'All right,' said Jo, pleased to have been asked to supper, but still sulky at being forbidden to go with Julian and Dick that night.

Jo disappeared after supper, with many messages to Berta from Dick, Julian, Anne and Sally.

'And I bet she doesn't give a single one of them!' said Dick. 'Now, let's have a game before we set off, Julian. Just to take our minds off the excitement. I'm getting all worked-up!'

Joan went up to bed at ten because she was tired. Anne stayed up to see the boys off. 'You will be careful,' she kept saying. 'You will be careful, won't you? Oh dear, I think it's almost worse to stay behind and wonder what's happening to you, than to go with you and find out!'

At last the time came for the boys to go. It was a quarter to twelve and, except for a small moon, was a dark night, with great clouds looming up, often hiding the moon.

'Come on, Timmy,' said Dick. 'We're going to find George.'

'Woof!' said Timmy, delighted. Sally wuffed too, and was most disappointed at being left behind. The boys wheeled their bicycles to the front gate.

'So long, Anne!' said Dick. 'Go to bed - and hope to see George when you wake up!'

They set off on their bicycles, with Timmy loping along beside them. They soon arrived at the field where the Fair was, and went swinging away to the east, following the road the silver-grey car had gone that afternoon.

They knew the way by heart, for they had studied the map so well. As they passed the signposts they felt their excitement beginning to mount. 'Graysfield next,' said Dick at last. 'Soon be there, Timmy! You're not getting tired, are you?'

They came into Graysfield silently. The town was asleep, and not a single light showed in any window. A policeman suddenly loomed up out of the shadows, but when he saw two boys cycling, he did not stop them.

'Now - into Twining Village, turn to the left - and look for the house on the hill!' said Dick.

They rode through the tiny, silent village of Twining, and took the lane to the left. It led up a steep, narrow lane. The boys had to get off and walk because the hill was too much for them.

'There's the house!' said Julian, suddenly whispering. 'Look - through those trees. My word, it looks a dark and lonely one!'

They came to some enormous iron gates, but when they tried to open them, they found them locked. A great wall ran completely round the grounds. They followed it a little way, leaving their bicycles against a tree by the gate, but it was soon certain that nobody could climb a wall like that!

'Blow!' said Julian. 'Blow!'

'What about the gates?' whispered Dick. Then he glanced round him nervously, hearing a twig crack. 'Did you hear that? There's nobody following us, is there?'

'No! Don't get the jitters, for goodness' sake!' said Julian. 'What was it you were saying?'

'I said "What about the gates?" ' said Dick. 'I don't see why we can't climb over them, do you? Nobody would do that in the daytime, they'd be seen - but I can't see why we can't do it now - they didn't look too difficult - just ordinary wrought-iron ones.'

'Yes! Of course!' said Julian. 'That's a brain-wave. Come on!'

Chapter 20

A THRILLING TIME

The two boys went back to the gates. Dick turned round and looked behind him two or three times. 'I do hope nobody is shadowing us!' he said. 'I keep on feeling somebody's watching us all the time.'

'Oh, stuff!' said Julian, impatiently. 'Look - here are the gates. Give me a leg-up and I'll be over in a jiffy.'

Dick gave him a shove, and Julian climbed over the gates without much difficulty. They were bolted, not locked. He slid the great bolts carefully, and opened one gate a little for Dick and Timmy. 'Timmy can't be left behind!' he said. 'And he certainly couldn't climb this gate!'

They kept to the shadowed side of the drive as they walked up towards the house. The small moon came out from behind a cloud as they came near. It was an old house, with high chimneys, an ugly house with narrow windows that seemed like watching eyes.

Dick glanced behind him suddenly and Julian saw him. 'Got the jitters again?' he said, impatiently. 'Dick, don't be an ass. You know perfectly well that if anyone was shadowing us, Timmy would hear them and go for them at once.'

'Yes, I know,' said Dick. 'I'm an idiot - but I've just got that feeling tonight - the feeling that someone else is there!'

They came right up to the house. 'How shall we get in?' whispered Julian. 'The doors are all sure to be locked. We'll have to try the windows.'

They tiptoed silently round the big house. As Julian had said, the doors were all locked. The windows were all fastened too - well and truly fastened. Not one was open or could be opened.

'If this is a house belonging to Gringo he must be able to hide plenty of things in absolute safety - bolted gates, high walls, locked doors, fastened windows!' said Dick. 'No burglar could possibly get in.'

'And neither can we,' said Julian, desperately. 'We've been all round the house three times now! There's no door, no window we can get in. No balcony to climb up to - no ivy to hang on to - nothing!'

'Let's go round once more,' said Dick. 'We might have missed something.'

So once more they went round - and discovered something curious when they got to the kitchen quarters. The moon came out, and showed them a round black hole in the ground! Whatever could it be?

They tiptoed to it just as the moon went in again. They shone their torches on it briefly.

'It's a coal-hole!' said Dick, astonished. 'Why didn't we see it before? Look, there's the lid just beside it. It's been left open. I suppose the moon was in last time we came by this part of the house. I can't think how we didn't notice it.'

Julian was uneasy. 'I didn't see it before, certainly. It's queer. Could it be a trap, do you think?'

'I don't see how it could be,' said Dick. 'Come on - let's get down. At least it's a way in.' He shone his torch into the hole. 'Yes, look - there's a whole lot of coke down there - we can easily jump on to it. Tim, you go first and spy out the land.'

Timmy jumped down at once, the coke slithering away from beneath his four paws. 'He's down all right,' said Julian. 'I'll go next.'

Down he jumped, and the coke slithered away again, making what seemed to be a very loud noise in the silent night. Julian shone his torch around.

They were standing on a very large heap of coke in the middle of a big cellar. At the end was a door.

'Hope it's not locked,' said Dick, in a whisper. 'Now, Tim, keep to heel, for goodness' sake, and don't make a sound!'

They went to the door, treading on gritty bits of coke. Julian turned the dirty handle - and the door opened inwards! 'It's not locked!' said Julian, thankfully.

They crept through it, Timmy treading on their heels, and found themselves in another cellar, set with stone shelves on which were piled tins and boxes and crates. 'Enough food here to stand a siege!' whispered Dick. 'Where are the cellar-steps? We've got to get out.'

'Over there,' said Julian. Then he stopped and put out his torch. He had heard something.

'Did you hear that?' he whispered. 'It sounded like somebody treading on the coke in the coal-cellar! Gosh, I hope nobody is shadowing us. We'll soon be prisoners if so.'

They listened but heard nothing further. Up the stone steps they went and undid the door at the top. A big kitchen lay beyond, lighted by the dim moon. A shadow rose suddenly in front of them and Timmy growled. Dick's heart almost stopped beating. What in the world was that, crawling silently over the floor and disappearing in the shadows? He clutched at Julian and made him jump.

'Don't do that, ass! That was only the kitchen cat you saw,' whispered Julian. 'Gosh, you made me jump. Wasn't it a good thing that Timmy didn't go for the cat? There would have been an awful yowling!'

'Where do you suppose George will be?' asked Dick. 'Somewhere at the top of the house?'

'I've no idea. We'll just have to look into every room,' said Julian. So they looked into every room on the ground floor, but they were empty. They were huge rooms, ugly and over-furnished.

'Come on - up the stairs!' said Dick, and up they went. They came to an enormous landing, hung with tapestry curtains at the windows. Timmy suddenly gave a small growl and in a trice both boys had hidden themselves in the folds of the long window-curtains. Timmy went with them, feeling surprised. Dick peeped out after a minute.

'I think it was that cat again,' he whispered. 'Look, there it is, up on that chest. It's following us, wondering what on earth we're doing, I expect!'

'Blow it!' said Julian. 'I'm getting the jitters now, being watched by a shadowy cat. I suppose it is real?'

'Timmy thinks so!' said Dick. 'Come on - there are any amount of bedroom doors on this landing.'

They tiptoed into the ones whose doors were open, but no one was sleeping in the beds there. They came to a closed door and listened. Someone was snoring inside!

'That's not George,' said Dick. 'Anyway, she'd be locked in, and the key is in this door.'

They went to the next door, which was also shut. They listened and could hear someone breathing heavily.

'Not George,' said Dick, and they went on up to the next flight of stairs. There were four more rooms there, two of them not even furnished. The doors of the other two were ajar, and it was clear that people were sleeping in them, because once more there was loud breathing to be heard.

'There don't seem to be any more rooms,' said Dick, in dismay, as they flashed their torches carefully round the top landing. 'Blow! Where's George then?'

'Look - there's a little wooden door there,' said Julian, in Dick's ear. 'A door leading into the cistern room, I should think.'

'She wouldn't be there,' said Dick. 'But wait - look, there's a strong bolt on the door! And cistern rooms don't have bolts on their doors, or even locks. This one hasn't a lock, but it has a bolt.'

'Sh! Not so loud!' said Julian. 'Yes, that's funny, I must say. How can we get the door open without waking the people in those other two rooms?'

'We'll shut their doors very quietly, and we'll lock them!' said Dick, excited. 'I'll go and do it.'

He drew the doors gently to, and then locked first one and then the other, having taken the keys from the other side of the doors to do so. Except that one made a slight click as he locked it, there was no noise. Nobody stirred in the two rooms, and the boys breathed freely again.

They went to the little wooden door opposite. They pulled gently at the bolt, afraid that it might squeak. But it didn't. It was obviously quite new, and ran easily. The door opened outwards with a small creak. There was pitch darkness inside, and the sound of trickling water from the cistern.

Dick flashed his torch on and off quickly. In that second he saw something that made his heart jump!

There was a small mattress on the floor of the little cistern room, and someone was lying on it, rolled so completely in blankets that even the head was covered! Julian had seen it too, and he put his arm on Dick's, afraid that it might not be George, afraid that it might be someone who would give the alarm, perhaps another prisoner.

But Timmy knew who it was! Timmy ran straight in with a small, loving whimper and flung himself on the sleeping figure!

Dick shut the cistern room door at once, afraid of the noise being heard. Timmy might bark with joy in a moment, or George might shout!

The figure gave a grunt and sat up. The blanket fell away from the head - and there was George's curly nob, and her startled face.

'Sh!' said Dick, raising his finger warningly. 'SH!' Timmy was licking George from head to foot, wild with delight, but extraordinarily silent - clever old Timmy knew that this was one of the times when joy must be dumb!

'Oh!' said George, hugging Timmy anywhere she could. 'Oh, Timmy! I missed you so! Darling, darling, Tim! Oh Timmy!'

Dick stood by the closed door, listening to find out if anyone was stirring in the other rooms. He heard nothing at all. Julian went to George.

'Are you all right, George?' he asked. 'Have you been treated well?'

'Not very,' said George. 'But then I didn't behave very well! I did quite a lot of kicking and biting - so they locked me in here!'

'Poor old George!' said Julian. 'Well, we'll hear everything when we've got out of here. So far, we've been jolly lucky. Can you come now?'

'Yes,' said George and got off the mattress. She was dressed in an odd selection of clothes, and looked rather peculiar. 'That awful old woman - Gringo's mother - found these for me when I was taken to the caravan,' she said. 'Gosh, I've got a lot to tell you!'

'Sh!' said Dick, at the door. 'Not a sound, now! I'm going to open the door!'

He opened it slowly. All was quiet. 'Now we'll go down the stairs,' he said. 'Not a sound!'

They went down the first flight of stairs and on to the enormous landing. Then, just as Dick put his foot on to the next stair down, he trod on something soft that yowled, spat and scratched. It was that cat!

Dick fell half-way down the stairs, and Timmy could not stop himself from chasing the cat up the landing and up the top stairs to the cistern room. Nor could he stop himself from barking!

Shouts came from two of the near-by bedrooms and two men appeared in pyjamas. One switched on the landing light, and then both of them tore down the stairs after the three children. Dick picked himself up, but he had ricked his ankle and could not even walk!

'Run, George - I'll see to Dick!' yelled Julian. Rut George stopped too - and in a trice the two men were on to them, catching hold of Dick and Julian, and jerking them into a near-by room.

'Tim! TIM!' shouted George. 'Help, Timmy!'

But before Timmy could come pelting down the stairs from the attic George was shoved into the room too, and the door locked.

'Look out for the dog!' shouted one of the men. 'He's dangerous!'

Timmy certainly was! He came tearing towards the men, snarling, his eyes blazing, showing all his teeth.

The men darted into the room next to the one into which they had locked the children, and banged the door. Timmy flung himself against it in rage, snarling and growling in a most terrifying manner. If only he could get at those men! If only he could!

Chapter 21

MOST UNEXPECTED!

Soon there was real pandemonium in the old house! The sleepers in the rooms on the top landing awoke suddenly and found their doors locked, and began to bang on them and shout. The three children in the locked room on the ground floor shouted and banged too - and Timmy nearly went mad!

Only the men in the room next to the children were silent. They were terrified at Timmy's growling and snarling. They would have liked to lock themselves in, but the key was on the other side of the door - and they certainly didn't dare to open it to get the key!

Soon the children quietened down. Dick sat on a chair, exhausted. 'That cat! That wretched, prowling, sly old cat! Gosh, I stepped on it and it scratched me to the bone - to say nothing of pitching me headlong down the stairs and making me wrench my ankle!'

'We so nearly managed to escape!' groaned Julian.

'I can't think what will happen now!' said George. 'Timmy's out there and can't get in to us, and we can't possibly get out to him because the door's locked - and those men won't dare to set a foot outside their door while Tim's there!'

'And we've locked the people into their rooms upstairs!' said Julian. 'Well, it's certain that nobody can get out of their rooms to help anyone else - so it looks as if we'll all be here till Doomsday!'

It certainly did seem a very poor look-out! The only people who were not behind locked doors were the two men, whoever they were - and they simply dared not put a foot outside their room.

Timmy roamed about, occasionally whimpering and scratching outside the children's door, but more often growling outside the next door, sometimes flinging his heavy body against it as if he would break it down.

'I bet the men are shaking with fright,' said Dick. 'They won't even dare to try and get out of a window in case they meet Timmy outside somewhere!'

'Serve them right,' said George. 'Gosh, I'm glad you came! Wasn't I an absolute ass to take Sally down to the kennel that night?'

'You were,' said Julian, 'I agree wholeheartedly. The men were waiting for a chance to get Berta, of course, and they saw you, complete with Berta's dog, and thought you were the girl they wanted!'

'Yes. They flung something all over my head so that I couldn't make a sound,' said George. 'I fought like anything, and my dressing-gown girdle must have slipped off - did you find it?'

'Yes,' said Dick. 'We were jolly glad to find a few other things too - the comb - the hanky - the sweet - and of course the note!'

'They carried me quite a way to somewhere in the wood,' said George. 'Then they plonked me down at the back of the car. But they had to turn it and it was difficult - and I had the bright thought of throwing out all the things in my dressing-gown pocket just in case you came along and saw them.'

'What about that note - with the word Gringo on?' asked Julian. 'That was a terrific help. We wouldn't be here tonight if it hadn't been for that.'

'Well, I heard one of the men call the other Gringo,' said George. 'And it was such an unusual name I thought I'd scribble it on a bit of paper and throw that out too - it was just on chance I did it.'

'A jolly good chance!' said Dick. 'Good thing you had a notebook and pencil with you!'

'I hadn't,' said George. 'But one of the men had left his coat in the back of the car and there was a notebook with a pencil in the breast-pocket. I just used that!'

'Jolly good!' said Julian.

'Well, they whizzed me off in the car to some Fairground or other,' said George. 'I heard the roundabout music next day. There was a horrid old witch-like woman in the caravan; she didn't seem at all pleased to see me. I had to sleep in a chair that night, and I got so wild that I yelled and shouted and threw things about and smashed quite a lot of cups and saucers. I enjoyed that.'

The boys couldn't help laughing. 'Yes - I bet you did,' said Dick. 'They had to move the caravan away from the Fair itself, because they were afraid people would hear you. In fact, I expect that's why Gringo decided to hide you here!'

'Yes. I suddenly felt a jolt, and found the caravan we were in was being towed away!' said George. 'I was awfully surprised. I waved at the windows and shouted as we drove through the streets, but nobody seemed to notice anything wrong - in fact some people waved back to me! Then we swung in through some gates, and came here - and, as I told you, they put me up here because I made such a nuisance of myself!'

'Did you tell them you weren't Berta?' asked Dick.

'No,' said George. 'Of course not. For two reasons - I knew there would be no fear of Berta's father giving those secrets away, because he'd be told by you that I had been kidnapped, not his precious Berta. So he'd hang on to them. And also I thought Berta would be safe, so long as I didn't tell the men they'd got the wrong person.'

'You're a good kid, George,' said Julian, and slapped her gently on the back. 'A - very - good - kid. I'm jolly proud of you. There's nobody like our George!'

'Don't be a fathead,' said George, but she was very pleased all the same.

'Well, there's no more to tell,' she said, 'except that the cistern room was most frightfully draughty, and I had to wrap my head up as well as my body when I lay down. And the cistern made awful noises - sort of rude noises, that made me want to say 'I beg your pardon!' all the time! Of course I knew you'd rescue me, so I wasn't awfully worried!'

'And we haven't rescued you!' said Julian. 'All we've done is to get ourselves locked up as well as you!'

'Tell me how you found out I was here,' said George. So the boys told her everything and she listened, thrilled.

'So Berta went to stay with Jo!' she said. 'I bet Jo didn't like that.'

'She didn't,' said Julian. 'But she's been quite a help. I only wish she was here now, and could do one of her ivy-climbing stunts, or something!'

'I say - Timmy's very quiet all of a sudden!' said George, listening. 'What's happened?'

They listened. Timmy was not barking or whimpering. There was no sound of him at all. What was happening? George's heart sank - perhaps those men had managed to do something to him?

But suddenly they heard him again, whimpering - but whimpering gladly and excitedly. And then a familiar voice came to their ears.

'Dick! Julian! Where are you?'

'Gosh - it's JO!' said Dick, astounded. He limped to the door. 'We're in here, Jo. Unlock the door!' Jo unlocked it and looked in, grinning. Timmy tore in like a whirlwind and flung himself on George, almost knocking her over. Dick limped out of the room immediately. Jo rushed in, much to everyone's astonishment. Then he returned, looking rather pleased with himself.

'Let's go while the going's good,' he said.

'Yes - but be careful, those men will be out, now that Timmy isn't there to guard them!' cried Julian, suddenly realising that the two angry fellows could easily escape while Timmy was in with them - and might lock the door on the lot of them, Timmy too!

'It's all right - there's no desperate hurry!' said Dick. 'I thought of that. I slipped out and locked their door on them, as soon as Jo rushed in to us. And there they can stay till the police arrive in the morning. They can then collect the whole lot - the men upstairs too.'

'And I'm sure the police will be quite pleased to search the house and the cellars,' said Julian. 'There will be plenty of stuff here that they will be interested in! Well, let's go at once.'

They called a cheery good-bye to the two men. 'We're off!' shouted Dick. 'You'd better look out for the dog in case he gets you!' They all went down the hall, Dick hobbling, for his ankle was still painful.

'We might as well leave in style,' said Julian, and unbolted and unlocked the front door. 'Also it would be as well to leave this door open for the police to come in by - I don't expect they will want to come in through the coal-hole! It was a good idea of yours to let the men think we were leaving Tim behind to guard them, Dick - they won't dare even to climb out of the windows in case he's waiting for them!'

'We've left a good many lights on,' said George, looking back. 'Never mind - we're not paying the bill! Come on, Timmy, out into the dark, dark night!'

They went down the front steps and into the dark drive. Everyone felt safe with Timmy running ahead.

'Jo - exactly how did you get here?' said Dick, suddenly. 'You were forbidden to come.'

'I know,' said Jo. 'Well, I just took Anne's bike and followed you, that's all. And I walked in through the front gates when you'd left them open, of course. That was easy.'

'Gosh - I kept feeling there was someone behind me!' said Dick. 'And there was - it was you, you little horror! No wonder Timmy didn't bother to bark or growl.'

'Yes, it was me,' said Jo. 'And I followed you round and round the house, while you were trying to get in - and I thought you never would see that coal-hole - so I took the lid off and put it on the ground, hoping you'd see it then. And you did!'

'So you did that!' said Dick. 'I must say I was astonished to see it. I knew we must have passed it before. So that was you too! You want spanking, you disobedient, cheeky little wretch!'

Jo laughed. 'I couldn't bear you to go off without me,' she said. 'It's a good thing I did come! I waited and waited inside that coal-hole for you to come back with George - and when you didn't, I left the coal-hole and got into the house. And Timmy heard me and came running down the stairs. He nearly knocked me over, he was that pleased!'

'Here are the gates at last,' said George. 'What are we going to do about bikes? There isn't one for me.'

'Jo can stand behind on my step and hold on to my shoulder,' said Julian. 'You take Anne's bike, George. We'll leave these gates open. The police ought to be pleased with us for saving them so much trouble!'

Off they went down the steep hill, Timmy running behind, his tail wagging happily. He had got George back again. All was well again in his doggy world!

Chapter 22

'THESE KIDS SURE ARE WUNNERFUL!'

What shrieks and shouts there were from Joan and Anne when the four arrived at Kirrin Cottage at last, at half past three in the morning! Joan was awake, but Anne had just gone to sleep. She was sleeping in Joan's room for company and Sally was there too.

The stories had to be told again and again. First Dick, then Julian, then George, then Jo - they all talked without stopping, excited and happy. Sally ran from one to the other, and followed Timmy about - but sometimes her little stiff tail drooped when she remembered that Berta was not there.

'I say,' said Dick, suddenly drawing back the sitting-room curtains - it's daylight! The sun's up! And all the time I've been thinking it was still night!'

'No use going to bed, then,' said Jo, at once. She was so much enjoying this that she felt as if she never wanted it to stop!

'Well, I suppose it isn't,' said Joan. 'I know what we'll do - we'll have a big breakfast now, a very big one to celebrate - and then we'll all go back to bed and sleep till lunchtime. We're tired out really - just look at our black-rimmed eyes and pale cheeks!'

'Joan! We're all as sunburnt as can be, you're just making that up!' said George. 'Come on - let's get this celebration breakfast going! Bacon - eggs - tomatoes - fried bread. Oh, and mushrooms too - have you any mushrooms, Joan? And lots and lots of hot coffee, and toast and marmalade. I'm ravenous.'

They discovered that they all were, and twenty minutes later they sat at the table tucking in as if they had eaten nothing for a month.

'I can't eat a thing more,' said Dick, 'and I don't know what's happening to my eyes - they keep closing!'

'So do mine,' said George, with an enormous yawn. 'Joan - don't say we've got to do the washing-up, will you?'

'Of course not!' said Joan. 'Go on up to your beds now - don't even bother to undress.'

'I feel as if there's something I ought to do - but I can't remember it,' said Julian, sleepily, staggering upstairs. 'I - just - can't remember!'

He flopped on his bed and was asleep as soon as his head fell on the pillow. In two minutes everyone but Joan was asleep too. Joan stopped to give Timmy a drink, and then he bounded up to George and curled up in the crook of her knees as usual.

Joan went to lie down too, thinking she would just have a rest, but not go to sleep. But in half a second she slept too.

The sun rose higher in the sky. The milkman came whistling up the path and left four bottles of milk on the step. The gulls in the bay circled and soared and called loudly. But nobody stirred in Kirrin Cottage.

A car came up to the front gate, and another one followed. Out of the first stepped Uncle Quentin, Aunt Fanny, Mr. Elbur Wright - and Berta! Out of the second car stepped the sergeant and his constable.

Berta flew to the front door, but it was shut. She raced round to the garden door. That was locked too - and so was the kitchen door!

'Pops! We'll have to ring - all the doors are locked!' she called. And then, from up above came a sound of excited barking, and Sally's head appeared at a bedroom window. When she saw it really was Berta down below, she tore down the stairs and scraped at the front door.

'What's happened? Where is everyone?' said Aunt Fanny in amazement. 'All the doors locked? But it's ten o'clock in the morning. Where are the children?'

'I've got my key,' said Uncle Quentin, and he put it into the front door lock. He opened the door and Sally leapt straight into Berta's arms, licking her face from forehead to chin!

Aunt Fanny went into the hall and called, 'Anyone at home?'

No answer. Timmy heard her call, but as George did not stir, he didn't either. He was not going to leave George for a minute, not even to go downstairs!

Aunt Fanny walked into all the rooms on the ground floor. Nobody there! She marvelled at the remains of the meal spread all over the dining-room table, and even more at the dirty pans and dishes in the kitchen. What was Joan thinking of? WHERE was everybody? She did not expect George to be there, because she knew George had been kidnapped - but where in the world were all the others?

She went upstairs and her husband followed with Berta and her father. They were all feeling most astonished now. They went into Julian's room - good gracious he was there, then! And Dick too - lying choppily on their beds, absolutely sound asleep! Aunt Fanny couldn't understand it.

And then she went into the girls' room - and there was Anne fast asleep too - and GOOD GRACIOUS, could that be George? But surely George was kidnapped - then how - why - where...

Her mother suddenly put her arms round the sleeping George and kissed her and hugged her. She had worried so much about her - and now here she was, safe and sound after all!

George awoke at once. She sat up and gazed at her mother and father in astonishment.

'Oh - you're back! Oh, how lovely! When did you come?'

'Just now,' said her mother. 'But George - why is everyone asleep - and how did you get here - we thought you were...'

'Oh, Mother - yes, of course you don't know half the story, do you?' said George. 'Gosh, there's Berta here too - and your Pops, Berta! Hallo, everyone.'

She was still so sleepy that she was not quite sure whether this was a dream or not. But then Anne woke up and squealed, and that woke Julian and Dick. They came into the very crowded bedroom, and soon there was such a noise that Joan and Jo, in the room above, awoke too.

Down they came, looking very dishevelled, Joan full of apologies. She rushed downstairs to put some coffee on and bumped into the two policemen in the hall. She screamed.

'Excuse me, Miss,' said the sergeant to Joan. 'Isn't anyone ever coming down again? We're supposed to be guarding Miss Berta.'

'Oh my - you don't need to do that now!' said Joan. 'Didn't Master Julian telephone you last night - this morning, I mean - I thought he was going to.'

'What about?' said the sergeant.

'About the kidnappers. Everything's all right,' explained Joan to the two astonished policemen. 'We've got Miss George back - and oh, bless us all, there's those kidnappers - you haven't been told they're all locked up and waiting for you, have you?'

'Look here, Miss, what are you talking about?' said the sergeant bewildered. 'This is too bad - what do you mean - kidnappers locked up and waiting!'

'Master Julian!' called Joan, 'the police are here - and you forgot to telephone and tell them what happened last night. They'd better go to that house and get the men, hadn't they?'

'I knew there was something I'd forgotten,' said Julian, running down the stairs. 'I did mean to telephone, but I was so tired that I forgot.'

Everyone then came downstairs and went into the sitting-room. Jo was shy with so many people there, and wouldn't sit anywhere near the two policemen.

'I've just been told, Mr. Wright, sir, that there's no need to guard your daughter now,' said the sergeant, rather stiffly. 'Seems as if the police are the last to hear about anything!'

'Well, the fact of the matter is that we found out that Gringo, who owns the Fair called Gringo's Fair, was paid to kidnap Berta,' said Julian. 'He kidnapped George instead, by mistake. We found out where Gringo had taken her and went to rescue her last night. You go on, Dick.'

'And we left Gringo and somebody else locked up in a room on the ground floor, and two other people locked up in a top-floor room - and we've left the front door open for you and the drive gates open too,' said Dick. 'So don't be too annoyed about it, Sergeant, because we really have tried to make things easy for you! We've rescued George, as you see - and now you can get the men.'

The sergeant looked as if he found it difficult to believe a single word! Uncle Quentin tapped him sharply on the shoulder.

'Well, look alive, man - they'll escape before you can get them if you don't hurry.'

'What's the address?' said the sergeant, stolidly.

'I don't know the name of the house, or the lane it's in,' said Julian. 'But you go through the village of Twining, turn to the left, and it's the house up on the hill.'

'How did you find out all this?' said the sergeant.

'It's too long to tell you now!' said Dick. 'We'll write it all down in a book, and send you a copy. We'll call it - er - we'll call it - what shall we call it, you others? It's a peculiar adventure really - it ended with everyone fast asleep in bed!'

'I want some coffee,' announced Uncle Quentin. 'I think we've talked enough. Do go and catch your kidnappers, my good men.'

The policemen disappeared. Mr. Elbur Wright beamed round happily, Berta on his knee.

'Well, this is a very happy ending!' he said. 'And I can take my little Berta back with me after all!'

'Oh no!' wailed Berta, much to her father's surprise.

'What do you mean?' he asked.

'Gee, Pops, be a honey and let me stay on here,' begged Berta. 'These kids sure are wunnerful.'

'WonDERful, wonDERful, wonDERful!' chanted the others.

'Of course let her stay on if she'd like to,' said Aunt Fanny. 'But as a girl this time, not a boy!'

George heaved a sigh of relief. That was all right then. She wouldn't mind Berta as a girl, even though she was a silly girl!

'Woof!' said Timmy suddenly, and made everyone jump.

'He says he's jolly pleased you're staying, Berta, because now Sally-dog will have to stay too,' said Dick. 'So he'll have someone to play with as well!'

'Shall we really send the sergeant a book about this adventure?' said Anne. 'Did you really mean it, Dick?'

'Rather!' said Dick. 'Our fourteenth adventure - and may we have many more! What shall we call the book?'

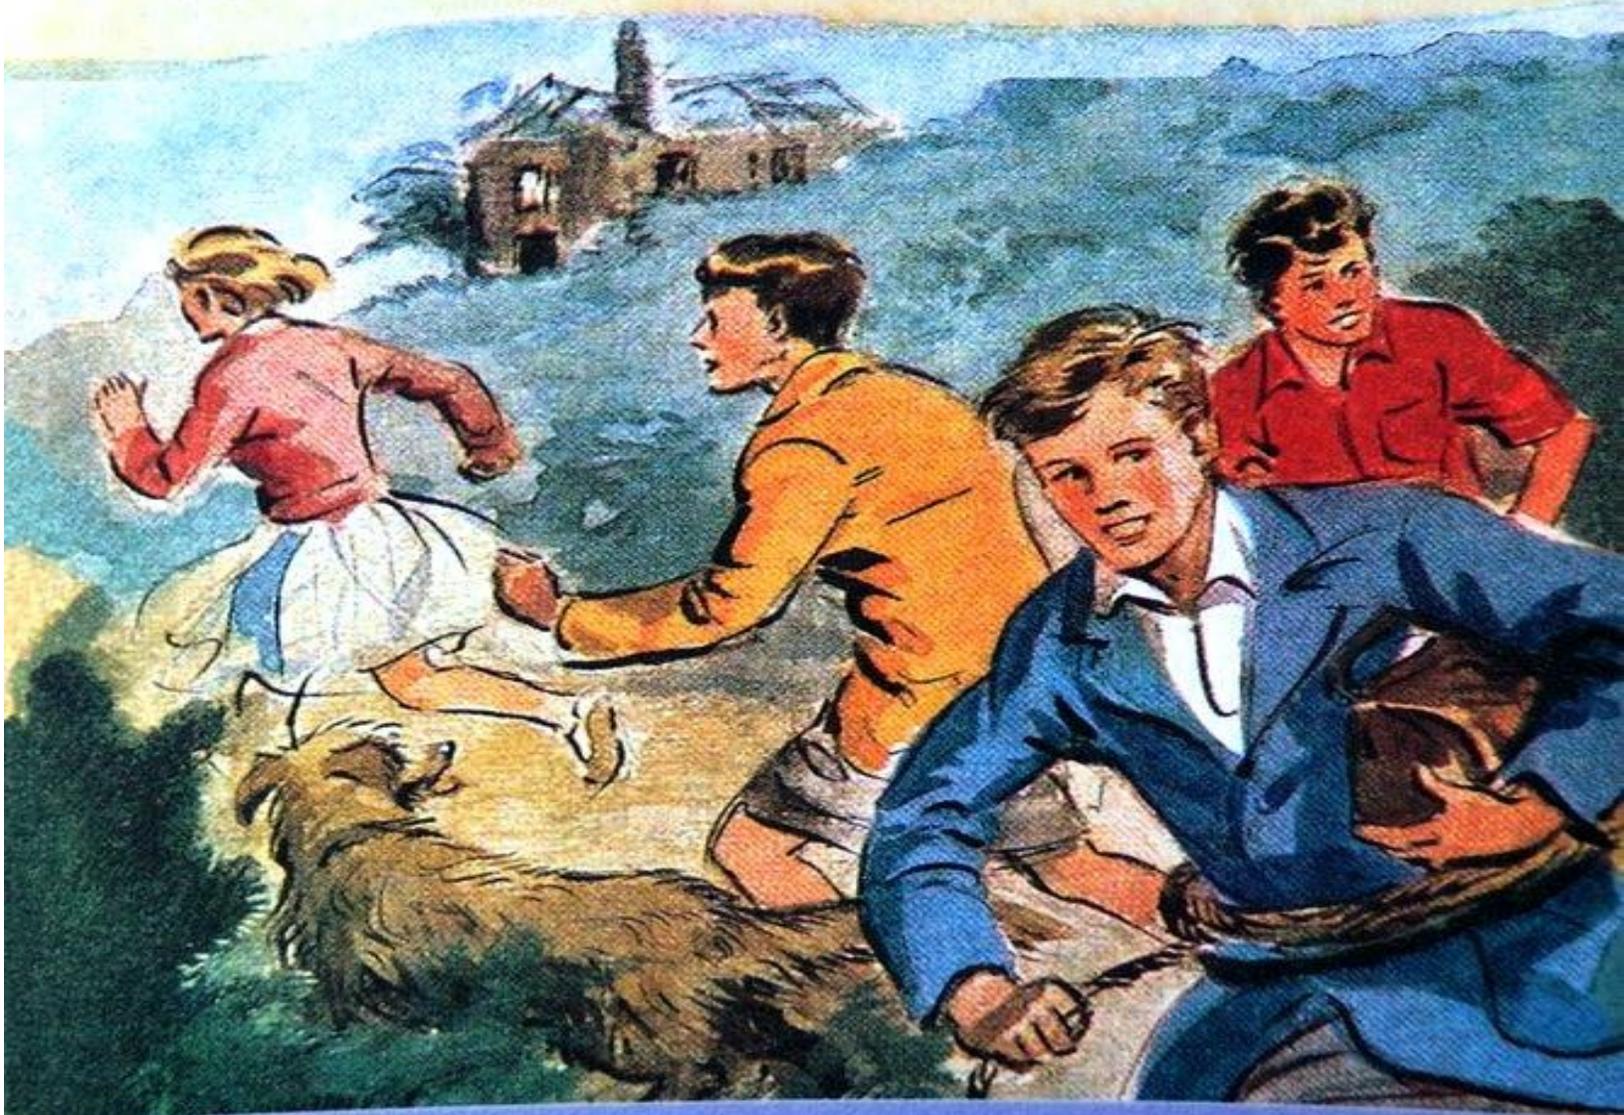

'I know!' said George, at once. 'I know! Let's call it 'FIVE HAVE PLENTY OF FUN!'

Well, they did - and they hope you like it!

THE END

Enid Blyton

THE
FAMOUS
FIVE

FIVE ON A SECRET TRAIL

ENID BLYTON

FAMOUS FIVE 15

Five On A Secret Trail

Contents

| | | |
|----|--|----|
| 1 | George Is Rather Difficult | 2 |
| 2 | Anne Joins The Little Camp | 6 |
| 3 | The Old Cottage - And A Surprise | 10 |
| 4 | That Night | 15 |
| 5 | That Boy Again! | 19 |
| 6 | Storm In The Night | 23 |
| 7 | Queer Happenings | 28 |
| 8 | All Together Again! | 32 |
| 9 | A Little Exploration | 37 |
| 10 | What Can Be Happening? | 41 |
| 11 | Interesting Discoveries - And A Plan | 46 |
| 12 | A Good Hiding-Place | 50 |
| 13 | On Watch In The Cottage | 54 |
| 14 | An Exciting Night - And A Surprising Morning | 58 |
| 15 | Well Done, George! | 63 |
| 16 | The Secret Way | 67 |
| 17 | Full Of Surprises | 71 |
| 18 | The Way Out | 76 |
| 19 | Back To Kirrin Cottage | 81 |
| 20 | The Adventure Ends - As It Began! | 85 |

Chapter 1

GEORGE IS RATHER DIFFICULT

'Mother! Mother, where are you?' shouted George, rushing into the house. 'Mother, quick!'

There was no answer. George's mother was out in the garden at the back of Kirrin Cottage, picking flowers. George yelled again, this time at the top of her very strong voice.

'MOTHER! MOTHER! Where are you? IT'S URGENT.'

A door was flung open nearby and George's father stood there, glaring at her.

'George! What's this row about? Here am I in the middle of some very difficult...'

'Oh Father! Timmy's hurt!' said George. 'He went...'

Her father looked down at Timmy, standing meekly behind George. He gave a little snort.

'Hurt! He seems all right to me. I suppose he's got a thorn in his paw again - and you think it's the end of the world or something, and come yelling in here and...'

'Timmy is hurt!' said George, with tears in her voice. 'Look!'

But her father had gone back into his study again, and the door slammed. George glared at it, looking exactly like her hot-tempered father.

'You're unkind!' she shouted, 'and ... oh there's Mother. Mother!'

'Dear me, George, whatever is the matter?' said her mother, putting down the flowers. 'I heard your father shouting, and then you.'

'Mother - Timmy's hurt!' said George. 'Look!'

She knelt down by the dog, and gently pulled forward one ear. Behind it was a big cut. Timmy whined. Tears came into George's eyes, and she looked up at her mother.

'Now don't be silly, George,' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'It's only a cut. How did he do it?'

'He tried to jump over a ditch, and he didn't see some old barbed wire there,' said George. 'And a rusty piece caught his ear, and ripped that awful cut. I can't stop it bleeding.'

Her mother looked at it. It certainly was quite deep. 'Take him to the vet, George,' she said.

'Perhaps it ought to be stitched. It does look rather deep. Poor old Timmy-boy - well, it's a good thing it wasn't his eye, George.'

'I'll take him to the vet at once,' said George, getting up. 'Will he be in, Mother?'

'Oh yes - it's his surgery hour,' said her mother. 'Take him along now.'

So Timmy was hurried along the country lanes to the pretty little house where the vet lived. George, very anxious indeed, was most relieved to see that the vet seemed quite unconcerned.

'A couple of stitches and that cut will heal well,' he said. 'Hold him, will you, while I do the job? He'll hardly feel it. There, old boy - stand still - that's right.'

In five minutes' time George was thanking the vet wholeheartedly. 'Thank you! I was worried! Will he be all right now?'

'Good gracious, yes - but you mustn't let him scratch that wound,' said the vet, washing his hands. 'If he does, it may go wrong.'

'Oh. But how can I stop him?' asked George anxiously. 'Look - he's trying to scratch it now.'

'Well, you must make him a big cardboard collar,' said the vet. 'One that sticks out right round his neck, so that his paw can't get near that cut, however much he tries to reach it.'

'But - but Timmy won't like that a bit,' said George. 'Dogs look silly wearing cardboard collars like great ruffs round their neck. I've seen them. He'll hate one.'

'Well, it's the only way of stopping him from scratching that wound,' said the vet. 'Get along now, George - I've more patients waiting.'

George went home with Timmy. He padded along quietly, pleased at the fuss that George was making of him. When he was nearly home, he suddenly sat down and put up his hind leg to scratch his bad ear.

'No, Timmy! NO!' cried George, in alarm. 'You must NOT scratch. You'll get the plaster off in no time, and break the stitches. NO, Timmy!'

Timmy looked up in surprise. Very well. If scratching was suddenly upsetting George, he would wait till he was alone.

But George could read Timmy's thoughts as easily as he could read hers! She frowned.

'Blow! I'll have to make him that cardboard collar. Perhaps Mother will help me.'

Her mother was quite willing to help. George was not good at things of that sort, and she watched her mother cutting out a big cardboard collar, fitting it round the surprised Timmy's head, and then lacing the edges together with thread so that he could not get it off. Timmy was most surprised, but he stood very patiently.

As soon as the collar was finished, and safely round his neck, he walked away. Then he raised his hind leg to scratch at his smarting ear - but, of course, he couldn't get it over the collar, and merely scratched the cardboard.

'Never mind, Timmy,' said George. 'It will only be for a few days.'

The study door nearby opened and her father came out. He saw Timmy in his collar and stopped in surprise. Then he roared with laughter.

'Hey, Timmy - you look like Queen Elizabeth the First in a fine big ruff!' he said.

'Don't laugh at him, Father,' said George. 'You know that dogs can't bear being laughed at.'

Timmy certainly looked offended. He turned his back on George's father and stalked off to the kitchen. A little squeal of laughter came from there and then a loud guffaw from someone at the kitchen door - the milkman.

'Oh Timmy - whatever have you got that collar on for?' said the cook's voice. 'You do look peculiar!'

George was angry. She remained angry all that day and made everyone most uncomfortable. How mean of people to jeer at poor Timmy! Didn't they realize how terribly uncomfortable a collar like that was - and Timmy had to wear it night and day! He couldn't even lie down comfortably. George mooned about looking so angry and miserable that her mother felt worried.

'George dear - don't be silly about this. You will make your father cross. Timmy will have to wear that collar for at least a week, you know - and he does look a bit comical when you first see him. He's getting used to it, he soon won't notice it.'

'Everybody laughs at him,' said George, in an angry voice. 'He went into the garden and a lot of kids hung over the wall and laughed like anything. And the postman told me it was cruel. And Father thinks it's funny. And...'

'Oh dear, George, don't get into one of your moods,' said her mother. 'Remember, Anne is coming soon. She won't enjoy things much if you behave like this.'

George bore it for one day more. Then, after two upsets with her father over Timmy, another with a couple of boys who laughed at him, and one with the paper-boy, she decided she wouldn't stay at Kirrin Cottage for one day longer!

'We'll take my little tent, and go off by ourselves somewhere,' she told Timmy. 'Some place where nobody can see you till your ear is better and that hateful collar is off. Don't you think that's a good idea, Timmy?'

'Woof,' said Timmy. He thought that any of George's ideas were good, though the collar puzzled him very much.

'You know the dogs laugh at you too, Timmy,' said George, earnestly. 'Did you see how that silly little poodle belonging to Mrs. Janes up the lane stood and stared at you? He looked exactly as if he was laughing. I won't have you laughed at. I know you hate it.'

Timmy certainly didn't like it, but he really was not as upset about the collar as George seemed to be. He followed her as she went up to her bedroom and watched her as she began to put a few things into a small bag.

'We'll go to that lonely little spot on the common,' she said to him. 'We'll pitch our tent near a little stream, and we'll jolly well stay there till your ear's better. We'll go tonight. I'll take my bike, and strap everything on to the back.'

So, in the middle of the night, when Kirrin Cottage was dark and quiet, George stole downstairs with Timmy. She left a note on the dining-room table, and then went to get her bicycle. She strapped her little tent on it, and the bag containing food and other odds and ends.

'Come on!' she whispered to the surprised Timmy. 'We'll go. I'll ride slowly and you can run beside me. Don't bark for goodness' sake!'

They disappeared into the darkness, Timmy running like a black shadow beside the bicycle. Nobody guessed they were gone. Kirrin Cottage was quiet and undisturbed - except for the creaking of the kitchen door, which George had forgotten to shut.

But in the morning, what a disturbance! Joan the cook found George's note first and wondered what a letter in George's writing was doing on the dining-room table. She ran straight up to George's room and looked inside.

The bed was empty. There was no George and Timmy's basket was empty. Joan went to take the note to Mrs. Kirrin.

'Oh dear! How silly George is!' she said, when she had read it. 'Look, Quentin - such a fuss about Timmy! Now George has gone off with him, goodness knows where!'

Her husband took the note and read it out loud. 'Dear Mother, I'm going off for a few days with Timmy till his ear is better. I've taken my tent and a few things. Don't worry, please. Tell Anne if she wants to join me, to come to the end of Carters Lane on the common and I will show her where I'm camping. Tell her to come at twelve. Love from George.'

'Well, I'm blessed!' said George's father. 'All right - let her stay away if she wants to - I'm tired of her sulky face and Timmy's hang-dog looks. Tell Anne to join George, and maybe I shall have peace for a few days!'

'George should be all right,' said his wife. 'She's quite sensible really - and she's got Timmy. I'll tell Anne to join her when she arrives this morning.'

When Anne arrived at Kirrin Station, and looked out for George and Timmy, they weren't there - only her aunt was there, smiling as usual.

'What's happened?' said Anne. 'Where's George - and Timmy?'

'Oh - George has gone off by herself,' said her Aunt Fanny. 'Come along, and I'll tell you!'

Chapter 2

ANNE JOINS THE LITTLE CAMP

Aunt Fanny soon told Anne about Timmy's ear and the big collar of cardboard that had caused all the trouble. Anne couldn't help smiling.

'Oh Aunt Fanny - George is quite crazy about old Tim, isn't she? I'll go and meet her at twelve, and of course I'll camp with her for a day or two. It's lovely weather and I'd like to. I expect Uncle Quentin will be glad to have us out of the house!'

'How are Julian and Dick?' asked her aunt. She was very fond of Anne's two brothers, George's cousins. 'Will they be coming down here at all these holidays?'

'I don't know,' said Anne. 'They're still in France, you know, on a school-boys' tour. I feel funny without them! George will be cross to hear they probably won't be coming to Kirrin. She'll just have to put up with me!'

At twelve o'clock Anne was standing patiently at the end of Carters Lane. It ran to the common and then ended in a small, winding path that led to nowhere in particular. Big gorse bushes grew here and there, and slender birch trees. Anne, her belongings strapped to her back, and a bag in her hand, looked over the common to see if she could spy George coming.

There was no sign of her. 'Blow!' said Anne. 'I suppose she's changed her mind or something. Perhaps her watch has stopped and she doesn't know the time. She ought to, though, by looking at the sun! How long shall I wait?'

She sat down by a big gorse-bush, out of the hot sun. She hadn't been there for more than a minute when she heard a hissing sound.

'Psssst!'

Anne sat up at once. The sound came from the other side of the bush, and she got up and walked round it. Half-hidden under a prickly branch were George and Timmy!

'Hallo!' said Anne, surprised. 'Didn't you see me when I arrived? Hallo, Tim darling! How's your poor old ear? Oh, doesn't he look a quaint old dear in that collar, George?'

George scrambled out of the bush. 'I hid here just in case Father or Mother should come with you and try to make me come back,' she said. 'I wanted to make quite sure they weren't waiting somewhere a little way away. I'm glad you've come, Anne.'

'Of course I've come,' said Anne. 'I wouldn't stay alone at Kirrin Cottage while you were camping out. Besides, I understand how you feel about Timmy. The collar's a jolly good idea, of course - but it does make him look comical. I think he looks rather a dear in it, I do really.'

George was almost relieved that Anne had not laughed at Timmy as most people had. She smiled at her cousin, and Timmy licked her till Anne really had to push him away.

'Let's go,' said George, scrambling up. 'I've got a lovely camping-place, Anne. You'll like it. It's near a little spring too, so there's plenty of water for Timmy to drink - and us too. Did you bring any more food? I didn't really bring much.'

'Yes. I've brought heaps,' said Anne. 'Aunt Fanny made me. She's not cross with you, George. I didn't see your father. He was shut up in his study.'

George's spirits suddenly rose. She gave Anne a friendly punch. 'This is going to be fun! Timmy's ear will soon be better, and he loves camping out as much as we do. I've really found a good place - about the loneliest on the common! Nobody near us for miles!'

They set off together, Timmy at their heels, darting off every now and again when he smelt rabbit.

'When are Julian and Dick coming down?' asked George. 'In a few days? Timmy's ear will be all right then and we can go back to Kirrin Cottage to welcome the boys, and have some fun there.'

'They may not be coming down at all these hols,' said Anne, and George's face fell at once. She stopped and stared at Anne in dismay.

'Not coming! but they always come in the hols - or we go away somewhere together!' she said.

'They must come! I shall be miserable without Ju and Dick.'

'Well - they're still in France, on a tour or something,' said Anne. 'We shall hear if they're staying on there or coming down to Kirrin, when we get back to the cottage. Don't look so woebegone, George!'

But George felt woebegone. The holidays stretched before her, suddenly seeming long and dreary. Her two boy cousins were always such fun - they had had such wonderful adventures together. And now - now they weren't coming!

'We shan't have any adventures at all if the boys don't come,' she said, in a small voice.

'I shan't mind that,' said Anne. 'I'm the peaceful one, not always on the look-out for something to happen, like you and the boys! Perhaps these holidays will be quite unexciting without even the smell of an adventure! Oh George - cheer up! Don't look so mournful. You'd better send a telegram to Julian and Dick if you feel so badly about it.'

'I've a good mind to!' said George. 'I can't imagine hols without the boys. Why - we shan't be the Five - the Famous Five - if they don't come!'

'Woof!' said Timmy, quite agreeing. He sat down and tried to scratch his ear, but the big collar prevented him. He didn't seem to mind and ran off after a rabbit quite happily.

'I think you are more upset about that collar than Timmy,' said Anne, as they walked along. 'Are we getting near this place of yours, George? It's a jolly long way.'

'We go up this hill in front of us - and then drop down to a little copse,' said George. 'There's a funny old cottage nearby - quite ruined and empty. At first I thought perhaps people lived there, but when I went nearer I saw that it was ruined. There's a big old rose-rambler climbing all over it, even inside. I suppose the people who used to live there planted it.'

They walked up the little hill and down again, following curving rabbit-paths. 'Better look out for adders,' said Anne. 'This is just the kind of place for them. My word, it's hot, George. Is there anywhere to bathe near here - a pool or anything?'

'I don't know. We could explore and see,' said George. 'I did bring my swim-suit just in case. Look - you can see part of the old cottage now. My camp is fairly near there. I thought I'd better camp near the spring.'

They were soon at George's rough little camp. Her tent was up, and she had made a bed inside of the springy heather. A mug, a bag of dog biscuits, a few tins, and a loaf of bread were at one end of the tent. It didn't seem to Anne as if George had brought very much, and she felt glad that she had managed to pack such a lot of things.

'Aunt Fanny cut dozens and dozens of sandwiches,' said Anne. 'She said if we kept them in this tin they wouldn't go stale, and would last us a day or two till we went back. I'm hungry. Shall we have some now?'

They sat out in the sun, munching the ham sandwiches. Anne had brought tomatoes too, and they took a bite at a sandwich and then a bite at a tomato. Timmy had to make do with a handful of dog biscuits and half a sandwich every now and again. After a bit he got up and wandered off.

'Where's he going?' asked Anne. 'To look for a rabbit?'

'No. Probably to get a drink,' said George. 'The spring is in the direction he's gone. I'm thirsty too - let's take the mug and get a drink ourselves.'

They went off with the mug, Anne following George through the thick heather. The little spring was a lovely one. It had evidently been used by the people who had once lived in the old cottage, and was built round with big white stones, so that the spring ran through a little stony channel, as clear as crystal.

'Oooh - it's as cold as ice!' said Anne. 'Simply delicious! I could drink gallons of this!'

They lay on the heather out in the sun, talking, when they came back from the spring. Timmy wandered off by himself again.

'It's so peaceful here,' said Anne. 'Nobody near us for miles. Just the birds and the rabbits. This is what I like!'

'There's hardly a sound,' said George, yawning.

And then, just as she said that, there came a noise in the distance. A sharp sound, like metal on stone. It came again and again and then stopped.

'What's that, do you suppose?' said George, sitting up.

'I can't imagine,' said Anne. 'Anyway, it's a long way away - everything is so still that sounds carry from quite a distance.'

The sharp noises began again in a little while and then stopped. The girls shut their eyes, and slept. There wasn't a sound now except the pop-pop-pop of gorse pads exploding in the sun and sending out their little black seeds.

George woke up when Timmy came back. He sat down heavily on her feet and she woke up with a jump.

'Timmy! Don't!' she said. 'Get off my feet, you made me jump!' Timmy obligingly removed himself and then picked up something he had dropped, lay down and began gnawing it. George looked to see what it was.

'Timmy! That's a bone! Where did you get it?' she said. 'Anne, did you bring a bone for Tim?'

'What? What did you say?' said Anne, half asleep. 'A bone. No, I didn't. Why?'

'Because Timmy's found one,' said George, 'and it's a bone that has had cooked meat on it, so it's not a rabbit or anything Timmy's caught. Timmy, where did you get it.'

'Woof,' said Timmy, offering the bone to George, thinking that she too might like a gnaw, as she seemed so interested in it.

'Do you suppose anyone else is camping near us?' asked Anne, sitting up and yawning. 'After all, bones don't grow in the heather. That's quite a good meaty one, too. Timmy, have you stolen it from another dog?'

Timmy thumped his tail on the ground and went on with his bone. He looked pleased with himself.

'It's rather an old bone,' said George. 'It's smelly. Go away, Tim - take it further off.'

The sharp metallic noises suddenly began again and George frowned. 'I believe there is someone camping near us, Anne. Come on - let's do a bit of exploring and find out. I vote we move our camp if there are other people near. Come on, Timmy - that's right, bury that horrible bone! This way Anne!'

Chapter 3

THE OLD COTTAGE - AND A SURPRISE

The two girls, with Timmy at their heels, left their camping-place and set off in the hot sun. Anne caught sight of the ruined cottage and stopped.

'Let's have a look at it,' she said. 'It must be awfully old, George.'

They went in at the wide doorway. There was no door left, only the stone archway. Inside was a big room, whose floor had once been paved with slabs of white stone. Now grass and other weeds had grown between the cracks, and had actually lifted up some of the slabs so that the whole floor was uneven.

Here and there parts of the walls had fallen away, and the daylight came through. One window was still more or less intact, but the others had fallen out. A small crooked stairway of stone led upwards in one corner.

'To rooms above, I suppose,' said Anne. 'Oh, here's another doorway, leading into a second room - a small one. It's got an old sink in it, look - and this must be the remains of a pump.'

'There's not much to see, really,' said George, looking round. 'The top rooms must be quite ruined, because half the roof is off. Hallo, here's another door - a back door. It's actually a door too, not just a doorway.'

She gave a push at the stout wood - and the old door promptly fell off its hinges and crashed outwards into an over-grown yard.

'Goodness!' said George, startled. 'I didn't know it was quite so rotten. It made poor Tim jump almost out of his skin!'

'There are out-houses here - or the remains of them,' said Anne, exploring the back-yard. 'They must have kept pigs and hens and ducks. Here's a dried-up pond, look.'

Everything was falling to pieces. The best preserved corner of the old place was what must have been a small stable. Rusted mangers were still there and the floor was of stone. An old, old piece of harness hung on a big nail.

'It's got quite a nice 'feel' about it, this old place,' said Anne. 'Sometimes I don't like the feel of places - they give me an uneasy feeling, a feeling that horrid things may have happened there. But this is quite different. I think people have been happy here, and led peaceful lives. I can almost hear hens clucking and ducks quacking, and pigs gr...'

'Quack, quack, quack! Quack!'

'Cuck-cuk-cuk-cuk-cuk! Cuck-cuk-cuk-cuk-cuk!'

Anne clutched George and the two girls looked extremely startled to hear the sudden loud noise of quacking and clucking. They stood and listened.

'What was it?' said Anne. 'It sounded like hens and ducks - though I'm not quite sure. But there aren't any here, surely. We shall hear a horse whinnying next!'

They didn't hear a whinny - but they heard the snorting of a horse at once. 'Hmrr-umph! Hrrrrr-umph!'

Both girls were now quite alarmed. They looked for Timmy. He was nowhere to be seen! Wherever could he have got to?

'Cuck-cuk-cuk-cuk-cuk!'

'This is silly,' said George. 'Are we imagining things? Anne, there must be hens near. Come round the back of these stables and look. Timmy, where are you? TIMMY!'

She whistled shrilly - and immediately an echo came - or so it seemed!

'Phee-phee-phee-phee-phee!'

'TIMMY!' yelled George, beginning to feel as if she was in a dream.

Timmy appeared, looking rather sheepish. He wagged his tail - and to the girls' enormous amazement, they saw that he had a ribbon tied on it. A ribbon - a bright blue one at that!

'Timmy! Your tail - the ribbon - Timmy, what's all this about?' said George, really startled.

Timmy went to her, still looking sheepish, George tore the ribbon off his tail. 'Who tied it there?' she demanded. 'Who's here? Timmy, where have you been?'

The two girls searched the old buildings thoroughly, and found nothing and nobody. Not a hen, not a duck, not a pig - and certainly not a horse. Then - what was the explanation? They stared at one another in bewilderment.

'And where did Timmy get that silly ribbon?' said George, exasperated. 'Someone must have tied it on.'

'Perhaps it was a hiker passing by - perhaps he heard us here and saw Timmy and played a joke,' said Anne. 'But it's strange that old Tim let him tie on the ribbon. I mean - Timmy's not overfriendly with strangers, is he?'

The girls gave up the idea of exploring any further and went back to their little camp. Timmy went with them. He lay down - and then suddenly got up again, making for a thick gorse bush. He tried to squirm underneath.

'Note what's he after?' said George. 'Really, I think Timmy's gone mad. Timmy, you can't get under there with that great collar on. TIMMY, do you hear me!'

Timmy backed out reluctantly, the collar all crooked. After him came a peculiar little mongrel dog with one blind eye and one exceedingly bright and lively one. He was half-white and half-black, and had a ridiculously long thin tail, which he waved about merrily.

'Well!' said George, amazed. 'What's that dog doing there? And how did Timmy get so friendly with him? Timmy, I can't make you out.'

'Woof,' said Timmy, and brought the mongrel dog over to Anne and George. He then proceeded to dig up the smelly bone he had buried, and actually offered it to the little dog, who looked away and took no interest in it at all.

'This is all very peculiar,' said Anne. 'I shall expect to see Timmy bring a cat to us next!'

At once there came a pathetic mewing.

'Mee-ew! Mee-ew-ee-ew-ee-ew!'

Both dogs pricked up their ears, and rushed to the bush. Timmy was once again kept back by his big collar and barked furiously.

George got up and marched to the bush. 'If there's a cat there, it won't have much chance against two dogs,' she called to Anne. 'Come away, Tim. Hey, you little dog, come away, too.'

Timmy backed out, and George pulled out the small dog very firmly indeed. 'Hold him, Anne!' she called. 'He's quite friendly. He won't bite. I'm going to find that cat.'

Anne held on to the small mongrel, who gazed at her excitedly with his one good eye and wagged his tail violently. He was a most friendly little fellow. George began to crawl into the bare hollow space under the big gorse bush.

She looked into it, not able to see anything at first, because it was dark there after the bright sunlight. Then she got a tremendous shock.

A round, grinning face stared back at her, a face with very bright eyes and tousled hair falling on to the forehead. The mouth was set in a wide smile, showing very white teeth.

'Mee-ew-ee-ew-ee-ew!' said the face.

George scrambled back at top speed, her heart thumping. 'What is it?' called Anne.

'There's somebody hiding there,' said George. 'Not a cat. A fathead of a boy who is doing the mewling.'

'Mew-ee-ew-ee-ew!'

'Come out!' called Anne. 'Come out and let's see you. You must be crazy!'

There was a scrambling noise and a boy came headforemost from the hollow space under the bush. He was about twelve or thirteen, short, studily built, and with the cheekiest face Anne had ever seen.

Timmy rushed at him and licked him lovingly. George stared in amazement.

'How does my dog know you?' she demanded.

'Well, he came growling at me yesterday when I was in my own camp,' said the boy. 'And I offered him a nice meaty bone. Then he saw my little dog Jet - short for jet-propelled, you know - and made friends with him - and with me too.'

'I see,' said George, still not at all friendly. 'Well, I don't like my dog to take food from strangers.'

'Oh, I couldn't agree more,' said the boy. 'But I thought I'd rather he ate the bone than ate me. He's a nice dog, yours. He feels a bit of an idiot wearing that collar, doesn't he? You should have heard Jet laugh when he first saw it!'

George frowned. 'I came here to be alone so that Timmy shouldn't be jeered at,' she said. 'He's got a bad ear. I suppose you were the fathead who tied a blue ribbon on his tail?'

'Just for a joke,' said the boy. 'You like frowning and glaring, I can see. Well, I like joking and tricking! Your Timmy didn't mind a bit. He took to my dog right away. But everyone likes Jet! I wanted to find out who owned Timmy - because, like you, I don't like strangers messing about when I'm camping out. So I came along.'

'I see. And you did all the clucking and quacking and hrrr-umphing?' said Anne. She liked this idiot of a boy, with his broad friendly grin. 'What are you doing - just camping - or hiking - or botanizing?'

'I'm digging,' said the boy. 'My father's an archaeologist - he loves old buildings more than anything else in the world. I take after him, I suppose. There was once an old Roman camp on this common, you know - and I've found a place where part of it must have been, so I'm digging for anything I can find - pottery, weapons, anything like that. See, I found this yesterday - look at the date on it!'

He suddenly thrust an old coin at them - a queer, uneven one, rather heavy to hold.

'Its date is 292,' he said. 'At least, as far as I can make out. So the camp's pretty old, isn't it?'

'We'll come and see it,' said Anne, excited.

'No, don't,' said the boy. 'I don't like people messing round me when I'm doing something serious. Please don't come. I won't bother you again. I promise.'

'All right. We won't come,' said Anne, quite understanding. 'But don't you play any more silly tricks on us, see?'

'I promise,' said the boy. 'I tell you, I won't come near you again. I only wanted to see whose dog this was. Well, I'm off. So long!'

And, whistling to Jet, he set off at a furious pace. George turned to Anne.

'What a peculiar boy!' she said. 'Actually - I'd rather like to see him again. Wouldn't you?'

Chapter 4
THAT NIGHT

It was now tea-time, according to Anne's watch and also according to everyone's feelings, including Timmy's. Timmy felt the heat very much and was always wandering off to the little spring to lap the crystal-cold water. Anne wished that she and George had a big jug that they could fill - it was such a nuisance to have to keep running to and fro with just a mug.

They had tea - biscuits, a sandwich each, and a bar of rather soft chocolate. George examined Timmy's ear for the hundredth time that day, and pronounced it very much better.

'Well, don't take off that collar yet,' said Anne. 'He'll only open the wound by scratching if you do.'

'I'm not going to take it off!' said George, touchily. 'What shall we do now, Anne? Go for a walk?'

'Yes,' said Anne. 'Listen - you can hear those sharp, metallic noises again - that's the boy at work again, I expect. Funny boy he must be - coming to dig about all on his own with his comical little dog. I wish we could see what he's doing.'

'We promised we wouldn't,' said George. 'So I don't feel that we even ought to go and peep.'

'Of course not!' said Anne. 'Come on - let's go in the opposite direction, George - right away from the boy. I hope we shan't get lost!'

'Not while Timmy's with us, silly!' said George. 'You'd find your way home from the moon, wouldn't you, Tim?'

'Woof,' agreed Timmy.

'He always says yes to whatever you say, George,' said Anne. 'I say - isn't it a lovely evening? I wonder what Julian and Dick are doing?'

George immediately looked downcast. She felt that her two cousins had no right to go rushing across France when she wanted them at Kirrin. Didn't they like Kirrin? Would they be having magnificent adventures on the Continent, and not want to spend even a week at Kirrin? She looked so lost in miserable thoughts that Anne laughed at her.

'Cheer up! At least I am here with you - though I agree that compared with Ju and Dick I'm very poor company, and not at all adventurous!'

They had a lovely walk, and sat down half-way to watch hordes of rabbits playing together. Timmy was very unhappy about this. Why sit down to watch silly rabbits? Rabbits were made to chase, weren't they? Why did George always put a restraining hand on his collar when she sat down to watch rabbits? He whined continually, as he watched with her.

'Shut up, Timmy, you ass,' said George. 'You'd only spoil the entertainment if you sent them to their holes.'

They watched for a long while and then got up to go back to the camp. When they came near, they heard the sound of low whistling. Someone was about that evening, quite near their camp. Who was it?

They came round a big gorse bush, and almost bumped into a boy. He got out of their way politely, but said nothing.

'Why - it's you!' said George, in surprise. 'I don't know your name. What are you doing here? You said you wouldn't come near us.'

The boy stared, looking very surprised. His tousled hair fell right across his forehead, and he brushed it back.

'I said nothing of the sort,' he said.

'Oh, you did!' said Anne. 'You know you did. Well, if you break your promise, there's no reason for us to keep ours. We shall come and visit your camp.'

'I never made you any promise,' said the boy, looking quite startled. 'You're mad!'

'Don't be an idiot,' said George, getting cross. 'I suppose you'll be saying next that you didn't act like a hen, and a duck, and a horse this afternoon...'

'And a cat,' said Anne.

'Balmy!' said the boy, looking at them pityingly. 'Quite balmy.'

'Are you coming here again?' demanded George.

'If I want to,' said the boy. 'The water in this spring is better than the one over by my camp.'

'Then we shall come and explore your camp,' said George, firmly. 'If you don't keep your promise, we shan't keep ours.'

'By all means come if you want to,' said the boy. 'You seem quite mad, but I daresay you're harmless. But don't bring your dog. He might eat mine.'

'You know he wouldn't eat Jet!' said Anne. 'They're good friends.'

'I don't know anything of the sort,' said the boy, and went off, brushing his hair out of his eyes again.

'What do you make of that?' said George, staring after him. 'Not a bit the same as he was this afternoon. Do you think he really had forgotten about his promise and everything?'

'I don't know,' said Anne, puzzled. 'He was so perky and jolly and full of fun before - grinning all the time - but just now he seemed quite serious - not a smile in him!'

'Oh well - perhaps he's a bit crazy,' said George. 'Are you sleepy Anne? I am, though I can't think why!'

'Not very - but I'd like to lie down on this springy heather and watch the stars gradually come sparkling into the sky,' said Anne. 'I don't think I'll sleep in the tent, George. You'll want Timmy with you, and honestly there's so little room inside the tent that I'm quite sure Timmy would lie on my legs all night long.'

'I'll sleep in the open air as well,' said George. 'I only slept in the tent last night because it looked a bit like rain. Let's get some more heather and make a kind of mattress of it. We can put a rug on top of it, and lie on that.'

The two of them pulled a lot of heather and carried it to their 'bed'. Soon they had a fine pile, and Timmy went to lie on it.

'Hey - it's not for you!' cried George. 'Get off - you'll flatten it right down. Where's the rug, Anne?'

They laid the rug on the heather-pile and then went to the spring to wash and clean their teeth. Timmy immediately got on to the heather-bed again, and shut his eyes.

'You old fraud!' said George, lugging him off. 'You're not asleep. Keep off our bed! Look - there's a nice soft patch of grass for you. That's your bed!'

George lay down on the rug, and the heathery-bed sank a little beneath her weight.

'Very comfortable!' said George. 'Shall we want a rug over us, Anne?'

'Well, I did bring one,' said Anne. 'But I don't think we'll want it, the night's so hot. Look - there is a star already!'

Soon there were six or seven - and then gradually hundreds more pricked through the evening sky as the twilight deepened. It was a wonderful night.

'Don't the stars look big and bright?' said Anne, sleepily. 'They make me feel very small, they're such millions of miles away. George, are you asleep?'

There was no answer. George hadn't heard a word. She was fast asleep. Her hand fell down the side of the heather and rested on the ground below. Timmy moved a little nearer and gave it a small lick. Then he too fell asleep, and gave some small doggy snores.

The night darkened. There was no moon but the stars shone out well from the midnight sky. It was very quiet out there on the common, far away from streets and villages and towns. Not even an owl hooted.

Anne didn't quite know why she awoke. At first she had no idea where she was, and she lay gazing up at the stars in astonishment, thinking she must still be asleep.

She suddenly felt very thirsty. She groped about in the nearby tent for the mug, couldn't find it and gave it up.

'I'll drink from my cupped hands,' she thought, and set off for the little spring. Timmy wondered whether to follow her. No - he would stay with George. She wouldn't like it if she awoke and found him gone with Anne. So he settled his head down on his paws again and slept, leaving one ear open for Anne.

Anne found the little spring. Its tinkling gurgling sound guided her as soon as she heard it. She sat down on one of the stones nearby, and held out her cupped hands. How very cold the water was - and how delicious to drink on this hot night! She sipped thirstily, slopping some of the water down her front.

She got up to go back, and walked a few steps in the starlight. Then she stopped. Wait - was she going in the right direction? She wasn't sure.

'I think I am!' she decided, and went on, carefully and quietly. Surely she must be near their little camp now?

Then all at once she stood still, and felt herself stiffen. She had suddenly seen a light. It had flashed and disappeared. Ah - there it was again! Whatever could it be?

Then, as her eyes strained through the starlit darkness, she suddenly saw that she had taken the wrong way - she had gone in the direction of the old ruined cottage, and not the camp - and the light had come from there!

She didn't dare go any nearer. She felt glued to the grass she was standing on! Now she could hear sounds - whispering sounds - and the noise of a footfall on the stone floor of the cottage - and then the flash of a light came again! Yes, it was from the old cottage!

Anne began to breathe fast. Who was it in the old cottage? She simply dared not go and see. She must go back to George, and to Timmy's protection. As fast and as silently as she could she found her way back to the spring - and then, almost stumbling now, made her way to where George was still lying peacefully asleep.

'Woof,' said Timmy, sleepily, and tried to lick her hand. Anne climbed on to the heathery-bed beside George, her heart still beating fast.

'George!' she whispered. 'George, do wake up. I've something queer to tell you!'

Chapter 5

THAT BOY AGAIN!

George would not wake up. She grunted when Anne poked her and prodded her, and then she turned over, almost falling off the small heather-bed.

'Oh George - please do wake!' begged Anne, in a whisper. She was afraid of speaking out loud in case anyone should hear her. Who knew what might happen if she drew attention to their little camp?

George awoke at last and was cross. 'Whatever is it, Anne?' she said, her voice sounding loud in the night.

'Sh!' said Anne. 'Sh!'

'Why? We're all alone here! We can make as much noise as we like!' said George, surprised.

'George, do listen! There's someone in that old cottage!' said Anne, and at last George heard and understood. She sat up at once.

Anne told her the whole story - though it didn't really seem very much of a tale when she related it. George spoke to Timmy.

'Tim!' she said, keeping her voice low. 'We'll go and do a little exploring, shall we? Come on, then - and keep quiet!'

She slid off the rug and stood up. 'You stay here,' she said to Anne. 'Timmy and I will be very quiet and careful, and see what we can find out.'

'Oh no - I couldn't stay here alone!' said Anne in alarm, and got up hurriedly. 'I shall have to come too. I don't mind a bit now Timmy's with us. I wonder he didn't bark at the people in the old cottage, whoever they were.'

'He probably thought it was you messing about,' said George, and Anne nodded. Yes, of course, Timmy must have thought that any noises he heard had been made by her.

They took the path that led to the old cottage. George had Timmy well to heel. He knew he must not push forward unless told to. His ears were pricked now, and he was listening hard.

They came cautiously to the cottage. They could see its dark outline in the starlight, but little else. There was no light flashing there. Nor did there seem to be any noises at all.

All three stood still and quiet for about five minutes. Then Timmy moved restlessly. This was boring! Why wouldn't George let him run forward and explore everywhere if she wanted to know if intruders were about?

'I don't think there's a soul here!' whispered George into Anne's ear. 'They must have gone - unless you dreamed it all, Anne!'

'I didn't!' whispered back Anne indignantly. 'Let's go forward a bit and send Timmy into the cottage. He'll soon bark if there's anyone there.'

George gave Timmy a little shove. 'Go on, then!' she said. 'Find, Timmy, find!'

Timmy gladly shot forward into the darkness. He trotted into the cottage, though it was impossible even to see him go to it. The two girls stood and listened, their heart-beats sounding very loud to them! There was not a sound to be heard, except occasionally the rattle of Timmy's strong claws on a stony slab.

'There can't be anyone there,' said George at last.

'Else Timmy would have sniffed them out. You're an ass, Anne - you dreamt it all!'

'I did not!' said Anne, indignant again. 'I know there was someone there - in fact, more than one person, because I'm sure I heard whispering!'

George raised her voice. 'Timmy!' she called loudly, making Anne jump violently. 'Timmy! Come along. We've sent you on a silly wild goose chase - but now we'll go back to bed!'

Timmy came trotting out of the cottage and went obediently to George. She heard him yawn as he stood beside her, and she laughed.

'Anne had a bad dream, that's all, Timmy,' she said.

Anne felt cross - very cross. She said no more and they left the old cottage and went back to their heather-bed. Anne climbed on to her side and turned over with her back to George. All right - let George think it was a dream if she liked!

But when Anne awoke in the morning and remembered the happenings of the night before, she too began to wonder uneasily if she had dreamed what she had seen and heard in the old cottage. 'After all - Timmy would certainly have caught anyone who was there,' she thought. 'And he wasn't at all excited, so there can't have been anyone in the cottage. And anyway, why would they come? It's just silly!'

So, when George talked about Anne's dreaming in the middle of the night, Anne did not defend herself. She really could not be sure that it had really happened. So she held her tongue when George teased her, and said nothing.

'Let's go and see that boy and his camp,' George said when they had eaten a few rather stale sandwiches and some shortbread biscuits. 'I'm beginning to feel bored, aren't you? I wish Timmy's ear would quite heal up. I'd go back home like a shot then.'

They set off in the direction of the camp with Timmy. They heard a chip-chipping noise as they came near, and then something small and hairy shot out from a bush and rushed up, barking a welcome.

'Hallo, Jet!' said Anne. 'Don't you let Timmy have any more of your bones!'

The chipping noise had stopped. The two girls went on and came to a very messy piece of common. It had been well dug over, in some places very deeply. Surely that boy couldn't have done so much excavating by himself?

'Hey! Where are you?' called George. Then she saw the boy below her, examining something in a trench he had dug out. He jumped and looked upwards.

Then he scowled. 'Look - you promised not to come and disturb me!' he shouted. 'You're mean. Just like girls to break a promise.'

'Well! I like that!' said George, amazed. 'It was you who broke yours! Who came messing round our camp yesterday evening I'd like to know?'

'Not me!' said the boy at once. 'I always keep my promises. Now go away and keep yours. Girls! Pooh!'

'Well, I can't say we think much of you,' said George, disgusted. 'We're going. We don't want to see anything of your silly digging. Good-bye!'

'Good-bye and good riddance!' called the boy rudely, and turned back to his work.

'I think he must be quite mad,' said Anne. 'First he makes a promise - then last evening he broke his promise and even said he hadn't made one - and now today he says he did make a promise and that he'd kept his and we'd broken ours. Idiotic!'

They went up a little rabbit path, and into a small copse of birch trees. Someone was sitting there reading. He looked up as they came.

The two girls stopped in amazement. It was that boy again! But how had he got here? They had just left him behind in a trench! Anne looked at the title of the book he was reading. Goodness - what a learned title - something about Archaeology.

'Another little trick of yours, I suppose?' said George, sarcastically, stopping in front of him. 'You must be a jolly good runner, I must say, to have got here so quickly. Funny boy, aren't you - very very funny!'

'Good gracious - it's those potty girls again,' groaned the boy. 'Can't you leave me alone? You talked a lot of rubbish yesterday - and now you're talking it again.'

'How did you get here so quickly,' said Anne, puzzled.

'I didn't get here quickly. I came very slowly, reading my book as I went,' said the boy.

'Fibber!' said George. 'You must have run at top speed. Why do you pretend like this? It's only a minute or so ago that we saw you.'

'Now you're the fibber!' said the boy. 'I do think you two girls are awful. Go away and leave me alone and never let me see you again!'

Timmy didn't like the tone of the boy's voice and he growled. The boy scowled at him. 'And just you shut up too,' he said.

Anne pulled at George's sleeve. 'Come on,' she said, 'it's no good staying here arguing. The boy's crazy - just mad - we'll never get any sense out of him!'

The two girls walked off together, Timmy following.

The boy took absolutely no notice. His face was turned to his book and he was quite absorbed in it.

'I've never met anyone quite so mad before!' said Anne, rather puzzled. 'By the way, George - you don't suppose it could have been that idiotic boy last night in the cottage?'

'No. I tell you I think you dreamed it,' said George, firmly. 'Though that boy is quite idiot enough to explore an old cottage in the middle of the night. He would probably think it a very good time to do so. Oh Anne, look - there's a pool - in that hollow down there. Do you think we could bathe in it?'

It certainly shone very temptingly. They went down to have a closer look. 'Yes - we'll have a swim this afternoon,' said George. 'And then I really think, Anne, we ought to go back to Kirrin Cottage and get a few more provisions. The sandwiches we've got left are so dry that we really shan't enjoy eating them - and as Timmy's ear isn't healed, it looks as if we'll have to stay a bit longer.'

'Right!' said Anne, and they went on back to the camp. They changed into their swim-suits in the afternoon and went off to the little pool. It was fairly deep, very warm and quite clean. They spent a lovely hour swimming and basking and swimming again - then they reluctantly dressed and began to think of going off on the long journey to Kirrin Cottage.

George's mother was very surprised to see the two girls and Timmy. She said yes, of course, they could have some more food, and sent them to ask Joan for all she could spare.

'By the way, I've heard from Julian and Dick,' she said. 'They're back from France - and may be here in a day or two! Shall I tell them to join you or will you come back here?'

'Tell them to come and fetch us as soon as they get here!' said George, delighted. Her face shone. Ah - the Five would be together again. How wonderful!

'Leave me directions to give them so that they can find you,' said her mother. 'Then you can all come back - together. The boys can help to carry everything.'

What fun, what fun! Julian and Dick again, now things would be exciting, things would happen, as they always did. What FUN!

Chapter 6

STORM IN THE NIGHT

It was fun to go back to their little camping-place again. It was growing dark, as they had stayed to have a good meal at Kirrin Cottage, and Timmy had eaten a most enormous plate of meat, vegetables and gravy. Then he had sat down and sighed as if to say 'That was jolly good! I could do with some more!'

However, nobody took any notice of this, so he trotted off to have a good look round the garden to make sure it was just the same as when he had left it a day or two before. Then it was time to start back to the camping-place, and Timmy heard George's whistle.

'Well, nobody laughed at Timmy this evening!' said Anne. 'Not even your father!'

'Oh, I expect Mother had told him not to,' said George. 'Anyway, I said I would stay away till Tim's ear is better, and I mean to.'

'Well, I'm quite willing,' said Anne. 'The only thing I'm a bit worried about is - do you suppose there will be anyone snooping about in that old cottage again!'

'You dreamed it all!' said George. 'You admitted you did!'

'Well, yes, I did wonder if I had dreamed it,' said Anne, as they walked up the long Carters Lane to the moor. 'But now that it will soon be dark, I'm beginning to think I didn't dream it - and it isn't a very nice feeling.'

'Oh, don't be silly!' said George impatiently. 'You can't chop and change about like that. Anyway, we've got Timmy - no one would dare to upset Timmy! Would they, Tim?'

But Timmy was ahead, hoping against hope that he might for once in a way catch a rabbit. There were so many about on the common at this time of the evening, peeping at him here, making fun of him there, and showing their little white bobtails as soon as he moved in their direction.

The two girls got safely back to their camp. The tent was still up, their heather-bed out in the open, covered with the old rug. They put down their loads thankfully, and went to the little spring for a drink.

George yawned. 'I'm tired. Let's get to bed at once, shall we? Or wait - perhaps it would be a good idea to have a look in at that cottage to make sure no one is there to disturb us tonight.'

'Oh no - I don't want to look,' said Anne. 'It's getting dark now.'

'All right - I'll go with Timmy,' said George, and off she went. She came back in about five minutes, her little torch shining in front of her, for it was now almost dark.

'Nothing to report,' she said. 'Nothing whatever - except one bat flying round that big room. Timmy nearly went mad when it flew down and almost touched his nose.'

'Oh. That's when he barked, I suppose,' said Anne, who was now curled up on the heather-bed. 'I heard him. Come on, George - I'm sleepy.'

'I must just look at Timmy's ear once more,' said George and shone her torch on it.

'Well, buck up, then,' said Anne. 'That's about the thousandth time today you've examined it.'

'It does seem much better,' said George, and she patted Timmy. 'I shall be glad when I can take this awful collar off him. I'm sure he hates it.'

'I don't believe he even notices it now,' said Anne. 'George, are you coming or not? I really can't keep awake one minute more.'

'I'm coming,' said George. 'No, Tim - you are not sleeping on our bed. I told you that last night. There's hardly enough room for Anne and me.'

She climbed carefully on to the heather-bed, and lay looking up at the twinkling stars. 'I feel happy tonight,' she said, 'because Julian and Dick are coming. I was down in the dumps when I thought they might not be coming at all these hols. When do you suppose they'll be here, Anne?'

There was no answer. Anne was asleep. George sighed. She would have liked to plan what they were going to do when the boys came. Timmy's ear would surely be all right in a day or two - and the boys could carry everything back from this little camp to Kirrin Cottage - and then long days of swimming and boating and fishing and all kinds of fun could begin - begin - begin - be... And now George was asleep too! She didn't feel a small spider running over her hand, wondering whether or not to spin a web between her finger and thumb. She didn't hear the scramble of a hedgehog not far off - though Timmy did and pricked one ear. It was a very peaceful night indeed.

Next day the girls were very cheerful. They made a good breakfast of some of the food they had brought, and then spent some time getting more heather for their bed, which, under the weight of their two bodies, was now rather flat and uncomfortable.

'Now for a swim!' said George. They put on their swim-suits, threw cardigans over their shoulders and set off to the little pool. On the way they saw Jet, the little mongrel dog, in the distance, and the boy with him. Jet tore up to them and danced round Timmy excitedly.

The boy called to them. 'It's all right, don't worry, I'm not going near your place! I'm still keeping my promise! Jet - come here!'

The girls took no notice of the grinning boy, but couldn't resist patting the little one-eyed mongrel. Jet really was like a piece of quicksilver, darting in and out and round about. He shot back to the boy at once.

The girls went on to the pool - and stopped in dismay when they came near. Someone was already there, swimming vigorously!

'Who is it?' said Anne. 'Dear me, this lonely common seems absolutely crowded with people!'

George was staring at the swimmer in utmost amazement. 'Anne - it's that boy!' she said. 'Look - tousled hair and everything! But-but...'

'But we've just met him going in the opposite direction!' said Anne, also amazed. 'How extraordinary! No, it can't be the boy!'

They went a little nearer. Yes - it was the boy. He called out to them. 'I'm just going out. I shan't be a minute!'

'How did you get here?' shouted George. 'We never saw you turn back and run.'

'I've been here for about ten minutes,' shouted back the boy.

'Fibber!' yelled back George at once.

'Ah - barmy as usual!' yelled the boy. 'Same as yesterday!'

He got out and walked off, dripping wet, in the direction of the trenches and pits which he was digging. George looked about for Jet, but she couldn't see him. 'Perhaps he's in the pool too,' she said. 'Come on, Anne - let's swim. I must say that that boy is extraordinary! I suppose he thinks it's funny to meet people, then double back and appear again!'

'He was nicer the first time of all that we saw him,' said Anne. 'I liked him then. I just don't understand him now. Ooooh - isn't this water lovely and warm!'

They had a long swim, got out and basked in the sun, lying on the heather, and then swam again. Then they began to feel hungry and went back to their little camping place.

The day passed quickly. They saw no more of the puzzling boy, or of Jet. They occasionally heard the sharp noise of metal on stone, or of chipping, from the place where the boy was presumably still digging in the old Roman camp.

'Or what he hopes is an old Roman camp,' said George. 'Personally I think he's so mad that I don't suppose he would know the difference between a Roman camp and a Boy Scout's camp!'

They settled down on their heather-bed that night, but saw no stars twinkling above them this time. Instead there were rather heavy clouds, and it was not nearly so warm.

'Gosh - I hope it's not going to rain!' said George. 'Our tent wouldn't be much good against a real downpour! We could squeeze into it all right, but it's not a proper waterproof tent. Do you think it's going to rain, Anne?'

'No,' said Anne, sleepily. 'Anyway, I'm not getting up till I have to! I'm tired.'

She went to sleep, and so did George. Timmy didn't, though. He had heard the far-off growl of thunder, and he was uneasy. Timmy was not afraid of thunderstorms, but he didn't like them.

They were things that growled like enormous dogs in the sky, and flashed angrily - but he never could get at them, or frighten them!

He closed both eyes, and put down one ear, leaving the other one up, listening.

Another thunder growl came, and one large and heavy drop of rain fell on Timmy's black nose. Then another fell on his cardboard collar and made a very loud noise indeed, startling him. He sat up, growling.

The rain came closer, and soon large drops, the size of half-crowns, peppered the faces of the two sleeping girls. Then came such a crash of thunder that they both awoke in a fright.

'Blow! It's a thunderstorm!' said George. 'And thunder rain too. We shall be soaked.'

'Better get into the tent,' said Anne, as a flash of lightning forked down the sky and lighted up everything with a quick brilliance.

'No good,' said George. 'It's soaked already. There's nothing for it but to get into the cottage, Anne. At least we'll have a roof over our heads or rather, a ceiling, for the roof's gone. Come on.'

Anne didn't in the least want to shelter in the old cottage, but there was absolutely nothing else to do. The girls grabbed their rug and ran through the rain, George flashing her torch to guide them.

Timmy ran too, barking.

They came to the doorway of the cottage and went inside. What a relief to get out of the rain!

The two girls huddled down into a corner, the rug round them - but soon they were too hot and threw it off.

The storm passed overhead with a few terrific crashes and much lightning. Gradually the rain grew less and soon stopped. One star came out, and then others followed as the thunder-clouds swept away in the wind.

'We can't go back to the tent - we'll have to stay here,' said George. 'I'll go and get our bags for pillows. We can lie on the rug.'

Anne went with her, and carried a bag back too. Soon the girls were lying in a corner on the rug, their heads on the bags, and Timmy close beside them.

'Good night,' said Anne. 'We'll try to go to sleep again! Blow that storm!'

Soon they were both asleep - but Timmy wasn't. Timmy was uneasy. Very uneasy! And quite suddenly he broke into a volley of such loud barks that both girls woke up in a panic.

'Timmy! What's the matter? Oh Tim, what is it?' cried George. She clutched his leather collar and held on to him.

'Don't leave us! Timmy, what's scared you?'

Chapter 7

QUEER HAPPENINGS

Timmy stopped barking and tried to get away from George's hand on his collar. But she would not let him. George was not easily frightened, but what with the thunderstorm, the queer old cottage and now Timmy's sudden excitement, she wanted him near her.

'What is it?' asked Anne, in a scared whisper.

'I don't know. I can't even imagine,' said George, also in a low voice. 'Perhaps it's nothing - just the thunderstorm that has upset him and made him nervous. We'll keep awake a bit, and see if we hear anything queer.'

They lay quietly in their corner, and George kept a firm hand on Timmy. He growled once or twice, but did not bark any more. George began to think it really must have been the storm that had upset him.

A rumble of thunder came again - the storm was returning, or else another one was blowing up! George felt relieved. 'It's all right, Anne. It must have been the thunder and lightning in the distance that upset Timmy. You're silly, Timmy - scaring us like that!'

Crash - rumble - crash! Yes, certainly the storm was gathering force again! Timmy barked angrily.

'Be quiet! You make more noise than the thunder!' said George, crossly. 'No, you can't go out into the rain, Timmy. It's begun again, as bad as before. You'd only get dripping wet - and then you'd want to come and sit as close to me as possible and make me wet too. I know you!'

'No - don't let him go, George,' said Anne. 'I like him here with us. My word - what a storm! I hope it won't strike this cottage.'

'Well, considering that it must have stood here for three or four hundred years, and have seen thousands of storms, I expect it will come safely through one more!' said George. 'Where are you going, Anne?'

'Just to look out of the window,' said Anne. 'Or out of the place where the window used to be! I like to see the countryside suddenly lit up for just one moment in a lightning flash - and then go back to darkness again.'

She went to stand at the window. There came the crash of thunder, not far away, and a brilliant flash of lightning. Anne stared over the countryside, which had suddenly become visible in the flash - and then disappeared like magic in a second!

Anne gave a sudden cry and stumbled back to George. 'George - George...'

'Whatever's the matter?' asked George, alarmed.

'There's someone out there - people!' said Anne, clutching George and making her jump. 'I saw them just for an instant, when the lightning flashed.'

'People? What sort of people?' said George, astonished. 'How many?'

'I don't know. It was all so quick. I think there were two - or maybe three. They were standing some way off - quite still, out there in the storm.'

'Anne, those are trees!' said George, scornfully. 'There are two or three small trees standing against the sky out there - I noticed them the other day.'

'These weren't trees,' said Anne. 'I know they weren't. What are people doing out there in this storm? I'm frightened.'

George was absolutely certain that Anne had seen the group of little trees that she knew were there - they would look just like people, in a quick flash of lightning. No sooner did you see something in a storm than it was gone!

She comforted Anne. 'Don't worry, Anne! It's the easiest thing in the world to imagine seeing things in a lightning flash. Timmy would bark if there were people around. He would...'

'Well, he did bark, didn't he?' said Anne. 'He woke us both up with his barking.'

'Ah yes - but that was just because he heard the storm coming up again,' said George. 'And you know he gets angry when he hears the thunder growling.'

Just at that moment the thunder crashed again - then the lightning flashed its weird and brilliant light.

This time both the girls screamed and Timmy gave an enormous bark, trying his hardest to get away from George.

'There! Did you see that?' said Anne, in a shaky voice.

'Yes. Yes, I did. Oh, Anne, you're right! Someone was looking in at the window! And if we saw him, he must have seen us! Whatever is he doing here in the middle of the night?'

'Well, I told you I saw two or three people,' said Anne, still shakily. 'I expect it was one of them. May be they saw the cottage in one of the lightning flashes, and thought they might shelter here - and sent one of their number to see.'

'May be. But what in the world is anyone doing, wandering about here at night?' said George. 'They can't possibly be up to any good. Let's go home tomorrow, Anne. I wish the boys were here! They'd know what to do, they would have some good plan!'

'The storm's going off again,' said Anne. 'Timmy has stopped barking too, thank goodness. Don't let him go, George. You never know - those people, whoever they are, might do him harm. Anyway, I feel safer when he's with us!'

'I wouldn't dream of letting him go,' said George. 'You're trembling, Anne! You needn't be as scared as that! Timmy won't let you come to any harm.'

'I know! But it wasn't very nice suddenly seeing somebody looking in at the window like that, outlined in a lightning flash!' said Anne. 'I can't possibly go to sleep again. Let's play some silly game to take our minds off it.'

So they played the Alphabet game with Animals. Each had to think in turn of an animal beginning with A, and a mark went to the one who could keep it up longest! Then they went on to B and to C and to D.

They were doing the E's when they heard a loud and very comforting sound.

'Timmy's snoring,' said George. 'He's fast asleep. What an elephantine snore, Tim!'

'E for elephant,' said Anne, quickly.

'Cheat! That should have been my E!' said George. 'All right. E for Eland.'

'E for Egg-Eater,' said Anne, after a pause.

'Not allowed - you made that up!' said George. 'My mark!'

By the time they got to M, and Anne was two marks ahead, the dawn was breaking. It was a great relief to the two girls to see the silvering of the sky in the east and to know that soon the sun would be up. They immediately felt much better. George even stood up and went bravely to the window, where there was nothing to be seen but the quiet countryside outside, with its stretches of heather, gorse-bushes and silver birches.

'We were silly to be so scared,' said George. 'I don't think we'll go back home today after all, Anne. I hate running away from anything. The boys would laugh at us.'

'I don't care if they do,' said Anne. 'I'm going back. If the boys were here, I'd stay - but goodness knows when they'll come - it might not be till next week! I'm just NOT staying here another night.'

'All right, all right,' said George. 'Do as you like - but for goodness' sake tell the boys it was you who wanted to run away, not me!'

'I will,' said Anne. 'Oh dear - now I feel sleepy all over again. I suppose it's because daylight is here and everything seems safe, so I know I can fall asleep.'

George felt the same! They cuddled down together on the rug again and immediately feel asleep. They did not wake till quite late - and even then something woke them, or they might have slept on for hours, tired out with their broken night and the fright they had had.

They were awakened by something scuttling round them, making a very loud noise indeed. Then Timmy barked.

The girls awoke and sat up, rather dazed. 'Oh, it's Jet!' said Anne. 'Jet, have you come to see if we're all right, you dear, funny little one-eyed thing!'

'Wuff-wuff!' said Jet, and rolled over on his back to be tickled, his long thin tail wagging all the time. Timmy leaped on him and pretended to eat him. Then a loud voice called to them.

They looked up. The boy was standing at the door, grinning widely.

'Hallo, sleepy-heads! I came to see if you were all right after that awful storm. I know I promised I wouldn't come here, but I felt a bit worried about you.'

'Oh. Well, that's nice of you,' said Anne, getting up and brushing the dust from her skirt. 'We're quite all right - but we had rather a queer night. We...'

She got a hard nudge from George and stopped suddenly. George was warning her not to say anything about the people they had seen - or the person at the window. Did she think they might have anything to do with this boy? Anne said no more and George spoke instead.

'Wasn't it a dreadful storm? How did you get on?'

'All right. I sleep down in a trench, and the rain can't get at me. Well - so long! Come on, Jet!'

The boy and the dog disappeared. 'That was nice of him,' said Anne. 'He doesn't seem crazy this morning, does he - quite normal! He didn't even contradict us. I think I quite like him after all.'

They went to their soaked tent and got a tin of sardines out to eat with bread and butter. Just as they were opening it, they heard someone whistling and looked up.

'Here comes that boy again!' said Anne.

'Good morning. I don't want to butt in - but I just wondered if you were all right after the storm,' said the boy, without even a smile. The girls stared at him in amazement.

'Look - don't start being crazy all over again!' said George. 'You know jolly well we're all right. We've already told you.'

'You haven't. And I didn't know!' said the boy. 'Well, I only came out of politeness. Sorry to see you are still balmy!'

And off he went. 'There!' said Anne, vexed. 'Just as we thought he was nice again, and not crazy, he starts all over again. I suppose he thinks it's funny. Silly ass!'

They set their things out to dry in the sun, and it was half-past twelve before they were ready to pack and go back to Kirrin Cottage. George was rather cross about going, but Anne was quite firm. She was NOT going to spend another night on the common.

George was just strapping a package on her bicycle, when the two girls heard the sound of voices - and then Timmy went quite mad! He barked wildly, and set off down a path at top speed, his tail wagging nineteen to the dozen!

'Oh! It can't be - surely it can't be Julian and Dick!' shouted George, in sudden delight, and she shot off after Timmy.

It was! It was Julian and Dick! There they came, packs on their backs, grinning all over their faces! Hurrah! The Famous Five were all together once more!

Chapter 8

ALL TOGETHER AGAIN!

There was such excitement at the arrival of the boys that at first nobody could make themselves heard. Timmy barked at the top of his very loud voice and simply would not stop! George shouted, and Dick and Julian laughed. Anne hugged them, and felt proud of two such brown, good-looking brothers.

'Ju! We never guessed you'd come so soon!' said the delighted George. 'Gosh, I'm pleased to see you!'

'We got fed up with French food,' said Dick. 'I came out in spots and Julian was sick, and it was SO hot. Phew! Next time I go there I'll go when it's cooler.'

'And we kept on thinking of Kirrin and the bay, and you two girls and Timmy,' said Julian, giving George a friendly punch. 'I think we really got a bit homesick. So we packed up before we should, and flew home.'

'Flew?' said George. 'You lucky things! And then did you come straight down here?'

'We spent the night with Mother and Dad at home,' said Julian, 'and then caught the first train here that we possibly could this morning - only to find that you weren't at Kirrin!'

'So we packed camping-out things in smaller bags and came straight along to you!' said Dick. 'I say, George, old thing, do you think you could possibly make Timmy stop barking? I'm going a bit deaf!'

'Shut up, Tim,' ordered George. 'Let other people bark a bit. Do you notice his collar, Julian?'

'Can't help seeing it!' said Julian. 'He looks a scream in it, doesn't he? Ha ha! You're an Elizabethan dog with a ruff, Timmy - that's what Uncle Quentin told us - and that's what you look like, old fellow!'

'He looks most comical, I must say,' said Dick. 'Enough to make a cat laugh, hey, Timmy!'

Anne looked at George. Goodness, what would she say to hear Julian and Dick laughing at Timmy and making fun of him! Would she lose her temper at once?

But George only grinned. In fact she gave a little laugh herself. 'Yes - he does look funny, doesn't he? But he doesn't mind a bit!'

'You know, we came here to camp because George couldn't bear people laughing at ...' began Anne, thinking that she wouldn't let George get away with this! But George gave her such a beseeching look, that she stopped at once. George could never bear to look small in front of Julian and Dick. She prided herself on being just like a boy - and she was suddenly certain that her two cousins would think she was 'just like a girl' if they heard of the fuss she had made about people laughing at Timmy's collar.

'I say - you two seem to be packing up,' said Julian, looking at the package strapped to the back of George's bicycle. 'What's happened?'

'Well - it got a bit lonely and Anne was...' and then in her turn George caught a beseeching look from Anne! She knew what it meant 'I didn't tell tales of you - so don't tell tales of me - don't say I was scared!'

'Er - Anne was certain that there was something queer going on here,' went on George, who had quite meant to say that Anne was scared and insisted on going home. 'And we didn't feel that we could tackle it ourselves - though if you had been here we wouldn't have dreamed of going home, of course.'

'What do you mean - something queer?' asked Dick.

'Well - you see - it began like this,' said George, but Julian interrupted.

'If there's a tale to tell, let's have it over a meal, shall we? We've had nothing to eat since six o'clock this morning, Dick and I - and we're ravenous!'

'Yes. Good idea,' said Dick, and began to undo a big package which he took out of his bag. 'I've a picnic lunch here from your mother, George - a jolly good one, I can tell you. I think she was so relieved to think that she was going to get rid of us that she really surpassed herself! We've got a marvellous piece of boiled ham - look! It'll last us for ages - if we don't give bits to Timmy. Get away, Tim. This is not for you! Grrrrrr!'

George suddenly felt so happy that she could hardly speak. It had been fun camping with Anne - but what a difference the boys made! So confident of themselves, so merry, full of jokes, so idiotic, and yet so dependable. She felt that she wanted to sing at the top of her voice!

The sun had been hot again that morning and had dried the common beautifully. It wasn't long before the Five were sitting down in the heather with a very fine feast before them.

'I wouldn't sell anyone my hunger for a hundred pounds,' said Dick. 'Now then - who's going to carve this magnificent piece of gammon?'

There were no plates, so they had to make sandwiches of the ham. Dick had actually brought some mustard, and dabbed it generously over the slices of ham before George put them between pieces of bread. 'Aha, Tim - this is one way of making sure you won't get even a bite of these wonderful ham sandwiches!' said Dick. 'You can't bear mustard, can you? Ju, where's the meat we brought for Tim?'

'Here. Pooh - it smells a bit strong,' said Julian. 'Do you mind taking it to a nice secluded corner, Tim?'

Timmy immediately sat down close to Julian. 'Now - don't be so disobedient!' said Julian, and gave Timmy a friendly push.

'He doesn't understand the word 'secluded',' said George, with a grin. 'Tim - buzz off a bit!'

Timmy understood that and took his meat a little way away. Everyone took a ripe red tomato, and a little lettuce heart from a damp cloth brought by Julian, and settled down happily to munch sandwiches.

'Lovely!' said Anne, contentedly. 'Goodness gracious - I can hardly believe we had such a peculiar time last night!'

'Ah - tell us all about it!' said Dick.

So first Anne, then George related all that had happened. Anne told of the night she had seen a light in the old cottage and had heard whispers and footfalls inside.

'We did think I might have been dreaming,' she said, 'but now we don't think I was. We think I really did see and hear those things.'

'What next?' asked Julian, taking his third sandwich. 'This all sounds most interesting. Quite Famous Five-ish, in fact!'

George told of the storm in the night, and how they had had to leave their heather-bed and go to shelter in the old cottage - and how, in the flashes of lightning, Anne had seen two or three people standing outside - and then how they had both seen someone standing silently, looking in at the window.

'Queer,' said Julian, puzzled. 'Yes - something is up. I wonder what? I mean - there's absolutely nothing on this lonely bit of common that's at all interesting.'

'Well - there are the remains of an old Roman camp,' said Anne. 'And a boy there who is examining them to see if he can find anything old and interesting.'

'A completely mad boy,' said George. 'He doesn't seem to know what he says or doesn't say. Contradicts himself all the time - or, to put it another way, tells the most idiotic fibs.'

'And he apparently thinks it's awfully funny to meet us somewhere, and then double round on his tracks and appear suddenly somewhere else,' said Anne. 'Sometimes I can't help liking him - other times he's too fat-headed for words.'

'He's got a little one-eyed dog called Jet,' said George, and Timmy gave a sudden bark as he heard the name. 'You like Jet, don't you, Tim?'

'This all sounds most interesting,' said Dick. 'Pass me the tomato bag, Ju, before you eat the lot. Thanks. As I said, most interesting - a one-eyed dog, a mad boy, Roman remains - and people who come to an old ruined cottage in the dead of night and look into windows!'

'I wonder you two girls didn't pack up and go home,' said Julian. 'You must be braver without us than I thought possible!'

George caught Anne's eye and grinned mischievously, but said nothing. Anne owned up, red in the face.

'Well - I did tell George I was going home this very morning, I was so scared last night. George didn't want to, of course, but she was coming, all the same. But now you've turned up, things are different.'

'Ah - well, do we stay on, or don't we, Ju?'

said Dick. 'Are we scared or are we not?'

Everyone laughed. 'Well - if you go back I shall stay on alone!' said Anne. 'Just to show you!'

'Good old Anne!' said Dick. 'We all stay, of course. It may be nothing - it may be something - we can't tell. But we'll certainly find out. And the first thing to do is to have a look at the Roman remains and the mad boy. I'm looking forward to meeting him, I must say! After that we'll tackle the ruined cottage!'

Timmy came up to see if he could get any tit-bits. Julian waved him away. 'You smell of too-strong meat, Timmy,' he said. 'Go and get a drink. By the way, is there anything to drink here, George?'

'Oh yes,' said George. 'A lovely spring. Not far off, either. Let's take the remains of our meal there, and the mug. We've only got one unfortunately, so it's no good getting water unless we all sit by the spring and take turns at the mug. Come on!'

The boys thought that the spring was a really splendid one. They grouped themselves around it and took turns at filling the mug and drinking from it. They were now eating slabs of Joan's fruit-cake and it was very good.

'Now, you girls unpack again,' said Dick, when they had finished their meal. 'Goodness, I did enjoy that! We'd better unpack too, Julian.'

'Right, Where shall we put our things?' asked Julian, looking around. 'I don't somehow like to leave everything under that little tent, with a mad boy about, and a one-eyed dog. I feel that both of them might like the rest of that ham.'

'Oh, it's too hot to leave ham out in this sun,' said George. 'We'll have to put it into the old cottage, on a shelf. We'll put everything there, shall we? Move in properly, in case it rains again at night. It's so tiresome to have to bundle everything indoors in the dark and the rain.'

'I agree,' said Dick. 'Right. We'll move into the ruined cottage. What fun! Come on, everyone!'

They spent the next half-hour taking their things into the cottage and putting them in corners or on shelves. George found a dark corner behind the fireplace where she put the food, for she was half-afraid that Jet, nice little dog though he seemed, might perhaps smell the ham and gobble up most of their food.

'Now!' said Julian, 'are we ready to go and see the Roman remains and the Mad Boy? Here we go, then - the Famous Five are off again, and who knows what will happen!'

Chapter 9

A LITTLE EXPLORATION

The Five walked off together, Timmy at the back, delighted to have all his friends with him again. He kept nudging first one person's heels and then another, just to remind them that he was there.

As they came near the old camp, they saw a boy sitting beside a bush, reading.

'There's that boy we told you of!' said George. 'See?'

'He looks fairly ordinary,' said Dick. 'Very absorbed in his book, I must say. Determined to take no notice of us!'

'I'll speak to him,' said George. So, as they drew near, she called to the boy.

'Hallo! Where's Jet?'

The boy looked up, annoyed. 'How do I know?'

'Well, he was with you this morning,' said George.

'He was not,' said the boy. 'He's never with me! Please don't disturb me, I'm reading.'

'There you are!' said George to the others. 'He came to see us this morning with Jet - and now he says the little dog is never with him. Quite, quite mad!'

'Or plain rude,' said Dick. 'Not worth bothering about, anyway. Well, if he's not doing any excavating in his Roman Camp, perhaps we can explore it without being ordered off!'

They walked on slowly and came to the camp, and at once heard a cheerful whistling going on, and the sound of someone digging. George looked over the top of the dug-out trench in surprise. She almost toppled in, she was so amazed at what she saw!

The boy was there, digging carefully, whistling as he did so! He brushed his tousled hair from his hot forehead and caught sight of George and the others. He looked rather astonished.

'How on earth did you get down here so quickly?' said George. 'Do you have wings or something?'

'I've been down here all the afternoon,' said the boy. 'For at least an hour, I should think.'

'Fibber!' said George. The boy looked very angry, and shouted back at once.

'I'm tired of you two girls - and now you've brought your friends too, I suppose you think you can come and aggravate me even more!'

'Don't be a fathead,' said Dick, feeling as puzzled about this boy as George and Anne had been. How in the world had he run around them and got down in the trench so quickly? Did he enjoy playing tricks like that? He really didn't look mad!

'Is this your property, this old camp?' asked Julian.

'No. Of course not. Don't be daft!' said the boy. 'As if I could own a whole camp like this! It was discovered by my father some time ago, and he gave me permission to work here for the hols. It's pretty exciting, I can tell you. See my finds?'

He pointed to a rough shelf where stood a broken pot, something that looked like an old brooch, a long pinlike thing, and part of a stone head. Julian was at once interested. He leapt down into the trench.

'I say - you've certainly got something there!' he said. 'Any coins too?'

'Yes - three,' said the boy and put his hand in his pocket. 'I found this one first - then these two close together yesterday. They must be hundreds and hundreds of years old.'

By this time all the others were down in the trench too. They looked about with much interest. Evidently the place had been well excavated by experts, and now the boy was working here and there on his own, hoping to find something that had been overlooked.

Dick went out of the trench and began to clamber about over the great stones and rocks. A small animal suddenly caught his eye - a young rabbit.

It stared at him in fright and then disappeared behind a slab of stone. It peeped out at Dick again, and he was amused. He went cautiously over to the slab, and the little rabbit disappeared - but soon two or three whiskers poked out. Dick got down on hands and knees and looked behind the slab. A dark hole was there.

Dick pulled out his torch and flashed it into the hole, wondering if the small rabbit was hiding there, or whether it was the entrance to a burrow.

To his surprise there was a very big hole indeed - a hole that seemed to go down and down and down - his torch could make out no bottom to it.

'It's far too wide for a rabbit-hole,' thought Dick. 'I wonder where it leads to, I'll ask that boy.'

He went back to where the boy was still showing his things to Julian, talking eagerly. 'I say,' began Dick, 'there's a most interesting hole behind one of the stone slabs over there - what is it?'

'Oh that - my father says it was explored and that it was only a place for storages - meat in hot weather, or loot, or something like that. Actually nothing whatever was found there - most uninteresting. As a matter of fact it may be nothing to do with the Camp at all.'

'I say, look - here's another shelf with things on it,' said George, suddenly spying a little collection of things on a rough shelf in another part of the trench. 'Are these yours too?'

'Those? No,' said the boy. 'Nothing to do with me at all. Don't touch them, please.'

'Whose are they then?' asked George, curiously. The boy took no notice whatever of her question and went on talking to Julian. George took down a beautiful little round pot.

'Hey! I told you NOT to touch those!' yelled the boy, so suddenly and angrily that George almost dropped the pot. 'Put it back - and clear out if you can't do what you're told.'

'Easy, old man, easy!' said Julian. 'No need to yell at her like that. You scared that little dog of yours and made him jump almost out of his skin! We'd better go, I think.'

'Well - I don't like being disturbed too much,' said the boy. 'People always seem to be wandering around. I've turned off quite a lot.'

'People?' said Julian, remembering Anne's story of two or three figures standing outside the cottage the night before, and of someone looking in. 'What kind of people?'

'Oh - nosey ones - wanting to get down and explore - disturbing me - it's surprising how many idiots there are wandering about this lonely place,' said the boy, picking up a tool again and setting to work. He grinned suddenly. 'I don't mean you. You really know something about this kind of thing.'

'Was anyone about last night?' asked Julian.

'Well - I rather think so,' said the boy. 'Because Jet here barked like mad. But it might have been the storm that frightened him - not that he's usually frightened of storms.'

'What's your name?' asked Dick.

'Guy Lawdler,' said the boy, and Dick whistled.

'My word - is your father the famous explorer, Sir John Lawdler?' he asked. The boy nodded.

'Well, no wonder you're so keen on archaeology!' said Dick. 'Your father's done pretty well in that line, hasn't he?'

'Come on, Dick!' said George. 'Let's go now. We might have time for a swim in the pool. We forgot to tell you about that.'

'Right,' said Dick. 'Come on, Julian. Good-bye, Guy!'

They left the rather desolate old camp and went back to the cottage to get their swim-suits and change. It wasn't long before they were running over the heather to the pool.

'Hallo - Guy's having a swim!' said Dick, in surprise. Sure enough, a boy was there, his hair falling over his forehead as usual.

'Hey, Guy!' shouted George. 'Have a swim with us!'

But the boy was already getting out of the water. Dick shouted. 'Wait a minute - don't go. We'd like to have a swim with you, Guy!'

The boy turned defiantly. 'Don't be an ass!' he said. 'My name's not Guy!'

And, leaving four astonished people behind him, he ran lightly over the heather and disappeared.

'There you are - he's mad after all!' said Anne. 'Don't bother about him. Come on in - the water's lovely and warm.'

They lazed about afterwards and began to feel hungry. 'Though how any of us could feel hungry after eating about fifty sandwiches between us at dinner-time, I don't know!' said Dick. 'Race you back to the cottage, Ju!'

They changed back into ordinary clothes and then had tea - fruit cake, shortbread biscuits, and tinned pineapple on bread. They kept the juice and diluted it with cold spring water - it was simply delicious.

'Now let's explore the cottage,' said Dick.

'We already have, Anne and I,' said George. 'So I don't expect you'll find anything much.'

They went methodically through the old house, and even up the old stone stairway to the two rooms upstairs - though they could hardly be called rooms, for they had very little roof and not much wall!

'Nothing much here, that's certain,' said Dick clattering down the stone stairway. 'Now let's go to the out-buildings - not that there's much left of them either!'

They examined everything, and came last of all to the old stables. It was dark inside, for the windows were very small, and it was some seconds before anyone could see properly.

'Old mangers,' said Dick, touching them. 'I wonder how long ago it is since they were used - and...'

'I say!' said George, suddenly. 'There's something funny here. Anne, look - this bit of floor was undisturbed yesterday, wasn't it?'

Anne looked down at the big white flagstone on which George was standing. It was quite obvious that it had been lifted, for the edges were not as green with moss as the others were, and the stone had been put back a little crookedly.

'Yes - someone's been interested in this stone - or in what is beneath it!' said Dick. 'I bet something is buried underneath!'

'Those men last night - that's what they came about!' said George. 'They went into these stables and lifted this stone. Why?'

'We'll soon find out!' said Julian. 'Come on everyone, loosen it with your fingers - then we'll heave it up!'

Chapter 10

WHAT CAN BE HAPPENING?

Forty fingers and thumbs were very hard at work trying to loosen the heavy stone. At last Julian got hold of a corner which could be held more easily than any other part of the stone. He tried to lift it and it came away a little.

'Help me this side, Dick,' said Julian, and Dick put his strong fingers there too. 'Heave-ho!' he said - and up came the stone.

It went over with a crash and Timmy barked loudly, jumping aside. Everyone peered down - and then looked exceedingly disappointed!

There was nothing there at all. Not even a hole! The black earth, hard as iron, lay underneath, and nothing else.

They all stared down at the dry, hard earth, puzzled. George looked up at Julian.

'Well - that's queer, isn't it? Why should anyone lift up this heavy stone if there is nothing hidden underneath?'

'Well, it's clear that whoever was here didn't find anything - nor did he hide anything either,' said Julian. 'Dear me - why should anyone lift up a heavy stone and put it back - just for nothing?'

'He was obviously looking for something that wasn't here,' said Anne. 'The wrong stone, probably!'

'Yes. I think Anne's right,' said Dick. 'It's the wrong stone! Probably there is something very interesting under the right stone! But which one is it?'

They all sat and looked at one another, and Timmy saw it too, wondering why all this fuss was made about a flat white stone. Julian thought hard.

'From what you've told me, Anne - about seeing a light in the cottage that first night you were here - and hearing voices - and then seeing those figures outside last night in the storm - it looks as if someone is urgently hunting for something round about here.'

'Yes - something under a stone. Treasure of some sort, do you think?' said George.

Julian shook his head. 'No. I hardly think that much treasure would be hidden anywhere about this old cottage - all the people who lived here must have been fairly poor. The most they would have hidden would have been a few pieces of gold, and that would have been found long ago.'

'Well - someone modern might have hidden something valuable here - even something stolen,' said Anne.

'Yes. We can't tell. It's obviously important and urgent to somebody,' said Dick. 'I wonder if the people that Guy said came bothering him were anything to do with this?'

'They may have been,' said Julian. 'But they have clearly decided that what they are looking for is here now, whatever it is. And they must have been most annoyed to find you and Anne here last night, George. That's why someone came and looked in at the window, I expect - to make sure you were asleep! And you weren't.'

'I don't know whether I want to stay on here or not now,' said Anne, alarmed. 'If they haven't found what they want, they'll probably come again - in the night too.'

'Who cares?' said Dick. 'We've got Timmy, haven't we? I'm not turning out of here because somebody's got a habit of turning up big stones!'

Julian laughed. 'Nor am I. Let's stay on! And I don't see why we shouldn't do a bit of pulling up of stones ourselves! We might come across something very interesting!'

'Right. It's decided that we stay on then, is it?' said Dick. 'What about you, Anne?'

'Oh yes - of course I'll stay,' said Anne, not wanting to in the least, but knowing that she simply could not bear not to be with the others.

The Five walked round and about the cottage for a while, trying to make out where the people that the girls had seen the night before had come from - from what direction did they come and go?

'The figures I saw first in the lightning stood about there,' said Anne, pointing. 'Let's go and see if there are any foot-prints. It was pouring with rain and the ground must have been very muddy.'

'Good idea,' said Dick, and off they went to where Anne had pointed. But it was a heathery piece of ground, and difficult to tell even if anyone had trodden there, for the heather was thick and springy.

'Let's look just outside the window now - the one where Anne saw someone looking in,' said Dick. And there they had a find! Just in front of the window were two quite deeply-printed foot-marks. One was slightly blurred as if the maker of them had turned his foot sideways as he waited. The other was very clear indeed.

Dick got out a piece of paper. 'I rather think I'll measure these,' he said, 'and make a note of the pattern on the soles. They had rubber soles and heels - look at the markings - crepe rubber I should think.'

He measured the prints. 'Size eight shoes,' he said. 'Same as yours, Ju. Then he carefully drew an exact picture of the sole and heel markings.

'You're quite a detective, Dick,' said Anne, admiringly, and he laughed.

'Oh, anyone can copy foot-prints!' he said. 'The thing is to match them up with the owner!'

'I have a feeling it's getting on for supper-time - if anyone wants any supper,' said George. 'It's half-past eight! Would you believe that the time could fly so fast.'

'I don't really feel very hungry,' said Dick. 'We've done pretty well today.'

'Well, don't waste our precious food if you don't feel hungry,' said George. 'We shall have to keep going home for more if we eat everything too quickly.'

Nobody felt terribly hungry. They made a cosy corner in the cottage and had a slice of cake and a biscuit each, with a drink of pineapple juice and spring-water. George had had the bright idea of filling the big empty pineapple tin, and they each filled a mug from it in turn, and drank.

'It's getting dark,' said Julian. 'Are we going to sleep inside the cottage or out?'

'In,' said Dick, promptly. 'We'll make things just as difficult for any night-prowlers as possible!'

'Right,' said Julian. 'I bet they won't be pleased to find old Timmy here too. Shall we go out and get some heather for beds? I don't fancy sharing a thin rug between the four of us.'

Soon they were all dragging in armfuls of the springy heather. They laid it in the front room, in two corners, for the boys thought they would rather be in the same room as the girls, in case of danger.

'You need an awful lot of heather to make a soft bed,' said Dick, trying his. 'My bones seem to go right through the clumps and rub against the floor!'

'We can put our macs over our heather,' said Julian. 'That will help. The girls can have the rug. We shan't need any covering, it's so hot.'

By the time they had finished, it was dark. George lay on her heather and yawned. 'I'm going to sleep,' she announced. 'We don't need to keep guard or anything like that do we? Timmy will bark if anyone comes near.'

'You're right. I really don't think we need take turns at keeping awake,' said Julian. 'Move up, Dick - you've left me no room.'

Julian was the last to go to sleep. He lay awake puzzling over the lifted stone slab. It was clear that someone had expected to find something under it. How did they know it was that particular slab? Had they a map? If so, it must have shown the wrong stone - or perhaps the searchers read the map wrong?

Before he could work it out any further, he was asleep. Timmy was asleep too, happy because all the others were under his care. He had one ear open as usual, but not very much open!

It was enough to let him hear a small mouse of some kind run across the floor. It was even enough for him to hear a beetle scraping its way up the wall. After a while his ear dropped down and he didn't even hear a hedgehog outside.

But something caused his ear to listen again and it pricked up. A noise crept inside the cottage - a noise that got louder and louder - a weird and puzzling noise!

Timmy woke up and listened. He pawed at George, not knowing whether to bark or not. He knew he should not bark at owls, but this was not an owl. Perhaps George would know.

'Don't, Timmy,' said George sleepily, but Timmy went on pawing her. Then she too heard the noise and sat up in a hurry.

What a truly horrible sound! It was a whining and a wailing, rising and falling through the night. A sound of misery and woe, that went on and on.

'Julian! Dick! Wake up!' called George, her heart beating wildly. 'Something's happening.'

The boys awoke at once and so did Anne. They sat and listened to the weird noise. What in the world could it be? There it went again - wailing high in the air, and then dying away with a moan, only to begin again a few seconds later.

Dick felt the roots of his hair pricking. He leapt off the heather-bed and ran to the window. 'Quick! Come and look at this!' he cried. 'What is it?'

They all crowded to the window, Timmy barking now as loudly as he could. In silence the others gazed at a very strange sight.

Blue and green lights were shining here and there, sometimes dimly, sometimes brightly. A curious round white light was travelling slowly in the air, and Anne clutched George, breathing fast.

'It won't come here,' she said. 'It won't, will it? I don't like it. What is happening, Julian?'

'I wish that awful wailing, whining noise would stop,' said Dick. 'It gets right inside my head. Do you make anything of all this, Julian?'

'Something's queer abroad,' said Julian. 'I'll go out with Timmy and see what I can find.' And before anyone could stop him, out he went, Timmy barking beside him.

'Oh Julian - come back!' called Anne, listening as his footsteps became distant. They all waited tensely at the window - and then suddenly the wailing noise stopped and the strange lights began to fade.

Then they heard Julian's footsteps coming back firmly in the darkness.

'Ju! What was it?' called Dick, as his brother came in at the doorway.'

'I don't know Dick,' said Julian, sounding very puzzled. 'I simply - don't - know! Perhaps we can find out in the morning.'

Chapter 11

INTERESTING DISCOVERIES - AND A PLAN

The four sat in the dark and talked over the horrible noises and the weird blue and green and white lights. Anne sat close to Julian. She really was frightened.

'I want to go back to Kirrin,' she said. 'Let's go tomorrow. I don't like this.'

'I didn't see a thing just now,' said Julian, puzzled, his arm close round Anne. 'I seemed to go quite close to those wailing sounds - and then they stopped as soon as I got fairly near. But although Timmy barked and ran around, there didn't seem to be anyone there.'

'Did you get near the lights?' asked Dick.

'Yes, fairly near. But the odd thing was that they seemed high up when I got near them - not near the ground as I expected. And again Timmy couldn't find anyone. You would have thought if there was anyone about, playing the fool, that Timmy would have found them. But he didn't.'

'Woof,' said Timmy, dolefully. He didn't like this queer business at all!

'Well, if nobody's making the noises and lights, it makes it even worse,' said Anne. 'Do let's go home, Julian. Tomorrow.'

'All right,' said Julian. 'I don't feel particularly thrilled about all this myself. But there is one idea I've got in my mind which I'd like to sort out tomorrow.'

'What's that?' said Dick.

'Well - it may quite well be that somebody very badly wants us out of here for some reason,' said Julian. 'And that somebody may want to come and lift other stones and have a thorough search all over the place - which he can't do with us around. So he's trying to frighten us out!'

'Yes - I believe you are right, Julian,' said Dick. 'Those noises - and lights - they would be enough to scare anyone out of a place. Too eerie for words! Well - let's have a good snoop round in the daylight, to see if we can find any trace of a trickster!'

'We will - but it's extremely odd that Timmy didn't find him,' said Julian. 'Timmy can smell anyone out of any hiding-place! Yes - we'll have a very very good hunt round tomorrow.'

'And if you find nothing and nobody, we'll go home?' asked Anne.

'Yes, we will. I promise you,' said Julian, hugging Anne. 'Don't worry. You shan't have to stay here one night longer, unless you want to! Now - let's try and go to sleep again!'

It took the four a long time to go to sleep after all this excitement in the middle of the night. Anne kept listening for the wailing noises again, but none came. She kept her eyes shut tightly in case she should happen to see any more of the queer lights outside the window.

George and the boys lay awake too, puzzling out the problems of lights and noises which were not apparently caused by anyone! Julian especially was puzzled.

Only Timmy was unconcerned. He went to sleep before anyone else, though he kept one ear wide open - and up went the other one when George moved, or Dick whispered to Julian.

The excitement of the night made them all sleep late.

Julian awoke first, and stared at the low ceiling in surprise. Now - where was he? In France? No. Ah, of course he was in the old ruined cottage!

He woke Dick, who yawned and stretched. 'Remember those queer lights and noises last night?' asked Dick. 'What a fright they gave us! It seems silly to think we were all so puzzled and scared, now that the sun is shining in at the window, and we can see the countryside around for miles!'

'I'm pretty certain someone is trying to scare us away,' said Julian. 'We are in their way here - they want to do some thorough explorations and they can't, because of us! I've a good mind to take the girls home, Dick, and come back here with you.'

'Anne might go, but George wouldn't,' said Dick. 'You know what old George is - good as any boy, and as full of courage as any boy, too. Let's not decide anything till we have had a look round this morning. I don't really believe there's anything spooky about this at all - I agree with you that it's just a few tricks to frighten us away.'

'Right,' said Julian. 'Let's wake the girls. Hey, George! Anne! Sleepyheads! Get up and get us breakfast! What are girls for if not to get our meals?'

George sat up, looking furious, as Julian intended. 'You jolly well get your own m...' she began, and then laughed as she saw Julian's amused face.

'I was only just striking a little match to set you alight!' said Julian. 'Come on - let's all go for a swim in the pool!'

They set off together happily in the warm sunshine, Timmy padding along, his tail waving vigorously. As soon as they got to the pool, they saw the boy there, floating lazily on his back.

'There's Guy!' said Anne.

'I wonder if he will admit to his name or not this morning!' said George. 'Remember how he told us his name was Guy - and then said it wasn't a little while after? Silly ass! I can't make out if he's quite mad, or just thinks its funny to keep playing the fool!'

They came to the pool. The boy waved to them, grinning. 'Come on in - it's fine!'

'Is your name Guy this morning or not?' called George.

The boy looked surprised. 'Of course it's Guy!' he said. 'Don't be idiotic! Come on in and have a game.'

They had a fine swim and a mad one. Guy was like an eel, swimming under the water, catching their legs, splashing, swimming away fast, doubling round and going underwater just as they got up to him!

At last they all sat panting on the edge of the pond, the sun shining down warmly on them.

'I say, Guy - did you hear anything strange last night?' asked Dick. 'Or see anything?'

'I didn't see anything strange - but I thought I heard somebody wailing and crying in the distance,' said Guy. 'Just now and again when the wind brought the sound this way. Jet didn't like it at all - did you, Jet? He went and hid under my legs!'

'We heard it too - quite near us,' said Julian. 'And saw strange lights.'

They discussed the matter for some time, but Guy could not really help them, because he had not been near enough to the noises to hear them as clearly as the others had.

'I'm getting hungry,' said George, at last. 'I keep thinking of ham and tomatoes and cheese. Let's go back to the cottage.'

'Right,' said Julian. 'Good-bye, Guy - see you sometime soon. Good-bye, Jet, you mad little thing.'

They went off together, their swim-suits almost dry already in the sun.

'Well, Guy was perfectly sensible this morning,' said Anne. 'Funny! I wonder why he's so silly sometimes.'

'See - isn't that him - running down the path there - to the right, look!' said George, suddenly.

'Now how did he get there so quickly? We left him by the pool!'

It certainly looked like Guy! They called to him, but he didn't even look round or wave, though he must have heard them. They went on, puzzled. How could one person be so different each time - and why? What was the point?

They had a good breakfast and then went out to look round and see if they could find anything to explain the strange happenings of the night before.

'The noises seemed to come from about here, when I came out last night,' said Julian, stopping near the little group of trees. 'And the lights seemed to start about here too - but not near the ground - they were high up, above my head.'

'Above your head?' said Dick, puzzled. 'That seems odd.'

'It doesn't!' said Anne. 'Not a bit odd! What about those trees there? Couldn't somebody climb up them and do the wailing and whining there, with some strange instrument - and set off the weird lights?'

Julian stared up at the trees and then round at Anne. He grinned suddenly.

'Anne's got it! Clever girl! Of course someone was up there - or maybe two people - one doing the noises with some weird instrument and the other playing about with fireworks of some kind. Not the noisy kind - just coloured fire or balloons lighted up from inside.'

'Yes! That's why the lights seemed to be so high up, when you came out!' said Dick. 'They were sent out by someone up in a tree!'

'And floated away to scare us,' said Anne. 'Golly - I do feel glad that it was silly tricks like that that frightened us so. They wouldn't frighten me again!'

'It explains something else too,' said George. 'It explains why Timmy didn't find anyone! They were safely up trees! I bet they hardly breathed when they knew Tim was down below.'

'Yes. Of course! That puzzled me too,' said Julian. 'It was too spooky for words when even old Tim couldn't find anyone real about - just noises and lights!'

'Here's something, look - a wrinkled little rubber-skin - pale green!' said Dick, picking something up from the ground. 'That's what those lights were - balloons lighted up from inside in some way and sent floating away in the air.'

'Most ingenious,' said Julian. 'I expect they had quite a lot of funny tricks at their disposal last night. Yes - they certainly mean to scare us away!'

'Well, they won't,' said Anne, unexpectedly. 'I'm not going, for one. I won't be scared away by stupid tricks!'

'Good old Anne!' said Julian, and clapped her on the back. 'Right - we'll all stay - but I've got an idea.'

'What?' asked everyone.

'We'll pretend to go!' said Julian. 'We'll pack up everything - remove our things from here - and go and camp somewhere else. But Dick and I will hide somewhere here tonight - and watch to see if anyone comes, and where they look for whatever it is they're hunting for, and why!'

'That's a wizard plan,' said Dick, pleased. 'We'll do it! Roll on, tonight! Adventure is about - and we'll be ready for it!'

Chapter 12

A GOOD HIDING-PLACE

The Five spent quite a pleasant day, but when late afternoon came, they decided that it was time to carry out their plan and pack as if they were leaving.

'I imagine someone is spying on our doings,' said Dick. 'And won't he be pleased to see us apparently on the point of leaving!'

'How can anyone be spying?' asked Anne, looking all round as if she expected to see someone behind a bush. 'Timmy would be sure to sniff out anyone in hiding.'

'Oh, he won't be near enough for Timmy to smell out,' said Dick. 'He'll be a long way off.'

'Then how can he possibly see us - or know that we're leaving?' asked Anne.

'Anne - I don't know if you've heard of field-glasses,' began Dick, solemnly. 'Well, they're things that can spot anything half a mile away...'

Anne went red and gave Dick a punch. 'Don't be an ass! Of course - that's it! Field-glasses used by someone on a hillside somewhere - trained on the old cottage.'

'Actually I think I know where the someone is,' said Dick. 'I've caught sight of a little flash every now and again on the hill yonder - the kind of flash that is made by the sun on glass - and I somehow think that our spy is sitting near the top of the hill, watching us carefully.'

Anne turned to look at the hill, but Julian at once spoke sharply. 'No - don't stand and stare up there, anyone. We don't want the watcher to know that we know we are being watched.'

They went on with their packing, and soon began to stagger out with their bundles. George was told to strap her things to her bicycle, and stand well out in the open as she did so, so that the watcher on the hill would be able to observe all her doings.

Julian was in the midst of carefully folding up his things to go into his knapsack, when Anne gave a sudden exclamation.

'Someone's coming!'

Everyone looked round, imagining that they would see a sinister-looking foreigner, or someone peculiar in some way.

But all they saw was a country-woman hurrying along, a shawl over her head, and a basket under her arm. She wore cheap glasses, had no make-up on, and her hair was pulled straight back under the shawl. She stopped when she saw the Five.

'Good afternoon,' said Julian, politely. 'Isn't it glorious weather!'

'Beautiful,' said the woman. 'Are you camping out - you've chosen a good time!'

'No - actually we're packing,' said Julian. 'We've been sleeping in the old cottage, but we've decided to move out. Is it very, very old?'

'Oh yes - and it's supposed to have queer things happening in it at nights,' said the woman.

'We know that!' said Julian. 'My word - we were pretty scared last night, I can tell you - weird noises and horrible, ghastly lights. We decided not to stay there any longer.'

'That's right,' said the woman. 'Don't you stay! You get as far from this place as you can! I can tell you, I wouldn't come by it at night. Where are you going?'

'Well, our home is at Kirrin,' said Julian, evading the question. 'You know - on Kirrin Bay.'

'Ah yes - a fine place,' said the woman. 'Well, don't you stay another night! Good-bye!'

She hurried off, and was soon lost to sight.

'Go on packing,' said Julian to the others.

'The watcher is still up in the hills. I caught sight of a flash again just then.'

'Julian - why did you tell all that to the woman?' asked Anne. 'You don't usually say so much when we are in the middle of something queer!'

'My dear, unsuspecting Anne - do you mean to say that you thought that woman was really what she pretended to be - a woman from a nearby farm?' said Julian.

'Well - wasn't she?' said Anne surprised. 'She looked like one - no make-up - and that old shawl - and she knew all about the old cottage!'

'Anne - farm-women don't have gold fillings in their teeth,' said Julian. 'Didn't you notice them when she smiled?'

'And her hair was dyed,' said George. 'I noticed it was blonde at the roots and black above.'

'And what about her hands?' said Dick. 'A farmer's wife does a great deal of hard, rough work, and her hands are never white and smooth - they are rough and brown. This woman's hands were as white as a princess's!'

'Well yes - I did notice them,' said Anne. 'And I did notice too that she sometimes spoke like a country-woman and sometimes not.'

'Well, there you are!' said Julian. 'She's one of the unpleasant gang that tried to scare us last night - and when the watcher on the hill reported that we appeared to be packing up and going, she was told to go and make sure. So she pretended to be a country woman and came by - but unfortunately we weren't quite so stupid as she thought we would be!'

'You certainly stuffed her up well!' said Dick, with a grin. 'The gang will be down here tonight, digging up all the big stones they can find. You and I will have a marvellous time, snooping round them.'

'You'll be careful they don't see you, won't you?' said Anne. 'Where will you hide?'

'We haven't planned that yet,' said Dick. 'Now - come on and we'll make a new camp somewhere that won't be easily seen. You and George and Timmy can sleep there tonight, and Ju and I will come and watch here.'

'I want to come too,' said George at once. 'Anne will be all right with Timmy.'

'You aren't joining us this time, George,' said Ju. 'The fewer people watching, the better. Sorry, old thing - but you'll have to stay with Anne.'

George scowled and looked sulky at once. Julian laughed and slapped her on the shoulder. 'What a lovely scowl! One of your best! I haven't seen it for quite a long time. Keep it up, George - go on, scowl a bit harder, it suits you!'

George grinned unwillingly, and pulled herself together. She hated being left out of anything - but she did see that it was no use having a crowd of people watching that night. All right - she would stay with Anne and keep her company.

It seemed as if the watcher on the hills must have gone, because there were no more sudden flashes such as came when he lifted his field-glasses to watch the Five.

'That disguised country-woman has convinced the watcher that we're going! Any ideas, anyone, where we can go? Not too far away - but somewhere where the watcher can't follow us with his glasses, if he's still up there.'

'I know a place,' said George. 'There's a simply colossal gorse-bush on the other side of the spring. And underneath it is all hollow and dry. It's almost like a kind of gorse-cave.'

'Sounds all right,' said Julian. 'Let's go and find it.'

George led the way, trying to remember exactly where it was. Timmy followed, still in his enormous cardboard collar, which was now rather the worse for wear. George stopped when they had gone a little way past the spring.

'It was somewhere here,' she said. 'I know I could still hear the sound of the spring when I found the hollow under the bush. Ah - there's the bush!'

It certainly was a great bush, green and spiky outside, with a few yellow blooms on it still. Under it was a big hollow place, where the ground was soft and fine, scattered with dry old prickles.

The main trunk - for it was almost a trunk that supported the big bush - was not quite in the middle, so there was a good bit of room. Julian caught hold of the branches that hid the hollow, using a folded sheet of brown paper to hold them by, for the bush was very prickly.

'This is fine,' he said. 'Plenty of room for you two girls - and Timmy. My word, he'll have difficulty with his collar though, won't he - squeezing in and out!'

'Take it off!' said Dick. 'His ear really is practically healed now. Even if he scratches it, he can't do much damage. Dear old Timmy, we simply shan't know you without your collar.'

'Right,' said George. She took a quick look at the ear. It was still covered by a piece of elastoplast, but it was quite obvious that the ear was healthy. She cut the thread that bound the two ends of the circular collar - and then bent it so that it came off.

They all stared at Timmy, who looked most surprised. He wagged his tail gently as if to say 'Well - so you've taken off that thing - I wonder why?'

'Oh Tim - you look sort of undressed without that collar now!' said Anne. 'It is nice to see you without it, though. Good old Tim! You'll guard me and George tonight won't you? You know that we're in the Middle of Something again, don't you?'

'Woof,' said Timmy, wagging his tail violently. 'Woof!' Yes - he knew all right!

Chapter 13
ON WATCH IN THE COTTAGE

It was getting dark - and under the gorse-bush it was very dark indeed! All the Five had managed to squeeze in there, and Timmy too. One torch only was allowed to be used at a time, to save the batteries of the others.

The Five were having supper. The ham was now practically finished, but there were still a few tomatoes and plenty of cake.

Julian opened the last tin of sardines, and made some sandwiches for himself and Dick to take with them. He also wrapped up two enormous chunks of cake and pocketed two slabs of chocolate each.

'We shall need something to while away the time when we're on the watch tonight!' he said, with a grin. 'I don't know if the Weepies and Wailies and Floating Lights will be along to give us a show - but I fear not. They would be wasted on an empty cottage!'

'I do hope you'll be careful,' said Anne.

'Anne - that's the seventh time you've said that,' said Dick. 'Don't be an ass. Don't you understand that Ju and I are going to enjoy ourselves? You'll be the one that has to be careful.'

'How?' asked Anne, surprised.

'Well - you'll have to be careful of that big black beetle squatting over there,' said Dick. 'And mind that the hedgehog doesn't sit down on your bare legs. And be careful in case a snake wants to share this nice safe warm place with you...'

'Now you're being an ass!' said Anne, giving him a punch. 'When will you be back?'

'We shall be back at exactly the moment you hear us squeezing under here,' said Julian. 'Now Dick - what about it? I think we might be going, don't you?'

'Right,' said Dick, and began to squeeze out carefully so as not to be pricked more than he could help. 'Oh - why are gorse bushes so horribly spiteful! Jab jab - anyone would think the bush was trying to prick me!'

The two girls sat quite still when the boys had gone from the bush. They tried to hear their footsteps, but they couldn't. Dick and Julian trod too softly on the wiry grass.

'I do so hope they'll be...' began Anne, and George groaned.

'If you say that again I shall slap you, Anne! Honestly I shall.'

'I wasn't saying it,' said Anne, 'I was only going to say that I hope they'll be successful tonight. I'd like to get back to Kirrin and have some fun bathing and boating, wouldn't you?'

'Yes. And some of Joan's marvellous cooking,' said George. 'Sausages and mash - and tomatoes with it.'

'Yes. And fried plaice fresh from the sea with Joan's best chipped potatoes,' said Anne. 'I can almost smell it.'

'Woof,' said Timmy, sniffing hard.

'There! He thought I meant it!' said Anne. 'Isn't Timmy clever?'

They had a pleasant talk about how very very clever Timmy was, and Timmy listened and wagged his tail so hard that he made quite a dust in the gorse-hollow.

'Let's go to sleep,' said Anne. 'We can't talk all night - and keeping awake won't help the boys!'

They curled up on the rug they had brought and cuddled together - not so much for warmth, because it was a hot night, but because there was so little room! Anne put out her torch, and the little place immediately became black and dark. Timmy put his head on George's tummy. She groaned.

'Oh Tim - be careful, please! I had rather a lot of supper!'

Anne giggled and pulled Timmy's head close to her. It was comforting to have old Timmy there. She agreed with George that he was the best dog in the whole world.

'I wonder what the boys are doing now,' she said, after a while. 'Do you suppose they are in the middle of something exciting? Perhaps they are!'

But they weren't! Julian and Dick were feeling extremely bored at that minute. They had gone cautiously to the cottage when they had left the girls, not using their torches at all, for fear of giving anyone warning that they were about. They had debated beforehand where would be the best place to hide, and had decided that it would be a good idea to climb up the little stone stair and hide in the roofless rooms above.

'There's no roof there - and hardly any walls,' said Dick. 'We can peep over any side to watch - and no one would guess that anyone was above them, spying down! It's a good thing it's such a starry night - once we get used to the dim light, we shall be able to see fairly well. Pity there's no moon.'

They had approached the cottage very cautiously indeed, stopping at every step and listening with bated breath for any sound. But there was none.

'Not even the light of somebody's torch, either,' said Dick, in Julian's ear. 'I don't think anyone is here yet. Let's get into the cottage and up those stairs as soon as we can.'

They tiptoed into the cottage, not daring to put on their torches. They fumbled across to the little stone stairway, and climbed it with as little sound as they could. Holding their breath made their hearts thump loudly.

'Can you hear my heart thumping?' Dick whispered to Julian, as they at last stood on the floor of the roofless rooms above.

'No. Mine's just the same, thumping away! Well, we're safely here. Let's just shuffle to and fro and see if there are any loose stones we might fall over, and so give ourselves away!'

They cleared away a few loose stones, and then sat down silently on the low broken wall of the two ruined rooms. The wind blew gently but warmly. Everything was still except the rose-rambler climbing over the old house. It moved a little in the wind and made a faint scraping noise. Dick caught his hand on a thorn, and sucked his finger. The rambler was everywhere, across the floor, and over the walls and even up what was left of the little chimney!

The boys had been there for about three-quarters of an hour when Julian gave Dick a slight nudge.

'Here they come!' he whispered. 'See - over there!'

Dick looked round and about and then caught sight of a small, moving light, just a prick in the darkness. It cast a faint glow before it.

'A torch!' he whispered. 'And another - and another! Quite a procession! A slow one, too.'

The procession made very little noise. It made its way to the cottage, and then split up.

'Having a look to see if we really are gone,' whispered Julian. 'Hope they won't think of coming up here.'

'Let's get behind the chimney, in case,' whispered back Dick. So very quietly they rose and made their way to where the remains of the chimney stood, a dark shadow in the starry night. The chimney was quite big, though rather crumbly. The two boys crouched close to it, on the side farthest from where the stone stairway came up in the corner.

'Someone is coming up!' whispered Dick, his sharp ears catching the sound of someone's feet on the stone stairs. 'I hope he gets caught by the rambler - there's a big spray near the top!'

'Sh!' said Julian.

Someone came right up the stairway, and gave an exclamation of annoyance near the top. 'Good!' thought Dick, 'he has got caught by the rambler!'

A torch shone out over the ruined rooms, the crumbling walls and the remains of the chimney. The boys held their breath, and stood like statues. The light of the torch played over the place for one second and then a voice called down the stairs.

'No one here. The kids have gone. We can get on with the job!'

The boys let out a long breath. Good - they were safe - for the time being at any rate! The visitors down below were no longer cautious - they spoke in ordinary voices and torches flashed all over the place. Then someone lighted two lanterns, and the little cottage shone quite brightly.

'Where do we start?' said a voice. 'Here, Jess - where's that plan?'

'I've got it. I'll spread it on the floor,' said a voice that the boys recognized at once. It was the voice of the 'country-woman' who had spoken to them that day! 'Not that it's much use. Paul's no good at drawing!'

Evidently the searchers were now leaning over the plan. Voices came up the stone stairway.

'All we know for certain is that we have to find that white stone slab - and we know the size. But we don't know the place, except that we think it must be here. After all - we've searched the old Roman camp, and there are no slabs there that size!'

Julian nudged Dick. So some of the visitors that Guy had complained of must have been these searchers! Whatever was it they were looking for, hidden behind a slab of stone?

He knew a minute later! A drawling voice said: 'If we have to get up every great slab in this neighbourhood, we will. I'm going to find that secret way if it's the last thing I do! If we don't find that, we don't find those blue-prints - and if we don't find them, we might as well go into the poor-house for the rest of our lives.'

'Or prison!' said someone.

'Not prison,' said the drawling voice. 'It'll be Paul who goes to prison. He managed to steal them, we didn't!'

'Can't you get Paul to draw a better plan than this?' said the voice of the 'country-woman'. 'I can't understand half that's written here.'

'He's ill - almost off his head, too,' said someone. 'No good asking him. He had such a time escaping with those prints, he nearly died. No good asking him, I say.'

'I can't make out this word here,' said the woman. ' 'W-A-D-E-R' - whatever does it mean?'

'I don't know - wait, though, I do! It might be W-A-T-E-R - water. T not D in the middle. Where's the well? Anywhere in this kitchen? That's it, that's it. Water! I bet there's a slab over the well. That's the way to the secret hiding-place!'

Julian clutched Dick. He was as excited as the man down below. They listened eagerly, straining their ears.

'Here's the old sink - and this must be the remains of the pump. The well's underneath this slab - and see, the stone is just about the right size. Get busy! Buck up, get busy!'

Chapter 14

AN EXCITING NIGHT - AND A SURPRISING MORNING

Soon there came the sound of loud breathing and grunts, as the searchers tried to prise up the stone by the pump. It was obviously very heavy, and very difficult to move, for it had become almost part of the floor itself, through the centuries!

'Drat the thing! It's tearing my hands to pieces!' said a voice. 'Lend me that jemmy, Tom - you don't seem to be doing much good with it!'

After a lot more struggling and panting the stone was loosened. 'Up she comes!' said a voice, and up came the stone so suddenly that it sounded as if most of those pulling at it had sat down very hard on the floor!

The two hidden boys were beside themselves with interest and excitement. How they wished they could go and watch! But it was impossible. They must just listen and try to make out what was happening from what the men said below them.

'Is it a well down there? Yes, it is! My, the water's pretty far down - and black as pitch too.'

There was a silence as the well was examined in the light of torches. Then an exasperated voice, the one with the drawl, said: 'This is no secret way! Who's going to get through that water! It's just an ordinary small well, and nothing else. That word can't have meant Water.'

'All right, boss. What does it mean then?' said the woman. 'I don't know. This isn't a plan, it's a riddle! Why couldn't Paul have made it clear where this stone slab is - he just goes and does a lot of scribble round it - and all we can make out is that it's on this common, somewhere near here - and the secret way is behind the slab!'

'And all we have to do is to go and look behind dozens of heavy slabs!' said someone else. 'I'm fed up. We've lifted slabs in that wretched camp - we've lifted some here - and we still don't know if we're anywhere near the right one.'

'Shut up,' said the voice of the drawler but now the voice was sharp and angry. 'If we have to pull this cottage down, if we have to lift every slab there is, if we have to take over that camp, I'll do it! I tell you, this makes all the difference between wealth and poverty! Anyone who wants to back out can do so - but he'd better be careful!'

'Now boss, now boss, don't you fly off the handle!' said the woman. 'We're all in this! We'll do all you say. Look, let's start by lifting a few more slabs. There are not so very many that are the size that Paul figured on this plan.'

Then began a boring time for the two hidden boys, as slab after slab was lifted and put back. Nothing was found under any of them, apparently.

The men went to the out-buildings too, leaving the woman in the cottage. The boys thought she had gone as well, and Julian moved a little, feeling rather cramped after being still for so long. The woman's ears must have been sharp for she called out at once.

'Who's there? Is it you, Tom?'

The boys stiffened and stood like statues. The woman said no more. It was not long before the men came back, talking among themselves. It sounded as if there were three of them.

'No go,' said the drawler. 'I think we'll have to search that camp really well again.'

'That's going to be difficult with someone already there,' said the woman.

'We'll deal with him,' said a voice, grimly. Julian frowned. Did that mean that Guy was in danger? He had better warn him!

'I'm fed up with this place,' said the woman. 'Let's go. I don't think the slab is anywhere here! We're wasting our time!'

To the boys' great relief, the four searchers left the cottage and went off together. Julian and Dick leaned over the crumbling wall of the room they stood in, and watched the lights of the torches and lanterns getting dimmer and dimmer over the common. Good! Now they could go back to the girls!

'I'm stiff!' said Dick, stretching himself.

'Well, Ju - we know a lot more now, don't we? It's clear that someone called Paul has stolen some valuable blue-prints of something - maybe a new plane, or battleship perhaps - and has hidden them in some secret place he knew of about here - and to get to it you have to lift a slab of stone of a certain size.'

'Yes. And we know the size because we've already seen the one they lifted in the old stables,' said Julian. 'I vote we go there and measure it - or measure the one by the sink. I should think that the right slab will be somewhere in the old camp. We'd better tell Guy and let him into the secret. He'll help us to search!'

'What a peculiar business this is to find ourselves mixed up in,' said Dick. 'All because George didn't like people laughing at old Timmy with a cardboard collar round his neck! Timmy's the cause of this!'

The boys went down the stone stairs, and, of course, Dick quite forgot about the rambler, which caught him neatly round the ankle and almost tripped him headlong down the stairs!

'Blow!' he said, clutching Julian and nearly making him topple too. 'Sorry. It was that rambler again. It's ripped my ankle all round. Put on the torch for goodness' sake.'

They carefully measured the stone slab by the sink and then made their way out of the cottage and up towards the spring, hoping that they would find the great gorse-bush in the dark. They tried to get under the wrong one at first, but at last found the right one. They heard a small welcome bark from Timmy.

'Oh! Julian! Dick! Is it you?' said Anne's voice, as the boys squeezed through into the hollow middle. 'Oh, what AGES you've been! We haven't slept a wink. Keep still, Timmy, do - this place is too small for you to rampage about in!'

The boys settled down and torches were put on. Julian related the curious happenings to the two interested girls. George was thrilled.

'Oh I say! Fancy all this springing up out of the blue so suddenly! What are you going to do?'

'Warn Guy first thing in the morning - and then get in touch with the police, I think,' said Julian.

'We ourselves can't stop the men searching the camp, and as soon as they do find the slab they're looking for, they can easily get what they want and go off with it!'

'Well, it's really thrilling,' said George. 'I wish I'd been with you. I'll never go to sleep tonight!'

But they did manage to drop off to sleep, for they were all very tired. After a few hours, just as dawn was breaking, Timmy lifted his head and growled. George awoke at once.

'What is it, Tim? I can't hear anything.'

But Timmy could, that was certain. George woke Julian, and made him listen to Timmy's continuous growling.

'What do you think he's growling at?' she asked. 'He keeps on and on. I can't hear a thing, can you?'

'No,' said Julian, listening. 'Well, it's no use my creeping out and going searching in the dark for whatever Timmy's growling at. It might be something silly like a weasel or a hedgehog or a stoat. Shut up, Tim. That's enough.'

Although it was as dark as night under the thick old gorse-bush, outside it was just getting light. What was Timmy growling at? Were there people about again? Or was it just one of the hedgehogs he so heartily disliked?

He stopped growling at last and put his head down on his paws, closing his eyes. George patted him.

'Well, whatever it was, it's gone. Are you comfy, Julian? It's very cramped in here - and hot too, isn't it?'

'Yes. We'll get up fairly early and go to warn Guy - then we'll have a swim,' said Julian, yawning. He switched off his torch and went to sleep again.

It was late when they awoke. Dick was the first, and he looked at his watch. He gave an exclamation.

'Gosh! It's half past eight! Hey, Ju - Anne - George - wake up, it's almost afternoon!'

Everyone felt stiff and cramped, and they went off to have a swim and to warn Guy. As they came near the camp, they stopped in amazement.

Someone was howling down in the trench, howling so miserably and so broken-heartedly that the Five felt quite panic-stricken. Whatever in the world could have happened? They ran to the edge of the excavations and looked down into the trench.

The boy was there, lying on his face, sobbing. He kept lifting his head and howling, then putting it down again.

'Guy! GUY! Whatever's happened?' shouted Julian. He leapt down beside the boy. 'Are you hurt'? Is Jet hurt? What's the matter?'

'It's Guy! He's gone! They've taken him,' howled the boy. 'And I was so awful to him. Now he's gone. He'll never come back, I know he won't!'

'Guy's gone? But - but you're Guy!' said Julian in astonishment. 'What do you mean?'

He felt sure that the boy really was mad now - quite mad - talking about himself like that. He patted him on the shoulder. 'Look - you're ill. You come along with us. You need a doctor.'

The boy sprang to his feet, his face swollen and stained. 'I'm not ill! I tell you Guy's gone. I'm not Guy. He's my twin. There are two of us.'

Everyone gasped. It took half a minute to think about this and get everything straight - and then, of course many things were clear! There was not one mad boy, there were two ordinary boys - but they were twins! There wasn't, as they had thought, just one boy who contradicted himself all the time, who seemed continually to appear suddenly and unexpectedly, and who was sometimes nice and sometimes not.

'Twins! Why on earth didn't we think of that before?' said Julian. 'We thought there was only one of you. You were never together.'

'No. We quarrelled - quarrelled bitterly,' said the boy, tears in his eyes again. 'And when twins quarrel, really quarrel, it's worse than any quarrel there is! We hated one another then - we really did! We wouldn't be with one another, we wouldn't eat together, or dig together, or sleep together. We've often quarrelled before, but not like this - not like this! I just pretended that he didn't exist - and he did the same with me!'

'What a to-do!' said Julian, astonished and worried. 'Well now - what's happened to make you so upset? Tell me!'

'Guy wanted to be friends with me again last night,' said the boy. 'And I wouldn't. I hit him and walked away. Then this morning I was sorry and went to find him and be friends - and - and...'

He stopped and howled again. Everyone felt very sad and uncomfortable. 'Go on, tell us,' said Julian, gently.

'I was just in time to see him fighting two men, and screaming at them, and kicking - then they hustled him away somewhere!' said the boy. 'I fell down in the trench and hurt my leg - and by the time I dragged myself up, Guy had gone - and so had everyone else!'

He turned away and wept again. 'I'll never forgive myself, never! If I'd made friends last night I could have helped him - and I didn't!'

Chapter 15

WELL DONE, GEORGE!

It was Anne who comforted the boy. She went to him and pulled him down on a stone beside her. 'Let me look at your leg,' she said. 'It's pretty bad, isn't it? Look, I'll bind it up for you. Don't be so upset - we'll help you. I think we know what's happened, don't we Julian?'

The boy looked at Anne gratefully, and sniffed hard. When she offered him her handkerchief, he took it and wiped his face. Dick gave Anne his big hanky to bind up the boy's cut and bruised leg. He must have fallen right into the trench in his fright at seeing his brother fighting and being taken away.

'How do you know what's happened?' he said to Julian. 'Can you get Guy back? Do say you can! I'll never forgive myself for this. My twin-brother - and I wasn't there to fight by his side when he needed me!'

'Now don't soak my hanky all over again!' said Anne. He gave her a forlorn little smile and turned to Julian again.

'My name's Harry Lawdler, and Guy and I are mad on old camps and buildings and things. We spend almost all our holidays together, digging and finding all kinds of things, like these.' He nodded his head towards the little shelf of relics that the four had seen before.

'Yes - Guy told us,' said Dick. 'But he never said a word about you. We were often very puzzled - we thought you and he were one boy - not two, you see - and we couldn't understand a lot of things you both said. You're so very, very alike.'

'Well - I tell you, we each pretended that the other didn't even exist,' said Harry. 'We're like that. We love each other best in the world, and we hate each other worse - when we quarrel. We're simply horrible then!'

'Can you tell us a bit about the people that Guy was fighting?' asked Dick.

'Yes. They were some that came before, wanting Guy to clear out while they had a look round,' said Harry, wiping his face again. 'Guy was pretty rude to them. In fact I heard him say that if they messed about his camp he would throw stones at them - he's like that, you know, very fierce, when he's roused.'

'And you think these were the same people?' said Dick. 'Which way did they go with Guy?'

'That way,' said Harry, pointing. 'I've hunted the whole camp round, but they're gone - disappeared into thin air! It's extraordinary!'

'Let's have a hunt round,' said Julian. 'We might find something. But I imagine that the searchers have taken Guy off with them because he knew too much - perhaps they found here what they were looking for, and saw Guy watching.'

'Oh! Then we're too late!' said George, in deep disappointment. 'They've got what they want - and they'll disappear now and never be caught. I expect by now they are speeding away in a fast car - and have taken Guy with them to make sure he doesn't talk before they're safely in another country!'

'Oh no!' cried Harry. 'He's not kidnapped, is he? Don't say that!'

'Come on - let's have a hunt,' said Julian, and they all made their way among the various trenches and pits, looking for they hardly knew what.

They gave it up after a while. There were too many slabs and stones of all sizes! Besides, what good would it be even if they found the right one? The birds had flown - presumably with what they had come for! In fact, if Guy hadn't come along and seen the searchers, nobody would even have known that they had been in the camp and made a successful search!

'It's no good,' said Julian, at last. 'This is too big a place to know where to look for anything that might help us. Let's go back to the gorse-bush and collect our things, return to Kirrin and go to the police. It's the only sensible thing left to do!'

'Come along, Harry,' said Anne, to the miserable twin. He was so full of remorse that her handkerchief was now soaked for the third time! 'You'd better come with us and tell all you know.'

'I'll come,' said Harry. 'I'll do anything to get Guy back. I'll never quarrel with him again. Never. To think that...'

'Now don't go all through that again,' said Anne. 'Look, you're upsetting Timmy so much that his tail is down all the time!'

Harry gave another forlorn little smile. They all left the camp and made their way back to the gorse-bush. It was only when they got there, and began pulling out the tins of food, as well as the rug and other things, that they realized how extremely hungry they were!

'We've had no breakfast. We've been up for ages, and it's very late. I'm simply starving!' said George.

'Well, if we finish up all the food, we shan't have to carry the tins!' said Dick. 'Let's have a meal. Ten minutes more here can't make much difference.'

They were thankful not to have to sit under the gorse-bush again. They sat outside in the sun, and discussed everything.

'I believe when Timmy began to growl and growl about six o'clock this morning, it was because he could hear those people coming quietly by to go to search the camp,' said George.

'I think you're right,' said Julian. 'I bet they searched the camp well - till Guy woke and came on the scene and fought like fury. It's a pity I didn't squeeze out from under the bush and follow them, when Timmy growled.'

'Anyone want a drink?' said George. 'I'll go and fetch some water from the spring. Where's the pineapple tin?'

Anne passed it to her. George got up and took the little rabbit-path that led to the spring. She could hear it gurgling and bubbling as she came near - a very pleasant noise.

'Water always sounds nice,' said George to herself. 'I love the sound of water.'

Water! Now why did that ring a bell in her mind just then? Who had been talking about water? Oh - Dick and Julian, of course, when they had come back from the old cottage last night. They had told Anne and herself about the word on the plan - the word that might have been WATER, not WADER.

'I wonder which it was,' said George to herself as she idly held the pineapple tin to the gurgling water. She gazed at the beautiful little spring, jutting up from the stony slabs - and then another bell rang loudly in her mind.

'Stone slabs! Water! Why - I wonder - I just wonder - if one of these slabs is the one! This one just here is about the right size!'

She stared at it. It was set firmly in a high little bank at the back of the place where the spring gurgled up and then ran into the clean stony channel. Did it hide anything behind it?

George suddenly dropped the tin and ran back to the others at full speed. 'Julian! Julian! I believe I've found the slab! It's been staring us in the face the whole time!'

Julian was very startled. So were the others. They stared up at George in astonishment.

'What do you mean, George?' said Julian, jumping to his feet. 'Show me!'

Followed by everyone, George ran back to the spring. She pointed to the white slab behind the water. 'There!' she said. 'That's the right size, isn't it? And it's beside WATER - just as it said in the plan you told us about - only the people thought it was WADER.'

'Gosh - I wonder if you're right, George,' said Julian, excited. 'You might be - you never know. Sometimes springs come from underground passages - secret, hidden ways into the earth.'

'Let's try and move it,' said Dick, his face red with sudden excitement. 'It looks pretty hefty to me.'

They began to struggle with the stone, getting extremely wet as they splashed about in the spring. But nobody minded that. This was too exciting for words. Harry helped too, heaving and tugging. He was very strong indeed.

The stone slab moved a little. It slid to one side and stuck. More tugging. More pulling. More panting and puffing!

'I believe we'll have to get help,' said Julian at last. 'It really is too heavy and well-embedded.'

'I'll go and get some of my tools,' said Harry. 'I'm used to heaving stones about with them. We can easily move it if we have the right tools.'

He flew off at top speed. The others sat down and mopped their streaming foreheads.

'Phew!' said Julian. 'What a job this is for a hot day! I'm glad Harry remembered his tools. Just what we want!'

'How queer that he and Guy are twins!' said George. 'I never even thought of such a thing!'

'Well, they behaved so idiotically,' said Julian. 'Always pretending there was just one of them, and neither of them even mentioning the other. I wonder where Guy has been taken to. I don't think he'll come to much harm - but it will be worrying to his people.'

'Here comes Harry,' said Anne, after a pause. 'One of us ought to have gone with him to help him. He's brought dozens of tools!'

The things he had fetched proved very useful indeed, especially a big jemmy-like tool. The stone soon began to move when this was applied by Julian and Harry!

'It's slipping - it's coming away - look out, it will fall right down into the spring!' cried Dick.

'Look out, you girls!'

The stone was prised right out, and fell into the stony channel where the water ran. The five children stared at the opening it left.

Julian leaned forward and looked into it. 'Yes - there's a big hole behind,' he said. 'Let me shine my torch in.'

In great excitement he flashed his torch into the opening. He turned round, his face glowing.

'Yes! I think we've got it! There's a tunnel behind, going down and down. It widens out behind this hole!'

Everyone was too thrilled for words. George gave Dick a punch, and Anne patted Timmy so hard that he whined. Harry beamed round, all his woes forgotten.

'Do we go down now?' asked Dick. 'We'll have to make the opening a bit wider. Earth and roots have narrowed it very much. Let's make it bigger.'

'Then we'll explore it!' said George, her eyes shining. 'A secret tunnel only known to us! Quick - let's explore it!'

Chapter 16

THE SECRET WAY

All the children were so excited that they got into each other's way. Julian pushed them back.

'Let's be sensible! We can't all make the opening wider - let Harry and me get at it with the tools - and we'll soon make it bigger!'

It took only a minute to hack away at the sides of the hole to make it big enough for even Julian to climb through. He stood there panting, smiling broadly.

'There - it's done! I'll get in first. Everyone got torches? We shall need them! It's going to be dark in there!'

He clambered up and into the hole. He had to crawl on hands and knees for a little way, and then the hole suddenly went downwards and became considerably bigger. Julian could walk in it, if he bent down, for at that point the tunnel was about three feet high.

He called back to the others. 'Follow me! Take hold of each other's coats or jerseys and hang on. It's as dark as pitch in here!'

George followed after Julian, then Anne, then Dick, then Harry. Timmy went with George, of course, pushing and shoving like all the rest. Everyone was excited, and nobody could talk in a normal voice. They all shouted!

'I'll give you a hand! One good shove and you're in!'

'I say - isn't it dark!'

'What a crawl! I feel like a fox going into its den!'

'Timmy, don't butt me from behind like that! I can't crawl any faster!'

'Ah - thank goodness I can stand up now! What size of rabbit do you think made this burrow!'

'It was made by water at some time perhaps. Don't shove, Timmy!'

'Water doesn't run uphill, ass! Hang on to my coat, Harry. Don't get left behind.'

Julian, bent almost double at times, walked carefully along the narrow tunnel, which went steadily downwards. Soon it widened and became higher, and then it was easier to walk in comfort.

'Do you suppose this is the right secret way?' called George, after a time. 'We don't seem to be getting anywhere.'

'I can't tell. In fact we shan't know till we find something hidden somewhere - if we ever do!'

A sudden scuttering noise in front of him made Julian stop suddenly. Immediately everyone bumped into the one in front, and there were shouts at once.

'What's up, Ju?'

Julian's torch shone on to two pairs of bright, frightened eyes. He gave a laugh.

'It's all right - just a couple of rabbits using our burrow! There are small holes running out of the tunnel which, I imagine, are rabbit burrows. I bet we're giving the bunnies a shock!'

The tunnel wound about a good deal, and then suddenly the rather soft ground they were treading on turned to rock. The passage was now not so high, and the children had to bend down again. It was most uncomfortable.

Julian stopped once more. He had heard another sound. What was it?

'Water!' he said. 'There must be an underground stream here! How thrilling! Everyone all right?'

'Yes!' shouted those behind him. 'Get on, Julian - let's see the water!'

The tunnel suddenly ended, and Julian found himself in a big cave with a fairly high roof. Almost in the middle of it ran a stream - not a very big one, and not a very fast one. It gurgled along in a small channel of rock, which it had carved out for itself through hundreds of years.

Julian shone his torch on it. The water looked very black and glittered in the light of the torch. The others came one by one out of the tunnel and stared at the underground stream. It looked rather mysterious, slipping through the cave, gurgling quietly as it disappeared through a hole at one end.

'Queer,' said Dick.

'It's not unusual, this,' began Harry. 'In some parts of the country round about here, the ground below our feet is honeycombed with little streams. Some come up as springs, of course, some join other streams when they come out into the open, others just run away goodness knows where!'

Julian was looking up round the cave. 'Does our tunnel end here?' he wondered. 'Is the where we have to look for whatever is hidden?'

'We'll have a look round the cave and see if there are any exits,' said Dick. Using their torches the five separated, Timmy keeping close to George, not seeming in the least surprised at this underground adventure.

'I've found another tunnel over here, leading out of the cave!' called Dick. No sooner had he said that than Anne called out too.

'There's one here as well!'

'Now - which do we take?' said Julian. 'How annoying that there should be two!'

'Would the fellow - what's his name - Paul - have marked the correct underground way on his plan?' said George. 'I mean - I don't see how he could possibly expect either himself or anyone else to find what he had hidden, if there are numbers of passages to choose from down here!'

'You're right!' said Julian. 'Let's look about and see if we can find anything to help us.'

It wasn't long before Dick gave another shout. 'It's all right! This is the passage to take, over here - the one I found just now. There's an arrow drawn in white chalk on the wall.'

Everyone crowded over to Dick, stepping across the little stream as they did so. Dick held his torch up and they all saw the white arrow, drawn roughly on the wall.

Julian was pleased. 'Good. That helps a lot! It shows we're going the right way - and that this is the secret way that Paul chose. Come on!'

They entered the tunnel, left the little stream behind, and went on again. 'Anyone got any idea in which direction we're going?' called Dick. 'East, west, north, south?'

Harry had a compass. He looked at it. 'I think we're going rather in the direction of the old Roman camp,' he said.

'Ah - that's interesting,' said Julian. 'This tunnel was probably used in olden times.'

'Guy and I have seen the plan of the camp as it probably used to be,' said Harry. 'And there are plenty of tunnels and caves and holes shown on it - just roughed in, not a proper plan of them. Gosh - I never thought I'd be exploring one! My father warned me not to, in case of roof-falls and things like that.'

The tunnel suddenly forked into two. One passage was nice and wide, the other narrow. Julian took the wide one, thinking that the other was really too narrow to get through. But after a minute or two, he stopped, puzzled.

'There's a blank wall of rock here - the tunnel's ended! We'll have to turn back! I suppose we should have taken that very narrow opening.'

They went back, Harry leading the way now. Timmy suddenly took it into his head that he would like to lead, too, and made himself a real nuisance, pushing his way between everyone's legs!

They came back to the fork. Harry shone his torch in at the second opening, the very narrow one. There, clearly marked on the right hand wall, was a white arrow in chalk!

'We're idiots,' said Dick. 'We don't even look for the sign-posts! Lead the way, Julian!'

This tunnel was very narrow indeed, and had rough, jutting rocky sides. There were loud 'Aahs!' and 'Oohs!' as elbows and ankles were knocked against hard rock.

And then again there came a blank wall of rock in front of Julian, and again he had to stop!

'Can't go this way either!' he said. 'There's a blank wall again - this is a blind alley too!'

There were cries of dismay at once.

'Blow! It can't be!'

'What's gone wrong! Look all round, Ju - flash your torch down at your feet and above your head!'

Julian shone his torch over his head, and gave an exclamation.

'There's a hole above my head!'

'Is there a white arrow anywhere?' called Harry.

'Yes! And it's pointing up, instead of forwards!' called back Julian. 'We're still all right - we've got to go upwards now - but how?'

George, who was just behind him, shone her torch on the side-walls. 'Look!' she said. 'We can easily get up to the hole. There are rough, natural steps up - made by ledges of rock. Look, Julian!'

'Yes,' said Julian. 'We can manage to get up quite easily, I think. George, you go first - I'll give you a boost up.'

George was delighted to go first. She put her torch between her teeth, and began to climb up the ledges, Julian pushing her as best he could. She came to the hole and immediately saw that it would be quite easy to hoist herself through.

'One more boost and I'll be through!' she called to Julian. And with one last heave George, was up, rolling on the floor of a small cave above! She called down in excitement to the others.

'I believe this is the place where those things are hidden! I can see something on a ledge. Oh, do buck up!'

The others followed eagerly. Dick slipped off the rocky ledges in his excitement and almost squashed poor Harry as he fell on him. However, everyone was up at last, even Timmy, who was the most difficult of all to heave through! He seemed to have far too many vigorous legs!

Harry found no difficulty at all. 'I'm used to this kind of thing,' he said. 'Guy and I have explored a whole lot of tunnels and caves in hills and other places.'

George was pointing her torch at a broad ledge of rock. On it was a brown leather bag, and beside it, marked on the rock, was a very large arrow indeed.

Julian was overjoyed. He picked up the bag at once. 'My word - I hope there's something in it!' he said. 'It feels jolly light - as if it's empty!'

'Open it!' cried everyone - but Julian couldn't. It was locked - and alas, there wasn't a key!

Chapter 17

FULL OF SURPRISES

'Its locked - we can't open the bag,' said Julian, and shook it vigorously as if that might make it fly open and spill whatever contents it had!

'We don't know if it's got anything of value in it or not,' said Dick, in deep disappointment. 'I mean - it might be some trick on that fellow Paul's part - he might have taken the blue-prints, or whatever they were he hid, for himself, and left the bag just to trick the others.'

'Can we cut it open?' asked George.

'No. I don't think so. It's made of really strong leather. We would need a special knife to cut through it - an ordinary pen-knife wouldn't be any use,' said Julian. 'I think we'll just have to assume that we've got the goods, and hope for the best. If they're not in here, it's just bad luck. Someone else has got them, if so.'

They all looked at the tantalizing bag.

Now they would have to wait for ages before they found out whether their efforts had been successful or not!

'Well - what do we do now?' said George, feeling suddenly flat. 'Go back all through that long tunnel once more? I'll be glad to be in the open air again, won't you?'

'Rather!' said Julian. 'Well - I suppose we'd better get down through that hole again.'

'Wait!' said Anne, her sharp eyes catching sight of something. 'Look - what does all this mean?' She shone her torch on to various signs on the wall.

Again there were arrows drawn in white chalk - but, very oddly, a line of them ran downwards across the wall of the little rocky room, right to the edge of the hole - and another line of arrows pointing the other way, ran horizontally across the wall!

'Well - do you suppose that's just meant to muddle people?' said Dick, puzzled. 'We know jolly well that the way out of this room is down that hole, because that's the way we came into it.'

'Perhaps the other line of arrows means that there's a second way out,' suggested George. They all looked round the little rocky room. There didn't seem any way out at all.

'Where's Timmy?' said Anne, suddenly, flashing her torch round. 'He's not here! Has he fallen down the hole? I never heard him yelp!'

At once there was a great to-do. 'Timmy, Timmy, Timmy! TIMMY! Where are you?'

George whistled shrilly, and the noise echoed round and round the little room. Then, from somewhere, there was a bark. How relieved everyone was.

'Where is he? Where did that bark come from?' said Dick. 'It didn't sound as if it came from below, down that hole!'

There came another welcome bark, and the sound of Timmy's feet. Then to everyone's amazement, he appeared in the little rocky room as if by magic - appearing straight out of the wall, it seemed!

'Timmy! Where were you? Where have you come from!' cried George, and ran to see. She came to a standstill and exclaimed loudly.

'Oh! What idiots we are! Why, just behind this big jutting-out piece of rock, there's another passage!'

So there was! A very, very narrow one, it is true - and completely hidden from the children because of the enormous slab of rock that jutted out from the wall and hid it! They stood and stared at it, shining their torches on the narrow way. The arrows ran round the wall to it.

'We never even looked properly!' said Dick. 'Still - it's a passage that would be extremely difficult to spot - hidden round the corner of that rock - and very narrow at that. Well, I do know one thing for certain about that man called Paul!'

'What?' asked Anne.

'He's thin - thin as a rake!' said Dick. 'No one but a skinny fellow could squeeze through this opening! I doubt if you can, Julian - you're the biggest of us.'

'Well, what about trying?' said George. 'What does everyone say? This might be an easier, shorter way out - or it might be a harder, longer one.'

'It won't be longer,' said Harry. 'By my reckoning we must be pretty well near the Camp now. It's likely that the way leads straight there - though where it comes out I can't imagine. Guy and I have explored the Camp pretty thoroughly.'

Dick suddenly thought of something he had noticed at the Camp - the big hole behind the slab of stone, where he had seen the baby rabbit a day or two before! What had Guy said about that? He had said there was a great hole underground, which had been explored - but that it was probably just an ancient storage place for food or for loot! He turned eagerly to Harry.

'Harry - would this lead to that enormous hole underground - the one that Guy once told me had been explored, but was of no interest - probably just an old store-place?'

'Let me see,' said Harry. 'Yes - yes, it might lead to that. Most of these underground ways are throughways - ways that lead from one place to another. They don't as a rule stop suddenly, but have usually been of use as secret escape-routes or something of that kind. I think you may be right, Dick - we're fairly near the Camp, I'm sure, and we may quite well find that if we go on, instead of going back, we shall come into the Camp itself - probably through that great hole!'

'Then come on,' said Julian. 'It will certainly be a shorter way!'

They tried to squeeze through the narrow opening that led out of the little rocky room. Dick got through all right, and so did the others - but poor Julian found it very very difficult and almost gave up.

'You shouldn't eat so much,' said Dick, unkindly. 'Go on - one more try, Ju - I'll haul on your arm at the same time!'

Julian got through, groaning. 'I'm squashed flat!' he said. 'Now, if anyone makes any more jokes about too much breakfast, I'll pull his nose!'

The passage grew wider immediately, and everyone was thankful. It ran fairly straight, and then went steeply downwards, so that the five slithered about, and Timmy found himself suddenly running. Then it came to a stop - a complete stop! This time it was not a blank wall of rock that faced them - it was something else.

'A roof-fall!' groaned Dick. 'Look at that! Now we're done!'

It certainly looked most formidable. Earth, rocks and stones had fallen from the roof and blocked up the whole passage-way. There was no use in going on - they would just have to turn and go back!

'Blow it!' said Dick, and kicked at the mass of earth. 'Well - there's no use staying here - we'd better turn back. My torch isn't too good now, and neither is yours, George. We don't want to lose any time - if our torches give out, we shall find things very difficult.'

They turned to go back, feeling very despondent. 'Come on, Timmy!' said George. But Timmy didn't come. He stood beside the roof-fall, looking very puzzled, his ears cocked and his head on one side. Then he suddenly gave a sharp bark.

It made everyone jump almost out of their skins, for the sound echoed round and about in a very queer way.

'Don't, Timmy!' said George, almost angrily. 'Whatever's the matter? Come along!'

But Timmy didn't come. He began to paw at the pile of earth and rocks in front of him, and barked without stopping. Wuff-wuff-wuff-wuff-wuff-WUFF!

'What's up?' said Julian, startled. 'Timmy, what on earth's the matter?'

Timmy took absolutely no notice, but went on feverishly scraping at the roof-fall, sending earth and stones flying all over the others.

'There's something he wants to get at - something behind this roof-fall,' said Dick. 'Or perhaps somebody - make him stop barking, George, and we'll listen ourselves and see if we can hear anything.'

George silenced Timmy with difficulty, and made him stand quiet and still. Then they all listened intently - and a sound came at once to their ears.

'Yap-yap-wuff-wuff-wuff!'

'It's Jet!' yelled Harry, making everyone jump violently again. 'Jet! Then Guy must be with him. He never leaves Guy! What's Guy doing here? He may be hurt. GUY! GUY! Jet!'

Timmy began to bark wildly again and to scrape more furiously than ever. Julian shouted to the others above the barking.

'If we can hear Jet barking, this roof-fall can't be very big. We'd better try and get through it. Two of us can work in turn with Timmy. We can't all work at once, the passage is too narrow.'

Then began some very hard work - but it didn't last as long as Julian feared, because, quite suddenly, the mass of rubble and rock shifted as they worked, and a gap appeared at the top of the heap, between it and the roof.

Dick began to scramble up, but Julian called to him at once. 'Be careful, ass! The roof can't be too good here - it may come down again, and you'll be buried. Go carefully!'

But before Dick could go any further, a little figure appeared on the top of the rubble above their heads, and slid down to them yapping loudly, and waving a long wiry tail!

'Jet! Oh, Jet! Where's Guy?' cried Harry, as the little dog leapt into his arms and licked his face lavishly, barking joyfully in between the licks.

'GUY!' yelled Julian. 'Are you there?'

A weak voice came back. 'Yes! Who's that?' An absolute volley of voices answered him.

'It's us! And Harry! We're coming to you, we shan't be long!'

And it wasn't long, either, before the roof-fall was slowly and carefully climbed by each one - though Timmy, of course, scrambled up, over and down at top speed!

On the other side of the roof-fall was a passage, of course, the continuation of the one the children had come along. Guy was there, sitting down, looking very pale. Jet flung himself on him and licked him as if he hadn't seen him for a month, instead of just a minute or two before!

'Hallo!' said Guy, in a small voice. 'I'm all right. It's just my ankle, that's all. I'm jolly glad to...'

But before he could say a word more, Harry was beside him, his arms round him, his voice choking.

'Guy! Oh, Guy! I've been a beast, I wouldn't be friends! What happened to you? Are you really all right? Oh Guy, we are friends again, aren't we?'

'Look out Harry, old son,' said Julian gently. 'He's fainted. Now just let's be sensible and everything will come all right. Flap your hanky at him, Dick, and give him a little air. It's only the excitement!'

In half a minute Guy opened his eyes and smiled weakly. 'Sorry!' he said. 'I'm all right now. I only hope this isn't a dream, and that you really are here!'

'You bet we are!' said Dick. 'Have a bit of chocolate, then you'll know we're real!'

'Good idea!' said Julian. 'We'll all have some - and I've some biscuits in my pocket too. We'll eat and talk - and we'll make plans at the same time. Catch, Guy - here's a biscuit!'

Chapter 18

THE WAY OUT

Guy soon told his story. It was much as the others had imagined.

'I was fast asleep this morning, with Jet curled up to me,' he said. 'He began to bark and I wondered why, so I got up to see - and I saw four people in the camp.'

'The four we know!' said Dick, and Julian nodded. 'Go on, Guy.'

'They were looking all over the place,' said Guy, 'prising up rocks, messing about - so I yelled at them. But they only laughed. Then one of the men, who was trying to prise up a slab - the slab that covers that great hole underground, Harry - you remember it? - well, this man gave a yell and said 'I've got it! This is the way in - down here, behind this slab!'

Guy stopped, looking very angry. Jet licked him comfortably. 'Well,' he went on, 'I set Jet on them, and they kicked him cruelly - so I went for them.'

'You're a plucky one, aren't you!' said Dick, admiringly. 'Did you knock them all out, by any chance?'

'No. Of course not,' said Guy. 'One of the men pretty well knocked me out though. He hit me on the head and I went down, dazed. I heard him say 'drat this kid - he'll be fetching help, and we shan't be able to get down and hunt for the goods.' And then another man said 'We'll take him with us then,' and they got hold of me and dragged me through the opening.'

'But how did they get down into that great hole?' said Harry in wonder. 'There is such a steep drop into it. You need a rope.'

'Oh, they had a rope all right,' said Guy, munching his biscuit and chocolate and looking decidedly better. 'One of the men had one tied round and round his waist. They knotted it fast round a rock - that big one we can't move, Harry - and then they swung down on it. All except the woman. She said she'd stay at the top and keep watch. She hid behind a bush some way off.'

'I never saw her when I came along!' said Harry. 'I never thought of looking there! What about you? Did you get down too?'

'Yes. I screamed and shouted and kicked and howled, but it wasn't a bit of good. They made me swing down the rope - and I fell off half-way down and hurt my ankle. I howled at the top of my voice for help, and they hurried me along with them, shaking me like a rat.'

'The beasts!' said Harry, fervently. 'Oh, the beasts!'

'I heard one of them say that there should be a tunnel out of the hole somewhere, it was marked on Paul's plan - whatever that may be - and then I think I must have fainted - the pain of my ankle, you know. And when I came to myself again, we were all here, the three men and I - beside this roof-fall - though I really don't know how we got here. They must have dragged me along with them!'

'And that's all, is it?' asked Julian.

'Not quite. They were furious when they saw the roof-fall, but as soon as they began to scabble in it a rock rolled down and hit one of the men quite a crack - and after that they were afraid to do anything. They stood and talked for a bit - and then they decided to go and get some tools, and come down again to see if they could remove all this stuff and get through it.'

'Good gracious!' said Julian, startled. 'Then they may be back at any moment?'

'I suppose so. They left me here because they couldn't think of anything else to do with me! They knew I couldn't walk, because of my ankle. I think it's broken. So of course, I couldn't possibly find my way out myself! And here I've been waiting for those brutes to come back, and to hack through the rubble to go after whatever it is they want!'

Everyone began to feel rather uncomfortable at the thought that three violent men might be appearing at any moment. 'Is it very far to the opening you came down?' asked Julian. But Guy didn't know. He had fainted, as he had said, and he didn't even know what way they had come.

'It can't be far,' said Harry. 'I think it would be worth while trying to find the opening, see if the men have left the ropes there, and get out that way. If Guy's ankle really is broken, he couldn't possibly manage to go back the long way we've come.'

'No. That's true,' said Julian, thoughtfully. 'Well, that's what we'll do then. But we'll go jolly cautiously, without a sound, because it might be just our luck to meet those fellows on their way back here!'

'Shall we start?' said George. 'What about Guy?'

Julian knelt down beside the boy, and gently examined his ankle. 'I've done my First Aid Training, like everybody else!' he said. 'And I ought to know if his ankle is broken or just sprained.'

He examined the swollen ankle carefully. 'It's not broken. I believe I could bandage it tightly with a couple of large hankies. Give me yours, Dick.'

The others watched admiringly as Julian deftly and confidently bandaged Guy's swollen ankle. 'There!' he said. 'You can perhaps hobble on it now, Guy. It may hurt, but I don't think it will damage it. Try. You'll have to go barefoot because your ankle is too swollen for your shoe to go on.'

Very gingerly Guy stood up, helped by Harry. He tried his hurt foot, and it certainly seemed all right to hobble on, though it was very painful. He grinned round at the others' anxious faces.

'It's fine!' he said. 'Come on, let's go! We don't want to bump into those fellows if we can help it. Thank goodness we've got Jet and Timmy.'

They set off down the passage, flashing their torches in front as usual, to show them the way. The tunnel was quite wide and high here, and in a very short time came out into an enormous pit underground.

'Ah - this is the hole I saw down behind the slab where the rabbit went,' said Dick. 'We weren't very far from the camp, as we thought. I'm surprised that when this pit was explored, the underground passages were not discovered, Guy!'

'I expect the men exploring it came to the roof-fall and thought there was nothing beyond,' said Guy. 'Or maybe they were afraid of going further in case of further falls. They can be very dangerous, you know. Many a man has been buried under one and never heard of again.'

They looked round the enormous hole - it was really a huge round pit. Daylight showed in the roof at one place.

'That's the opening into it,' said Guy, eagerly. 'The one I came through, on the rope.'

He limped a few steps forward to look for the rope. Harry held him by the arm, thankful that the ankle was holding up so well. Guy pointed upwards.

'Yes. I can see the rope. The men have left it there, thank goodness. They must have been certain that I couldn't get to it!'

The rope hung down from the little opening high above their heads. Julian looked round at Anne.

'Can you manage to climb up the rope, Anne?' he said, doubtfully.

'Of course!' said Anne, scornfully. 'We do rope-climbing in the gym at school often enough. Don't we, George?'

'Yes - but our gym rope is a bit thicker!' said George.

'I'll go up first,' said Harry. 'We've got a much thicker rope, Guy and I, that we use when we want to haul on very heavy stones. I'll find it, and let it down.'

'Well - we can't afford to waste any time, in case those fellows come back,' said Julian. 'I daresay the girls can manage all right. George, you go up first.'

George went up like a monkey, hand over hand, her legs twisted round the rope. She grinned down when she got to the top.'

'Easy!' she said. 'Come on up next, Anne, and show the boys how to do it!'

Before the boys could leap to the rope, Anne was on it, pulling herself up lithely. Julian laughed. He called up to George.

'George! You might have a squint round and see if there's any sign of people about. If they were going to borrow Guy's tools, they would have been back long ago, so I think probably they've had to go to Kirrin or some farm-house to borrow them.'

'They wouldn't get my tools!' said Guy, 'or Harry's. We had them stolen once, and now we always hide them where no one can possibly find them.'

'That settles it then,' said Julian. 'They've had to go a good way, I expect, to get satisfactory tools to tackle that roof-fall. They probably imagine that it's a pretty big fall! All the same, keep a watch out, George, till we're all up.'

It was difficult to get Guy up, for he was feeling weak, but they managed it at last. The two dogs had to have the boys' shirts tied round them so that the rope would not cut them when they were hauled up. They didn't seem to mind at all. Timmy was very heavy to pull up because he appeared to think that he had to try and make his legs do a running action all the time - just to help! All that happened was that he began to spin round and round, as he went up!

Everyone was up in the open air at last, hot and perspiring. Julian had the precious bag safely under his arm. Timmy sat down panting. Then he suddenly stopped panting and pricked up his ears.

'Woof,' he said warningly, and stood up.

'Quiet, Tim, quiet, Jet,' said Julian, at once aware that somebody must be about. 'Hide, everyone - quickly. It may be those fellows coming back!'

'Wuff,' began Jet, but Guy stopped him immediately. The six children separated and went into hiding at once, each choosing the best place he or she could see. There were plenty of hiding-places in the old camp!

They heard voices coming near. Nobody dared to peep out and see who was coming - but Julian and Dick recognized the drawling voice of one of the men!

'What a time we've been!' said the man. 'Just chuck the spades and things down the hole - then we'll all climb down again. Buck up! We've wasted too much time already. Anyone might come on the scene at any moment!'

The spades and jemmys went hurtling down the hole. Then one by one the men went down the rope. The children could not hear the woman's voice. They thought she must have been left behind.

Julian gave a low whistle and all the others popped up their heads. 'We'll spring for it!' said Julian. 'Buck up!'

They all shot out of their hiding-places at once and made off - except Julian. He stayed behind for a minute or two. What could he be doing?

Julian was doing something very simple indeed! He was hauling up the rope that dangled underground! He slipped it off the rock that held it and tied it round his waist, looking suddenly very bulky.

He grinned a very wide grin and went after the others. How very, very angry those men were going to be!

Chapter 19

BACK TO KIRRIN COTTAGE

Julian ran after the others. 'What were you doing?' said George. 'Calling rude names down to the men?'

'No. I hope they'll go and dig for hours if they want to!' said Julian. 'They'll soon find that when they've got through it, that roof-fall is nothing much, and they'll go on till they come to the little room - and what they'll say when they find that the bag is gone, I really don't know!'

'I wish I could be there!' said Dick.

'What are we going to do about Guy?' asked Harry. 'He really can't walk very far on that bad foot.'

'If he can walk as far as the gorse-bush where we've left our things, I've got a bike there,' said George. 'He could pedal with one foot, I should think.'

'Oh yes - I could easily do that,' said Guy, pleased. He had dreaded the thought of having to walk all the way to Kirrin - but neither did he want to be left behind!

He limped along, helped by Harry, who couldn't do enough for him. Jet ran along beside them, excited and happy at being with so many people. Timmy sometimes wuffed a little bark to him, which made Jet as proud as punch. He thought the big Timmy was wonderful!

They came to the gorse-bush, and found their things all safe. The bicycle was there, with its packages strapped to it. George unstrapped them, meaning to carry them herself, so that Guy would not have too heavy a weight to pedal with his one foot. They all started off together, Guy riding ahead on the bicycle.

'We will go to Kirrin, dump our things at the cottage, and get Aunt Fanny to ring the police and ask them if they'll come along and collect this bag from us,' said Julian. 'I don't want to leave it at the police station - I want to see it opened in front of us!'

'I do hope it won't be empty,' said Anne. 'It does feel terribly light!'

'Yes. It does,' said Julian, swinging it to and fro. 'I can't help fearing that Paul, who drew the plan that the men found so difficult to understand, may have double-crossed his friends - drawn a deliberately difficult plan - and then left the bag quite empty in the place he marked on the plan! It would be the kind of hoax that a trickster loves to play - and would give him time to get away in safety.'

'But they said he was ill,' said Dick. 'Still - perhaps he might have been pretending that too! It's a mystery!'

'How are you getting on, Guy?' called Anne, as they overtook the boy. He kept riding on by himself for a little way, and then resting, waiting for them to catch up with him before he pedalled on again with his one good foot.

'Very well indeed, thank you,' said Guy. 'This bike was a very good idea of yours. What a blessing you had it with you!'

'Your foot doesn't seem any more swollen,' said Anne. 'I expect you'll be able to walk on it properly in a day or two. Oh, dear - it does make me laugh when I think how puzzled we all were when we thought there was just one of you, not twins!'

'We met first one of you, then the other, and thought you were the same boy,' said George, with a chuckle. 'We were absolutely wild with you sometimes, you seemed so mad and contradictory!'

'Don't remind us of it,' said Harry. 'I can't bear thinking that if I'd only been with Guy, all this trouble of his would never have happened.'

'Oh well - it's an ill wind that blows nobody any good!' said George. 'The bad and the good have fitted together very well this time, and made a most exciting adventure!'

'Here's Carters Lane at last,' said Anne. 'What a long walk it seemed over the common. It will be much easier for you to ride that bike when you're on a proper road, Guy. It won't go bumping over heather clumps now.'

They went down the long lane and came into Kirrin at last, realizing that they were all very hungry indeed. 'It must be well past dinner-time,' said George, looking at her watch. 'Good gracious - it's a quarter to two! Would you believe it! I hope there's some dinner left over for us - Mother doesn't know we're coming.'

'We'll raid Joan's larder!' said Dick. 'She never minds so long as she's there to grumble at us while we do it!'

They went in at the gate of Kirrin Cottage and up to the front door, which was open. George shouted.

'Mother! Where are you? We've come back!'

Nobody answered. George yelled again. 'Mother! We've come home!'

The door of the study opened and her father looked out, red in the face and frowning.

'George! How many times am I to tell you not to shout when I'm working? Oh, my goodness me, who are all these?'

'Hallo, Father!' said George, mildly. 'Surely you know Anne and Julian and Dick! Don't say you've forgotten them already!'

'Of course not! But who are these?' and George's father pointed to the startled twins. 'They're as like as peas. Where did they come from? I haven't seen them before, have I?'

'No, Father. They're just friends of ours,' said George. 'Where's Mother? We've just had an adventure and we want to tell her. Oh, and we want to ring the police - and I think we ought to get a doctor to see to Guy's foot - and Father, look, Timmy's ear is healed!'

'Bless us all! There's never any peace when you are about, George,' said her father, groaning. 'Your mother's at the bottom of the garden, picking raspberries - or it might have been strawberries.'

'Oh no, Father - it's August, not June!' said George. 'You always...'

Julian thought he had better get his uncle safely back in his study before a row blew up between him and George. Uncle Quentin did not like being disturbed in his complicated work!

'Let's go and find Aunt Fanny,' he said, 'we can tell her everything out in the garden. Come on!'

'Wuff-wuff!' said Jet.

'Good gracious - that's not another dog, is it?' said George's father, scowling. 'How many times have I said that...'

'We won't disturb you any more, Uncle,' said Julian, hurriedly, seeing Guy's scared face. 'We'll go and find Aunt Fanny.'

They all went thankfully out in the garden, hearing the house echo to the slam of Uncle Quentin's study door. George shouted.

'Mother! Where are you?'

'Shut up, George - we don't want to make your father leap out of the window after us!' said Dick.

'Ah - there's Aunt Fanny!'

His aunt was very surprised to see him and the others advancing on her. She went to greet them, a basket of raspberries on her arm.

'Well! I thought you wanted to stay away for longer than this!'

'We did - but an adventure descended on us!' said Dick. 'We'll tell you all about it in detail later on, Aunt Fanny.'

'But just now we want two things - can we ring the police - or will you - and ask them to come here?' said Julian, very grown-up all of a sudden. 'There's something that might be very important for them to know. And also do you think we should let a doctor see Guy's foot - he's sprained his ankle, I think?'

'Oh dear!' said Aunt Fanny, distressed to see the boy's swollen foot. 'Yes - he ought to have that seen to properly. Who is he? Dear me - there's another of them! Aren't they alike?'

'Twins,' said George. 'I don't know how I shall be able to tell one from the other when Guy's bad foot is better.'

'I'm going to ring the police,' said Julian, seeing that his aunt could now only think of Guy's swollen foot. He went off indoors, and they heard him speaking on the telephone. He put it down and came out again.

'The Inspector himself is coming,' said Julian. 'Shall I ring the doctor now, Aunt Fanny?'

'Oh yes. His number is 042,' said his aunt. 'How did you get such an ankle, Guy?'

'Mother, you don't seem at all interested in our adventure,' complained George.

'Oh, I am, dear,' said her mother. 'But you do have such a lot, you know. What have you been up to this time?'

But before George could do more than begin, a black police car drew up at the front gate, and the inspector of police got out and marched up to the front door. He knocked extremely loudly on the knocker.

Which, of course, had the immediate result of bringing George's father hotfoot out of his study in another rage! He flung open the front door.

'Hammering at the door like that! What's the matter? I've a good mind to report you to the police! Oh - er - h'm - good afternoon, Inspector. Do come in. Are we expecting you?'

Smiling broadly, the Inspector came in. By this time Julian had come back in the house again, and greeted him. His uncle went back into his study, rather red in the face, and actually closed the door quietly!

'You wanted me to come along at once, because of something important?' said the Inspector. 'What is it?'

The others came into the room now, with Julian's aunt behind them. Julian nodded round at them. 'They're all in this, sir - except my aunt, of course. We've brought something we think may be important, sir. Quite a lot of people were looking for it - but we managed to get hold of it first!

He put the brown bag on the table. The Inspector's eyes went to it at once. 'What is it? What's inside? Stolen goods?'

'Yes, sir - blue-prints of some kind, I think. But I don't know what of, of course.'

'Open the bag, my boy! I'll examine them,' said the Inspector.

'I can't open it,' said Julian. 'It's locked - and there's no key!'

'Well - we'll soon manage that!' said the Inspector, and took out a small, strong-looking tool. He forced the lock, and the bag opened. Everyone leaned forward eagerly, even Timmy. What was in the bag?

There was nothing there! Absolutely nothing! Julian groaned in bitter disappointment.

'No wonder it felt so light. It's empty after all. Would you believe it!'

Chapter 20

THE ADVENTURE ENDS - AS IT BEGAN!

It was a moment of great disappointment for all the children. Although they had talked about the possibility of the bag being empty, everyone had secretly felt certain that something exciting would be inside.

The Inspector was astonished. He looked round sharply. 'Where did you get this bag? What made you think it had stolen goods inside - and what kind of blue-prints were they?'

'Well, sir - it's rather a long story,' said Julian.

'I'm afraid you'll have to tell it to me,' said the Inspector, taking out his notebook. 'Now - how did this all begin?'

'Well - it really began with Timmy hurting his ear and having to wear a cardboard collar,' said George.

The Inspector looked most surprised. He turned to Julian. 'You'd better tell it,' he said. 'I don't want to waste time on cardboard collars!'

George went red and put on a scowl. Julian grinned at her, and began the story, making it as clear and short as he could.

The Inspector became more and more interested. He laughed when Julian came to the weird noises and lights.

'They certainly wanted to get rid of you,' he said. 'You were plucky to stay on. Go on - there's something behind all this, that's certain!'

He jotted down the name of 'Paul', and 'Jess', the name of the woman. He noted that one man had a drawl. 'Any other clues to them?' he asked.

'Only this, sir,' said Julian and handed his drawing of the crepe-soled shoe to the Inspector. This was carefully folded and put into the notebook too. 'Might be of use. Might not,' said the Inspector. 'You never know!'

He listened intently to the tale of the underground passages, and picked up the bag again.

'I can't understand why it's empty,' he said. 'It isn't really like a crook deliberately to mislead his friends when they know quite well where he is and can get at him whenever they like.' He shook the bag hard. Then he began to examine it very very carefully.

Finally he took out a sharp knife and gently slit the lining at the bottom of the bag. He turned it back.

Something was there - under the lining! Something blue, folded very carefully. Something covered with thousands of minute figures, thousands of lines, thousands of queer little designs!

'Wheeeeeew!' whistled the Inspector. 'So the bag's not empty, after all! Now what is this? It's a blue-print of some project - but what?'

'My father would know!' said George, at once. 'He's a scientist, you know, Inspector - one of the cleverest in the world. Shall I get him?'

'Yes,' said the Inspector, laying out the blue-print on the table. 'Get him at once.'

George flew off and returned with her father, who didn't look very pleased.

'Good afternoon, sir, once more. Sorry to disturb you,' said the Inspector. 'But do you happen to know whether this document is of any importance?'

George's father took it up. He ran his eyes over it, and then gave a loud exclamation.

'Why - why - no, it's IMPOSSIBLE! Good heavens, it's - no, no, it can't be! Am I dreaming?'

Everyone gazed at him, surprised and anxious. What did he mean? What could it be, this blue-print?

'Er - it's important then, sir?' said the Inspector.

'Important? IMPORTANT? My dear fellow, there are only two of these prints in existence - and at the moment I have the second one, which I am checking very carefully indeed. Where did this come from? Why - I simply can't believe it! Sir James Lawton-Harrison has the other. There isn't a third!'

'But - but - there must be if you have one here and Sir James has the other!' said the Inspector. 'It's obvious there is a third!'

'You're wrong. It isn't obvious!' shouted George's father. 'What is obvious is that Sir James hasn't got his! I'll ring him up - this very minute. Astounding! Most disturbing! Bless us all, what will happen next?'

The children did not dare to say a word. They were full of astonishment. To think that the blue-print was so important - and that George's father actually had a pair to this one. What was its importance?

They heard George's father shouting into the telephone, evidently angry and disturbed. He slammed it down and came back.

'Yes. Sir James' copy has been stolen - but it's been kept very hush-hush because of its importance. Good heavens - they never even let me know! And to think I spilt a bottle of ink over mine yesterday - gross carelessness. Stolen! A thing like that - stolen out of his safe under his very nose. Now there's only one copy left!'

'Two, sir,' said the Inspector, tapping the copy on the table. 'You're so upset to hear that Sir James' copy has gone that you've forgotten we have it here!'

'Bless us all! Thank goodness! Yes, I had forgotten for the moment!' said Uncle Quentin. 'My word, I even forgot to tell Sir James it was here.' He leapt up to go to the telephone again, but the Inspector caught his arm.

'No, sir. Don't telephone again. I think we should keep this as quiet as possible.'

'Father - what is this a blue-print of?' said George, voicing the thoughts of everyone there, the Inspector included.

'This blue-print? I'm certainly not going to tell you!' said her father. 'It's too big a thing even to speak of to you children - or the Inspector either for that matter. It's one of the biggest secrets we have. Here, give it to me.'

The Inspector placed his big hand on it at once. 'No, sir. I think I must take it with me, and send a secret messenger to Sir James with it. It wouldn't do to have the only two copies in one place. Why, your house might catch fire and both prints might go up in flames!'

'Take it, then, take it! We can't possibly risk such a thing!' said George's father. He glared round at the children. 'I still don't understand how you came to possess it!' he said, looking suddenly amazed.

'Sit down, sir, won't you, and listen to their tale,' said the Inspector. 'They've done very well. They haven't finished their story.'

Julian went on with it. The Inspector sat up straight when he heard where the three men were - down in the great pit below the Roman camp.

'You saw them go down into that pit?' he said. 'Watched them swing down on the rope? They may be there now!' He glanced at his watch. 'No, they won't. They'll be gone.'

He groaned loudly. 'And to think we might easily have caught three clever rogues. They've slipped through our hands again!'

'They haven't!' said Julian, his voice rising exultantly. 'They're still there!'

'How do you know?' said the Inspector.

'Because I pulled up their rope and took it away - look, I've got it round me!' said Julian. 'They can't get out without a rope - and they won't know how to escape any other way. They're still there - waiting for you, Inspector!'

The Inspector slapped the table so hard that everyone jumped and the two dogs barked.

'Good work!' he boomed. 'Magnificent! I must go at once and send some men out there. I'll let you know what happens!'

And out he went at a run, the precious blue-print buttoned safely in his pocket. He leapt into the driving-seat and the police-car roared away at top speed down the lane.

'Whew!' said Julian, flopping back into his chair. 'It's too exciting for words!'

Everyone felt the same, and began to talk at the tops of their voices. Poor Aunt Fanny couldn't make herself heard. But when Joan came in and asked if anyone wanted anything to eat, they heard her at once!

The doctor came to see Guy's foot, and re-bandaged it. 'Rest it for a day or two,' he said. 'It will soon be all right.'

'Well, you'll have to stay here with George and the others, Guy,' said George's mother. 'You can't go excavating in that camp of yours again yet. Harry can stay too. So can Jet.'

The twins beamed. They liked this jolly family, and the adventurous life they seemed to lead. It would be fun to stay with them for a while. They thought it would be even more fun, when Joan arrived with a truly wonderful meal!

'Home-made veal-and-ham-pie! Stuffed tomatoes! And what a salad - what's in it, Joan? Radishes, cucumber, carrot, beetroot, hard boiled eggs, tomatoes, peas - Joan, you're a marvel! What is the pudding?'

Soon they were all sitting down enjoying themselves, and talking over their adventure. Just as they were finishing, the telephone bell rang. Julian went to answer it. He came back looking thrilled.

'That was the Inspector. They've got all three men! When they got to the pit, one of the men called up for help - said some idiot of a boy or some hoaxer must have taken their rope away. So the police - all in plain-clothes, so that of course the three men suspected nothing - the police let down a rope, and up came the men one by one...'

'And were arrested as soon as they popped out of the hole, I suppose!' said George, delighted. 'Oh, I wish I'd been there! What a joke!'

'The Inspector's awfully pleased with us,' said Julian. 'And so is Sir James Lawton-Harrison too, apparently. We're to get a reward - very hush-hush, though. We mustn't say anything about it. There's to be something for each of us.'

'And for Timmy too?' said George at once.

Julian looked round at Timmy. 'Well, I can see what old Timmy ought to ask for,' he said. 'A new cardboard collar. He's scratching his ear to bits!'

George screamed and rushed to bend over Timmy. She lifted a woebegone face. 'Yes! He's scratched so hard he's made his ear bad again. Oh Timmy! You really are a fatheaded dog! Mother! Mother! Timmy's messed up his ear again!'

Her mother looked into the room. 'Oh George, what a pity! I told you not to take off that collar till his ear was absolutely healed!'

'It's maddening!' said George. 'Now everyone will laugh at him again.'

'Oh no they won't,' said Julian, and he smiled at George's scowling face. 'Cheer up - it's a very peculiar thing, George - this adventure began with Timmy and a cardboard collar - and bless me if it hasn't ended with Timmy and a cardboard collar. Three cheers for old Timmy!'

Yes - three cheers for old Timmy! Get your ear well before the next adventure, Tim - you really can't wear a cardboard collar again!

THE END

Enid Blyton

THE
FAMOUS
FIVE

FIVE GO TO BILLYCOCK HILL

ENID BLYTON

FAMOUS FIVE 16

Five Go To Billycock Hill

Contents

| | | |
|----|---|----|
| 1 | A Week's Holiday | 2 |
| 2 | Off To Billycock Hill | 6 |
| 3 | Billycock Farm | 10 |
| 4 | A Fine Camping-Place | 14 |
| 5 | The First Night - And A Morning Visitor | 18 |
| 6 | The Butterfly Farm | 22 |
| 7 | Mrs. Janes - A Spider - And A Pool | 27 |
| 8 | A Spot Of Trouble | 31 |
| 9 | Cousin Jeff | 35 |
| 10 | Butterfly Farm Again | 40 |
| 11 | A Stormy Night | 43 |
| 12 | What Happened In Billycock Caves | 48 |
| 13 | A Dreadful Shock | 52 |
| 14 | Mr. Gringle Is Annoyed | 56 |
| 15 | More News - And A Night Trip | 60 |
| 16 | Looking Through Windows | 63 |
| 17 | Quite A Lot Happens | 68 |
| 18 | Nobody Knows Where To Look | 72 |
| 19 | A Morning Of Work | 76 |
| 20 | A Peculiar Message | 80 |
| 21 | An Exciting Finish | 85 |

Chapter 1
A WEEK'S HOLIDAY

'Where's the map?' said Julian. 'Is that it, George? Good! Now - where shall we spread it?'

'On the floor,' said Anne. 'A map is always easiest to read on the floor. I'll push the table out of the way.'

'Well, be careful, for goodness' sake,' said George. 'Father's in his study, and you know what happened before when someone pushed the table right over!'

Everyone laughed. George's father so often came pouncing out of his study if any sudden noise was made when he was working.

The table was pushed out of the way and the big map unfolded and spread out over the floor. Timmy was surprised to see the four children kneeling down around it, and barked, imagining this was some kind of new game.

'Be quiet, Timmy!' said Dick. 'You've got into trouble once this morning already for making a row. And stop brushing my face with your tail.'

'Wuff,' said Timmy and lay down heavily on the map.

'Get up, idiot,' said Dick. 'Don't you know we're in a hurry? We want to trace our route to Billycock Hill...'

'Billycock Hill - what a lovely name!' said Anne. 'Is that where we're going?'

'Yes,' said Julian, poring over the map. 'It's near some caves we want to see - and there's a Butterfly Farm not far off, and...'

'A Butterfly Farm!' said George, surprised. 'Whatever's that?'

'Just what it sounds like!' said Dick. 'A farm for butterflies! Toby, a friend of ours at school, told me about it. He lives quite near it and he says it's a most interesting place - they breed butterflies - and moths, too - from eggs, and sell them to collectors.'

'Do they really?' said Anne. 'Well, I must say I used to enjoy keeping caterpillars and seeing what they turned into - it was like magic to see a lovely butterfly or moth creep out of the chrysalis. But a farm for them - can we really go and see it?'

'Oh, yes - Toby says the men who run it are very decent about showing anyone round,' said Julian. 'Apparently Billycock Hill is a good place for rare butterflies, too - that's why they've got their farm there. They rush about with nets half the time - and at night they go moth-hunting.'

'It sounds exciting,' said Dick. 'Well, what with caves to see, and a butterfly farm, and Toby to visit, and...'

'And just Five together again on a sunny week's holiday!' said George, giving Timmy a sudden thump of joy. 'Hurrah for Whitsun - and thank goodness our two schools had a week's holiday at the same time!'

The four cousins sprawled on the floor, looking with great interest at the map, following out a route with their fingers. As they traced out the way, there came an angry noise from the study, where George's father was at work.

'Who's been tidying my desk? Where are those papers I left here? Fanny, Fanny - come here!'

'He wants Mother - I'll get her,' said George. 'No, I can't - she's gone shopping.'

'Why can't people leave my papers alone?' came her father's voice again. 'Fanny! FANNY!'

Then the study door was flung open and Mr. Kirrin came striding out, muttering to himself. He didn't see the four children on the floor, and fell right over them.

Timmy barked in delight and leapt at him, thinking that for once in a way George's father was actually having a game with them!

'Oooh!' said George, as her father's hand came over her face. 'Don't! What are you doing, Father?'

'Uncle Quentin - sorry you fell over us!' said Julian. 'Shut up, Timmy - this isn't a game!'

He helped his uncle up and waited for the explosion. His uncle brushed himself down and glared at Julian. 'Have you got to lie on the floor? Get down, will you, Timmy? Where's your mother, George? Get up, for goodness' sake! Where's Joan? If she's been tidying my desk again I'll give her notice!'

Joan the cook appeared at the doorway, wiping her floury hands on her apron. 'Whatever's all this noise about?' she began. 'Oh, sorry, sir - I didn't know it was you. I...'

'Joan - have you been tidying my desk again?' almost shouted George's father.

'No, sir. Have you lost something? Never you mind, sir, I'll come along and find it,' said Joan, who was used to Mr. Kirrin's ways. 'Pick up that map, you four - and put the table back. Stop barking, Timmy. George, take him out for goodness' sake, or your father will go mad.'

'He's only excited because we're all together again,' said George, and took Timmy into the garden. The others followed, Julian folding up the map, grinning.

'We ought to put Uncle Quentin into a play,' said Dick. 'He'd bring the house down! Well - do we know the way, Julian? And when do we start?'

'Here's Mother,' said George as someone came to the front gate with a basket.

Julian ran to open it. He was very fond of his kindly, pleasant-faced aunt. She smiled round at them all.

'Well - have you decided where to go - and what to take with you? You'll be able to camp out this beautiful weather - what a lovely Whitsun it's going to be!'

'Yes,' said Julian, taking his aunt's basket from her and carrying it indoors. 'We're going to Billycock Hill, and as our friend Toby lives at the bottom of it, at Billycock Farm, he's going to lend us all the camping gear we need.'

'So we shan't need to load our bikes with tents and mattresses and things,' said Dick.

'Oh - good!' said his aunt. 'What about food? You can get it at Toby's farm, I suppose?'

'Rather! We shan't feed there, of course,' said Julian. 'But we shall buy any eggs or milk or bread we need - and Toby says the strawberries are already ripening!'

Aunt Fanny smiled. 'Well, I needn't worry about your meals, then. And you'll have Timmy with you, too, so he'll look after you all. Won't you, Timmy? You won't let them get into any trouble, will you?'

'Woof,' said Timmy, in his deepest voice, and wagged his tail. 'Woof.'

'Good old Tim,' said George, patting him. 'If it wasn't for you we'd never be allowed to go off so much on our own, I bet!'

'Uncle Quentin's a bit on the war-path, Aunt Fanny,' said Dick. 'He wants to know who's been tidying his desk. He came rushing out of the study, didn't see us lying on the floor round our map - and fell right over us.'

'Oh dear - I'd better go and find out what papers he's lost now,' said his aunt. 'I expect he forgot that he had a tidying fit on last night, and tidied his desk himself. He's probably put a lot of his most precious papers into the waste-paper basket!'

Everyone laughed as Mrs. Kirrin hurried into the study.

'Well, let's get ready,' said Julian. 'We won't need to take much, as old Toby's going to help us. Macs, of course - and don't forget yours, Timmy! And jerseys. And one or two maps.'

'And torches,' said Anne, 'because we want to explore those caves. Oh, and let's take our swimsuits in case we find somewhere to bathe. It's warm enough!'

'And candles and matches,' said George, slapping the pocket of her shorts. 'I've got those. I got

Joan to give me three boxes. And let's take some sweets.'

'Yes. That tin of humbugs,' said Julian. 'And I vote we take our little portable radio!'

'Oh, yes - that's a good idea,' said Anne, pleased. 'We can hear our favourite programmes then - and the news. I don't suppose we shall be able to buy newspapers.'

'I'll get out the bikes from the shed,' said Julian. 'Dick, get the sandwiches from Joan - she said she'd make us some, because we shan't get to Toby's farm till after our dinner-time - and I bet we'll be hungry!'

'Wuff,' said Timmy, who knew that word very well.

'He says remember biscuits for him,' said Anne with a laugh. 'I'll go and get some now, Tim - though I expect you can share meals with the dogs at Billycock Farm.'

Joan had two large packets of sandwiches and cake ready for them, and two bottles of orangeade. 'There you are,' she said, handing them over. 'And if you get through all those you'll no longer feel hungry. And here are Timmy's biscuits - and a bone.'

'You're a brick, Joan,' said Dick, and put his arm round her to give her one of the sudden hugs she liked. 'Well, you'll soon be rid of us - a whole week at Whitsun - isn't that luck - and with such glorious weather, too.'

'Buck up!' called Julian. 'I've got the bikes - and no one's had a puncture, for a change. Bring my mac, Dick.'

In three minutes everything was packed into the bicycle baskets, or strapped at the back. Timmy made sure that his biscuits and bone were packed by sniffing at each basket until he came to the smell he was hoping for. Then he wagged his tail and bounded round excitedly. The Five were together again - and who knew what might happen? Timmy was ready for anything!

'Good-bye, dears,' said Mrs. Kirrin, standing at the gate to see them go. 'Julian, take care of the girls - and Tim, take care of everyone!'

Uncle Quentin suddenly appeared at the window. 'What's all the noise about?' he began impatiently. 'Oh - they're off at last, are they? Now we'll have a little peace and quiet! Good-bye - and behave yourselves!'

'Grown ups always say that,' said Anne as the Five set off happily, ringing their bells in farewell.

'Hurrah - we're off on our own again - yes, you too, Timmy. What fun!'

Chapter 2
OFF TO BILLYCOCK HILL

The sun shone down hotly as the Five sped down the sandy road that ran alongside Kirrin Bay. Timmy loped easily beside them, his tongue hanging out quite a long way. Anne always said that he had the longest tongue of any dog she had ever known!

The sea was as blue as forget-me-nots as they cycled along beside it. Across the bay they could see little Kirrin Island, with Kirrin Castle towering up.

'Doesn't it look fine?' said Dick. 'I half wish we were going to spend Whitsun at Kirrin Cottage, and going bathing, and rowing across to George's little island over there.'

'We can do that in the summer hols,' said Julian. 'It's fun to explore other parts of the country when we can. Toby says the caves in Billycock Hill are marvellous.'

'What's Toby like?' asked George. 'We've never seen him, Anne and I.'

'He's a bit of a joker,' said Dick, 'Likes to put caterpillars down people's necks and so on - and beware if he has a magnificent rose in his buttonhole and asks you to smell it.'

'Why?' asked Anne, surprised.

'Because when you bend down to smell it you'll get a squirt of water in your face,' said Dick. 'It's a trick rose.'

'I don't think I'm going to like him much,' said George, who didn't take kindly to tricks of this sort. 'I'll probably bash him on the head if he does things like that to me.'

'That won't be any good,' said Dick cheerfully. 'He won't bash you back - he'll just think up some worse trick. Don't scowl, George - we're on holiday! Toby's all right - a bit of an ass, that's all.'

They had now left Kirrin Bay behind and were cycling down a country lane, set with hawthorn hedges each side. The may was over now, and the first wild roses were showing pink here and there. A little breeze got up, and was very welcome indeed.

'We'll have an ice when we come to a village,' said Julian after they had cycled about six miles.

'Two ices,' said Anne. 'Oh dear - this hill - what a steep one we've come to. I don't know whether it's worse to ride up slowly and painfully, or to get off and push my bike to the top.'

Timmy tore up to the top in front of them and then sat down to wait in the cool breeze there, his tongue hanging out longer than ever. Julian came to the top first and looked down the other side.

'There's a village there,' he said. 'Right at the bottom. Let's see - yes, it's Tennick village - we'll stop and ask if it sells ices.'

It did, of course, strawberry and vanilla. The four children sat on a seat under a tree outside the small village shop, and dug little wooden spoons into ice-tubs. Timmy sat nearby, watching hopefully. He knew that at least he would be able to lick out the empty tubs.

'Oh, Tim - I didn't mean to buy you one, because you really are a bit fat,' said George, looking at the beseeching brown eyes fixed on her ice cream. 'But as you'll probably get very thin running so far while we're cycling, I'll buy you a whole one for yourself.'

'Wuff,' said Timmy, bounding into the little shop at once and putting his great paws up on the counter, much to the surprise of the woman behind it.

'It's a waste, really, giving Timmy an ice,' said Anne when George and the dog came out. 'He just loosens it with his tongue and gulps it down. I sometimes wonder he doesn't chew up the cardboard tub, too!'

After ten minutes' rest they all set off again, feeling nice and cool inside. It really was lovely cycling through the June countryside - the trees were so fresh and green still, and the fields they passed were golden with butter-cups - thousands and thousands of them, nodding their polished heads in the wind.

There was very little traffic on these deserted country roads - an occasional farm-cart, and sometimes a car, but little else. The Five kept to the lanes as much as they could, for they all preferred their quaint winding curves set with hedges of all kinds, to the wide, dusty main roads, straight and uninteresting.

'We ought to get to Billycock Farm about four o'clock,' said Dick. 'Or may be sooner. What time do we have our lunch, Julian? And where?'

'We'll find a good place about one o'clock,' said Julian. 'And not a minute before. So it's no good anyone saying they are hungry yet. It's only twelve.'

'I'm more thirsty than hungry,' said Anne. 'And I'm sure old Timmy must be dying of thirst! Let's stop at the next stream so that he can have a drink.'

'There's one,' said Dick, pointing to where a stream wound across a nearby field. 'Hey, Tim - go and have a drink, old fellow!'

Timmy shot through the hedge to the stream and began to lap. The others dismounted and stood waiting. Anne picked a spray of honeysuckle and put it through a buttonhole of her blouse. 'Now I can sniff it all the time,' she said. 'Delicious!'

'Hey, Tim - leave some water for the fishes!' shouted Dick. 'George, stop him drinking any more. He's swelling up like a balloon.'

'He's not,' said George. 'Timmy! That's enough! Here, boy, here!'

Timmy took one last lap and then raced over to George. He pranced round her, barking joyfully.

'There - he feels much better now,' said George, and away they all went again, groaning as they cycled slowly up the many hills in that part of the country, and shouting with delight as they sped furiously down the other side.

Julian had decided where to have their midday meal - on the top of a high hill! Then they could see all the country for miles around, and there would also be a nice cooling breeze.

'Cheer up,' he said as they came to the steepest hill they had so far encountered. 'We'll have our lunch at the top of this hill - and a good long rest!'

'Thank goodness,' panted Anne. 'We'll be as stiff as anything tomorrow!'

It really was lovely at the top of the hill! It was so high that they could see the countryside spreading for miles and miles around them.

'You can see five counties from here,' said Julian. 'But don't ask me which - I've forgotten! Let's lie in this heather and have a bit of a rest before we have our lunch.'

It was soft and comfortable lying in the springy heather, but Timmy did not approve of a rest before lunch. He wanted his bone! He went to where George had put her bicycle down, and sniffed in her basket. Yes - his bone was most certainly there! He glanced round to make sure that everyone was resting, and nobody watching him. Then he began to nuzzle a paper parcel out of the basket.

Anne was lying nearest to him, and she heard the crackling of the paper and sat up. 'Timmy!' she said, shocked. 'Oh, Timmy - fancy helping yourself to our sandwiches!'

George sat up at once, and Timmy put his tail down, still wagging it a little as if to say, 'Sorry - but after all, it is my bone!'

'Oh - he just wants his bone,' said George. 'He's not after our sandwiches. As if he should take them, Anne! You might have known he wouldn't!'

'I feel rather like having mine now,' said Anne. 'Julian, can't we have some? - and I do want a drink.'

The idea of a drink made everyone long to begin lunch and soon they were unwrapping ham and tomato sandwiches, and enormous slices of Joan's fruit cake. Julian found the little cardboard drinking cups, and poured out the orangeade carefully.

'This is fine,' said Dick, munching his sandwiches and gazing out over the rolling countryside, with its moorlands, its stretches of farmland with the fields of green corn, and its sloping hills. 'Look - see that hill far away in the distance, Julian - over there - would that be Billycock Hill do you think? It's rather a funny shape.'

'I'll look through my field-glasses,' said Julian, and took them from their leather case. He put them to his eyes and stared hard at the far-away hill that lay to the north of them.

'Yes - I think it probably is Billycock Hill,' he said. 'It's got such a queerly-shaped top; it looks a bit like an old Billycock hat.'

He handed the glasses round, and everyone looked at the far-off hill. George put the glasses to Timmy's eyes. 'There you are!' she said. 'Have a squint, Timmy! Julian, it doesn't look so very far away.'

'It's not, as the crow flies,' said Julian, taking back his glasses and surveying the countryside around them again. 'But it's a long, long way through those hundreds of little winding lanes. Any more sandwiches, anyone?'

'There aren't any more left,' said Dick. 'Or fruit cake either. Have a humbug if you're still hungry.' The humbugs were passed round and Timmy waited hopefully for his turn. George gave him one. 'Not that it's much use to you,' she said. 'You just swallow it without even one suck!'

'We'll rest for half an hour more,' said Julian. 'Gosh, I do feel sleepy!'

They all snuggled down into the soft clumps of heather, and soon they were asleep in the warm sun. Even Timmy snoozed, with one ear half up just in case someone came by. But nobody did. In fact it was so very quiet on the top of the hill that three-quarters of an hour went by before anyone awoke. Anne felt something crawling up her arm and woke with a jump.

'Ugh - a big beetle!' she said, and shook it off. She glanced at her watch. 'Dick! Ju! Wake up! We must get on, or we'll never be there by tea-time!'

Soon they were once more on their way, tearing down the hill at top speed, shouting as they went, with Timmy barking madly beside them. Really, the start of a holiday was the happiest thing in the world!

Chapter 3

BILLYCOCK FARM

The Five certainly cycled fast that afternoon, and would have arrived at Billycock Hill even sooner than they did if it hadn't been for Timmy. He panted so much in the heat that they stopped for brief rests every fifteen minutes.

'It's a pity he's so big and heavy,' said Anne. 'If he had been a small dog we could have taken turns at carrying him in our bicycle baskets.'

Billycock Hill was soon very near. It certainly was a queer shape, very like an old-fashioned hat. It was partly heather-clad and partly sloping meadow land. Cows grazed in the meadows, and farther up the hill, where there was shorter, wiry grass, the farmer had put a good many sheep.

Nestling down at the foot of the hill was a rambling old farm-building, with outhouses and stables and a big greenhouse. 'That must be Billycock Farm,' said Julian. 'Well, we've made very good time, you know - it's only half past three. Let's wash our faces in that stream over there - we all look rather hot and dirty. Timmy, you can have a bathe if you want to!'

The water was cool and silky to the touch, and the children laved it over their faces and necks, wishing they could do as Timmy was doing - lie down in the stream and let the water flow over him!

'That's better,' said Dick, mopping his face with an enormous handkerchief. 'Now let's go and present ourselves at Billycock Farm. I hope Toby's remembered that we're coming - he promised to lend us all we wanted for camping out.'

They combed their hair, brushed down their clothes with their hands, and then, feeling more respectable, made their way across a field-path to a farm gate. The field was bumpy, so they rode slowly.

Soon they were in a big farmyard, with hens pecking around them, and ducks swimming on a round duckpond. Farm dogs began barking from somewhere - and then something ran round the corner of the old house - something very small and pink.

'Whatever is it?' said Anne. 'Oh - it's a pigling! What a pet! Oh, it's come right up to us - little pigling, have you escaped from your sty? How clean you are!'

The tiny pig gave funny little squeals, and ran up to Timmy, who sat back on his haunches in surprise, staring at this unexpected little creature. He thought it must be some sort of dog without any hair.

The pigling butted Timmy gently and Timmy retreated backwards. Julian laughed. 'Tim can't make it out!' he said. 'No, don't growl, Timmy - it's quite harmless!'

'Hallo - who's this?' said Dick as a small figure came round the house. It stopped when it saw the Five.

'What a dear little boy!' said Anne. 'Is he Toby's brother?'

The child didn't look more than five years old. He had a head of bright yellow curls, big brown eyes, and a grin just like his big brother's.

'That's my pig,' he said, coming slowly towards them. 'He runned away from me.' Anne laughed.

'What's your pig's name?' she said.

'Curly,' said the small boy, and pointed at the pigling's tail. 'He's got a curly tail. It won't go straight.'

'It's a nice tail,' said Anne. The pigling ran to the small boy, and he grabbed it by its tail. 'You runned away again,' he said. Then he picked up the pig and walked off.

'Hey! Is this Billycock Farm?' called Julian. 'Have you got a brother called Toby?'

'Toby? Yes, Toby's over there,' said the boy, and he pointed to a big barn. 'Toby' ratting with Binky.'

'Right,' said Julian. The little boy disappeared with his queer pet, and Julian laughed. 'He's rather a pet himself,' he said. 'Come on - let's go and find Toby and Binky. Perhaps Binky is another brother.'

'Or a dog,' said George, and put her hand on Timmy's collar. 'Better be careful. He might go for Tim.'

'Yes - Binky might be a dog, of course - probably a good ratter,' said Julian. 'Dick and I will go to the barn and you two girls stay here with Timmy.'

They went off to the barn. A great noise came from inside as the two boys approached. Shouts and barks and the rap of a stick came to their ears.

'Get him, Binky - look, he went under that sack! Oh, you fathead, you' lost him again!'

Wuff-wuff-wuff! Rap-rap! More yells! In great curiosity Julian and Dick peered into the rather dark old barn. They saw Toby there, prodding under sacks, with a most excited collie beside him, barking incessantly.

'Hey, Toby!' yelled Julian, and Toby stood up and turned a red and perspiring face towards the two boys.

'Oh - you've arrived!' he said, going quickly to the door. 'I thought you were never coming. Glad to see you! But are there only two of you? I got out tents and things for four.'

'There are four of us - five counting Timmy,' said Julian. 'We've left the two girls over there with him - he's our dog. Will yours be friendly or not?'

'Oh, yes, so long as I introduce them,' said Toby, and they all went out of the barn. As soon as Binky, Toby's dog, saw Timmy, he stood still, made himself stiff, and growled, while the hackles on his neck slowly rose up.

'It's all right,' shouted Toby to the girls. 'Bring your dog here. He'll be all right with Binky in half a minute.'

Rather doubtfully George brought Timmy across. Timmy was a bit doubtful himself of this big collie! Toby bent down and spoke into Binky's ear.

'Binky, shake paws with this nice girl - she's a friend.' He nodded at George. 'Hold out your hand,' he said.

George bent down to the collie and held out her hand. At once the dog put up his paw and allowed her to shake it solemnly.

'Now you,' said Toby to Anne, and she did the same. She liked this dog Binky, with his bright brown eyes and long, sleek nose.

'Does your dog shake hands, too?' asked Toby. George nodded, 'He does? Right - tell him to shake paws with Binky. Binky, shake!'

'Timmy, shake,' commanded George, and very politely and solemnly the two dogs shook paws, eyeing each other cautiously. Timmy gave a sudden little whine - and then the two were tearing round the yard together, barking furiously, chasing one another, rolling over, and having a wonderful game.

'That's all right, then,' said Toby, pleased. 'Binky's quite all right with anyone, human or animal, so long as he can shake hands with them. I've taught him that. But he's a dud ratter! He just can't seem to nip a rat. Well - let's go and see my mother. She's expecting you. She's got a whopping great tea.'

This was all very satisfactory! Just the kind of welcome the Five liked. Anne looked sideways at Toby. She thought he was rather nice. George wasn't so sure.

He had a rose in his button-hole - was it a trick one, and was he going to ask her to smell it?

'We saw a little yellow-haired boy just now,' said Anne. 'With a tiny pigling.'

'Oh, that's Benny with his pet pig,' said Toby, laughing. 'He calls it Curly - and he adores it! We've offered him a kitten or a puppy - but no, he wants that pigling. They go everywhere together - like Mary and her lamb! Benny's a pet - he really is. Kid brothers are usually a nuisance, you know, but Benny isn't.'

'Kid sisters are a bit of a nuisance sometimes, too,' said Dick, glancing slyly at Anne, who at once gave him a determined punch. 'Still - Anne's not too bad, is she, Ju?'

Toby's mother, Mrs. Thomas, was a plump and jolly woman, with a smile as wide as Toby's and Benny's. She made them all very welcome.

'Come along in,' she said. 'Toby's pleased you're going to camp hereabouts - he's got all the tents and rugs you'll need - and you can come every day and get eggs and milk and bread and butter and anything else you need from here. Don't be afraid to ask!'

There was suddenly the scamper of little hooves and Curly the pigling came running indoors.

'There, now!' said Toby's mother. 'There's that pigling again. Benny, Benny - you are NOT to let Curly come indoors. Cats I don't mind, nor dogs - but pigs I won't have. Benny!'

Benny appeared, looking most apologetic. 'Sorry, Mum - but he's lively today. Oooh, I say - what a tea! Can we have some yet?'

'I'll just make the tea - unless you'd rather have some of our creamy milk?' said Toby's mother.

'Oh, milk, please, Mrs. Thomas,' said Anne, and they all said the same. Nothing could be nicer than icy-cold, creamy farm milk from the dairy on a hot day like this.

They all sat down to tea, and the four visitors wished they had not had such a big lunch! A large ham sat on the table, and there were crusty loaves of new bread. Crisp lettuces, dewy and cool, and red radishes were side by side in a big glass dish. On the sideboard was an enormous cake, and beside it a dish of scones. Great slabs of butter and jugs of creamy milk were there, too, with honey and home-made jam.

'I wish I was hungry, really hungry,' said Dick. 'This is just the kind of meal for a hungry day.'

'I didn't think you'd have had much lunch,' said Mrs. Thomas. 'Now then, Toby - you're the host. See to your guests, please - and, Benny, take the pigling off your knee. I will not have him at the table.'

'Curly will be very upset if he sees that ham,' said Toby slyly. 'That's his grandfather!'

Benny put Curly down hurriedly, afraid that his feelings might be hurt. The pigling went to sit beside Timmy, who, very much surprised, but rather pleased, at once made room for him.

It was a very happy meal, and Toby was a good host. Anne sat beside little Benny, and found herself liking him more than ever. 'He's like a little boy out of a story,' she said to George. 'He and Curly ought to be put into a book!'

'Well now,' said Mrs. Thomas after everyone had eaten their fill, 'what are your plans? Toby, show them where you have put their tents and everything. Then they can decide where they are going to camp.'

'Come on, then,' said Toby, and Benny and Curly and Binky all came along, too. 'You can help to carry everything - and we'll go up on Billycock Hill and find a fine camping place. How I wish I could camp out with you too!'

Away they all went, feeling rather full but very happy. Where should they camp? How lovely to sleep out at nights, and see the stars through the opening in the tent!

Chapter 4

A FINE CAMPING-PLACE

Toby had put all the camping-out gear in a nearby barn. He took the Five there, with Benny and the pigling trailing after. Binky came, too, so friendly now with Timmy that they trotted along side by side, occasionally pushing against each other like schoolboys!

Julian and Dick looked at the pile of canvas, the pegs and the ropes. Yes, these two tents would do very well, though if the weather stayed like this they would hardly need tents! They could lay their rugs out on the springy heather.

'This is fine, Toby,' said Julian gratefully. 'You've even provided a kettle and a frying-pan.'

'Well, you might want to cook a meal,' said Toby. 'Or boil soup. There's a saucepan for that - ah, here it is!'

He picked it up and promptly put it on Benny's head, where it stuck tightly on his yellow curls. Benny yelled and ran at Toby, hitting him with his fists. The little pig rushed away in fright and disappeared round a corner.

Anne took the saucepan off poor Benny's head. 'You're all right!' she said. 'It was a funny hat to wear, wasn't it?'

'Curly's runned away again!' wept Benny, and he pummelled the laughing Toby. 'I hate you, I hate you!'

'You go and find him,' said Toby, fending off the angry small boy, and Benny ran off on his fat little legs.

'Well, we've got rid of him for a few minutes,' said Toby. 'Now - is there anything I've forgotten? You've got torches, I suppose? What about candles - and matches?'

'We've got those, too,' said Dick. 'And we've brought macs and swim-suits - but that's about all. I see you've put a couple of rugs here as well in case we're cold!'

'Well, it might turn wet and chilly,' said Toby. 'Of course, if it snows, or anything like that, you'll have to come and borrow some more rugs! Now, shall I help you to fix them on your bikes?'

It was too difficult to fix everything on to the four bikes, and in the end Toby found a hand-cart and the children piled everything into that.

'We'll fetch our bikes some other time,' said Julian.

'Leave them here!' said Toby. 'They'll be all right. Are you going now? Well, I'll get a package Mother's got ready for you - you know, ham and new-laid eggs and bread and butter and the rest.'

'It's most awfully good of her,' said Julian gratefully. 'Well, let's start - we've got everything in the hand-cart now. We'll just wait for the food. Dick, you and I can push this hand-cart together. It will need two of us up the hill - and I vote we camp on the side of the slope somewhere, so that we can get a good view.'

Toby came back with an enormous package of food. Benny came with him, Curly trotting behind. Benny carried a basket of ripe strawberries.

'I picked them for you,' he said, and handed them to Anne.

'What beauties!' she said, and gave the smiling child a hug. 'We shall enjoy them, Benny.'

'Can I come and see your camp when you've builded it?' he asked. 'Can I bring Curly? He's never seen a camp.'

'Yes, of course you can,' said Anne. 'Are we ready now, Julian? What about milk? Mrs. Thomas said we could take some.'

'Oh, yes - I forgot that,' said Toby. 'It's in the dairy.' He sped off with Binky, and the others arranged everything neatly in the useful little hand-cart. Toby came back with the milk - two big bottles. They were stacked carefully in a corner of the cart.

'Well, we're ready now, I think,' said Julian, and he and Dick began to push the cart down the path to the gate. Timmy and Binky trotted on ahead, and everyone else followed. Benny came as far as the gate with Curly, then Toby sent him back.

'You know what Mother said, Benny,' he said. 'You're not to come with us now - it'll be too late when Binky and I come back.'

Benny's mouth went down, but he didn't attempt to follow them. He picked Curly up in his arms in case the pigling should run away after the others.

'Benny's a pet,' said Anne. 'I wish I had a little brother like that.'

'He's all right,' said Toby. 'A bit of a cry-baby, though. I'm trying to bring him up properly - teasing him out of his babyishness, and making him stand on his own feet.'

'He seems to be able to do that all right,' said Dick. 'My word - the way he went for you when you put that saucepan on his head! He pummelled you right and left!'

'Benny's a funny little kid,' said Toby, giving a hand with the cart as they reached the slope of the hill. 'He's always having queer pets. Two years ago he had a lamb that followed him everywhere. Last year he had two goslings that followed him about - and when they grew into geese they still followed him! They waddled all the way upstairs one day!'

'And this year he's got a pig!' said George, who, like Anne, was very much amused with Benny. 'Don't you think Timmy was very funny with Curly? I'm sure he still thinks it's a puppy without any hair!'

They made their way up the hill, following a narrow sheep-path. The hand-cart bumped and wobbled, and soon it needed four or five pairs of hands to push it.

'How much farther?' panted Toby at last. 'Surely you're not going right to the top?'

'No,' said Julian. 'About half-way up. We do want to have a good view, Toby, Not very much farther up, I should think. But let's have a bit of rest, shall we?'

They sat down, glad to get their breath. Certainly the view was magnificent. Far away on the horizon were purplish hills, and in front of them stretched miles and miles of green and golden countryside. Green for growing corn and grass - gold for the buttercups, which were at their best in this sunny week of June.

'I like those silvery threads here and there winding about the green fields,' said Anne. 'Little streams - or rivers - curving like snakes all about! And I like the dark green patches that are woods.'

'What's that just down there?' asked George, pointing to what looked like an enormous field with great sheds in the centre.

'That's an airfield,' said Toby promptly. 'A bit hush-hush. Secret planes tried out, and all that. I know all about it because a cousin of mine is there - he's a flight-lieutenant. He comes to see us sometimes and tells me things. It's an experimental place.'

'What's that, exactly?'

asked Anne.

'Well - where new ideas are tried out,' said Toby. 'They deal mostly with very small planes down there - one-man fighter planes, I think. Don't be scared if you hear noises from the airfield sometimes - bangs and bursts. I don't know what they are, of course - it's all to do with their experiments.'

'I wish I could visit the airfield,' said Dick. 'I'm keen on planes. I'm going to fly one when I'm older.'

'You'd better meet my cousin, then,' said Toby. 'He might take you up in one.'

'I should like to meet him,' said Dick, delighted. 'So would Julian.'

'We'd better get on now,' said Julian, standing up. 'We won't go much higher - the view can't be much better anywhere else!'

George and Anne went on ahead to find a good camping-place, while the three boys pushed the cart slowly over the heather. But it was Timmy who found the right place! He ran on ahead, feeling thirsty, so when he heard the sound of running water he ran to it at once.

From under a jutting rock gushed a little spring. It rippled down a rocky shelf and lost itself in a mass of lush greenery below. Rushes grew to mark the way it went, and George's sharp eyes could follow its path for quite a long way down the hill, outlined by the dark line of rushes.

'Julian! Look what Timmy's found!' she called as she watched him lap from the clear spring water. 'A little spring gushing out of the hillside! Hadn't we better camp near it?'

'Jolly good idea!' shouted back Julian, and left the hand-cart to come and see. 'Yes, this is just the place! A fine view - plenty of spring heather to camp on - and water laid on quite near!'

Everyone agreed that it was a fine place, and soon all the gear was taken from the hand-cart. The tents were not erected, for everyone meant to sleep under the stars that night, the evening was so warm. Nobody wanted to lie in a stuffy tent!

Anne unpacked the food parcel, wondering where would be the coolest place for a 'larder'. She went over to the rock from which gushed the crystal-clear spring water. She pushed away the rushes around and discovered a kind of small cave hollowed out of the rock below the spring.

'It would be as cool as anything in there,' thought Anne, and put her hand through the falling water into the cave-like hole. Yes, it was icy cold! Was it big enough to hold the milk bottles and everything? Just about, she thought.

Anne loved arranging anything, and she was soon at work putting away the food and the milk into her queer larder. George laughed when she saw it.

'Just like you, Anne!' she said. 'Well, we'd better put a towel by the spring, for certainly we shall get soaked every time we get out any food!'

'Tell Timmy he's not to try and poke his head into my larder,' said Anne, pushing Timmy away. 'Oh, now he's all wet. Go and shake yourself somewhere else, Timmy - you're showering me with drops of water!'

Toby had to leave them, for it was already past his supper-time. 'See you tomorrow!' he said. 'How I wish I was staying up here with you! So long!'

Away he went down the hill with Binky at his heels. The Five looked at one another and grinned. 'He's nice - but it's good to be alone again - just us Five,' said George. 'Come on - let's settle in. This is the best camp we've ever had!'

Chapter 5

THE FIRST NIGHT - AND A MORNING VISITOR

'What's the time?' said Julian, looking at his watch. 'Good gracious - it's almost eight o'clock! Anyone feel tired?'

'Yes,' said Dick, Anne and George, and even Timmy joined in with his deepest 'Woof'.

'With all that bicycling and then pushing that heavy cart up the hill, I can hardly move!' said Dick. 'I vote we have a simple supper - something out of Anne's little larder - and then spread our rugs over some thick heather and sleep under the sky. Even up here, with a breeze, it's warm. I should be stifled in a tent.'

'Well, we're all agreed on that,' said Julian. 'Anne, what do you suggest for a light supper?' 'Bread, butter and some of Mrs. Thomas's farm cheese,' said Anne promptly. 'With a tomato or two if you like - and icy-cold milk and Benny's strawberries to finish with. That is - if the milk has had time to get cold in the little hole under the spring.'

'Sounds jolly good,' said Julian. 'What do you think, Timmy? Anne, if you and George get the supper ready, Dick and I will prepare our heathery beds. Then we can all turn in as soon as possible. I honestly feel that once I sit down or lie down I'll not be able to get up again!'

'Same here,' said Dick, and went off with Julian to find the best place for sleeping. They soon found one. They came across a giant of a gorse bush, thick, prickly and still full of golden blooms. In front of it was a stretch of very close-set heather, as springy as the best mattress in the world. Dick sat down on it and grinned at Julian.

'Just made for us!' he said. 'We shall sleep like tops here. We hardly need a rug to lie on, it's so close-grown. Help me up, Ju - my legs won't do anything now I've sat down!'

Julian pulled him up and they called to the girls: 'Anne! George! Bring the supper here. We've found a good place. It's by this giant gorse bush.'

The girls came along with the meal, and the boys fetched a couple of rugs from the pile of things that they had brought in the hand-cart. They spread them on the heather.

'I say! This certainly is a good place,' said George, coming up with Anne and Timmy, carrying a loaf of bread, a pat of butter and tomatoes. Anne had the milk and the cheese. Timmy was carrying a little bag of his own biscuits.

'The gorse bush will shelter us from too much wind,' said Dick, taking the milk from Anne. 'It's an ideal spot - and the view is superb.'

It was a very happy supper they had, sitting in the heather, while the sun sank lower and lower in the west. The evenings were very light now, and certainly they would not need candles! They finished up everything, and then went to wash at the little spring that bubbled out so cheerfully.

They lay down on their rugs in the heather while it was still daylight. 'Good night!' said Dick, and promptly fell fast asleep. 'Good night!' called Julian, and lay for a few seconds looking at the view, which was now becoming dim and blue.

Timmy kept the two girls awake for a minute or two, trying to squeeze in between them. 'Do keep still, Timmy,' said George. 'And just remember you're on guard, even though I don't expect there is anyone nearer than a mile - and that will be at Billycock Farm! Lie still now, or I'll push you off the rug! Good night, Anne.'

George was soon asleep, and so was Timmy, tired out with so many miles of running. Anne lay awake for a few minutes, looking at the evening star which shone large and golden in the sky. She felt very happy. 'I don't want to grow up,' she thought. 'There can't be anything nicer in the world than this - being with the others, having fun with them. No - I don't want to grow up!

Then she, too, fell asleep, and night came quietly down, with stars brilliant in the sky, and very little noise to be heard anywhere - just the gurgling of the spring some way away, and the far-off bark of some dog - perhaps Binky at the farm. The breeze died down, so that even that could not be heard.

No one except Timmy awoke at all that night. Timmy put up one ear when he heard a squeak just above his head. It came again and he opened one eye. It was a small black bat circling and swooping, hunting for insects. Its squeak was so high that only Timmy's quick ear caught it. He put down his listening ear and went to sleep again.

Nobody stirred until a very loud noise awakened them. R-r-r-r-r-r-r-r-r! R-r-r-r-r-r-r-r-r! They all woke up with a jump and the boys sat up straight, startled. What could it be?

'It's a plane,' said Julian, staring up at a small aeroplane flying over the hill. 'It must be one from that airfield down there! I say - it's five past nine! Five past nine - we've slept for nearly twelve hours!'

'Well, I'm going to sleep for some more,' said Dick, snuggling down into his heathery bed again and shutting his eyes.

'No, you're not,' said Julian, giving him a shove. 'It's too good a day to waste in any more sleep. Hey, you girls - are you awake?'

'Yes,' called George, sitting up, rubbing her eyes. 'That aeroplane wakened me. Anne's awake, too - and you can see that Timmy is; he's gone after a rabbit or something.'

'We'll all go and wash at the spring,' said Anne, scrambling off the rug. 'And George and I will get breakfast. Anyone like a boiled egg?'

The sun shone down out of a blue sky, and the little breeze awoke and began to blow again. They washed in the cold water, and Timmy drank it, lapping it thirstily as it splashed down over his nose. Then they had their breakfast.

It was easy to make a little fire in the shelter of the giant gorse bush, and boil the eggs in the saucepan. Bread and butter and tomatoes completed the simple meal, with cold creamy milk to wash it down.

In the middle of this Timmy began to bark frantically, but as his tail was wagging all the time, the others guessed that it must be Toby coming. They heard Binky's answering bark, and then the dog himself appeared, panting and excited. He greeted Timmy first of all, and then ran round to give everyone a lick.

'Hallo, hallo, hallo!' came Toby's voice, and he appeared round the gorse bush. 'Had a good night? I say, aren't you late - still having your breakfast? My word, you're sleepy-heads! I've been up since six. I've milked cows and cleaned out a shed, and fed the hens and collected the eggs.'

The Five immediately felt ashamed of themselves! They gazed at Toby in admiration - why, he was quite a farmer!

'I've brought you some more milk, bread and eggs and cake,' he said, and put down a basket.

'Jolly good of you,' said Julian. 'We must pay for any food we get from your farm, you know that. Any idea of how much we owe for yesterday's food and for what you've brought today?'

'Well, my mother says you don't need to pay her,' said Toby. 'But I know you mean to - so I suggest that you pay me each time and I'll put the money into a box and buy my mother a smashing present at the end - from you all. Will that do?'

'That's a good idea,' said Julian. 'We couldn't possibly accept food if we didn't pay for it - but I know what mothers are - they don't like being paid in money for their kindness! So we'll do what you say. Now, reckon up what we owe so far, and I'll pay you.'

'Right,' said Toby in a business-like way. 'I'll charge you market prices, not top prices. I'll just tot up the bill while you're cleaning up and putting away what I've brought.'

The girls washed-up in the spring, and the boys carried everything there for Anne to put in her 'larder'. Toby presented Julian with a neatly-written bill, which he at once paid. Toby receipted the bill and gave it back.

'There you are - all business-like,' he said. 'Thanks very much. What are you going to do today? There are super caves to be explored if you like - or there's the Butterfly Farm - or you can just come down to our farm for the day.'

'No, not today,' said Julian, afraid that they might make themselves a nuisance to Mrs. Thomas. 'I don't feel like seeing caves this morning either - so dark and eerie on such a sunny day. What shall we do, girls?'

But before they could decide Binky and Timmy began to bark, each dog standing quite still, facing the same way - towards the giant gorse bush.

'Who is it, Tim?' asked George. 'Go and see! Go on, then!'

Timmy ran behind the bush, followed by Binky, and then the children heard a surprised voice.

'Hallo, Binky! What are you doing all the way up here? And who's your friend?'

'It's Mr. Gringle,' said Toby. 'One of the men who own the Butterfly Farm. He's often up here with his net, because it's a wonderful place for butterflies.'

A man came round the gorse bush - rather a peculiar figure, untidy, with glasses slipping down his nose, and his hair much too long. He carried a big butterfly net and stopped when he saw the five children.

'Hallo!' he said. 'Who are all these, Toby? Quite a crowd!'

'Friends of mine, Mr. Gringle,' said Toby solemnly. 'Allow me to introduce them. Julian Kirrin, Dick Kirrin, Anne Kirrin, George Kirrin, their cousin - and their dog Timothy.'

'Ha - pleased to meet you!' said Mr. Gringle, and came shambling forward, his big butterfly net over his shoulder. Behind his glasses shone curiously bright eyes. He nodded his head to each of the four cousins. 'Three boys - and a girl. Very nice lot, too. You don't look as if you'll leave litter about or start fires in this lovely countryside.'

'We shouldn't dream of it,' said George, delighted that he had thought she was a boy. Nothing pleased George as much as that! 'Mr. Gringle - could we see your Butterfly Farm, please? We would so like to!'

'Of course, my dear boy, of course,' said Mr. Gringle, and his eyes shone as if he were very pleased. 'We don't often have visitors, so it's quite an event when somebody comes along. This way, this way!'

Chapter 6

THE BUTTERFLY FARM

Mr. Gringle led the way down the hill by a little path so overgrown that it was hardly possible to see it. Halfway down the little company heard a squealing noise - and then an excited little voice.

'Toby, Toby! I'm here! Can I come with you?'

'It's Benny - and the pigling!' said Anne, amused at the little couple making their way excitedly towards them. Timmy ran to Curly and sniffed him all over, still not quite sure that he wasn't some kind of strange Puppy.

'What are you doing up here?' said Toby sternly. 'You know you're not supposed to wander too far from the farm. You'll get lost one of these days, Benny.'

'Curly runned away,' said Benny, looking up at his big brother with wide brown eyes.

'You mean you wanted to find out where I'd gone so you came after me with Curly,' said Toby.

'Curly runned away, he runned fast!' said Benny, looking as if he was going to cry.

'You're a scoundrel, Benny,' said Toby. 'You make that pigling of yours an excuse for getting about all over the place. You wait till Dad hears it - you'll get such a spanking. Well - tail on to us now - we're going to the Butterfly Farm. And if Curly runs away, let him! I'm tired of that pig.'

'I'll carry him,' said Benny, and picked up the little creature in his arms. But he soon had to put him down, for Curly squealed so loudly that Timmy and Binky both leapt round him in great concern.

'Hm - well - shall we proceed?' asked Mr. Gringle, walking on in front. 'Quite a party we have today.'

'Are your butterflies afraid of pigs or dogs?' asked Benny, trotting beside him. 'Shall we leave them outside?'

'Don't ask idiotic questions, Benny,' said Toby. Then he gave a cry and caught Mr. Gringle's arm.

'I say sir - look at that butterfly. Don't you want to catch it? Is it rare?'

'No,' said Mr. Gringle rather coldly. 'It's a meadow-brown - very common indeed. Don't they teach you anything at school? Fancy not knowing that!'

'Julian, do we have any butterfly lessons?' asked Toby with a grin. 'I say, Mr. Gringle, what about you coming and teaching us about Cabbage Butterflies and Cauliflower Moths, and Red Admirals and Blue Captains and Peacock Butterflies and Ostrich Moths and...'

'Don't be an ass, Toby,' said Julian, seeing that Mr. Gringle had no sense of humour at all, and did not think this in the least funny. 'Mr. Gringle, are there many rare butterflies about here?'

'Oh, yes, yes,' said the Butterfly Man. 'But not only that - there are so many of all kinds here, and it is easy to catch as many as I want for breeding purposes. One butterfly means hundreds of eggs, you know - and we hatch them out and sell them.'

He suddenly made a dart to one side, almost knocking George over. 'Sorry, boy!' he said, making the others smile, 'sorry! There's a Brown Argus there - a lovely specimen, first I've seen this year! Stand clear, will you.'

The children - and the dogs, too - stood still as he tiptoed towards a small dark brown butterfly spreading its tiny wings as it sat on a flowering plant. With a swift downwards swoop the net closed over the plant, and in a trice the Butterfly Man had caught the fluttering insect. He pinched the net inwards, and showed the children the tiny creature.

'There you are - a female Brown Argus, one of the family of the Blue Butterflies you see so often in full summer. She'll lay me plenty of eggs and they'll all hatch into fat little slug-like caterpillars, and...'

'But this isn't a blue butterfly,' said Anne, looking through the fine net. 'It's dark brown, with a row of pretty orange spots along the margins of its wings.'

'All the same, it belongs to the Blue Butterfly family,' said Mr. Gringle, taking it out with the gentlest of fingers and putting it into a tin case slung round his shoulders. 'It's probably come up from one of those hay meadows down in the valley there. In you go, my little beauty!'

'Mr. Gringle, quick - here's a most lovely butterfly!' called George. 'It's got greeny-black front wings with red spots, and lovely red back wings with dark green borders. Oh, quick - I'm sure you want this one!'

'That's not a butterfly,' said Dick, who knew a good deal about them.

'I should think not!' said Mr. Gringle, getting his net poised ready to swoop. 'It's a moth - a lovely little thing!' Down went his net and the pretty little red and green insect fluttered in surprise inside it.

'But moths don't fly in the daytime,' argued George. 'Only at night.'

'Rubbish!' said Mr. Gringle, looking at the moth through the thick lens of his glasses. 'What are boys coming to nowadays? In my boyhood nearly every boy knew that there are night-time and day-time ones as well!'

'But,' began George again, and stopped as Mr. Gringle gave her quite a glare.

'This is a Six-Spot Burnet Day-Flying Moth,' he said, speaking slowly as if he were addressing a very small child. 'It loves to fly in the hot sunshine. Please do not argue with me. I don't like ignorance of this sort.'

George looked rather mutinous and Dick nudged her. 'He's right, fat-head,' he said in a low voice. 'You don't know much about moths, so say nothing, George, or he won't let us go with him.'

'I'd like two or three more of these Six-Spots highly-coloured and unusually large. Perhaps you would see if you can find any more, all of you.'

Everybody began to look here and there, and to shake any little bush or clump of grass they passed. Timmy and Binky were most interested in this and began a hunt on their own, sniffing and snuffling everywhere, not quite sure what they were looking for, but enjoying it all the same. Mr. Gringle took a long time to get to his Butterfly Farm, and the children began to wish they hadn't asked to go. There was so much sidestepping to see this and that, so much examining when a specimen was caught, so much 'talky-talk', as Dick whispered to Anne.

'Do you keep your butterflies and moths in those glass-houses?' asked Julian.

'Yes,' said Mr. Gringle. 'Come along - I'll show you what I and my friend Mr. Brent do. He's away today, so you can't meet him.'

It was certainly a queer place. The cottage looked as if it were about to fall down at any moment. Two of the windows were broken and some tiles had fallen off the roof. But the glass-houses were in good repair, and the glass panes were perfectly clean. Evidently the Butterfly Men thought more of their butterflies and moths than they did of themselves.

'Do you live here all alone with Mr. Brent, your friend?' asked Dick curiously, thinking that it must be a strange and lonely life.

'Oh, no. Old Mrs. Janes does for us,' said Mr. Gringle. 'And sometimes her son comes here to do any small repairs, and to clean all the glass of the butterfly houses. There's the old lady, look. She can't bear insects of any sort, so she never comes into the glass houses.'

An old woman, looking exactly like a witch, peered out at them through a window in the cottage. Anne was quite scared to see her. Toby grinned. 'She's quite harmless,' he said to Anne. 'Our cook knows her because she often comes to us for eggs and milk. She's got no teeth at all, so she mutters and mumbles and that makes her seem more like a witch than ever.'

'I don't much like the look of her,' said Anne, going thankfully into the first of the butterfly houses. 'Oh - what a lot of butterflies!'

There certainly were! Hundreds were flying about loose, and many others were in little compartments either by themselves or with another butterfly to match.

The children saw that many bushes and plants were growing in the glass-house, and on some of them were placed long sleeves made of muslin, tied in at each end.

'What's in these long sleeves of fine muslin?' asked Dick. 'Oh - I see. They are full of caterpillars! My word, how they are eating, too!'

'Yes. I told you we breed butterflies and moths,' said Mr. Gringle, and he opened the end of one of the muslin bags, so that the visitors could see the caterpillars better. 'These are the caterpillars of one kind of butterfly; they feed on this particular plant.'

The children gazed at scores of green caterpillars, marked with red and yellow spots, all eating greedily on the leaves of the twig enclosed there. Mr. Gringle undid another of the muslin bags and showed them some huge caterpillars, each of them green, with purple stripes on the side and a curious black horn on the tail end.

'Privet-Hawk Moth Caterpillars,' said Mr. Gringle, and Julian and Dick nodded. They knew these big green caterpillars quite well.

'Why is the moth called Privet-Hawk?' asked Anne. 'There are so many different Hawk-moths, I know. I've often wondered why they are all called Hawk.'

Mr. Gringle beamed at Anne, evidently thinking that this was a quite intelligent question, 'Haven't you ever seen a Hawk Moth flying?' he said. 'No? Well, it flies very strongly indeed. Oh, a most striking flight - like the flight of the bird called a hawk, you know.'

'You're not feeding the caterpillars on privet, though,' said George. 'But you said they were privet-hawks.'

'There isn't any privet growing near here,' said Mr. Gringle. 'So I give them elder - this is an elder bush which I planted in the glass-house. They like it just as much.'

The Butterfly Farm was certainly interesting, and the children wandered about the glass-house watching caterpillars of all kinds, admiring the lovely specimens of butterflies, and marvelling at the collection of curious-shaped chrysalides and cocoons that Mr. Gringle kept carefully in boxes, waiting for the perfect insect, moth or butterfly, to emerge.

'Like magic,' he said in an awed voice, his eyes shining behind his glasses. 'Sometimes, you know, I feel like a magician myself - and my butterfly net is a wand!'

The children felt rather uncomfortable as he said this, waving his butterfly net to and fro like a wand. He really was rather a queer person.

'It's terribly hot in here,' said Julian suddenly. 'Let's get into the fresh air. I've had enough. Good-bye, Mr. Gringle, and thank you!'

Out they all went and drew in deep breaths of fresh air. And then they heard a croaking voice behind them.

'Get out of here!' said the voice. 'Get out!'

Chapter 7

MRS. JANES - A SPIDER - AND A POOL

Timmy growled, and so did Binky. The children swung round and saw the old witch-like woman standing there, her wispy grey hair hanging over her face.

'What's the matter, Mrs. - er - Mrs. Janes?' said Julian, fortunately remembering the name Mr. Gringle had told him. 'We're not doing any harm.'

'My son don't like strangers here,' said Mrs. Janes, mumbling so much that the children could hardly understand what she was saying.

'But this place belongs to Mr. Gringle surely, and his friend,' said Dick, puzzled.

'I tell 'ee my son don't hold with strangers here,' mumbled the old woman again and shook her fist at them.

Timmy didn't like this, and growled. She at once pointed her finger at him and muttered a long string of such queer-sounding words that Anne shrank back, afraid. Really, Mrs. Janes did look exactly like a witch - and sounded like one, too.

Timmy acted strangely. He put his tail down, stopped growling and crept close to George. She was most astonished.

'It looks as if she's trying to put a spell on old Tim,' said Dick, half laughing, but that was too much for Anne and George.

Taking Timmy by the collar, George rushed off quickly with Anne following. The boys laughed. Binky ran after Timmy, and Toby spoke boldly to the queer old woman.

'Your son isn't even here - so what business is it of his to tell you to give orders to visitors?'

Tears suddenly began to pour down the old woman's face and she wrung her bony hands together. 'He'll hit me,' she wept. 'He'll twist my arm! Go away! Do go away! If he comes, he'll chase you off. He's a bad man, my son is!'

'She's mad, poor old thing,' said Toby, feeling sorry for old Mrs. Janes. 'Our cook often says so, though she's harmless enough. Her son's not too bad - he's quite handy at repairs, and we used to have him come to the farm to mend roofs and things like that. But he's not so good as he used to be. Come on - let's go. Mr. Gringle's a bit queer, too, isn't he?'

They went off after the two girls, Julian still feeling uncomfortable and distressed.

'What's Mr. Gringle's friend like - the one who helps him?' asked Julian.

'I don't know. I've never seen him,' said Toby. 'He's away mostly, doing the business side, I think - selling specimens of eggs, caterpillars and so on - and the perfect moths and butterflies, too, of course.'

'I'd like to see that Butterfly House again, but Mr. Gringle gets on my nerves,' said Dick. 'Those brilliant eyes behind those thick glasses. You'd think that if they were as bright and piercing as that he wouldn't need to wear any glasses at all!'

'Hey, George - Anne!' shouted Julian. 'Wait for us - we're just coming.' They caught up the girls and Julian grinned at George.

'You thought old Timmy was going to be changed into a black beetle or something, didn't you?' he said.

'No, of course not,' said George, going red. 'I just didn't like her very much - pointing her finger like that at Timmy. No wonder he growled.'

'You didn't hear what she said about her son,' said Dick. 'She began to cry like anything after you'd gone, and say that her son would beat her and twist her arm if we didn't go - and he's not even there!'

'She's mad,' said George. 'I don't want to go there again. What are we going to do now?'

'Go up to our camping-place and have our lunch,' said Julian promptly. 'Come with us, Toby - or have you got jobs to do at the farm?'

'No. I've done them all,' said Toby. 'I'd love to have a meal with you up on the hill.'

It wasn't very long before they were back at their camping-place. Everything was as they had left it - mats neatly under the gorse bush with the rugs and other little things - and the food in Anne's 'larder' waiting for them.

The meal was very hilarious, as Toby was in one of his silly moods, and produced some idiotic jokes. The most successful one was a large imitation spider with shaky legs, which, while Anne and George had gone to get the food, he hung by a thin nylon thread to a spray on the nearby gorse bush. Dick grinned broadly.

'Wait till Anne sees that!' he said. 'George always says she doesn't mind spiders, but a big one like that is distinctly creepy.'

It certainly was. Anne didn't spot it until she was eating her strawberries, covered with some of the cream that Toby's mother had generously sent. Then she suddenly spied it, shaking slightly in the breeze, hanging by its thread just over George's head.

'Ooooooooh!' she squealed. 'Ooooh, George - be careful! There's a MONSTER spider just over your head!'

'What - is George scared of spiders?' cried Toby at once. 'Just like a girl!' George glared at him. 'I don't mind them at all,' she said coldly.

'I'm glad you aren't scared of them,' said Toby. 'I'd have to call you Georgina if you were. That's your right name, isn't it?'

'George - do move!' cried Anne, upsetting her strawberries in her anxiety. 'It's almost on your head, I tell you - its legs are wobbling as if they are going to settle on your hair. George, it's an ENORMOUS one! It might even be one of those foreign things - a tarantula or something!'

The wind blew a little just then and the spider moved about on the thread most realistically. Even Dick was glad it wasn't alive!

George couldn't resist looking up, pretending to be quite unmoved - but when she saw the enormous creature just above her she shot straight out of her place and landed on Toby's legs, making him spill his strawberries and cream.

'Now, now, Georgina,' said the annoying Toby, picking up his strawberries. 'You said you didn't mind spiders. I'll remove it for you, and you can go back to your place.'

'No, no - don't touch it - ugh!' cried Anne. But Toby, putting on a very brave face, leaned over and neatly took the spider off the gorse-bush, still swinging by its thread. He swung it near to Anne, who scrambled up at once.

Then he made it 'walk' over Dick's knee, and Timmy came to investigate at once. Binky came too, and snapped at it, breaking the nylon thread that held it.

'Ass!' said Toby, giving him a smack. 'My beautiful spider - my spinner of webs - my tame catcher of flies!'

'What - is it a tame one?' said Anne in horror.

'More or less,' said Toby, and put it carefully into his pocket, grinning all over his round face.

'That's enough, Toby,' said Julian. 'Joke's finished.'

George stared at Toby, her face growing crimson. 'A joke? A JOKE! You wait till I pay you out, Toby! I don't call that a joke. I call it a mean trick. You knew Anne hated spiders.'

'Let's change the subject,' said Dick hastily. 'What are we going to do this afternoon?'

'I know what I'd like to do,' said Julian longingly. 'I'd like a bathe. It's so jolly hot. If we were at Kirrin I'd be in the sea all the afternoon.'

'I wish we were at Kirrin,' said George sulkily.

'Well - if you really do want a bathe, I can take you to a pool,' said Toby, anxious to get into everyone's good books again.

'A pool? Where?' said Dick eagerly.

'Well - see that airfield down there?' said Toby, pointing. 'And see this spring here, where you get your water? It goes on and on running down the hill, joins two or three more little rivulets, and ends in a smashing pool not far from the airfield. Cold as ice it is, too. I've often bathed there.'

'It sounds jolly good,' said Julian, pleased. 'Well, we can't bathe immediately after a meal. The girls will want to do their bit of washing-up, and put the rest of the food away. We'll sit here and wait till they've finished, have a bit of a rest, and then go and find this pool.'

Everyone agreed to this, and the girls hurried off to the little spring.

'If Toby has any more idiotic tricks like that I'll play a few on him!' said George. 'In fact I've a good mind to pull him under in the pool.'

'He's all right, George,' said Anne. 'He's just like that at school, Dick says. He must drive the masters mad!'

They soon joined the boys and had a short rest, while Timmy and Binky went off amiably together to do a little hunting - sniping down holes and under bushes, looking very serious indeed. They came back immediately George whistled.

'We're going, Timmy,' said George. 'Here's your swim-suit, Dick, and yours, Julian. Good thing we brought them with us!'

'What about you, Toby? You haven't a swim-suit with you,' said Julian.

'We have to pass fairly near the farm,' said Toby. 'I'll leave you when we're near there and get mine - it won't take more than five minutes if I run all the way back.'

They set off down the hill towards the airfield. Except for the planes they had heard that morning, they had heard and seen none. It seemed a very quiet airfield.

'Wait till they start experimenting with the new fighter planes my cousin told me about!' said Toby. 'You'll hear a noise then - they're so fast they break the sound-barrier every time they go up!'

'Would your cousin let us look over the airfield one day?' asked Julian. 'I'd like to do that. It wouldn't interest the girls, but Dick and I would love it.'

'I should certainly like to go,' said George at once. 'It would interest me as much as you!'

'But you're a girl,' said Toby. 'Girls don't understand the first thing about aeroplanes or motor-cars or ships - or spiders either, come to that! I really don't think you'd be interested, Georgina dear.'

'My name is not Georgina,' said George furiously. 'And don't call me "dear".'

'Shut up, you two!' said Julian. 'It's too nice an afternoon to begin an argument. Look - isn't that your farm, Toby? We've got here jolly quickly - but it's all downhill, of course.'

'Yes,' said Toby. 'Come on, Binky - race you home and back. Shan't be long, Julian! Keep straight ahead, and walk towards that big pine-tree you can see in the distance. I'll be with you by the time you're there.'

He raced off at top speed, while the others went on slowly towards the pine-tree in the distance. It would be heavenly to bathe in a cold pool!

Toby was certainly a fast runner! Just before they reached the pine-tree he came up behind them, his swimsuit over his shoulder, so out of breath that he could hardly speak!

'It's over there,' he panted. 'Look - the pool!'

And sure enough, there was the pool - deep blue, cool and as smooth as glass. Trees surrounded it on one side, and heather grew right down to the edge.

The five children went towards it gladly - but suddenly they came to a big notice, nailed to a tree:

KEEP OUT DANGER

CROWN PROPERTY

'I say - what does that mean?' said Dick in dismay. 'We can't bathe after all!'

'Oh, take no notice of that,' said Toby. 'It doesn't mean a thing!'

But it did as they were very soon to find out!

Chapter 8

A SPOT OF TROUBLE

'What do you mean by saying that the notice doesn't mean a thing?' said Julian. 'Why put it up, then?'

'Oh, there are notices like that all round the airfield,' said Toby airily. 'Telling you to KEEP

OUT, there's DANGER. But there isn't. Only aeroplanes are here, no guns, no bombs, nothing. It's a jolly lonely place, too, tucked away at the foot of this hill.'

'Why don't you ask your cousin why they put up the notices?' asked Dick. 'There must be some reason!'

'I tell you those notices have been up for ages,' said Toby, sounding cross. 'Ages! They might have been some use at some time or other, but not now. We can bathe here and do what we like.'

'All right - but I hope you know what you're talking about,' said Julian. 'I must say I can't see any sense myself in putting notices here - there's no wire or fencing to keep anyone out.'

'Let's get into our bathing things, then,' said Dick.

'You girls can have that bush over there and we'll have this one. Buck up!'

They were soon changed into their swim-suits, and dived into the pool, which was surprisingly deep. It was also deliciously cool, and silky to the touch, just as the spring water had been. The two dogs leapt in gladly and swam vigorously round and round. The children splashed them, and Timmy began to bark excitedly.

'Shut up, Timmy!' said Toby at once.

'Why should he?' demanded George, swimming up.

'Well - someone at the airfield might hear him,' said Toby.

'You said it didn't matter us being here!' said George. 'Look out for yourself!' She dived underwater and got hold of Toby's legs, pulling him down. He yelled and kicked and spluttered, but George was strong and she gave him a very, very good ducking! He came up purple in the face.

'I said I'd pay you out for the spider!' yelled George, and swam strongly away. Toby swam after her, and she led him a fine dance round the pool, for she was a splendid swimmer. The others laughed at the contest.

'I back old George,' said Dick. 'She'd out-swim most boys. Well, she's put Toby in his place all right. He won't be so free with spiders and silly jokes for a while!'

Timmy began to bark again when he saw Toby chasing George, and Binky joined in.

'Shut up, Binky!' shouted Toby. 'I tell you STOP BARKING!'

Before Toby had obeyed, something happened. A stentorian voice came across the pool.

'What's all this! You're trespassing on Crown property. Didn't you see the notice?'

The dogs stopped barking and the five children looked round to see who was shouting. Their heads bobbed on the surface of the water as they gazed about to find the shouter.

It was a man in Air Force uniform, a big man, burly and red-faced.

'What's the matter?' called Julian, swimming towards him. 'We're only bathing. We're not doing any harm.'

'Didn't you see the notice?' shouted the man, pointing over to it.

'Yes. But we couldn't see much danger here,' called back Julian, wishing now that he hadn't believed Toby.

'You come on out!' roared the man. 'All of you, Come on.'

They all waded out of the cool pond, Anne feeling scared. The dogs splashed out, too, and stood eyeing the man grimly. He calmed down a little when he saw them.

'Those your dogs I heard barking? Well, now, I see you're all kids - though one of you's big enough to know better!' and he pointed to Julian. 'I thought may be you were trippers - thinking you could come wandering on the airfield and not get into trouble!'

'Trippers don't come here,' said Toby, squeezing the water out of his hair.

'Nor do sensible children,' retorted the man. 'I've had trouble from you before, haven't I? Yes. Didn't you come walking round the hangars bold as brass one day? And that dog with you, too?'

'I only went to see my cousin, Flight-Lieutenant Thomas,' said Toby. 'I wasn't doing any harm - I wasn't spying. I tell you I only went to see my cousin!'

'Well, I shall report you to him,' said the man, 'and tell him to give you a proper ticking off. We've strict instructions to warn off anyone - there're notices everywhere.'

'Is something hush-hush going on, then?' said Toby with a sudden grin.

'As if I'd tell you if there was!' said the man in disgust. 'Far as I can see, there's nothing much doing here - dull as ditch-water this place - and as far as I'm concerned I'd welcome a horde of trippers - it would liven up the place no end. But orders are orders, as you very well know.'

Julian thought it was about time that he should join in. The man was only doing his duty, and Toby was an ass to have said that the notices meant nothing.

'Well, we apologize for trespassing,' he said in his clear, pleasant voice. 'We shan't bathe here again, I promise you. Sorry to have made you come all this way to warn us off.'

The RAF guard looked at Julian with respect. There was something about the boy that reassured people, and the man now felt quite sure that it was all Toby's fault. He smiled and gave a sketchy salute.

'That's all right,' he said. 'Sorry to cut your bathe short this hot day. And - er - if that rogue of a boy here' - he pointed to Toby - 'if he cares to ask Flight-Lieutenant Thomas for permission to bathe in this pool at certain hours, it's okay by me. I shan't come running then when I hear dogs barking and a lot of shouting if I know you're allowed here at certain hours.'

'Thanks,' said Julian. 'But anyway we're only here for a few days.'

'So long,' said the man, who saluted them all and walked off smartly.

'Well,' said Toby, quite unashamed, 'what did he want to come messing about here for, spoiling our bathe? He said there wasn't anything secret going on, so why...'

'Oh, shut up!' said Dick. 'You heard what he said about orders being orders? He's not a silly schoolboy trying to be clever and getting out of doing his work - yes, like you do at school, Toby, and a good many of the others! He's a man in uniform. You'd better grow up a bit, young Toby.'

'I agree,' said Julian. 'So don't let's hear any more about it. You slipped up, Toby, and that's all there is to it. Now let's dry ourselves and go to the farm and ask your nice kind mother if she'll let us have some more food to take back to our camp with us. I'm as hungry as a hunter after our bathe.'

Toby was rather subdued after all this. He glanced at George to see if she was gloating over his ticking off, but George was never one to exult over anyone's downfall, and Toby felt relieved.

'Shall I ask my cousin if he'll get permission for us to bathe in the pool?' he said as they went away from the water, dry and dressed again.

'I think not,' said Julian. 'But I'd like to meet your cousin some time all the same.'

'He might take us up in a plane,' said Toby hopefully, his spirits rising at the thought. 'Oh, look there - here's that little wretch Benny again - and the pigling!'

Benny panted up, carrying the little pig. 'You look like Tom, Tom the Piper's Son,' said Julian, ruffling the yellow curls. 'He stole a pig and ran away, carrying it under his arm.'

'But this is my own pig,' said Benny, surprised. 'I didn't steal him. I came to find you, because my mother says come to tea.'

'You have got a nice mother!' said Anne, taking the small boy's hand. 'Why don't you put the pig down? He must be so heavy.'

'He runned away again,' said Benny severely. 'So I carried him.'

'Put a collar on his neck, with a lead,' suggested Dick.

'He hasn't got a neck,' said Benny, and indeed the pigling was so plump that his head joined his body without any neck at all.

The little procession made its way to the farm, and the pigling at once ran in front, squealing. It seemed surprised and delighted to find it was home again. Timmy pricked up his ears when it squealed. He thought that it must be in pain, and he was worried! He ran beside the little creature, trying to nuzzle it.

Mrs. Thomas saw them through the window. 'Come along in!' she said. 'I thought you might like to have tea here again today, because I've a visitor you'd like to meet!'

'Who is it?' cried Toby, running indoors. 'Oh! It's you, Cousin Jeff. Hey, Julian, Dick - look, it's my Cousin Jeff from the airfield - Flight-Lieutenant Thomas! The one I told you about! Cousin Jeff, meet my friends - Julian, Dick, Anne, Georgina - er, I mean George - and Timmy!'

A tall, good-looking young man stood up, smiling. The Five gazed at him, liking him very much indeed. What a fine young fellow - how strong - what keen straight eyes he had - what a cousin to possess! They all envied Toby at that moment. No wonder he had boasted about him so much!

'Hallo to you!' said Cousin Jeff. 'Glad to see you all. Hey - look at this dog!'

And well might everyone look, for Timmy had marched straight up to him and then held up a paw. 'Wuff!' he said, which, of course, meant 'Shake!'

'How do you do?' said Cousin Jeff solemnly, and shook paws with Timmy at once.

'Timmy's never done that before!' said George, astonished. 'Well - what a surprising thing! He must like you very much!'

Chapter 9

COUSIN JEFF

'I like dogs,' said Jeff, and patted Timmy on the head. 'This is a fine one - as smart as can be, too, isn't he?'

George nodded, pleased. She loved anyone to praise Timmy. 'Yes, he's very clever. He's been in heaps of adventures with us. He can be very fierce if he thinks anyone is going to attack us. Oh, look - he wants to shake hands again! Isn't he funny?'

Jeff shook paws once more and then Timmy settled down beside him, almost as if he considered himself to be his dog. George didn't mind. She liked Cousin Jeff as much as Timmy did!

'Tell us about your job,' begged Dick. 'It's such a queer airfield, the one you're at - no fencing round it, hardly any planes, nobody about the field! Do you do much flying?'

'Not much at the moment,' said Cousin Jeff. 'But don't be misled by the fact that there's no fencing round the airfield! Believe me, the commanding officer knows immediately if any stranger comes into the district, and - er - well, let us say that extra precautions are taken.'

'Really?' said George. 'Do you mean to say, for instance, that your commanding officer knows we've arrived?'

'You bet he does,' said Jeff, laughing. 'You've probably been given the once-over already, though you didn't know it. I expect someone has been detailed to find out who you are and why you're here, and you may even have been watched for a few hours - though you had no idea of it.'

This was rather a creepy thought. Watched? How? By whom? And where did they hide to watch? Dick asked Jeff these questions, but the young airman shook his head.

'Sorry. Can't answer,' he said. 'But you needn't worry, you're all right. May be my aunt here has said a few words about you - you never know!'

Mrs. Thomas smiled, but said nothing. She beckoned to Anne and George to help her to bring in the tea - just as good a one as they had had before. The girls bustled about, setting out cups and saucers, while the boys talked to Cousin Jeff and asked him eager questions about planes and flying and how this was done and that.

'I suppose you wouldn't take us up some time, Cousin Jeff, would you?' asked Toby at last.

'I don't think I'd be allowed to,' said Jeff. 'In fact I don't think I can even ask. You see, the planes there are pretty special - you can't go joy-riding in them and...'

'Of course we see,' said Julian hurriedly, afraid of embarrassing the friendly young airman. 'We wouldn't dream of bothering you. When are you going up next? Can we watch you from our camping-place?'

'Yes, I should think you could see me with field-glasses,' said Jeff, considering. 'I'll tell you the number of my plane - it's painted underneath it, of course, so you'll know it's me if you see it circling over the hill. But I shan't do any stunts, I'm afraid - like coming down low to you, or anything like that. Only fat-headed beginners do that.'

'We'll look out for you,' said Dick, quite envious of Toby for having such a fine young cousin. 'I don't expect you'll see us - but we'll wave anyway!'

Tea was now ready and they all drew up their chairs. Benny wandered in with his pigling under his arm, and set it down in the cat's basket, where it stayed quite peacefully, falling asleep and making tiny, grunting snores.

'Does the cat mind?' asked George, astonished, looking at the basket.

'Not a bit,' said Mrs. Thomas. 'It had to put up with two goslings last year in its basket - and something the year before...'

'A lamb,' said Toby.

'Oh, yes - and old Tinky - that's the cat - didn't seem to worry at all,' said Mrs. Thomas, pouring out creamy milk for everyone, even Cousin Jeff. 'I once found her curled up round the goslings one morning, purring loudly.'

'Good old Tinky!' said Toby. 'Where is she? I'd like to see what she thinks of Curly. She couldn't cuddle him - he takes up nearly all the basket, he's so plump.'

Tea was a merry meal, with Toby playing the fool, putting a spoonful of sifted sugar on the side of Anne's plate to eat with her crisp radishes instead of salt, and offering the salt to George to eat with her strawberries.

Both girls were listening so intently to Cousin Jeff that they didn't even notice what Toby had done, and he almost fell off his chair with laughing when he saw their faces. Salt with strawberries - ugh! Sugar and radishes - ugh!

'Funny boy, aren't you?' said George, annoyed at being tricked. 'You wait!' But Toby was too wily to be tricked and George had to give it up. Anyway, she couldn't bother with Toby when Cousin Jeff was talking about planes, his eyes shining with pleasure. Flying was his great love, and in listening to him all three boys there made up their minds to take it up as soon as ever they could!

Benny didn't listen much. He was more interested in animals than in planes. He ate his tea solemnly and watched his pigling in the cat's basket, occasionally leaning over to tap his mother's hand when he wanted to speak to her.

'Curly runned away again,' he told her solemnly. 'Right up to the horse-pond.'

'I thought I had told you not to go there,' said his mother. 'You fell in last time.'

'But Curly runned there,' said Benny, his big eyes looking very wide and innocent. 'I had to go after him, didn't I? He's my pigling.'

'Well, I shall spank Curly if he takes you to places you've been told not to go to,' said his mother.

'I can't let him grow up disobedient, can I?'

This needed thinking over, and Benny ate his tea with a serious face, ignoring the others. Anne looked at him several times, delighted with the solemn little boy and his funny ways. How nice it would be to have a small brother like that!

'Well, I must be off,' said Jeff when the meal was finished. 'Thanks most awfully for a super tea, Aunt Sarah - but then your teas always are super! I was jolly lucky to be stationed here so near to Billycock Farm! Well, so long, everyone! So long, Timmy!'

Everyone went with him to the gate, Timmy and Binky as well, and Benny awoke his little pig and carried him to the gate too, squealing and kicking. They all watched the tall, sturdy young airman striding away round the hill.

'Do you like him?' asked Toby proudly. 'Isn't he super? I'm awfully proud of him. He's supposed to be one of the cleverest flying men in the kingdom - did you know?'

'No, we didn't,' said Dick. 'But I'm not surprised. He's got eyes as keen as a hawk's, and he's heart and soul in his work! How lucky for you that he is stationed so near!'

'We'd better get back to our camp when the girls have helped your mother to clear away and wash-up,' said Julian, anxious not to outstay his welcome at the farm. 'Toby, can you pack us up a bit more food in case we don't see you tomorrow?'

'Right,' said Toby, and went off, whistling.

Benny appeared again with Curly running round his feet.

'Hallo!' said Dick with a grin, 'Is that pigling of yours running away again?'

Benny grinned back. 'If he runned away to your camp, would you be cross?' he asked, looking most innocently up at Dick.

'He mustn't do that,' said Dick seriously, guessing what was in the little boy's mind; he meant to go to find the camp himself, and then say that it was Curly who had 'runned away' there! 'You see, you might lose your way if you went so far.'

Benny said no more, but wandered off with his comical pet running in front of him. The boys went to find Toby to see if they could help him to pack food into a basket. 'We must pay his bill, too,' said Julian, feeling for his purse. 'It was a good idea of his to save up the money to buy his mother a present. She really is a darling.'

Soon the Five were on their way back to their camp again. Toby was left behind to do his usual jobs of collecting the eggs, washing them and grading them into sizes for the market. 'I'll be up tomorrow!' he called after them. 'We'll plan something good to do - may be visit the caves if you like!'

The four children went up the steep slope of Billycock Hill, talking, while Timmy ranged in front, sniffing everywhere as usual. And then suddenly a large butterfly sailed through the air, and came to rest on a flower of a blossoming elder bush, just in front of George - a butterfly that none of them had ever seen before.

'Look at that! What is it?' cried Anne in delight. 'Oh, what a beauty! Julian, what is it?'

'I've absolutely no idea!' said Julian, astonished. 'It may be an unusual Fritillary, though it's early in the year for those. That Butterfly Man - what's his name now? - Mr. Gringle - said that this hill was famous for rare butterflies, and I imagine this is pretty uncommon. It is a beauty, isn't it?'

They watched the butterfly opening and shutting its magnificent wings on the white blossom. 'We ought to try and catch it,' said Dick. 'I'm sure that Mr. Gringle would be thrilled. It might lay eggs for him and start a whole breed of uncommon butterflies in this country.'

'I've got a very thin hanky,' said Anne. 'I think I can catch it without harming its wings - and we'll put it into the little box that Toby filled with sugar lumps for us. Get it and empty it, Dick.'

In half a minute the butterfly was inside the box, quite unharmed, for Anne had been very deft in catching it.

'What a magnificent creature!' said Dick, shutting the box. 'Now come on - we'll give Mr. Gringle a surprise!'

'What about that witch woman - you know, Mrs. Janes, who looks exactly like a witch?' said Anne. 'I don't want to meet her again.'

'I'll tell her to jump on her broomstick and fly away!' said Julian with a laugh. 'Don't be silly, Anne - she can't hurt you.'

They went off round the hill, taking the little path down which Mr. Gringle had guided them. Soon they saw the reflection of the sun glittering on the glass-houses. Anne and George hesitated as they came near, and Timmy stopped, too, his tail down.

'Well, stay there, then,' said Dick, impatiently. 'Ju and I won't be long!' And off went the two boys together, while George and Anne waited in the distance.

'I hope they won't be long!' said Anne, worried. 'I don't know why I feel creepy here, but I do!'

Chapter 10
BUTTERFLY FARM AGAIN

Dick and Julian went to the glass-houses where the butterflies and caterpillars lived. They peered through the panes, but could see nobody there.

'Mr. Gringle must be in the cottage,' said Julian. 'Let's stand outside and call - he'll come out then. I don't much like Mrs. Janes.'

So they stood outside the tumble-down cottage and shouted: 'Mr. Gringle! Mr. Gringle!'

Nobody answered. No Mr. Gringle came out, but somebody pulled aside the corner of a window curtain upstairs and peeped out. The boys shouted again, waving at the window.

'Mr. Gringle! We've got a rare butterfly for you!'

The window opened and old Mrs. Janes looked out, seeming more witch-like than ever.

'Mr. Gringle's away!' she mumbled.

'What about his friend Mr. Brent - the one we didn't see?' shouted Dick. 'Is he in?'

The old woman stared at them, mumbled something else, and then disappeared very suddenly indeed from the window.

Dick looked at Julian in surprise.

'Why did she go so suddenly? Almost as if somebody pulled her roughly away? Julian, I don't like it.'

'Why? Do you think that son of hers is here - the one she said was cruel to her?' asked Julian, who was puzzled, too.

'I don't know,' said Dick. 'Let's snoop round a bit. Perhaps Mr. Gringle is somewhere about, whatever old Mrs. Janes says!'

They went round the corner of the house and peered into a shed. Nobody there. Then they heard footsteps and turned round hurriedly. A man was coming towards them, small and thin, with a pinched-looking face, and dark glasses. He carried a butterfly net, and nodded at the two boys.

'My friend Gringle is away,' he said. 'Can I do anything for you?'

'Oh - you're Mr. Brent, then?' said Dick. 'Look - we've found a rare butterfly. That's why we came!'

He undid the box in which the butterfly was peacefully resting, having found a tiny grain of sugar to feed on. Mr. Brent looked at it through his dark glasses.

'Hm! Hm!' he said, peering closely at it. 'Yes, very fine indeed. I'll buy it off you for five shillings.'

'Oh, you can have it for nothing,' said Dick. 'What is it?'

'Can't say without examining it closely,' said Mr. Brent, and took the box and put the lid on again.

'But isn't it some kind of Fritillary?' asked Julian. 'We thought it was.'

'Quite likely,' said Mr. Brent, and suddenly produced two half-crowns and shoved them at Dick.

'Here you are. Much obliged. I'll tell Mr. Gringle you came.'

He turned abruptly and went off, his butterfly net still over his shoulder. Dick stared at the two half-crowns in his hand, then at the receding back of Mr. Brent. 'What a queer fellow!' he said.

'Well, I must say that he and Mr. Gringle are a pair! What are we to do with this five shillings, Julian? I don't want it!'

'Let's see if we can give it to that poor Mrs. Janes,' said Julian, always generous. 'She looks as if they paid her only about a shilling a week, poor soul!'

They went round to the front of the house, hoping to find the old woman, and after a little hesitation knocked at the door. It opened and she stood there, mumbling as before.

'You go away! My son's coming back. He'll hit me. He don't like strangers. You go away, I say!'

'All right,' said Dick. 'Look - here's something for you,' and he pressed the two half-crowns into her claw-like hand. She looked at them as if she couldn't believe her eyes, and then, amazingly quickly, she slipped the money into one of her broken-down shoes. When she stood up her eyes were full of tears.

'You're kind,' she whispered, and gave them a little push. 'Yes, you're kind. Keep away from here. My son's a bad man. Keep away!'

The boys went off silently, not knowing what to make of it. After all, Toby knew the son - they had employed him at the farm. Why did the old woman keep saying he was bad and cruel? She must be at least a little mad to talk like that!

'It must be a queer household,' said Julian as they went to join the waiting girls. 'Two Butterfly Men, both rather peculiar. One old witch-like woman, very peculiar. And a son who seems to terrify her out of her wits! I vote we don't go there again.'

'So do I,' said Dick. 'Hallo, you two - did we keep you waiting long?'

'You did rather,' said Anne. 'We were just about to send Timmy to look for you! We thought you might have been turned into mice, or something!

The boys told the two girls about Mr. Brent and the five shillings and old Mrs. Janes. 'A funny household, altogether,' said Dick. 'We think we'll give it a miss now, however many rare butterflies we spot! I'm pretty certain that the one we found was a kind of Fritillary, aren't you, Julian?'

'Yes, I was surprised Mr. Brent didn't say so,' said Julian. 'I have a feeling that Mr. Gringle is the expert of the two. Mr. Brent probably does the donkey-work - sees to the caterpillars and so on.'

They came to their camp at last, and Timmy at once went to the 'larder'. But Anne shook her head. 'No, Tim - it's not nearly supper-time, Bad luck!'

'What shall we do?' asked Dick, flinging himself down on the heather. 'It's another heavenly evening!'

'Yes - but I don't much like the look of the sky over to the west tonight,' said Julian. 'See those clouds there, coming up slowly against the wind? It looks like rain tomorrow to me!'

'Blow!' said George. 'The weather might have lasted for just one week! Whatever shall we do if it pours? Sit in our tents all day, I suppose!'

'Cheer up - we could go and see the caves,' said Dick. 'I know what we'll do now! We'll get out our portable radio and turn it on. If there's some decent music, it will sound glorious up here!'

'All right. But for goodness' sake have it on softly,' said Anne. 'I loathe people who take radios out into the country with them, and switch them on loudly, so that it spoils the peace and quiet for everyone else. I could go and kick their radios to pieces!'

'Gracious, Anne - you do sound fierce!' said George, looking at her cousin in surprise.

'You don't know our quiet sister Anne quite as well as we do, George,' said Julian, with a twinkle in his eyes. 'She can be really fierce if she thinks anyone is spoiling things for others. I had to stop her once from going up to scold people at a picnic - they actually had a gramophone going full-pelt, in spite of the angry looks from people all round. I do believe she meant to take off the gramophone record and break it over somebody's head!'

'Oh, Julian! How can you say such a thing!' said Anne. 'I did feel like it - but I didn't do it.'

'All right, young Anne!' said Julian affectionately, and patted her head. Both he and Dick thought the world of their quiet, kind little sister and looked after her well. She smiled at them.

'Well - let's have some music, then,' she said. 'There's the Pastoral Symphony on sometime this evening, I know, because I made a note of it. It would sound beautiful out here in this lovely countryside with that view spreading for miles in front of us. But softly, please.'

Julian fetched the little radio set and took it out of its waterproof case. He switched on, and a voice came loudly from the set. Julian lowered the volume to make it softer. 'It's the seven o'clock news,' he said. 'We'll hear it, shall we?'

But it was almost the end of the news, and the voice soon stopped to give way to an announcer. Yes - it was going to be the Pastoral Symphony now. Soon the first notes came softly from the little radio, and it seemed to set the countryside around to music. The four settled down in the heather to listen, lying half-propped up to watch the changing colours of the view in front of them as the sun sank lower.

The bank of cloud on the horizon was higher now, and the sun would soon slip behind it, for it was coming up fast. What a pity!

And then, cutting across the music, came another sound - the sound of an aeroplane.

R-r-r-r-r-r! R-r-r-r-r-r! R-r-r-r-r-r!

It sounded so very loud that Dick and Julian leapt to their feet, and Timmy began to bark loudly.

'Where is it?' said Dick, puzzled. 'It sounds so jolly near. I wonder if it's Cousin Jeff's!'

'There it is - coming up over the back of the hill!' said Julian, and as he spoke a small aeroplane appeared over the brow of the hill, and circled once before it flew down to the airfield.

The four children could plainly see the number painted underneath. '5 - 6 - 9,' began Julian, and Dick gave a shout.

'It's Jeff's plane! It is - that's his number! Wave, everybody, wave!'

So they all waved madly, though they felt sure that Jeff wouldn't see them, tucked away in their camp on the hill-side. They watched the plane fly down to the airfield, circle round, and land neatly on the runway. It came to a stop.

Julian looked through his glasses and saw a small figure leap from the plane. 'I bet it's Jeff,' he said. 'Gosh - I do wish I had a plane to fly over the hills and far away!'

Chapter 11

A STORMY NIGHT

The Five soon began to prepare for their evening meal, and Timmy trotted about pretending to help, always hopeful of being allowed to carry a loaf of bread or piece of cold ham in his mouth. But he was never lucky!

As they sat eating their meal, Julian glanced uneasily at the western sky again. 'The rain's certainly coming,' he said. 'That cloud has covered half the sky now, and swallowed up the evening sun. I think we ought to put up the tents.'

'Blow! I suppose we ought,' said George.

'And we'd better do it quickly,' said Dick. 'I distinctly felt a nasty cold wind just then - the first really cold air since we came here. We shall certainly want to roll up in our rugs tonight!'

'Well, let's get the things out from under the old gorse-bush,' said Julian. 'It won't take long to put up the tents if we all get to work.'

In three-quarters of an hour the tents were up, set nicely in the shelter of the giant gorse-bush. 'A good, business-like job,' said Dick, pleased. 'It would take a hurricane to blow the tents away - we'll be quite all right here. Let's pull up some more heather and pile it in the tents. We shall want our rugs to wrap ourselves in, not to lie on tonight, so we might as well make our beds as soft as possible.'

They piled heather into the tents, spread their macs there, too, and then looked at the sky. Yes, there was no doubt about it - there was rain coming and probably a storm! Still, it might clear tomorrow, and be as fine as ever. If it wasn't they would go and explore the caves that Toby had told them about.

It was now almost dark and the children decided that they would all get into one tent and have the radio on again. They called Timmy, but he preferred to be outside.

They set the radio going - but almost immediately Timmy began to bark. George switched off at once.

'That's the bark he gives when somebody is coming,' she said. 'I wonder who it is?'

'Toby, to say we'd better go to the farm for the night,' guessed Dick. 'Mr. Gringle hunting for moths!' said Anne with a giggle.

'Old Mrs. Janes looking for things to make spells with!' said George.

Everyone laughed. 'Idiot!' said Dick. 'Though I must say this looks a night for witches!'

Timmy went on barking, and Julian put his head out of the tent. 'What's up, Tim?' he said. 'Who's coming?'

'Wuff, wuff,' said Timmy, not turning his head to Julian, but seeming to watch something or someone in the half-light.

'It may be a hedgehog he's seen,' said George from inside the tent. 'He always barks at them because he knows he can't pick them up.'

'Well - may be you're right,' said Julian. 'But I think I'll just go out and get Timmy to take me to whatever it is he's barking at. I feel I'd like to know. He obviously hears or sees something!'

He slid out of the tent-opening and went to Timmy. 'Come on, Tim,' he said. 'Who is it? What's upsetting you?'

Timmy wagged his tail and ran in front of Julian. He obviously had no doubts about where he was going. Julian followed him, stumbling over the heather and wishing he had brought his torch, for it was now half-dark.

Timmy ran some way down the hill towards the airfield, then rounded a clump of birch-trees and stopped. He barked loudly again. Julian saw a dark shadow moving there and called out.

'Who's there? Who is it?'

'It's only me - Mr. Brent,' said an annoyed voice, and Julian caught sight of a long stick with a shadowy net on the end. 'I've come out to examine our honey-traps before the rain comes and washes away the moths feeding there.'

'Oh,' said Julian. 'I might have thought of that when Timmy barked. Is Mr. Gringle about, too?'

'Yes - so if your dog barks again you'll know it's only us,' said Mr. Brent. 'We're often prowling around at night - this is just as good a hill for moths at night as it is for butterflies by day. Can't you stop that dog barking at me? Really, he's very badly trained.'

'Shut up, Tim,' ordered Julian, and Timmy obediently closed his mouth, but still stood stiffly, staring at the man in the darkness.

'I'm going on to our next honey-trap,' said the man. 'So you can take that noisy dog back to wherever you are camping.' Mr. Brent began to move away, flashing a torch in front of him.

'We're just up the hill,' said Julian. 'About a hundred yards. Oh - you've got a torch, I see. I wish I'd brought mine.'

The man said nothing more, but went slowly on his way, the beam of his torch growing fainter. Julian began to climb back up the hill to the tents, but in the growing darkness it was not easy! He missed his way and went much too far to the right. Timmy was puzzled and went to him, tugging gently at his sleeve.

'Am I going wrong?' said Julian. 'Blow! I'd soon get lost on this lonely hill-side. Dick! George!

Anne! Give a shout, will you? I don't know where I am.'

But he had wandered so far off the path that the three didn't hear him - and Timmy had to guide him for a good way before he saw the torches of the others flashing up above. He felt most relieved. He had no wish to be caught in a heavy rain-storm on the exposed side of Billycock Hill!

'Is that you, Julian?' called Anne's anxious voice. 'What a long time you've been! Did you get lost?'

'Almost!' said Julian. 'Like a fat-head I went without my torch - but Timmy here knew the way all right. I'm glad I'm back - it's just beginning to rain!'

'Who was Tim barking at?' asked George.

'One of the Butterfly Men - Mr. Brent, the one Dick and I saw today,' said Julian. 'I just caught the glint of his dark glasses in the half-light, and saw the butterfly net he carried. He said Mr. Gringle was out, too.'

'But whatever for, with a storm coming?' marvelled Anne. 'All the moths would be well in hiding.'

'They've come out to examine their moth-traps, as they call them,' said Julian. 'They spread sticky stuff like honey or something round the trunks of trees - and the moths fly down to it by the score. Then they come along and collect any they want to take back.'

'I see - and I suppose Mr. Brent was afraid the rain might wash away the clinging moths,' said Dick. 'Well, they'll both be caught in the storm, that's certain. Hark at the rain pelting down on the tent now!'

Timmy squeezed into the tent, not liking the sting of the heavy raindrops. He sat down by George and Anne.

'You do take up a lot of room in a small tent, Tim,' said George. 'Can't you make yourself a bit smaller?'

Timmy couldn't. He was a big dog, and rather a sprawly one. He put his wet head on George's knee and heaved a heavy sigh. George patted him.

'Humbug!' she said. 'What are you sighing about? Because you've finished your bone? Because it's raining and you can't go and sit and bark at anything moving on the hill?'

'What shall we do now?' said Julian, setting his torch on the radio set, so that it more or less lighted up the tent. 'There's nothing on the radio we want to hear.'

'I've got a pack of cards in the pocket of my mac,' said George, much to everybody's joy, and she got them out. 'Let's have a game of some sort.'

It was rather difficult in the small tent, with Timmy sometimes getting up just when all the cards were neatly dealt, and upsetting the piles. The storm grew fiercer and the rain tried its best to lash its way through the canvas of the little tent.

Then Timmy began to bark again, startling everyone very much. He climbed over legs and knees and poked his head out of the tent opening, barking loudly.

'Good gracious - you almost gave me a heart attack!' said Dick, pulling him back. 'You'll get soaked out there, Tim. Come back - it's only those mad Moth-men out there picking moths off rain-soaked honey-traps. Don't worry about them. They're probably enjoying themselves enormously.'

But Timmy simply would NOT stop barking, and even growled when Julian tried to drag him into the tent.

'Whatever's up with him?' said Julian, bewildered. 'Oh, stop it, Timmy! You're deafening us!'

'Something's upsetting him - something unusual,' said George. 'Listen - was that a yell?'

Everyone listened, but the rain was pelting down so hard that it was impossible to hear anything but the slashing rain and the wind.

'Well, we can't do much about it, whatever it is that's upsetting Timmy,' said Dick. 'We can't possibly go wandering about in this storm - we'd get soaked through and probably lost!'

Timmy was still barking, and George grew cross. 'Timmy! Stop! Do you hear me? I won't have it.'

It was so seldom that George was angry with him that Timmy turned in surprise. George pounced at his collar and dragged him forcibly into the tent. 'Now - be QUIET!' she commanded.

'Whatever it is, we can't do anything about it!'

Just then another noise rose above the howling of the wind and the torrents of rain, and the Five pricked up their ears at once, sitting absolutely still.

'R-r-r-r-r-r-r-r! R-r-r-r-r-r-r-r-r-r! R-R-R-R-R-R-R-R-R-R! R-R-R-R-R-R-R-R-R-R!'

They all looked round at one another. 'Aeroplanes!' said Dick. 'Aeroplanes! In this weather, too. Whatever is going on?'

Chapter 12

WHAT HAPPENED IN BILLYCOCK CAVES

The little company in the tent were amazed. Why should aeroplanes take off from the airfield in the middle of a stormy night?

'For experiments in storms, perhaps?' said Dick. 'No - that would be rather unnecessary.'

'Perhaps they were aeroplanes landing there, not leaving,' suggested Anne.

'Possibly - perhaps seeking the shelter of the airfield when they were caught in this storm,' said Dick. But Julian shook his head.

'No,' he said. 'This airfield is too far off the ordinary air-routes - nobody would bother about it; it's so small for one thing - more of a little experimental station than anything else. Any aeroplane in difficulties could easily go to a first-class airfield for shelter or help.'

'I wonder if Jeff went up in one of the two we heard,' said George.

Anne yawned. 'What about bedding down?' she said. 'This tent is so hot and stuffy that I feel half-asleep.'

'Yes - it's getting late,' said Julian, looking at his watch. 'You two girls and Timmy can have this tent - it will save you going out into the rain. Fasten the flap after we've gone - and yell if you want anything.'

'Right. Good night, Ju, good night, Dick,' said the girls, and the boys scrambled out into the rain. Anne fastened the flap of the tent, and wrapped her rug round her. She burrowed into her heathery bed and made herself comfortable. George did the same.

'Good night,' said Anne, sleepily. 'Keep Tim on your side. I can't bear him on my legs, he's so heavy.'

The Five slept soundly and awoke the next morning to a dismal scene of rain and dark clouds.

'How disappointing!' said Dick, peering out of his tent. 'We ought to have listened to the weather forecast to see if it would clear today. What's the time, Julian?'

'Just gone eight,' said Julian. 'My word, we are sleepy these days! Well, it's not raining so very hard now - let's see if the girls are awake, and put on our macs and go and wash at the spring.'

They all had breakfast - not quite so merry as usual, because it was a bit of a crowd in the tent and not nearly so much fun as having it in the sunshine. Still, the day might clear, and then they could go down to see Toby at the farm.

'I suppose we'd better go and explore those caves this morning,' said Dick, after breakfast. 'There's nothing else to do, and I refuse to play cards all morning.'

'We all refuse!' said George. 'Let's put on our macs and see if we can find the caves.'

'We can look at the map,' said Julian. 'It's a large-scale one. There must be a road or lane to them - they are quite well-known. They're probably round the hill a bit - lower down.'

'Well, never mind - we'll see if we can find them, and if we can't it won't matter. We shall have been for a walk!' said Dick.

They set off in a fine drizzle, walking through the damp heather, Timmy leaping in front.

'Everyone got torches!' said Dick suddenly. 'I've got mine. We'll need them in the caves!'

Yes, everyone had a torch - except Timmy, and he, as Anne pointed out, had eyes that were far better for seeing in the dark than any torch could ever be!

They made their way down the hill and then veered off to the north side - and came suddenly upon a wide, rather chalky path, where the heather had been cut well back.

'This rather looks as if it led somewhere,' said Julian, stopping.

'It might lead to an old chalk quarry,' said Dick, kicking some loose white lumps of chalk. 'Like the one near Kirrin.'

'Well, let's follow it up and see,' said George, and they went along it, kicking the lumps of chalk as they went. They rounded a corner and saw a notice.

TO BILLYCOCK CAVES

Warning

Keep only to the roped ways. Beware of losing your way in the unroped tunnels.

'This sounds good,' said Julian. 'Let's see - what did Toby tell us about the caves?'

'They're thousands of years old - they've got stalagmites and stalactites,' said George.

'Oh - I know what those are,' said Anne. 'They look like icicles hanging from the roof - while below, on the floor of the cave, other icicles seem to grow upwards to meet them!'

'Yes - the roof ones are stalactites and the ground ones are stalagmites,' said Dick. 'I simply never can remember which is which,' said Anne.

'It's easy!' said Julian. 'The stalactite icicles have to hold tight to the roof - and the stalagmite might some day join with the ones above them!'

The others laughed.

'I shall never forget which are which now,' said Anne.

The path they were following altered as they came near to the caves, and lost its chalky look. Just in front of the entrance the way was properly paved, and was no longer rough. The entrance was only about six feet high, and had over it a white board with two words painted very large in black.

BILLYCOCK CAVES

The warning they had read on the first notice they had come to was repeated on another one just inside the entrance. 'Read it, Tim,' said George, seeing him looking at it. 'And keep close to us!'

They went right in, and had to switch on their torches at once. Timmy was amazed to see the walls around him glittering suddenly in the light of the four torches. He began to bark, and the noise echoed all around in a very weird manner.

Timmy didn't like it, and he pressed close to George. She laughed. 'Come on, silly. These are only caves. You've been in plenty in your life, Timmy! Goodness - don't they feel cold! I'm glad of my mac!'

They passed through one or two small and ordinary caves and then came to a magnificent one, full of what looked like gleaming icicles. Some hung down from the roof, others rose up from the ground. In some places the one below had reached to the one hanging down, so that they had joined, making it look as if the cave was held up by great shining pillars.

'Oh!' said Anne, catching her breath. 'What a wonderful sight! How they gleam and shine!'

'It reminds me of cathedrals I have seen,' said Julian, looking up at the roof of the cave. 'I don't know why. All these finely-wrought pillars... come along, let's go into the next cave.'

The next one was smaller, but contained some splendid coloured 'icicles' that shone and gleamed in the light of the torches. 'It's like a cave in Fairyland,' said Anne. 'Full of rainbow colours!'

The following cave had no colour, but was of a dazzling white, walls, roof, floor and pillars. So many stalactites and stalagmites had joined that they almost formed a snow-white screen through which the children peered - only to see even more of the strange 'icicles'.

They came to a threefold forking of the ways. The centre one was roped, but the other two tunnels were not. The children looked down the unroped tunnels, stretching away so dark and quiet, and shivered. How awful to go down one and lose the way, never to be found again, perhaps!

'Let's go down the roped way,' said George. 'Just to see where it leads to - more caves, probably.' Timmy ran sniffing down one of the other ways, and George called him. 'Tim! You'll get lost!'

Come back.'

But Timmy didn't come back. He ran off into the darkness and the others felt cross. 'Blow him,' said Dick. 'What's he after? TIM! TIM!' The echoes took up the last word and sent it repeatedly up and down the passage.

Timmy barked in answer, and at once the place was full of weird barking, echoing everywhere and making Anne put her fingers to her ears.

'Woof-oof-oof-oof!' said the echoes, sounding as if a gang of dogs were barking madly in the caves. Then Timmy appeared in the light of their torches, looking extremely surprised at the enormous noise he had created with his barking.

'I shall put you on the lead, Timmy,' scolded George. 'Keep to heel now. Surely you understand what that word means after all these years?'

Timmy did. He kept faithfully to heel as the little company went along a narrow, roped tunnel and came out into a succession of dazzling caves, all linked together by little passages or tunnels. They kept only to those that were roped. Many of them were not, and the Five longed to see where they led to, but were sensible enough not to try.

And then, as they were examining what looked like a frozen pool, which reflected the snowy roof above like a mirror, a curious noise came to their ears. They straightened themselves and listened.

It was a whistling sound, high-pitched and shrill, that filled the cave, and filled their ear-drums, too, until they felt like bursting. It rose high, then died down - then rose again till the children were forced to put their hands to their heads - and died away.

Timmy couldn't bear it. He barked frantically and ran round and round like a mad thing. And then the second noise began - a howling! A howling that seemed to be tossed to and fro, and grew louder as the echoes threw it about from cave to cave! Anne clutched Dick, terrified.

'What is it?' she said. 'Quick, let's go!' And, led by an extremely scared Timmy, the Five raced pell-mell out of Billycock Caves as if a hundred dogs were after them!

Chapter 13
A DREADFUL SHOCK

The Five stood panting outside the entrance of the caves, feeling decidedly sheepish at having run away from a noise.

'Whew!' said Julian, mopping his forehead. 'That was decidedly weird. That whistling - it got inside my head. It was like a - like a police whistle gone mad or something. As for the howling... well.'

'It was horrible,' said Anne, looking quite pale. 'Like wild animals. I'm not going into those caves again for anything. Let's get back to the camp.'

They walked soberly down the chalk-strewn path that led away from the caves and made their way back to their camp. The rain had stopped now, and the clouds were beginning to break.

The Five sat down inside a tent, and discussed the matter. 'We'll ask Toby if it's usual for noises like that to be heard,' said Dick. 'I wonder anyone ever visits the caves if it is infested with horrible whistles and screeches like that.'

'All the same, we were a bit cowardly,' said Julian, now feeling rather ashamed of himself.

'Well, go back and do a bit of howling yourself,' suggested George. 'It may frighten the howler as much as his howling scared you.'

'Nothing doing,' said Julian promptly. 'I'm not going in for any howling matches.' He burrowed down under the rug for his field-glasses and slung them round his neck.

'I'm going to have a squint at the airfield,' he said. 'Just to see if I can spot Cousin Jeff.' He put the glasses to his eyes and focused them on the airfield below them. He gave a sudden exclamation.

'There's quite a lot doing on the airfield this morning!' he said in surprise. 'Dozens of people there! I wonder what's up. There are quite a lot of planes, too - they must all have arrived this morning!'

Each of the others took a turn at looking through the glasses. Yes - Julian was right. There was certainly something going on at the airfield today. Men hurried about, and then came the noise of yet another aeroplane, which zoomed neatly down to the runway.

'Gosh - another plane!' said Dick. 'Where did all the others come from? We never heard them.'

'They must have arrived while we were in the caves,' said Dick. 'I wish we could ask Toby's

Cousin Jeff what all the excitement is about.'

'We could go down to the farm after our lunch and see if he has heard anything,' suggested Anne, and the others agreed.

'Thank goodness the sun's coming out again,' said George, as a shaft of warm sunlight burst out from behind a cloud, and the sun sailed into a patch of blue sky. 'The heather will soon dry now. Let's have the news on - we may just catch the weather forecast. I don't want to carry my mac about if it's going to clear up.'

They switched on the little radio set - but they had missed the weather news. 'Blow!' said Dick, and raised his hand to switch off - and then he heard two words that stopped him. They were 'Billycock Hill!' He left his hand suspended in the air and listened, full of surprise. The announcer's voice came clearly to the four.

'The aeroplanes stolen from Billycock Hill airfield were two valuable ones, into which had been incorporated new devices,' said the voice from the radio. 'It is possible that they were stolen because of these. We regret that it appears that two of our best pilots flew them away - Flight-Lieutenant Jeffrey Thomas and Flight-Lieutenant Ray Wells. No news has been received of either plane. Both disappeared during a storm over Billycock Hill during the night.'

There was a pause, and then the announcer went on to another item of news. Dick switched off the radio and looked blankly at the others. No one had a word to say at first.

'To think that Jeff could do a thing like that - Jeff a traitor - flying off with a plane of ours to sell to an enemy!' said Julian at last, voicing the thought of all the others.

'We heard the planes go!' said Dick. 'Two of them. Gosh - we ought to go to the police and tell what we know. Not that it's much. But, I say - fancy Jeff doing that! I liked him so much.'

'So did I,' said Anne, turning her head away.

'So did Timmy,' said George. 'And he hardly ever makes a mistake in anyone.'

'What will poor Toby do?' said Dick. 'He thought the world of Jeff.'

Timmy suddenly ran off a few yards and began barking - a welcoming bark this time. Julian looked to see who was coming. It was Toby!

He came up to them and sat down beside them. He looked pale and shocked, though he tried to smile at them.

'I've got awful news,' he said in a queer, croaking voice.

'We know,' said Dick. 'We've just heard it on the radio. Oh, Toby - fancy - Jeff!'

To everyone's horror Toby's face crumpled up and tears poured down his cheeks. He made no attempt to wipe them away; indeed, he hardly seemed to know that they were there. Nobody knew what to do - except Timmy. Dear old Tim scrambled over Julian and most sympathetically licked Toby's wet face, whining as he did so. Toby put his arm round the dog's neck and began to speak.

'It wasn't Jeff! Jeff couldn't have done such a thing. He couldn't! You know he couldn't, don't you?' He turned quite fiercely on the others as he spoke.

'I can't believe that he did,' said Julian. 'He seemed to me to be absolutely straight and trustworthy, even though I only met him that once.'

'He was - well - a sort of hero to me,' said Toby, beginning to mop his cheeks with his hanky, and staring in surprise to see it so damp. 'Gosh, I'm a sissy to go on like this! But when the military police came to our farm this morning to ask questions about Jeff - he's my Dad's nephew, you know - I couldn't believe my ears. I was so furious with one fat-head that I punched him - and Mother sent me out of the room.'

'I suppose both Jeff and the other fellow have definitely gone?' asked Julian. 'No other pilots are missing, are they?'

'No. I asked that,' said Toby dismally. 'Everyone answered roll-call at the camp this morning except Jeff and Ray. Ray is Jeff's best friend, you know.'

'It looks bad,' said Dick, after a long pause.

'But it's not true that Jeff's a traitor!' cried Toby, up in arms again. 'Are you suggesting that he is?'

'No, I'm not,' said Dick. 'Don't be an ass. I don't...' Then he stopped as Timmy ran off and barked fiercely. Now who was coming?

A deep voice called to Timmy. 'Down, boy, down! Where are your friends?'

Julian scrambled up and saw two military policemen standing facing the excited Timmy. 'Here, Tim,' called Julian. 'It's all right. Friends!'

Timmy ran to him and the two burly men came up. 'You the children camping on this hill?' asked the first one. 'Well, we want to ask you a few questions about last night. You were here then, weren't you?'

'Yes, sir. We know what you've come about, too,' said Julian. 'We'll tell you all we know - but we're pretty certain that Flight-Lieutenant Thomas hadn't anything to do with it, sir.'

'That's as may be,' said the man. 'Well, sit down, all of you, and we'll have a little talk.'

Soon they were sitting down in the heather, while Julian told all they knew, which wasn't much - just the sound of the two aeroplanes flying off together.

'And you heard nothing suspicious last night - nothing to all?' asked the first man. 'Nothing,' said Julian.

'Nobody about at all, I suppose?' asked the second man, looking up from his notebook in which he had been writing.

'Oh - well, yes - there were people about,' said Julian, suddenly remembering the Butterfly Man, Mr. Brent, who had said that he and Mr. Gringle were out looking at their moth-traps.

The first policeman asked some rapid questions and Julian and the others told them what little they knew - though Julian knew the most, of course.

'You're sure it was Mr. Brent you saw?' asked the policeman.

'Well - he said he was,' said Julian. 'And he carried a butterfly net on his shoulder - and he wore the same dark glasses I saw him wearing in the morning. Of course, it was pretty dark - but I honestly think it was Mr. Brent. I didn't see or hear Mr. Gringle. Mr. Brent said he was some way off. They're both mad on moth and butterfly hunting.'

'I see,' said the policeman, and the second one shut his notebook. 'Thanks very much. I think we'll just go and pay a call on these - er - what do you call them - Butterfly Men? Where do they hang out?'

The children offered to guide them on their way, and the whole company went with the two burly men almost to the Butterfly Farm.

'Well, thanks a lot,' said the first policeman as they came near the tumble-down cottage. 'We'll go on alone now. You get back to your camp.'

'Sir - will you send us word as soon as you know it wasn't my Cousin Jeff?' asked Toby, forlornly. 'He'll be getting in touch with you, I know, as soon as he hears what he's suspected of.'

'It's bad luck on you, son - he's your cousin, isn't he?' said the big policeman kindly. 'But you'll have to make up your mind to it - it was Jeff Thomas all right that flew off in one of those aeroplanes last night! There isn't a doubt of it!'

Chapter 14

MR. GRINGLE IS ANNOYED

The military police went off down the hill to the Butterfly Farm, and the five children stood disconsolately watching them, with Timmy staring, too, tail well down. He didn't quite know what had happened, but he was sure it was something dreadful.

'Well - it's no good waiting about here, I suppose,' said Julian. 'I bet the police won't get anything useful out of the Butterfly Men - they wouldn't have noticed anything when they were out last night, except their precious moths!'

They were just turning away when they heard someone screaming in a high voice, and they stopped to listen in surprise. 'It must be old Mrs. Janes,' said Dick. 'What's up with her?'

'We'd better see,' said Julian, and he and the others, with Timmy at their heels, went quickly down to the cottage. They heard the voices of the two policemen as they came near.

'Now, now, old lady - don't take on so!' one was saying in a kindly voice. 'We've only come to ask a few questions.'

'Go away, go away!' screamed the old woman, and actually battered at the men with her little bony hands. 'Why are you here? Go away, I tell you!'

'Now listen, Ma - don't take on so,' said the other man patiently. 'We want to talk to Mr. Gringle and Mr. Brent - are they here?'

'Who? Who did you say? Oh, them! They're out with their nets,' mumbled the old woman. 'I'm all alone here, and I'm scared of strangers. You go away.'

'Listen,' said one policeman. 'Were Mr. Gringle and Mr. Brent out on the hills last night?'

'I'm in my bed at nights,' she answered. 'How would I know? You go away and leave me in peace.'

The policemen looked at one another, and shook their heads. It was clearly quite useless to find out anything from this frightened old woman.

'Well, we'll go, Ma,' said one, patting her shoulder gently. 'Sorry we've scared you - there's nothing to be afraid of.'

They turned away and came back up the slope of the hill, seeing the children standing silently there. 'We heard old Mrs. Janes screaming,' said Julian. 'So we came to see what was happening.'

'The Butterfly Men, as you call them, are out with their nets,' said one policeman. 'A funny life, I must say - catching insects and looking after their eggs and caterpillars. Well - I don't suppose they know anything about last night's job. Not that there's anything to know! Two pilots flew off with the planes, we know who they were - and that's that!

'Well, one was NOT my Cousin Jeff,' said Toby, fiercely. The men shrugged their shoulders and went off together.

The five children went off up the hill again, very silent. 'I think we'd better have something to eat,' said Julian at last. 'We've had no lunch - and it's long past our usual time. Toby, stay and have some with us.'

'I couldn't eat a thing,' said Toby. 'Not a thing!'

'Get out what we've got, Anne and George,' said Julian, and the girls and Timmy went to the little 'larder'. Nobody really felt like eating - but when the food was there, in front of them, they found that they were quite hungry - except poor Toby, who sat forlorn and pale-faced, trying to chew through a sandwich made for him by Anne, but not making a very good job of it!

Timmy began to bark in the middle of the meal, and everyone looked to see who was coming now. Julian thought he saw a movement some way down the hill, and took his field-glasses and put them to his eyes.

'I think it's Mr. Gringle,' he said. 'I can see his net, too. He's out butterflying, I suppose.'

'Let's shout to him,' said Dick. 'We can tell him why the police went to call at his cottage this morning, when he wasn't there. He'll never get any sense out of old Mrs. Janes.'

Julian cooed, and there came an answering call. 'He's coming up,' said Dick. Timmy ran to meet him, and soon the man was just below them, panting as he made his way up the steep slope.

'I hoped I'd see you,' he said. 'I want you to look out for some special moths for me - another day-flying one like the Six-Spot Burnet you saw the other day. It's the Cinnabar Moth - it's got rich crimson underwings, and - '

'Yes - I know that one,' said Julian. 'We'll look out for it. We just wanted to tell you that two military policemen went to your cottage a little while ago to ask you some questions about last night - and as we're sure old Mrs. Janes won't be able to explain anything to you, we thought we'd better tell you ourselves.'

Mr. Gringle looked absolutely blank and bewildered. 'But - but why on earth should military policemen come to our cottage?' he said at last.

'For nothing much,' said Julian. 'Only to ask you if you saw anything suspicious when you were out looking at your moth-traps last night - you see, two aero-planes were - '

Mr. Gringle interrupted in a most surprised voice, 'But - but, dear boy, I wasn't out at all last night! It wouldn't have been a bit of good looking for moths anywhere, on our moth-traps or anywhere else on a night like that.'

'Well,' said Julian, also surprised, 'we saw your friend Mr. Brent, and he said you were both out looking at your moth-traps.'

Mr. Gringle stared at Julian as if he were mad, and his mouth fell open in amazement. 'Mr. Brent!' he said at last. 'But Peter - that's Mr. Brent - was at home with me! We were busy writing up our notes together.'

There was a silence after this surprising statement. Julian frowned. What was all this? Was Mr. Gringle trying to hide the fact that he and his friend had been out on the hills the night before?

'Well - I certainly saw Mr. Brent,' said Julian at last. 'It was very dark, I admit - but I'm sure I saw his butterfly net - and his dark glasses.'

'He doesn't wear dark glasses,' said Mr. Gringle, still more astonished. 'What is this tale? Is it a joke of some sort. If you can't talk better sense than this, I'm going.'

'Wait!' said Dick, something else occurring to him. 'You say that Mr. Brent doesn't wear dark glasses - then who was the man that took the moth from us yesterday evening about six o'clock and gave us five shillings? He said he was Mr. Brent, your friend!'

'This is all nonsense!' said Mr. Gringle, getting up angrily. 'Wasting my time on a poor joke of this kind! Brent doesn't wear dark glasses, I tell you - and he wasn't at home at six o'clock yesterday - we'd been to buy some tackle in the next town. He was with me, not at the cottage. You couldn't possibly have seen him! What do you mean by all this nonsense - dark glasses, five shillings for a moth - and seeing Brent on the hillside last night when he didn't stir out of the house!'

He was now standing up, looking very fierce, his brilliant eyes flashing behind his thick glasses.

'Well,' said Julian, 'All this is extremely puzzling, and ...'

'Puzzling! You're nothing but a pack of nitwitted, ill-mannered children!' suddenly roared Mr. Gringle, quite losing his temper. Tirnmy gave a warning growl, and stood up - he didn't allow anyone to rave at his friends!

Mr. Gringle went off angrily, trampling down the heather as if he were trampling down the children. They heard him muttering to himself as he went off. They looked at one another in really great surprise.

'Well - I simply don't know what to make of all this!' said Julian helplessly. 'Was I dreaming last night? No - I did see that fellow - half-see him, anyway - and he did say he was Mr. Brent, and that Gringle was somewhere near. But - if he wasn't Brent, who was he? And what was he doing on a stormy night, hunting moths!'

Nobody could make even a guess. Toby spoke first.

'Perhaps the man you saw was mixed up in the stealing of those aeroplanes - you never know!'

'Impossible, Toby!' said Julian. 'That's too farfetched. I can't say that I understand it at all - but honestly, he didn't seem like a man who could steal an aeroplane!'

'Who was the man that gave us the five shillings then, if it wasn't Brent?' said Dick, puzzled.

'Could it have been Mrs. Janes' son, pretending he was Brent - just for a silly joke?' said George.

'What was he like?' asked Toby at once. 'I know Will Janes - I told you he's often been to our farm. We don't have him now because he drinks so much and he isn't reliable any more. What was this man Brent like - I'd soon know if he was Will Janes pretending to be someone else!'

'He was small and thin, with dark glasses,' began Dick - and Toby interrupted him at once.

'Then it wasn't Will Janes! He's tall and burly - with a thick neck and, anyway, he doesn't wear dark glasses - or any glasses at all!'

'Then who in the world was it? And WHY did he pretend to be Brent, Gringle's friend?' wondered Dick. Everyone frowned and puzzled over the whole thing - but nobody could think of a sensible reason for anyone wanting to pretend to be Mr. Brent!

'Well - for goodness' sake, let's get on with our meal,' said George at last. 'We stopped in the middle of it - and the rest is still waiting for us. Have another ham sandwich, Julian?'

They all munched in silence, thinking hard. Toby sighed. 'I don't really feel that this mix-up with the Butterfly Men and somebody else, whoever he is, has anything to do with the stealing of the aeroplanes. I wish it had!'

'All the same - it wants looking into,' said Dick seriously. 'And what's more - I vote we keep our eyes and ears open. Something's going on at Butterfly Farm!'

Chapter 15

MORE NEWS - AND A NIGHT TRIP

The Five spent most of the afternoon talking about the mystery of the man who had pretended to be Mr. Brent. It really was difficult to understand why anyone should do such a foolish thing, especially as it could be so easily found out.

'I can only think there's a madman about who has got it into his head that he is Mr. Brent!' said Dick at last. 'No wonder he didn't seem to recognize that butterfly we took him!'

'Do you know what I think would be a good idea?' suddenly said George. 'Why don't we slip down to Butterfly Farm tonight, when it's getting dark, and see if the false Mr. Brent is there, and the real one - whom we've never seen, by the way, and Mr. Gringle?'

'Hm - yes - quite an idea,' said Julian, seriously. 'But only Dick and I will go - not you or Anne.'

'I'll come, too,' said Toby.

'Right,' said Julian. 'But we'll have to be jolly careful - because if there is something funny going on down there, we don't want to be caught. It wouldn't be at all pleasant, I fear!'

'Take Timmy with you,' said George at once.

'No. He might bark or something,' said Dick. 'We'll be all right, George. Gracious - we've had enough adventures by now to teach us how to go about things like this! Ha - I shall look forward to tonight!'

Everyone suddenly felt much more cheerful, even Toby. He managed a very small smile, and stood up to brush the crumbs off his jersey.

'I'm going now,' he said. 'I've a lot of farm jobs to do this afternoon - I'll meet you at the big oak-tree behind the Butterfly Farm - did you notice it?'

'Yes - an enormous one,' said Julian. 'Right. Be there at - say - ten o'clock. No, eleven - it will be dark by then, or almost.'

'So long!' said Toby and plunged down the hill, accompanied for a little way by Timmy.

'Well - I feel much better now we've made a definite plan,' said Dick. 'My goodness, it's half past five already! Don't suggest tea, George - we had our lunch so late!'

'I wasn't going to,' said George. 'We'll miss it out and have a really good supper later on. And don't let's forget to listen to the news at six o'clock - there might be some about Jeff and his friend Ray - and the aeroplanes.'

So, just before six o'clock, they switched on the little radio set, and listened intently for the news. It came at last - and almost the first piece was about the stolen aeroplanes. The children listened, holding their breath, bending close to the set.

'The two aeroplanes stolen from Billycock Airfield last night, flown away by Flight-Lieutenant Jeffrey Thomas and Flight-Lieutenant Ray Wells, have been found. Both planes apparently crashed into the sea, but were seen, and there is a chance of their being salvaged. The pilots were not found, and are presumed to have been drowned. At Edinburgh this afternoon there was a grand rally of...'

Julian switched off the news and looked at the others soberly. 'Well - that's that! Crashed, both of them! That was because of the storm, I suppose. Well, at least no enemy will be able to get hold of the new devices that were incorporated in the planes.'

'But - that means Toby's cousin is drowned - or killed,' said Anne, her face very white.

'Yes. But remember, if he flew away in that plane, he was a traitor to his country,' said Dick gravely. 'And traitors deserve to die.'

'But Toby's cousin didn't seem like a traitor,' said George. 'He seemed so - well, so very British, and I can't say anything finer than that. I feel as if I shall never trust my judgment of anyone again. I liked him so very much.'

'So did I,' said Dick, frowning. 'Well, these things happen - but I just wish it hadn't been Toby's cousin. He was such a hero to him. I don't feel as if Toby will ever be quite the same after this - it's something so absolutely beastly!'

Nobody said anything for a little while. They were all profoundly shocked - not only by the idea of Cousin Jeff being a traitor, but also by the news that he had been drowned. It seemed such a horrible end to come to that bright-eyed, smiling young airman they had joked with only the other day - and yet it was an end that a traitor deserved - and that the other man deserved, too.

'Do you think we ought to pack up and go home?' said Anne. 'I mean - won't it be awkward for the Thomas's to have us hanging round when they must feel shocked and unhappy?'

'No, we don't need to bother them much at the farm,' said Julian. 'And I don't think we can desert old Toby at the moment. It will help him to have friends around, you know.'

'Yes. You're right,' said Dick. 'This is the sort of time to have good friends - poor old Toby. He'll be knocked out by this last piece of news.'

'Will he be waiting for you at the old oak-tree tonight, do you think?' asked George.

'Don't know,' said Julian. 'It doesn't matter if he's not there, anyway - Dick and I can do all the snooping round that is necessary. And it will take our minds off this shock a bit - to try and solve the mystery down at Butterfly Farm!'

They went for a walk round the hill, with Timmy leaping over the heather in delight. He couldn't understand the lack of laughter and the unusual solemnity shown by his four friends, and he was pleased to be able to forget any troubles and sniff for rabbits.

They had their suppers at eight o'clock and then turned on the radio to listen to a programme. 'We'll hear the news at nine,' said Dick. 'Just in case there might be any more.'

But the nine o'clock news only repeated what had been said about the two planes in the six o'clock broadcast, and not a word more. Dick switched off and gazed down at the airfield below. There were still quite a lot of planes there, though some of them had taken off and flown away during the day. Julian trained his field-glasses on the field.

'Not so many men scurrying about now,' he said. 'Things are quietening down. My word - what a shock it must have been for everyone there last night, to hear the planes revved up, and then flown away! They must have been amazed!'

'May be they didn't hear them go, in the storm,' said George.

'They must have,' said Dick. 'We heard them up here. Well, what about you girls turning-in? Dick and I don't want to, in case we fall off to sleep - we've got to slip away about half past ten or we shan't be down at the oak-tree at eleven.'

'I wish you'd take Timmy with you,' said George uneasily. 'I don't like Butterfly Farm - or the witch-like old woman there - or the man you met with dark glasses who wasn't Mr. Brent, or the son you haven't seen.'

'Don't be an ass, George,' said Julian. 'We shall be back by twelve, I expect - and Timmy is sure to bark in welcome, so you'll know we're safe.'

The girls wouldn't go to their tent to sleep, so they all sat and talked, and watched the sun slip behind the clear horizon. The weather was now perfect again, and there wasn't a cloud in the sky. It was difficult to imagine the sweeping rain and howling wind of last night's storm.

'Well,' said Julian at last, looking at his watch. 'Time we went. Timmy, look after the girls as usual.'

'Woof,' said Timmy, understanding perfectly.

'And you look after yourselves,' said Anne. 'We'll come down a little way with you - it's such a lovely evening.'

They all set off together, and the girls went halfway to the Butterfly Farm and then turned back with Timmy. 'Well, Tim - mind you bark at twelve, when they come back,' said Anne. 'Though somehow I think that both George and I will still be awake!'

The two boys went on down the hill and round to the right across towards Butterfly Farm. It was almost dark now, though the June night was very clear and bright. 'Better be careful we're not seen,' muttered Julian. 'It's such a clear night.'

They made their way to the big old oak-tree that stood at the back of the Butterfly Farm. Toby was not there - but in about two minutes they heard a slight rustling noise, and saw Toby, panting a little, as if he had been hurrying. Then he was close beside them.

'Sorry I'm a bit late,' he whispered. 'I say - did you hear the six o'clock news?'

'Yes - we were awfully sorry about it,' said Julian.

'Well - as I still don't believe that Cousin Jeff stole the aeroplanes with Ray Wells, but that somebody else did, I wasn't any more upset than before,' said Toby. 'If Jeff didn't steal the plane, he wasn't in it when it crashed, so he's not drowned. See?'

'Yes. I see,' said Julian, glad that Toby had taken the news in that way, but convinced himself that there wasn't really much hope.

'What are your plans?' whispered Toby. 'There are lights in the cottage windows - and I don't think any curtains are pulled. We could go and peep into each one and see exactly who is there!'

'Good idea,' said Julian. 'Come on - and, for goodness' sake, don't make a noise. Single file, of course. I'll lead the way.'

And silently and slowly they went round the oak-tree and down to the tumble-down cottage. What would they see there, when they looked through those lighted windows?

Chapter 16

LOOKING THROUGH WINDOWS

The three tiptoed quietly up to the cottage. 'Don't go too near when you look in,' whispered Julian. 'Keep a little distance away. We shall be able to see who is in the rooms, but they mustn't be able to see us outside. I sincerely hope they won't!'

'Look in the downstairs rooms,' said Dick. 'See, that's the kitchen window over there. Old Mrs. Janes may be there, if she's still up.'

They crept to the uncurtained window. The room was lighted by only a candle, and was full of shadows. The boys gazed in.

Old Mrs. Janes was there, sitting up in a brown rocking-chair, clad in a dirty dressing-gown. She rocked herself to and fro, and although the boys could not see her face, they sensed that the old woman was frightened and unhappy. Her head sank on her chest, and when she put her wispy hair back from her face, her hand shook.

'She's no witch, poor old thing!' whispered Dick, feeling quite sad to see her rocking to and fro all by herself so late at night. 'She's just a poor, frightened old woman.'

'Why is she up so late?' wondered Julian. 'She must be waiting for someone.'

'Yes. She might be. We'd better look out then,' said Toby at once, looking behind him as if he expected to see someone creeping up.

'Now let's go round to the front,' said Dick. So they tiptoed there, and saw another lighted window - much more brightly lighted than the kitchen window had been.

They kept a little way from the pane, afraid of being seen. They looked in and saw two men there, sitting at a table, poring over some papers.

'Mr. Gringle!' said Julian, in a low voice. 'No doubt about that - and the other one must be his friend, Mr. Brent, I suppose. Certainly he isn't wearing dark glasses, as that man was we gave the butterfly to and who gave us five shillings. He isn't a bit like him!'

They all looked intently at the 'friend'. He was a perfectly ordinary man, with a small moustache, dark hair and a rather big nose. Not in the least like the 'Mr. Brent' they had seen the day before.

'What are they doing?' whispered Toby.

'It looks as if they're making lists of something - probably making out bills for their customers,' said Julian. 'Anyway - I must say they look perfectly ordinary sitting there, doing a perfectly ordinary job. I think Mr. Gringle was speaking the truth when he said that it wasn't Mr. Brent who gave us the five shillings and it certainly wasn't him either that I saw on the hill-side last night with a butterfly net.'

'Then who was it?' asked Dick, pulling the others right away from the window, in order to talk more easily. 'And why did he carry the butterfly net and tell that lie about moth-traps? Why was he on the hill, the night the planes were stolen?'

'Yes - why was he? I'd like to ask him that!' said Toby in too loud a voice. The others nudged him at once, and he spoke more softly. 'Something funny was going on last night - something people don't know anything about. I'd like to find that phony Mr. Brent you met on the hill-side, Julian!'

'Well, may be we shall,' said Julian. 'Now - any other window lighted? Yes - one up there, under the roof. Who's there, I wonder?'

'Perhaps it's Mrs. Janes' son,' said Dick. 'It would be just like him to take one of the three bedrooms and make her sleep downstairs in the old rocking-chair! I expect the other two little rooms up there are used by the Butterfly Men.'

'How can we see into the lighted room?' wondered Toby. 'Look - if we got up in that tree there, we'd see in.'

'There's an easier way!' said Julian, switching his torch on and off very quickly, giving the others just half a second to see a ladder leaning against a nearby woodshed.

'Good - yes, that would be much easier,' said Dick. 'But we'll have to be jolly quiet. Whoever is in there would come to the window at once if he so much as heard the top of the ladder grating against the window-ledge!'

'Well, we'll manage it all right,' said Julian. 'The window isn't very high, and the ladder isn't very heavy. Between us we can place it very gently against the wall without disturbing anyone!'

The ladder was certainly quite light. The boys found no difficulty in carrying it slowly and carefully across to the cottage. They placed it against the wall without a sound!

'I'll go up,' whispered Julian. 'Hold the ladder steady - and for goodness' sake keep a lookout! Give me a signal if you hear anything at all, because I don't want to be trapped at the top of the ladder!'

The others held the sides as he climbed the rather rickety rungs. He came to the lighted window and very cautiously and slowly lifted his head until he could see right into the room.

It was lighted by a candle, a very small and untidy room, poorly furnished. A man sat on the bed there, a big hulking man, with broad shoulders and a neck like a bull. Julian gazed at him - yes, that must be Mrs. Janes' son, who, she said, was so unkind to her. Julian remembered the old mumbling voice saying that her son was cruel. 'He hits me. He twists my arm!' Yes, the man on the bed could be a nasty bully, no doubt about that.

He was reading a newspaper close to the candle.

As Julian looked at him, he pulled out a big watch from his pocket and stared at it, muttering something that Julian couldn't hear. He stood up, and the boy was so afraid that he might come to the window, that he slithered down the ladder as quickly as possible.

'The son's in there,' he whispered to the others. 'I was afraid he was coming to the window to look out; that's why I slid down so quickly. Blow! I've got a splinter in the palm of my hand doing that! Toby - could you creep up to the top in a minute or two and look in - just to make sure I'm right, and that it is Will Janes, the old woman's son?'

Toby went up the ladder as soon as they were certain that Will Janes was not going to look out. He came down almost at once.

'Yes - that's Will - but, my word, he has changed!' whispered Toby. 'He looks a brute now - and yet he was a kind, decent fellow not so long ago. Mother said he'd fallen in with a bad set of fellows, and had taken to drinking - so I suppose he's quite different now.'

'He looked at his watch as if he was expecting someone,' said Julian. 'I wonder - now, I wonder - if the man who paraded about the hill-side last night with a net is coming here tonight? I must say I'd like to get a good look at him. He can't be up to any good.'

'Well - let's hide somewhere and wait,' suggested Toby. 'Nobody knows I've slipped out to be with you, so I shan't be missed. Anyway, Mother wouldn't mind if she knew I was on a night trip with you two!'

'We'll hide in that barn over there,' said Julian, and, on tiptoe again, they crossed to an old ruined barn, whose roof was partly off, and whose walls were falling in. It smelt dirty and there seemed no clean place to sit in, but at last Julian pulled out some dusty sacks and they laid them in a corner and sat there waiting in the dark.

'Pooh!' said Dick. 'What a horrible smell in here - old rotting potatoes, or something. I wish we'd chosen somewhere else.'

'Sh!' said Julian suddenly, giving him a nudge that made him jump. 'I can hear something.'

They all sat silent and listened. They could certainly hear something - yes - quiet footsteps, very quiet - made by rubber-soled shoes. The soft sounds passed by the barn, and they could no longer hear them. Then came a soft, low whistle.

Julian stood up and looked through the broken barn window. 'I think there are two men standing below Will Janes' bedroom,' he whispered. 'They must be the men he was waiting for. He'll be coming down. I hope to goodness they don't come into this barn to talk!'

This was a horrible thought, but there was no chance of going anywhere else, because at that moment the front door opened and Will Janes came out. Julian, still looking through the broken pane, could see him dimly outlined in the light that came from Mr. Gringle's front window.

The three men went off very quietly round the cottage. 'Come on,' said Julian. 'Let's shadow them. We might hear something to explain what's up.'

'What's the time?' asked Dick. 'I hope the girls won't start worrying about us. It must be gone twelve by now.'

'Yes. It is,' said Julian, looking at the luminous hands of his watch. 'It can't be helped. They'll guess we're on to something!'

They crept after the three men, who went to a clump of trees on the other side of the glass-houses. There they began to talk, but in such low tones that the three boys could hear nothing but the murmur of the voices.

Then one man raised his voice. It was Will Janes - Toby recognized it at once and told the others. 'It's Will. He's furious about something. He always loses his temper when he thinks people have treated him badly in any way - and it sounds as if he thinks those two men have.'

The two men tried to quiet him, but he would not be pacified. 'I want my money!' the boys heard him say. 'I helped you, didn't I, I hid you here, didn't I, till the job was done. Then give me my money!'

His voice rose almost to a shout, and the two men with him grew frightened. Exactly what happened next the boys never knew, but quite suddenly there was the sound of a blow and a fall - then another blow and a fall - and Will Janes laughed. It was not a nice laugh.

In a few seconds there came an anxious voice from the window of the room where Mr. Gringle and his friend were at work. 'Who's there? What's happening?'

CRASH! That was the sound of breaking glass! Will Janes had picked up a big stone and flung it at the nearby glass-house. It made the three boys almost jump out of their skins.

'It's all right, sir! I came out to see who was prowling about!' shouted Will Janes. 'And whoever it was has broken some of the glass in your butterfly house. I've been out here shouting, trying to catch him.'

He came blundering towards the house - and then, as luck would have it, his torch picked out the three crouching boys. He gave a yell!

'Who's this? Here they are, sir, kids who've been trying to smash the glass! Catch them - that's right - I've got two of them - you catch the third!

Chapter 17

QUITE A LOT HAPPENS

Things then happened so quickly that, to their utter amazement, the three boys found themselves captives, quite unable to escape.

Big Will Janes had hold of both Dick and Toby - and he was so strong, and held them in such a vice-like grip, one in each hand, that it was hopeless to try to get away.

Julian had run straight into Mr. Gringle and Mr. Brent, and the men had captured him between them. They were very angry.

'What do you mean by coming here and snooping round, smashing our glass-houses!' yelled Mr. Gringle, shaking Julian in his rage. 'We shall lose all our butterflies through that broken pane!'

'Let me go. We didn't break your glass,' shouted Julian.

'He did! I saw him!' shouted Will Janes.

'You didn't!' cried Toby. 'Let me go, Will. I'm Toby Thomas, from Billycock Farm. You let me go or my father will have something to say!'

'Oho - so it's Toby Thomas, is it?' said Will in a sneering voice. 'Toby Thomas, whose father won't employ Will Janes now because he turns his nose up at him. You wait till I tell the police tomorrow what I've caught you doing - I'll say you're the kids that have been taking our hens!'

Will dragged the angry boys over to a shed, calling out to the other two men. 'Bring them here. Chuck them in and we'll lock the door and let them cool off till tomorrow morning!'

Julian struggled valiantly against the two men, but short of kicking them viciously there was nothing he could do to escape - and he didn't really want to harm them. It was all a mistake!

And then - oh, joy - there came a sound that made Julian's heart leap - the bark of a dog!

'Timmy! It's Timmy!' yelled Julian to the others. 'Call him! He'll soon make Janes drop you!'

'Tim, Tim!' shouted Dick, and Timmy ran to him at once, and began to growl so ferociously that Will Janes stopped dragging the boys to the shed.

'Set us free or he'll spring at you,' warned Dick. Timmy growled again, and nipped Will's ankle just to let him know he had teeth. Will let both boys go, and they staggered away from him in relief. Then Timmy ran to Julian - but Mr. Gringle and Mr. Brent had already heard his fierce growls and did not wait for any more! They gave Julian a shove away from them, and retreated into the cottage.

Will Janes also went into the cottage and lumbered up the stairs. The boys saw his figure outlined against the candle-light.

'Well, thank goodness he didn't go and scare his poor old mother,' said Julian, shaking his clothes straight. They had been twisted and pulled in the struggle. 'We'd better go and see if Will knocked those two men out - gracious, what a night! Good old Timmy - you just came in time!'

'I bet the girls sent him after us when twelve o'clock came,' said Dick. 'He'd smell our tracks easily. Dear Old Tim. Now, go carefully - it's about here that Will floored those two men, whoever they were.'

But there was no sign of the men at all. They must have got up from the ground very quickly and made themselves scarce. 'They went while the going was good!' said Toby grimly. 'What do we do next?'

'Get back to the camp,' said Julian. 'We're really not much wiser now than when we came - except that we know that Gringle and Brent are Butterfly Men, and that Janes was a bad lot and in with those two fellows he knocked out...'

'And that he helped them in some way, and hid them here - and hasn't been paid,' finished Dick. 'But how did he help them and why?'

'I've no idea,' said Julian. 'I can't think any more tonight - my mind just won't work. Go back home, Toby. We'll talk it all out tomorrow.'

Toby went off to the farm, puzzled and excited. What an evening! What would Cousin Jeff say when he told him - but no, he couldn't tell him, People said he had gone off in that plane, and that he was now at the bottom of the sea.

'But I won't believe it,' thought the tired boy, stoutly. 'I will - not - believe it!'

The girls were most relieved to hear the boys and Timmy coming back. 'What happened? Why are you so late?' said George. 'Timmy found you all right, of course?'

'Couldn't have come at a better moment,' said Julian, grinning in the light of George's torch. 'I suppose you sent him after us?'

'We did,' said George. 'He wanted to go, anyway. He kept whining and whining as if you needed help - so we sent him off.'

'And we did need help!' said Dick, flinging himself down in the heather. 'Listen to our tale!'

He and Julian told it, and the girls listened, astonished. 'What has been going on down there?' said George, puzzled. 'What has Will Janes been up to with those fellows? How can we find out?' 'He won't talk,' said Julian. 'Nobody can make him, either. But I think may be if we went down tomorrow morning and found that he'd gone out, we might persuade old Mrs. Janes to tell us a few secrets.'

'Yes - that's a good idea,' said George. 'She must know what her son has been up to - especially if he has been hiding people there. She would have to feed them, of course. Yes - old Mrs. Janes could tell you - if she would!'

'But now,' said Julian, snuggling down in the heather on his rug, now, you two gabblers, I want to go to sleep. Good night!'

'Well! Who's been doing the gabbling!' said George. 'We have hardly been able to get a word in! Come on, Anne - we can go to sleep all right now. I wonder if Toby's home safely, and fast asleep in bed!'

Yes, Toby was home, but he wasn't asleep! He was still brooding over his Cousin Jeff. If only he could do something - but he couldn't. Cousin Jeff had disappeared, and he, and he only, could clear himself of the hateful charge of traitor ... but people said he was drowned.

Next morning the Five awoke late, even Timmy. There wasn't a great deal left in the larder, and Julian hoped that Toby would bring up some more food. If not, they must certainly go down to Billycock Farm and get some. They breakfasted on bread and butter and cheese, with water to wash it down and a humbug from the tin to follow!

'We'll go straight down to the Butterfly Farm, I think,' said Julian, taking the leadership as he always did when there was any quick decision to be made. 'Dick, you'd better take on the asking of questions - the old lady was so touched when you gave her that five shillings! She's probably got a soft spot for you now.'

'Right,' said Dick. 'Well, are we ready?'

They set off to the Butterfly Farm, Timmy at their heels. When they came near, they slowed their steps, not wanting to run into Will Janes. But there did not seem to be anybody about at all, not even the Butterfly Men themselves.

'They've probably gone off butterfly-hunting, I should think,' said Dick. 'Look - there's poor old Mrs. Janes trying to peg up her washing - dropping half of it on the ground. Go and help her,

Anne.'

Anne ran over to the little woman. 'I'll peg up the things for you,' she said. 'Here, let me have them.' Mrs. Janes turned to her and Anne was shocked to see that her right eye was black and bruised.

'However did you get that black eye?' she began. 'Here, give me the whole basket. Gracious, what a lot of washing!'

Mrs. Janes seemed a little dazed. She let Anne peg up the things without a word - she just stood and watched her. 'Where are Mr. Gringle and Mr. Brent?' asked Anne as she pegged.

Mrs. Janes mumbled something. Anne made out with some difficulty that they had gone butterfly-hunting. 'And where is your son, Will?' she asked, having been prompted to ask this by signs from Julian.

To her dismay Mrs. Janes began to sob. The old woman lifted her dirty apron and covered her head with it, and then, half-blinded by it, she stumbled towards the kitchen door, her arms stretched out in front of her.

'Gracious - whatever's the matter with her this morning?' said Anne to the others. Dick ran to the kitchen door and guided the old lady in, sitting her down in her rocking-chair. Her apron slid down from her head and she looked at him.

'You're the one that give me five shillin',' she mumbled, and patted his hand. 'Kind, you are. Nobody's kind to me now. My son, he's cruel. He hits me.'

'Did he give you that black eye?' asked Dick, gently. 'When? Today?'

'Yes. He wanted money - he always wants money,' wept Mrs. Janes. 'And I weren't going to give him that five shillin'. And he hit me. And then the police came and took him away.'

'What! The police took him - this morning do you mean?' asked Dick, astonished. The others came a little closer, astonished, too. Why - it was only last night that Will Janes had captured two of them!

'They do say he thieved,' sobbed Mrs. Janes. 'Robbed old Farmer Darvil of his ducks. But it's those bad men that changed my son. He was a good son once.'

'What men?' asked Dick, patting the skinny old hand. 'You tell us everything. We understand. We'll help you.'

'You're the one that give me five shillin', aren't you?' she said once more. 'You'll help a poor old woman, won't you? It was those men, I tell you, that changed my son.'

'Where are they now? Did he hide them here?' asked Dick. Mrs. Janes clung to his hand and pulled him closer.

'There were four men,' she mumbled, in such a low voice that Dick could hardly hear. 'And my son, he was promised money if he hid them here, on Billycock Hill. They all had a secret, see? And they only talked about it when they were hid up in my bedroom there - but I listened and I heard.'

'What was the secret?' asked Dick, his heart beating fast. Now perhaps he would hear what all this mystery was about.

'They were watching something,' whispered Mrs. Janes. 'Watching something out on the hills. Sometimes day-time, sometimes night-time, always watching. And they hid up there in my little old room, and cook for them I did, and got nothing for it. Bad men they were.'

She sobbed again, and the four children felt sad and embarrassed. 'Don't worry her any more,' said Anne.

Then there came the sound of feet outside and Mr. Gringle walked by the window. He looked in and was astounded to see such a crowd in the little kitchen.

'What! You again!' he cried, as he saw Julian and Dick. 'You just look out! I told the police about you when they fetched Will Janes this morning. They'll be after you next, and you'll be punished for prowling round here at night and smashing my glass-house! How dare you come here again?'

Chapter 18

NOBODY KNOWS WHERE TO LOOK

'Let's go,' said George. 'We can't find out any more from the poor old woman. I'm glad that son of hers has been arrested for thieving. At least he won't be here to knock her about any more!'

Mr. Gringle began to talk angrily again, but the Five had had enough. Timmy growled and made him retreat.

'We're going, Mr. Gringle,' said Julian coldly. 'We shall be very glad to see the police, if you have really sent them after us. Quite a lot has been going on here that you don't know anything about. You've noticed nothing but your butterflies and moths.'

'Anything wrong in that, you uncivil boy?' shouted Mr. Gringle.

'Well, it would have been a good thing if you had noticed how that fellow Janes knocked his poor mother about,' said Julian. 'I suppose you haven't even seen the bruised black eye she has this morning? No? I thought not. Well, may be the police will be asking you a few questions soon - about the four strangers that have been hiding in that little bedroom up there!'

'What? What's that you say? What do you mean?' stammered Mr. Gringle, astonished. 'Men? Where from? Who?'

'I've no idea,' said Julian. 'I wish I had.' And then the Five walked off together, leaving a very puzzled and worried Mr. Gringle behind them.

'It serves him right,' said Julian. 'To think that he could make that miserable little woman slave for him, and never even notice how frightened and unhappy she was - or even see that she had a black eye from that scoundrel of a son. Let him get back to his butterflies!'

'What did Mrs. Janes mean - mumbling about men hidden in that room - four of them she said,' wondered Anne. 'And why did they go and watch on the hill-side? What for? That must have been one of them you saw that night of the storm, Julian - the one you spotted with the butterfly net, who said he was Mr. Brent. I suppose he pretended to be him, so that nobody would ask him why he was prowling out there!'

'Yes, you're right,' said Julian. 'Of course, they may have been watching the airfield, you know - yes, of course that's what they were doing! Why didn't I think of that before? They were watching it night and day - two by day, I suppose, and two by night - and paid Janes to keep them hidden in that room. What were they up to?'

'Julian - could it - could it possibly be anything to do with the stolen aeroplanes?' asked George, with sudden excitement in her voice.

'It might. It certainly might,' said Julian. 'But I don't know how it ties up with Jeff Thomas and Ray Wells flying them away. That doesn't seem to fit, somehow. You know - I do really believe we are on to something here! Let's go down to Billycock Farm and see if Mr. Thomas, Toby's father, is about. I think we ought to tell him all we know.'

'Yes, that's a fine idea,' said Anne, pleased. 'We do want a bit of help over this now.'

'Well, come on then,' said Julian, and off they went at top speed down the hill, taking the path to Billycock Farm. They soon came to the farm-yard and called Toby.

'Toby! Where are you? We've got a bit of news.'

Toby appeared at the barn-door, looking rather pale, for he had had a bad night. 'Oh, hallo - what news? The only news I want to hear is about Jeff. I can't get it out of my mind.'

'Where's your father?' asked Julian. 'We think he ought to hear what we've got to say. He'll know what to do. I'm afraid we don't - it's a puzzle we can't seem to fit together!'

'I'll call Dad,' said Toby at once, and sent a shout over the field where red-and-white cows were grazing. 'Da-ad! Da-ad! You're WANTED!'

His father came hurrying over the field. 'What is it? I'm busy.'

'Dad - Julian and Dick have got something to tell you,' said Toby. 'It won't take very long - but they're a bit worried.'

'Oh - well, what is it, lads?' said Mr. Thomas, turning his kindly brown face to the boys. 'Got into any trouble?'

'Oh no, sir - not exactly,' said Julian. 'I'll tell you as shortly as I can.' And he began to tell him the tale of the Butterfly Farm - and of the man he had seen at night on the hill - of the old woman at the Butterfly Farm, and of Will Janes, who treated her so badly. The farmer nodded at that.

'Ay!' he said. 'Will's changed this last year. Got into bad company, of course.'

'We've met some of the "bad company",' said Julian, and told of their adventure the night before - and then ended by telling Mr. Thomas what the old woman had said to them that morning.

'Now what has Will Janes been up to?' said the farmer. 'Bad enough to get into ill company - but worse to ill-treat his poor old mother! He'll have to say who these men are that he's been harbouring up there at Butterfly Farm - and why they go out at night - watching the airfield, as you say, I don't doubt. Why, may be they've even had a hand in the stealing of those planes!'

Toby became very excited at this and his face grew crimson. 'Dad! May be it was those men who took the planes! There were four, weren't there? They would be strong enough to capture Jeff and Ray and take them off somewhere - and then two of them could fly off the planes, and the other two watch poor Jeff and Ray, wherever they are!'

'You know - you may be right, young Toby,' said his father. 'This is a matter for the police - and at once, too. They must get on to Will, and get everything out of him - make him confess. If Jeff and Ray are held prisoner anywhere, they must be freed.'

Toby was dancing round in excitement. 'I knew it wasn't Jeff! I knew he couldn't do a thing like that! I'm sure it was two of those men. Dad, get on to the police at once.'

Mr. Thomas hurried indoors to the telephone, and was soon telling the police all he knew. They listened in astonishment, and at once saw the tremendous importance of the information the children had given.

'We'll question Will Janes at once,' they said. 'He's held on a matter of thieving, so we've got him under our hands. We'll call you back, sir - in about half an hour.'

That half-hour was the very longest the children had ever known. Julian looked at his watch a score of times, and nobody could sit still, least of all Toby. Anne was fidgety, too, and thought she would play with Benny. But neither Benny nor the pigling were there, so she had to wait in patience.

When the telephone bell at last shrilled out everyone jumped violently. Mr. Thomas ran to it. 'Yes - yes - that's the police speaking, is it? Yes, I'm listening. What's the news? Oh... yes... yes...'

The farmer held the telephone close to his ear, nodding as he listened intently. The children watched him just as intently, trying to glean something from his few words, and from his face.

'I see. Well - that's very disappointing,' they heard Mr. Thomas say, and their hearts sank. 'Thank you. Yes, very worrying indeed. Good-bye!'

He put down the receiver and faced the children. Toby called out to him. 'Was it Jeff who stole the plane, Dad? Was it?'

'No,' said his father, and Toby gave a wild yell of joy, and leapt into the air. 'Then nothing else matters!' he cried. 'Oh, I knew it wasn't Jeff!'

'Wait a minute, wait a minute,' said Mr. Thomas. 'There's something very worrying.'

'What?' said Toby, startled.

'Will Janes has confessed that those four men were sent to steal those two planes,' he said. 'Two of them were first-class pilots - foreign, of course. The other two were thugs - bullies - sent to capture Jeff and Ray that night in the storm. They knocked them out and dragged them away from the airfield, and hid them somewhere. Then the pilots got out the two planes, and flew them away. When the alarm was raised, it was too late.'

'So - when the planes crashed into the sea, it was the foreign pilots who were drowned, not Jeff and Ray?' said Julian.

'Yes. But here's the worrying part. The other two men, the ones who captured Jeff and Ray, have hidden them away, but didn't tell Janes where!' said Mr. Thomas. 'They refused to pay him any money for his help, because the planes had crashed and their plans had failed - and they also refused to tell him where Jeff and Ray were hidden...'

'And now I suppose the two thugs have left the district - made their escape - and left Jeff and Ray to starve in some place where they may never be found!' said Toby, sitting down heavily and looking suddenly subdued.

'Exactly,' said Mr. Thomas. 'And unless we find out where they are pretty quickly, things will go hard with them - they're probably bound hand and foot - and are dependent on the two bullies for food and water. Once the men are gone, there is no one to bring them anything!'

'Oh, I say!' said Toby, horrified. 'Dad, we must find them, we must!'

'That's what the police think,' said his father. 'And what I think, too. But nobody knows where to look!'

'Nobody knows where to look!' The words repeated themselves in everyone's mind. Nobody knows where to look!

Chapter 19

A MORNING OF WORK

There was a dead silence after Mr. Thomas had said those despairing words - 'Nobody knows where to look!' Where were Jeff and Ray lying, worried and anxious, knowing their planes to be stolen, picturing them in the hands of an alien country, being dismantled to discover the new and secret devices built into them!

'They must be absolutely furious to think how easily it was all done!' said Dick. 'Taken by surprise like that! Surely there must be someone on the airfield who was in the secret?'

'Bound to be,' said Mr. Thomas. 'These things are carefully planned to the very last detail - and, of course, it was a bit of luck for the men to have a storm going on just at the time when they needed something to make their getaway unseen and unheard - unheard, that is, until the planes were actually up in the air, and then it didn't matter!'

'Yes - the rain simply slashed down that night,' said George, remembering. 'Nobody would be out in it - even the guards on the airfield would be under shelter somewhere. It was a bit of luck for those fellows!'

'I expect they were delighted to look out of that tiny little window at the cottage and see a storm blowing up on the very night they wanted one!' said Dick.

'It beats me how Mr. Gringle and Mr. Brent never heard or suspected anything - with four strange men hanging about Butterfly Farm,' said Julian.

'There can't be anything in their heads but butterflies or moths,' said Toby. 'I bet the police will have something to say to them!'

'The thing is - what's to be done now?' said Julian, frowning. He turned to Mr. Thomas, who was deep in thought. 'What do you think, sir? Is there anything we can do?'

'I doubt it,' said Mr. Thomas. 'The police have had reports of two men driving a closed van at a fast speed - the number was taken by two or three people who complained - and they think that it might have been one used to transport Jeff and Ray to some distant hiding-place - somewhere in a disused quarry - or in some deserted cellar. Likely places of that sort.'

Everyone groaned. There certainly was absolutely nothing they could do, then - it would be impossible to hunt for miles for old quarries or other hiding-places!

'Well - I must get on with my work,' said Mr. Thomas. 'Where's your mother, Toby? You'd better tell her about all this.'

'She's gone shopping,' said Toby, looking at the clock. 'She'll be back just before dinner-time.'

'I suppose Benny has gone with her,' said Mr. Thomas, going to the door. 'Where's Curly, his pigling? Surely he hasn't taken him, too!'

'I expect he has,' said Toby. He looked at the other four children, suddenly remembering something. 'I say - aren't you a bit short of food up at the camp? Shall I get you some to take back with you?'

'Well - if it isn't an awful bother,' said Julian, apologetically. It seemed rather dreadful to think about food when probably Jeff and Ray were lying tied up somewhere, hungry and thirsty, with no chance of food of any sort.

'I'll get some. You come with me, Anne, and say what you want,' said Toby, and he and Anne went off together to the kitchen, and opened the door of the immense larder. Soon Anne was choosing what she wanted, trying to cheer up poor, downcast Toby at the same time.

'Can we stay and help you this morning, Toby?' asked Julian, when he and Anne came back. He knew that Toby had many jobs to do on the farm, although it was a holiday week - and he thought, too, that it would be good for the boy to have company that worrying morning.

'Yes. I'd like you to!' said Toby, brightening at once. 'I told Dad I'd limewash the hen-houses today - it's just the kind of day for that, nice and dry with a little breeze. You and Dick could help and we'd get them all done by dinner-time.'

'Right. We'll help you all morning, then we'll go back to our camp and have a picnic lunch,' said Julian. 'If you've finished all the jobs you have to do, you could come back with us - and we could go on a hike or something this afternoon.'

'Oh yes!' said Toby, cheering up considerably. 'Come on, then - we'll get the lime and find the brushes. Hey, Binky, come and help us - and you, too, Timmy.'

'Wait a minute - can't we help?' said George. 'I can limewash hen-houses as well as anyone!'

'Oh, no, George - it's a messy job - a job for boys not girls,' said Toby, and went off with Dick and Julian, leaving George looking furious.

'Now you've offended George,' said Dick, grinning. Toby was genuinely surprised.

'Have I really?' he said. 'Oh, of course - I forgot she doesn't like to be girlish! Half a minute!' He ran back to the window of the sitting-room and called through it.

'Hie, George! What about doing a job for my mother? She never has time to weed her flower-garden and she is always upset because it's so untidy. I suppose you and Anne couldn't do something about that?'

'Yes, of course!' called Anne, going out of the door. 'Let's find a trowel each, and something to put weeds in. George! Don't look so gloomy! Let's weed the whole bed and make it marvellous for Mrs. Thomas. She's so kind and generous, I'd like to do something for her.'

'All right. So would I,' said George, more graciously, and went with her cousin into the garden.

'I wish little Benny was at home,' said Anne, as she and George began their task a few minutes later, complete with trowels and two old tin pails for the weeds. 'I'd like him running round us, asking questions in that dear little high voice of his. And Curly, his pigling, running about like a funny little pig-puppy!'

'Yes. I like Benny, too,' said George, pulling up a handful of weeds. 'My word - there are more weeds than flowers in this bed.'

'Let's take Benny up to the camp with us this afternoon, if Toby comes,' said Anne. 'Then Toby can take him back with him when he goes. I love little Benny - I could look after him while you and the boys go hiking this afternoon.'

'All right,' said George, torn between wanting to stay with Anne and little Benny and his pig and going with the boys. 'Help - I've been stung by a most vicious nettle!'

All the children worked hard that morning. The hen-houses had been scrubbed down and well and truly lime-washed. Now they were drying quickly, the doors flung open to sun and wind. The girls had practically cleared the big flower-bed of weeds and were feeling rather pleased with it - and with themselves too!

There came the sound of a car at about a quarter to one. 'That must be Mrs. Thomas coming back from her shopping,' said George. 'Quick, let's finish this bed before she sees us - we've only about ten minutes' more work.'

'Benny will soon come running to see what we are doing,' said Anne. 'And little Curly, too. My word - I've just filled my ninth pail of weeds!'

The three boys came by just then, swinging their empty pails and carrying their big brushes. Timmy came, too, with quite a few white patches on his coat!

'Hallo, girls!' said Dick. 'My word you've done a fine job on that bed - you can actually see the flowers now!'

The girls sat back, pleased. 'Yes, it looks a bit better,' said Anne, pushing back her hair. 'Your mother's home, I think, Toby. We'd better go now, because you'll soon be having your dinner, and we'll be as hungry as hunters by the time we get back to our camp.'

'Right,' said Toby. 'Here, I'll take those pails of weeds for you - and the trowels!'

'Oh - thanks,' said George. 'Dick, Anne and I will go off to the camp now, with Timmy, and take the salad and stuff that wants washing under the spring - you bring the rest of the food, will you?'

'Of course,' said Dick. 'You take one basket, and we'll take the other.'

They went off with Toby. Anne and George went to look for Mrs. Thomas, but she had gone into the dairy and was not to be seen.

'Never mind - she'll be busy,' said Anne. 'We'll go off straight away and get our lunch ready.'

They went off to the farm-gate and up the path on to the steep slopes of Billycock Hill, the basket between them. Soon they were out of sight.

The boys washed their hands under a pump in the yard. Toby had gone to see his mother and to tell her what the police had said - but his father had already told her. She was very worried indeed.

'Poor Jeff! Poor Ray!' she said. Then she looked round as she heard the footsteps of Dick and Julian. 'Oh,' she said, 'I thought it was Benny. Where is he?'

'Benny - well, he was with you, wasn't he?' said Toby. 'You didn't leave him in the car, did you?'

'What do you mean, Toby?' said Mrs. Thomas, looking startled. 'I left Benny here at the farm. I didn't take him with me - I never do when I have a lot of shopping, he gets so bored!

'But, Mother - I've not seen him all morning!' said Toby. 'He's not at the farm. I've not seen him for hours!'

'Oh, Toby!' said his mother, looking frightened. 'Toby, what's happened to him then? I thought you'd look after him, as you usually do!'

'And I thought he'd gone with you,' groaned Toby. 'Dick - Julian have you seen Benny, or Curly?'

'No - we haven't set eyes on him this morning!' said Dick. 'Gosh - where's he got to? He may have gone up Billycock Hill to try and find our camp - I know he wanted to.'

'Toby - the horse-pond!' said Mrs. Thomas, looking pale. 'Go there - he may have fallen in. Look in the loft of the barn, too - and go into the machinery shed. Oh, Benny, Benny, where are you?' She turned to Dick and Julian, standing anxiously beside her. 'Go up to your camp,' she said. 'Hunt and call all the way. He may be lost on the hill-side. My little Benny! Perhaps his pigling "runned away" again, as he so often tells us - and he followed and got lost! Oh, dear, whatever shall I do?'

Chapter 20

A PECULIAR MESSAGE

Toby raced off to the horse-pond, very frightened. The pond was deep in the middle and Benny couldn't swim. Dick and Julian went off hurriedly through the farm-gate up to Billycock Hill, calling as they went.

'Benny! Benny, where are you? Benny!'

They toiled up the steep, heathery slopes, looking for any sign of the small boy, but there was none. They were both anxious, Benny was such a little wanderer, and his pig made such a good excuse for going long distances!

'Benny! BENNY!' they called, and sometimes the echo came back to them, calling the name, too. 'Perhaps he will be at the camp,' said Dick. 'I know he wanted to visit it. He may be there, the little monkey - with Curly, too.'

'I hope so,' said Julian, soberly. 'But it's a long way for his small legs to go. I don't see how he could possibly find the way without someone to guide him - he has never been there yet!

'Well, may be the girls spotted him on their way up,' said Dick. 'My word - this is a day, isn't it? - nobody knows where Jeff and Ray are - and nobody knows where little Benny is either! I don't call this a very good holiday!'

'Exciting - but decidedly worrying,' said Julian. 'Why do we always run into something like this? We never seem to have a really peaceful time!'

Dick glanced sideways at Julian and gave a fleeting smile. 'Would you like a really peaceful time, Ju?' he said. 'I don't think you would! Come on - let's shout again!'

They came to the camp at last, not having seen a sign of Benny or the pigling. He was not at the camp either, that was quite clear. The girls and Timmy were alone.

They were horrified when they were told about Benny. Anne went pale. 'Let's go and look for him at once,' she said. 'We must!'

'Well, can you make some sandwiches very quickly?' asked Dick. 'We're all hungry, and it won't take a minute. We can munch them as we go. Let's make a plan of campaign while you're cutting them.'

George and Anne set to work with the sandwiches. Anne's fingers were all thumbs, she was so shocked to hear that little Benny was missing. 'Oh, I hope nothing's happened to him!' she said. 'Missing all the morning - for hours! Poor Mrs. Thomas!'

'The sandwiches are ready,' said George. 'Now, what's the plan, Julian? We all separate, I suppose, and quarter the hill, shouting all the time?'

'That's it,' said Julian, beginning on his sandwiches hungrily, and slipping some tomatoes and radishes into his pocket. 'You go round that side, Anne and George, one of you high up on the hill, and one lower down, so that your shouts cover as much distance as possible. And Dick and I will do the same on this side. We'll go down to Butterfly Farm, too, in case he has wandered there.'

They all set off, and soon the hill echoed to stentorian shouts. 'BENNY! BE-ENNY! BENNY! Coo-ee, Benny! Coo-ee!'

Over the heather scrambled the four, with Timmy excitedly leaping about, too. He knew that Benny was lost, and he was sniffing for some smell of the small boy - but his sharp nose could find nothing.

Julian went to Butterfly Farm and searched all about, but there was no sign of the boy there. In fact, there was no sign of anyone, not even old Mrs. Janes. She had gone off somewhere, and the two men were out butterflying as usual. In fact, George and Anne saw them as they searched their side of the hill, and called to them.

'Have you seen anything of a small boy and a little pig?' The two men were curt and unhelpful. 'No. No sign at all.'

'I suppose they're annoyed because they still think the boys broke the glass of their Butterfly House!' said George. 'Well, I wish they would hunt for Benny instead of butterflies.'

It was two hours before Benny was found, and the Five had almost given up looking for him. They had met together as they came round the hill, and were standing in despair, wondering what to do next, when Timmy suddenly pricked up his ears. Then he barked - an excited little bark that said as plainly as possible, 'I've heard something interesting.'

'What is it then, Tim, what is it?' cried George at once. 'Go find, go find!'

Timmy trotted off, his ears well pricked. He stopped every now and again and listened, then went on again. The children listened, too, but they could hear nothing - no call, no groan, no whimper.

'Why - he's going downhill towards the caves,' said Julian at last. 'The caves! Why didn't we think of those? But how could that tiny little fellow have found the way there - it's a long and complicated way from Billycock Farm?'

'He might have followed Curly, the pig,' said Anne. 'We always thought that he only pretended that the pig ran away, so that he could wander where he liked and blame it on the pig. But this time the pig might really have "runned away"!'

'Let's hope it's Benny that Timmy can hear,' said Julian. 'I must say I can't hear a single sound and I've got pretty sharp ears!'

And then the next minute they all heard something - a small, tired voice calling high and clear - 'Curly! Curly! I want you!'

'BENNY!' yelled everyone and leapt ahead so fast that the heathery ground shook beneath their trampling feet.

Timmy was there first, of course, and when the four children came up, they saw him gently licking the golden-haired little boy, who had put his arms round the dog's neck in delight. Benny was sitting just outside the entrance of the caves, all by himself - his pigling was not there.

'Benny! Oh, Benny darling, we've found you,' cried Anne, and knelt down beside him. He looked up at the others, not seeming at all surprised to see them.

'Curly runned away,' he said. 'He runned right away. Curly's gonned in there,' and he pointed into the caves.

'Thank goodness you didn't follow him!' said George. 'You might never have been found! Come along - we must take you home!'

But as soon as she lifted up the child he began to kick and scream. 'No! No! I want Curly! I want Curly!'

'Darling, he'll come along when he's tired of the caves,' said Anne. 'But your Mummy wants you now - and your dinner is waiting for you.'

'I'm hungry,' announced Benny. 'I want my dinner - but I want Curly, too. Curly! Curly! Come here!'

'We must take Benny back,' said Dick. 'His mother will be so terribly worried. Curly will eventually come out if he's got sense enough to remember the way - if not, well - it's just too bad! We daren't go wandering down the unroped paths in case we get lost. Come on, bring Benny, George.'

'Curly will come when he's ready,' George said, as she carried the little boy away from the entrance to the caves. 'But now your Mummy wants you, and your dinner's waiting.'

With Timmy jumping up delightedly beside her, she carried the small boy down the chalky path, talking to him. They were all so thankful to have found him that they felt quite cheerful, forgetting Jeff and Ray for a time. They teased little Benny, trying to make him forget his lost pet.

Mrs. Thomas was overjoyed to see the small boy again. She cried over him as she took him into her arms. 'Oh, Benny, Benny - what a bad pair you are, you and your pigling.'

'He runned away,' said Benny, of course. He was set down at the table to have his dinner and began to eat very fast indeed because he was so hungry. Everyone sat and watched him, so glad to have him safe again that they hardly took their eyes off him while he gobbled his meal.

He finished at last. 'I'm going to look for Curly,' he announced as he got down from his chair.

'Oh, no, you're not,' said his mother. 'You're going to stay with me. I want you to help me to make some cakes. Curly will come home when he's ready.'

And in an hour's time, when Julian, Dick, Anne, George and Toby were busy at the messy job of cleaning out the duck-pond, Curly did come back. He trotted into the farmyard, making his usual funny little squeals, and everyone looked round at once.

'CURLY! You have come back! Oh, you bad little pig!' cried George, and Timmy ran up to the pigling and sniffed him and licked him. The pig turned himself round to look for Benny - and Julian laughed.

'Someone's written something on him - in black! Come here, Curly, and let's see.'

Curly trotted over to him, and Julian examined the rather smudged black lettering. 'Can't make it out,' he said. 'Somebody's printed something on his pink little body - silly thing to do - but it will wash off.'

'Wait!' said Dick sharply, as Julian bent to get one of the rags they were using, to wash the pigling's body. 'WAIT, I say! Look - isn't that a J and a T and below those are letters that look like R and V - no, W, because half that letter has been rubbed off by heather or something.'

Now everyone was staring in excitement. 'J... T, and R... W!' said Toby in a breathless voice. Then it rose to a shout. 'They stand for JEFF THOMAS AND RAY WELLS. What does it mean - who put those letters there?'

'There are some more letters, smaller and rather smudged,' said Julian. 'Hold the pigling still, Dick. We must, we must make out what they are! It's some kind of message from Jeff and Ray. The pigling must have been where they are hidden!'

They all looked earnestly at the smudgy letters, which appeared to be five in number. They were almost unreadable - but Dick's sharp brain got hold of them at last.

'The word is CAVES!' he said. 'See - the first letter might be G or O or C - but the third one is certainly V and last is S. I'm sure it's CAVES - and that's where Curly went, we know.'

'Whew! That's where Jeff and Ray are hidden then,' said Julian. 'Quite near, after all - and we thought they had been taken away by car and hidden miles away! Quick - where's your father, Toby?'

Mr. Thomas was found and was shown Curly, with the smudgy black letters on his back. He was astounded. 'So Curly went wandering in the caves, did he - what a pig he is! Can't keep his nose out of anything! And somehow he went to where Jeff and Ray were. What a strange way to send a message - they could surely have tied one on to his tail, or round his neck - these letters are almost unreadable!'

'I nearly washed them off, thinking that somebody had played a silly joke on Curly,' said Julian. 'My word - if I had, we'd not have known where Jeff and Ray were. What shall we do now, sir?'

Go to the caves at once? Telephone the police?'

'Both!' said Mr. Thomas. 'The police must know because they are searching everywhere, of course. Now - you start off to the caves - but take a ball of string with you, because Jeff and Ray won't have been hidden in any of the roped tunnels, where sightseers so often go, and without string you might not be able to find your way back down the unroped ones. You may find that you need to unwind the string in order to get back safely. And take Timmy. He'll be useful.'

'He certainly will!' said Julian. 'And we'll take the little pig, too, so that Timmy can smell him, and then smell the tracks Curly made as he wandered through the caves, and follow them! We shan't have to wander all about wondering where Jeff and Ray are then.'

The Five set off at once, with Toby, too, all as excited as they could possibly be.

'Good old Jeff! Good old Ray!' Toby kept saying. 'We're coming! Hang on, we're coming!'

Chapter 21

AN EXCITING FINISH

Up the heathery hill panted the five children and Timmy. Julian carried the frightened little pig, who was not at all sure what was happening to him. He kicked and squealed but nobody took any notice of him - he would be of importance when they reached the caves, but not till then!

At last they reached the chalky roadway to the caves and pounded along it, the loose bits of chalk flying between their feet. They came to the entrance where the warning notice stood.

'Timmy!' called George as Julian put down the trembling little pig and held him tightly. 'Timmy - come here! Smell Curly - that's right - smell him all over - now follow, follow, follow! Smell where he went in the caves - and follow, Tim, follow!'

Timmy knew perfectly well what tracking meant and obediently smelt Curly thoroughly, and then put his nose to the ground to follow the scent of the pigling's footsteps. He soon picked it up, and began to run into the first cave.

He stopped and looked back enquiringly. 'Go on, Tim, go on - I know this seems peculiar to you when we've got Curly here - but we want to know where he went!' called George, afraid that Timmy might think it was just a silly game and give up. Timmy put his nose to the ground again. He came to the magnificent cave, full of the gleaming 'icicles', the stalactites and stalagmites, some of them looking like shining pillars. Then into the next cave, which, with its glowing rainbow colours, had reminded Anne of a Fairyland cave. Then through the next cave they went - and came to the forking of the ways.

'Here we are - at the three tunnels,' said George. 'I bet Timmy won't go down the usual roped one that all visitors would take ...'

As she spoke the words Timmy, nose to ground, still following the scent of the pigling's footsteps, took the left-hand, unroped way - and everyone followed, torches shining brightly.

'I thought so!' said George, and her voice began to echo round. 'Thought so, thought so, so, so ...' 'Do you remember those awful noises we heard the other day - that piercing whistling, and those howls?' said Dick. 'Well, I bet they were made by the bullies who dragged Jeff and Ray here! I expect they heard Timmy barking - he must have heard the men, probably, though we didn't - and they were scared in case we were coming. So they made those frightful noises to scare us off, and the echoes magnified them horribly.'

'Well, they certainly scared us away all right,' said Anne, remembering. 'Yes - it must have been those men - there aren't any awful noises today! My word, what a long, winding tunnel this is - and look, it's forking into two!'

'Timmy will know which way to take,' said George - and, of course he did. With his nose to the ground, he chose the left-hand one without any hesitation.

'You didn't really need to bring a ball of string, Julian,' said Toby. 'Timmy will easily be able to take us the right way back, won't he?'

'Yes,' said Julian. 'He's better than any unwinding ball of string! But without Tim we'd never find the way back - there are so many caves, and so many tunnels. We must be well into the heart of the hill now.'

Timmy suddenly stopped in his tracking, raised his head, and listened. Could he hear Jeff and Ray? He barked loudly - and from somewhere in the near distance came a shout. 'Hoy! Hoy! This way! This way!'

'It's Jeff!' shouted Toby, dancing in the dark tunnel with excitement. 'JEFF! CAN YOU HEAR ME? JEFF!'

And a voice came back at once. 'Hie, Toby! This way, this way!'

Timmy ran down the passage and stopped. At first the children could not see why - and then they saw that the passage came to an end there - a blank wall faced them just beyond Timmy - and yet

Jeff's voice came quite clearly to them!

'Here we are, here!'

'Why - there's a hole in the floor of the tunnel just by Timmy!' cried Julian, shining his torch on it. 'That's where Jeff and Ray are - down that hole. Hey, Cousin Jeff - are you down there?'

Julian shone his torch right through the hole - and there, lying on the floor of a cave below was Ray - and standing beside him, looking up eagerly, was Jeff!

'Thank God you've found us!' he said. 'Those fellows told us they were leaving us here and not coming back. Ray's got a twisted ankle - he can't stand on it. They pushed us down this hole without any warning, and he fell awkwardly. But with your help we can get him up.'

'Jeff, oh, Jeff - I'm so glad we've found you!' yelled Toby, trying to look down into the hole with Julian. 'What's the best way to get you up? This entrance hole isn't very big.'

'If you can manage to pull me up, that's the first thing to do,' said Jeff, considering the matter. 'Then two of you boys can go down to Ray, and help him to stand, and I think I could haul him up. This is an awful place - no outlet except through that small hole up there, which was too high for me to jump up to - and Ray couldn't stand, of course, to help me!'

There was soon a great deal of acrobatic work on the part of Jeff, Julian and Dick! The two boys managed to haul up Jeff by lying down on the floor above, and putting their arms and shoulders through the hole to drag him up! Toby and George had to hold on to their legs to prevent them from being pulled into the hole! And Anne had to hold the little pig, which did its best to try and get down the hole, too!

At last Jeff was up through the hole, and then the two boys, Julian and Dick, leapt down to Ray. He seemed rather dazed and Jeff said that he thought he had hurt his head as well as his leg when the men pushed them down the hole. Julian pulled him gently to his feet and then he and Dick lifted him until he could reach Jeff's swinging hands as he leaned down through the hole.

Poor Ray was pulled up at last, and then up went Julian and Dick in the same way. Timmy thought the whole procedure was most extraordinary, and produced volleys of excited barks, scaring the little pig almost out of its skin!

'Phew!' said Jeff, when at last Ray was up, and being helped by the others. 'I never thought we'd get out of there. Let's get away from this nightmare place as quickly as possible. What we want is a little fresh air and food - and water! Those brutes haven't been near us for what seems like weeks!'

They made their way back to the cave entrance, Timmy leading the way confidently, not even troubling to smell it. He never forgot a path once he had been along it.

They came out into the bright June sunshine, and it was so very dazzling to the two men who had been so long in pitch-black darkness that they had to shade their eyes.

'Sit down a bit till you get used to it,' said Julian. 'And tell us how you wrote your message on the pig! Did he suddenly appear down the hole?'

Jeff laughed. 'Well,' he said, 'there we were down in that awful hole, Ray and I - with no watch to tell us the time, no means of knowing if it was night or day, or even if it was last Thursday or next Monday! And suddenly we heard a pitter-pattering noise - and the next thing we knew was that something had fallen down through the hole and landed on top of us! It began to squeal like billy-o, so we guessed it was a little pig - though why a pig should suddenly descend on us out of the dark tunnel above us we simply couldn't imagine!'

Everyone laughed, even Ray. 'Go on,' said Dick. 'What did you do?'

'Well, we felt the pig all over and knew it was a baby,' said Jeff, 'but it didn't occur to us for some time that we might use it as a messenger! That was Ray's bright idea!'

'We could hardly read your message,' said Dick. 'It was just touch and go that we made it out.'

'I dare say - but when you consider that we had been robbed of everything - even my silver pencil taken, and my old fountain pen - to say nothing of my money, my watch and my torch - and Ray's, too - and that it was pitch-dark in the hole, I'm sure you will agree that we didn't make a bad job of printing that message!' said Jeff.

'But what did you print it with if your pockets had been emptied?' asked George, in wonder.

'Well, Ray found a tiny bit of black chalk at the bottom of his trouser pocket,' said Jeff. 'It's chalk we use to mark out our air-routes, on big maps - and that was all we had to use! Ray held the pigling and I printed our initials and the word CAVES on his back. I couldn't see what I was doing in the dark, but I just hoped for the best. Then I stood up and tossed the poor little pig through the hole! It was a jolly good shot, I must say - I heard him scrambling on the edge, and then away he trotted, the finest little pig in the world!'

'What a tale!' said Julian. 'My word, you're lucky, Jeff, that the pigling came home all right! It's a wanderer, that pig, always running away. And to think that I nearly washed your message off his back before we read it.'

'Whew! It gives me the creeps to hear that,' said Jeff. 'Now tell me what happened when it was discovered that we'd disappeared from the airfield - wasn't there an uproar?'

'Rather! You knew your planes were stolen, didn't you?' said Dick.

'I guessed that, when I heard two planes take off, just as some great thugs were hauling us up the hill,' said Jeff. 'I heard a dog barking as we were being kicked and dragged up - was it Timmy? I did hope he would come to our rescue.'

'Oh, yes - that must have been the time when he began to bark that night of the storm!' said George, remembering. 'So it was you and those thugs we heard - oh, what a pity he didn't know it!'

'Those two stolen planes crashed into the sea during the storm, Jeff,' said Toby. 'The pilots weren't found.'

'Oh,' said Jeff and was silent for a moment. 'I shall miss my dear old bus - well let's hope I get another plane - and Ray, too. Ray! How do you feel now? Can you hobble along again or not?'

'Yes - if the boys can help me as they did just now,' said Ray, who was already looking much better since he had been in the open air. 'Let's get along.'

It was very slow going - but fortunately the police met them half-way, on their way to the caves! Mr. Thomas had telephoned them and they had come along immediately. They took Ray in hand, and the little party made better progress.

'Put that pig down, Anne, you must be tired of carrying it,' said Dick. 'You look like Alice in Wonderland. She carried a pig, too!'

Anne laughed. 'I think it's gone to sleep, just like Alice's pig!' she said. And so it had!

They were all very thankful when at last they arrived at Billycock Farm. What a welcome they had from Mrs. Thomas, her husband and Benny. The little boy dragged his pigling from Anne's arms and hugged it. 'You runned away, you're bad, you runned fast!' he scolded, and set it down. It immediately scampered over to the barn, with Benny in pursuit, and Anne went to fetch them back.

'Now we'll all have tea - I've got it ready, hoping that everyone would be back in time from their extraordinary adventures!' said Mrs. Thomas. 'I know Jeff and Ray must be starved - you look quite thin in the face, Jeff.'

They all sat round the big table, Toby next to his hero, Cousin Jeff. They gazed with pleasure at the food there - surely never, never had there been such a spread before!

'Mother!' said Toby, his eyes gleaming. 'Mother, this isn't a meal - it's a BANQUET! Jeff - what will you have?'

'Everything!' said Jeff. 'Some of every single thing. I'll start with two boiled eggs, three slices of ham, two thick pieces of bread and butter, and some of that wonderful salad. My word, it's almost worth being down that hole for ages, to end up with a feast like this!'

It was a most hilarious tea, and for once Benny sat at the table throughout the whole meal, and didn't slip from his chair to go and find Curly. Why didn't they have parties like this every day? Why, even his father was there, roaring with laughter! What a pity the two policemen hadn't been able to stop to tea, too - Benny had a lot of questions to ask policemen! Where was Timmy? Yes, he was under the table - Benny could feel him with his foot. And, yes, Binky was there, too, just by Toby.

He slid his hand down with a large piece of cake in it, and immediately it was taken gently from his hand by a hairy mouth - Timmy was having a wonderful time, too!

Everyone was sorry when the grand meal was over. Jeff and Ray now had to report to the airfield, and Mr. Thomas offered to take them in his car. The children went to see them off.

'It will seem awfully dull now, up in our camp on the hill-side,' said Dick. 'So many things have happened in the last few days - and now nothing will happen at all!'

'Rubbish!' said Jeff. 'I promise you something will happen - something grand!'

'What?' asked everyone eagerly.

'I shall see that you're all given a free flight in a plane as soon as possible - perhaps tomorrow,' said Jeff. 'And - I shall pilot it! Now then - anyone want to loop the loop with me?'

What shouts and squeals from everyone! Jeff made a face and put his hands to his ears.

'Me too, me too - and Curly!' came Benny's little high voice.

'Where is Curly?' said Jeff, looking out of the car. 'I really must shake hooves with him - he's been a wonderful friend to me and Ray! Wherever is he?'

'I don't know,' said Benny, looking all round. 'He must have...'

'Runned away!' chorused everyone, and Timmy barked at the sudden shout. He put his paws up on the car and licked Jeff's hand.

'Thanks, old boy,' said Jeff. 'We couldn't have done without you either! So long, everybody - see you tomorrow - and then whoooops! - up in the clouds we'll go!'

THE END

Enid Blyton

THE
FAMOUS
FIVE

FIVE GET INTO A FIX

ENID BLYTON

FAMOUS FIVE 17

Five Get Into A Fix

Contents

| | | |
|----|----------------------------|----|
| 1 | A Miserable Christmas | 2 |
| 2 | Off To Magga Glen | 6 |
| 3 | The End Of The Journey | 11 |
| 4 | In The Old Farmhouse | 15 |
| 5 | Things Might Be Worse! | 19 |
| 6 | A Funny Little Creature | 24 |
| 7 | Back At The Farm Again | 28 |
| 8 | Off To The Little Hut | 33 |
| 9 | A Strange Tale | 37 |
| 10 | In The Middle Of The Night | 41 |
| 11 | Strange Happenings | 46 |
| 12 | Out On The Hills | 50 |
| 13 | Aily Is Surprising | 55 |
| 14 | Morgan Is Surprising Too | 59 |
| 15 | What's Up, Tim? | 64 |
| 16 | Aily Changes Her Mind | 69 |
| 17 | The Big, Big Hole | 73 |
| 18 | Inside Old Towers | 78 |
| 19 | A Lot Of Excitement | 82 |
| 20 | In The Heart Of The Hill | 87 |
| 21 | An Astounding Thing | 92 |
| 22 | All's Well That Ends Well! | 97 |

Chapter 1
A MISERABLE CHRISTMAS

'I do think these Christmas holidays have been the worst we've ever had,' said Dick.

'Jolly bad luck on old George, coming to stay with us for Christmas - and then us all going down with those awful colds and coughs,' said Julian.

'Yes - and being in bed on Christmas Day was horrible,' said George. 'The worst of it was I couldn't eat anything. Fancy not being hungry on Christmas Day! I never thought that would happen to me!'

'Timmy was the only one of us who didn't get ill,' said Anne, patting him. 'You were a pet, Tim, when we were in bed. You divided your time between us nicely.'

'Woof!' said Timmy, rather solemnly. He hadn't been at all happy this Christmas. To have four of the five in bed, coughing and sneezing, was quite unheard of!

'Well, anyhow, we're all up again,' said Dick. 'Though my legs don't really feel as if they belong to me yet!'

'Oh - do yours feel like that too?' asked George. 'I was quite worried about mine!'

'We all feel the same,' said Julian, 'but we shall be quite different in a day or two - now we're up. Anyway - we go back to school next week - so we'd better feel all right!'

Everyone groaned - and then coughed. 'That's the worst of this germ we've had, whatever it is,' said George. 'If we laugh - or speak loudly - or groan - we start coughing. I shall go completely mad if I don't get rid of my cough. It keeps me awake for hours at night!'

Anne went to the window. 'It's been snowing again,' she said. 'Not much - but it looks lovely. To think we might have been out in it all last week. I do think it's too bad to have holidays like this.'

George joined her at the window. A car drew up outside and a burly, merry-looking man got out and hurried up the steps to the front door.

'Here's the doctor,' said Anne. 'I bet he'll say we're all quite all right to go back to school next week!'

In a minute or two the door opened and the doctor came into the room, with the mother of Julian, Dick and Anne. She looked tired - and no wonder! Looking after four ill children and a most miserable dog over Christmas had not been an easy job!

'Well, here they are - all up and about now!' said Mrs. Barnard. 'They look pretty down in the mouth, don't they?'

'Oh - they'll soon perk up,' said Dr. Drew, sitting down and looking at each of the four in turn. 'George looks the worst - not so strong as the others, I suppose.'

George went red with annoyance, and Dick chuckled. 'Poor George is the weakling of the family,' he said. 'She had the highest temperature, the worst cough, and the loudest groans, and she...'

But whatever else he was going to say was lost beneath the biggest cushion in the room, which an angry George had flung at him with all her might. Dick flung it back, and everyone began to laugh, George too. That set all the four coughing, of course, and the doctor put his hands to his ears.

'Will they be well enough to go to school, Doctor?' asked Mrs. Barnard anxiously.

'Well, yes - they would - but they ought to get rid of those coughs first,' said the doctor. He looked out of the window at the snow. 'I wonder now - no - I don't suppose it's possible - but...'

'But what?' said Dick, pricking up his ears at once. 'Going to send us to Switzerland for a skiing holiday, Doc? Fine! Absolutely smashing!'

The doctor laughed. 'You're going too fast!' he said. 'No - I wasn't actually thinking of Switzerland - but perhaps somewhere hilly, not far from the sea. Somewhere really bracing, but not too cold - where the snow will lie, so that you can toboggan and ski, but without travelling as far as Switzerland. Switzerland is expensive, you know!'

'Yes. I suppose it is,' said Julian. 'No - we can't expect a holiday in Switzerland just because we've had beastly colds! But I must say a week somewhere would be jolly nice!'

'Oh yes!' said George, her eyes shining. 'It would really make up for these miserable holidays! Do you mean all by ourselves, Doctor? We'd love that.'

'Well, no - someone ought to be there, surely,' said Dr. Drew. 'But that's up to your parents.'

'I think it's a jolly good idea,' said Julian. 'Mother - don't you think so? I'm sure you're longing to be rid of us all for a while. You look worn out!'

His mother smiled. 'Well - if it's what you need - a short holiday somewhere to get rid of your coughs - you must have it. And I won't say that I shan't enjoy a little rest while you're enjoying yourselves having a good time! I'll talk it over with your father.'

'Woof!' said Timmy, looking enquiringly at the doctor, both ears pricked high.

'He says - he needs a rest somewhere too,' explained George. 'He wants to know if he can come with us.'

'Let's have a look at your tongue, Timmy, and give me your paw to feel if it's hot or not,' said Dr. Drew, gravely. He held out his hand, and Timmy obediently put his paw into it.

The four children laughed - and immediately began to cough again. How they coughed! The doctor shook his head at them. 'What a din! I shouldn't have made you laugh. Now I shan't be coming to see you again until just before you go back to school. I expect your mother will let me know when that day comes. Goodbye till then - and have a good time, wherever you go!'

'We will!' said Julian. 'And thanks for bothering about us so much. We'll send you a card when our coughs are gone!'

As soon as Dr. Drew had driven off in his car, there was a conference. 'We can go off somewhere, can't we, Mother?' said Dick, eagerly. 'The sooner the better! You must be tired to death of our coughs, night and day!'

'Yes. I think you must go somewhere for a week or ten days,' said his mother. 'But the question is - where? You could go off to George's home, I suppose - Kirrin Cottage... but it's not high up... and besides, George's father would certainly not welcome four coughs like yours!'

'No. He'd go mad at once,' said George. 'He'd fling open his study door - and stride into our room - and shout 'Who's mak...''

But as George began to shout, she coughed - and that was the end of her little piece of acting!

'That's enough, George,' said her aunt. 'For goodness' sake, go and get a drink of water.'

There was much debating about where they could go for a little while, and all the time they were talking the snow fell steadily. Dick went to the window, pleased.

'If only we could find a place high up on a hill, just as the doctor said, a place where we could use our toboggans, and our skis,' he said. 'Gosh, it makes me feel better already to think of it. I do hope this snow goes on and on.'

'I think I'd better ring up a holiday agency and see if they can offer us something sensible,' said his mother. 'Maybe a summer camp set up on a hill would do - it would be empty now, and you could have the choice of a hut or a chalet or something.'

But all her telephoning came to nothing! 'No,' said the agencies. 'Sorry - we haven't anything to suggest. Our camps are all closed down now. No - we know of no winter ones in this country at all!'

And then, as so often happens, the problem was suddenly solved by somebody no one had thought of asking ... old Jenkins, the gardener! There was nothing for him to do that day except sweep a path through the snow. He saw the children watching him from the window, grinned and came up to them.

'How are you?' he shouted. 'Would you like some apples? They've ripened nicely now, those late ones. Your mother said you weren't feeling like apples - or pears either. But maybe you're ready for some now.'

'Yes! We are!' shouted Julian, not daring to open the window in case his mother came in and was angry to see him standing with his head out in the cold. 'Bring them in, Jenkins. Come and talk to us!'

So old Jenkins came in, carrying a basket of ripe, yellow apples, and some plump, brown-yellow pears.

'And how are you now?' he said, in his soft Welsh voice, for he came from the Welsh mountains. 'It's pale you are, and thin too. Ah, it's the mountain air of Wales you want!'

He smiled all over his wrinkled brown face, handing round his basket. The children helped themselves to the fruit.

'Mountain air - that's what the doctor ordered!' said Julian, biting into a juicy pear. 'I suppose you don't know somewhere like that we could go to, do you, Jenkins?'

'Well, my aunt now, she lets rooms in the summertime!' said Jenkins. 'And a good cook she is, my Aunt Glenys. But the winter-time now - I'm not knowing if she'd do it then, what with the snow and all. Her farm's on the hillside, man - and the slope runs right down to the sea. A fine place it is in the summer - but there'll be nothing but snow there now, sure as I'm telling you.'

'But - it sounds exactly right,' said Anne, delighted. 'Doesn't it, Ju? Let's call Mother! Mother! Mother, where are you?'

Her mother came running in, afraid that one of the children was feeling ill again. She was most astonished to see old Jenkins there - and even more astonished to hear the four children pouring out what he had just told them. Timmy added a few excited barks, and Jenkins stood twirling his old hat, quite overcome.

The excitement made Julian and Dick cough distressingly. 'Now listen to me,' said their mother, firmly. 'Go straight upstairs, and take another dose of your cough medicine. I'll talk to Jenkins and find out what all this is about. No - don't interrupt, Dick. GO!'

They went at once, and left their mother talking to the bewildered gardener. 'Blow this cough!' said Dick, pouring out his usual dose. 'Gosh, I hope Mother fixes up something with Jenkins' aunt. If I don't go off somewhere and lose this cough, I shall go mad - stark, staring mad!'

'I bet we'll go to his old aunt,' said Julian. 'That's if she'll take us. It's the kind of sudden idea that clicks - don't you think so?'

Julian was right. The idea did 'click'. His mother had actually met Jenkins' old aunt that spring, when she had come to visit her relations, and Jenkins had brought her proudly up to the house to introduce her to the cook. So when Dick and Julian went downstairs again, they were met with good news.

'I'm telephoning to Jenkins' aunt, old Mrs. Jones,' said their mother. 'And if she'll take you - well off you can go in a day or two - coughs and all!'

Chapter 2

OFF TO MAGGA GLEN

Everything was soon settled. Old Mrs. Jones, whose voice came remarkably clearly over the long-distance call, seemed delighted to take the four children.

'Yes, Mam. I understand. Oh, their coughs won't last a day here, don't you be fretting, Mam. And how's my nephew, Ifor Jenkins, Mam? It's hoping I am that he's still pleasing you. A wild boy he was, and...'

'Mother! Tell her we're bringing a dog, too,' said Julian, in his mother's ear. George had been making wild gestures to him, pointing first to Timmy, then to the telephone, where her aunt stood patiently listening to old Mrs. Jones' gossipy talk.

'Oh - er - Mrs. Jones - there'll be a dog, too!' said her aunt. 'What - you've seven dogs already? Good gracious! Oh, for the sheep, of course...'

'Seven dogs, Timmy!' said George, in a low voice to Tim, who wagged his tail at once. 'What do you think of that? Seven! You'll have the time of your life!'

'Sh!' said Julian, seeing his mother glance crossly at George. He felt thankful that this unexpected holiday had been so quickly fixed up. Like the others, he was beginning to feel very down and dull. It would be wonderful to go away. He wondered where their skis were...

Everyone looked brighter when things had been settled. No school for some time! No lounging about the house wishing something would happen! Timmy would be able to go for long walks at last. They would be on their own again, too, a thing the Five loved.

Jenkins was very helpful in looking out toboggans and skis. He brought them all into the house to be examined and cleaned. Something exciting to do at last! Their exertions made them all cough badly, but they didn't mind so much now.

'Only two days to wait - then we're off!' said Dick. 'Ought we to take our skates, do you think?'

'No. Jenkins says there's no skating round about the farm,' said George. 'I asked him. I say - look at that mound of woollen clothes your mother's just brought in, Ju! We might be going to the North Pole!'

'Whew, Mother! If we wear all those, we'll never be able to ski!' said Julian. 'Gosh, look - six scarves! Even if Timmy wears one, that's one too many.'

'One or two may get wet,' said his mother. 'It won't matter how many clothes you take - you're going by car, and we can easily get everything in.'

'I'll take my field-glasses, too,' said Dick. 'You never know when they might be useful. George, old thing, I do hope Timmy will be friends with the farm dogs. It would be awful if he quarrelled with them - and he does sometimes get fierce with other dogs, you know - especially if we make a fuss of them!'

'He'll behave perfectly,' said George. 'And there's no need to make a fuss of other dogs if we've got Timmy.'

'All right, teacher!' said Dick, and George stopped her polishing and threw her duster at him. Yes - certainly things were getting normal again!

When the time came for the children to set out on their journey they were feeling a good deal better - though their coughs were still almost as bad! 'I do hope you'll lose those awful coughs, Julian, before you come back,' said his mother. 'It worries me to hear you all cough, cough, cough, day and night!'

'Poor old Mother - you have had a time!' said Julian, giving her a hug. 'You've been a brick. What a sigh of relief you'll give when we're all safely away in the car!'

At last the car came, driving up the snowy path to the house. It was a hired car, a very big one, and that was fortunate, as the children's luggage was truly colossal! The driver was a cheerful little man, and he and Jenkins soon had the suit-cases, toboggans, skis and all the rest either in the boot of the car, or strapped on top.

'There we are, Mam!' said the driver at last. 'Everything made fast. We're making a nice early start, and we should be safe in Magga Glen before it's dark.'

'We're all ready to start!' said Julian and the little man nodded and smiled, climbing into the driving-seat. Dick sat beside him, and the other three sat at the back, with Timmy on their feet. Not that he would stay there long! He liked to look out of the window just as much as the children did!

Everyone heaved a sigh of relief as the car slid down the drive. They were off at last! Jenkins was at the gate, and waved as they went past.

'Remember me to my old aunt now!' he shouted, as he shut the gate.

The driver was very chatty. He soon heard all about their miserable holidays, and how much they were looking forward to their unexpected break before going back to school. In return he told them all about himself and his family - and as he had eleven brothers and sisters, his tale lasted for a good part of the journey!

They stopped for a meal in the car after some time, and found that they were hungry for the first time since they had been ill.

'Good gracious - I can really taste these sandwiches!' said George, in a surprised voice. 'Can you, Anne?'

'Yes - they don't taste of cardboard - like all our meals have lately,' said Anne. 'Timmy - you're not going to fare so well, now that we're getting our appetites back!'

'He was a very good dustbin while we were ill, wasn't he?' said Dick. 'He simply gobbled up all the bits and pieces we couldn't eat. Ugh - that boiled fish! It tasted like stewed knitting!'

They laughed - and that set them off coughing again. The driver listened and shook his head. 'Nasty coughs you've got!' he said. 'Reminds me of the time when me and my family got whooping-cough - twelve of us together. My, when we all whooped, it sounded like a lot of fire-sirens going off!'

That made the children laugh again, and cough. But somehow nobody minded the irritating coughs now - they would surely soon be gone, once they could get out into the country and try their legs at running and racing and skiing once again.

It was a long drive. All the children fell asleep in the car after their meal, and the driver smiled to see them lolling back against one another, looking very peaceful. Only Timmy was awake, and he climbed cautiously up between George and the window, wishing the window was open, so that he could put his big nose out into the wind, as he loved to do.

They stopped for a very early tea at a tea-shop in a village. 'Better stretch your legs a bit,' said the driver, getting out. 'I know I want to stretch mine. Look - I'm going into that place over there for my tea. There's plenty of my pals there, and I'd enjoy a chat. You go and tuck in at this tea-shop here, and ask for their buttered crumpets. Best in the kingdom they are! Be back for you in a quarter of an hour - not longer, or we shan't be at the farmhouse before dark. It's still about an hour's run, but there'll be a moon later on.'

They were all glad to stretch their legs. Timmy bounded out as if he were on springs, barking madly. He was disappointed to find that they were only making a short stop - he had hoped they were at the end of their journey. But he was pleased to be given a buttery crumpet all to himself in the tea-shop. He licked every scrap of butter off first, much to the children's amusement.

'I'd rather like to do that myself, Timmy,' said Anne. 'But it's not really good manners, you know! Oh, don't make my shoe buttery - take your crumpet a bit farther away.'

They had time for two crumpets each, and a cup of hot tea. Julian bought some chocolate biscuits, as he felt unexpectedly hungry, even after two crumpets.

'Marvellous to feel even a bit hungry, after not being able to look even bread and butter in the face!' he said. 'I knew we must be jolly ill that day we couldn't eat even ice-cream though Mother tried to tempt us with some!'

'My legs are still a bit funny,' said Anne, walking back to the car. 'But they're beginning to feel as if they belong to me, thank goodness!'

They set off again. They were in Wales now, and mountains were beginning to loom up in the distance. It was a very clear evening, and although the mountains were white with snow, the countryside they passed was not nearly as snowy as their own home had been when they left.

'I hope to goodness the snow doesn't begin to melt, just as we've arrived,' said Dick. 'It seems all right up on the mountains at present - but down here in the valleys there's hardly any.'

They passed a sign-post, and Julian looked to see what it said. He made out a word that looked like Cymryhlli, and called to the driver.

'Did you see that sign-post? Should we look out for Magga Glen now?'

'Yes. We must be getting on that way,' said the driver. 'I've been looking out for it myself. I wonder I haven't seen it yet.'

'Goodness! I hope we haven't lost our way,' said Anne. 'It will soon be dark.'

The car went on and on. 'Better look out for a village,' said Julian. But they didn't come to one - nor did they see any other sign-posts. The night was now coming on, but there was already a small moon, which gave a little light.

'Are you sure we're right?' Dick asked the driver. 'The road seems to be getting a bit rough - and we haven't passed even a farmhouse for ages.'

'Well - maybe we are on the wrong road,' admitted the driver, slowing down. 'Though where we took the wrong turning I simply don't know! I reckon we're near the sea now.'

'Look - there's a turning up to the right!' shouted George, as they went slowly on. 'It's got a sign-post, too!'

They stopped by the sign-post, which was only a small one. 'It doesn't say Magga Glen,' said Dick, disappointed. 'It says Old Towers - just that. Would it be the name of a place, do you think - or a building? Where's a map?'

The driver hadn't one. 'I don't usually need a map,' he said. 'But this here countryside isn't sign-posted as it should be, and I wish I'd brought my route with me. I guess we'd better turn right and go up to see this Old Towers. Maybe they can put us on our road!'

So they swung up to the right, and the car went slowly, crawling up a long, steep, winding road.

'It's quite a mountain,' said Anne, peering out of the window. 'Oh - I can see something - a building on the side of the hill, look - with towers. This must be it.'

They came to stout wooden gates. On them was a large notice, with just two words on it in large black letters:

KEEP OUT

'Well - that's nice and polite!' said the driver, angrily. 'Keep out! Why should we? Wait a bit - there's a little lodge here. I'll go and ask our way.'

But the lodge was no more helpful than the big gate. It was in complete darkness, and when the driver banged on the door, there was no answer at all. Now what could they do?

Chapter 3

THE END OF THE JOURNEY

'Well - we'd better turn round and go back down the hill,' said Dick, as the driver came back to the car.

'No, wait, I'll just hop out and see if there are any lights anywhere,' said Julian, and jumped out of the car. 'I could go up the drive a little way and see if I can spot the house itself. It can't be very far. After all, we spotted it just now as we came up the winding road.'

He went to the gates, and looked at them in the light from the car's headlamps. 'They're padlocked,' he called. 'But I think I can climb over. There's certainly a light somewhere beyond - though how far, I don't know.'

But before he could climb over the gate there came the sound of running footsteps behind it - and then a loud and savage howl came on the night air, and some animal hurled itself against the other side of the gate.

The driver got back hurriedly into the car and slammed the door. Julian also ran to the car, finding his legs could go quickly if he wanted them to, for all their feebleness!

Timmy began to bark fiercely, and tried to leap through the closed car-window. The howling and barking behind the gates went on and on, and the dog there, which must have been a very big one, continually hurled itself against the gates, shaking them from top to bottom.

'Better turn round and go,' said the driver, scared.

'Whew! I'm glad I'm this side of those gates. What a din! That dog of yours is almost as bad, too!' Timmy was certainly furious. Why wasn't he allowed to get out and tell the other dog what he thought of him? George tried to pacify him, but he wouldn't stop barking. The driver began to turn the car round, cautiously backing a little and then going forward, and backing again. The road was fairly wide, but there was a very steep slope to the right of the car. Old Towers was certainly built on a mountainside!

'The people there must be jolly scared of burglars to have a dog like that,' said Dick. 'Yet it's such a lonely place you wouldn't think many people would come near it. What's up, driver?'

'There's something wrong,' said the driver, who now had the car facing back down the road again. 'The car seems very heavy to drive, all of a sudden. As if I'd got my brakes on.'

'Perhaps you have,' said Julian.

'Well, I haven't,' said the driver, shortly. 'That is, only just a little, to make sure the car doesn't shoot off down the hill - you can see it's pretty steep here, and there's almost a cliff, your side. Don't want to drive down there in the dark! What can be the matter with the car? It will only crawl.'

'I thought it came up the hill terribly slowly, too,' said Dick. 'I know the road was steep and winding - but didn't it seem to you as if the car was making heavy work of it?'

'Well, yes, it did,' admitted the driver. 'But I just thought the hill must be steeper than I imagined. What is the matter with the car? I've got no brake on at all, and I'm pushing the accelerator down hard - and still she crawls! As if she'd got a ton weight to pull!'

It really was a puzzle. Julian felt worried. He didn't want them to have to spend the night in the car, lost in a cold countryside - especially as now it was beginning to snow lightly! The moon had disappeared behind heavy clouds, and everything looked very dark indeed.

They reached the bottom of the hill at last, and came on to the level road again. The driver heaved a sigh of relief - and then gave a sudden exclamation.

'What's happened? The car's all right again! She's going like a bird! Whew - that's a load off my mind! I thought she was going to pack up, and leave us to spend the night here.'

The car sped along well now, and everyone was most relieved. 'Must have been something wrong with her works somewhere,' said the driver. 'But I'm blessed if I know what it was! Now - look out for a house or a signpost.'

They actually came to a sign-post not long after that, and George yelled out at once. 'Stop! Here's a signpost. STOP!'

The car slid to a stop beside it, and everyone looked at it and gave a shout of delight. 'Magga Glen! Hurrah!'

'Up to the left,' said the driver, and swung his car into the lane. It was rather rough, and obviously only a farm-road - but there, right up the hill they were now climbing, was a house, with lights shining in the windows. That must be old Mrs. Jones' farmhouse.

'Thank goodness!' said Julian. 'This must be it. I'm glad we got here before the snow set in properly. It's quite difficult to see through the windscreen now.'

Yes - it was the farmhouse. Dogs set up a terrific barking as the car drew near, and Timmy at once answered, almost deafening everyone in the car!

The driver drew up at the farmhouse door, and looked out cautiously to make sure that none of the barking dogs was leaping about round the car. The front door opened, and framed in the light stood a little old woman, as upright as any of the children!

'Come you in, come you in!' she called. 'Out of this cold and snow! Our Morgan will help with the luggage. Come you in, now!'

The four children, suddenly feeling very tired, got out of the car. Anne almost stumbled, because once again her legs felt as if they didn't belong to her, and Julian caught her arm. They went in wearily, only Timmy seeming to have any energy! A tall man hurried out to help the driver with the luggage, saluting them as he passed.

The old lady took them into a big warm living-room and made them sit down. 'What a journey for you!' she said. 'You look worn out and poorly. It's late you are, too, and I'd a good tea laid for you. But now it's supper you'll be wanting, poor children!'

Julian caught sight of a loaded table not far from the fire, set to one side. Although he was tired, the sight of the good food there made him suddenly feel hungry. He smiled at the kind old woman. Her hair gleamed like silver, and her fine old face was wrinkled all over - but her eyes were as sharp and bright as a blackbird's.

'I'm sorry we're so late,' he said. 'We lost our way. This is my sister Anne - this is our cousin George - and this is my brother Dick.'

'And this is Timmy,' said George, and Timmy at once offered his paw to the old woman.

'Well, now, it's a wonder to see a dog with such good manners,' she said. 'We've seven - but not one of them would shake hands - no, not if the Queen herself came here, God bless her!'

The barking of the dogs had now died down. Not one of them was to be seen in the house, and the children thought they must be outside in kennels somewhere.

Timmy trotted about round the room, sniffing into every corner with much interest. Finally he went to the table, put his paws up and had a good look at the food there. Then he went to George and whined.

'He says he likes the look of the food there,' George said to the old woman. 'I must say I agree with him! It looks good!'

'You go and wash and get yourselves a bit tidy, while I make some hot tea,' said Mrs. Jones. 'You look cold and hungry. Go through that door, look - and up the little flight of stairs. The rooms up there are all yours - no one will disturb you.'

The Five went out of the door and found themselves in a little stone passage, lighted by a candle. A narrow flight of stone steps led upwards to a small landing on which another candle burned. The steps were very steep, and the children stumbled up them, their legs stiff after their long drive.

Two bedrooms opened off the little landing, opposite to one another. They seemed exactly alike, and were furnished in the same way too. There were wash-stances with basins, and in each basin was a jug of hot water, wrapped around with a towel. Wood-fires burned in the little stone fireplaces, their flames lighting the rooms almost more than the single candles there.

'You'll have this room, girls, and Dick and I will have the other,' said Julian. 'Gosh - wood-fires in our bedrooms! What a treat!'

'I shall go to bed early, and lie and watch the flames,' said Anne. 'I'm glad the rooms aren't cold. I know I should cough if they were.'

'We haven't coughed quite so much today,' said Dick, and immediately, of course, had a very bad fit of coughing! The old woman downstairs heard him, and called up at once.

'You hurry up, now, and come down into the warm!'

They were soon downstairs, sitting in the warm living-room. Nobody was there except old Mrs. Jones, pouring out tea.

'Isn't anyone else coming in to tea?' asked George, looking all round. 'Surely all this food isn't just for us?'

'Oh yes it is,' said the old woman, cutting some ham in long thin slices. 'This is your own room - the room I let out to families for themselves. We've got our big kitchen yonder for ourselves. You can do what you like here - make as much noise as it pleases you - no one will hear you - our stone walls are so thick!'

After she had served them, she went out of the room, nodding and smiling. The children looked at one another.

'I like her very much,' said Anne. 'How old she must be, if she is Jenkins' aunt! But her eyes are so bright and young!'

'I feel better already,' said Dick, tucking into the ham. 'George, give Timmy something. He keeps poking me with his paw, and I really can't spare him any of my ham.'

'He can have some of mine,' said George. 'I thought I was hungry - but I'm not, after all. I suddenly feel tired.'

Julian looked at her. She did look tired, and her eyes were ringed with black shadows. 'Finish your meal, old thing,' said Julian, 'and go up to bed. You can unpack tomorrow. You're tired out with the long drive! Anne doesn't look nearly so tired as you do!'

Old Mrs. Jones came in again, and approved highly of Julian's idea that they should all go up to bed when they had finished. 'Get up tomorrow when you like,' she said. 'And just come into my kitchen and tell me when you're down. You can do just what you like here!'

But all they wanted to do at that moment was to get into bed and go to sleep by the light of the crackling wood-fires! What a relief it was to slip in between the rather rough sheets and shut their eyes! All except Timmy. He kept guard by the door for a long long time before he crept on to George's bed. Good old Timmy!

Chapter 4

IN THE OLD FARMHOUSE

The four children slept like logs all night long. If they coughed they didn't know it! They lay in their beds, hardly moving - and only Timmy opened an eye occasionally, as he always did on the first night in a strange place.

He jumped when a burning log fell to one side in the fireplace. He stared sternly at a big bright flame licking up the chimney, as the log burned fiercely. He cocked up an ear when an owl hooted outside the window.

But at last he too fell asleep, lying as usual on George's feet - though old Mrs. Jones would not have approved of that at all!

Julian awoke first in the morning. He heard the sounds of the farm coming through the closed window. Shouts of one man to another - the lowing of cows - the barking of one dog after another, and then all together - and the peaceful sound of hens clucking and ducks quacking. It was nice to lie and hear it all, feeling warm and lazy.

He looked at his watch. Good gracious, it was almost nine o'clock! Whatever would Mrs. Jones think of them? He leapt out of bed, and awoke Dick with the quick movement.

'It's almost nine!' said Julian, and went to the washstand. This time there was only cold water in the big china jug, but he didn't mind. The bedroom was still warm with the burnt-out wood-fires.

The sun shone outside, but in the night the snow must have fallen heavily, for everywhere was white.

'Good,' said Julian, looking out. 'We shall be able to use our toboggans soon. Wake the girls, Dick.'

But the girls were already awake, for Timmy had heard the boys stirring, and had gone whining to the door. George stretched herself, feeling quite different from the night before.

'Anne - how do you feel? I feel really fine!' said George, pleased. 'Do you know it's nine o'clock? We've slept for more than twelve hours. No wonder we feel better!'

'Yes. I certainly do too,' said Anne, with an enormous yawn. 'Oh look, I've made Timmy yawn too! Timmy, did you sleep well?'

'Woof!' said Timmy, and pawed impatiently at the door. 'He wants his breakfast,' said George. 'I wonder what there is. I feel rather like bacon and egg - goodness, I thought I'd never feel like eating that again. Brrrr - this water's cold to wash in.'

They all went downstairs together and found their living-room warm with a great wood-fire. Breakfast was laid, but only a big crusty loaf, butter and home-made marmalade were there, with an enormous jug of cold, creamy milk.

Mrs. Jones came in almost at once, beaming at them. 'Well, good morning to you now,' she said, 'and a nice morning it is too, for all the snow we had in the night. What would you be wanting for breakfast now? Ham and eggs - or home-made pork sausages - or meat patties - or...'

'I'd like ham and eggs,' said Julian, at once, and the others said the same. Mrs. Jones went out of the room, and the children rubbed their hands.

'I feared we were only going to have bread and butter and marmalade,' said Dick. 'I say, look at the cream on the top of this milk! Me for a farm life when I grow up!'

'Woof!' said Timmy, approvingly. He kept hearing the other dogs barking, and going to the window to look out. George laughed at him. 'You'll have to remember you're just a visitor, when you meet those dogs,' she said. 'No throwing your weight about, and barking your head off!'

'They look pretty big dogs,' said Dick, joining Timmy at the window. 'Welsh collies, I should think - they're so good with the sheep. I say - I wonder what that dog was that barked at us so fiercely last night, behind that gate at Old Towers? Do you remember?'

'Yes. I didn't much like it,' said Anne. 'It was rather like a nasty dream - losing our way - going up that steep hill - only to find that horrid notice on the gates - and nobody to ask the way - and then that hidden dog barking ferociously just the other side of the gates! And then the car crawling down the hill in that strange way.'

'Yes. It was a bit queer,' said Dick. 'Ah - here comes our breakfast. Mrs. Jones, you've brought in enough for eight people, not four!'

She was followed by an enormous man, with a mass of black hair, bright blue eyes, and a stern mouth.

'This is my son Morgan,' she said. The four children looked at the giant like man in awe.

'Good morning,' said Julian and Dick together, and Morgan nodded his head, after giving them one quick look. The girls gave him polite smiles, and he nodded at them too, but didn't speak a word. He went out at once.

'He's not much of a one for talking,' said the old woman. 'Not my Morgan. But the voice he's got when he's angry! I'm telling the truth when I say you could hear him a mile away! Sends the sheep skittering off for miles when he shouts!'

Julian felt that he could quite believe it. 'Those are his dogs you can hear barking,' said the old woman. 'Three of them. They go about with my Morgan everywhere. He's all for dogs, he is. Doesn't care much about people! He's got four more dogs on the hills with the sheep - and, believe you me, if Morgan went out in the yard there, and shouted, those four dogs away with the sheep on the hills far yonder would hear him and come tearing down here like a flash of lightning!'

The children felt as if they could well believe this of the giant like Morgan. They rather wished he would call his dogs. His voice would certainly be worth hearing!

They set to work on their breakfast, and although they couldn't eat quite all that Mrs. Jones had brought, they managed to do very well indeed! So did Timmy. They especially liked the bread, which was home-made and very good.

'I could really make a meal just of this home-made bread and fresh butter,' said Anne. 'Our bread at home doesn't taste a bit the same. I say - wouldn't Mother be amazed to see the breakfast we've eaten today?'

'She certainly would - considering that we haven't felt like eating even a boiled egg for days,' said Dick. 'I say - oughtn't we to telephone home, Julian, and say we're safely here?'

'Gosh, yes,' said Julian. 'I meant to last night. I'll do that now, if Mrs. Jones will let me. Hallo, look - isn't that our last night's driver going off? He must have spent the night here.'

The driver was about to get into his car when he heard Julian knocking at the window. He came over to the farmhouse, and walked in at the front door, and soon found the children's living-room.

'I'm just off,' he announced. 'The old lady gave me a bed in the barn last night - never been so cosy in my life! And I say - I've found out why the car crawled so slowly up and down that hill to Old Towers last night!'

'Oh, have you? Why was it then?' asked Julian, with interest.

'Well, it wasn't anything to do with the car,' said the driver, 'and wasn't I thankful to know that! It was to do with the hill itself.'

'Whatever do you mean?' said Dick, puzzled.

'Well, the shepherd's wife told me they think there must be something magnetic down under that hill,' said the driver. 'Because when the postman goes up on his bicycle, the same thing happens. His bicycle feels like lead, so heavy that he can't even cycle up - and if he pushes his bike, it feels just as heavy too. So now he leaves his bike at the bottom and just walks up!'

'I see - so the magnetic whatever-it-is got hold of the car last night, and pulled so much that it made it go slow too,' said Julian. 'Queer! There must be some deposit of powerful metal in that hill. Does it affect all cars like that?'

'Oh yes - no one goes up there in a car if they can help it,' said the driver. 'Funny thing, isn't it? Queer hill altogether, if you ask me - that notice on the gate and all!'

'I wonder who lives there?' said Dick.

'Only an old dame,' said the driver. 'She's off her head, so they say - won't let anyone in! Well - we know that all right. Sorry I lost my way last night - but you're all right now. You're in clover here!'

He moved to the door, raised his hand in salute, and went out. They saw him through the window getting into his car and driving away, waving a leather-gloved hand out of the window.

'Is the snow thick enough to toboggan on?' wondered George. 'It doesn't look like it. Let's go out and see. Better wrap up well, though - I bet the wind's cold out on this hill, and I don't want to start sniffing again. I've had enough of that.'

Soon they were all clad in heavy coats, scarves and woollen hats. Mrs. Jones nodded her head when she saw them, and smiled. 'Sensible children you are,' she said. 'Cold it is today, with a biting wind, but healthy weather! Be careful of that dog of yours, my boy - don't you let him loose till you're well away from the farm, in case he goes for one of my Morgan's dogs.'

George smiled, pleased to be addressed as a boy. They began to wander round the farm, Timmy cross because he was on the lead. He pulled at it, wanting to run round and explore on his own. But George wouldn't let him. 'Not till you've made friends with all the other dogs,' she said. 'I wonder where they are?'

'Must have gone out with Morgan,' said Dick. 'Come on - let's go and look at the cows in the sheds. I do love the smell of cows.'

They wandered round the farm, enjoying the pale sun, the keen wind, and the feeling that their legs belonged to them at last, and were not likely to give way at any moment. They hardly coughed at all, and felt quite aggrieved when one or other suddenly began.

'I shall let old Timmy off the lead a bit now,' said George. 'I can't see a dog about anywhere.' So she slipped the lead off his collar and he ran off joyfully at once, sniffing here, there and everywhere. He disappeared round a corner, his tongue hanging out happily.

And then the most appalling barking began! The children stopped as if they had been shot. It wasn't one dog, or even two - it sounded like a dozen! The four rushed round the corner of a barn at once - and there was poor Timmy, standing with his back to the barn, growling and barking and snarling at three fierce dogs!

'No, George, no, don't go to Timmy,' shouted Julian, seeing that George was going to rescue Tim, whatever happened. 'Those dogs are savage!'

But what did George care for that? She raced to Timmy, stood in front of him, and yelled at the three surprised dogs snarling there. 'HOW DARE YOU! GET AWAY! GO HOME! I SAID GO HOME!'

Chapter 5

THINGS MIGHT BE WORSE!

The three snarling dogs took no notice of George. It was Timmy they wanted. Who was this strange dog who dared to come wandering round their home? They tried to get at him, but

George stood there, swinging the leather lead, and giving first one dog and then another a sharp flick. Julian rushed to help her - and then Timmy gave a sharp yelp. He had been bitten!

Someone came rushing round the corner. It was Mrs. Jones, running as if she were a twelve-year-old!

'Tang! Bob! Dai!' she called, but the three dogs took no notice of her. And then, from somewhere, came a voice. What a voice! It echoed all round the farmyard as if it had come through a megaphone.

'DAI! BOB! TANG!'

And at the sound of that stentorian voice the three dogs stopped as if shot. Then they turned about and tore off at top speed.

'Thank God! That was Morgan,' panted the old woman, clutching her shawl round her. 'He must have heard the barking. Oh, my little dear - are you hurt?' She took hold of George's arm, and looked at her anxiously.

'I don't know. I don't think so,' said George, looking rather white. 'It's Timmy that's hurt. Oh, Tim, darling Tim, where did they bite you?'

'Woof!' said Timmy, who, though extremely startled, didn't seem at all frightened. It had all happened so suddenly. George dropped down on her knees in the snow, and gave a little scream.

'He's been bitten on the neck - oh look! Poor, poor, Timmy. Why did I let you off the lead?'

'It's not much, George,' said Julian, looking at the bleeding place. 'The other dog bit just where his collar is, look - and his teeth went through the collar, not really into Tim's neck. It's really not much more than a graze.'

Anne was leaning against the wall, looking sick, and Dick suddenly felt as if his legs were wobbly again. He couldn't help thinking what would have happened if the three savage dogs had bitten George instead of Timmy. Good old George! She was as brave as a lion!

'What a thing to happen!' said old Mrs. Jones, upset. 'Why for did you let him loose, my boy? You should have waited for my Morgan to come along with his dogs, and tell them your Timmy was a friend.'

'I know,' said George, still on her knees beside Timmy. 'It was all my fault. Oh, Timmy, I'm so thankful you've only got that one small bite. Mrs. Jones, have you any iodine? I must put some on at once.'

But before Mrs. Jones could answer, the giant like figure of Morgan came round the corner of the barn, his three dogs, extremely subdued now, at his heels.

'Hey?' he said, enquiringly, looking at the four children and his mother.

'The dogs attacked this one,' explained his mother. 'You shouted just in time, Morgan. But he's not much hurt. You should have seen this boy here - the one the dog belongs to - he stood in front of his dog, and fought off Tang, Bob and Dai!'

Julian couldn't help smiling to hear George continually called a boy - but, standing there in snow-trousers and coat, a woollen cap on her short hair, she looked very like a sturdy boy.

'Please come and get the iodine,' said George, anxiously, seeing a drop of blood drip from Timmy's neck on to the white snow. Morgan took a step forward and bent down to look at Timmy.

He made a small scornful sound and stood up again. 'He's all right,' he said, and walked off.

George stared after him angrily. It was his dogs that had attacked and hurt Timmy - and he hadn't even been sorry about it! She felt so angry that tears came suddenly into her eyes. She blinked them away, ashamed.

'I don't think I want to stay here,' she said, loudly and clearly. 'Those dogs will be sure to attack Timmy again. They might kill him. I shall go home.'

'Now, now, you're just upset,' said kind old Mrs. Jones, taking George's arm. George shook off her hand, scowling. 'I'm not upset. I'm just angry to think my dog should have been attacked for nothing - and I'm sure he'll be attacked again. And I want to see to his neck. I'm going indoors.'

She stalked off with Timmy at her heels, her head well up, bitterly ashamed of two more tears that suddenly ran down her cheeks. It wasn't like old George to cry! But she was still not quite herself after being ill. The other three looked at one another.

'Go with her, Anne,' said Julian, and Anne obediently ran after George. Julian turned to the worried old woman.

'You shouldn't stand out here in the cold,' he said, seeing that she was shivering, and pulling her shawl more closely round her. 'George will soon be all right. Don't take any notice of what she says.'

'She! What, isn't she a boy, then?' said Mrs. Jones, in surprise. 'Is it a girl she is - as brave as that? Now there's a fine thing, to be sure! What'll Morgan say to that? But now, surely she won't go home, will she?'

'No,' said Julian, hoping he was right. You never could tell with George! 'She'll soon get over it. If we could get some iodine it would help, though! She's always terrified of wounds going bad, where Timmy is concerned.'

'Come away in, then,' said Mrs. Jones, and hurried back to the farmhouse, refusing Julian's hand over the snow. What an independent little old woman!

George was in the living-room with Timmy. She had got some water and was bathing the wound with her handkerchief, having first taken off Tim's collar.

'I'll fetch you the iodine, boy,' said Mrs. Jones, forgetting again that George was a girl. She ran to her kitchen, and came back with a big bottle of brown liquid. George took it gratefully, and dabbed some on Timmy, who stood still, quite enjoying all the fuss. He jumped a little when the iodine stung him, and George patted him and praised him.

'He wouldn't mind having iodine dabbed on him all day long, George, if you would only make a fuss of him,' said Dick, with a laugh.

George looked up. 'He might have been killed,' she said. 'And if those dogs get him again, he certainly will be! I'm going to go back home - not to your home, Ju - but to my own, at Kirrin Cottage.'

'Oh, don't be an ass, George,' said Dick, exasperated. 'Anyone would think Timmy had been injured for life or something. He's only got a skin wound! Why spoil what may be a jolly good holiday just for that?'

'I don't trust those three dogs,' said George, stubbornly. 'They'll be out to get Tim now - I know they will. I tell you I'm going home. I'm not spoiling your holiday - only my own.'

'Well, listen - stay one more day,' said Julian, hoping that if she did, George would see how stupidly she was behaving. 'Just one more day. That's not much to ask. It will upset old Mrs. Jones dreadfully if you rush off like this - and it will be difficult to make arrangements for you to go back today, now that everywhere is under snow again.'

'All right,' said George, ungraciously. 'I'll stay till tomorrow. It will give Timmy a bit of time to get over his fright. But ONLY till tomorrow.'

'Tim's not frightened,' said Anne. 'George, he would have taken on all three dogs by himself if you hadn't gone to his help. Wouldn't you, Timmy?'

'Woof, woof!' said Timmy, agreeing at once. He wagged his tail vigorously. Dick laughed. 'Good old Tim!' he said. 'You don't want to go home, do you?'

'Woof!' said Timmy, obligingly, and wagged his tail again. George put on one of her scowls, and Julian nudged the others to warn them to stop teasing her. He didn't want George suddenly to change her mind and rush off home straightaway!

'I vote we go for a walk,' said Dick. 'It's a shame to stick indoors like this on this sunny, snowy day. Anne, are you coming?'

'I will if George does,' said Anne. But George shook her head.

'No,' she said. 'I'll stay in with Tim this morning. You go off together.'

Anne wouldn't come, so the boys left the two girls and went out into the keen, invigorating mountain air once more. Already they felt better, and were not coughing at all. What a pity this had happened! It spoilt things for everyone - even for old Mrs. Jones, who now appeared at her front door, looking anxious.

'Don't you worry now, Mrs. Jones,' said Julian. 'I expect our cousin will be all right soon. She's given up the idea of rushing home today at any rate! My brother and I are going for a walk up the mountain. Which way is best?'

'Well now, take that path,' said the old woman, pointing. 'And go on till you come to our summer chalet. You can rest there before coming back - and if you don't want to come back for dinner, well, you'll find food in the cupboard there. Here is the key to get into the little place!'

'Oh thanks,' said Julian, surprised. 'That sounds good. We'd love to have our lunch up there, Mrs. Jones - we'll be back before dark. Tell the girls for us, will you?'

And away they went, whistling. It was fun to have a day all to themselves, just the two of them, together!

They took the snowy path and began to climb up the slope of the mountain. The sun was now melting the snow a little, so they could make out the path fairly easily. Then they discovered that big black stones marked the way here and there - a guide to the farmer and his men, when the snow covered path and everything!

The view was magnificent. As they climbed higher, they could see the tops of more and more hills, all of which sparkled snowy-white in the pale January sun.

'I say - if only we had a bit more snow, what tobogganing we could have down these slopes,' said Dick, longingly. 'I wish I'd brought my skis this morning - the snow is deep enough for them down that hill - we'd whizz along like lightning!'

They were glad when they at last came to the little hut or chalet that old Mrs. Jones had spoken about. After two hours' climbing it was nice to think of having something to eat, and a good rest! 'It's quite a place,' said Julian, slipping the key into the lock. 'A little wooden house, with windows and all!'

He opened the door and went inside. Yes - it was a very fine little place indeed, with bunk-beds let into the wooden walls, a stove for heating - and cupboards full of crockery - and tins of food! The two boys had the same idea at once, and swung round to one another.

'Couldn't we stay here - on our own? George would love it too,' said Julian, putting into words what Dick was already thinking. Oh - if only they could!

Chapter 6

A FUNNY LITTLE CREATURE

The boys were tired, but not too tired to examine the little hut thoroughly - though it really was more like a one-roomed house. It faced across the deep valley, and the sun shone straight into it. Julian opened cupboard after cupboard, exclaiming in delight.

'Bedding! Towels! Crockery - and cutlery! And look at these tins of food - and bottles of orangeade and the rest! My word, people who come to stay at Magga Glen in the summer must have a fine time!'

'We could light the stove to heat the room,' suggested Dick, pulling the oil-stove into the middle of the room.

'No. We don't need to,' said Julian. 'The sun is pouring in, and it really isn't cold in here. We could wrap ourselves round in the rugs from that cupboard if we want to.'

'Do you think we'd be allowed to come up here, instead of living down at the farm?' said Dick, opening a tin of ham with a tin-opener that hung on a nail by the cupboard. 'It's so much nicer to be quite on our own and independent! George would simply love it!'

'Well, we can ask,' said Julian, taking the cap off a bottle of orangeade. 'Can we find some biscuits to eat with this ham? Oh yes - here are some cream-cracker biscuits. I say - I'm really ravenous!'

'So am I,' said Dick, his mouth full. 'Pity George was such an ass - she and Anne could have enjoyed this too.'

'Well - perhaps on the whole it's as well they didn't come,' said Julian. 'I think Anne would have been too tired to come all this way on her first day - and George certainly had a worse cold and cough than anyone. A day at the farm will probably do her good. Gosh - she's absolutely fearless, isn't she? I'll never forget her standing up to those three savage dogs! I was jolly scared myself.'

'I'm going to get a rug and wrap it round me and sit out on the doorstep in the sun,' said Dick. 'That view is too marvellous for words!'

He and Julian took a rug each, and then sat out on the wooden door-step, munching their ham and biscuits. They stared across at the great hill opposite.

'Is that a house on the slope over there - near the top, look,' said Dick, suddenly.

Julian stared across at the opposite hill, but could make out nothing.

'It can't be,' he said. 'The roof would be covered with snow, and we'd never see it. Besides, who would build a house so high up?'

'Plenty of people,' said Dick. 'It's not everyone who likes towns and shops and cinemas and traffic and the rest. I can imagine an artist building a house on one of these mountains, just for the view! He'd be quite happy looking at it and painting it all day long.'

'Well - I like a bit of company, I must say,' said Julian. 'This is all right for a week or two - but you'd need to be an artist or a poet - or a shepherd or something, to stand it all the time!'

He yawned. Both boys had finished their meal, and felt comfortably full and at peace. Dick yawned too, and lay back on his rug. But Julian pulled him upright.

'Oh no! We're not going to take naps up here! We'd sleep like logs again, and wake up in the dark. The sun's going down already, and we've got all that long walk back to the farm - and no torch to light our way if we go wrong!'

'There are those black stones,' said Dick, with another yawn. 'All right, all right - I agree with you! I certainly don't want to stumble down this mountain in the pitch dark!'

Julian suddenly clutched Dick's arm, and pointed upwards, where the path still wound on and on. Dick turned - and stared. Someone was up there, skipping down the path towards them, with a lamb gambolling around, and a small dog scampering after.

'Is it a boy or a girl?' said Julian, in wonder. 'My word - it must be cold, whichever it is!'

It was a small girl coming along, a wild-looking little creature with a mass of untidy black curls, a face as brown as an oak-apple - and very few clothes! She wore a dirty pair of boy's shorts, and a blue blouse - or it might have been a shirt. Her legs were bare, and she had old shoes on her feet. She was singing as she came, in a high sweet voice like a bird's.

The dog with her began to bark, and she stopped her song at once. She spoke to the dog, and he barked again, facing towards the hut. The lamb gambolled round without stopping.

The little girl looked towards the hut, and saw Julian and Dick. She turned at once and ran back the way she had come. Julian got up and shouted to her.

'It's all right! We shan't hurt you! Look - here's a bit of meat for your dog!'

The girl stopped and looked round, poised ready to run again at once. Julian waved the bit of ham left over from their meal. The little dog smelt it on the wind, and came running up eagerly. He snapped at it, got it into his mouth and ran back to the girl. He didn't attempt to eat it, but just stood there by her, looking up.

She bent down eagerly, and took it. She tore it in half and gave one piece to the eager dog, who swallowed it at once - and the other piece she ate herself, keeping a sharp eye on the two boys as she did so. The lamb came nosing round her, and she put one thin arm round its neck.

'What a queer little thing,' said Julian to Dick. 'Where can she have come from? She must be absolutely frozen!'

Dick called to the child. 'Hallo! Come and talk to us!'

She shot off at once as soon as he shouted. But she didn't go very far. She half hid behind a bush, peeping out now and again.

'Get some of those biscuits,' said Julian to Dick. 'We'll hold some out to her. She's like a wild thing.'

So Dick held out a handful of biscuits, and called: 'Biscuits! For you! And your dog!'

But only the lamb came gambolling up, a toy-like creature, with a tail that frisked and whisked all the time. It tried to get on to Dick's knee, and bumped its little black nose against his face.

'Fany, Fany!' called the small girl, in a high, clear voice. The lamb tried to get away but Dick held on to it. It seemed to be all legs!

'Come and get it!' shouted Dick. 'We shan't hurt you!'

The little girl couldn't bear to leave her lamb. She came out from the bush, and took a few hesitating steps towards the boys. The dog ran right up to them, snuffling at their hands for more ham. Julian gave him a biscuit and he crunched it up at once, giving sidelong glances at his watching mistress as if to apologise for eating it all himself! Julian patted the little thing and it licked him joyfully.

The little girl came nearer. Her legs looked blue with cold, but although she had so little on, she didn't seem to be shivering. Julian held out another biscuit. The dog jumped up and took it neatly in his mouth, running up to the little girl with it. The boys burst into laughter, and the small girl smiled suddenly, her whole face lighting up.

'Come here!' called Julian. 'Come and get your pretty lamb. We've got some more biscuits for you and your dog.'

At last the child came near to them, as watchful as a hare, ready to run at a moment's notice. The boys sat still and patient, and soon the girl was near enough to snatch a biscuit and retreat again. She sat down on one of the black stones marking the path, and munched her biscuit, staring at them all the time out of her big dark eyes.

'What's your name?' asked Dick, not moving from his place, afraid that the child would leap off like a frightened goat.

The girl didn't seem to understand. Dick repeated his question, speaking slowly.

'What - is - your - name? What - are - you - called?'

The child nodded her head and then pointed to herself.

'Me - Aily,' she said.

She pointed at the dog.

'Dave,' she said, and he leapt up at his name and covered her with licks. Then she pointed to the lamb, which was now gambolling round the boys like a mad thing. 'Fany,' she said.

'Ah - Aily - Dave - Fany,' said Julian, solemnly, and he too pointed at first one then the other. Then he pointed to himself. 'Julian!' he said, and then pointed to Dick. 'Dick!'

The little girl gave a high, clear laugh, and suddenly poured out quite a long speech. The boys couldn't understand a word of it.

'She's speaking in Welsh, I suppose,' said Dick, disappointed. 'What a pity - it sounds lovely, but I can't make head or tail of it.'

The child saw that they had not understood. She frowned, as if thinking hard.

'My Dadda - he up high - sheep!' she said.

'Oh - your father's a shepherd up there!' said Dick. 'But you don't live with him, do you?'

Aily considered this, then shook her head.

'Down!' she said, pointing. 'Aily down!' Then she turned to the dog and the lamb, and cuddled them both. 'Dave mine,' she said, proudly. 'Fany mine!'

'Nice dog. Nice lamb,' said Julian, solemnly, and the little girl nodded in delight. Then, for no reason that the boys could see, she stood up, leapt down the hill, followed by the lamb and the dog, and disappeared.

'What a funny little creature!' said Dick. 'Like a pixie of the hills, or an elf of the woods. I quite expected her to disappear in smoke, or something. I should think she runs completely wild, wouldn't you? We'll ask Mrs. Jones about her when we get back!'

'My goodness - come on, the sun's getting quite low,' said Julian, getting up in a hurry. 'We've got to put the things away, and fold up the rugs, and lock up. Buck up - once the sun goes it will be dark almost at once, and we've quite a long way to go.'

It didn't take them long to tidy up and lock the little house carefully. Then down the path they went at top speed. The sun had melted most of the snow farther down, and the going was easy. The boys felt exhilarated by their day on the mountainside and sang as they went, until they were quite out of breath.

'There's the farmhouse,' said Dick, and both boys were glad to see it. Their legs were tired now, and they longed for a good meal and a rest in a warm room.

'I hope George has recovered a bit by now - and is still at the farm!' said Julian, with a laugh. 'You never know with old George! I hope she'll like the sound of that hut. We'll ask Mrs. Jones about it tonight, when we've talked it over with Anne and George.'

'Here we are,' said Dick, thankfully, as they went up to the house. 'Anne! George! We're back - where are you?'

Chapter 7

BACK AT THE FARM AGAIN

Anne came running to meet Dick and Julian. 'Oh, I'm glad you're back!' she said. 'It's beginning to get dark, and I was afraid you'd lose your way!'

'Hallo, George!' said Julian, seeing her behind Anne, in the darkness of the passage. 'How's Timmy?'

'All right, thank you,' said George, sounding quite cheerful. 'Here he is!'

Timmy barked loudly and jumped up at the boys in welcome. He was very glad to see them, for he had been afraid that they had gone back home. They all went into the living-room, where there was an enormous wood-fire, looking very cheerful indeed. Julian and Dick fell into the two most comfortable chairs and spread their legs out to the fire.

'Ha! This is good!' said Dick. 'I couldn't have walked another step. I don't believe I can even go up the stairs to wash. We've walked MILES!'

They told the girls about their day, and when they described the little summer chalet, the two girls listened eagerly.

'Oh - I wish we'd gone with you,' said Anne, longingly. 'Timmy would have been quite all right, wouldn't he, George? We've decided it's only a skin-wound. Actually, you can hardly see it now.'

'But all the same, I'm going back home tomorrow,' said George, determinedly. 'I'm sorry I made such a fuss this morning - but honestly I thought Timmy had been badly bitten. Thank goodness he wasn't. Still, I'm not risking such a thing again. If I stay on here with him, he's sure to have those three dogs attacking him sometime or other, and he might be killed. I don't want to upset your holiday - but I can NOT stay on here with Tim.'

'All right, old thing,' said Julian, soothingly. 'Don't get so up-in-the-air about it. There - you've gone and started your cough again! Do you know, Dick and I haven't coughed once today!'

'Nor have I,' said Anne. 'The air is marvellous here. I think I ought to go back with George, though, Ju. She'd be miserable all by herself at home.'

'Listen,' said Julian. 'We've got an idea, Dick and I - one that means old George won't have to go home, and...'

'Nothing will make me stop here,' interrupted George at once. 'NOTHING!'

'Give me a chance to tell you what I've got up my sleeve,' protested Julian. 'It's about that mountain-hut we've been to - Dick and I thought it would be a marvellous idea if we could all five of us go and spend our time there - instead of here. We'd be ABSOLUTELY on our own then - the way we like to be!'

'Oh yes!' said Anne at once, delighted. They all three looked at George. She smiled suddenly.

'Yes - that would be fun. I'd like that. I don't suppose those dogs would come near there. And how heavenly to be on our own!'

'Mrs. Jones said that her son Morgan told her we're going to have heavy falls of snow!' said Anne. 'We could spend all day long on those slopes with our toboggans and skis. Oh, George - what a pity Timmy can't ski! We'll have to leave him at the hut when we go off skiing!'

'Do you suppose Mrs. Jones will mind us going off there?' said Dick.

'I don't think so,' said Anne. 'She was telling us today that parties of children go there alone in the summer, while their parents stay and have a peaceful time down here. I don't see why she shouldn't let us go. We'll ask her when she comes in with our high tea. I said we wouldn't have tea and supper - we'd just have one big meal. We didn't know what time you'd be back - and George and I had such an enormous dinner in the middle of the day that we knew we wouldn't want tea.'

'Yes. I'd rather have a big meal now, too,' said Julian, yawning widely. 'I'm afraid all I shall want to do afterwards is to go up to bed and fall asleep. I'm marvellously tired. In fact, I could go to sleep this very minute! I suppose you girls have been indoors all day long because of Timmy?'

'No. We took it in turns to go for a walk without him,' said Anne. 'George hasn't let him put his nose outside the door. Poor Timmy - he just couldn't understand it, and he whined and whined!'

'Never mind - he'll enjoy himself if we can go up to that hut,' said George, who was very cheerful indeed now. 'I do hope we can. It would be glorious fun.'

'Ju - come and wash,' said Dick, seeing that Julian had his eyes closed already. 'Julian! Come up and wash, I tell you - you don't want to miss your meal, do you?'

Julian groaned and dragged himself up the stone stairway. But once he had sluiced himself in cold water he felt much better, and very hungry indeed. So did Dick.

'We didn't tell the girls about that funny little creature - what was her name now - Aily! And Dave her dog and Fany the lamb. We mustn't forget to ask Mrs. Jones about them,' said Julian.

They went downstairs, feeling much fresher and were delighted to see that Mrs. Jones had been in and laid the table. They went up to see what there was for their high tea.

'Pork pie - home made, of course,' said Dick. 'And what's this - golly, it's a cheese! How enormous! Smell it, Julian - it's enough to make you start eating straightaway! And more of that home-made bread! Can't we start?'

'No - there are new-laid boiled eggs to begin with,' said Anne, with a laugh. 'And an apple pie and cream to end with. So I hope you really are hungry, you two!'

Mrs. Jones came in with a pot of hot tea. She smiled at the boys as she set the big brown teapot down on the table.

'Is it a nice day you've had, away up on the mountain?' she said. 'You look fine, both of you. Did you find the hut all right?'

'Yes, thank you,' said Julian. 'Mrs. Jones, it's a marvellous hut. We...'

'Yes, yes - it's a good hut,' said Mrs. Jones, 'and it's sorry I was the two girls didn't go with you, such a fine day as it was, and the dog not really hurt! And to think that the girls want to go back home! It's sad I've been this day in my thoughts!'

She really did seem hurt and grieved, and George looked very guilty. Julian patted Mrs. Jones on the arm, and spoke comfortingly.

'Don't you worry about us, Mrs. Jones. I've got a fine idea to tell you. What we'd really like is to go and live up at that hut, the five of us - then we'd be out of your way and Timmy would be out of the way of the farm dogs too! Do you think we might do that? Then George wouldn't have to go home, as she had planned to do.'

'Well now! To go to that hut in this weather! What an idea!' said Mrs. Jones. 'Most uncomfortable you would be, with no one to look after you, and see to your wants, and cook for you this cold weather. No, no...'

'We're used to looking after ourselves,' said Dick. 'We're awfully good at it, Mrs. Jones. And, my word, the food you've got up there is enough to feed an army! And there are cups and plates and dishes - and knives and forks - and all kinds of bedding...'

'We'd have a smashing time,' said George, joining in eagerly. 'I don't really want to go home, Mrs. Jones. It's so lovely in these mountains - and if the snow comes down, as your Morgan says, we'd be able to have winter sports all on our own!'

'Oh, do say it's all right,' begged Anne. 'We shall be quite safe and happy there - and we do promise to come down here again if we can't manage, or if anything goes wrong.'

'I'll see that things go all right,' said Julian, speaking in his most grown-up voice.

'Well - well, it's a queer idea you have,' said Mrs. Jones, still taken aback. 'I'll have to talk to my Morgan about it first. Now set you down and eat your meal. I'll get my Morgan to decide.'

She went out of the room, shaking her head, her mouth pursed up in disapproval. No fire! No hot meals! No one to 'manage' for them. What a dreadful time those children would have up in that hut in this weather!

The five set to work to demolish the good food on the table. George allowed Timmy to sit up on a chair too, and fed him with titbits for a treat. He was perfectly good and very well-mannered indeed.

'I almost expect him to hand me a plate of something!' said Anne, with a giggle. 'Tim, dear - do pass me the salt!'

Timmy put a paw on the table exactly as if he meant to obey Anne, and George hastily made him put it down again! What a meal that was! The pork pie was so good that everyone had two slices, as well as their boiled eggs. Then they started on the cheese, which even Timmy liked. There was very little room indeed for the apple pie that Mrs. Jones brought in at the end!

'My goodness - I forgot that an apple pie was coming,' said Anne, in dismay, as the old woman walked in with a tray on which was a big apple pie and a jug of cream.

'Mrs. Jones - when we were up at the hut, we saw such a funny little creature,' said Dick. 'She said her name was Aily and she had a lamb and a...'

'Oh, Aily! That mad little thing!' said Mrs. Jones, picking up the dirty plates. 'She's the shepherd's daughter - a little truant she is, runs off from school, and hides away in the hills with her dog and her lamb. She always has a lamb each year - it follows her about everywhere. They say there isn't a rabbit hole or a blackberry bush or a bird's nest that child doesn't know!'

'She was singing when we first saw her,' said Julian. 'Singing like a bird.'

'Ah, yes - it's a lovely voice she has,' said Mrs. Jones. 'She's wild as a bird - there's nothing to be done with her. If she's scolded she goes off for weeks, no one knows where. Don't you let her come round that hut now, when you're there - she'll maybe steal from you!'

'Oh, yes - the hut! Have you spoken to Morgan about it?' said Dick, eagerly.

'Yes, I have indeed,' said Mrs. Jones. 'And he says yes, to let you go. He doesn't want trouble with the dogs either. He says snow is coming for sure, but you'll be safe up there and you can take all your toboggans for there'll be a chance to use them! He'll help you up with your things.'

'Oh good! Thanks!' said Julian, and the others smiled and looked at one another joyfully. 'Thanks most awfully, Mrs. Jones. We'll go tomorrow after breakfast!'

Tomorrow! After breakfast! Up to that lonely hut on the mountainside, just the Five of them together. What could be better than that?

Chapter 8

OFF TO THE LITTLE HUT

Julian and Dick were so sleepy after their long day in the cold air, and their enormous meal, that they could not keep their eyes open for long.

'Go to bed, both of you!' said Anne, seeing them lying tired out in their chairs, when Mrs. Jones had cleared away everything.

'Yes. I think we'd better,' said Julian, staggering up. 'Oh, my legs! They're as stiff as sticks! Good night, you two girls, and Timmy. See you tomorrow - if we wake up!'

The two boys stumbled up the stone stairs to bed. George and Anne stayed downstairs, talking and reading. Timmy lay on the hearthrug, listening, his ears twitching towards Anne when she spoke, and then towards George as she answered. This little habit of his always made them laugh.

'It's exactly as if he was listening, but too lazy to join in our conversation!' said Anne. 'Oh, George - I really am glad you're not going home tomorrow. It would be the first time you'd ever done a thing like that! I'd just have had to come with you!'

'Don't let's talk about it,' said George. 'I feel rather ashamed of making such a fuss now. All the same I shall be terrified if I see any of those dogs again when I'm with Timmy. What a bit of luck the boys went up to that hut today, Anne - we'd never have known about it if they hadn't.'

'Yes. It sounds fun,' said Anne. 'Don't let's be too late to bed, George. It will be quite a pull up the mountainside tomorrow, with all our things!'

George went to the window.

'It's snowing hard,' she said. 'Just as Morgan said it would. I don't like him, do you?'

'Oh - I think he's all right,' said Anne. 'And what a voice he's got! He nearly made me jump out of my skin when he called his three dogs. He must have the loudest voice in the world!'

'Timmy - you're yawning!' said George, as Timmy opened his mouth widely and made a yawning noise. 'How's your neck?'

Timmy was getting rather tired of having his neck examined. He lay still while George had another look at it.

'Healing beautifully!' she said. 'You'll be quite all right tomorrow. Will you like going off to that hut all by ourselves, Tim?'

Timmy gave her a loving lick and yawned again. Then he got up and trotted over to the door that led to the stone stairs, looking back enquiringly at George.

'Right. We're coming,' said George, laughing, and she and Anne blew out the lamp on the table, and followed Timmy up the stairs. They peeped in at the boys' room - and saw Julian and Dick absolutely sound asleep, dead to the world!

'A thunderstorm wouldn't wake them tonight!' said Anne. 'Come on - let's buck up and get into bed ourselves. We've a nice wood-fire again, and I shall undress in front of it. Move over, Timmy, I want to stand on the rug.'

In the morning the world was very white indeed! As Morgan had prophesied, the snow had fallen thickly in the night, and everywhere was covered in a thick white blanket, that gleamed and sparkled in the weak January sun.

'This is something like!' said Dick, as he looked out of his bedroom window. 'Get up, Ju - it's a marvellous morning! Remember, we've got to take all our things up to that hut today! Do stir yourself!'

Mrs. Jones gave them a fine breakfast - eggs, bacon and sausages.

'It's the last hot meal you'll have, if you're going up to that hut,' she said. 'Though you'll be able to cook eggs in the little saucepan up there, if you set it on top of the oil-stove. And mind you don't get playing about round that stove when it's alight, or the whole place might go up in flames!'

'We'll be very careful,' promised Julian. 'I'll send anyone back if they upset the stove - yes, I will, so just look out, Timmy!'

'Woof!' said Tim, amiably. He was pleasantly excited with all the preparations for going, and ran sniffing from one parcel to another.

The children were not taking all their things, of course, but Mrs. Jones had made them pack a complete change of clothes each, besides their warmest night-clothes and dressing-gowns. They had torches too, and plenty of rope for hauling things up and down the hills. And also they had six loaves of new-baked bread, a large cheese, about three dozen eggs and a ham. So they were truly well provided for.

'And there's plenty of butter packed in with the loaves,' said Mrs. Jones, 'and a large pot of cream. I'll try and send up some milk if the shepherd comes down. He'll pass the hut when he goes up again. There's only a quart in that bottle there - but you'll find plenty of orangeade and lemonade in the hut - and you can boil snow if you want to make cocoa or tea!'

It was quite clear that Mrs. Jones had no idea how many times the Five had gone off on their own! They smiled and winked at one another, and took all her advice in good part. She really was so kind, so very concerned about them all. She even packed some bones and dog biscuits for Timmy!

'Here's my Morgan now,' said Mrs. Jones, when every single thing had been put in a pile outside the front door, toboggans and skis as well. 'He's brought his snow-slide with him, to take all your goods.'

The snow-slide was like a long, flat cart with runners instead of wheels - an elongated sleigh. The children piled on to it all the parcels, and two suit-cases. They were all going to walk up as the snow was not yet too thick. Timmy danced round in great excitement - though both he and George kept a wary eye out for the other dogs, and Timmy did not venture very far from George. The giant like Morgan arrived, his breath puffing before him like a smoke-cloud! He nodded at the children.

'Morning,' he said, and that was all. He took hold of the ropes at the front of the snow-slide and ran them over his shoulders.

'I'll take one,' said Julian. 'It's much too heavy for one person to pull!'

'Ha!' said Morgan, scornfully, and walked off with the two ropes over his shoulder. The snow-slide followed easily.

'Strong as a horse, my Morgan is,' said old Mrs. Jones, proudly.

'Strong as ten horses!' said Julian, wishing he was as big and as strong as the broad-shouldered farmer.

George said nothing. She hadn't yet forgiven the farmer for being scornful about Timmy's bite the day before. She followed the others, carrying her skis, and waved to kind old Mrs. Jones as she stood anxiously watching them leave.

It seemed a long trek up the mountainside, when things had to be pulled or carried! Morgan went first, pulling the big snow-slide easily. Julian went next, pulling a toboggan and carrying his skis. Dick was next with another toboggan and skis, and the girls came last with their skis only. Timmy ran at the front or the back as he liked, enjoying everything.

Morgan said nothing at all. Julian addressed a few polite remarks to him, and received a grunt in reply, but that was all. He looked curiously at the great, strong fellow, wondering about him and his silence. He looked intelligent and even kindly - but he seemed so dour and rough in his manners and behaviour! Oh well - they would soon say good-bye to him and be on their own!

They came at last to the little hut. The girls ran ahead to it, exclaiming in delight. George looked through the windows.

'Oh - it's a proper little house inside! Oh, look at those bunks on the walls! And there's even a carpet on the floor! Quick, Julian, where's the key?'

'Morgan's got it,' said Julian, and they all stood by and waited while Morgan unlocked the door for them.

'Thanks so much for helping to bring up our things,' said Julian, politely. 'Awfully good of you.' Morgan grunted, but looked pleased.

'Shepherd comes by at times,' he said, in his great deep voice, and the Five felt quite surprised to hear him saying even a short sentence to them! 'He'll take messages for you if you so want.'

And with that he set off down the hill back to the farm, with enormous, swinging steps, like a giant from an old-time tale.

'He's queer,' said Anne, looking after him. 'I don't know if I like him or not.'

'What does it matter?' said Dick. 'Come on, Anne, old girl, give a hand. There's plenty to do. What about you and George seeing what blankets and things are in those cupboards, and making up some beds for tonight.'

Anne loved that kind of thing, though George didn't. She would much rather have carried in the things as the boys were doing. But she went to the cupboards with Anne, and examined all their contents with much interest.

'Plenty of rugs and blankets and pillows,' said Anne. 'And enough china and cutlery for half a dozen families too! I suppose old Mrs. Jones has dozens of people here in the summer! George, I'll put the food away, if you'll see to the beds.'

'Right,' said George, and went to make up four of the bunk-beds. There were six of these altogether, in rows of three - three on one wall, three on another, one above the other. George was soon struggling with blankets and pillows, while Anne set out the food they had brought with them, arranging it neatly on the cupboard shelves. Then she went to look at the stove to see if it had oil in it, for it would be very cold that night.

'Yes, it's full,' she said. 'I'll light it tonight, because I expect we'll be out as long as it's daylight, won't we, Dick?'

'Rather!' said Dick, unpacking some of the things out of his suit-case. 'By the way, there's a little wooden bunker outside, with a can of extra oil and an enamel jug. I suppose the jug's for fetching water from some spring or other in the summer-time - but we can easily melt snow for water. Will you two girls be long, Anne?'

'No. We've almost finished,' said Anne. 'Do you want something to eat before we go? Or shall we take some bread and ham with us, and have a good meal when we come back?'

'Oh, take some sandwiches,' said Julian. 'I don't want to stop for a meal. Besides, we can't be hungry yet. Make sandwiches, Anne - and we'll take some of those apples with us too!'

The sandwiches were quickly made, and the boys filled their pockets with apples. Timmy danced round in delight.

'You won't be quite so pleased, Tim, when you find yourself in deep snow!' said Dick. 'I wonder if he'll like travelling down the hill on a toboggan, George!'

'Oh, he'll love it!' said George. 'Won't you, Tim? Are we ready? Well, lock the door, Ju, and off we'll go!'

Chapter 9

A STRANGE TALE

The children did not bother about their skis that first day. For one thing the snow was not quite thick or smooth enough for skiing, and for another thing they longed for the swift excitement of tobogganing. Dick took George on his toboggan and Julian took Anne on his. Timmy wouldn't come on either of them.

'Race you to the bottom!' Julian shouted. 'One, two, three, go!' And away they went, swishing over the clean white snow at top speed, shouting with laughter.

Julian won easily, because Dick's toboggan caught on a root or small bush under the snow, which upset it very suddenly. Dick and George were flung headlong into the snow, and sat up, blinking, and spitting out the cold snow from their mouths.

Timmy was terribly excited. He came plunging down the hillside after the toboggans, annoyed at the way his legs went into the snow, barking madly. He was most astonished to see Dick and George fly into the air when their toboggan upset, and pranced round them, licking them and leaping on them in a most aggravating way.

'Oh, get away, Timmy!' said Dick, trying to get up, and being knocked down again by the excited dog. 'Go and knock George over, not me! Call him, George!'

Pulling the toboggans back up the hill was a tiring job - but the swift flight down over the snow was worth all the pullings-up! The four children soon had glowing faces and tingling limbs, and wished they could throw off their coats and scarves!

'I can't pull up our toboggan one more time!' said Anne, at last. 'I really can't. You'll have to pull it up yourself, Julian, if you want to toboggan any more.'

'Well, I do want to - but my legs will hardly walk up the hill now,' said Julian, panting. 'Hey, Dick - Anne and I have had enough. We'll go up and eat our sandwiches at the top of the slope, where we can watch you.'

The other two soon joined them, and Timmy was glad to sit down too. His long pink tongue hung out of his mouth, and he puffed his white breath out like rolling mist! At first he had been puzzled by what he thought was 'smoke' coming out of his mouth so continually, but now, seeing that everyone was apparently puffing it out too, he didn't worry!

The Five sat at the top of the slope, eating their sandwiches hungrily, very glad of the rest. Julian grinned round at them all.

'Pity Mother can't see us now!' he said. 'We look marvellous! And nobody's coughed once. I bet we'll be stiff tomorrow though!'

Dick was looking across the slope to the opposite hill, rising steeply up a mile or so away.

'There's that building I thought I saw yesterday,' he said. 'Isn't that a chimney sticking up?'

'You've got sharp eyes!' said George. 'Nobody could surely see a building as far away as that, when the snow is on it!'

'Did we bring the field-glasses?' asked Julian. 'Where are they? We could soon find out if there's a house there or not, if we look through those.'

'I put them into a cupboard,' said Anne, getting up. 'Ooooh, I'm stiff! I'll just go and get them.'

She soon came back with the glasses and handed them to Dick. He put them to his eyes and adjusted them, till they were properly focused on the far-away hill opposite.

'Yes,' he said. 'I was right. It is a building - and I'm pretty sure it must be Old Towers, too. You know - the place we went to by mistake two nights ago when we lost our way.'

'Let's have a look,' said Anne. 'I think I might recognise it. I caught a glimpse of the towers when we swung round a corner on the way up Old Towers Hill.'

She put the glasses to her eyes and gazed through them. 'Yes. I'm sure that's the place,' she said.

'Wasn't it queer - that big rude notice on the gate - and that fiercely barking dog - and nobody about! How lonely the old lady must be living there all by herself!'

As they sat there, nibbling their apples, Timmy suddenly began to bark. He stood up, turning his head towards the path that ran higher up the hill.

'Perhaps it's Aily, that funny child, coming,' said Julian, hopefully. But it wasn't. It was a small, wiry-looking woman, a shawl over her head, neatly-dressed, walking swiftly.

She didn't seem very surprised to see the children. She stopped and said 'Good day'.

'You'll be the boys my Aily was telling me of last night,' she said. 'Are you staying in the Jones' hut?'

'Yes,' said Julian. 'We were staying at the farm first - but our dog didn't get on with the others, so we've come up here. It's fine. Marvellous view, too!'

'If you see that Aily of mine, you tell her not to stay out tonight,' said the woman, wrapping her shawl more tightly round her. 'Her and her lamb! She's as mad as the old lady in the house yonder!' and she pointed in the direction of Old Towers.

'Oh - do you know anything about that old place?' asked Julian, at once. 'We went to it by mistake, and...'

'Well, you didn't get into it, I'll be bound,' said Aily's mother. 'Notices on the gate and all! And to think I used to go up there three times a week, and never anything but kindness shown me! And now old Mrs. Thomas, she won't see a soul except those friends of her son's. Poor old lady - she's out of her mind, so they say. Must be - or she'd see me, that waited on her for years!'

This was all very interesting.

'Why do they say 'Keep Out' on the gates?' asked Julian. 'They've a fierce dog there, too.'

'Ah well, young sir, you see some of the old lady's friends would like to know what's going on,' said Aily's mother. 'But nobody can do a thing. It's a queer place now - with noises at night - and mists - and shimmerings - and...'

Julian began to think this was an old wives' tale, made up because the villagers were angry that they were now kept out of the big old house. He smiled.

'Oh, you may smile, young man,' said the woman, sounding cross. 'But ever since last October, there's queer doings there. And what's more, vans have been there in the dead of night. What for, I'd like to know? Well, if you ask me, I reckon they've been taking away the poor old thing's belongings - furniture and pictures and such. My poor old Madam - she was sweet and kind, and now I don't know what's happening to her!'

There were tears in the woman's eyes, and she hastily brushed them away.

'I shouldn't be telling you all this - you'll be scared sleeping here alone at night now.'

'No - no, we shan't,' Julian assured her, amused that she should think that a village tale might frighten them. 'Tell us about Aily. Isn't she frozen, going about with so few clothes on?'

'That child! She's fey, I tell you,' said Aily's mother. 'Runs about the hills like a wild thing - plays truant from school - goes to see her father - he's shepherd, up yonder where the sheep are - and doesn't come home at nights. You tell her there's a good whipping waiting for her at home if she doesn't come back tonight. She's like her father, she is - likes to be alone all the time - talks to the lambs and the dogs like they were human - but never a word to me!'

The children began to feel uncomfortable, and wished they hadn't spoken to the grumbling gossipy woman. Julian got up.

'Well - if we see Aily, we'll certainly tell her to go home - but not about the whipping, because I expect she wouldn't go home then,' he said. 'If you pass by the farmhouse will you be kind enough to step in and tell Mrs. Jones we are quite all right, and enjoying ourselves very much? Thank you!'

The woman nodded her head, muttered something, and went off down the hill, walking as swiftly as before.

'She said some queer things,' said Dick, staring after her. 'Was that a silly village-tale she told us - or do you suppose there's something in it, Ju?'

'Oh - a village tale of course!' said Julian, sensing that Anne hadn't liked it much. 'What a strange family - a shepherd who spends all his time on the hills - a child who wanders about the countryside with a lamb and a dog - and a mother who stops and tells such angry tales to strangers!'

'It's getting dark,' said Dick. 'I vote we go in and light the oil-lamp and get the hut warm - and light the table-lamp too. It'll be cosy in there. I'm feeling a bit chilled now, sitting out here so long.'

'Well, don't begin to cough,' said Julian, 'or you'll set us all off! Indoors, Tim! Come on!'

Soon they were all in the hut, the oil-lamp giving out a lovely warmth and glow, and the table-lamp shining brightly.

'We'll play a game, shall we?' said Dick. 'And have a sort of high tea later. Let's have a silly game - snap, or something!'

So they sat down to play - and soon Dick's cards had all been 'snapped' by the others. He yawned and went to the window, looking out into the darkness that hid all the snowy hills. Then he stood tense for a moment, staring in surprise. He spoke to the others without turning.

'Quick! Come here, all of you! Tell me what you make of this! Did you ever see such an extraordinary thing! QUICK!'

Chapter 10

IN THE MIDDLE OF THE NIGHT

'What is it, Dick? What can you see?' cried George, putting down her cards as soon as she heard Dick's call. Julian rushed to stand beside him at once, imagining all sorts of things. Anne went too, with Timmy leaping excitedly. They all stared out of the window, Anne half fearfully.

'It's gone!' cried Dick, in disappointment.

'But what was it?' asked George.

'I don't know. It was over there - on the opposite slope, where Old Towers is,' said Dick. 'I don't know how to describe it - it was like a - like a rainbow - no, not quite like that - how can I describe it?'

'Try,' said Julian, excited.

'Well - let me think - you know how, on a very hot day, all the air shimmers, don't you!' said Dick. 'Well that's what I saw on the hill over there - rising high into the sky and then disappearing. A shimmering!'

'What colour?' asked Anne, amazed.

'I don't know - all colours it seemed,' said Dick. 'I don't quite know how to explain - it's something I've never seen before. It just came suddenly - and the shimmering rose all the way up into the sky, and then disappeared. That's all.'

'Well - that's what Aily's mother said - mists - and shimmerings,' said Julian, remembering. 'Gosh - so that wasn't just a tale she told us. There was some truth in it. But what in the wide world can this shimmering be?'

'Had we better go back to the farm and tell them there?' asked Anne, hopefully, not at all wanting to spend the night in the hut now.

'No! They've probably heard the tale already,' said Julian. 'Besides - this is exciting. We might be able to find out something more about it. We can easily watch Old Towers from here - it's one of the very few places where anyone can look straight across at it. As the crow flies, it's less than a mile away - though it's many miles by the road.'

They all gazed towards the opposite hill again, though they couldn't see it, of course, hoping something would happen. But nothing did happen. The sky was pitch black, for heavy clouds had come up - and the distant hill couldn't be seen.

'Well - I'm tired of looking out into the darkness,' said Anne, turning away. 'Let's go on with our game.'

'Right,' said Julian, and they all sat down again, Dick watching the others play, but occasionally glancing out of the window into the black darkness there.

Anne was out of the game next, and she got up and went to the food cupboard.

'I think I'll start preparing a meal,' she said. 'We'll have boiled eggs, shall we, to begin with - and I'll boil a kettle too and make some cocoa - or would you rather have tea?'

'Cocoa,' said everyone, and Anne got out the tin.

'I'll want some snow, for the kettle,' she said.

'Well, there's some nice clean snow just behind the hut,' said Dick. 'Oh wait, Anne - you won't like going out in the dark now, will you? I'll get it! If you hear me yell, you'll know there's something going on!'

Timmy went out with him, much to Anne's relief. She held the kettle, waiting for the snow - and then suddenly there came a loud yell!

'Hey! Who's that?'

Anne let go the kettle in fright, and it dropped on the floor with a crash, making the other two jump violently. Julian rushed to the door.

'Dick! What's up?'

Dick appeared at the doorway, grinning, with Timmy beside him.

'Nothing much. Sorry if I frightened you. But I was just scraping up some snow in the basin here, when something rushed at me, and butted me!'

'Whatever was it?' said George, startled. 'And why didn't Timmy bark?'

'Because he knew it was harmless, I suppose,' said Dick, grinning aggravatingly. 'Here, Anne - here's the snow for the kettle.'

'Dick! Don't be so annoying!' said George. 'Who was out there?'

'Well - I couldn't really see much, because I'd put my torch down to scrape up the snow,' said Dick. 'But I rather think it was Fany the lamb! It was gone before I had time to call out. I got quite a shock!'

'Fany the lamb!' said Julian. 'Well - that must mean that little Aily is about. What can she be doing out in the darkness at this time of night?'

He went to the door and called: 'Aily! Aily, if you're there, come in here and we'll give you something to eat.'

But there was no answering call. Nobody appeared out of the darkness, no lamb came frisking up.

Timmy stood by Julian, looking out into the darkness, his ears pricked. He had been surprised when the tiny lamb trotted up out of the darkness, and had had half a mind to bark. But who would bark at a lamb? Not Timmy!

Julian shut the door.

'If that kid is out there in this frosty night, with only the few clothes she had on yesterday, I should think she'll catch her death of cold,' he said. 'Cheer up, Anne - and for goodness' sake, don't be scared if you hear a noise outside or see a little face looking in at the window. It will only be that mad little Aily!'

'I don't want to see any faces looking in at the window, whether it's Aily or not,' said Anne, putting snow into the kettle. 'Honestly I think she must be mad, wandering about these snowy hills alone at night. I don't wonder her mother was cross.'

It wasn't long before they were all sitting round the small table eating a very nice meal. Boiled eggs, laid that morning, cheese and new bread and butter, and a jar of home-made jam they found in the cupboard. They drank steaming hot cups of cocoa, into each of which Anne had ladled a spoonful of cream.

'No King or Queen in all the world could possibly have enjoyed their meal more than I have,' said Dick. 'Anne, shall I take the milk and cream out into the snow - they'll keep for ages out there.'

'All right. But for goodness' sake don't put them where the lamb can get them - if it was a lamb that butted you,' said Anne, giving them to Dick. 'And don't yell again if you can help it!'

However, Dick didn't see anything this time, nor did anything come up and butt him. He was quite disappointed!

'I'll wash the plates and cups out in the snow tomorrow,' said Anne. 'How long are you all going to stay up? It's awfully early, I know - but I'm half asleep already! The air up here is so very strong!'

'All right. We'll all pack up,' said Julian. 'You take those two bunks over there, girls, and we'll have these. Shall we have the little oil-stove on, or not?'

'Yes,' said Dick. 'This place will be an ice-box if we don't!'

'I'd like it on too,' said Anne. 'What with shimmerings and buttings and yellings. I feel I'd like a little light in the room, even if it only comes from an oil-stove!'

'Well - I know you don't believe my 'shimmerings',' said Dick. 'But I swear they're true! And what's more, I bet we'll all see them before we leave this hut! Well - good night, girls - I'm for bed!'

In a few minutes' time the bunks were creaking as the four children settled into them. They were not as comfortable as beds, but quite good. George's bunk creaked more than anyone's.

'I suppose you've got Timmy in your bunk, making it creak like that!' said Anne sleepily. 'Well, I'm glad I'm in the bunk above yours, George. I bet Tim falls out in the night!'

One by one they fell asleep. The oil-stove burned steadily. It was turned rather low, and shadows quivered on the ceiling and walls. And then something made Timmy's ears prick up as he lay asleep on George's feet. First one ear pricked up - and then the other - and suddenly Timmy sat up straight and growled in his throat. Nobody awoke - they were all too sound asleep.

Timmy growled again and again - and then he barked sharply. 'WOOF!'

Everyone awoke at once. Timmy barked again, and George put out a hand to him.

'Sh! What's the matter? Is there someone about, Tim?'

'What's up, do you think?' said Julian, from his bunk on the other side of the room. Nobody could hear or see anything out of the ordinary. Why was Timmy barking then?

The oil-stove was still burning, its light throwing a small round pattern of yellow on the ceiling. It made a small cosy noise as it burned, a kind of bubbling. There was nothing else to be heard at all.

'It must be someone prowling outside,' said Dick at last. 'Shall we let Timmy go and see?'

'Well - let's lie down and see if he barks again,' said Julian. 'For all we know a mouse may have run across the floor. Tim would bark at that just as soon as he would bark at an elephant!'

'Yes. You're right,' said George. 'All right - we'll lie down again. Timmy's lying down too. Now, for goodness' sake, Tim, if it is a mouse somewhere, do use your common sense, and let it play if it wants to - and don't wake us up.'

Timmy licked her face. He kept his ears well up for a while. The others all went to sleep except Anne. She lay with her eyes open, wondering what had startled Timmy. She didn't believe it was a mouse!

So it was the wakeful Anne who heard the noise when it came again. She thought at first that it was just a noise in her ears, the kind she often heard when she lay down to sleep, and the room was quiet. But then she felt certain that it wasn't in her ears - it was a real noise. But what a peculiar one!

'It's a kind of deep deep grumbling noise,' thought Anne, sitting up. Timmy gave a little whine as if to say he was hearing something again too. 'A sort of thunder-rumble, but far far below me, not above!'

It grew a little louder, and Timmy growled.

'It's all right, Tim,' whispered Anne. 'It must be far-off thunder, I think!'

But then the shuddering began! This was so astonishing that Anne didn't know what to make of it. At first she thought it was herself, beginning to shiver with the cold. But no - even her bunk vibrated to her fingers when she touched the wooden side!

Then she really was frightened. She called out loudly.

'Julian! Dick! Wake up - something queer is happening. Do wake up!'

And Timmy began to bark again. Woof, woof, woof! WOOF, WOOF!

Chapter 11

STRANGE HAPPENINGS

Everyone awoke at Anne's call. Julian thought he was in bed, and leapt out, forgetting that he was in the top bunk. He landed with a crash on the floor, shaken and alarmed.

'Oh, Ju! You forgot you were in the top bunk!' said George, half scared and half amused. 'Are you hurt? Anne, whatever is the matter? Why did you call out? Did you see something?'

'No. I heard something - and felt something!' said Anne, glad that the others were awake. 'So did Timmy. But it's all gone now.'

'Yes, but what was it?' asked Julian, sitting on the edge of Dick's bunk, and rubbing his knee, which had struck the floor when he fell.

'It was a... a... well... a kind of very very deep rumbling,' said Anne. 'A deep-down rumbling - very far away. Not like thunder up in the sky. More like a thunderstorm underground! And then there was a... a shuddering! I felt the edge of my bunk and it seemed to be sort of - well - quivering. I can't quite explain it. I was awfully scared.'

'Sounds like a small earthquake,' said Dick, wondering if Anne had dreamt all this. 'Anyway - you can't hear or feel it now, can you? You're sure you didn't dream all this, Anne?'

'Quite sure!' said Anne, 'I...' And just at that very moment it all began again! First the curious grumbling, muffled, and 'deep-down', as Anne had described it - then the equally strange 'shuddering'. It crept through their bodies till they were all shuddering a little too, and could not stop.

'It's as if we were shivering in every part of us,' said Dick, in wonder. 'Sort of vibrating as if we had tiny dynamo engines working inside us.'

'Yes! You've described it exactly!' said George. 'Goodness - when I put my hand on Timmy I can feel him doing the 'shudders' - and it's just like putting my hand on something working by electricity! You know the sort of small vibrations you feel then.'

'It's gone!' said Dick, just as George finished speaking. 'I'm not 'shuddering' any more. It suddenly stopped. And I can't hear that grumbling, far-off noise now. Can you?'

Everyone agreed that both the noise and the shuddering had stopped. What in the wide world could it be?

'It must be something to do with that curious 'shimmering' I saw in the sky over Old Towers Hill tonight,' said Dick, remembering. 'I've a good mind to go and look out of the window that faces the hill opposite, and see if it's there again.'

He leapt out of his bunk and ran to the window. At once he gave a loud cry. 'Come and look! Whew! Just come and look!'

All the others, Timmy as well, rushed to the window at once, Timmy standing on his hind legs to see. Certainly there was something queer to look at!

Over the hill opposite hung a mist - a curious glowing mist, that stood out in the pitch black darkness of the night! It swirled heavily, not lightly as a mist usually does.

'Look at that!' said Anne, in wonder. 'What a strange colour - not red - not yellow - not orange. What colour is it?'

'It's not a shade I've ever seen before,' said Julian, rather solemnly. 'I call this jolly strange. What's happening here? No wonder Aily's mother told us those stories - there's really something in them! We'd better make a few enquiries tomorrow.'

'It's funny that both the shimmering I saw and that cloud too are over Old Towers Hill,' said Dick. 'You don't think it's something that's happening in Old Towers House, do you?'

'No. Of course not,' said Julian. 'What could happen there that would make us feel the effects here, in this hut - that queer shuddering, for instance? And how in the world could we hear a rumbling from a mile or so away, if it were not thunder? And that certainly wasn't.'

'The mist is going,' said Anne. 'Look - it's changing colour - no, it's just going darker. It's gone!'

They stood looking out for a short while longer, and then Julian felt Anne shivering violently beside him.

'You're frozen!' he said. 'Come on, back to bed. You don't want to get another awful cold and cough. My word - this is all very queer. But I expect there's a sensible explanation - probably there are mines around here, and work is being done at night as well as day.'

'We'll find out,' said Dick, and they all climbed thankfully back into their bunks, feeling very cold. Julian turned up the stove a little more, to heat the room better.

George cuddled Timmy and was soon as warm as toast, but the others lay awake, trying to get their cold hands and feet warm again. Julian felt very puzzled. So there was a lot of truth in that woman's peculiar tale, after all!

They awoke late the next morning, for they had been tired out with their exertions the day before, and with the excitements in the night. Julian leapt out of his bunk when he found that it was actually ten to nine, and dressed quickly, calling to the others. He went out to get some snow to put into the kettle.

Soon breakfast was ready, for Anne was next to get up, and she began quickly to prepare some food. Boiled eggs and ham, bread, butter and jam - and good hot cocoa again. Soon they were all eating and chattering, talking over the happenings of the night, which somehow didn't seem nearly so remarkable now that daylight was everywhere, brilliant with the snow, and the sun trying to come out from behind the clouds.

As they sat round the table, eating and talking, Timmy ran to the door and began to bark. 'Now what's up?' said Dick. Then a face looked in at the window!

It was a remarkable face, old, lined and wrinkled, yet curiously young-looking too. The eyes were as blue as a summer sky. It was a man's face, with a long, raggedy beard and a moustache.

'Gracious - he looks like one of the old prophets out of the Bible,' said Anne, really startled. 'Who is he?'

'The shepherd, I expect,' said Julian, going to the door. 'We'll ask him in for a cup of cocoa. Maybe he can answer a few questions for us!'

He opened the door. 'Are you the shepherd?' he said. 'Come in. We're having breakfast and we can give you some too, if you like.'

The shepherd came in, and smiled, making many more wrinkles appear on his weather-beaten face. Julian wondered if he spoke English, or only Welsh. He was a fine-looking fellow, tall and straight, and obviously much younger than he looked.

'You are kind, young sir,' he said, standing there with his crook, and Anne suddenly felt that there must have been men just like this all through the history of the world, ever since there had been sheep on the hills, and men to watch them.

The shepherd spoke slowly, for English words were not easy to him. 'You want to send - to send - words - to the farm?' he said, in the lilting Welsh voice, so pleasant to hear.

'Oh yes - please take a message to the farm,' said Julian, handing him some bread and butter, and a dish of cheese. 'Just say we're fine, and all is well.'

'All is well, all is well,' repeated the shepherd, and refused the bread and cheese. 'No. I do not eat now. But the drink, yes, I will have, and thanking you I am, for the morning is cold.'

'Shepherd,' said Julian, 'did you hear queer noises last night - rumblings and grumblings - and did you feel shudderings and see a coloured mist over the hill yonder?'

The shepherd listened intently, trying to follow the strange English words. He understood that Julian was asking him something about the opposite hill.

He took a sip of his cocoa, and looked over to the hill. 'Always it has been a strange hill,' he said slowly, pronouncing some of his words queerly, so that they were hard to understand. 'My grandad told me a big dog lay below, growling for food, and my granny said witches lived there and made their spells, and - and the smock rose up...'

'Smock? What does he mean by that?' said George.

'He means 'smoke' I should think,' said Julian. 'Don't interrupt. Let him talk. This is very interesting.'

'The smock rose up, and we saw it in the sky,' went on the shepherd, his forehead wrinkled with the effort of using words he was not familiar with. 'And it comes still, young ones, it comes still! The big dog, he growls, the witches they cook in their pots, and the smock, it rises.'

'We heard the big dog growling last night, and saw the witches' smoke,' said Anne, quite under the spell of the lilting voice of the old shepherd.

The man looked at her and smiled. 'Yes,' he said. 'Yes. But the dog is worse now and the witches are more bad - more wickit, much more wickit...'

'More wicked?' said Julian. 'How?'

The shepherd shook his head. 'I am not clever,' he said. 'I know few things - my sheep, and the wind and the sky - and I know too that the hill is wickit - yes, more wickit. Near it you must not go, young ones! For there the plough will not plough the fields, the spade will not dig, and neither will the fork.'

This somehow sounded so much like a piece out of the Old Testament that the children felt quite solemn. What a strange and impressive old man - and yet he was only a shepherd.

'Still,' thought Julian, gazing at him, 'he has absolutely nothing to do but think long long thoughts all the hours he sits watching his sheep. No wonder he says extraordinary things. But what does he mean about the plough not ploughing the fields, I wonder?'

The shepherd put his cup down on the table. 'I go now,' he said. 'And I take your words to Mrs. Jones. And I thank you for your kindness. Good day!'

He went out with great dignity, and the children saw him striding past the window, his beard being blown backwards by the wind.

'Well!' said Dick, 'what a character! I almost felt that I was in church, listening to a preacher. I liked him, didn't you? But what did he mean about ploughs not ploughing and spades not digging? That's nonsense!'

'Well - it may not be,' said Julian. 'After all, we know that our car wouldn't go down that hill fast - and you remember that Aily's mother - the shepherd's wife - said that the postman had to leave his bicycle at the bottom of the hill - even that wouldn't work! So it's quite likely that in the old days ploughs went too heavily and too slowly to plough properly, and that spades were the same.'

'But why?' said Anne, puzzled. 'Surely you don't really believe these things? I know our car went crawling down - but that might have been because something went wrong in its works for a little while!'

'Anne doesn't want to believe in ploughs and spades and forks that won't do their jobs!' said Dick, teasingly. 'Come on - let's forget the queer happenings last night and put on our skis. I feel pretty stiff after yesterday - but a bit of skiing down those slopes will do me good. What about it?'

'Yes! Come on!' said Julian. 'Buck up with the clearing away, Anne - Dick and I will get out the skis. Hurry!'

Chapter 12

OUT ON THE HILLS

Timmy didn't find skiing any fun at all, because, not being fitted with skis, he couldn't keep up with the others, when they tore down the hill at top speed!

At first he plunged after them, but when he jumped into a great soft heap of snow, and buried himself completely, he decided that this kind of winter sport was not for him! He clambered out of the snow-heap, shook the snow off his coat, and stared forlornly after the shouting children.

They had skied before, and were quite good at it. The hill down which they went was very long, and had a fine slope. It ran smoothly into the upward slope of the next hill, on which Old Towers house had been built.

Julian did a marvellous run down, and went swinging on up the opposite hill. He called to the others.

'I say - what about going up to the top of this hill, because we're already part of the way up - and ski-ing down, and partly up our own slope again. It would save time, and give us a jolly good second ski-run.'

All but Anne thought this was a very good idea. She said nothing, and Dick looked at her.

'She's scared of going up Old Towers Hill!' he said. 'Are you afraid of the big, big dog, Anne, who lies under it and growls at night, or of the lank-haired witches that sit on the hill and make their smoky spells?'

'Don't be silly,' said Anne, cross with Dick for reading her thoughts. She didn't believe in either dog or witches, but somehow she did not like that hill! 'I'm coming too, of course!'

So she toiled up the opposite hill with the others, quite ready to enjoy the lovely run down, and to end half-way up their own hill.

'Look - you can see Old Towers quite clearly now,' said George to Julian. She was right. There, not far off, was the great old house, set with towers, built cosily into the side of the steep hill.

They stood still and looked at it. 'We can even see down into a few of the rooms,' said Julian. 'I wonder if the old lady is still there - Mrs. Thomas - the one that Aily's mother used to go and work for?'

'Poor old thing - I'm sorry for her if she is,' said George. 'Seeing nobody - keeping out all her friends! I wish we could go and enquire at the house for something - pretend we've lost our way, and snoop round a bit. But there's that fierce dog.'

'Yes - we don't want any more fights,' said Julian. 'Now - we're almost at the top. We'll wait for the others and then have a race. What a wonderful slope!'

'Julian - look - is that someone at one of the tower windows - the one to the right?' said George suddenly, as they stood waiting, looking down at the big old house some way off below them. Julian looked at the tower at once, just in time to see someone disappear.

'Yes. It was someone!' he said. 'Someone staring at us, I think. I expect no one ever comes near this hill, and it must have been a surprise to look out and see us! Did you make out if it was a man or a woman?'

'A woman, I think,' said George. 'Could it have been old Mrs. Thomas, do you think? Oh, Ju - you don't suppose she's being kept prisoner in that tower, do you - while her horrid son and his friends gradually steal everything? You know we heard that vans went up to the house in the middle of the night.'

'Hallo, you two!' said Dick, labouring up with Anne. 'What a climb! Still, the run down will be worth it. I simply must have a rest first, though!'

'Dick, George and I thought we saw someone at the tower window there - the one on the right,' said Julian. 'When we get back we'll get our field-glasses and train them on to that window. We might possibly see some sign of anyone there!'

Dick and Anne stared hard at the tower window - and as they looked, someone drew the curtains swiftly across!

'There - we've been seen - and we're not going to be encouraged to look at the old place!' said Julian. 'No wonder there are queer stories about it! Come on, now - let's start our run down!'

They set off together, each taking a different line. Whooooooooosh! The wind blew in their faces as they flew down the white slope, gasping in delight at their speed. Julian and Anne slid swiftly all the way down the first slope and half-way up the next - but Dick and George were not so fortunate. They both caught their skis in something, and shot into the air and then down into the soft snow. They lay there breathless, almost dazed with the sudden stoppage.

'Whew!' said Dick, at last. 'What a shock! Is that you, George? Are you all right?'

'I think so,' said George. 'One ankle feels a bit queer - no, I think it's all right! Hallo, here's Tim! He must have seen us fall, and come rushing down to help. It's all right, Tim. We're not hurt. It's all part of the fun!'

As they lay there, getting their breath, half-way down the first slope, a loud voice shouted in the distance.

'Hey there! You keep off this slope!'

Dick sat up straight at once. He saw a tall fellow wading through the snow towards them, from the direction of Old Towers, looking angry.

'We're only skiing!' shouted back Dick. 'And we're not doing any harm! Who are you?'

'I'm the caretaker,' shouted the man, nodding his head towards Old Towers. 'This field belongs to the house. So keep off it!'

'We'll come and ask permission of the owners,' yelled Dick, standing up, thinking this might be a good way of having a look at the house.

'You can't. There's no one else here but me!' shouted back the man. 'I'm the caretaker, I tell you. I'll set my dog on you all, if you don't do what I say!'

'That's funny,' said Dick to George, as the man waded back through the snow. 'He says he's the only one in the house - and yet we saw someone in the right-hand tower only a few minutes ago! The caretaker wouldn't have had time to have got here from the tower - so he isn't the only one in the house. There is someone in the tower as well. Queer, isn't it?'

George had held Timmy by the collar all the time the man was speaking. Timmy had growled at the man's angry voice, and George was afraid he might fly at him. Then, if the other dog appeared, there might be a fight! That would be dreadful! Timmy might get bitten again.

She and Dick tried their skis to see if they were still properly fixed, after their fall - and then went smoothly gliding off again. The others were waiting at the top of the hill for them.

'Who was that man? What was he shouting about?' demanded Julian. 'Did he actually come from Old Towers?'

'Yes - and a surly fellow he was, too,' said Dick. 'He ordered us to keep off that slope - said it belonged to Old Towers and he was the caretaker - and when we said we'd go and ask permission from the owners, he said he was the only one in the house! But we know different.'

'Yes. We do,' said Julian, puzzled. 'Why should it matter to anyone if we ski down that particular slope? Are they afraid we might see something in the house - as we did! And why tell a lie and say there was no one else there? Did he sound like a caretaker?'

'Well - he didn't sound Welsh!' said George. 'And I should have thought that any owners would have chosen someone trustworthy from the village, someone Welsh, wouldn't you? This is all rather mysterious!'

'And if you add to it all the strange noises and things, it's extremely curious,' said Dick. 'In fact, I feel it might be worth enquiring into!'

'No,' said Anne. 'Don't let's spoil our holiday. It's such a short one.'

'Well - I don't see how we can enquire into the matter,' said George. 'I'm certainly not going to that house while the dog is there - and there's no other way of making enquiries - even if they would get us anywhere, which I'm pretty sure they wouldn't!'

'I say - do you know that it's almost one o'clock?' said Anne, pleased to change the subject. 'Isn't anybody hungry?'

'Yes - I'm ravenous!' said Julian. 'But as I thought it was only about half-past eleven, I didn't like to mention it! Let's go in and have dinner. I vote we finish up that ham!'

They went to the hut, and there, standing in the snow outside it, were two quart bottles of milk, and a large parcel which Timmy at once went to, wagging his tail eagerly. He gave a little bark.

'He says it's meat, so it must be for him,' said George with a laugh.

Julian tore off the paper and laughed too. 'Well, Timmy's right,' he said. 'It's a big piece of cold roast pork. No ham for me, then. I'll have some of this!'

'Pity we haven't any apple sauce,' said Dick. 'I love it with pork.'

'Well, if you like to wait while I make some on the stove, with a few of the apples we brought...' began Anne. But the others refused at once. No one was going to wait one minute longer for their meal than they could help, apple sauce or not!

It was a merry meal, and certainly the pork was good. Timmy had a piece and thought that George was very mean not to give him the rest of the joint when they had finished with it.

'Oh no, Tim!' said George, as he put an enquiring paw on her knee. 'Certainly not. We're going to finish it up tomorrow! You shall have the bone then.'

'There's more snow coming,' said Julian, looking out of the window. 'I say - who brought the meat and the milk here, do you think?'

'The shepherd, I should imagine, on his way back,' said Dick. 'Jolly nice of him. I wonder where that kid Aily is? I'd be scared of her getting caught in the snow, and having to sleep on the hills in it.'

'I expect she'll look after herself all right and her lamb and dog!' said Julian. 'I'd like to see her again - but unless she's hungry, I don't expect we shall!'

'Talk of an angel and hear the rustle of her wings!' said Anne. 'Here she is!' And sure enough, there was Aily, looking in at the window, holding up her lamb for him to take a peep too!

'Let's get her in and feed her - and ask her if she knows who lives in Old Towers,' said George. 'She might have seen someone in that right-hand tower too, as we did!'

'Right. I'll call her in,' said Julian, going to the door. 'She might know something - always scouring round about the countryside!'

He was right! Aily did know something - something that interested everyone very much!

Chapter 13

AILY IS SURPRISING

Aily was not shy this time. She did not run away when Julian opened the door. She was still dressed in the same few clothes, but her face glowed, and she certainly didn't look cold!

'Hallo, Aily!' said Julian. 'Come along in. We're having dinner - and there is plenty for you!'

The dog ran right up to the door and into the room, when he smelt the dinner there. Timmy looked most surprised, and gave a very small growl.

'No, Tim, no - he's your guest,' said George. 'Remember your manners, please!'

The small dog wagged his tail vigorously. 'There, Timmy! He's telling you not to be afraid of him; he won't hurt you!' said Anne, which made everyone laugh. Timmy wagged his tail vigorously, too, and the pair were friends at once.

Aily came in then, the lamb in her arms, in case Timmy might object to him. But Timmy didn't. He was very interested in the little creature, and when Aily set him down and let him run about the room, Timmy ran sniffing after him, his tail still wagging fast.

Anne offered the untidy little girl some of the meat but she shook her head and pointed at the cheese. 'Aily like,' she said, and looked on in delight as Anne cut her a generous piece. She sat down on the floor to eat it, and the lamb came along and nibbled at it too. It really was a dear little thing.

'Fany bach!' said the child, and kissed his little nose.

' 'Bach' is Welsh for 'dear', isn't it?' said Anne. She touched Aily on the arm. 'Aily bach!' she said, and the child smiled a sudden sweet smile at her.

'Where did you sleep last night, Aily?' asked George. 'Your mother was looking for you.'

But she had spoken too quickly, and Aily didn't understand. George repeated her words slowly.

Aily nodded. 'In the hay,' she said. 'Down at Magga Farm.'

'Aily, listen - who lives at Old Towers?' asked Julian, speaking as slowly and clearly as he could.

'Many peoples,' said Aily, pointing to the cheese, to show that she wanted another piece. 'Big mans, little mans. Big dog, too. More big than him!' and she pointed at Timmy.

The others looked at one another in surprise. Many men! Whatever were they doing at Old Towers?

'And yet that caretaker fellow said he was the only one there!' said George.

'Aily, listen - is there - an - old - lady - there?' asked Julian, slowly. 'An - old - lady?'

Aily nodded her head. 'Yes - one old lady I see her high up in tower - sometime she not see Aily. Aily hide.'

'Where do you hide?' asked Dick, curiously.

'Aily not tell, never not tell,' said the child, looking through half-closed eyes at Dick, as if she kept her secrets behind them.

'Did you see the old lady when you were in the fields?' asked Julian. Aily considered this, and shook her head.

'Well, where then?' asked Julian. 'Look - you shall have some of this chocolate if you can tell me.' He held the bar of chocolate just out of her reach. She looked at it with bright eyes. Obviously chocolate was a rare treat for her. She reached out suddenly for it, but Julian was too quick for her.

'No. You tell me what I ask you,' he said. 'Then you shall have the chocolate.'

Aily suddenly hit out with her hands and gave him a good punch in the chest. He laughed and took both her small hands in his big one.

'No, Aily, no. I am your friend. You do not hit a friend.'

'I know where you were, when you saw the old lady!' said Dick, slyly. 'Aily - you were in the grounds - in the garden!'

'How you know?' cried Aily. She dragged her hands out of Julian's hand, and leapt to her feet, facing Dick, looking furious and frightened.

'Here - don't get so upset,' said Dick, astonished.

'How you know?' demanded Aily again. 'You not tell no one?'

'Of course I've told no one,' said Dick, who had only just thought of the idea that very moment.

'Aha! So you get into the grounds of Old Towers, do you? How do you get in?'

'Aily not tell,' said the little girl, and suddenly burst into tears. Anne put her arm round her to comfort her, but the child pushed it roughly away. 'He - Dave - went there, not me, not Aily. Poor Dave - big dog bark, wuff-wuff, like that - and... and...'

'And so you went in to get Dave, didn't you?' said Dick. 'Good little Aily, brave Aily.'

The little girl rubbed her tears away with a grubby hand, and left black streaks down her cheeks. She smiled at Dick, and nodded. 'Good Aily!' she repeated, and took the little dog on her knee and hugged him. 'Poor Dave bach!'

'So she got into the grounds, did she?' said Julian, in a low voice to Dick. 'I wonder how? Through the hedge perhaps. Aily - we want to see this old lady. Can we get through the hedge round the garden?'

'No,' said Aily, shaking her head vigorously. 'Fence there - big high fence that bites.'

Everyone laughed at the idea of a biting fence. But George guessed what she meant. 'An electric fence!' she said. 'So that's what they've put round. My word - the place is like a fort! Locked gates, a fierce dog, an electric fence!'

'How on earth did Aily get in, then?' said Dick. 'Aily - have you seen this old woman many times? Has she seen you?'

Aily didn't understand and he had to ask his questions again, more simply. The child nodded her head. 'Many times Aily see her - up high - and one time she see Aily. She throw out papers - little bits - out of the window.'

'Aily - did you pick them up?' said Julian, sitting up straight at once. 'Was there writing on them?' Everyone waited for Aily's answers. She nodded her head. 'Yes. Writings like they do at school - pen writings.'

'Did you read any of them?' asked Dick.

Aily suddenly wore a hunted expression. She shook her head - then she nodded it. 'Yes, Aily read them,' she said. 'They say 'Good morning, Aily. How are you, Aily?''

'Does the old woman know you then?' asked Dick, surprised.

'No, she not know Aily - only Aily's Mam,' said the child. 'She say on her papers 'Aily, you good girl. Aily, you very good!''

'She's not telling the truth now,' said Dick, noticing that the child would not look at them when she spoke. 'I wonder why?'

'I think I know,' said Anne. She took a piece of paper and wrote on it clearly. 'Good morning, Aily.' Then she showed it to the child. 'Read that, Aily,' she said.

But Aily couldn't! She had no idea what was written on the paper.

'She can't even read,' said Anne. 'And she was ashamed, so she pretended she could. Never mind, Aily! Listen - have you any of those bits of paper that the old woman dropped?'

Aily felt about in her few clothes, and at last produced a piece of paper that looked as if it had been torn from the top of a page in a book. She gave it to Dick.

All the four bent over it, reading what was written there, in small, rather illegible writing.

'I want help. I am a prisoner here, in my own house, while terrible things go on. They have killed my son. Help me, help me! Bronwen Thomas.'

'Good gracious!' said Julian, very startled. 'I say - this is extraordinary, isn't it! Do you think we ought to show it to the police?'

'Well - there is probably only one policeman shared between three or four of these little places,' said Dick. 'And there's another thing - the old lady might be off her head, you know. What she says may not be true.'

'How can we possibly find out if it is or not?' said George.

Dick turned to Aily. 'Aily - we want to see the old lady - we want to take her something nice to eat - she is all by herself, she is sad. Will you show us the way into the grounds?'

'No,' said Aily, shaking her head vigorously. 'Big dog there - dog with teeth like this!' And she bared her own small white teeth and snarled, much to Timmy's astonishment. The children laughed.

'Well - we can't make her tell us,' said Julian. 'And anyway, even if we got into the grounds, that dog would be there - and - I don't fancy him, somehow.'

'Aily show you way into house,' suddenly said the small girl, much to everyone's astonishment. They all stared at her.

'Into the house!' said Dick. 'But - you'd have to show us the way into the grounds first if we are to get into the house, Aily!'

'No,' said Aily, shaking her head. 'Aily show you way to house. Aily do that. No big dog there!'

Just then Timmy began to bark, and someone came by the door, looking in as she passed. It was Aily's mother, who had again been to take some things to her shepherd husband. She saw Aily sitting on the floor and gave an angry shout. Then standing at the door she poured out a long string of Welsh words which the children didn't understand. In a great fright Aily ran straight to a cupboard, her dog and lamb with her.

But it was no good. Her mother stormed into the hut and dragged Aily out, shaking her well. Timmy growled, but Aily's little dog was as frightened as she was, and the lamb bleated pitifully in the child's arms.

'I take Aily home!' said her angry mother, glaring at the four children as if she thought they were responsible for the child's keeping away from home. 'I whip her well!'

And out she went, holding the protesting child firmly by one arm. The children could do nothing. After all, she was Aily's mother, and the child really was a little monkey, the way she wandered round the country.

'You know - I think we'd better go down to the farm and tell Morgan what we know,' said Julian, making up his mind. 'I really do. If this thing is serious - and if the old lady is really a prisoner - I don't see how we can do a thing - but Morgan might be able to. He'd know the police for one thing. Come on - let's go down now. We can stay at the farm for the night if it gets dark. Buck up - let's go straightaway!'

Chapter 14

MORGAN IS SURPRISING TOO

George did not particularly want to go down to the farm, as she was afraid of Timmy meeting the farm dogs again, and being attacked. Julian saw her doubtful face and understood.

'Would you like to stay here by yourself with Timmy, George, till we come back?' he said. 'You should be all right with Tim - he'll look after you. The only thing is - will you be scared if any more rumblings and shudderings and shimmerings come again tonight?'

'I'll stay with George,' said Anne. 'It would really be best if you two boys went alone. I'm a bit tired and I don't think I could go as fast as you'd want to.'

'Right. Then Dick and I will go together, and leave you two girls here with Timmy,' said Julian.

'Come on, Dick. If we hurry, we might get back before dark.'

They set off together, and went swiftly down the winding mountain path, still white with snow. They were glad when at last they saw the farmhouse. A light was already in the kitchen, and looked very welcoming!

They went in at the front door, and made their way to the big kitchen, where Mrs. Jones was washing up at the sink. She turned in astonishment when they came in, stamping the snow from their shoes.

'Well now - this is a surprise!' she said, drying her hands on a towel. 'Is there something wrong? Where are the girls?'

'They're up at the hut - they're fine,' said Julian.

'You have come for something more to eat?' said Mrs. Jones, feeling certain this was the reason for their sudden visit.

'No, thank you - we've got plenty!' said Julian. 'We just wondered if we could talk to your son - Morgan. We - well, we've got something to tell him. Something rather urgent.'

'Well now - what could that be?' said Mrs. Jones, all curiosity at once. 'Let me see - yes, Morgan will be up at the big barn.' She pointed out of the window, where a big and picturesque old barn stood, outlined against the evening sky. 'It is there you will find my Morgan. You will be staying the night, now, will you not? You will like supper - a good supper.'

'Well - yes, we should,' said Julian, suddenly realising that they had missed out tea altogether.

'Thanks awfully. We'll just go and find Morgan.'

They made their way out to the big old barn. Morgan's three dogs at once ran out when they heard strange footsteps, and growled. But they recognised the boys immediately and leapt round them, barking.

The giant like Morgan came out to see what the dogs were barking about. He was surprised to find the two boys there, fondling the dogs.

'Hey?' he said, questioningly. 'Anything wrong?'

'We think there is,' said Julian. 'May we tell you about it?'

Morgan took them into the almost dark barn. He had been raking it over and he went on with his raking as Julian began his tale.

'It's about Old Towers,' said Julian, and Morgan stopped his raking at once. But he went on again almost immediately, listening without a word.

Julian told him his story. He told him about the noises of rumbling, the shimmering in the sky that Dick had seen, the 'shuddering' they had all felt - then about the old woman they had seen in the tower - and how Aily had told of the pieces of paper, and shown them one, which proved that old Mrs. Thomas was a prisoner in her own house.

For the first time Morgan spoke. 'And where is this paper?' he asked in his deep bass voice.

Julian produced it and handed it over. Morgan lighted a lamp to look at it, for it was now practically dark.

He read it and put it into his pocket. 'I'd rather like it back,' said Julian, surprised. 'Unless you want it to show the police. What do you think about it all? And is there anything we can do? I don't like to think of...'

'I will tell you what you are to do,' said Morgan. 'You are to leave it to me, Morgan Jones. You are but children, you know nothing. This matter is not for children. I can tell you that. You must go back to the hut, and you must forget all you have heard and all you have seen. And if Aily comes again you must bring her down here to me, and I will talk to her.'

His voice was so hard and determined that the two boys were startled and shocked.

'But, Mr. Morgan!' said Julian. 'Aren't you going to do anything about this... go to the police, or...'

'I have told you, this is not a matter for children,' said Morgan. 'I will say no more. You will go back to the hut, and you will say nothing to anyone. If you are not willing to do this, you will go home tomorrow.'

With that the giant of a man put his rake over his shoulder, and left the two boys alone in the barn. 'What do you make of that?' said Julian, very angry. 'Come on - we'll go back to the hut. I'm not going to the farm for supper. I don't feel as though I want to meet that rude, dour Morgan again this evening!'

Feeling angry and disappointed the boys made their way out of the barn, towards the path that led up to the hill. It was almost dark now, and Julian felt in his pocket for his torch.

'Blow! I didn't bring it with me!' he said. 'Have you one, Dick?'

Dick hadn't one either, and as neither of them felt like making their way up the mountainside in the darkness Julian decided to go back to the farm, slip up to his bedroom there, and find the extra torch he had put in one of the drawers.

'Come along,' he said to Dick. 'We'll try and get in and out without seeing Morgan or old Mrs. Jones.'

They went quietly back to the farmhouse, keeping a look-out for Morgan. Julian slipped up the stone stairway to the bedroom he had been given a few nights before, and rummaged in the drawer for his torch. Good - there it was!

He went downstairs again - and bumped into old Mrs. Jones at the bottom. She gave a little scream.

'Oh, 'tis you, Julian bach! Now what have you been telling my Morgan to put him into such a temper! Enough to turn the milk sour his face is! Wait now, while I get you some supper. Would you like some pork and...'

'Well - we've decided to go back to the hut, after all,' said Julian, hoping that the kind old woman wouldn't be upset. 'The girls are alone, you know - and it's dark now.'

'Oh yes, yes - then you shall go back!' said Mrs. Jones. 'Wait for one minute - you shall have some of my new bread, and some more pie. Wait now.'

The boys stood in the doorway, waiting, hoping that Morgan would not come by. They suddenly heard him in the distance, yelling at a dog, in his loud, really fierce voice.

'Taking it out on the dogs, I suppose,' said Julian to Dick. 'Gosh - I wouldn't like to come up against him, if I was one of his men! Strong giant that he is, he could take on a dozen men if he wanted to - or a score of dogs!'

Mrs. Morgan came up with a net bag full of food. 'Here you are,' she said. 'Take care of those girls - and don't go near Morgan now. He's in a fine temper, is my Morgan, and he is not nice to hear!'

The two boys thoroughly agreed. Morgan was not nice to hear. They were glad when they were away up the path, out of reach of his enormous voice!

'Well, that's that,' said Julian. 'No help to be got from this quarter! And we're forbidden to do anything at all about the matter. As if we were kids!'

'He kept telling us we were only children,' said Dick, sounding disgusted. 'I can't make it out. Ju, WHY was he so annoyed about it all? Didn't he believe us?'

'Oh yes - he believed us all right,' said Julian. 'If you ask me, I think he knows much much more than we were able to tell him. There's some kind of racket going on at Old Towers - something queer and underhand - and Morgan is in it! That's why he shut us up and told us not to interfere, and to forget all about it! He's in whatever's going on, I'm sure of it.'

Dick whistled. 'My word! So that's why he was so angry. He thought we might be putting a spoke in his wheel. And of course the last thing he would want us to do would be to go to the police! Well - whatever do we do next, Ju?'

'I don't know. We'll have to talk it over with the girls,' said Julian, worried. 'This would crop up just when we're all set for a jolly holiday!'

'Julian, what do you think is going on at Old Towers?' asked Dick, puzzled. 'I mean - it isn't only a question of locking up an old lady in a tower - and selling off her goods and taking the money. It's all the other things too - the rumblings and shudderings and that queer mist.'

'Well - apparently those things have been going on for some time,' said Julian. 'They may have nothing whatever to do with what Morgan is mixed up in - which is, I'm sure, to do with robbing the old lady. In fact, those old tales may be a very good way of keeping people away from the place - in these country places people are much more afraid of strange happenings than townspeople are.'

'It all sounds very convincing when you put it like that,' said Dick. 'But somehow I don't feel convinced. I just can't help feeling there's something queer about it all - something we don't know!'

They fell silent after that, walking one behind the other on the mountain path, seeing the big black stones looming up one after the other in the light of Julian's torch. It seemed a long long way in the dark, much longer than in the daylight.

But at last they saw the light in the window of the hut. Thank goodness! They were both very hungry now, and were glad that Mrs. Jones had presented them with more food. They could really tuck in.

Timmy barked as soon as they came near, and George let him out of the door. She knew by his bark that it was the boys coming back.

'Oh, we are glad you came back, instead of staying down at the farm!' cried Anne. 'What happened? Is Morgan going to the police?'

'No,' said Julian. 'He was angry. He told us not to interfere. He took that bit of paper with the message on, and never gave it back to us. We think he's mixed up with whatever is going on!'

'Very well then,' said George at once. 'We'll take up the matter ourselves! We'll find out what's going on - and MOST CERTAINLY we'll get poor old Mrs. Thomas out of that tower. I don't know how - but we'll do it! Won't we, Timmy?'

Chapter 15

WHAT'S UP, TIM?

The four children sat and talked for a long time, sitting round the little oil-stove, eating a good supper. What would be the best thing to do? It was all very well for George to flare up and say they would see to things, they would rescue the old lady from the tower - but how could they even begin to do anything? For one thing they didn't know how to get into the house! No one was going to risk a battle with that fierce dog!

'If only that kid Aily would help us!' said Julian, at last. 'She's really our only hope. It's no good going to the police - it would take us ages to go down to the village at the bottom of the mountain, and find out where the nearest police station is - and we'd never get a village policeman to believe our tale!'

'I wonder the villagers don't do something about Old Towers,' said Dick, puzzled. 'I mean - all those peculiar vibrations we felt last night - and the noises we heard - and the light in the sky when that mist hung over the place...'

'Yes - but I suppose all those things are seen and heard up here in the mountains much more clearly than down in the valley below,' said Anne, sensibly. 'I don't expect that queer shuddering would be felt in the valley nor would the rumblings be heard, and even the strange mist over Old Towers might not be seen.'

'That's true,' said Julian. 'I never thought of that. Yes - we up here would see a lot... and possibly the shepherd higher up on the hills would, as well. I dare say the farm down below us would see something, too... Well, we know they did, because of Morgan's behaviour to us tonight! He obviously knew what we were talking about!'

'He's also obviously hand in glove with the men in that place - the big men and little men that Aily spoke of. Gosh - I wish she'd show us how to get into that house. How does she get in? I'm blown if I can think of any way. With that electric fence all round, it sounds impossible.'

'The fence that bites!' said George, with a laugh. 'Fancy that child touching the fence and getting a shock. She's an extraordinary little creature, isn't she - quite wild!'

'I hope she didn't get a whipping,' said Anne. 'She is a naughty little truant, of course - but you can't help liking her. Does anybody want more cheese? And there are still some apples left - or I could open a tin of pears.'

'I vote for the pears,' said Dick. 'I feel like something really sweet. I say - this stay up here is turning out rather exciting, isn't it?'

'We always seem to run into trouble,' said Anne, going to the cupboard to fetch the tin of pears.

'Give it a better name, Anne, old thing,' said Dick. 'Adventure! That's what we're always running into. Some people do, you know - they just can't help it. And we're those sort of people. Jolly good thing too - it makes life exciting!'

Timmy suddenly began to bark, and everyone started up at once. Now what was up?

'Let Timmy out,' said Dick. 'With all these queer goings-on I feel as if it would be just as well to let Tim examine anyone coming by here at night!'

'Right,' said George, and went to the door - but as she was about to open it, she heard a dog barking outside, just beyond the hut. She swung round.

'I'm not letting Timmy out! That might be Morgan with his dogs! I seem to recognise that deep bark!'

'Someone's coming by,' said Anne, half scared. 'My word - it is Morgan!'

So it was. He passed by the window, and they saw his great shoulders and head bent against the wind as he went on up the hill. He didn't even glance in at them - but the three dogs, who were with him, began to bark furiously as they sensed another dog in the hut. Timmy barked back furiously too.

Then all was quiet. Morgan had gone by and the dogs with him. 'Whew - I'm glad you didn't let Tim out as I suggested,' said Dick. 'He'd have been torn to pieces!'

'Where do you suppose Morgan's going?' asked Anne. 'It's funny he should be going up the hill - not even in the direction of Old Towers!'

'Probably going to talk to the shepherd,' said Julian. 'He's farther up the hill with his sheep. I say - I wonder if he's in this too!'

'Oh no,' said Anne. 'He's good - I could feel it in my bones. I can't imagine him mixed up with a gang of any sort.'

Nobody could, of course. They had all liked the shepherd. But why else would Morgan be going up to him at this time of night?

'He might be going to tell him that we know too much,' suggested Julian. 'He might ask him to keep an eye on us.'

'Or he might be going to complain of Aily, and her doings inside the grounds of Old Towers,' said Dick. 'Goodness - do you suppose that kid will get into trouble because we told Morgan about her - and gave him the bit of paper she found?'

They all stared at one another in dismay. Anne nodded soberly. 'Yes - that's it, of course. Aily will certainly get into trouble over this - oh, why did we think of telling Morgan what we knew? Poor little Aily!'

They all felt very uncomfortable about Aily. They liked the wild, fey little creature with her pet lamb and little dog. Now perhaps she would be well beaten because of what they had told Morgan!

None of them felt like playing cards just then. They sat and talked, wondering if they would hear Morgan coming back. They knew Timmy would bark if he did.

Sure enough he began to bark about half-past eight, and made them all jump. 'That will be Morgan coming back,' said Julian, and they watched the window to see if his head and shoulders would pass by again. But they didn't. Neither did any dog bark outside.

Then George saw that Timmy was sitting with his ears pricked up, and his head on one side. Why? And if he could really hear something, why didn't he bark again? She was puzzled.

'Look at Tim,' she said. 'He's heard something - and yet he's not barking. And he doesn't look very worried either. What's up, Tim?'

Timmy took no notice. He sat there listening intently, still with his head on one side. What could he hear? It was most tantalising to the others, because not one of them could hear anything at all. The countryside seemed to be absolutely quiet at that moment.

Then suddenly Tim jumped up and barked joyfully! He ran to the door and whined, scraping at the bottom of it with his paw. He looked back at George and barked again, as if to say 'Buck up! Open the door!'

'Well!' said Dick, in surprise. 'What's up, Timmy? Has your best friend come to call? Shall we open the door, Julian?'

'I'll go,' said Julian, and went to open the door cautiously. Timmy leapt out at once, barking and whining.

'There's nobody here,' said Julian, astonished. 'Nobody at all! Hey, Tim, what's all the fuss about? Give me that torch, Dick, will you? I'll go out after him and see what the excitement is.'

Out he went, and flashed the torch around to find Timmy. Ah - there he was, scraping at the little wooden bunker that held the oil-cans and the big enamel jug. Julian was astonished.

'Whatever's come over you, Tim?' he said. 'There's nothing here in this bunker - look, I'll lift the lid so that you can peep inside and see, silly dog!'

He lifted up the lid, and shone his torch inside, to show Timmy that it was empty.

But it wasn't! Julian almost let the lid drop down in his surprise! Someone was there - someone small and half-frozen! It was Aily!

'Aily!' said Julian, hardly believing his eyes. 'What on earth - Aily - what are you doing here?'

Aily blinked up at him, looking scared to death. She clutched the lamb and the dog, and didn't say a word. Julian saw that she was shivering, and crying bitterly.

'Poor little Aily bach!' he said, using the only Welsh word he knew. 'Come into the hut - we'll get you warm and make you better.'

The child shook her head and clutched her animals closer. But Julian was not going to leave her there in the little oil-bunker on that cold night! He lifted her up, animals and all, and cuddled her. Aily strove to get free but his arms were strong and held her close.

George's voice came impatiently from the hut. 'Ju! Tim! Where are you? Have you found anything?'

'Yes,' called back Julian. 'We have. We're bringing it along - it's quite a surprise!'

He carried the shivering child into the hut, and the others stared in the utmost astonishment. Aily! A cold, forlorn and miserable little Aily, pale and shivering! And the lamb and dog too!

'Bring her near the stove,' said Anne, and stroked the child's thin arm. 'Poor Aily!'

Julian tried to set her down, and the animals as well, but she clung to him. She sensed that he was good and kind and strong, and his arms were very comforting. Julian sat down on a chair, still holding the little creature closely. The dog and lamb slid off his knee and ran sniffing round the room.

'She was in the oil-bunker out there - she and the lamb and dog,' he said. 'All cuddled up together. Partly hiding, I should think, and partly for shelter. Maybe she's slept there before, with these two. Isn't she a poor little mite? She seems very unhappy. Let's give her something to eat.'

'I'll make some hot cocoa,' said Anne. 'George, get some bread and butter and cheese for her - and hadn't we better get the lamb and dog something too? What do you give lambs?'

'Milk out of a bottle,' said Dick. 'But we haven't got a feeding-bottle! I dare say it will lap milk. Good gracious - the things that happen here!'

Aily felt warm and comforted in Julian's arms. She lay there like a little animal, too cold and tired to be scared. Julian was glad to hold her and comfort her. Poor little thing - what had made her come this long way so late at night?

'She must have gone home with her mother,' he said, watching the little dog hobnobbing with a delighted Timmy. 'And probably got a whipping, and was shut up somewhere. And then my guess is that Morgan went down to see if she was there, and to scold her, and tell her mother to be sure and not let her out, and...'

'Morgan!' repeated Aily, sitting up in fear, looking all round as if he might be there. 'Morgan! No! No!'

'It's all right, little thing,' said Julian. 'We'll look after you. Morgan shan't get you!'

'See?' he said to the others. 'I bet I'm right! It was he who went and scared her - and as soon as he was gone, I expect she escaped from her mother's house and came up here to hide. That horrible fellow! If he shouted at her as he shouted at us, she'd be scared stiff. I bet he was afraid she'd go and give more of the game away unless she was shut up - might even show us the way into the old house over on the opposite hill!'

Timmy suddenly gave a bark - but not a joyful one this time! Anne cried out at once, 'That may be Morgan coming back! Hide Aily, for goodness sake - or he'll drag her out of here and take her back with him! Quick - where shall we hide her?'

Chapter 16

AILY CHANGES HER MIND

Aily leapt out of Julian's arms as quickly and surely as a cat, when she heard that it might be Morgan coming. She looked round the room like a hunted thing, and then darted to the bunk-beds. With an amazing leap, she was up on one of the top ones in a trice, and pulled a rug over her. She lay absolutely still. The lamb looked up in surprise and bleated.

Then it too leapt up the bunks, as sure-footed as a goat, and cuddled down with its little mistress. Only Dave the dog was left below, whining miserably. 'Gosh!' said Dick, amazed at these incredibly sudden happenings. 'Look at that! Did you ever see such leaping! Shut up barking, Tim. We want to hear if Morgan is coming. Ju - where shall we hide Aily's dog? He mustn't be seen - or heard either!'

Julian lifted the dog up to the top bunk and put him with the other two there. 'That's about the only place where he'll keep quiet!' he said. 'Aily - lie quite still till we tell you everything is safe.' There was no reply from the bunk - not a word or a bark or a bleat. Then Timmy began to bark loudly again, and ran to the door.

'I'm going to lock the door,' said Julian. 'I'm not having Morgan and his dogs in here, hunting for Aily! My guess is that he knows she's escaped from her mother's - or maybe she ran off when he scolded her - and thinks she went to her father, the old shepherd! He's got to get hold of her, to stop her from spreading what she knows!'

'Well - for goodness sake don't let those dogs in here!' said George, desperately. 'I can hear them barking away in the distance.'

'Quick - let's sit round the table with the cards, and pretend to be playing a game!' said Dick, snatching the cards from a shelf. 'Then if Morgan looks in, he'll think everything is normal - and won't guess we've got Aily here. I bet he'll be sly enough to try and peep in without us seeing him - hoping to spot Aily if we've got her!'

They sat round the table, and Dick dealt out the cards. Anne's hands were trembling, and George felt a bit weak at the knees. Anne kept dropping her cards, and Dick laughed at her.

'Butterfingers! Cheer up - Morgan won't eat you! Now - if I suddenly say 'What ho!' you'll know I can see Morgan peeping in at the window, and you must laugh and play like anything. See?'

Dick was the one facing the window, and he kept a sharp eye on it as they played snap. There was no sound of dogs barking now, though Tim sat by the door, his ears cocked, as if he could hear something.

'Snap!' said Julian, and gathered up the cards. They went on playing.

'Snap! I say, don't grab like that - you've almost broken my nail!'

'Snap! I said it first!'

'What ho!' said Dick, and that put everyone on their guard at once. They went on playing, but without giving much attention to the game now. What could Dick see?

Dick could see quite a lot. He could see a shadowy face some way from the window, looking in - yes, it was Morgan all right.

'What ho!' said Dick again, to warn the others that there was still danger. 'WHAT HO!'

Morgan's face had now come quite near to the window. He evidently thought that no one saw him, and that they were all too engrossed in their game to notice anything else. His eyes swept the room from corner to corner. Then his face disappeared.

'He's gone from the window,' said Dick, in a low voice. 'But go on playing. He may come to the door.'

KNOCK! KNOCK!

'Yes - there he is,' said Dick. 'Ju - you take charge now.'

'Who's there?' yelled Julian.

'Morgan. Let me in,' said Morgan's deep, growling voice.

'No - we've got our dog here, and we don't want him set on again,' said Julian, determined not to let Morgan in at any cost.

Morgan turned the handle - but the door was locked. He growled again.

'Sorry! But we can't unlock it!' shouted Julian. 'Our dog might rush out and bite you. He's growling like anything already!'

'Bark, Tim,' said George, in a low voice, and Timmy obligingly barked the place down!

Morgan gave up. 'If you see Aily, send her home,' he said. 'She's gone again, and her Mam's worried. I've been looking for her this cold night.'

'Right!' called Julian. 'If she comes we'll give her a bed here.'

'No. You send her home,' shouted Morgan. 'And pay heed to what I told you down at the barn there, or it will be the worse for all of us!'

'For all of us! I like that!' said Dick, in disgust. 'It will certainly be the worse for him and his friends when the secret's out! Awful fellow! Has he gone, Tim?'

Timmy came away from the door and lay down peacefully. He gave a little bark as if to say 'All clear!'

When dogs began to bark right away in the distance Tim took no notice. 'That means they're going down the hill with Morgan, back to the farm,' said George, thankfully. 'We can get Aily down now, and give her something to eat.'

She went to the bunk. 'Aily!' she called. 'Morgan is gone. Gone right away! Come down and have a meal. We will give the lamb some milk and your dog some meat and biscuits!'

Aily's head peered cautiously over the side of the little bunk-bed. With a leap she was down on the floor, as lightly as the lamb itself, which followed at once, landing squarely on its four tiny hooves. The little dog had to be lifted out - he was much too scared to jump!

To everyone's amusement, Aily ran straight to Julian, and held up her arms to be taken into his. She felt safe with this big kind boy. He sat down with her on his knees and she cuddled up to him like a kitten.

George put some bread and butter and cheese on the table in front of her, and Anne put down a dish of milk for the lamb, which lapped it greedily but most untidily. The dog tried to get the milk too, but soon went to the dish of cut-up meat and biscuits put down by Anne.

'There - the Aily-family is fed,' she said. 'My word - what an excitement all this is! Julian, don't let Aily gobble like that - she'll be sick. I never did see anyone eat so quickly. She can't have had anything since the bit of cheese we gave her this afternoon!'

Aily snuggled back into Julian's arms contentedly, when she had eaten every scrap of her meal. She looked up at him, wanting to please him.

'Aily tell how to get into big big house,' she said suddenly, taking everyone completely by surprise. Julian looked down at her. He had the dog on his knee now too, though he would not allow the lamb to climb on as well.

'Aily tell me?' he said gravely. 'Good little Aily bach!'

Aily began to try and tell him. 'Big hole,' she began. 'Down, down, down...'

'Where's this big hole?' asked Julian.

'High up,' said Aily. 'Down it goes down...'

'But where is it?' asked Julian again.

Aily went off into a long jabber of Welsh and the children listened helplessly. How maddening to have Aily willing to tell them her secret - and then not to be able to follow what she said.

'Good little Aily,' said Julian, when she came to a stop at last. 'Where is this big big hole?'

Aily gazed at him in reproach. 'Aily tell you, tell you, tell you!' she said.

'Yes, I know - but I don't understand Welsh,' said Julian, gently, despairing of trying to make the child understand. 'Where is this big hole - that's all I want to know.'

Aily stared at him. Then she smiled. 'Aily show,' she said, and slipped off his knee. 'Aily show! Come!'

'Good gracious! Not now,' said Julian. 'Not in all this snow and darkness. No, Aily - tomorrow - in the morning - not now!'

Aily took a look out of the window into the darkness. She nodded. 'Not now. In the morning, yes? Aily show in morning.'

'Well, thank goodness that's settled!' said Julian. 'I'd dearly love to see this big big hole whatever it is, now, straightaway - but we'd only get lost on these hills in the dark. We'll look forward to it tomorrow!'

'Good!' said Dick, yawning. 'I must say that I think that's best too. What a bit of luck that Aily's so grateful to you, Ju! I believe she'd do anything in the world for you now.'

'I believe she would too, funny little creature,' said Julian, looking at Aily as she curled up on the rug near the stove, with her lamb and dog beside her. 'How could Morgan scare such a harmless little thing? He's a brute!'

'Jolly good thing he didn't see her when he looked in,' said George. 'He'd probably have broken the door down! One blow of his fist and it would have cracked from top to bottom!'

Everyone laughed. 'Well - good thing it didn't come to that!' said Julian. 'Now then, let's get to bed. We may have quite an exciting day tomorrow!'

'I hope we manage to get to that poor old woman in her tower,' said Anne. 'That's the most important thing to do. Aily, you can sleep in that topmost bunk, where you hid. I'll give you some rugs, and a blanket and a pillow.'

It wasn't long before the hut was quiet and peaceful, with all five children in their bunks, and Timmy with George. The lamb and the little dog were with Aily. Julian looked out from his bunk and smiled. What a collection of people and animals in the hut tonight! Well - he was quite glad there were two dogs!

No one woke in the night except George. She felt Timmy stir and sat up, resting on her elbow. But he didn't bark. He gave her a small lick, and sat with her, listening.

The queer rumbling noise was coming again - and then the 'shuddering', though not so strongly as before. George felt the wooden edge of her bunk - it vibrated as if machinery was in the room below, shaking everything a little.

She leaned out of her bunk and looked out of the window. Her eyes widened as she saw what Dick had seen the other night - the 'shimmering' in the sky. She could think of no other name for that strange quivering that rose and rose and finally ended very high up indeed, seeming to lose itself in the stars, that were now shining brightly.

George didn't wake the others. As soon as the queer happenings stopped, she lay down again. Perhaps tomorrow they would know what caused such strange things - yes, tomorrow would be very exciting!

Chapter 17

THE BIG, BIG HOLE

Next morning everyone was awake early. They had slept well, and were full of beans - and excited to think that an adventure lay ahead. To get into that old house, with its many secrets, would be marvellous!

Aily followed Julian about the room like a little dog. She wanted to have her breakfast on his knee, just as she had had her supper the night before, and he let her. He was ready to do anything she wanted - if only she would show them the way into Old Towers!

'We'd better set off pretty soon,' said Anne, looking out of the window. 'It's snowing pretty fast again - we don't want to get lost!'

'No. That's true. If Aily is going to take us across country, we shan't have the faintest idea where we're going, in this heavy snow!' said Julian, rather anxiously.

'I'll just clear up a bit, then we'll go, shall we?' said Anne. 'Do we take any food with us, Ju?'

'We certainly do - all of us,' said Julian, at once. 'Goodness knows what time we'll get back to this hut. George, you make sandwiches with Anne, will you? And put in some bars of chocolate too, and some apples if there are any left.'

'And for pity's sake, remember your torches,' said Dick.

Aily watched while the sandwiches were made, and scraped up the bits that fell on the table to give to Dave, her small dog. The lamb frisked about, quite at home, getting into everyone's way. But nobody minded it - it was such a charming little long-leggitty creature!

At last all the sandwiches were made and put into two kit-bags. The hut was cleared up and tidied, and the children got into their out-door clothes.

'I think it would be easiest to toboggan down the slope, and half-way up Old Towers' slope,' said Julian, looking out into the snow. 'It would take us ages to walk - and it's no good skiing, because Aily hasn't any skis - and couldn't use them if she had!'

'Oh yes - let's take the toboggans!' said George, pleased. 'What do we do with the lamb? Leave it here? And must we take Dave the dog, too?'

However, that was not for them to settle! Aily absolutely refused to go without her lamb and dog. She gathered them up into her arms, looking mutinous, when Julian suggested they should be left in the warm hut. Neither would she allow herself to be wrapped up warmly - and only consented to wear a scarf and a woollen hat because they happened to be exactly the same as Julian was wearing!

They set off at last. The snow was still falling, and Julian felt seriously doubtful whether they would be able to find their way down the hill and up the other slope without losing their sense of direction.

The toboggans were rather crowded! Julian and Dick were on the first one, with Aily and the lamb between them, and Anne and George were on the second one, with Timmy and Dave between them. George was at the front, and Anne had the awkward job of hanging on to both the dogs and keeping her balance too!

'I know we shall all roll off,' she said to George. 'Good gracious - I half wish we had waited a bit! The snow is falling very fast now!'

'Good thing!' called Julian. 'No one will spot us when we are near Old Towers - they won't be able to see a thing through this snow!'

Julian's toboggan shot off down the snowy slope. It gathered speed, and the boys gasped in delight at the pace. Aily clung to Julian's back, half frightened, and the lamb stared with astonished eyes, not daring to move from its place, squashed in between Aily and Julian!

Whooooooosh! Down the slope to the bottom, and up the opposite slope, gradually slowing down! Julian's toboggan came to a stop, and then, not far behind, came George's, slowing down too. George got out and dragged her toboggan over to Julian.

'Well,' she said, her face glowing, 'what do we do now? Wasn't that a wonderful run?'

'Wonderful!' said Julian. 'I only wish we could have a few more! Did you like that, Aily?'

'No,' said Aily, pulling her woollen cap to exactly the same angle that Julian wore his. 'No. It make my nose cold, so cold.'

She cupped her hand over her nose to make it warm. George laughed.

'Fancy complaining about a cold nose when she's hardly wearing anything on her skinny little body - you'd think the whole of her would feel cold - not just her nose!'

'Aily - do you know where the big hole is?' asked Julian, looking about in the snow. The snowflakes were quite big now, and nothing that was more than a few yards away could be seen. Aily stood there, her feet sinking into the snow. She looked all round, and Julian felt certain that she was going to say that she didn't know which way to go, in this thick snow. Even he was rather doubtful which was the way back up the hill!

But Aily was like a dog. She had a sure sense of direction, and could go from one place to another on a dark night or in the snow without any difficulty at all!

She nodded. 'Aily know - Dave know, too.'

She walked a few steps, but her feet sank into the snow above her ankles, and her thin shoes were soon soaked through.

'She'll get her feet frost-bitten,' said Dick. 'Better put her on one of the toboggans and pull her, Ju. Pity we didn't have any snow-boots small enough to lend her. I say - this is a bit of a crazy expedition, isn't it! I hope to goodness Aily knows where she's taking us. I haven't the foggiest idea at the moment which is east or west, north or south!'

'Wait - I've got a compass in one of my pockets,' said Julian, and did a lot of digging in his clothes. At last he pulled out a small compass. He looked at it.

'That's south,' he said, pointing, 'so that's where Old Towers Hill is - south is directly opposite our hut; we know that because the sun shone straight in at our front windows. I reckon we walk this way, then - due south.'

'Let's see which way Aily points,' said Dick. He set her on his toboggan, and wrapped her scarf more closely round her. 'Now - which way, Aily?'

Aily at once pointed due south. Everyone was most impressed.

'That's right,' said Julian. 'Come on, Dick - I'll pull Aily's toboggan, you can pull the girls' for them.'

They all set off up the rest of the slope of Old Towers Hill, Aily on the toboggan with Dave and Fany the lamb, and Timmy sitting in state on George's toboggan, the girls walking behind. Timmy was enjoying himself. He didn't like the way his legs went down into the snow when he tried to run - it was much easier to sit on the toboggan and be pulled along!

'Lazy thing!' said George, and Timmy wagged his tail, not caring a bit what anyone said!

Julian looked at his compass as he went, and walked due south for some time. Then Aily gave a call, and pointed to the right.

'That way, that way,' she said.

'She wants us to go westwards now,' said Julian, stopping. 'I wonder if she's right. By my reckoning we're going dead straight for Old Towers now - but we shall be going up the hill to the right of it, if we go her way.'

'That way, that way,' repeated Aily, imperiously, and Dave barked as if to say she was right!

'Better follow her way,' said Dick. 'She seems so jolly certain of it.'

So Julian swerved to the right a little, and the others followed. They went a good way up the steep hill, and Julian began to pant.

'Is it far now?' he asked Aily, who was petting her lamb, and apparently taking no notice of the way they were going. Not that there was anything much to take notice of, except snow on the ground and snowflakes in the air!

Aily looked up. Then she pointed again, a little more to the right, and said something in Welsh, nodding her head.

'Well - it looks as if we're getting near this place of hers - this 'big, big hole', whatever it is,' said Julian, and on he went.

In about a minute Aily suddenly leapt off the toboggan, and stood there, looking round with a frown.

'Here,' she said. 'Big hole here.'

'Well - it may be - but I'd like to see it a bit more clearly, Aily,' said Julian. Aily began to scrape down through the snow, and Timmy and Dave obligingly went to help her, imagining that she was after rabbits or a hidden hare.

'I'm afraid the poor kid's led us on a wild-goose chase,' said Dick. 'Why should there be a big big hole here?'

Timmy and Aily had now got down through the snow to the buried clumps of heather that grew all over the slopes of the mountains in that district. Julian could see the clumps sticking up, stiff and wiry, in the clearing that Aily and the dogs had made.

'Timmy - you take Timmy!' said Aily suddenly to George. 'He fall down, down - he fall like Dave one day - down down!'

'I say! I believe she's looking for an old pot-hole!' said Dick, suddenly. 'You know - those strange holes that are sometimes found on moors - sudden holes that drop right down underground. They're called dean-holes I think, in some places. We found one once on Kirrin Island - don't you remember?'

'Oh yes - that was in the heather too!' said George, remembering. 'And it led to a cave below, by the seashore! That's what Aily meant by a big big hole! A pot-hole on the moors! Timmy - for goodness sake come away - you may drop right down it!'

Timmy very nearly did go down the hole! George just caught his collar in time! But Dave was wary - he had fallen down once before!

'Hole!' said Aily, pleased. 'Big big hole! Aily find for you!'

'Well - certainly you've found your hole - but how does it get us into Old Towers?' said Dick. Aily didn't understand. She knelt there, looking down at the hole she had uncovered under the heather and the snow.

'I must say that was a marvellous feat,' said Julian. 'Coming straight to this place and finding the hole when she couldn't see a thing through the falling snow. She really is as good as a dog. Good little Aily bach!'

Aily gave one of her sudden smiles, and slipped her hand in Julian's.

'Go down, yes?' she said. 'Aily show way?'

'Well - we'd better go down if it's possible,' said Julian, not much liking the idea, for he could see nothing but darkness inside the hole, and had no idea of what lay below.

Fany the lamb was tired of waiting about. She gave a little leap to the edge of the big round hole, and then put her small head in. She kicked up her heels - and was gone!

'She's jumped into the hole!' said George, amazed. 'Here, wait, Aily - you can't jump too - you'll hurt yourself!'

But Aily slithered into the hole, then let herself go.

'Aily here,' came a small voice from below. 'You come quick!'

Chapter 18

INSIDE OLD TOWERS

'Well! Did you see that - she just let go and dropped!' said George, amazed. 'I wonder she didn't break her legs. Julian, shine your torch down.'

Julian shone it down.

'It's a pretty good drop,' he said. 'I think we'll take the ropes off our toboggans and let ourselves down on those. I don't particularly want to break a leg or sprain an ankle just at present.'

'If we pull our toboggans over the hole, and let their ropes hang down into it, they will hold us safely,' said Dick, and pulled his toboggan right across the hole.

Then Julian pulled the other toboggan across as well, and soon the ropes were dangling down, ready to take each of the four children.

'What about Timmy?' asked George, anxiously. 'Dave has jumped down - though I wonder he didn't break a leg!'

'I'll wrap my coat over him and tie one of the ropes round him,' said Julian. 'Then we can let him down easily. Come here, Tim.'

Tim was soon tied up in the coat with the rope. Then Dick slithered down on another rope, and stood on the floor of the hole, ready to take Timmy when Julian let him down. It really wasn't very difficult. Aily looked rather scornful as the four children used the ropes.

Julian laughed, and patted her shoulder.

'We're not all goat-like, you know,' he said. 'We don't gambol about the mountains all day long, like you, Aily. Well - that was your big big hole. What next?'

He shone his torch round. 'Yes - it's a pot-hole. There's a small underground cave here. Look - is that a tunnel leading out of it?'

'Yes,' said George, as Aily and the lamb skipped off together down into the darkness of the tunnel. 'Look at that - no torch, no lamp - and yet she goes off into the darkness without any fear! I'd be scared stiff!'

'She's got eyes like a cat,' said Anne. 'Well, do we follow her? We'd better or we shall lose her!'
'Come on, Timmy,' said George, and all Five went down the dark, winding little tunnel after Aily. Anne glanced up at the rocky roof and thought with wonder of the thick masses of heather growing on its upper surface, all covered with thick snow.

Aily was nowhere to be seen! Julian grew worried.

'Aily! Come back!'

But there was no answer.

'Never mind,' said Dick. 'There's probably only one way to go, and she knows we must take it! If we come to a fork, we'll shout again.'

But they didn't come to a fork. The tunnel wound on and on, going steadily downhill. Its roof was of rock, and so were the walls, but underfoot was sandy soil alternating with rocky ridges that made the going rather rough.

Julian looked at his compass.

'We've been going in a north-easterly direction more or less,' he said. 'And that should be in the direction of Old Towers. I think I know how Aily gets into the house!'

'Yes - this tunnel must pass right under the fence-that-bites, and under the grounds, and end somewhere near the cellars of the house,' said Dick. 'Or possibly in them. Where's that child?'

They caught sight of her just then, in the light of Julian's torch. She was waiting for them in a corner of the passage with Dave and Fany.

She pointed upwards.

'Way to garden!' she said. 'Little hole there - big for Aily! Not for you!'

Julian shone his torch upwards. Sure enough there was a small hole there, which appeared to be overgrown with weeds or heather - he couldn't tell what. He looked at the rocky sides of the upward passage to the hole, and saw how easily Aily could have climbed up to squeeze out of it, and roam the gardens! So that was how it was she had been able to pick up the notes that the poor old woman had constantly thrown out so hopefully! Aily must surely have been the only person who managed to get into the grounds without permission!

'This way,' said Aily, and led them past the garden-hole and downwards again.

'We must be under the house now,' said Julian. 'I wonder if...'

But before he could finish his sentence he saw that the passage had led them into some old, half-ruined cellars. It went through a half-fallen cellar wall, and Aily proudly led them into a dark, cluttered-up cellar which, with its many barrels and old bottles, must once have been the wine-cellar.

'What cellars!' exclaimed Dick, in amazement, as they went through one after another. 'Dozens of them. Hey - what's this, Aily?'

He had come to where one high wall had been broken down completely - but the breakage seemed to have been done by human hands, for the breaks looked new, and were not covered with grime and mould as were the other fallen-down walls. A vast opening had been made into what seemed at first glance to be a low-walled cave.

Then a curious sound came to their ears. The sound of water - water gurgling and splashing! Julian took a step forward to peer into the cave beyond the broken walls.

But Aily tugged at his hand in terror.

'No, no! Not go there! Bad mans, very bad mans. Bad place there!'

'I say, look!' said Julian, amazed, taking no notice of Aily's tugging hand. 'An underground river - not just a stream - a river! Flowing down through the mountain, probably fed by springs on the way - and I bet it goes right down to the sea somewhere! We know the sea isn't far away!'

'Bad mans down there,' said Aily, in panic, pulling Dick and George too. 'Bang-bang - big fires - big noise. You come in house, quick!'

'Gosh - isn't this extraordinary!' said Julian, quite astounded. 'What is going on here? We really shall have to find out. What in the world does Aily mean?'

Anne and George were astonished too, but had no desire to go along the river and find out!

'Better leave this for now, and go up into the house,' said George. 'After all, the old lady is the important thing at the moment. No wonder they imprisoned her in one of the towers, so that she wouldn't know what is going on!'

'Well, I'm blowed if I know what's going on,' said Dick. 'I'm not quite sure if I'm in some peculiar kind of nightmare or not!'

'You come house,' said Aily again, and this time, to her great relief, they followed her, Timmy trotting at the back with George, not quite knowing what to make of it all.

Aily led them unerringly back through the smashed walls, through the musty cellars, and into some that looked as if they had recently been used for store-places. Tins of food stood about, old furniture, old tins and baths and cans, barrels of all sizes and shapes.

'We go soft!' said Aily, meaning that they were now to walk quietly. They followed her up a long flight of stone cellar steps to a great door that stood half open. Aily stood at the top listening - probably for the tall caretaker, Julian thought. He wondered if the fierce dog was anywhere about the house. He whispered to Aily.

'Big dog in house, Aily?'

'No. Big dog in garden, big dog there all day and night,' whispered back the little girl, and Julian felt most relieved.

'Aily find man,' said Aily, and shot off by herself, motioning to the others to wait.

'She's gone to find out where the caretaker is,' said Julian. 'My word - did you ever know anyone like her? Gosh, she's back again already!'

So she was, smiling mischievously all over her face.

'Man sleep,' she said. 'Man safe.' She took them through the door from the cellar into a perfectly enormous kitchen, with a colossal range at one end, black and empty now. A larder door near by was open and Aily darted into it. She brought out a meat pie and offered it to Julian. He shook his head at once.

'No. You mustn't steal!' he said. But Aily either didn't understand, or didn't want to, for she bit into the pie herself, gobbling great pieces down, and then put it on the floor for the animals to finish, which they were very pleased to do!

'Aily - take us to the old woman,' said Dick, not wanting to waste time on things like this. 'Aily - you are sure there is no one else in the house?'

'Aily know!' said the little girl. 'One man to watch - he in there!' and she pointed towards the door of a nearby room. 'He watch old woman, and dog watch garden. Other mans not come in here.'

'Oh - well, where do they live then, these strange 'other men'?' asked Julian, but Aily didn't understand. She led them to a great hall, from which two wide stairways swept up, meeting above at an even wider landing.

The lamb gambolled up, and the little dog Dave barked joyfully.

'Sh!' said all the four children at once, but Aily laughed. She seemed quite at home in the house and Dick wondered how many times she had let herself down into the pot-hole and come wandering in here. No wonder she spent so many nights away from home - she could always come and hide away in some corner of this big house! They followed her up the wide stairs.

But Aily would come no farther than the second floor. She had brought them up two flights of stairs - and now before them stretched a great picture gallery, that led to another stairway at the far end. The child hung back and refused to take Julian's hand.

'What's the matter?' he asked.

'Aily not come here,' said the child, shrinking back. 'Not go here, not ever. Those peoples see Aily!' And she pointed at the rows of great pictures, each a portrait of some long-dead owner of the house.

'She's afraid of the portraits!' said Anne. 'Afraid of all their eyes following her as she runs down the long gallery! Funny little thing. All right - you stay here, Aily. We'll go on up to the towers.'

They left Aily curled up behind a curtain, with Dave and Fany. Anne glanced at the rows of grave portraits as the four of them, with Timmy, walked softly down the long gallery. She shivered a little, for their eyes seemed to follow her as she passed, looking grave and disapproving.

Up another flight of stairs, and yet another. And now they were in a long passage that ran from tower-room to tower-room. Which was the tower they wanted?

It was very easy to find out! All of them had their doors wide open but one!

'This must be it!' said Julian, and knocked at the door.

'Who knocks?' said a weak, sorrowful voice. 'Surely not you, Matthew - you have no manners! Unlock the door and do not mock me with your knocking!'

'The key's in the door,' said Dick. 'Unlock it, Julian - quick!'

Chapter 19

A LOT OF EXCITEMENT

Julian turned the key in the lock and opened the door. A stately old woman sat in a chair beside the window, reading a book. She did not turn round.

'And why have you come at this time of the morning, Matthew?' she said, without turning round.

'And how did you find the manners to knock? Are you remembering the time when you knew how to behave to your elders and betters?'

'It isn't Matthew,' said Julian. 'It's us - we've come to set you free.'

The old woman turned at once, gaping in amazement. She got up and went over to the door, and the Five saw that she was trembling.

'Who are you? Let me out of that door before Matthew comes! Let me out, I tell you!'

She pushed by the four children and the dog, and then stood uncertainly in the passage.

'What shall I do? Where shall I go? Are those men here still?'

She went back into her room and sank down in her chair again, covering her face with her hands.

'I feel faint. Get me some water.'

Anne sprang to pour out a glass of water from a jug on a table. The old woman took it and drank it. She looked at Anne.

'Who are you? What is the meaning of this? Where is Matthew? Oh, I must be going mad!'

'Mrs. Thomas - you are Mrs. Thomas, aren't you?' said Julian. 'Little Aily, the shepherd's daughter, brought us here. She knew you were locked up. You remember her mother, don't you? She told us she used to come and wait on you.'

'Aily's mother - Maggy - yes, yes. But what has Aily to do with this? I don't believe it. It's another trick. Where are the men who killed my son?'

Julian looked at Dick. It was clear that the poor old lady was not herself - or else this sudden appearance of the children had upset her.

'Those men that my Llewellyn brought here - they wanted to buy my house,' she said. 'But I wouldn't sell it, no, I wouldn't. Do you know what they said to me? They said that in this hill, far, far below my house, was a rare metal - a powerful metal - worth a fortune. What did they call it now?'

She looked at the children, as if expecting them to know. She shook her head as they didn't answer.

'Why should you know about it - you are only children. But I wouldn't sell it - no, I wouldn't sell my house - nor the metal below. Do you know what they wanted it for? For bombs to kill people with! And I said NO, never will I sell this place so that men can dig the metal and make bombs. It is against the law of God, I said, and I, Bronwen Thomas, will not do such a thing!'

The children listened in awe. The old lady seemed beside herself, and rocked to and fro as she spoke.

'So they asked my son, and he said no, as I had. But they took him away and killed him - and now they are at work below. Yes, yes, I hear them - I hear the noises creeping up, I feel my house shake, I see strange things. But who are you? And where is Matthew? He keeps me here, locked in my room. He told me about Llewellyn, my poor dead son; he is a wicked man, Matthew, he works with those men, those evil men!

She seemed to forget the four children for a little while. They wondered what to do. Julian saw that the poor woman was not fit to take down the stairs with them, and through the tunnel - and certainly she could not get out of the pot-hole. He began to wish that he hadn't been so hasty in his ideas of rescue. It would really be best to lock the door again and leave her here in safety until he could get the police - for certainly now the police must come.

'We will leave you now,' he said, 'and send someone soon to bring you out of here. We are sorry we disturbed you.'

And, to the astonishment of the others, he pushed them out of the room, turned the key in the lock again, and put it into his pocket!

'Aren't we going to take her with us?' said George, surprised. 'Poor, poor old thing!'

'No. How can we?' said Julian, troubled. 'We must go to the police, no matter what Morgan says. I see it all now, don't you? The mother forbidding the son to sell the old place, in spite of the enormous amount of money offered - the son refusing too - and the men making a plot to get in somehow and down to this metal, whatever it is - and work it...'

'And killing the son?' said Dick. 'Well, it may be so - but I should have thought that was a pretty drastic thing to do! Surely the son would have been reported missing very quickly, and the police would have made enquiries. Nobody said the son was missing or dead, did they, except the old lady?'

'Well, let's not talk about it now,' said Julian. 'We've got to do something. I'm sorry to leave old Mrs. Thomas still locked up in that room, but I honestly think she would be safer there than anywhere else.'

They went down the two flights of stairs to the picture gallery. Aily was there, still cuddling her two pets. She was pleased to see them, and ran up smiling. She didn't seem to notice that they hadn't the old woman with them.

'Man down there very cross!' she said, and laughed. 'He wake now - he shout and bang!'

'Goodness - I hope he won't see us,' said Julian. 'We've got to get out of here, quick, and go to the police. Let's hope he won't come rushing at us, or call in that fierce dog.'

They went downstairs at top speed, looking out for Matthew. But there was no sign of him in person - though there was a most tremendous row going on somewhere, of shouting and banging. 'Aily lock door,' said Aily, suddenly, pointing in the direction of the sounds. 'Man lock old woman - Aily lock man!'

'Did you? Did you really lock him in?' said Julian, delighted. 'You really are a monkey - but what a good idea! I wish I'd thought of it!'

He went to the door of the room in which the angry Matthew was.

'Matthew!' he called sternly. There was a dead silence, and then Matthew's astonished voice came through the shut door.

'Who's that? Who locked me in? If it's one of you men, you'll be sorry for it! Silly joke to play on me, when you know I've got to go up and see to old Mrs. Thomas!'

'Matthew - this isn't one of the men,' said Julian, and how the others admired his cool, determined voice! 'We have come to rescue Mrs. Thomas from that tower - and now we are going to the police to report all this, and to report too that her son has been killed by the men who are working far below this house.'

There was an astonished silence. Then Matthew's voice came again.

'What's all this? I don't understand! The police can't do anything. Mr. Llewellyn, the son, isn't dead - my word, no, he's all alive and kicking - and he won't be very pleased with you, whoever you are. Clear off at once - but let me out before you go. I'm surprised that Alsatian outside didn't get you, that I am!'

It was the children's turn to be amazed now. So the son wasn't dead! Then where was he? And why had Matthew told old Mrs. Thomas such a cruel untruth? Julian asked him at once.

'Why did you tell Mrs. Thomas her son was dead then?'

'What's it to do with you? Mr. Llewellyn, he told me to tell his mother that. The old lady wouldn't let him sell that stuff deep down under the house - the stuff that gets hold of cars and bicycles, and ploughs, and makes them heavy as lead. Magnetises them, so they say. Well, if he wants to sell it, why shouldn't he? But what I say is this - he shouldn't sell it to foreigners, no, that he shouldn't! If I'd have known that - well - I wouldn't have taken money from him to act like I did!'

The voice rose and fell as Matthew told his extraordinary tale. Then the man banged frantically on the door again.

'Who are you? You let me out! I've been kind to the old lady - you ask her - though she's difficult, and strange in her ways. I've been loyal to Mr. Llewellyn, though he's not easy, no, that he's not. Who are you, I say? Let me out; let me out! If Mr. Llewellyn catches me locked in here, he'll kill me! He'll say I've let his secret out. He'll say... LET ME OUT, I say!'

'He sounds a bit mad,' said Julian, thankful that the man was locked up. 'He must be a bit simple too, to believe all that the son told him, and do everything he was told to do. Well - we'd better go to the police. Come on - we'll go back the way we came.'

'Let's just have a look down that river to see what the men are up to,' said Dick. 'Just you and I, Julian. It's such a chance - we needn't be seen, and it would only take a few minutes. The girls could wait somewhere with Tim.'

'I don't think we ought to stop now,' said Julian, 'I really don't.'

'No, don't let's,' said Anne. 'I don't like this house. It's got a horrid 'feel' about it. And I can't imagine what the 'shuddering' would be like, when the men start their work again deep down below - whatever it is!'

'Well, come along then,' said Julian, and, completely ignoring Matthew's yells and bangs, the children made their way through the kitchen and down the cellar-steps, flashing on their torches to light their way.

'I bet Matthew is wild that we've left him locked up,' said Dick, as they went through the vast cellars. 'Serves him right! Taking bribes from the son - and telling lies to that poor old woman. Hallo, we've come to where the men smashed the walls here, to get along the river tunnel. I suppose they found that was the easiest way to go down to where the precious metal was - whatever it is!'

They stood looking through the smashed walls at the gurgling river.

'Come, come,' said Aily, dragging at Julian's hand. 'Bad mans there!'

She was holding Dave, her little dog, in case he fell into the rushing river, but Fany the lamb was gambolling loose as usual. And, quite suddenly, she skipped off down the river tunnel, her tail whisking behind her madly.

'Fany, Fany!' cried Aily. 'Fany bach!'

But the lamb, thinking that she was going the right way, gambolled on, deafened by the rushing of the water. Aily ran after her, as sure-footed as the lamb, hopping and skipping over the rough rocky bank of the river.

'Come back, you little ass!' yelled Julian. But Aily either did not or would not hear, and she disappeared into the blackness of the tunnel almost at once.

'She hasn't got a torch, Ju - she'll fall in and drown!' yelled George, in a panic. 'Timmy, go after her, Fetch her back!'

And away went Timmy obediently, running as fast as he could beside the black, churning water, hurrying on its way downwards to the sea.

Julian and the others waited anxiously. Aily didn't come back, nor did any of the animals - and George began to be very panicky about Timmy.

'Oh, Julian - what's happened to Tim - and the others?' she said. 'They've no torches - oh, why did I let Timmy go? We all ought to have gone!'

'They'll come back all right,' said Julian, much more confidently than he felt. 'That child Aily can see in the dark, I really do believe - and she knows her way about like a dog.'

But when, after five minutes, not one of the four had come back, George started forward, flashing her torch on the rocky path beside the river.

'I'm going to find Timmy,' she said. 'And nobody's going to stop me!'

And she was gone before the boys could get hold of her! Julian gave a shout of aggravation.

'George! Don't be an ass! Timmy will find his own way back. Don't go down there - you don't know what you may find!'

'Come on,' said Dick, starting off down the river too. 'George won't come back, we know that - not unless she finds Tim and the others. We'd better go quickly before anything awful happens!'

Anne had to follow the boys, her heart beating fast. What a thing to happen! Just the very worst possible!

Chapter 20

IN THE HEART OF THE HILL

It seemed like a bad dream to the four children, making their way over the rocky edge of the underground river. Their torches had good batteries, fortunately, and gave a bright light, so that they could see their way alongside the river. But at times this rocky 'path' they had to walk on grew very narrow indeed!

'Oh dear!' thought Anne, trying to keep up with the boys, 'I know I shall slip! I wish I hadn't these heavy snow-boots on. What a noise the river makes, booming along, and how fast it goes!' Some way in front of the two boys and Anne was George, still calling for Timmy. She was very worried because he didn't come back to her, as he always did when she called him. She didn't realise that Timmy couldn't hear her! The river made such a noise in the enclosed rocky tunnel that Timmy heard nothing at all but the sound of the churning waters!

Quite suddenly the tunnel widened tremendously - the river making a big, broad pool before it tore on down the tunnel again. The walls opened out into an enormous cave, half of which was water and the other half a stretch of rough, rocky floor. George was most astonished. But she was even more astonished at other things she saw!

Two rafts, sturdy and immensely strong, were moored at the side of the deep pool! And on the floor of the cave were what looked like tin barrels, standing in rough rows - presumably waiting to be packed on to the rafts.

At one side of the cave were stacked great heaps of tins and bottles and cans, none of them opened - and on the other side an equally vast heap of discarded ones - all opened and thrown to one side. Big wooden crates stood about too - though George could not imagine what they were for.

The cave was dimly lighted by electricity of some kind - probably from a battery fixed up somewhere. Nobody seemed to be about at all! George gave a call, hoping that Timmy was somewhere there.

'Timmy! Where are you?'

And at once Timmy came from behind one of the big crates, his tail wagging hard! George was so glad that she fell on one knee and hugged him tight.

'You naughty dog,' she said, fondling him. 'Why didn't you come when you were called? Did you find the others? Where is Aily?'

A small face peeped from behind the crate near by, the one from which Timmy had appeared. It was Aily. She looked terrified, and tears were on her cheeks. She clasped her lamb to her, and Dave was at her heels. She ran straight across to George, crying out something in Welsh, pointing back up the tunnel. George nodded.

'Yes. We'll go back straightaway! Look - here come the others!'

Aily had already seen them. She ran to Julian with a cry of delight, and he swung her up in his arms, lamb and all. He was very glad to see George and Timmy too.

They all had a good look round the strange cave.

'I see what the idea is,' said Julian. 'Jolly clever too! They are mining that precious metal down here somewhere - and putting it on those rafts there, so that the underground river can take it right down to the sea. I bet they've got barges or something waiting down at some secret creek, to take the stuff away at night!'

'Whew!' said Dick. 'Very ingenious! And they count on the queer noises and shudderings and things to frighten people and keep them away from this hill - nobody dares to come prying round to see what's up!'

'The nearest farm is Magga Glen Farm, where the Jones's live,' said Julian. 'They would really be the only people who could find out anything definite.'

'Which they obviously did!' said Dick. 'I bet Morgan knows all about this, and is in with the son who sold the precious metal to the men who came after it - though it was his mother's.'

'There's no queer noise or anything down here - no noise at all except the sound of the river,' said Julian. 'Do you suppose the works aren't going just now?'

'Well,' began Dick, and then suddenly stopped as Dave and Timmy began to growl, Timmy in a deep voice and Dave in a smaller one. Julian at once pulled Aily and George behind a big crate, and Dick pushed Anne there. They listened intently. What had the dogs heard? Was there time to rush back to the tunnel and make their way out before they were seen?

Timmy went on growling in a low voice. The children's hearts began to beat fast - and then they heard voices. Where did they come from? Dick peeped cautiously round the crate. It was in a dark corner and he hoped he could not be seen.

The voices seemed to come from the direction of the great pool, and Dick looked over to it. He gave a sudden exclamation.

'Ju! Look over there! Do you see what I see?'

Julian looked - and was filled with astonishment. Two men had come up the tunnel, from the sea - evidently walking on the rocky edge of the river, just as they themselves had done - and were now wading in the shallows of the pool.

'One is MORGAN!' whispered Julian. 'And who's the other man! Gosh - it's the shepherd - Aily's father! Would you believe it? Well - we always thought Morgan was mixed up in this - but I didn't think the shepherd was.'

Aily had seen both Morgan and her father. She made no move to go to the shepherd - she was far too scared of Morgan!

Morgan and the shepherd stood and gazed round a little, as if looking for someone. Then, keeping to the shadows, they made their way across the great cave right to the back of it, where another tunnel, very wide, led downwards into the hill.

As they went, a strange noise began.

'The rumbling!' whispered George, and Timmy growled again. 'But oh - doesn't it sound near. What a terrific noise - it's got right inside my head!'

It was no use whispering now! They had to shout if they wanted to say anything. And then the shuddering began! Everything shuddered and vibrated, and when the children touched one another, they could feel the vibration in the other's hands and arms.

'It's as if we're being run by electricity ourselves!' said Dick, astonished. 'I wonder if it's anything to do with that strange metal that is under this hill - that makes steel things heavy, so that ploughs won't plough, and spades won't dig!'

'Let's follow Morgan and the shepherd,' said Julian, so excited now that he felt he must see everything possible. 'We can keep well in the shadows. Nobody would ever guess we were here!'

'Aily - you stay here,' said Julian. 'Big noise, big noise frighten Fany and Dave.'

Aily nodded. She settled down behind the crate with her pets.

'Aily wait,' she said. She had no desire at all to go any nearer that strange noise! In her simple mind she imagined that possibly the thunder itself came from this hill and was made here. Yes, perhaps the lightning too!

Morgan and the shepherd had now disappeared into the tunnel right at the back of the cave, on the opposite side to the great pool. The Five went quickly over to it and looked down. It was very wide and very steep - but rough steps had been cut in it, so that it was not difficult to go down.

They trod warily down the steep tunnel, astonished because it was dimly lighted - and yet there were no lamps of any sort to be seen.

'I think it's the reflection of some great glare far below,' shouted Julian, above the rumbling. The noise was so loud that it was almost like walking in the middle of thunder.

Down and down they went, and the tunnel curved and wound about, always steep, rocky and dimly lit. Suddenly the noise grew louder, and the tunnel grew lighter. The children saw the end of it, the exit outlined in brilliant light - a light that shimmered and shook in a most curious way.

'We're coming to the works - the mine - where that strange metal is!' shouted Dick, so excited that he felt his hands trembling. 'Be careful we aren't seen. JU! BE CAREFUL WE AREN'T SEEN!'

They went cautiously to the end of the tunnel and peered out. They were looking into a vast pit of light, round which men stood, working some curious-looking machines. The children could not make out what they were - and, indeed, the light was so blinding that it was only possible to look with their eyelids almost closed. All the men were wearing face-guards.

Suddenly the loud rumbling stopped and the light disappeared as if someone had turned off an electric switch! Then, in the darkness, a glow formed, a strange glow that came upwards and outwards, and seemed to go right through the roof itself! Dick clutched at Julian.

'That's the kind of glow we saw the other night!' he said. 'My word - it begins down here, goes right up through the hill in some strange way, and hangs above it! That shimmering must come from here too - some kind of rays that can go through anything - like X-rays or something!'

'It's like a dream,' said Anne, feeling George to make sure it wasn't! 'Just like a dream!'

'Where are Morgan and the shepherd?' said Dick. 'Look - there they are - in that corner, not far off. Look out - they're coming back!'

The four children moved back quickly into the tunnel, afraid of being seen. They suddenly heard shouts, and stumbled up the rocky steps even faster. Had they been seen? It sounded like it!

'I can hear someone coming up the tunnel behind us!' panted Dick. 'Quick, quick! I wish that noise would begin again. I know we can be heard!'

Someone was climbing swiftly up behind them. There were shouts and yells from below too. It sounded as if all the men were disturbed and angry. Why, oh why had they followed Morgan and the shepherd? They could so easily have gone back to the cellars!

They came to the top of the steep rocky tunnel at last, and ran to hide behind the crates, hoping to slip into the river-tunnel without being seen. They had to get Aily before they fled! Where was she?

'Aily, Aily!' shouted Julian. 'Where's she gone? We daren't leave her here. AILY!'

It was difficult to remember exactly where they had left her, in this great cave.

'There's the lamb!' cried Julian, thankfully, as he saw it on the other side of a crate. 'AILY!'

'Look out! There's Morgan!' shouted George, as the big farmer came out of the tunnel and ran across the cave. He saw the children and stopped in the utmost amazement.

'What are you doing here?' he roared. 'Come with us, quickly! You're in danger!'

The shepherd now appeared too, and Aily ran from behind her crate to him. He stared as if he could not believe his eyes, and then picked her up, calling something to Morgan in Welsh.

Morgan swung round on Julian again.

'I told you not to interfere!' he roared. 'I was handling this! Now we shall all be caught! Fool of a boy! Quick - we must hide and hope that the men will think we've gone down the tunnel. If we try to escape now, they will overtake us, and bring us back!'

He swept the astonished children into a dark corner and pulled crates round them.

'Stay there!' he said. 'We will do what we can!'

Chapter 21

AN ASTOUNDING THING

The five children crouched behind the pile of crates. Morgan pushed another crate up, so that they were completely hidden. Dick clutched Julian.

'Julian! We've made fools of ourselves! Morgan was trying to find out the secret of Old Towers himself - with the help of the shepherd! They were about the only people in the neighbourhood who could guess what was going on. The shepherd could see all the strange things we saw, while watching his sheep on the mountainside - and he told Morgan...'

Julian groaned.

'Yes. No wonder he was angry when he thought we were meddling in such a serious matter. No wonder he forbade us to do anything more! Gosh - we've been idiots! Where is Morgan now? Can you see him?'

'No. He's hiding somewhere. Listen - here come the men!' said Dick. 'There's a crack between two crates here - I can see the first man. He's got an iron bar or something. He looks pretty grim!' The men came out cautiously, evidently not sure how many people they were after. They advanced across the cave, seven of them, all with weapons of some kind. Two went to the upper river tunnel, two went to the one that led down to the sea, and the others began to hunt among the crates.

They found the children first! It was Aily's fault, poor child. She gave a sudden scream of fright - and in a trice the men had pulled away the crates. Crash - one by one they fell to the ground - and the amazed men found themselves looking at five children! But not for long! With a terrifying bark Timmy flung himself on the first man!

He yelled and began to fight him off, but Timmy held on like grim death. Morgan appeared from the shadows and surprised another of the men, jumping on him and getting him on the ground, at the same time catching hold of a second man and tossing him away. He had the strength of a giant!

'Run!' he yelled to the children, but they couldn't. Two of the men had penned them into a corner, and although Julian leapt at one of them, he was simply thrown back again. These men were strong miners, and though not a match for the giant like Morgan, they could certainly take everyone else prisoner - including the gentle shepherd! He too was penned into a corner - only Morgan and Timmy were fighting now.

'Timmy will be hurt!' said George, in a trembling voice, and she tried to push one of the men away to get to him. 'Oh look, Ju - that man is trying to hit him with that bar!'

Timmy dodged the bar and sprang at the man, who turned and ran for his life. Timmy shot after him and got him on the ground. But there were too many men - and more were now coming up from the tunnel at the back of the cave, pouring in, with weapons of all kinds. All of them were amazed to see the five children!

The men seemed mostly to be foreigners, and spoke a language the children couldn't understand. But one man was not a foreigner - he was obviously the boss, and gave his orders as if he expected them to be obeyed. He hadn't joined in the fight at all.

The shepherd was soon overpowered, and his hands bound behind his back. Morgan fought off for some time - but then had to surrender. He was like an angry bull, stamping here, pulling there, roaring with rage as three men tried to tie his hands.

The boss came up and faced him.

'You will be sorry for this, Morgan,' he said. 'All our lives we have been enemies - you down at the farm - and I here at Old Towers.'

Morgan suddenly spat at him.

'Where is your old mother?' he shouted. 'A prisoner in her own house! Who has robbed her? You, Llewellyn Thomas!' Then he went off into a spate of Welsh, his voice rising high as he denounced the man in front of him.

Julian admired the fearless Morgan enormously, as he stood with his hands bound, defying the man who had been a life-long enemy. How many quarrels had these two had, living in the same countryside, trying their strength against one another? Julian wished intensely that he had obeyed Morgan's command and left everything to him. But he had thought Morgan was on the side of the enemy! How stupid he had been!

'It's all because of us that he's caught,' thought the boy, remorsefully. 'I've been a fool - and I thought I was doing something clever - and right! And now we're all landed in this mess - the girls too! What will they do with us? I suppose the only safe thing for them to do is to keep us prisoner till they've finished this mining job, collected a fortune from the metal, whatever it is, and gone.'

Llewellyn Thomas was now giving some sharp orders, and the men were listening. Timmy was growling, held by the collar in a stranglehold by one of the men. If he tried to squirm away, the man twisted his hand in the collar a little more and poor Timmy was half-choked.

George was wild with despair. Julian had to keep stopping her from trying to make a dash to Timmy. He was afraid that these rough men would strike her, though she was a girl. Aily sat in a corner, hugging her lamb and Dave, who had been far too scared even to take a little nip at any of the men!

Morgan was held by two hefty miners - but, quite suddenly, he hurled himself sideways at one of them and sent him flying - and then at the other, who staggered away and fell over a tin.

With a great roar Morgan stumbled to the pool, and waded to the entrance of the tunnel that led to the sea, his hands still tightly tied behind his back.

'The fool!' said Llewellyn Thomas. 'If he thinks he can get along that tunnel with his hands tied, he is mad! He will fall into that rushing river - and without his hands to help him, he will drown! No - don't go after him. Let him go - let him drown! We shall be well rid of him!'

The shepherd struggled to his feet to go after his master, knowing quite well that Llewellyn was right - no man could get along that rough edge to the river without his hands to steady him, feeling along the wall at the side - and one slip would put him into the churning, hurrying river, that ran at full-pelt down to the sea far below, at the bottom of the hill.

But Morgan did not mean to escape. He was not going to struggle along beside that treacherous torrent! He had come all the way up beside it, with the shepherd, and knew how easy it was to slip, on the wet rocky edge. No - Morgan had another plan!

Julian watched him disappear into the tunnel, and his heart sank. He too knew that no one could walk along there without free hands to help him. But what could anyone do?

The boss turned to the other men, who were still staring after Morgan. He was just about to say something to them, when a roar came to their ears.

Not the roar of the torrent in the underground tunnel. Not the roar of the strange rumbling mine. No - the roar of a giant voice, that crashed out of the tunnel, and echoed round the cave.

It was Morgan's enormous voice. Morgan, calling the names of his seven great dogs! The children listened in amazement at this unbelievable voice.

'DAI! BOB! TANG! COME TO ME! DOON! JOLL! RAFE! HAL!'

The names echoed round and round the cave, and it seemed as if the place was full of giant voices. Aily, who was used to hearing the dogs called, didn't turn a hair - but the others crouched back in amazement at the sound of such a voice. Surely no one in all the world had ever shouted so loudly before!

'DAI! DAI! RAFE! RAFE!'

The great voice boomed again and again, seeming to be louder each time. At first Llewellyn Thomas, the boss, was taken aback - but then he laughed sneeringly.

'Does he think he can get his dogs up from the beach?' he said. 'All that way down the tunnel. He's mad! Let him be!'

Then again the great voice roared out the names of the seven dogs belonging to Morgan and the shepherd.

'DAI! BOB! TANG! DOON! JOLL! RAFE! HAL!'

At the last name, Morgan's voice seemed to crack. The shepherd raised his head in dismay. Morgan had over-strained that great voice of his, and no wonder. No megaphone could possibly have been louder!

There was silence after that. Morgan called no more. Neither did he appear again. The children felt scared and depressed, and Aily began to whimper.

The curious shuddering vibration began to creep into everything again, and the boss turned sharply, giving some more orders. Two of the men ran to the tunnel at the back of the cave and disappeared. Then things took on a curious shimmer, as if a heat-haze had spread everywhere, and it began to feel very warm in the cave.

Suddenly something happened. At first it sounded far-off in the distance, a confused noise that made Timmy tug at his collar again and prick his ears. He barked, and the man who was holding him hit him.

'What's that noise?' said Llewellyn Thomas, sharply, looking all round. There was no telling where it came from. But it grew louder - and louder - and then suddenly Julian knew what it was! It was the loud barking of seven angry dogs! The shepherd knew it too, and a glad smile came over his face. He glanced at Llewellyn to see if he recognised it as well.

Yes - the boss had certainly recognised that dreadful sound now. He could hardly believe it! Surely it was not possible that Morgan's voice, enormous as it was, had echoed all the way down the tunnel, and been heard by the sharp, pricked-up ears of the dogs who loved him?

But so it was! Dai, the oldest dog, who loved his master more than any of them, had stood tense and listening ever since Morgan and the shepherd had left them. And, from somewhere far distant, echoing down to the end of the tunnel they were guarding, Dai had heard the faint echoes of his master's beloved voice!

His bark had told the other dogs the news - and, led by Dai, they had all rushed up the rocky tunnel, sure-footed on the slippery, rocky path beside the racing river.

They came to Morgan, sitting beside the river, not far from the big cave, a little way down the tunnel. It was a moment of joy for Morgan and his dogs!

Dai soon snuffled at his hands and bit the ropes in half. Morgan was free!

'Down now - and hush!' commanded Morgan. He began to walk steadily back to the cave, then motioned the dogs before him.

'Attack!' he cried in Welsh.

And then, to the men's horror, the seven dogs raced out of the tunnel at a great speed, barking, growling, snarling - with a triumphant Morgan behind them, so tall that he had to bend double to leave the tunnel.

The men fled, every one of them. Llewellyn had turned to run even before the dogs appeared, and was gone. Dai leapt at one man and got him down, and Tang leapt at another. The cave was filled with snarls and growls and excited barking.

Timmy delightedly joined in, for his captor had rushed away too. Even little Dave ran to join this wonderful fight, while the children stood amazed and thankful to see their enemy defeated!

'Who would have thought of this?' said Dick, sending the crates crashing down. 'What an astounding thing! Hurrah for Morgan and his seven dogs!'

Chapter 22

ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL!

Morgan would not let the children stay underground any longer.

'We have things to do,' he said, in his deep voice, which sounded rather hoarse now. 'You will go back to the farm and telephone to the police for me. You will say 'Morgan has won' and tell them to send a boat to the little creek I have already told them of. There I will bring these men all the way down the tunnel to the sea. Go now, at once. Obey me this time, boy.'

'Yes, sir,' said Julian. This man was a hero! And he had thought him a villain! He was ready to obey his smallest command now. Then a thought struck him, and he turned back.

'The old woman,' he said. 'Mrs. Thomas - that man's mother. What about her? And we've locked the caretaker up in his room!'

'You will not do anything but go to the farm and telephone,' said Morgan, sternly. 'I will do everything there is to be done. Take Aily with you to the farm. She must not be here. Now go.'

And Julian went! He and the others took one last look round at the men, all pinioned by the dogs, lying still and panic-stricken. Then, with Aily and her lamb and dog, he led the others up the tunnel again, and at last back into the cellars.

'I don't like leaving that old lady up there, in the tower,' said Dick.

'No. But obviously Morgan has his plans,' said Julian, who was not going to disobey orders in any way this time. 'I expect he has arranged something with the police. We can't interfere now. We messed things up a bit, I'm afraid.'

They climbed soberly up to the place where they had left their toboggans. It took them some time, and they were beginning to feel very hungry. But Julian wouldn't let them stop even to eat some sandwiches.

'No,' he said. 'I've to telephone to the police as soon as ever I can. No stopping now! We'll munch our sandwiches on the way down to the farm.'

It wasn't very difficult to get out of the pot-hole, for they had left the ropes dangling down. Julian and Dick helped the two girls up by pushing them, and they in turn helped to pull up the boys from the top of the hole.

Aily scrambled up easily, swinging delightedly on a rope, and then flinging herself out of the hole. The lamb leapt up in a miraculous manner, and Julian handed Dave to the small girl.

Timmy was hauled up in the same way as he had been let down. He had badly wanted to stay with the other dogs - but nothing would make him leave George!

'Well, that's that,' said Julian, scrambling out last of all. 'Now, let's see. We could toboggan down this slope, and half-way up our own slope. That would save a lot of time. Aily, you're to come with us to the farm.'

'No,' said Aily.

'Yes, Aily bach,' said Julian. 'I want you to.' He took her small hand in his and she smiled her sudden little smile, quite content to go along with this big kind boy, even though she was afraid of going down to the farm for fear she should meet her mother.

'Aily good girl,' said Julian, setting the little thing on his toboggan. 'Aily shall have big piece of chocolate at the farm!'

They tobogganed down the slope at a great speed without any mishap, and half-way up the opposite slope. It seemed queer to be out in the dazzling daylight after the dark tunnels underground. Their adventure below began to seem slightly unreal!

'We'll leave the toboggans at the hut,' said Julian, as they dragged them up the rest of the slope. 'Anyone thirsty? I am. I think it must be something to do with that mine - my mouth got as dry as anything as soon as we were down there.'

Everyone said the same.

'I'll run into the hut and pour out some orangeade,' said Anne. 'You stack the toboggans in their place, Ju, and just see if there's enough oil in the can out in the bunker - we'll need to fill the stove tonight. And if there isn't enough we must bring some up with us.'

Julian gave her the key of the hut and she unlocked it and went in with George. They poured orangeade into five cups, and drank thirstily. Their mouths were drier than they had ever been before! Anne felt thankful that she didn't have to wait any longer for a drink.

'I think the roof of my mouth would have stuck to my tongue!' she said, putting down her cup. 'That was lovely!'

'There's plenty of oil,' reported Julian, coming to drink his orangeade. 'My word - I needed this. I'd not like to work down in that mine.'

They locked the hut and set off down to the farm, munching their sandwiches hungrily. They tasted very good indeed, and even Aily asked for one after another. Timmy had his share, and once they missed him, and had to stop and call him.

'Has he lost his bit of meat in the snow?' wondered Anne. But no - he, like the rest of them, was suffering from a very dry mouth and was busy licking the snow, letting it melt in his mouth and trickle down his dry throat!

Mrs. Jones was most surprised to see them. When she heard Julian's request to telephone to the police, she looked worried.

'It's all right, Mrs. Jones,' said Julian, comfortingly. 'It's a message to them from Morgan. Everything is fine. We'll tell you what's happened as soon as he comes home. He might not like us to say anything till then!'

The police did not seem at all surprised to hear Julian's message - they appeared to be expecting it!

'We will see to the matter,' said the sergeant, in his deep, stolid voice. 'Thank you.' And he rang off at once. Julian wondered what would happen next - what had Morgan arranged?

They were pleased to see Mrs. Jones bringing in bowls of hot chicken soup, as they sat talking round the wood fire she had hurriedly lighted in the living-room.

'Oh! Just what we feel like!' said Anne, gratefully. 'I'm still awfully thirsty - aren't you, George? And look, Timmy - there's a nice meaty bone for you! You are kind, Mrs. Jones!'

'You know - I feel pretty awful about all this now,' said Julian. 'We shouldn't have interfered after Morgan said we weren't to. I wish we hadn't. He can't think much of us!'

'I vote we all apologise humbly,' said Dick. 'How could we have thought he was the villain of the piece? I know he's dour and silent - but he didn't look mean or cruel.'

'We'd better stay down here at the farm till Morgan comes back,' said George. 'Quite apart from wanting to say I'm sorry, I'd like to know what happened!'

'So would I,' said Anne. 'And Aily ought to wait for her father. He'll want to know that she's safe.'

So they asked Mrs. Jones if they could stay till Morgan came home. She was delighted.

'Of course, now,' she said. 'We've a roasting turkey today - and you shall come and sup with us in our room for a change!'

This all sounded rather good. The children gathered round their fire to talk, and Timmy rested his head on George's knee. She looked at his neck.

'That man almost choked him,' she said. 'Oh look, Julian - he's bruised all round his poor neck!'

'Now don't start moaning over Timmy's neck again, for goodness' sake!' said Dick. 'Honestly, George, I'm sure Tim thinks the adventure was worth a bruised neck! He's not grumbling. He was jolly brave, I think - and didn't he enjoy himself when the other dogs rushed into the cave, and he joined in the fight!'

'I wonder what they'll do about that poor old woman,' said Anne. 'She will be glad her son is alive, I suppose - but what a shock for her to know he's lied to her, and sold what is really hers - that strange metal under the hill!'

'Well - I imagine it won't be allowed to be sold now,' said Julian. 'What a plan that was! To get men up that tunnel to mine the stuff - and to send it down by rafts to waiting ships, hidden in that creek. We ought to go down and examine the creek - it would be interesting to see what sort of a place it is down there. It must be well hidden in a fold of the cliff, I should think.'

'Yes - let's do that tomorrow,' said George, thrilled. 'I vote we stay here tonight. I feel tired after such an adventure! Don't you?'

'I do a bit,' said Julian. 'Well - I suppose there won't be quite so much shuddering and shimmering and rumbling now! Funny that that hill should always have been so queer, isn't it - 'ploughs that will not plough, spades that will not dig!' Must be some kind of iron, I suppose, that magnetises things. Oh well - it's all beyond me!'

Morgan came back with the shepherd when it was dark. Julian went straight up to the burly farmer.

'We want to apologise for being such idiots,' he said. 'We shouldn't have interfered after what you said.'

Morgan gave a broad smile. He seemed to be in a very good humour indeed.

'Forget it, boy,' he said. 'All's well now. The police came up the river tunnel, and all the men are safe in jail. Llewellyn Thomas is a sad man tonight. His mother is free and is staying with friends

- poor lady, she doesn't understand what has happened, and that is as well. And maybe now the right people will get that strange metal - it's worth a hundred times its weight in gold!

'Come you in to your supper, Morgan bach, and shepherd too!' said Mrs. Jones, in her lilting voice. 'The children too are coming. We've a roasting turkey - it's your birthday, Morgan boy!'

'Well there now, I didn't know it!' said Morgan and gave his mother such a hug that she squealed.

'Let's go in to the turkey. I've had nothing all day.'

Soon they were all sitting down before the most enormous turkey that the children had ever seen in their lives! Morgan carved it swiftly. Then he said something to his mother in Welsh and she smiled and nodded.

'Yes, you do that,' she said.

Morgan collected some slices of turkey on a big enamel dish, and then went to the door that led from the living-room into the farmyard. He roared loudly and the children jumped. What a voice!

'DAI! TANG! BOB! DOON! JOLL! RAFE! HAL!'

'He's calling the dogs,' said Anne. 'Just as he called them up the tunnel. Well - they certainly deserve a good dinner!'

Then down to the door came the seven dogs, jostling each other, barking excitedly. Morgan threw them the slices of turkey, and they gobbled the tasty bits up greedily.

'Woof!' said Timmy politely from behind him, and Morgan turned. He solemnly cut a big slice and a little slice.

'Here!' he said to Timmy and Dave. 'You did well too! Catch!'

'There'll not be much left of your birthday turkey!' said his mother, half-cross, half-amused. 'Now fill your glasses again, children, and we will drink to my Morgan - a better son there never was!'

Anne poured home-made lemonade into the empty glasses, while Morgan sat and smiled, listening to his seven dogs still barking together outside.

'Happy birthday, happy birthday!' shouted everyone, raising their glasses, and Julian added his own few words.

'Happy birthday, sir - and may your voice NEVER grow less!'

THE END

Enid Blyton[®]

THE
FAMOUS
FIVE

FIVE ON FINNISTON FARM

ENID BLYTON

FAMOUS FIVE 18

Five On Finniston Farm

Contents

| | | |
|----|---|----|
| 1 | The Five Are All Together Again | 2 |
| 2 | Finniston Farm | 6 |
| 3 | Out In The Barn | 10 |
| 4 | Junior! | 15 |
| 5 | Evening At The Farm | 19 |
| 6 | A Little Excitement For Breakfast! | 24 |
| 7 | The Twins Change Their Minds | 29 |
| 8 | All Round The Farm | 32 |
| 9 | A Very Interesting Tale! | 38 |
| 10 | Quite A Bit Of Shouting | 42 |
| 11 | A Most Exciting Talk | 46 |
| 12 | Really Very Thrilling | 51 |
| 13 | Junior Springs A Surprise! | 55 |
| 14 | Snippet And Nosey Are Very Helpful! | 60 |
| 15 | Digging For The Secret Tunnel | 64 |
| 16 | Up The Tunnel And Into The Cellars! | 68 |
| 17 | Trapped! | 73 |
| 18 | A Great Story To Tell! | 77 |
| 19 | The Most Exciting Adventure We've Ever Had! | 81 |

Chapter 1

THE FIVE ARE ALL TOGETHER AGAIN

'Phew!' said Julian, mopping his wet forehead, 'What a day! Let's go and live at the Equator - it would be cool compared to this!'

He stood leaning on his bicycle, out of breath with a long steep ride up a hill. Dick grinned at him. 'You're out of training, Ju!' he said. 'Let's sit down for a bit and look at the view. We're pretty high up!'

They leaned their bicycles against a nearby gate and sat down, their backs against the lower bars. Below them spread the Dorset countryside, shimmering in the heat of the day, the distance almost lost in a blue haze. A small breeze came wandering round, and Julian sighed in relief.

'I'd never have come on this biking trip if I'd guessed it was going to be as hot as this!' he said. 'Good thing Anne didn't come - she'd have given up the first day.'

'George wouldn't have minded,' said Dick. 'She's game enough for anything.'

'Good old Georgina,' said Julian, shutting his eyes. 'I'll be glad to see the girls again. Fun to be on our own, of course - but things always seem to happen when the four of us are together.'

'Five, you mean,' said Dick, tipping his hat over his eyes. 'Don't forget old Timmy. What a dog! Never knew one that had such a wet lick as Tim. I say - won't it be fun to meet them all! Don't let's forget the time, Julian. Hey, wake up, ass! If we go to sleep now, we'll not be in time to meet the girls' bus.'

Julian was almost asleep. Dick looked at him and laughed. Then he looked at his watch, and did a little calculating. It was half past two.

'Let's see now - Anne and George will be on the bus that stops at Finniston Church at five past three,' he thought. 'Finniston is about a mile away, down this hill. I'll give Julian fifteen minutes to have a nap - and hope to goodness I don't fall asleep myself!'

He felt his own eyes closing after a minute, and got up at once to walk about. The two girls and Tim must be met, because they would have suitcases with them, which the boys planned to wheel along on their bicycles.

The Five were going to stay at a place called Finniston Farm, set on a hill above the little village of Finniston. None of them had been there before, nor even heard of it. It had all come about because George's mother had heard from an old school friend, who had told her that she was taking paying guests at her farm-house - and had asked her to recommend visitors to her. George had promptly said she would like to go there with her cousins in the summer holidays.

'Hope it's a decent place!' thought Dick, gazing down into the valley, where corn-fields waved in the little breeze. 'Anyway, we shall only be there for two weeks - and it will be fun to be together again.'

He looked at his watch. Time to go! He gave Julian a push. 'Hey - wake up!'

'Another ten minutes,' muttered Julian, trying to turn over, as if he were in bed. He rolled against the gate-bars and fell on to the hard dry earth below. He sat up in surprise. 'Gosh - I thought I was in bed!' he said. 'My word, I could have gone on sleeping for hours.'

'Well, it's time to go and meet that bus,' said Dick. 'I've had to walk about all the time you were asleep, I was so afraid I'd go off myself. Come on, Julian - we really must go!'

They rode down the hill, going cautiously round the sharp corners, remembering how many times they had met herds of cows, wide farm-carts, tractors and the like, on their way through this great farming county. Ah - there was the village, at the bottom of the hill. It looked old and peaceful and half-asleep.

'Thank goodness it sells ginger-beer and ice-creams!' said Dick, seeing a small shop with a big sign in the window. 'I feel as if I want to hang out my tongue, like Timmy does, I'm so thirsty!'

'Let's find the church and the bus-stop,' said Julian. 'I saw a spire as we rode down the hill, but it disappeared when we got near the bottom.'

'There's the bus!' said Dick, as he heard the noise of wheels rumbling along in the distance.

'Look, here it comes. We'll follow it.'

'There's Anne in it - and George, look!' shouted Julian. 'We're here exactly on time! Whoo-hoo, George!'

The bus came to a stop by the old church, and out jumped Anne and George, each with a suitcase - and out leapt old Timmy too, his tongue hanging down, very glad to be out of the hot, jerky, smelly bus.

'There are the boys!' shouted George, and waved wildly as the bus went off again. 'Julian! Dick! I'm so glad you're here to meet us!'

The two boys rode up, and jumped off their bikes, while Timmy leapt round them, barking madly. They thumped the girls on their backs, and grinned at them. 'Just the same old couple!'

said Dick. 'You've got a spot on your chin, George, and why on earth have you tied your hair into a pony-tail, Anne?'

'You're not very polite, Dick,' said George, bumping him with her suitcase. 'I can't think why Anne and I looked forward so much to seeing you again. Here, take my suitcase - haven't you any manners?'

'Plenty,' said Dick, and grabbed the case. 'I just can't get over Anne's new hair-do. I don't like it, Anne - do you, Ju? Pony-tail! A donkey-tail would suit you better Anne!'

'It's all right - it's just because the back of my neck was so hot,' said Anne, shaking her hair free in a hurry. She hated her brothers to find fault with her. Julian gave her arm a squeeze.

'Nice to see you both,' he said. 'What about some ginger-beer and ice-cream? There's a shop over there that sells them. And I've a sudden longing for nice juicy plums!'

'You haven't said a word to Timmy yet,' said George, half-offended. 'He's been trotting round you and licking your hands - and he's so dreadfully hot and thirsty!'

'Shake paws, Tim,' said Dick, and Timmy politely put up his right paw. He shook hands with Julian too and then promptly went mad, careering about and almost knocking over a small boy on a bicycle.

'Come on, Tim - want an ice-cream?' said Dick, laying his hand on the big dog's head. 'Hark at him panting, George - I bet he wishes he could unzip his hairy coat and take it off! Don't you, Tim?'

'Woof!' said Tim, and slapped his tail against Dick's bare legs.

They all trooped into the ice-cream shop. It was half dairy, half baker's. A small girl of about ten came to serve them.

'Mum's lying down,' she said. 'What can I get you? Ice-creams, I suppose? That's what everyone wants today.'

'You supposed right,' said Julian. 'A large one each, please - five in all - and four bottles of ginger pop as well.'

'Five ice-creams - do you want one for that dog, then?' said the girl in surprise, looking at Timmy.

'Woof,' he said at once.

'There you are,' said Dick, 'he said yes!'

Soon the Five were eating their cold ice-creams, Timmy licking his from a saucer. Before he had had many licks, the ice-cream slid from the saucer, and Timmy chased it all the way round the shop, as it slid away from his vigorous licks. The little girl watched him, fascinated.

'I must apologize for his manners,' said Julian, solemnly. 'He hasn't been very well brought up.' He at once had a glare from George, and grinned. He opened his bottle of ginger-beer. 'Nice and cold,' he said.

'Here's a happy fortnight to us all!' He drank half the glass at top speed, and set it down with a great sigh.

'Well, blessings on the person who invented ice-cream, ginger-pop and the rest!' he said. 'I'd rather invent things like that any day than rockets and bombs, Ha - I feel better now. What about you others? Do you feel like going to find the farm?'

'Whose farm?' asked the little girl, coming out from behind the counter to pick up Timmy's saucer. Timmy gave her a large, wet and loving lick as she bent down.

'Ooooh!' she said, pushing him away. 'He licked all down my face!'

'Probably thought you were an ice-cream,' said Dick, giving her his hanky to wipe her cheek.

'The farm we want is called Finniston Farm. Do you know it?'

'Oh yes,' said the little girl. 'You go down the village street, right to the end, and turn up the lane there - up to the right. The farmhouse is at the top of the lane. Are you staying with the Philpots?'

'Yes. Do you know them?' asked Julian, getting out some money to pay the bill.

'I know the twins there,' said the girl. 'The two Harries. At least, I don't know them well - nobody does. They're just wrapped up in each other, they never make any friends. You look out for their old Great-Grand-dad - he's a one, he is! He once fought a mad bull and knocked it out! And his voice - you can hear it for miles! I was real scared of going near the farm when I was little. But Mrs. Philpot, she's nice. You'll like her. The twins are very good to her - and to their Dad, too - work like farm-hands all the holidays. You won't know the other from which, they're so alike!'

'Why did you call them the two Harries?' asked Anne, curiously.

'Oh, because they've both...' began the child, and then broke off as a plump woman came bustling into the shop.

'Janie - you go and see to the baby for me - I'll see to the shop now. Run along!'

Away went the small girl, scuttling through the door.

'Little gasbag she is!' said her mother. 'Anything more you want?'

'No thanks,' said Julian, getting up. 'We must go. We're to stay at Finniston Farm, so we may be seeing you again soon. We liked the ice-creams!'

'Oh - so you're going there, are you?' said the plump woman. 'I wonder how you'll get on with the Harries! And keep out of Grand-dad's way - he's over eighty, but he can still give a mighty good thumping to anyone who crosses him!'

The Five went out into the hot sun again. Julian grinned round at the others. 'Well - shall we go and find the nice Mrs. Philpot - the unfriendly Harries, whoever they are - and the fearsome Great-Grand-dad? Sounds an interesting household, doesn't it?'

Chapter 2

FINNISTON FARM

The four children, with Timmy trotting beside them, walked down the hot, dusty village street until they came to the end, and then saw the lane turning off to the right, just as the little girl had told them.

'Wait a minute,' said Anne, stopping at a curious little shop at the end of the village street. 'Look - here's a queer shop - it sells antiques. Look at those old horse-brasses - I'd like to get one or two of those. And just see those lovely old prints!'

'Oh no - not now, Anne,' said Julian, with a groan. 'This awful sudden craze of yours for second-hand shops has been going on too long! Horse-brasses! You've got stacks of them already! If you think we're going to go into that dark, smelly little shop and...'

'Oh, I'm not going in now,' said Anne, hurriedly. 'But it does look rather exciting. I'll come by myself sometime and prowl round.' She glanced at the name on the shop front. 'William Finniston - how funny to have the same name as the village! I wonder if...'

'Oh, come on, Anne,' said George impatiently, and Timmy tugged at her skirt. Anne gave one backward glance at the fascinating little shop-window, and hurried after the others, making up her mind to slip down to the shop one day when she was alone.

They all went up the little winding lane, where red poppy-heads jiggled about in the breeze, and after a while they came in sight of the farm-house. It was a big one, three storey's high, with whitewashed walls, and the rather small windows belonging to the age in which it was built. Old-fashioned red and white roses rambled over the porch, and the old wooden door stood wide open. The Five stood on the scrubbed stone entrance, looking into the dim hall. An old wooden chest stood there, and a carved chair. A rather threadbare rug lay on the stone floor, and a grandfather clock ticked slowly and loudly.

Somewhere a dog barked, and Timmy at once barked back. 'WOOF, WOOF!'

'Be quiet, Timmy,' said George sharply, afraid that a horde of farm-dogs might come rushing out. She looked for a bell or a knocker, but couldn't see either. Then Dick spotted a beautiful wrought-iron handle hanging down from the roof of the porch. Could it be a bell?

He pulled it, and at once a bell jangled very loudly somewhere in the depths of the farm-house, making them all jump. They stood in silence, waiting for someone to come. Then they heard footsteps and two children came up the hallway.

They were exactly alike! The most twinny twins I've ever seen! thought Anne, in amazement. Julian smiled his friendliest smile. 'Good afternoon - we're the Kirrins - I - er I hope you're expecting us.'

The twins stared at him without a smile. They nodded together. 'Come this way,' they both said, and marched back down the hall. The four stared at one another in surprise.

'Why so stiff and haughty' whispered Dick, putting on a face exactly like the twins. Anne giggled. They all followed the twins, who were dressed exactly alike in navy shorts and navy shirts. They went right down the long hall, passed a stairway, round a dark corner, and into an enormous kitchen, which was obviously used as a sitting-room as well.

'The Kirrins, Mother!' said the twins, together, and at once disappeared through another door, shoulder to shoulder. The children found themselves facing a pleasant-looking woman, standing by a table, her hands white with flour. She smiled, and then gave a little laugh.

'Oh, my dears! I didn't expect you quite so soon! Do forgive my not being able to shake hands with you - but I was just making scones for your tea. I'm so pleased to see you. Did you have a good journey here?'

It was nice to hear her welcoming voice and see her wide smile. The Five warmed to her at once. Julian put down the suitcase he was carrying and looked round the room.

'What a lovely old place!' he said. 'You carry on with your scone-making, Mrs. Philpot - we'll look after ourselves. Just tell us where to go. It's nice of you to have us.'

'I'm glad to,' said Mrs. Philpot. 'I expect your aunt told you the farm's not doing too well, and she kindly said she'd send you here for two weeks. I've some other boarders too - an American and his son - so I'm pretty busy.'

'Well, you don't need to bother too much about us,' said Dick. 'In fact, we'll camp out under a haystack, if you like - or in a barn. We're used to roughing it!'

'Well - that might be a help,' said Mrs. Philpot, going on with her mixing. 'I've a bedroom that would do for the girls all right - but I'm afraid you boys would have to share one with the American boy - and - er - well, you mightn't like him.'

'Oh, I expect we'll get on all right,' said Julian. 'But my brother and I would certainly prefer to be by ourselves, Mrs. Philpot. What about putting up camp-beds or something in a barn? We'd love that!'

Anne looked at Mrs. Philpot's kind, tired face, and felt suddenly sorry for her. How awful to have to have your home invaded by strangers, whether you liked them or not! She went over to her.

'You tell Georgina and me anything you'd like us to do to help,' she said. 'You know - making the beds, and dusting and things like that. We're used to doing things at home, and...'

'I'm going to enjoy having you!' said Mrs. Philpot, looking round at them all. 'And you won't need to help very much. The twins do a great deal - too much, I think, bless them - because they help on the farm too. Now, you go up the stairs to the very top of the house, and you'll see two bedrooms, one on each side of the landing - the left-hand one is yours, girls - the other is where the American boy is sleeping. And as for you two boys, you can slip out to the barn, and see if you'd like a couple of camp-beds there. I'll get the twins to take you.'

The twins came back at this minute, and stood silently shoulder to shoulder, as alike as peas. George looked at them.

'What's your name?' she said to one twin.

'Harry!' was the answer. She turned to the other. 'And what's yours?'

'Harry!'

'But surely you don't both have the same name?' exclaimed George.

'Well, you see,' explained their mother, 'we called the boy Henry, and he became Harry, of course - and we called the girl Harriet, and she calls herself Harry for short - so they're known as the Harries.'

'I thought they were both boys!' said Dick in amazement. 'I wouldn't know which is which!'

'Well, they felt they have to be alike,' said Mrs. Philpot, 'and as Harry can't have long hair like a girl, Harriet has to have short hair to be like Harry! I often don't know one from the other myself.'

Dick grinned. 'Funny how some girls want to be boys!' he said, with a sly glance at George, who gave him a furious look.

'Twins, show the Kirrins up to the top bedroom,' said Mrs. Philpot, 'and then take the boys out to the big barn. They can have the old camp-beds, if they like the look of the barn.'

'We sleep out there,' said the Harries, both together, and scowled just like George.

'Well, you shouldn't,' said their mother. 'I told you to take your mattresses to the little room off the dairy.'

'It's too stuffy,' said the twins.

'I say, look here - we don't want to cause trouble,' said Julian, feeling that the twins were too unfriendly for words. 'Can't we sleep in the room off the dairy?'

'Certainly not,' said Mrs. Philpot, and sent the Harries a warning glance. 'There's room for you all in the big barn. Go on, now, twins, do as I tell you, take the four up to the top bedroom, with the cases, and then out to the barn.'

The twins went to pick up the suitcases, still looking mutinous. Dick interposed himself between them and the cases. 'We'll carry them,' he said stiffly. 'We don't want to be any more trouble to you than we can help.'

And he and Julian picked up a suitcase each, and set off after the Harries, who looked suddenly surprised. George followed with Timmy, more amused than cross. Anne went to pick up a spoon that Mrs. Philpot had dropped.

'Thank you, dear,' said Mrs. Philpot. 'Look - don't get upset by the twins. They're a funny pair - but good at heart. They just don't like strangers in their home, that's all. Promise you won't mind them? I do want you to be happy here.'

Anne looked at the kindly, tired face of the woman beside her, and smiled. 'We'll promise not to worry about the twins - if you'll promise not to worry about us!' she said. 'We can look after ourselves, you know - honestly, we're used to it. And please do tell us when you want anything done!'

She went out of the room and up the stairs. The others were already in one of the two bedrooms at the top of the house. It was a fairly big room, whitewashed, with rather a small window and boarded floors. Julian looked at the boards he was standing on. 'I say! Look at the wood this floor's made of - solid old oak, worn white with the years! My word - this farm-house must be very old. And look at the beams running across the walls and into the roof. Hey, twins, this is a fine old house of yours!'

The twins unbent enough to nod in time together. 'Seems as if you two go by clockwork - you speak the same words at the same time, you walk in time, you nod your heads in time!' said Dick. 'But, I say - do you ever smile?'

The twins looked at him with dislike. Anne nudged Dick. 'Stop it, Dick! Don't tease them. Perhaps they'd show you the barn now. We'll unpack some clean things we've brought for you in our case, and come down with them when we're ready.'

'Right,' said Dick, and he and Julian went out of the room. Opposite, with its door open, was the other room, where the American boy slept. It was so very untidy that Dick couldn't help exclaiming, 'Gosh - how does he get his room into all that mess?'

He and Julian went down the stairs, and Dick turned back to see if the Harries were following. He saw them standing at the top, each shaking a furious fist at the door of the American boy's room. And what a furious look on their faces, too!

Whew! thought Dick. The Harries have got some sort of hate on there - let's hope they don't get one for us, too. 'Well - now for the barn,' he said aloud. 'Don't go so fast, Ju. Wait for the twins - they're just falling over themselves to look after us!'

Chapter 3

OUT IN THE BARN

The twins stalked out of the farm-house and took the two boys round the dairy shed, and up to an enormous barn. One of them pushed open the great door.

'I say!' said Julian, gazing into the dark barn. 'I never saw such a fine barn in all my life! It's as old as the hills - look at those beams soaring up into the roof - it reminds me of a cathedral, somehow. I wonder why they built the roof so high. What do you store in here, twins?'

'Sacks of meal,' said the Harries together, opening and shutting their mouths as one. The two boys saw a couple of camp-beds in a corner of the barn.

'Look here,' said Julian, 'if you really would rather sleep here alone, we'll sleep in the little room off the dairy that your mother spoke of.'

Before the twins could answer, a shrill barking came from the direction of the camp-beds, and the boys saw a tiny black poodle there, standing up, quivering in every hair.

'What a tiny thing!' said Julian. 'Is he yours, twins? What's his name?'

'Snippet,' came the answer from both at once. 'Come here, Snippet!'

At once the tiny black poodle hurled himself off the camp-bed and raced over to them. He fawned on them all, barking in delight, licking everyone in turn. Dick picked him up, but the twins at once clutched Snippet themselves.

'He's OUR dog!' they said, so fiercely that Dick backed away.

'All right, all right - you can have him. But be careful Tim doesn't eat him!' he said. A look of fear came over the faces of the Harries, and they turned to one another, anxiously.

'It's all right,' said Julian, hastily. 'Tim's gentle with small things. You needn't be afraid. I say - why do you have to be so dumb? It really wouldn't hurt you to be a bit friendly. And do let us sleep in your old room - we really don't mind.'

The twins looked at each other again, as if reading one another's thoughts, and then they turned gravely to the boys, not looking quite so unfriendly.

'We will all sleep here,' they said. 'We will fetch the other camp-beds.' And off they marched, Snippet running excitedly at their heels.

Julian scratched his head. 'Those twins make me feel peculiar,' he said. 'I somehow don't feel they are quite real. The way they act and speak together makes me feel as if they're puppets or something.'

'They're just jolly rude and unfriendly,' said Dick, bluntly. 'Oh well - they won't get in our way much. I vote we explore the farm tomorrow. It looks quite a big one - spreading out over the hill-slopes everywhere. I wonder if we could get a ride on a tractor?'

At that moment a bell rang loudly from the direction of the house. 'What's that for?' said Dick. 'Tea, I hope!'

The twins came back at that moment with two more camp-beds, which they proceeded to set up as far from their own as possible. Dick went to give a hand, but they waved him off, and put up the beds most efficiently and quickly by themselves.

'Tea is ready,' they said, standing up when the beds were finished, and blankets and pillows set out on them. 'We will show you where to wash.'

'Thanks,' said Dick and Julian together, and then grinned at one another. 'Better be careful,' said Julian, 'or we'll catch their habit of speaking exactly at the same moment. I say - isn't that poodle an amusing little fellow - look at him stalking that jackdaw!'

A black jackdaw, the nape of his neck showing grey as he ran in front of Snippet, had flown down from somewhere in the roof of the barn. As Snippet danced after him he ran behind sacks, scurried into corners, and led the little dog such a dance that the two boys roared. Even the twins smiled.

'Chack!' said the jackdaw, and rose into the air. He settled himself neatly on the middle of the poodle's back, and Snippet promptly went mad, and tore about the barn at top speed.

'Roll over, Snippet!' shouted the Harries, and Snippet at once flung himself on his back - but the jackdaw, with a triumphant 'chack' rose at once into the air, and alighted on one twin's head.

'I say - is he tame?' said Dick. 'What's his name?'

'Nosey. He's ours. He fell down a chimney and broke his wing,' said the twins. 'So we kept him till it was well and now he won't leave us.'

'Gosh!' said Dick, starrng at them. 'Did you really say all that - or was it the jackdaw? You can talk properly, after all.'

Nosey pecked at the twin's ear nearest to him, and the twin gave a yell. 'Stop it, Nosey!' The jackdaw rose into the air, with a 'chack-chack-chack' that sounded very like a laugh, and disappeared somewhere in the roof.

Just then the two girls came to find the boys in the barn, sent by Mrs. Philpot, who was sure they hadn't heard the bell. Timmy was with them, of course, sniffing into every corner, enjoying the farm-smells everywhere. They came to the barn and looked in.

'Oh, there you are!' called Anne. 'Mrs. Philpot said we...'

Timmy began to bark, and she stopped. He had caught sight of Snippet sniffing behind the sacks, still hunting for the cheeky jackdaw. He stood still and stared. What in the wide world was that funny little black creature? He gave another loud bark and shot over towards the poodle, who gave a terrified yelp and leapt into the arms of one of the twins.

'Take your dog away,' said both twins, fiercely, glaring at the four.

'It's all right - he won't hurt Snippet,' said George, advancing on Timmy and taking hold of his collar. 'He really won't.'

'TAKE YOUR DOG AWAY!' shouted the twins, and up in the roof somewhere the jackdaw said, 'CHACK, CHACK, CHACK!' just as fiercely.

'All right, all right,' said George, glaring as angrily as the twins, 'Come on, Tim. That poodle wouldn't be more than a mouthful for you, anyway!'

They all went back to the farm-house in silence, Snippet having been left behind on the camp-bed belonging to one of the twins. They cheered up when they came into the big, cool kitchen. Tea was now laid on the farm-house table, a big solid affair of old, old oak. Chairs were set round and it all looked very homelike.

'Hot scones,' said George, lifting the lid off a dish. 'I never thought I'd like hot scones on a summer's day, but these look heavenly. Running with butter! Just how I like them!'

The four looked at the home-made buns and biscuits and the great fruit cake. They stared at the dishes of home-made jam, and the big plate of ripe plums. Then they looked at Mrs. Philpot, sitting behind a very big teapot, pouring out cups of tea.

'You mustn't spoil us, Mrs. Philpot,' said Julian, thinking that really his hostess was doing too much. 'Please don't let us make too much work for you!'

A loud, commanding voice suddenly made them all jump. Sitting in a big wooden armchair near the window was someone they hadn't seen - a burly old man with a shock of snowy white hair and a luxurious white beard almost down to his waist. His eyes were startlingly bright as he looked across at them.

'TOO MUCH WORK! What's that you say? TOO MUCH WORK? Ha, people nowadays don't know what work is, that they don't! Grumble, grumble, GRUMBLE, asking for this and expecting that! Pah! PAH, I say!'

'Now now, Grand-dad,' said Mrs. Philpot, gently. 'You just sup your tea and rest. You've been out on the farm all day, and it's too much work for you.'

That set the old man off again. 'TOO MUCH WORK! Now let me tell you something. When I was a young lad, I... hallo, who's this?'

It was Timmy! He had been startled by the sudden shouting of the old man, and had stood up, his hackles rising, and a low growl down in his throat. And then a very curious thing happened.

Timmy walked slowly over to the fierce old man, stood by him - and laid his head gently on his knee! Everyone stared in astonishment, and George could hardly believe her eyes!

At first the old man took no notice. He just let Timmy stay there, and went on with his shouting. 'No one knows anything these days. They don't know a good sheep or a good bull or a good dog. They...'

Timmy moved his head a little, and the old man stopped again. He looked down at Timmy, and patted him on the head. 'Now here's a dog - a REAL dog. A dog that could be the best friend any man ever had. Ah, he reminds me of my old True, he does.'

George was staring in amazement at Timmy. 'He's never done a thing like that before,' she said. 'All dogs are like that with old Grand-dad,' said Mrs. Philpot softly. 'Don't mind his shouting. He's like that. See - your Timmy is lying down by Grand-dad - now they'll both be happy. Grand-dad will have his tea and be nice and quiet. Don't take any notice of him now.'

Still astonished, the children ate a marvellous tea, and were soon talking eagerly to Mrs. Philpot, asking her questions about the farm.

'Yes, of course you can go on the tractor. And we've an old Land-Rover too - you can motor round the farm in that, if you like. Wait till my husband comes in - he'll tell you what you can do.'

Nobody saw a little black shadow come in at the door, and sidle softly over to Grand-dad - Snippet the poodle! He had left the barn and come to the kitchen he loved. It was only when Mrs. Philpot turned round to ask the old man to have another cup of tea that she saw a very strange sight indeed. She nudged the twins, and they turned to look.

They saw Timmy lying peacefully down on Grand-dad's big feet - and Snippet the poodle lying between Timmy's great front paws! Well - what an astonishing sight, to be sure!

'Grand-dad's happy now,' said Mrs. Philpot. 'Two dogs at his feet. And now, look - here's my husband! Come along in, Trevor - we're all here, the dogs as well!'

Chapter 4
JUNIOR!

A big man came into the kitchen, very like the twins to look at. He stooped, and seemed tired. He didn't smile, but just nodded.

'Trevor, here are the visitors I told you about,' said Mrs. Philpot. 'Look, this is Julian and...'

'More visitors?' said Trevor, with a groan. 'Good heavens - what a crowd of children! Where's that American boy? I've got a bone to pick with him. He tried to set the tractor going by himself this morning, and...'

'Oh Trevor - never mind about that now. Just wash and come and have your tea,' said Mrs. Philpot. 'I've kept some of your favourite scones for you.'

'Don't want any tea,' said her husband. 'Can't stop - except for just one cup, and that I'll take into the dairy. I've got to go and see to the milking. Bob's off today.'

'We'll help, Dad!' said the twins, speaking together, as usual, and they got up from the table at once.

'No - you sit down,' said their mother. 'You've been on the go from seven o'clock this morning. Sit down and finish your tea in peace.'

'I could do with your help, twins,' said their father, as he went through the door towards the dairies, 'but now your mother's got so many on her hands, she'll need you more than I do!'

'Mrs. Philpot - let the twins go if they want to,' said Julian at once. 'We can help, you know - we're used to helping at home.'

'And what's more, we like it,' said Anne. 'Do let us, Mrs. Philpot - we'll feel much more at home then. Can't we clear away and wash up and all that, while the twins go and help with the milking?'

'YOU LET 'EM HELP!' shouted old Great-Grand-dad suddenly from his corner, making Timmy and Snippet leap to their feet, startled. 'WHAT ARE CHILDREN COMING TO NOWADAYS, WAITED ON HAND AND FOOT? PAH!'

'Now, now, Grand-dad,' said poor Mrs. Philpot, 'Don't you start worrying. We can manage fine.'

The old man made a loud, explosive noise, and banged his hand down on the arm of his chair. 'WHAT I SAY IS THIS...'

But he got no further, for the sound of footsteps could be heard in the hall, coming towards the kitchen, and loud, American voices came nearer and nearer.

'See here, Pop - I wanna come with you! This is a dead-and-alive place. You take me up to London with you, aw, Pop, go on, do!'

'That the Americans?' asked Dick, turning to the twins. Their faces had gone as black as thunder. They nodded. In came a burly man, looking rather odd in smart town clothes, and a fat pasty-faced boy of about eleven. The father stood at the door and looked round, rubbing his hands.

'Hiya, folks! We've been over to that swell old town, and picked up some fine souvenirs - my, my, they were cheap as dirt! We late for tea? Hallo, who're all these folks?'

He grinned round at Julian and the others. Julian stood up politely. 'We're four cousins,' he said. 'We've come to stay here.'

'Stay here? Where you gonna sleep, then?' demanded the boy, pulling up a chair to the table. 'This is a one-eyed place, ain't it, Pop - no wash-basins, no...'

'Shut up,' said the twins together, and gave the boy such a glare that Anne stared in astonishment.

'Aw, go on, I can say what I like, can't I?' said the boy. 'Free country, isn't it? Gee, you should just see America! That's something! Mrs. Philpot, I'll have a bit of that cake - looks good to me.'

'CAN'T YOU SAY PLEASE?' roared a voice from the corner. That was Great-Grand-dad, of course! But the boy took no notice, and merely held out his plate, while Mrs. Philpot cut him an enormous slice of cake.

'I'll have the same as Junior, Mrs. Philpot mam,' said the American, and sat down at the table. He held out his plate too. 'Say, you should see the things we've bought. We've had a day, haven't we, Junior?'

'Sure, Pop,' said Junior. 'Say, can't I have an iced drink? Look-a-here - who's going to drink hot tea on a day like this!'

'I'll get you some iced orangeade,' said Mrs. Philpot, rising.

'LET HIM GET IT HIMSELF! LITTLE VARMINT!' That was Great-Grand-dad again, of course. But the twins were already up and on their way to fetch the orangeade themselves. George caught sight of their faces as they passed her, and had a shock of surprise. Goodness - how those twins hated that boy!

'That old Grand-daddy of yours must be a bit of a nuisance to you,' said the American in a low voice to Mrs. Philpot. 'Always butting in, isn't he? Rude old fellow, too.'

'NOW DON'T YOU SET THERE WHISPERING!' shouted Grand-dad. 'I CAN HEAR EVERY WORD!'

'Now, now, Grand-dad, don't upset yourself,' said poor Mrs. Philpot. 'You just sit there and have a nap.'

'No. I'm going out again,' said Great-Grand-dad, heaving himself up. 'There's some people that fair make me ill!'

And out he went, leaning on his stick, a magnificent figure with his head of snow-white hair and his long beard.

'Like someone out of the Old Testament,' said Anne to Dick. Timmy got up and followed the old man to the door, with Snippet close behind him. Junior saw Timmy at once.

'I say! Look at that big dog!' he said. 'Who's he? I've not seen him before. Hey, you, come and have a bun.'

Timmy took not the slightest notice. George addressed Junior in an icy voice. 'That's my dog Timmy. I don't allow anyone to feed him except myself.'

'Shucks!' said Junior, and threw the cake down on the floor, so that it slid to Tim's feet. 'That's for you, dog!'

Timmy looked down at the cake, and stood perfectly still. Then he looked at George. 'Come here, Timmy,' said George, and he walked straight to her. The cake lay on the floor half-broken into crumbs.

'My dog is not going to eat that,' said George. 'Better pick it up, hadn't you? It's made a bit of a mess on the floor.'

'Pick it up yourself,' said Junior, helping himself to another bun. 'My, my - what a glare you've got! Makes me want my sunglasses, brother!' He gave George a sudden sharp dig in the ribs, and she gasped. Timmy was beside her in a moment, growling so deeply that Junior slid out of his seat in alarm.

'Say, Pop - this dog's fierce!' he said. 'He made to bite me!'

'He did not,' said George. 'But he might bite if you don't do what I said, and pick up that bun!'

'Now, now,' said Mrs. Philpot, really distressed. 'Leave it - it can be swept up afterwards. Will you have another piece of cake, Mr. Henning?'

It really was an embarrassing meal, and Anne longed for it to be over. Junior quietened down considerably when he saw Timmy lying down between his chair and George's, but his father made up for that by talking non-stop about the 'wunnerful' things he had bought that day. Everyone was extremely bored. The twins came back with a jug of orangeade, which they placed on the table, with two glasses, in case Mr. Henning wanted some. They then disappeared.

'Where have they gone?' demanded Junior, having poured a glass of orangeade straight down his throat in a most remarkable manner. 'Gee, that was good.'

'The twins have gone to help with the milking, I expect,' said Mrs. Philpot, looking suddenly very weary. Julian looked at her. She must find these meals very tiring, he thought, coping with so many people. Junior piped up at once.

'I'll go and help with the milking,' he said, and slid off his chair.

'I'd rather you didn't, Junior,' said Mrs. Philpot. 'You upset the cows a bit last time, you know.'

'Aw gee - that was because I was new to it,' said Junior. Julian looked at Mr. Henning, expecting him to forbid Junior to go, but he said nothing. He lighted a cigarette and threw the match down on the floor.

George scowled when she saw Junior heading for the door. How dare he go out to the milking against the wishes of his hostess? She murmured a few words to Timmy, and he got up at once and ran to the door, barring it against Junior.

'Get outa my way, you,' said Junior, stopping. Timmy growled. 'Say, call him back, will you?' said Junior, turning round. No one said anything. Mrs. Philpot rose and began to gather things together. It seemed to George as if she had tears in her eyes. No wonder, if this kind of thing happened every day!

As Timmy stood like a statue in the doorway, giving small threatening growls every now and again, Junior decided to give up. He dearly longed to give the dog a kick, but didn't dare to. He walked back to his father.

'Say, Pop - coming for a walk?' he said. 'Let's get out of here.'

Without a word father and son walked out of the other door. Everyone heaved a sigh of relief.

'You go and sit down and have a rest, Mrs. Philpot,' said Anne. 'We'll do the washing-up. We'd love to!'

'Well - it's really kind of you,' said Mrs. Philpot. 'I've been on the go all day, and twenty minutes' rest will do me good. I'm afraid Junior gets on my nerves. I do hope Timmy won't bite him!'

'He'll probably give him a nip before long,' said George cheerfully, collecting cups and saucers with Anne. 'What are you boys going to do? Go to the milking-shed?'

'Yes. We've milked cows plenty of times,' said Dick. 'Nice job! I like the smell of cows. See you later, girls - and if that little Pest tries any tricks, just give us a call! I'd love to rub his face into that crumbly mess on the floor!'

'I'm just going to sweep it up,' said Anne. 'See you at supper-time!'

The boys went out, whistling. Mrs. Philpot had disappeared. Only George, Anne and Timmy were left, for Snippet had gone out with the Harries.

'I rather wish we hadn't come,' said George, carrying out a tray to the scullery. 'It's an AWFUL lot for Mrs. Philpot to do. Still - if she needs the money...'

'Oh well - we can help - and we'll be out most of the day,' said Anne. 'We shan't see much of Junior - little beast!'

You're wrong, Anne. You'll see far too much of him! It's a good thing Timmy's there - he's the only one that can manage people like Junior!

Chapter 5

EVENING AT THE FARM

George and Anne went out to find the others in the milking-shed. There were plenty of cows there, swishing their tails. The milking was almost finished, and the twins were driving some of the cows back to their field.

'Hallo - how did you get on?' asked Anne.

'Fine - it was fun,' said Dick. 'My cows did better than Julian's, though - I sang to them all the time, and they loved it!'

'Ass!' said George. 'Did you have a talk with the farmer?'

'Yes - he says he's got an old Land-Rover and he'll take us all over the farm tomorrow,' said Dick, pleased. 'And we can ride on that tractor, if Bill - that's one of his farm-hands - will let us. He says Bill won't have Junior on the tractor at any price - so maybe there'll be ructions if he sees us on it!'

'Well, I'm all ready for a ruction, and so is Timmy,' said George grimly. 'Sooner or later I'm going to tell Junior a few home-truths.'

'We'd all like to do that,' said Julian. 'But let's hold our horses till a good moment comes - I don't want that nice Mrs. Philpot upset - and you know, if we caused her to lose the two Americans she might suffer badly - in her pocket! I bet they pay well.'

'Well - I understand all that too, Ju,' said George. 'But Timmy doesn't. He's longing to have a go at Junior!'

'And how I share that feeling!' said Dick, rubbing Timmy's big head. 'What's the time? Shall we go for a walk?'

'No,' said Julian. 'My legs feel stiff with cycling up so many Dorset hills today. I vote we just stroll around a bit, not go for miles.'

The Five set off together, wandering round the farm buildings. They were all very old, some of them falling to pieces. The roofs had great Dorset tiles, made of stone, uneven and roughly shaped. They were a lovely grey, and were brilliant with lichen and moss.

'Aren't they gorgeous?' said George, stopping to look at the tiles on a small out-house. 'Look at that lichen, did you ever see such a brilliant orange? But what a pity - half of them have gone from this roof, and someone has replaced them with horrid cheap tiles!'

'Maybe the Philpots sold them,' said Julian. 'Old tiles like that, brilliant with lichen, can fetch quite a bit of money - especially from Americans. There's many a barn out in America covered with old tiles from this country, moss and all. A bit of old England!'

'If I had a lovely old place like this I wouldn't sell one single tile, or one single bit of moss!' said George, quite fiercely.

'Maybe you wouldn't,' said Dick. 'But some would - if they loved their farm enough and didn't want to see it go to pieces for lack of money. Their fields would be worth more than old tiles to them!'

'I bet old Grand-dad wouldn't sell them if he could help it!' said Anne. 'I wonder if the American has tried to buy any of these tiles? I guess he has.'

They had an interesting time wandering round. They found one old barn-like shed stacked with ancient cast-away junk, and Julian rummaged in it with great interest.

'Look at this giant cart-wheel!' he said, peering into a dark corner. 'It's almost as tall as I am! My word - they must have made all their own wheels here in the old days - in this very shed, perhaps. And maybe their own tools too. Look at this old tool - what in the world is it?'

They gazed at the curious curved tool, still as strong and as good as it had been two or three centuries before. It was heavy, and Julian thought that he wouldn't have liked to use it for more than ten minutes at a time!

'But I bet old Grand-dad could use it for a whole day and never get tired,' he said. 'When he was a young man, I mean. He must have been as strong as an ox, then.'

'Well, you remember what the girl at the dairy said,' put in Anne. 'She said he had once fought a bull and knocked it out. We must ask him about that. I bet he'd love to tell us.'

'He's a real old character!' said Julian. 'I like him, shouts and temper and all. Come on - it's getting latish. We didn't ask about the evening meal. I wonder what time we ought to get back for it?'

'Half past seven,' said George. 'I asked. We'd better go back now, because we'll have to get ourselves clean - and Anne and I want to help lay the table.'

'Right. Back we go,' said Julian. 'Come on, Tim. Stop sniffing about that old rubbish. Surely you can't smell anything exciting there!'

They went back to the farm-house, and the girls went to wash at the kitchen sink, seeing Mrs. Philpot already preparing for supper. 'Won't be a minute!' called Anne. 'We'll do those potatoes for you, Mrs. Philpot. I say, what a lovely farm this is. We've been exploring those old sheds.'

'Yes - they need clearing out,' said Mrs. Philpot, who looked better for the rest she had had. 'But old Great-Grand-dad, he won't have them touched. Says he promised his Grand-dad not to let them go to anyone! But we did sell some of those lovely old grey tiles once - to an American, of course, a friend of Mr. Henning's - and Grand-dad almost went out of his mind. Shouted day and night, poor old chap, and went about with a pitch-fork in his hand all the time, daring any stranger even so much as to walk over the fields! We had such a time with him.'

'Good gracious!' said Anne, having a sudden vision of the grand old man stalking about his fields, shouting, and waving a great pitch-fork.

Supper was really a very pleasant meal, for Mr. Henning and Junior didn't come in. There was much talk and laughter at the table, though the twins, as usual, said hardly anything. They puzzled Anne. Why should they be so unfriendly? She smiled at them once or twice, but each time they turned their eyes away. Snippet lay at their feet, and Timmy lay under the table. Great-Grand-dad was not there, nor was Mr. Philpot.

'They're both making the best of the daylight,' said Mrs. Philpot. 'There's a lot to do on the farm just now.'

The children enjoyed the meat-pie that Mrs. Philpot had baked, and the stewed plums and rich cream that followed. Anne suddenly yawned a very large yawn.

'Sorry!' she said. 'It just came all of a sudden. I don't know why I feel so sleepy.'

'You've set me off now,' said Dick, and put his hand in front of an even larger yawn. 'Well, I don't wonder we feel sleepy. Ju and I set off at dawn this morning - and I know you girls had a jolly long bus-ride!'

'Well, you go to bed, all of you, as early as you like,' said Mrs. Philpot. 'I expect you'll want to be up bright and early in the morning. The Harries are always up about six o'clock - they just will not stay in bed!'

'And what time does Junior get up?' asked George, with a grin. 'Six o'clock too?'

'Oh, not before nine o'clock usually,' said Mrs. Philpot. 'Mr. Henning comes down about eleven - he likes his breakfast in bed. So does Junior.'

'WHAT? You don't mean to say you take breakfast up to that lazy little pest?' said Dick, astounded. 'Why don't you go and drag him out by the ankles?'

'Well - they are guests and pay well for being here,' said Mrs. Philpot.

'I'll take Junior his breakfast,' said George, much to everyone's astonishment. 'Timmy and I together. We'd like to. Wouldn't we, Timmy?'

Timmy made a most peculiar noise from under the table. 'That sounded like a laugh to me,' said Dick. 'And I'm not surprised! I'd just like to see Junior's face if you and Tim walked in on him with his breakfast!'

'Do you bet me I won't do it?' demanded George, really on her mettle now.

'Yes. I do bet you,' said Dick at once. 'I bet you my new pocket-knife you won't!'

'Taken!' said George. Mrs. Philpot looked puzzled. 'No, no, my dears,' she said. 'I can't have one guest waiting on another. Though I must say those stairs are a trial to my legs, when I'm carrying up trays!'

'I'll take up Junior's tray and Mr. Henning's too, if you like,' said George, in a half-kind, half-fierce voice.

'NOT Mr. Henning's,' said Julian, giving George a warning look. 'Don't go too far, old thing. Just Junior's tray will be enough.'

'All right, all right,' said George, rather sulkily. 'Aren't Junior and Mr. Henning coming in to supper?'

'Not tonight,' said Mrs. Philpot, in a thankful voice. 'They're dining at some hotel in Dorchester, I think. I expect they get a bit tired of our simple farm-house meals. I only hope they won't be too late back. Great-Grand-dad likes to lock up early.'

The children were really glad when the evening meal was cleared away and washed up, for they all felt heavy with sleep. The good strong air, the exciting day and the many jobs they had done had really tired them.

'Good night, Mrs. Philpot,' they said, when everything was done. 'We're off to bed. Are the twins coming too?'

The twins actually condescended to nod. They looked tired out. Julian wondered where Mr. Philpot and old Great-Grand-dad were - still out working, he supposed. He yawned. Well, he was for bed - and even if he had had to sleep on the bare ground that night, he knew he would sleep well! He thought longingly of his camp-bed.

They went their various ways - the twins and Julian and Dick to the big barn - the girls upstairs to the room opposite Junior's. George peeped into it. It was even untidier than before, and obviously Junior must have been eating nuts up there, for the floor was strewn with shells.

They were soon in bed - the girls cuddled together in the big, rather hard, old bed, the boys in their separate camp-beds. Timmy was on George's feet, and Snippet slept first on one twin's feet, and then on the other's. He was always perfectly fair in his favours!

A crashing noise awoke the girls about two hours later, and they sat upright in bed, alarmed. Timmy began to bark. George crept to the top of the stairs, hearing Grand-dad's loud voice below, and then crept back to Anne.

'It's Mr. Henning and Junior come back,' she said. 'Apparently old Grand-dad had locked up, and they crashed and banged on the knocker. My, what a to-do! Here comes Junior!' And indeed, here Junior did come, stamping up the stairs, and singing loudly.

'Little pest!' said George. 'Wait till I take him his breakfast tomorrow!'

Chapter 6

A LITTLE EXCITEMENT FOR BREAKFAST!

It was fun to sleep in the barn. Dick tried to keep awake for a while, and enjoy the barn-smell, and the sight of the stars in the sky seen through the open door, where a cool little night-breeze came wandering in.

Julian fell asleep at once, and did not even hear the crashing of the knocker at the front door of the farmhouse when the Hennings came in, or the loud voices. He awoke with a start at about one o'clock in the morning, and sat straight up in bed, his heart beating fast. What on earth was that noise he had heard?

He heard it again and laughed. 'What an ass I am! It's only an owl. Or maybe more than one. And gosh, what was that high little scream? A mouse - or a rat? Perhaps the owls are hunting in here?' He lay still and listened. He suddenly felt a rush of cool air over his face, and stiffened. That must have been an owl's soft-feathered wings! Owls' wings made no noise, he knew. The feathers were so soft that not even a quick-eared mouse could hear an owl swooping silently down!

There came another little high-pitched squeak. 'The owl's doing his job well,' thought Julian. 'What a fine hunting-place for him - a barn where food-stuffs are stored - over-run with mice and rats, of course. I bet this owl is worth his weight in gold to the farmer. Well, owl, do your job - but for goodness' sake don't mistake my nose for a mouse! Ah - there you go again - just over my head. I saw you then - a shadow passing by!'

He fell asleep once more and didn't wake until the sun streamed into the barn, lighting up hundreds of tiny motes floating in the air. Julian looked at his watch.

'Half past seven! And I meant to be up at seven. Dick! Wake up!'

Dick was so sound asleep that he didn't wake even when Julian shook him. He merely rolled over and settled down again. Julian glanced across the barn, and saw that the twins' camp-beds were empty. They had stacked their pillows and bed-clothes in neat piles, and disappeared silently out of the door. Without waking us! thought Julian, pulling on his socks. I wonder if I can wash at the big kitchen-sink. 'Dick - will you wake up?' he said loudly. 'It might be TEN O'CLOCK for all you care!'

Dick heard the two shouted words and sat up at once, looking aghast. 'Ten o'clock? Oh no! Gosh, I must have slept all round the clock, Oh, I say - I didn't mean to be late for breakfast. I... '

'Calm down,' grinned Julian, brushing his hair. 'I only said, 'It might be ten o'clock for all you care!' Actually, it's just gone half past seven.'

'Thank goodness for that,' said Dick, lying back in bed. 'Oh for ten minutes more!'

'The twins have gone already,' said Julian. 'I wonder if the girls are up. Oh my goodness, what's that?'

Something had jabbed him sharply in the back, making him jump violently. Julian swung round, expecting it to be Junior or one of the twins playing a silly joke.

'Oh - it's you - Nosey the jackdaw!' he said, looking at the cheeky bird, now perched on his pillow. 'You've got a jolly sharp beak!'

'Chack!' said the jackdaw, and flew to his shoulder. Julian felt flattered - until the jackdaw pecked his ear! 'Here - you take the bird,' he said to the unwary Dick and handed Nosey to him. Nosey promptly pounced on the watch lying beside Dick's pillow and flew off with it. Dick gave an angry yell.

'Bring that back, you ass of a bird! Don't you know a watch when you see one? He's taken my watch, Ju - goodness knows where he'll hide it!'

'He's gone into the roof,' said Julian. 'We'd better tell the twins. Perhaps they can deal with him. Now WHY doesn't he take Junior's watch - that would be a trick I should really applaud!'

'CHACK, CHACK, CHACK,' said Nosey, exactly as if he agreed. He had to open his beak to say 'chack' and the watch promptly fell out. It bounced on to a sack far below, and the bird swooped down to get it. Dick also swooped, and as the watch had now slipped between two sacks, he managed to get it before the jackdaw.

Nosey flew up into the roof, and chacked angrily. 'Don't use such bad language,' said Dick severely, strapping on his watch. 'You ought to be ashamed of yourself!'

They went out of the barn and round to the farmhouse. There were sounds of people about, and the two boys felt quite ashamed of being so late! Breakfast was on the table, but already quite a number of people seemed to have had it!

'The girls haven't had theirs,' said Dick, looking at the places set in front of the chairs where George and Anne had sat the night before. 'But the twins have. It looks as if everyone has, except us four, apparently! Ah - here's Mrs. Philpot. Sorry we're late. We overslept, I'm afraid.'

'That's all right!' said Mrs. Philpot, smiling. 'I don't expect my visitors to be up early. Anyone can sleep late on a holiday!'

She held a tray in her hands, and set it down on the table. 'That's for Mr. Henning - he'll ring when he wants his breakfast. That's Junior's tray over there. I make the coffee when they ring,' she said, and went out again.

There was cold ham for breakfast, boiled eggs and fruit. The two boys tucked in, and looked round reprovngly when the two girls came, with Timmy behind them, still sleepy-eyed. 'Overslept, I suppose?' said Dick, pretending to be shocked. 'Sit down. I'll pour you some coffee.' 'Where's Junior - not down yet, I hope?' said George anxiously. 'I've not forgotten my bet about taking up his breakfast!'

'I say - do you think it's all right to let George take up Junior's breakfasts,' said Julian, after a pause. 'George, don't throw the tray at him or anything, will you?'

'I might,' said George, eating a boiled egg. 'Anything to get your new pocket-knife from you!'

'Well, don't go too far in teasing Junior,' said Julian warningly. 'You don't want to make the Henning family walk out and leave Mrs. Philpot high and dry!'

'All right, all right,' said George. 'Don't nag. I think I'll have another egg, Dick. Pass one over, please. I don't know why I'm so hungry.'

'Leave a bit of room for this ham,' said Dick, who had cut himself two good slices. 'It's out of this world! Simply too good to be true! I could eat it all day.'

The two girls tucked into their breakfast, and just as they were finishing, a bell rang very loudly in the kitchen, jangling just above their heads. They jumped violently. Mrs. Philpot came into the room at once. 'That's Mr. Henning's bell,' she said. 'I must make his coffee.'

'I'll take up his tray,' said Anne. 'George is going to take up Junior's.'

'Oh no - I really don't like you to do that,' said Mrs. Philpot, distressed. Just then another bell rang. It jangled to and fro for a very long time.

'That's Junior's bell,' said Mrs. Philpot. 'He always seems to think I'm quite deaf!'

'Bad-mannered little beast!' said Dick, and was pleased to find that Mrs. Philpot didn't disagree!

Anne waited till Mr. Henning's tray was ready, and then firmly put her hands to the sides. 'I'm going to take it to Mr. Henning,' she said in a most determined voice, and Mrs. Philpot smiled gratefully and let her lift it. 'Bedroom on the left of the stairs, first floor!' she said. 'And he likes his curtains pulled, too, when his breakfast is brought.'

'And does Junior like his pulled as well?' inquired George, in such a sugary voice that the two boys looked round at her suspiciously. What was she up to now?

'Well - I do pull them for him,' said Mrs. Philpot, 'but don't you pull them if you don't feel like it! Thank you very much, dear!'

Anne had already gone upstairs with Mr. Henning's tray, and now George set off with Junior's. She winked at Dick. 'Get that pocket-knife ready for me!' she said, and disappeared through the door, grinning wickedly. She went carefully upstairs with Timmy close at her heels, wondering whatever George was doing with a tray!

George came to Junior's door. It was shut. She gave it a violent kick and it flew open. She entered, clattering with her feet, and set the tray down on a table with a jolt that upset the coffee. She went whistling to the windows, and pulled the curtains back across the poles so that they made a loud clattering noise.

Junior had apparently fallen asleep again, his head under the clothes. George upset a chair with a crash. That made Junior sit up, half scared. 'What's going on here?' he began. 'Can't you bring my breakfast without ...' Then he saw that it was George in the room, not the kindly Mrs. Philpot.

'Get out!' he said angrily. 'Crashing about like that! Pull the curtains across again. The sun's too strong. And look how you've spilt the coffee! Why didn't Mrs. Philpot bring my breakfast? She usually does. Here - put the tray on my knees, like she does!'

George whipped the bed-clothes off him, took up the tray and set it down violently on his pyjama'd knees. The hot coffee got a violent jerk and some drops fell on to his bare arm. They were hot, and he yelled loudly. He lashed out at George, and hit her hard on the shoulder.

That was a very great mistake. Timmy, who was at the door watching, leapt on to the bed at once, growling. He pulled the terrified boy on to the floor, and kept him lying there, standing over him, deep growls coming from the depths of his great body.

George took absolutely no notice. She went round the room, humming a little tune, putting this and that straight, tidying the dressing-table, not seeming to notice what Timmy was doing. She shut the door so that no one would hear Junior's howls.

'George - take this dog off me!' begged Junior. 'He'll kill me! GEORGE! I'll tell my Pop of you. I'm sorry I hit you. Oh no, take this dog off me, PLEASE do!'

He began to weep, and George looked scornfully down at him. 'You nasty spoilt little pest,' she said. 'I've a good mind to leave you here all morning, with Timmy on guard! But this time I'll be generous to you. Come here, Tim. Leave that funny little worm there on the floor!'

Junior was still weeping. He crept into bed and wrapped the blankets round him. 'I don't want any breakfast,' he wept. 'I'll tell Pop about you. He'll lam you all right.'

'Yes, you tell him,' said George, tucking him in so tightly that he couldn't move. 'You tell him - and I'll whisper into Timmy's ear that you've told tales of me - and honestly, I simply don't know what he'll do!'

'You are the most horrible boy I've ever met,' said Junior, knowing when he was beaten. George grinned. So he thought she was a boy, did he? Good!

'Mrs. Philpot isn't going to bring up your breakfast any more,' she said. 'I'm going to - with Timmy. See? And if you dare to ring that bell more than once each morning, you'll be sorry!'

'I don't want my breakfast brought up,' said Junior, in a small voice. 'I'd rather get up and go downstairs for it. I don't want you to bring it.'

'Right. I'll tell Mrs. Philpot,' said George. 'But if you change your mind, just tell me. I'll bring it up any morning - with Timmy!'

She went out and banged the door, Timmy trotting down the stairs in front of her, puzzled but pleased. He didn't like Junior any more than George did.

George went into the kitchen. Dick and Julian were still there. 'You've lost your bet, Dick,' said George. 'Pocket-knife, please. I not only took up his breakfast, and accidentally spilt hot coffee on him, but Timmy here pulled him out of bed and stood over him, growling. What a sight that was! Poor Junior doesn't want his breakfast in bed any more! He's coming down for it each morning.'

'Good for you, George!' said Dick, and slid his pocket-knife across the table. 'You deserve to win. Now - sit down and finish your breakfast and mind - I'm not betting anything else for a long, long time!'

Chapter 7

THE TWINS CHANGE THEIR MINDS

The twins, Harry and Harriet, had had their breakfast some while ago. They now came into the big kitchen, Snippet at their heels, and scowled to see the Five still having breakfast there. Anne was in fits of laughter over George's account of the way she had dealt with Junior.

'You should have seen his face when I planked the breakfast tray on his knees, and the hot coffee splashed him!' said George. 'He let out a yell that startled even old Timmy. And when he hit me, and Timmy leapt on the bed and dragged him out on to the floor, his eyes nearly fell out of his head!'

'No wonder he's decided to come down to breakfast each morning, then,' said Julian. 'He'll be scared stiff of you appearing with a breakfast tray again!'

The twins listened to this in amazement. They looked at one another, and nodded. Then they walked up to the breakfast table, and for once in a way, only one twin spoke. Whether it was Harry or Harriet, nobody knew, for they both looked so much alike.

'What's happened?' said the twin to George. 'Why did you take up Junior's breakfast tray.'

'Because we were all so fed up with the way Junior - and his Pop - impose on your mother,' said George. 'Fancy a boy having breakfast in bed!'

'So old George took it into her head to take up his breakfast herself, and said she'd teach him such a lesson he'd be a bit more considerate of your mother in future,' said Dick. 'What's more, I was idiotic enough to bet George she wouldn't do it - and now she's won my best pocket-knife off me - look!'

George proudly displayed the knife. The twins each gave a sudden loud laugh, which surprised the others very much. 'Well, I'm blessed!' said Dick. 'Fancy you being able to laugh! You always look so fierce and unfriendly. Well, now that you've condescended to talk to us, let me tell you this - we think your mother is absolutely tops, and far from giving her more trouble, we're all going to help as much as we can. Got that?'

Both twins were smiling broadly now. They took it in turns to speak, which was really much more friendly than their usual stiff way of talking in unison.

'We hate Junior!' said one twin. 'He thinks our mother is a kind of slave, to come when he rings for her, or shouts for her.'

'His father's the same,' said the other twin. 'Wanting this and that, and sending our mother all over the place to fetch and carry for him. Why doesn't he go and stay at a hotel?'

'He doesn't because he's so set on snooping out our old things and buying them,' said the other twin. 'I know for a fact that Mother has sold him some of her own things - but she just had to have some money; things are so expensive, and we grow out of our clothes so quickly.'

'I say - it is nice to hear you talking properly,' said Julian, clapping the twin on the back. 'And now would you mind letting us know how to tell which of you is which? I know one's a boy and one's a girl, but you both look exactly alike to me - you might be two boys!'

The twins gave sudden, mischievous grins. 'Well - don't you tell Junior, then,' said one. 'You can always tell me by this scar on my hand, see? Harriet hasn't any scar. I'm Harry.'

The four looked at the long thin scar on the boy's hand. 'I got that by tearing the back of my hand on barbed wire,' said Harry. 'Now you'll know us from each other! I say - tell us all about George and the breakfast tray, from beginning to end. Good old George. She looks just as much a boy as Harriet does.'

It was very pleasant to find the twins so friendly, after their stiff, sullen dislike. The four warmed to them - and when Mrs. Philpot suddenly appeared in the kitchen to clear away breakfast, she was astounded to see her twins talking and laughing gaily with the others. She stood and stared, a delighted smile on her face.

'Mother! Junior's not going to have breakfast in bed any more!' said Harry. 'Listen why!' And the story had to be told all over again. George went red. She was half afraid that Mrs. Philpot would be really displeased. But no, she threw back her head and laughed.

'Oh, that really does me good,' she said. 'But I hope Junior doesn't tell his father, and they don't both go off in a hurry! We do need their money, you know, much as I hate having them here. Now I must clear away breakfast!'

'No, you mustn't. That's our job,' said Anne. 'Isn't it, twins?'

'YES!' said both twins together. 'We're all friends now, Mother - let them belong to the family.'

'Well, I'll go and see to the chickens, then, if you're going to clear away,' said Mrs. Philpot. 'You can wash up, too, bless you!'

'Look - how would you like to go round the farm in our old Land-Rover today?' said Harry to the others. 'It's the best way to see over the farm. I think Bill's got to go round this morning, and check on the fields and the stock. He'll take you, if I ask him.'

'Fine!' said Julian. 'What time?'

'In about half an hour,' said Harry. 'I'll find Bill - and when you hear a horn hooting, come on out. By the way, Bill isn't much of a talker, but if he takes to you, he'll be quite pally.'

'Right,' said Julian. 'Can Dick and I do something while the girls are clearing away?'

'Gosh yes, there's ALWAYS something to do on a farm,' said Harry. 'Come on up to the chicken-houses - Harriet and I are patching them up to stop the rain leaking in.'

Julian and Dick, with Timmy behind them, immediately went off with the twins, now as merry and friendly as before they had been dour and sullen! What a change!

'Well, thank goodness I took Junior's breakfast up to him, and put him in his place,' said George, folding up the table-cloth. 'It was apparently just the one thing that would make the twins friendly! Hark, Anne, I believe that's Junior coming.'

She slipped behind the dresser, while Anne set the chairs straight round the table. Junior came creeping in very quietly indeed, and looked round fearfully. He seemed very relieved to find only Anne there. He considered that she was quite harmless!

'Where's that dog?' he asked.

'What dog?' said Anne innocently. 'Snippets?'

'No - that great ugly mongrel - and that awful boy he belongs to,' said Junior, still fearful.

'Oh, you mean George, I suppose,' said Anne, amused that Junior thought George was a boy.

'Well, look over there!'

Junior saw George advancing on him from behind the dresser, gave one agonized yell and fled, fearing that she had Timmy somewhere behind her. George laughed.

'We shan't have much trouble with him in future,' she said. 'I just hope he doesn't say too much to his Pop!'

After a while they heard the sound of a hooter outside. 'That's the Land-Rover,' said George, excited. 'Well, we've just finished the washing-up. Hang up the tea-cloths to dry, Anne. I'll pop these dishes into the cupboard...'

Soon they were out of the great kitchen door and down the passage that led to the yard. Not far off was a van-like car, the Land-Rover. It was an old one, very dirty, and a bit lop-sided. Dick and Julian yelled to the girls.

'Buck up! Didn't you hear us hooting?'

The girls ran to the Land-Rover. Bill, the farmhand, was at the wheel. He grinned at them and nodded. Timmy greeted George as if he hadn't seen her for a year and almost knocked her down in his playfulness.

'Tim! Don't be such an ass!' said George, 'planting your great muddy paws all over me! Where are the twins? Aren't they coming?'

'Naw,' said Bill. 'They be busy.'

They all got in, and were just about to set off when someone else appeared. 'Wait! I'm coming! Wait, I say!'

And up ran Junior, full of himself as usual. 'Jump down, Tim - go to him,' said George, in a low voice. And very willingly indeed Timmy leapt down and ran full-tilt towards the unsuspecting Junior. He gave one loud yell, turned, and fled for his life.

'Well, that's got rid of him!' said Dick, with much satisfaction. 'Look at Timmy - he's laughing all over his hairy old face! You love a joke, don't you, Tim?'

It did indeed look as if Tim was laughing, for he had his mouth wide open, showing all his teeth, and his tongue was hanging out happily. He leapt back into the car.

'Sensible dog, that,' said Bill, and then relapsed into his usual silence as he started up the Land-Rover with a really shattering noise. It moved off towards the fields.

How it jolted! The four clung to the sides of the van, almost bumped off their seats as the Land-Rover jerked its way over field-paths, uphill and downhill, jolting in and out of deep ruts, appearing to be on the point of overturning at any minute. Anne wasn't sure that she liked it much, but the others enjoyed every minute.

'Now you'll see the farm-land,' said Bill, as they came to the top of the hill. 'Look yonder! Could be the finest farm in the county, if Mester Philpot had the money!'

Chapter 8

ALL ROUND THE FARM

The Five thoroughly enjoyed their ride over the big farm. It spread out in all directions over undulating hills, and the van swung up and down and continually lurched round corners. It stopped every now and again so that the children might see the magnificent views.

Bill told them the names of the great fields as they passed them. 'That's Oak-Tree Field - that's Hangman's Copse over there - that's Tinker's Wood Field - and that's Faraway Field - the furthest from the farm-house.'

Name after name came from his lips, and it seemed as if the sight of the fields he knew and loved suddenly set his tongue going. He told them about the stock too. 'Them's the new cows over there - give good milk they do - helps a farmer no end to get money every week for milk, you know. And them's the bulls, down in that field. Fine creatures, too - cost a mint of money. But Mester Philpot, he believes in good animals. He'd rather go without a new car than buy poor stock. Them's the sheep right away over there - see, dotted about on those slopes. Can't take you to see 'em today, though. You'd like Shepherd. He's been here so long and is so old, he knows every inch of the farm!'

He relapsed into silence after this unusual spate of talk, and turned down a path that took the children back towards the farm-house, using a different route, to show them even more fields.

There were glorious fields of corn, golden in the sun, waving in the breeze with a wonderful rustling noise. 'I could sit here for hours and look at that, and listen,' said Anne.

'Then don't you marry a farmer, if so be you wants to do that, for a farmer's wife has no time to sit!' said Bill dryly, and was silent again.

They jolted along, shaken to the bones, but loving every minute. 'Cows, calves, sheep, lambs, bulls, dogs, ducks, chickens,' chanted Anne. 'Corn, kale, beet, cauliflower - ooh, Bill, look out!'

The van had gone at such speed into a deep rut that Anne was nearly flung out. Timmy shot through the back entrance of the van, and landed on the ground, rolling over and over. He got slowly to his feet, looking most amazed.

'Timmy! It's all right! It was only a bigger hole than usual!' shouted George. 'Buck up - jump in!' As the Land-Rover didn't stop, Timmy had to gallop after it, and enter with a flying leap from the back. Bill gave a snort of laughter, which made the wheel wobble dangerously. 'This here old car's almost human,' he said. 'Just jigs about for joy on a day like this!'

And he drove headlong over a slanting path and straight down into a hollow, making poor Anne groan again. 'All very well for Bill!' she said, in Julian's ear. 'He's got the wheel to hang on to!'

In spite of the jolting and bumping the Five immensely enjoyed their ride round the farm. 'Now we really know what it's like!' said Julian, as the Land-Rover came to a very sudden stop near the farm-house, throwing them all on top of one another. 'My word - no wonder old Great-Grand-dad, and Mr. and Mrs. Philpot love the place. It's GRAND! Thanks awfully, Bill. We've enjoyed it tremendously! Wish my people had a farm like this!

'Farm like this? Ay. It's taken centuries to grow,' said Bill. 'All them names I told you - they'm centuries old too. Nobody knows now who was hanged down in Hangman's Copse - or what Tinkers came to Tinkers Wood. But they'm not forgot as long as they fields are there!'

Anne stared at Bill in wonder. Why, that was almost poetry, she thought. He turned and saw her gazing at him. He nodded at her.

'You unnerstand all right, miss, don't you?' he said. 'There's some that don't, though. That Mr. Henning, he raves about it all - but he don't unnerstand a thing. As fer that boy of his!' And to Anne's surprise he turned and spat into the ditch, 'That's what I thinks of him!'

'Oh - it's just the way he's been brought up, I expect,' said Anne. 'I've met heaps of fine American children, and ...'

'Well, that one wants a hiding!' said Bill, grimly. 'And if it wasn't that Mrs. Philpot begged me to keep my hands offen him, he'd be black and blue, that boy! And so I tell you! Trying to ride on them scarey calves and chasing the hens till they're scared off egg-laying - and stoning the ducks, poor critturs - and slitting sacks of seed just for the fun of seeing it dribble out and waste! Hoo, wouldn't I like to shake him till his bones rattled!'

The four listened in silence, horrified. Junior was much worse than they had thought, then. George felt very very pleased that she had taught him a lesson that morning.

'Don't you worry any more about Junior,' said Julian grimly. 'We'll keep him in order while we're here!'

They said good-bye and walked back to the farmhouse, stiff and sore from the bumpy, bone-shaking ride, but with their minds full of the lovely sloping hills, the blue distance, the waving corn, and the feel of a farmland in good heart.

'That was good,' said Julian, voicing the feelings of the others. 'Very good. I somehow feel more English for having seen those Dorset fields, set about by hedges, basking in the sun.'

'I liked Bill,' said Anne. 'He's so - so solid and real. He belongs to the land, just as the land belongs to him. They're one!'

'Ah - Anne has discovered what farming really means!' said Dick. 'I say, I'm most awfully hungry, but I really don't like to go and ask for anything at the farm-house. Let's go down to the village and get buns and milk at the dairy.'

'Oh yes!' said Anne and George, and Timmy gave a few sharp, short barks as if he thoroughly agreed. They set off down the lane that led to the village, and soon came to the little ice-cream shop, half baker's half dairy. Janie, the small talkative girl, was there again. She smiled at them in delight.

'You're here again!' she said, in pleasure. 'Mum's made some macaroons this morning. See - all gooey and fresh!'

'Now how did you guess that we are all very partial to macaroons?' said Dick, sitting down at one of the two little tables there. 'We'll have a plateful, please.'

'What, a whole plateful?' exclaimed Janie. 'But there's about twenty on a plate!'

'Just about right,' said Dick. 'And an ice-cream each, please. Large. And don't forget our dog, will you?'

'Oh no, I won't,' said Janie. 'He's a very nice dog, isn't he? Have you noticed what lovely smiley eyes he has?'

'Well, yes, we have. We know him quite well, you see,' said Dick, amused. George looked pleased. She did so like Timmy to be praised. Timmy liked it too. He actually went up to Janie and licked her hand!

Soon they had a plateful of delicious macaroons in front of them - and they were indeed nice, and very 'gooey' inside, as Janie had so rightly said. George gave Timmy one, but it was really wasted on him, because he gave one crunch, and then swallowed it! He also chased his ice-cream all over the floor again, much to Janie's delight.

'How do you like it at Mrs. Philpot's?' she asked. 'Kind, isn't she?'

'Very!' said everyone together.

'We love being at the farm,' said Anne. 'We've been all over it this morning, in the Land-Rover.'

'Did Bill take you?' asked Janie. 'He's my uncle. But he don't usually say much to strangers.'

'Well, he said plenty to us,' said Julian. 'He was most interesting. Does he like macaroons?'

'Oooh yes,' said Janie, rather astonished. 'Everyone likes Mum's macaroons.'

'Could he eat six, do you think?' asked Julian.

'Oooh yes,' said Janie, still astonished, her blue eyes opened wide.

'Right. Put six in a bag for me,' said Julian. 'I'll give them to him in return for a jolly fine ride.'

'That's right down nice of you,' said Janie, pleased. 'My uncle's been on Finniston Farm all his life. You ought to get him to show you where Finniston Castle used to stand, before it was burnt down, and...'

'Finniston Castle!' exclaimed George, in surprise. 'We went all over the farm this morning, and saw every field - but we didn't see any ruined castle.'

'Oh no, you wouldn't see anything!' said Janie. 'I told you - it was burnt down. Right to the ground, ages ago. Finniston Farm belonged to it, you know. There's some pictures of it in a shop down the road. I saw them, and...'

'Now Janie, Janie, how many times have I told you not to chatter to customers?' said Janie's mother, bustling in, frowning. 'That tongue of yours! Can't you learn that people don't want to hear your chatter, chatter, chatter?'

'We like talking to Janie,' said Julian, politely. 'She's most interesting. Please don't send her away.'

But Janie had fled, red-cheeked and scared. Her mother began to arrange the goods on the counter. 'Let's see now - what did you have?' she said. 'Good gracious, where are all those macaroons gone? There were at least two dozen there!'

'Er - well - we had almost twenty - and the dog helped, of course - and Janie put six in a bag for us - let's see now...'

'There were twenty-four on that plate,' said Janie's mother, still amazed. 'Twenty-four! I counted them!'

'And five ice-creams,' said Julian. 'How much is that altogether? Most delicious macaroons they were!'

Janie's mother couldn't help smiling. She totted up the bill, and Julian paid. 'Come again,' she said, 'and don't you let that little gas-bag of mine bore you!'

They set off down the street, feeling very pleased with life. Timmy kept licking his lips as if he could still taste macaroon and ice-cream! They walked to the end of the street, and came to the little lane that led up to the farm. Anne stopped.

'I'd like to go and look at the horse-brasses in this little antique shop,' she said. 'You go on. I'll come later.'

'I'll come in with you,' said George, and she turned to the little shop-window. The boys walked on by themselves. 'We'll probably be helping on the farm somewhere!' shouted back Dick. 'So long!'

Just as Anne and George were going into the shop, two people came out and almost bumped into them. One was Mr. Henning the American, the other was a man they hadn't seen before. 'Good morning,' Mr. Henning said to them, and went into the street with his friend. Anne and George walked into the dark little shop.

There was an old man there, drumming on the counter, looking quite angry. He gave the two girls such a glare that they felt quite frightened!

'That man!' said the old man, and frowned so fiercely that his glasses fell off. Anne helped him to find them among the clutter of quaint old trinkets on his counter. He fixed them on his nose again and looked sternly at the two girls and Timmy.

'If you've come to waste my time, please go,' he said. 'I'm a busy man. Children are no good to me. Just want to nose round and touch this and that, and never buy anything! That American boy now - he's... ah, but you don't know what I'm talking about, do you? I'm upset. I'm always upset when people want to buy our beautiful old things and take them away to a country they don't belong to. Now...'

'It's all right, Mr. Finniston,' said Anne, in her gentle voice. 'You are Mr. Finniston, aren't you? I just wanted to look at those lovely old horse-brasses, please. I won't bother you for long. We're staying at Finniston Farm, and...'

'Ah - at Finniston Farm, did you say?' said the old man, his face brightening. 'Then you've met my great friend, dear old Jonathan Philpot. My very great friend!'

'Is that Mr. Philpot, the twins' father?' asked George.

'No, no, no - it's old Great-Grand-dad! We went to school together,' said the old man, excited. 'Ah - I could tell you some tales of the Finnistons and the castle they once owned. Yes, yes - I'm a descendant of the owners of that castle, you know - the one that was burnt down. Oh, the tales I could tell you!'

And it was just at that moment that the Adventure began - the Finniston Farm adventure that the Five-were never to forget!

Chapter 9
A VERY INTERESTING TALE!

Anne and George looked at the quaint old man, fascinated, as he talked to them. He stood there behind the counter of his little dark antique shop, surrounded by things even older than himself, a little bent old man with only a few hairs on his head. He had a kindly wrinkled face with eyes so hooded with drooping lids that they seemed to look out through slits.

The two girls were thrilled to hear that old Mr. Finniston was actually descended from the long-ago Finnistons, who lived in Finniston Castle.

'Is that why your name's Finniston?' asked Anne. 'Tell us about the castle. We only heard about it for the first time today. But we don't even know exactly whereabouts it stood. I didn't see a single stone when we went round the farm this morning!'

'No, no, you wouldn't,' said Mr. Finniston. 'It was burnt right down to the ground, you see - and through the centuries people have taken the old stones for building walls. Ah well - it was a long, long time ago!'

'How long?' asked George.

'Let's see now - it was burnt down in 1192 - the twelfth century,' said Mr. Finniston. 'Norman times, you know. Ever heard of the Normans? Schooling isn't what it was, I know, so maybe...'

'Of course we've heard of the Normans!' said George, indignantly. 'Every child knows them! They conquered England, and the first Norman king was William the First, 1066!'

'Hmm - that's right. You've had some schooling, then,' said Mr. Finniston. 'Well, it was a Norman castle - look, like that one in this picture, see?' And he showed them a copy of an old print. They gazed at the stone castle pictured there.

'Yes. It's a Norman castle,' said George. 'Was Finniston Castle just like that?'

'I've got a copy of an old drawing of it somewhere,' said the old fellow. 'I'll find it and show it to you sometime. A small castle, of course - but a very fine specimen. Well, well, you won't be interested in such details, I know. How it was burnt down, I don't know. Can't find out for certain. The story goes that it was attacked at night by the enemy, and there were traitors in the castle itself, who set fire to it - and while the castle folk were fighting the fire, the enemy walked in and slew nearly all of them.'

'So the castle was no use for living in after that, I suppose,' said Anne. 'But it's strange there isn't even a stone to be seen anywhere.'

'Oh, but that's where you're wrong!' said Mr. Finniston, triumphantly. 'There are stones from the castle - all over the farm. But only I and old Great-Grand-dad know where they are now! There's an old wall with some of the castle stones at the bottom - and there's a well - but no, I mustn't tell you these secrets. You might tell them to the Americans who come here and buy up all our old treasures!'

'We won't! We promise!' said both girls at once, and Timmy thumped his tail on the floor, as if he too agreed.

'Well, maybe Great-Grand-dad will show you one or two of the old castle stones,' said Mr. Finniston. 'But I doubt it - I doubt it! I'll tell you one thing you can see at the farm-house, though - everybody knows about it, so it's no secret. Have you seen the old kitchen door, that leads out into the yard?'

'Yes. That oak door, studded with iron knobs, do you mean?' said Anne at once. 'They're quite fashionable now as front doors in ordinary houses, you know. Surely that farmhouse door isn't a real old one?'

Mr. Finniston put his head into his hands and groaned as if he were in pain.

'Fashionable! FASHIONABLE! What will they do next? Surely you can't mix up that fine old door with the trashy copies you've seen in modern houses? What's the world coming to? Couldn't you feel that that door was real - was as old as the centuries - and once hung on great hinges in a castle? Don't you know when things are grand with the weight of years?'

'Well,' said Anne, rather out of her depth, 'I did notice the door - but, you see, it's very dark just there, and we really can't see it very clearly.'

'Ah well - most people go about with their eyes shut half the time!' said Mr. Finniston. 'You have a look at that door - feel it - look at the great knocker on it. Think of the old Norman folk who hammered on the door with it, all those ages ago!'

George sighed. This kind of thing didn't interest her as much as it interested Anne. A thought suddenly struck her.

'But Mr. Finniston - if the castle was built of stone - how was it burnt to the ground?' she said. 'What happened?'

'I can't find out,' said Mr. Finniston sadly. 'I've been into every old library in the county, and looked up every old book of that period - and I've delved into the old records in Finniston church. As far as I can make out, the castle was stormed by enemies - and, as I said, a traitor inside set fire to it at the same time. The floors fell in, and the castle was left blazing from top to bottom. The great walls fell inwards and covered the base - and the Finniston family fled. Lord Finniston was killed - but his Lady took the children and hid them - it's said she hid them in the old chapel, near the barns of the farm. Maybe she took them down a secret underground passage, leading from the dungeons to the old chapel itself.'

'An old chapel - is it still there?' asked Anne. 'Or was it burnt too?'

'No - it wasn't burnt. It's still standing,' said Mr. Finniston. 'Old Great-Grand-dad will show you.' He shook his head sorrowfully. 'It's a store-house for grain now. Sad, sad. But, mind you - it's still full of prayer!'

The girls stared at him, wondering what he meant. They began to think he must be a little mad. He stood with his head bent, saying nothing for a while. Then he looked up.

'Well, that's the story, my dears - and it's not only a story, it's history! It happened over seven hundred years ago. And I'll tell you something else...'

'What?' asked the two girls.

'That castle had cellars - and dungeons!' said the old man. 'The fire only burnt down to the ground floor, which was made of earth flattened down, not wood, so it wouldn't burn. The cellars and dungeons can't have been destroyed - are they still there, undamaged? That's what's been in my mind all these long years. What was down in those cellars - and is it still there?'

He spoke in such a hollow voice that the girls felt quite scared. George recovered herself first.

'But why were the dungeons never uncovered?' she asked. 'I mean, surely someone must have thought of them and wondered about them?'

'Well, when the castle fell, and the walls collapsed, any underground entrances must have been completely covered with enormously heavy stones,' said Mr. Finniston, peering at them earnestly. 'The peasants and farm-hands living around couldn't possibly move them, and maybe they were too scared to, anyhow. They probably lay there for years, till the wind and weather broke them up. Then they were taken to build walls and line wells. But by that time everyone had forgotten about dungeons. Might have been centuries later, you see.'

He stood and brooded for a while, and the girls waited politely for him to go on. 'Yes - everyone forgot ... and everyone still forgets,' he said. 'Sometimes I wake up in the night and wonder what's underground there. Bones of prisoners? Chests of money? Things stored away by the Lady of the castle? I wake up and wonder!'

Anne felt uncomfortable. Poor old man! He lived absolutely in the past! His mind had weaved for him a living fantasy, a story that had no certain foundation, no real truth. She was sorry for him. She wished she could go and see the place where the old castle had once stood! It would be overgrown with grass and weeds, nettles would wave there, and poppies dance in the summer. There would probably be nothing at all to show where once a proud castle had stood, its towers high against the sky, flags flying along the battlements. She could almost hear the cries of the enemy, galloping up on horseback, and the fearful clash of swords! She shook herself and stood up straight.

'I'm as bad as this old man!' she thought. 'Imagining things! But what a tale! The others will love to hear it. I wonder if the American knows it.'

'Does that American, Mr. Henning, know the old story?' she asked, and the old man straightened up at once.

'Not the whole of it - only what he has heard in the village!' he said. 'He comes here and pesters me. He'd like to bring in men and dig up the whole thing! I know him! He'd buy up all the farm, just for the sake of getting that castle site - if he really knew there was something worth having, deep under the ground where it once stood. You won't tell him what I've told you, will you? I've talked too much. I always do when someone's upset me. Ah - to think my ancestors once lived in Finniston Castle - and here I am now - a poor old man in a little antique shop that nobody comes to!'

'Well, we've come to it,' said Anne. 'I did want to buy some horse-brasses, but I'll come another time. You're upset now. You go and have a rest!'

They went out of the little shop, almost on tiptoe! 'My word!' said George, thrilled. 'I just can't wait to tell the boys! What a story - and it really sounded true, Anne, didn't it? I vote we find out where that old castle really stood, and then go and have a look round. Who knows what we might find! Come along - let's get back to the farm as quickly as we can!'

Chapter 10

QUITE A BIT OF SHOUTING

Anne and George, with Timmy running in front, went back to the farm to find the boys, but they couldn't see them anywhere and gave it up. Then they went indoors and found Mrs. Philpot shelling peas. They took over the job at once.

'The boys are still helping to mend the hen-house,' said Mrs. Philpot. 'The Harries are pleased to have two more pairs of hands to help them! Something always seems to need repairing! If only we could get a few things we need so badly - a new tractor, for instance. But they cost so much! The barns want mending too, and the hen-houses are almost falling down!'

'I hope the harvest will be good for you,' said Anne. 'That will help, won't it?'

'Oh yes - we'll keep our fingers crossed for fine weather from now on!' said Mrs. Philpot. 'Thank goodness the cows are such good milkers! What we should do without our milk-money, I really don't know! But there - why should I bother you with my troubles when you're here for a nice holiday!'

'You don't bother us - and we think it's awfully nice of you to let us help,' said Anne. 'We shouldn't like it if you didn't!'

The girls had no chance of telling the boys what old Mr. Finniston had told them, until the afternoon came. They were up at the hen-houses with the two Harries and Snippet, happily hammering and sawing. Snippet was delighted to have so many people whistling cheerily round him, and busily took bits of wood from one boy to another, under the mistaken impression that he was a great help!

Nosey the jackdaw was there too, but he wasn't nearly so popular as Snippet! He pounced on any bright nail or screw he saw, and flew off with it, heedless of the exasperated shouts that followed him.

'Blow that jackdaw!' said Julian, looking up crossly. 'He's just taken the very nail I wanted! Nosey by name and nose by nature!'

The twins laughed. They seemed entirely different children now that they were friendly - amusing, helpful and most responsible. Julian and Dick admired them - no work was too hard, no hours were too long if they could help their mother or father.

'We hated you coming here because we knew it would give Mother so much more work,' said Harry. 'We thought if we were beastly to you, you'd go. But you don't make more work! You help an awful lot. It's fun to have you here.'

'I hope the girls are back,' said Dick. 'I know your mother wants help with the peas - such a lot of people to shell for - let me see - counting in your Great-Grand-dad, there will be about a dozen people in to dinner. Whew! I certainly do hope the girls are in. Ah - here comes that nosey jackdaw again. Look out, Dick, he's after those screws. Snippet, chase him!'

Away went the tiny poodle after the cheeky jackdaw, barking in his high little voice, thoroughly enjoying having so many children round him. Nosey flew up on to the top of the hen-house, and flapped his wings, chacking rude things in a very loud voice indeed.

Dinner was rather a crowded meal, for everyone was there. Great-Grand-dad frowned when he saw Mr. Henning come in with Junior. Junior strutted to his place at table, giving George his best scowl. However, she was just as good at scowling as Junior, and Mr. Henning, who happened to catch sight of her giant-size scowl, had quite a shock.

'Now, now, my boy,' he said to her. 'Why pull such an ugly face?'

Nobody told him that George was a girl. Mrs. Philpot was really very much amused. She liked George, and couldn't help thinking she would have made a very good boy indeed!

'Er - Mrs. Philpot - would it be all right if I bring a friend to lunch here tomorrow?' asked Mr. Henning. 'He's called Durlleston - Mr. Durlleston - and he's a great authority on antiques. He's going to give me some advice. You'll remember that you told me you had a quaint old hole in the wall in one of the bedrooms - where in the old days people used to heat embers for warming-pans, and bricks to put in between the bed-sheets. I thought I...'

'You thought you could buy 'em, I suppose!' suddenly shouted old Great-Grand-dad from his place at the head of the table. He thumped on the cloth with the handle of his knife. 'Well, you ask my permission first, see? This place is still mine. I'm an old man, I'm nearly ninety, but I've still got all my wits about me. I don't like this selling of things that have been in our family for donkeys' years! That I don't! And...'

'Now, now, Grand-dad, don't excite yourself,' said Mrs. Philpot, in her gentle voice. 'Surely it's better to sell old things that we shall never use, in order to buy a new set of tools, or wood to mend the barns?'

'Why can't we sell 'em to our own folks, then?' shouted Great-Grand-dad, banging with his fork as well. 'Taking them out of the country! Part of our history, they are! Selling our birthright, that's what we're doing - for a mess of pottage! That's out of the Bible, let me tell you, Mr. Henning, in case you don't know.'

'SHURE I KNOW,' said Mr. Henning, getting up and shouting back at Great-Grand-dad. 'I'm not as ignorant as you seem to think. You ought to be glad that a poor, run-down, back-dated country like Britain has got anything to sell to a fine upstanding one like America! You...'

'That's enough, Mr. Henning,' said Mrs. Philpot, with such dignity that Mr. Henning blushed red, and sat down in a great hurry. 'Sorry, mam,' he said. 'But that old man, he gets under my skin. Sure he does! What's gotten into him? All I want is to buy things you want to sell. You want new tractors - I want old junk and I'm willing to pay for it. That's all there is to it - buying and selling!'

'OLD JUNK!' shouted Great-Grand-dad again, banging with his glass now. 'Do you call that great old cart-wheel you bought OLD JUNK? Why, that's more than two hundred years old! My Great-Grand-dad made it - he told me so, when I was a mite of a boy. You won't find another wheel like it in England. HOO - that wheel was made before the first American was born! I tell you...'

'Now, now, Grand-dad, you know you'll feel ill if you go on like this,' said Mrs. Philpot, and she got up and went to the old man, who was shaking with fury. 'You belong to old times, and you don't like the new times, and I don't blame you. But things change, you know. Calm yourself, and come with me and have a lie-down.'

Surprisingly, the old fellow allowed Mrs. Philpot to lead him out of the room. The seven children had all sat silent while the shouting had been going on. Mr. Philpot, looking worried, broke his habitual silence and addressed a few words to the equally worried-looking Mr. Henning.

'Storm in a tea-cup,' he said. 'Soon blow over.'

'Hmmm,' said Mr. Henning. 'Spoilt my dinner! Selfish, ignorant, rude old man.'

'He's not,' said one of the twins, in a voice trembling with anger. 'He's...'

'Enough, Harry!' said his father, in such a stern voice, that Harry subsided at once, but began to grind his teeth, to show that he was still angry, making a most remarkable noise at the now silent table. Junior had sat as still as a mouse all the time, scared of the angry old man. Timmy had given a few small growls, and Snippet had shot straight out of the kitchen as soon as Great-Grand-dad had begun to shout!

Mrs. Philpot came back, and sat down, looking sad and tired. Julian began to talk to her about Janie and the macaroons, and soon succeeded in making her smile. She even laughed out loud when George told her that they had six macaroons to give Bill for taking them out in the Land-Rover.

'I know those macaroons,' announced Junior. 'I buy about thirty a week. They're just wunnerful!'

'Thirty! No wonder you're so pasty-faced, then,' said George, before she could stop herself.

'Aw shucks! Pasty-face yourself!' retorted Junior, feeling safe with his father near him.

He heard a sudden ominous growl under the table, felt hot breath on his bare leg, and decided to say no more. He had forgotten all about the watchful Timmy!

Julian thought it was about time to have some bright conversation, and began to tell Mrs. Philpot about the hen-houses and what a good job they were making of patching them to make them rain-proof. Mr. Philpot listened too, nodded, and actually joined in.

'Yes - you're good with your hands, you boys. I had a look when I came by. Fine work!'

'Harriet's good, too,' said Harry at once. 'She did that corner where the rats get in. Didn't you, Harry?'

'I wanted to help, Pop, but they shooed me off, like I was a hen!' said Junior in an aggrieved tone.

'Seems as if they don't want me around. That makes it pretty lonely, Pop. Can't I come out with you this afternoon?'

'No,' said Pop, shortly.

'Aw, c'mon, Pop,' said Junior, in a whiny voice. 'Aw shucks, Pop, lemme come!'

'NO!' said Pop, exasperated. Timmy gave a growl again. He didn't like cross voices. He couldn't imagine why there was so much quarrelling here, and sat up, tense and still, until George gave him a gentle push with her toe. Then he lay down again, his head across her feet.

Everyone was glad when the meal was over, delicious though the food had been. The girls and Harriet insisted that Mrs. Philpot should go and have a rest while they did all the clearing-away and washing-up. 'Now try not to be unkind to Junior this afternoon,' she said, as she went. 'He'll be all alone when his father's gone. Do let him be with you.'

Nobody answered. They hadn't the least intention of allowing Junior to be with them. 'Spoilt, bad-mannered little idiot!' thought George, clearing away with such vigour that she almost knocked Anne over.

'Julian,' she said in a low voice, catching him at the door as he went out, 'Anne and I have something interesting to tell you. Where will you be this afternoon?'

'Up in the hen-houses, I expect,' said Julian. 'We'll watch out for you and Anne. See you in about half an hour.'

Junior had sharp ears. He heard exactly what George had said, and he was full of curiosity at once. What was this interesting thing George wanted to tell the boys? Was it a secret? All right - he'd be on hand somewhere to hear it!

And so, when the girls had finished their work, and set off to the hen-houses, Junior followed discreetly behind! He kept well out of sight until he saw George and Anne disappear into a hen-house, where the others were working - and then he crept to a corner outside and put his ear to a knot-hole in the wood. I'll get my own back now! he thought. I'll make them smart for leaving me out of things! Just see if I don't!

Chapter 11

A MOST EXCITING TALK

The boys were busy hammering and sawing and the girls sat and waited till the noise died down. Snippet was there, leaping about ridiculously with little bits of wood in his mouth, and Nosey the jackdaw had suddenly taken a fancy to the shavings that now covered the floor, and ran about chacking, and picking them up.

Outside the hens clucked and squawked, and not far off the ducks quacked loudly. 'Those are the kind of noises I like to hear,' said Anne, settling herself on a sack in a corner. She raised her voice and shouted above the hammering to Dick. 'WANT ANY HELP, DICK?'

'No thanks,' said Dick. 'We'll just finish this job, then sit down and have a rest, and listen to what you have to say. You sit and watch our wonderful carpentering! Honestly, I'd make pounds a week if I took it up!'

'Look out - Nosey has got your nails again!' shouted George. Timmy leapt up as if he was going to chase Nosey, and the jackdaw promptly flew up to a crossbeam, and sat there chacking with laughter. Timmy thought him a very exasperating bird indeed. He lay down again with a thump. At last the boys had finished the job they were on, and sat down, rubbing their hands over their wet foreheads. 'Well, now you can tell us your news,' said Dick. 'Good thing we got rid of that little pest of a Junior - I might have hammered a few nails into him by mistake if he'd come worrying us this afternoon.' He imitated Junior's whining drawl. 'Aw, shucks, Pop, lemme come with yew!'

Outside, his ear to the hole, Junior clenched his fists. He would willingly have stuck a few nails into Dick at that moment!

George and Anne began to tell the four listening children what old Mr. Finniston had told them that morning. 'It's about Finniston Castle,' said Anne. 'The old castle that gave the village its name - and the farm as well. The old fellow who told us about it is called Finniston, too - and will you believe it, he's a descendant of the Finnistons who lived in the castle centuries ago!'

'He seems to have spent most of his life trying to discover everything possible about the old castle,' said George. 'He said he'd delved into old libraries - and into the church records here - anywhere that might help him to piece together the castle's history!'

Outside the hen-house, Junior held his breath so as not to miss a single word. Why - his Pop had told him that he couldn't get anything out of that old Mr. Finniston at the antique shop - not a word about the castle, and its history, or even where the site was. Then why had he told Anne, and that horrible boy George? Junior felt angry, and listened even more keenly.

'The story goes that in the twelfth century enemies came to attack the castle one night - and there were traitors already inside it, who set it on fire, so that the castle-folk would be busy trying to put out the fire, and wouldn't be prepared for a fight,' said George. 'The inside of it was burnt right down to the ground - and then the great stone walls outside collapsed inwards, and lay in enormous heaps there, covering the place where the castle had stood.'

'Whew!' said Dick, visualizing it all. 'What a night that must have been! Everybody killed or burnt, I suppose?'

'No, the Lady of the castle wasn't killed and it is said that she took her children to the little chapel near the farm-house - we really must go and see that, twins - and they stayed there in safety.'

Anyway, some of the family must have escaped, because it is one of their descendants who keeps that little antique shop - old Mr. Finniston!

'This is tremendously interesting,' said Julian. 'Where's the site of the castle? It should easily be known, because of the great mass of stones that fell there when the walls collapsed.'

'No, they're not there now,' said George. 'Mr. Finniston said he thought that when the wind and weather had broken them up small enough to be lugged away by the farmers and peasants living near by, they were taken to build field walls, or to line wells. He said there were some on this farm. He didn't know himself where the castle once stood, because the site would be all grown over, and with no stones left to mark it, it wouldn't be easy to find.'

'But oh, Julian, I wish we could find it!' cried Anne, her voice rising in excitement. 'Because, so Mr. Finniston says, the cellars and dungeons are probably still there, quite untouched. You see, no one could uncover them for years, because of the heavy stones there - and when the stones were taken away, people had forgotten about the castle and the dungeons!'

'Gosh! So they may still be there - with whatever was stored in them hundreds of years ago,' said Dick, thrilled. 'My word - there might be priceless things there, as old as the hills! I mean, even an old broken sword would be worth its weight in gold, because it would be so very very old. I say - don't say a word of all this in front of that American, or he'd dig up the whole farm!'

'We shouldn't DREAM of it,' said George. 'He shan't get to hear a word of this.'

Alas! George little knew that every single word had been overheard by Junior, whose left ear was still pinned to the knot-hole in the wood! His face was red with surprise and delight. WHAT a secret! Whatever would his Pop say? Dungeons! Perhaps full of gold and jewels and all kinds of things! He rubbed his hands together in delight, thinking that he would soon get even with these annoying children now - as soon as his Pop came home, he'd spill everything to him.

GEE!

Timmy heard the small sound of Junior rubbing his hands together, and sat up, growling, his ears pricked. Snippet growled too, a miniature little sound that nobody took seriously. Timmy then heard Junior creeping away, afraid because he had heard the big dog growling. Timmy growled again, and then barked sharply, running to the shut door of the hen-house, scraping at it with his foot.

'Somebody's outside - quick! If it's Junior, I'll throw him on to the muck-heap!' yelled Dick, and flung open the door. They all trooped out and looked round - but there was nobody there! Junior had shot off at top speed, and was now safely behind the nearest hedge.

'What was it, Tim?' said George. She turned to the others. 'He may have heard those hens scratching near the door,' she said. 'There's no one about. Gosh, I was so afraid that it was that little sneak of a Junior! He'd tell his Pop every single thing!'

'Twins, listen - Mr. Finniston told us that one of the things that was saved from the castle - or found afterwards, perhaps - was a great old oak door, iron-studded,' said Anne, suddenly remembering. 'Is that one of your kitchen doors?'

'Yes - that must be the door leading into the dark little passage,' said Harry. 'You wouldn't have noticed it particularly, because it's usually kept open, and it's very dark just there. Gosh, I suppose it could have come from the castle. It's enormously thick and strong. I wonder if Dad knows.'

'We'll tell him,' said Harriet. 'I say - shall we go and look for the site of the castle sometime? If only we could find it! Do you suppose that if we found the cellars and dungeons, full of chests and things, they'd belong to us? The farm belongs to our family, of course, and all the land round.'

'Does it? Well then, of course anything found on this land would be yours!' said Julian.

'We might be able to buy a new tractor!' said the twins, both together, in the same excited voice.

'Let's go and look for the castle-site now,' said George, her voice sounding so excited that Timmy sat up and barked.

'No. We must finish this job,' said Julian. 'We promised we would. There's plenty of time to hunt around, because nobody knows about this except us.'

Julian was wrong, of course. Junior knew - and Junior meant to tell the whole secret to his father as soon as ever he could! He could hardly wait for him to come home.

'Well, we'd better be getting back to the house,' said George. 'We told Mrs. Philpot we'd pick some raspberries for supper tonight, so we'd better fetch baskets, and begin. Oh, I do HOPE we find that castle-site. I shall dream about it tonight, I know I shall.'

'Well, try and dream where it is,' said Julian, with a laugh. 'Then you can lead us straight to it tomorrow morning. I suppose you haven't any idea where it might be, have you, twins?'

'No,' they said together, frowning. 'No idea at all!' And Harriet added, 'You see, the farm's so big - and I suppose it might have been built anywhere on our land.'

'Yes - but probably near the top of a hill,' said Julian. 'Castles used to overlook surrounding land, you know, so that approaching enemies could easily be seen. And then again, George said Mr. Finniston told them that the Lady of the castle escaped with her children and took them in safety to the chapel, which wouldn't be very far away. I should guess that the castle-site must be not further than a quarter of a mile from the chapel, so that narrows the search down a bit. By the way, we really must look at that chapel - it sounds interesting, even though it has been used as a store-house for years!'

The girls picked raspberries for the rest of the afternoon, and the boys finished their jobs. They went back to the farm-house for tea, feeling pleasantly tired. The girls were already there, laying the table. They pounced on the twins, and George spoke excitedly.

'Twins! We've been looking at the old studded door. It's MAGNIFICENT! Come and see it, Julian and Dick. If it isn't from the old castle, I'll eat my hat - and my shoes as well!'

She took them to the great door that opened from the kitchen into the passage that led to the yard. With much difficulty she swung it shut. They all gazed at it. It had been almost too heavy for George to move! It was very stout and strong, made of old, old oak. Great iron studs had been driven into it so deeply and firmly that only by destroying the door itself could they ever be removed. There was a curious iron handle in the middle of the outer side, and George raised it and brought it down smartly. A loud bang resounded through the kitchen, and made the others jump.

'The knocker that visitors used when they came to the castle, I suppose!' said George, laughing at their surprised faces. 'Noise enough to rouse everyone, and alert any guard at once. Do you suppose it was the front door of the castle - it's big enough! It must be worth hundreds of pounds!'

'Look out - there's Junior!' said Anne, in a low voice. 'He's grinning all over his face. What do you suppose he's been up to? I wish I knew!'

Chapter 12

REALLY VERY THRILLING

At teatime Julian spoke to Mrs. Philpot about the old kitchen door. 'That's a fine old door,' he said. 'Did it come from the castle, do you suppose?'

'Yes - so it's said,' answered Mrs. Philpot. 'Great-Grand-dad here knows more about it than I do, though.'

Great-Grand-dad was not at the table. He was sitting in his enormous old chair in the window with Snippet at his feet. He was pulling contentedly at his pipe, a cup of tea on the window-sill beside him.

'What's that?' called the old man. 'Speak up!' Julian repeated what Mrs. Philpot had said, and the old fellow nodded.

'Oh ay! That door's from the castle all right. Made of the same oak as the beams in the barns, and the floors of the bedrooms above! Ay, and that American fellow's been at me about it, too! Ho! Offered me fifty pounds for it. FIFTY POUNDS! I wouldn't take a thousand. What - have that old door hanging in some newfangled house out in that American country, wherever it is? NO. I say NO, and I'll say it till I'm blue in the face!'

'All right, Grand-dad - don't upset yourself,' said Mrs. Philpot. She spoke to Julian in a low voice. 'Change the subject, quickly, or Grand-dad will go on and on, poor old fellow!'

Julian racked his brain for a change of subject, and fortunately remembered the hen-houses. He at once began to tell Great-Grand-dad all they had done that afternoon, and the old fellow calmed down at once, and listened with pleasure. Snippet, who had run in fright to the twins as soon as Great-Grand-dad had begun to shout, ran back to him, and settled on his feet. Timmy also decided to join them, and soon Great-Grand-dad was completely happy again, drawing on his old pipe, with one dog at his feet, the other resting a great head on his knee. Timmy certainly did love Great-Grand-dad!

Mr. Henning did not come back that night, much to everyone's relief, but arrived next day just before lunch, bringing with him a dried-up little fellow wearing thick glasses, whom he introduced as Mr. Richard Durlleston.

'The great Mr. Durlleston!' he said proudly. 'Knows more about old houses in England than anyone else in the country. I'd like him to see that old door after lunch, Mrs. Philpot - and that queer opening in the wall of the bedroom upstairs, which was used to heat embers and bricks for warming beds years ago.'

Fortunately Great-Grand-dad was not there to object, and after they had had dinner, Mrs. Philpot took Mr. Durleston to the old studded door. 'Ah yes,' he said. 'Quite genuine. Very fine specimen. I should offer two hundred pounds, Mr. Henning.'

How Mrs. Philpot longed to accept such an offer! What a difference it would make to her housekeeping! She shook her head. 'You'd have to talk to old Great-Grand-dad,' she said. 'But I'm afraid he'll say no. Now I'll take you to see the queer old opening up in one of the bedrooms.' She took Mr. Henning and Mr. Durleston upstairs, and the four followed, with Timmy. It was indeed a strange opening in the wall! It had a wrought-iron door rather like an old oven door. Mrs. Philpot opened it. Inside was a big cavity, which had obviously been used as a kind of oven to heat bricks for placing into cold beds; some of the old bricks were actually still there, blackened with long-ago heating! Mrs. Philpot took out what looked like a heavy iron tray with an ornamented raised edge. On it were old, old embers!

'This tray was used for heating and holding the embers before they were put into warming-pans,' she said. 'We still have one old warming-pan left - there on the wall, look.'

The four, just as interested as the two men, looked at the copper warming-pan, glowing red-gold on the wall. 'The red-hot embers were emptied into that,' Mrs. Philpot told the children, 'and then the pan was carried by its long handle into all the bedrooms, and thrust into each bed for a few minutes to warm it. And that funny little opening in the wall is, as I said, where people years and years ago heated the embers - and the bricks too, which were wrapped in flannel and left in each bed.'

'Hmmmmm. Very interesting. Quite rare to see one in such a well-preserved state,' said Mr. Durleston, peering into the opening through thick glasses. 'You could make an offer for this too, Mr. Henning. Interesting old place. We'll have a look at the barns too, I think, and the outbuildings. Might be a few things there you could pick up with advantage.'

George thought it was a good thing the twins were not with them to hear all this. They seemed to share with their Great-Grand-dad a hatred of parting with any of the treasures belonging to the old farm-house!

Mrs. Philpot took the two men downstairs again, and the four followed.

'I'll just take Mr. Durlleston to the old chapel, mam,' said Mr. Henning, and Mrs. Philpot nodded. She left them and hurried back into the kitchen, where she had a cake baking. The four looked at one another, and Julian nodded his head towards the two men, now making their way out of doors. 'Shall we go too?' he said. 'We haven't seen this chapel yet, either!'

So they followed the two men, and soon came to a tall, quaint old building with small and beautiful arched windows set high up in the walls. They went in at the door, a few paces behind the two men, and stared in wonder.

'Yes - you can see it was once a chapel!' said Julian, speaking instinctively in a low voice. 'Those lovely old windows - that arch there...'

'And the feel of it!' said Anne. 'I know now what old Mr. Finniston down at that little shop meant, when he said that though it was now a store-house, it was still full of prayer! You can feel that people have been here to pray, can't you? What a lovely little chapel. Oh, I do wish it wasn't used as a store-house!'

'I was told by an old fellow down in the village antique shop that a Lady Phillippa, who was once the Lady of the castle, brought each of her fifteen children here to learn their prayers,' said Mr. Durlleston, surprisingly. 'Hmm, hmm - nice old story. Probably true. Chapels were often built near to castles. Wonder which path they took from the castle to the chapel. All gone now, no castle, nothing! Hmm, hmm.'

'I'd like to buy this chapel, knock it down, and take it stone by stone to my place in the States,' said the American enthusiastically. 'Fine specimen, isn't it? It would look wunnerful in my place.' 'Can't advise that,' said Mr. Durlleston, shaking his head. 'Not in good taste. Let's go to those out-buildings yonder. Might see something in the old junk there.'

They went off, and the children stayed behind, entranced with the little chapel. Sacks upon sacks of grain and what looked like fertilizer were arranged in rows all over the floor. A cat had three kittens cuddled together on one sack, and a dove cooed somewhere high up in the arched roof. It was a very peaceful sound, somehow just right for the silent little place. The children trooped out quietly, not feeling inclined to follow the brash Mr. Henning round any more.

'At least the other man stopped him from his mad idea of removing the chapel stone by stone,' said Anne. 'I couldn't bear that beautiful old place to be torn up by its roots and replanted somewhere else.'

'You sound quite angry, Anne - almost as fierce as old Great-Grand-dad!' said Julian, slipping his arm through his sister's. 'I don't somehow think the old chapel will be sold to Mr. Henning - even if he offered a million dollars for it!'

'Well, I like most Americans very much,' said Anne. 'But not Mr. Henning. He - he wants to buy history just as if it were chocolate or toffee!'

That made the others laugh. 'I say!' said Julian, 'what about having a snoop round, now we're out, and just see if we can decide where to hunt for the site of the castle? I presume we all agree that it can't be very far away from the chapel?'

'Yes - that's agreed,' said Dick. 'And it's also agreed that the site is probably on a hill. The snag is that there are rather a lot of hills on this undulating farmland!'

'Let's make our way over there - up the nearest slope,' said George. 'Hallo, here are the twins. We'll call them. They might like to come.'

The twins soon joined them, and said yes, they would certainly like to hunt for the castle-site.

'But it might take years!' said Harry. 'It might be anywhere on the farm!'

'Well, we plan to examine this first slope,' said Julian. 'Heel, Tim, heel, Snippet. Oh gosh, here's Nosey the jackdaw too. NOT on my shoulder, if you don't mind, Nosey. I rather value my ears!'

'Chack!' said the jackdaw, and flew to the twins.

They made their way up the slope. There was, however, absolutely nothing to be seen except grass, grass, grass! They came to a big mound and stood looking at it.

'A very large mole must have made that!' said Dick, which made them all laugh, for the mound was as high as their shoulders. Rabbit-holes could be seen at the bottom, though it was probable that very few burrowed there now - the great rabbit-disease, myxomatosis had wiped them practically out of existence on Finniston Farm.

Timmy couldn't see a rabbit-hole without scraping at it, and soon he and Snippet were scattering earth over everyone. Snippet was small enough to disappear into one hole, and came out carrying - of all things - an oyster shell! Julian took it out of his mouth in amazement.

'Look here - an oyster shell - and we're miles from the sea. How did it get there? Go in again, Snippet. Scrape hard, Timmy. Buck up! An idea is glimmering in my brain!'

Before long, what with Timmy's excited scraping and Snippet's explorations deep into the burrow, quite a collection of oyster shells, and small and large bones, lay on the grass!

'Bones!' said Anne. 'Not bones of people surely! Don't tell me this is a mound covering an old grave or something, Ju.'

'No. But it is something rather exciting!' said Julian. 'I'm pretty sure it's an old kitchen-midden.'

'A kitchen-midden? What on earth's that?' said George. 'Oh look - Timmy's got another mouthful of oyster shells!'

'A kitchen-midden is what you might call the rubbish-heap of the old days,' explained Julian, picking up some oyster shells. 'It was often very big, when it comprised the rubbish thrown out from large houses - or castles! Things like bones and shells wouldn't rot away like other rubbish - and I do believe we've found the kitchen-midden of the old castle. My word - what a find! Now we know something very important!'

'What?' asked everyone, in excitement.

'Well - we know now that the site of the castle must be somewhere on this slope!' said Julian. 'The kitchen-midden was probably not far from its walls. We're on the scent, scouts, we're on the scent! Come on - let's go further on. Spread out. Examine every inch of the ground!'

Chapter 13

JUNIOR SPRINGS A SURPRISE!

The six children felt a sudden upsurge of excitement, and Timmy felt it too and barked loudly. Snippet joined in, and the jackdaw danced up and down on Harry's shoulder, chacking hoarsely. Junior, who had seen them start out and was tracking them, stared in surprise from behind a bush in a nearby hedge. NOW what was all the excitement about? What had Timmy and Snippet found?

He saw the six children spread out and begin to go slowly up the great slope of the hill. Timmy followed them, rather puzzled. He wished he knew what they were looking for - then he could hunt too! Junior kept safely behind the bush. He knew that if he followed too closely after the children, Timmy would hear him, and bark.

Suddenly the Harries gave a shout. 'Hey!' The others looked up from their search, and saw them beckoning in excitement. 'What about THIS? Come and look!'

Everyone hurried over to the twins, who were standing on a little ridge about two hundred yards below the top of the gently sloping hill. 'Look!' said Harry, sweeping his arm in a circle. 'Would this be a likely place for the castle-site?'

The four looked at the great shallow depression that the twins pointed to. In shape it was like a very shallow soup-plate, certainly big enough for a castle to have been built there! It was covered with thick, closely-growing grass, which was a little darker in colour than the grass around.

Julian clapped Harry on the shoulder. 'Yes! I bet this is where the castle once stood! Why should the ground here suddenly have this great depression in it, as if it had sunk down, for some reason? The only reason could be that some enormously heavy building once stood here - and it must have been the castle!'

'It's not too far from the kitchen-midden, where they threw their rubbish, is it?' asked Anne, anxiously, looking back to see how far away that was.

'No - just about right,' said Julian. 'They would be sure to have it some distance away, because it would smell, especially in the hot weather. Yes, twins - I think you really have hit on the castle-site - and I bet if we had the machinery to excavate here, we'd come across dungeons, cellars, underground passages - and all they contain!'

The twins went red with excitement, and stared solemnly at the great basin-like circle, green with grass. 'What will our mother say?' they said, both together.

'Plenty!' said Dick. 'This might be the saving of your farm! But look - let's not say a word about it yet, in case it gets round to Mr. Henning. Let's get Bill and ask him if he'll lend us spades and things. We'll tell him we've found some interesting old shells and bones on the hill and want to do a little digging. We'll soon know if this really is the site of the castle.'

'Good idea,' said Julian, excited at the thought of being one of the first to dig down into the old dungeons! 'Let's pace round this old site and see how big it is.'

They walked round and round it and decided it was more than big enough for even a large castle. They thought it was strange that the grass should be a different colour there.

'But it does sometimes happen that grass marks out where old buildings once stood,' said Julian. 'I say - this is just about the most exciting thing that ever happened to us - and I'm so glad it was the twins who first recognized the site! After all, it's on their farm!'

'Isn't that Junior, running over there?' said George suddenly, as she saw Timmy prick up his ears, and turn his nose to the wind. 'Yes, it is. He's been spying on us, the little beast! There he goes, look!'

'Well, he can't know much,' said Julian, gazing after the running figure. 'I don't expect he even knows that a castle was once built here, at the top of this hill - and he certainly wouldn't know we were looking for the site. He's just snooping, that's all.'

But Junior did know all about the old castle, for he had overheard the children talking in the hen-house! And he did know what they had been looking for! He had followed them as closely as he dared, listening to their shouts - and now he felt that he must get back to his father and tell him what he knew!

He found his father still with Mr. Durleston, examining an old fireplace. 'Now that's worth buying,' Mr. Durleston was saying. 'You could rip that out, and use it in your own house - a beautiful thing! Very old! And...'

'Pop! I say, Pop! Listen!' cried Junior, bursting in. Mr. Durleston looked annoyed. That boy again! But Junior took no notice of the old man's annoyance, and pulled urgently at his father's arm. 'Dad! I know where the place is that the castle once stood on! And there's dungeons and cellars underneath, full of treasure, I know there are. Pop, those kids found the place, but they don't know I saw them!'

'What is all this, Junior?' said his father, half-annoyed too. 'Silly talk! You don't know anything about castle-sites and dungeons and the rest!'

'I do, I do! I heard them all talking in the hen-house - I told you I did!' cried Junior, tugging at his father's sleeve again. 'Pop, they've found an old rubbish-heap too, that belonged to the castle - they called it a - a - let me see now - a...'

'A midden?' asked Mr. Durleston, suddenly taking an interest.

'Yes! That's it. A kitchen-midden!' said Junior triumphantly. 'With bones and shells. And then they looked for where the old castle might have been built - they said it couldn't have been far away, and...'

'Well, they were right,' said Mr. Durleston. 'A kitchen-midden would certainly pin-point the castle area! Mr. Henning, this is extremely interesting. If you could get permission to excavate, it would be a...'

'Oh BOY!' said Mr. Henning, interrupting, his eyes almost starting out of his head. 'Can't you see the papers - 'American discovers old castle-site - unknown for centuries! Excavates dungeons - find bones of long-ago prisoners - chests of gold coins...'

'Not so fast, not so fast,' said Mr. Durlleston, disapprovingly. 'There may be nothing at all there. Let us not count our chickens before they're hatched. And mind - not a word to the newspapers, Henning. We don't want a crowd of people rushing to pry over the farm, sending up its price!'

'I didn't think of that,' said Mr. Henning, a little cast-down. 'All right - we'll go carefully. What do you advise?'

'I should advise you to approach Mr. Philpot - not the old Great-Grand-dad, but the farmer himself - and offer to put down, say, £250 for the right to excavate up on the hill there,' said Mr. Durlleston. 'Then if you strike anything interesting, you can offer a further sum for whatever's down there - say another £250. If there is anything there, it will be extremely valuable - so very, very old. Hmmm. Hmmm. Yes, that is my advice to you.'

'And it sounds pretty good to me,' said Mr. Henning, excitement flooding him again. 'You'll stay here and advise me, won't you, Durlleston?'

'Certainly, certainly, if you are prepared to pay my fee,' said Mr. Durlleston. 'I think it would perhaps be advisable if I approached Mr. Philpot, Mr. Henning, not you. You might - er - well - give something away in your excitement. You will come with me, of course - but let me do the talking.'

'Right, old man, you do everything!' said Mr. Henning, feeling friendly with the whole world. He clapped the listening Junior on the back. 'Well done, son! You may have let us into something good. Now don't you breathe a word to ANYONE, see?'

'Aw shucks!' said Junior. 'What do you think I am? My mouth's sewn up from now on! Think I'd split, Pop, when there's a chance of getting even with those snooty kids? You go on up that hill when they've gone, and have a look yourself. Mr. Durlleston will know if it's the real thing or not!'

So, when the six children and dogs were safely out of sight, gone to help with various jobs of work on the farm, Mr. Henning and Mr. Durlleston went with Junior to see the kitchen-midden and the supposed site of the old castle. Mr. Henning became very excited indeed, and even the weary-looking Mr. Durlleston brightened up and nodded his head several times.

'Looks the real thing!' he said. 'Yes, we'll get going this evening - after that fierce old fellow - the old Great-Grand-dad - has gone to bed. He might put a spoke in our wheels. He's as old as the hills, but as cute as a jackdaw!'

And so, that evening, when Great-Grand-dad was safely in bed, Mr. Henning and Mr. Durleston had a private, very private talk with Mr. and Mrs. Philpot together. The farmer and his wife listened, amazed. When they heard that Mr. Henning proposed to hand them a cheque for £250 merely for the right to do a little digging, Mrs. Philpot almost cried!

'And I have advised Mr. Henning that he should offer you further sums, if he finds anything he would like to take back to the States with him, as - er - as mementos of a very pleasant stay here,' finished Mr. Durleston.

'It sounds too good to be true,' said Mrs. Philpot. 'We could certainly do with the money, couldn't we, Trevor?'

Mr. Henning took out his cheque book and produced his fountain-pen, before Mr. Philpot could say anything else. He wrote out the sum of £250, and signed the cheque with a flourish. He then presented it to Mr. Philpot.

'And I hope there'll be more cheques to come,' he said. 'Thank you, sir - I'll get men along tomorrow to start digging.'

'I'll have a formal agreement drawn up,' put in Mr. Durleston, thinking that he saw a rather doubtful look coming over Mr. Philpot's face, as he took the cheque. 'But you can cash the cheque straight away. Well, we'll leave you to talk over it!'

When the twins and the four heard of this, the next morning, they were astounded. Mrs. Philpot told the twins first, and Harry and Harriet ran at once to find the others. They listened, amazed and angry.

'How did they know all that? How did they guess where to find the castle-site?' said Dick, fiercely. 'I bet it's that snoopy little Junior who put them on to this! I bet he spied on us! I thought I saw two people up on that hill after tea yesterday. It must have been Mr. Henning and that friend of his - with Junior. Gosh, I could pull that kid's hair out!'

'Well, I suppose there's absolutely nothing we can do now!' said George, angrily. 'The next thing we'll see is lorries rolling up with men inside, and spades and drills and goodness knows what!'

She was quite right! That very morning the hill became quite a busy place! Four men had already been hired by Mr. Henning, and they all went up the hill in their lorry, bumping slowly along, past the kitchen-midden mound, and on up to the shallow basin-like depression near the summit of the hill. Spades, forks and drills rattled in the lorry. Junior was mad with joy, and danced about at a safe distance, yelling defiance at the six children.

'You thought I didn't know anything, didn't you! I heard everything! Serves you right! Yah!'

'Timmy - chase him!' ordered George, in a furious voice. 'But don't hurt him, mind. Go on!'

And off went Timmy at a gallop, and if Junior hadn't leapt into the lorry and picked up a spade, Timmy would certainly have rolled him over and over on the ground!

Now what was to be done? The children almost gave up - but not quite! There might be something they could do - there might! Why was Julian suddenly looking so excited?

Chapter 14

SNIPPET AND NOSEY ARE VERY HELPFUL!

'LISTEN!' said Julian, lowering his voice, and looking all about to make sure that no one was near. 'Do you remember what you told us, George, about a secret passage from the castle to the old chapel?'

'Yes! Yes! I do!' said George, and Anne nodded, her eyes bright. 'You mean the story that old Mr. Finniston told us, down at the little antique shop, about the Lady of the castle taking her children in safety from the burning castle, by way of an underground passage to the old chapel? Gosh, I'd forgotten that!'

'Oh, Julian! Yes, George is right!' said Anne. 'Are you thinking that the passage might still be there, hidden underground?'

'What I think is this,' said Julian. 'If the Lady and her children escaped underground, they must first have fled down into the cellars of the castle - and so the passage or tunnel must have started from there. They couldn't have escaped in any other way because the castle was itself surrounded by enemies. So she must have gone with her children to hide in the cellars - and then, when the castle fell, she took them safely down the secret passage that led to the old chapel. So that means...'

'That means that if we can find the secret passage, we can get into the cellars ourselves - perhaps before the workmen do!' cried George, almost shouting with excitement.

'Exactly,' said Julian, his eyes shining. 'Now don't let's lose our heads and get too excited. Let's talk about it quietly - and for GOODNESS' sake keep a watch for Junior.'

'Timmy - on guard!' said George, and Timmy at once went some paces away, and stood up straight, looking now in this direction, and now in that. Nobody could come within sight now, without Timmy giving a warning bark!

The children settled down beside a hedge. 'What's the plan?' asked Dick.

'I vote we go to the old chapel, take a line from there to the castle-site, and walk slowly up that line,' said Julian. 'We might possibly see something that would guide us as to where the secret passage is. I don't know what - maybe the grass might be slightly different in colour - a bit darker than the surrounding grass, just as it was on the castle-site. Anyway, it's worth trying. If we do see a line of darker grass, or something like that, we'll dig down underground ourselves, hoping the secret passage is underneath!'

'Oh Ju! What a wonderful idea!' said Anne. 'Come on, let's go down to the chapel straight away!' So off they all went, Timmy, Snippet and Nosey the jackdaw too. He loved being with Snippet, though he teased him unmercifully. They arrived quickly at the chapel door and went in. 'I always feel as if there ought to be an organ playing when I'm inside,' said Anne, looking round the stacked sacks of grain.

'Never mind about organs,' said Julian, standing at the open door, and pointing up the hill. 'Now see - there's the place where the old castle stood - where the men are already at work - and if we take a fairly straight line to it, we should be more or less walking over the old passage. I should think the men who made it would drive as straight a tunnel as they could, to save themselves work. A grinding one would take a long time.'

'I can't see that the grass is any different in colour, along the line I'm looking,' said Dick, squinting, and everyone agreed, very disappointed.

'So there's nothing to help us!' said George, mournfully. 'All we can do is to walk in a straight line up the hill, and hope to find something that will tell us if we're over a tunnel. Hollow-sounding footsteps, perhaps!'

'That's very doubtful, I'm afraid,' said Julian. 'Still, I can't see that we can do anything else. Come on, then. All right, Tim, you can come back to us. Look at Nosey, on Snippet's back again! That's right, Snippet, roll over and get him off!'

'Chack!' said Nosey, crossly, as he flew up in the air. 'Chack!'

The six children walked up the slope in as straight a line as they could. They came right up to where the men were digging, without having seen or heard anything of any help at all. It was most disappointing. Junior saw them, and yelled loudly.

'Children not allowed here! Keep off! My Dad's bought this place!'

'Fibber!' shouted back the two Harries at once. 'You've got the right to dig and that's all!'

'Yah!' yelled Junior. 'You wait! Now don't you set that great dog on me again! I'll tell my Pop, see?'

Timmy barked loudly, and Junior disappeared in a hurry. George laughed. 'Silly little fathead! Why doesn't somebody box his ears? I bet one of the men will before he's many hours older. Look at him trying to use that drill!'

Junior was certainly not at all popular. He made himself a great nuisance, and in the end his father put him roughly into a lorry and told him to stay there. He howled dismally, but as no one paid any attention, he soon stopped!

The six children went slowly back down the gentle slope of the hill, taking a slightly different line, still hopeful. The jackdaw flew down to Harry's shoulder, chacking loudly, bored with all this walking! He suddenly saw Snippet sitting down to scratch his neck, and at once launched himself at him. He knew that the poodle always shut his eyes when he scratched himself, and that that was a very good time to give him a well-placed peck!

But unfortunately for Nosey the poodle opened his eyes too soon, and saw the jackdaw just about to perch on him! He snapped at him - and got him by the wing! 'Chack-chack-CHACK!' cried the jackdaw, urgently calling for help. 'CHACK!'

Harry ran to Snippet, shouting, 'Drop him, Snippet, drop him! You'll break his wing!' Before he could reach the pair, the jackdaw managed to free himself by giving Snippet a sudden peck on his nose, which made him bark in pain. As soon as he opened his mouth to bark, the jackdaw dropped on the ground, and scuttled away, his wing drooping, unable to fly.

The poodle was after him in a second! The twins yelled in vain. He meant to catch that exasperating jackdaw if it was the last thing he did! The squawking bird looked anxiously for a hiding-place - and saw one! A rabbit-hole - just the thing to hop down in a trice! In he went with another loud squawk, and disappeared from sight.

'He's gone down that rabbit-hole!' said Dick, with a shout of laughter. 'Clever old bird. You're outwitted, Snippet!'

But no - Snippet wasn't! He disappeared down the hole too! He was as small as a rabbit, and could easily run down a burrow. He had never done more than sniff at one before, being rather scared of dark tunnels - but if Nosey had gone down, well, he would too!

The children stared in surprise. First the jackdaw - now Snippet! The twins bent down by the hole and yelled. 'Come back, Snippet, you idiot! The hill's honeycombed with old warrens - you'll get lost for ever. Come back! Snippet. Snip-Snip-Snip, can you hear us? COME HERE!'

There was silence down the rabbit-hole. No chack, no bark. 'They must have gone deep down,' said Harry, anxiously. 'There's a perfect maze of burrows in this hill. Dad said there used to be thousands of rabbits here at one time. Hey, Snippet - COME HERE!'

'Well, we'd better sit down till they come back,' said Anne, feeling suddenly tired with excitement and with climbing up hill and down.

'Right,' said Julian. 'Anyone got any sweets?'

'I have,' said George, as usual, and took out a rather grimy packet of peppermints. 'Here you are; have one, twins?'

'Thanks,' they said. 'We really ought to be getting back - we've plenty of work to do!'

They sat sucking their peppermints, wondering what in the world the jackdaw and Snippet were up to. At last Timmy pricked up his ears and gave a small bark, looking at the entrance of the burrow as he did so. 'They're coming,' said George. 'Timmy knows!'

Sure enough, Timmy was right. Out came first Snippet, and then Nosey, apparently quite good friends again. Snippet rushed to the twins and flung himself on them as if he hadn't seen them for days. He put something down at their feet. 'What's this you've found?' said Harry, picking it up. 'Some dirty old bone?'

Julian suddenly took it from him, almost snatching it. 'Bone? No - that's not a bone. It's a small carved dagger with a broken handle - old as the hills! SNIPPET! Where did you find it?'

'The jackdaw's got something too!' cried Anne, pointing to him. 'Look - in his beak!'

Harriet caught the jackdaw easily, for he still could not fly. 'It's a ring!' she said. 'With a red stone in it - look!'

All six children gazed at the two strange articles. An old carved knife, black with age - and an old ring, with a stone still set in it! They could have come from only one place! George said what everyone was thinking.

'Snippet and the jackdaw have been to the cellars of the castle! They must have! That burrow must have led straight into the tunnel that goes to the dungeons and the cellars - and they've been there! Oh, Snippet - you clever, clever dog - you've told us JUST what we want to know!'

'George is right!' said Dick, jubilantly. 'We know quite a lot of things now, because of Snippet and Nosey. We know there must be plenty of things still in those castle cellars - and we know that somewhere near the end of this burrow is the secret passage - because that's the only way they could have got into the cellars - by using the passage! The burrow led into the passage! Don't you agree, Julian?'

'Rather!' said Julian, flushed with excitement. 'My word, this is a bit of good luck! Hurrah for Snippet and Nosey. Look, the jackdaw's trying to fly - his wing isn't badly hurt - just bruised, I expect. Good old Nosey - little did he know what his bit of mischief would lead to!'

'What happens now?' said George, her eyes shining. 'Do we dig, too - now that we know where the passage is? It can't be very far - and once we've got down to it, we can easily get into the cellars before that American does!'

WHAT an excitement! Timmy really thought everyone had gone completely mad!

Chapter 15

DIGGING FOR THE SECRET TUNNEL

'How can we get permission to dig?' asked Anne. 'I mean - will we be allowed to?'

'I don't see why not - Mr. Henning has only been given permission to dig in one place,' said Julian. 'I bet we'd get permission to dig just here - it's a pretty good way from the castle-site, anyway.'

'Why shouldn't we just dig and see if anyone stops us?' said George. 'If Mr. Philpot stops us, we could tell him what we're really doing. He'd probably let us, then. But whatever happens, we don't want Mr. Henning to know what we've discovered - or think we've discovered!'

'Well, what shall we say then, if he asks why we're digging?' said Anne.

'Say silly things - joke about it!' said Dick. 'Twins, have you work to do this morning? Can you find us spades, do you think?'

'Yes - you can have our spades, and Dad's old ones, too!' said Harry. 'We wish we could help - but we've tons to do, and we're late already.'

'Oh dear - and I promised that George and I would help in the kitchen!' said Anne. 'And pick peas for dinner and pod them - and get more raspberries! Can you and Dick dig all on your own, Ju?'

'Good heavens, yes!' said Julian. 'It'll be slower with just two of us digging, but we'll soon get deep down, you'll see! Anyway, we could all take turns this afternoon, perhaps, if the twins finish their work.'

'We will! We'll do it at top speed!' said Harry and Harriet together. 'Now we'll get some spades for you.'

They raced off, with Snippet beside them, and the two girls went down the hill more slowly, feeling very thrilled. If only, only they could dig down and find the secret passage from the chapel to the cellars of the old castle! Timmy felt the excitement and wagged his tail happily. He was always happy when George was thrilled about anything.

Harriet soon brought two big spades and two smaller ones to the boys. They were heavy, and she panted as she carried them up the hill.

'Good girl - or is it good boy?' asked Dick, as he took the spades. 'Wait - it's Harriet, isn't it? You've no scar on your hand!'

Harriet grinned and ran off swiftly to join her brother in the farm-work that was their task. Julian gazed after her. 'They're good kids,' he said, as he turned to drive his spade into the earth. 'Worth a hundred Juniors! Funny how some children are made of such good stuff, and others aren't worth a penny. Well, Dick - go to it! This earth is pretty hard. I wish we could borrow one of those machines the men are using up there!'

They dug hard, and were soon very hot indeed. They stripped themselves to their shorts, but were still far too hot. They greeted Anne with joy when she laboured up the slope, carrying a jug of cool lemonade and some buns.

'I say! You've made quite a hole already!' she said. 'How far down do you think the tunnel will be?'

'Well, not too far down, really,' said Dick, taking a long drink of the lemonade. 'This is super, Anne. Thanks awfully. We've dug into the burrow, and we're following it at the moment - hoping it will enter the secret tunnel before we're too tired to dig any more!'

'I say - here comes Junior!' said Anne suddenly, looking up the slope. Sure enough, it was the American boy, feeling quite brave now that neither Timmy nor Snippet were about.

He stopped a little way away and shouted: 'What do you think you're doing, digging in our hill?'

'Go away and lose yourself!' shouted back Dick. 'This isn't your hill! If you can dig, so can we!'

'Copy-cats!' shouted Junior. 'My Pop's laughing his head off about you!'

'Well, tell him to pick it up before it rolls down the hill!' yelled Dick. 'Clear off!'

Junior watched them for a little while, puzzled, and then went off up the hill, presumably to report to his father. Anne laughed and went back to the farmhouse.

'As his Pop doesn't know a thing about the secret passage, he must think we're off our heads, digging here,' said Julian, with a chuckle. 'Well, let him think so. He'll be off his head with rage when he finds out what we're really doing - and he won't know that till we're in the cellars!'

Dick laughed, and wiped his forehead again. 'I wish this burrow would come to an end. And I hope to goodness it does lead into the side of the tunnel. I don't want to have to dig up half the hillside. The ground's so hard and dry.'

'Well, thank goodness it's getting sandy here,' said Julian, driving his spade deeper down. He suddenly gave a cry. 'I say! My spade went right down by itself, then! I believe I've come to the secret passage! The burrow must go right through one side of it!'

He was right! The rabbit-hole ran sideways and down - and into a passage! The boys dug feverishly now, panting, their hair falling over their foreheads, perspiration dripping off their faces.

Soon they had a deep hole, fairly wide - and at the bottom of it a way into the tunnel beneath! They lay down and peered into it. 'It's only about four feet below the surface,' said Dick. 'We might have had to do much more digging than this! Whew, I'm hot!'

'It must be dinner-time,' said Julian. 'I don't really like to leave our hole, now that we've got down to the tunnel. And yet we simply MUST have something to eat. I'm ravenous!'

'So am I. But if we leave the hole unguarded, that pest of a Junior might come along and climb down and find the passage!' said Dick. 'Look - here comes George - with old Tim. I wonder if she'd leave him here to guard the hole.'

George was delighted to hear their news. She gazed down the hole in great excitement. 'How deeply you've dug!' she said. 'No wonder you're hot. My word! - If Mr. Henning knew what you've found, he'd be down here in two shakes of a duck's tail!'

'He certainly would,' said Julian, soberly. 'That's what we're afraid of. Or that snoopy Junior might climb down into the hole, if he came along. He's been here already to see what we're doing.'

'We're scared of going in to dinner, in case one of them comes along and investigates the hole while it's unguarded,' said Dick. 'And we wondered if...'

But George interrupted him, almost as if she knew what he was going to say. 'I'll leave Timmy here on guard, while you come down to dinner,' she said. 'He won't let anyone come within yards of it!'

'Thanks, old thing,' said the boys, gratefully, and went off down the hill with George, leaving Timmy behind. 'On guard, Timmy,' said George. 'On guard. Don't let anyone come near that hole.'

'Woof,' said Timmy, understanding at once, and looking fiercely all round and about him. He lay down with a small growl. Let anyone come near the boys' hole, if they dare!

They did dare - but when they saw Timmy leaping to his feet, the hackles on his neck thick and upright, and heard his deep, continuous growl, Junior and his father thought better of it, and went on down the hill to have dinner at the farm-house. Poor Mr. Durlleston trailed behind them, almost knocked out by the heat of the sun.

'Silly kids,' said Mr. Henning to Junior. 'Thinking it's clever to dig just because we're digging! What do they suppose they'll find down there? Another kitchen-midden?'

Junior sent a stone scudding along towards Timmy - and then fled for his life as the dog came bounding angrily down the slope. Even Mr. Henning hurried. He didn't like Timmy either!

That afternoon the twins, Julian, Dick, George, Anne and Snippet all climbed the hill to the hole where Tim still lay watching for intruders. They brought him two fine bones, and a jug of water. He was very pleased indeed. Snippet danced round, hoping for a bite at a bone, and the jackdaw, his wing apparently quite recovered now, dared to go and peck at the bigger bone, even though Timmy growled warningly!

The twins were thrilled to see the deep hole. 'Can't we go down now?' they said, eagerly, both together.

'Yes - it would be a jolly good time to let ourselves slide into the tunnel,' said Julian. 'All the men working on the castle-site have gone off to have dinner at the little village pub, and haven't yet come back - and the Hennings and Mr. Durlleston are safely at the farmhouse.'

'I'll go first,' said Dick, and lowered himself into the hole. He held on to the grassy edges, and poked hard with his feet, to widen the opening into the tunnel. Then he let himself slide down until his legs were out of the rabbit hole, and dangled through the wall of the tunnel.

'Here we go!' he said, and let himself drop. Whoooooosh! He slid right into a dark, musty tunnel, and landed on soft earth. 'Chuck me down a torch,' he shouted. 'It's pitch-dark in here. Did you remember to bring our torches, George?'

Yes, George had four! 'Look out!' she said. 'Here comes one!' And she dropped it down the hole. She had already switched it on, so Dick saw it coming and caught it neatly. He shone it into the dark place around him.

'Yes! It is a tunnel!' he shouted. 'The secret passage, no doubt about it! I say - isn't this great? Come on down, all of you, let's share in the find together. Let's walk right up to the castle cellars. Come on, everybody! Come on!'

Chapter 16

UP THE TUNNEL AND INTO THE CELLARS!

Dick held up his torch to the hole, so that the others might see their way. One by one they slid into the dark tunnel, too excited for words. Timmy came too, and so did Snippet, but the jackdaw thought better of it, and remained at the enlarged opening of the burrow, chacking loudly.

The children swung their torches to and fro. 'That must be the way down to the old chapel,' said Julian, his torch shining down the dark tunnel. No one could stand upright just there except Timmy, for the roof was low. He sniffed suspiciously here and there, and kept close to George.

'Well - come on!' said Julian, his voice shaking a little with excitement. 'We'll go straight up, and see where the passage ends. My word - I can hardly wait to see what's at the top!'

They made their way slowly up the passage. There had been roof-falls here and there, but not enough to matter. Tree-roots, withered and twining, sometimes caught their feet. 'Funny!' said Harry, in astonishment, 'there aren't any trees growing on the hillside here - why the roots, then?'

'They may be the remains of the roots of long-ago trees that did once grow on the hill,' said Julian, shining his torch up the passage, hoping against hope that there would be no serious obstacle to their journey. 'Hallo - what's this at my feet? Two feathers! Now how in the world did they get here!'

It was a puzzle! The children examined them earnestly by the light of their torches. Feathers - looking quite new too - how did they get there? Was there any other way into the passage - and had the birds found it?

Dick gave a shout of laughter that made everyone jump. 'We're idiots! They're two of the jackdale's feathers - they must have dropped out of his bitten wing when he went down the burrow and up this passage with Snippet after him!'

'Of course! Why on earth didn't I think of that?' said Julian. They went on upwards once more, and then Julian suddenly stopped again. A curious humming noise had come down the dark, low tunnel, a throbbing that seemed to get right inside their heads.

'What's that?' said Anne, in great alarm. 'I don't like it.'

They all stood there, and felt, like Anne, that the noise was indeed inside their heads. They shook them, put their fingers into their ears - but it was no good. The strange throbbing went on and on.

'This is a bit too mysterious for me,' said Anne, scared. 'I don't think I want to go on.'

The noise stopped, and they all felt better at once - but almost immediately it started again. To everyone's surprise, George began to laugh.

'It's all right! It's only those men at work on the castle-site. It's their drills we can hear - throbbing through the hillside, and down this passage right into our ears. They must be back from lunch. Cheer up, everybody!'

They all smiled in relief, though Anne's hands were still shaking a little, as she held up her torch to shine through the black darkness. 'There's not an awful lot of air here,' she said. 'I hope we soon get into the cellars!'

'They can't be far,' said Julian. 'This tunnel goes in a pretty straight line, just as we thought it would. Where it curves it's probable that the long-ago men who made it were forced to burrow round tree-roots that blocked their way. Anyway, as we can hear the drills so loudly now, we can't be far from the castle-site.'

They were nearer than they thought! Julian's torch suddenly shone on the remains of a great door, lying on the ground before him - the door that once shut off the cellars from the passage! The tunnel ceased just there, and the torches shone on a vast underground place, silent, full of shadows.

'We're there!' said Julian, in a whisper that went scurrying round in the darkness and came back as a strange echo that said 'there-there-there-there-there.'

'That fallen door must have been the one made all those years gone by!' said Anne, in awe. She touched a corner of it with her foot, and the wood crumpled into dust with a queer little sigh.

Snippet pushed in front of them and ran into the cellars. He gave a short bark as if to say, 'Come on - don't be afraid. I've been here before.'

'Oh Snippet, be careful!' said Anne, half afraid that everything would crumble away at the sound of Snippet's pattering feet!

'Let's go on - but carefully,' said Julian. 'Everything will be ready to crumble into dust - unless it's made of metal! It's a marvel that door was preserved like that - it looks good enough - but I'm sure if any of us sneezed it would be gone.'

'Don't make me laugh, please, Ju,' said Dick, stepping carefully round the fallen door. 'Even a laugh might do damage down here!'

Soon they were all in the blackness of the underground cellars. They flashed their torches around. 'What a vast place!' said Julian. 'Can't see any dungeons, though!'

'Thank goodness!' said Harriet and Anne together. They had both dreaded coming across old bones of long-forgotten prisoners!

'Look - there's an archway,' said George, shining her torch to the right. 'A fine, semi-circular arch it is, too, made of stone - and there's another, look. They must lead into a main underground chamber, I should think. There's nothing much to see just here, except heaps of dirt. It all smells so musty, too!'

'Well, follow me carefully,' said Julian, and led the way towards the stone archways, his torch shining brightly. They came to one of the beautiful rounded arches and stood there, all four torches shining brightly into a large underground room.

'No cellars here - but just one great underground store-room,' said Julian. 'The roof was shored up with great beams - see, some of them have fallen. And those stone arches must have borne much of the weight, too. Not one of those has fallen! They must have stood there for centuries - what wonderful workmanship!'

Dick and the twins were more interested in the great mass of jumble scattered about round the walls. It was covered with dust that rose lightly into the air when Timmy brushed against anything. Snippet ran round happily, sniffing everywhere, and sneezing every now and again as the fine dust went up his nose.

'Any treasures, do you think?' whispered Anne, and the echo came back weirdly, whispering too.

'Whispers seem to echo back more than our ordinary voices!' said Julian. 'Hallo - what's this?'

They shone their torches on to the floor where lay what looked like a heap of blackened metal.

Julian bent down and then gave a loud exclamation. 'Do you see what this is? A suit of armour!

Almost perfect still. Look, though, it must be ages old - and here's another - and another! Were they old ones, thrown out - or spare ones? Look at this helmet - grand!

He kicked it gently with his foot, and it gave out a metallic sound and rolled away a little. 'Would that be valuable now?' asked Harry, anxiously.

'Valuable! Worth its weight in gold, I should think!' said Julian, such excitement in his voice that everyone felt even more thrilled. Harriet called to him urgently.

'Julian - here's a chest of some sort. Quick!'

They went slowly over to where she stood, for they had already learnt that any quick movement raised clouds of fine, choking dust. She pointed to a great dark chest, its corners bound with iron, and with iron strapping all round it.

It was made of wood, as black with age as the iron itself. 'What's inside, do you think?' whispered Harriet, and at once her whisper echoed from every corner. 'You think, you think, you think...'

Timmy went to sniff at the chest - and to his amazement it disintegrated at once! Slowly, softly, the sides and the great lid fell into dust that settled gently on the ground around. Only the iron corners and strapping were left. It was strange to watch something crumble away before their eyes. 'Like magic!' thought Anne.

As the wooden sides of the chest crumbled, something shone out brightly in the light of the torches - something that moved and slid out of the chest, as the sides fell away - fell with a jingling, clinking, sound, curious to hear in that silent darkness.

The children stared in astonishment, hardly believing their eyes. Anne clutched Julian and made him jump. 'Ju! What is it? Is it gold?'

Julian bent to pick up one of the rolling pieces. 'Yes! It's gold. No doubt about it. Gold never tarnishes, it keeps bright for ever. These are gold coins of some sort, treasured and hidden away.

There couldn't have been time to take them, when the Lady fled with her children - and no one else would be able to get them, for the castle was burnt down and buried by the falling walls! This hoard of gold must have lain here untouched all these long years.'

'Waiting for us to come!' said George. 'Twins - your mother and father needn't worry about their farm any more! There's enough gold there to buy them all the tractors they want! And that may be only the beginning of the treasures down here! Julian, there's another chest, look - like this one, but smaller, and beginning to fall to pieces. Let's see what's inside that! More gold, I hope.' But the second chest did not hold gold pieces - it held a different kind of treasure! One side had burst open, and its contents had dribbled out.

'Rings!' said Anne, picking up two from the dust in which they lay.

'A golden belt!' said George. 'And look - these tarnished chains must be necklaces, because they're set with blue stones. This must be where the jackdaw found that ring!'

'We've found something else, too!' called Harry, his excited voice making everyone jump. 'Look - racks of swords and daggers! Some are beautifully carved, too!'

Clamped to the wall were iron racks, held in place by great iron rods driven deep into the hard earth of the wall. Some had loosened and the racks hung crooked, their knives and swords askew, or lay on the floor. Snippet ran to pick one up - just as he had done before when he and Nosey first went into the cellars by themselves!

'What wonderful swords!' said Julian, picking one up. 'My word, this one's heavy! I can hardly hold it! Good gracious - what's that?'

Something had fallen from the roof of the cellar in which they were standing - a great piece of old wood, that had originally been placed there as part of the roofing. At the same time the continual hum of the drilling above rose to a roar that made the children jump.

Julian gave a shout. 'Out of here, quickly!' he yelled. 'Those men will soon be through the roof, and it may suddenly fall and bury us! We'll have to go at once!'

He snatched a dagger from the rack, and, still with the sword in his hand, ran back to the entrance of the secret passage, pulling Anne with him. The twins were last of all, for they had run to get a handful of the gold, and two of the necklaces and rings. They must show their mother a few of the treasures, they must!

Just as they reached the entrance, more of the roof fell. 'We'll have to stop this excavating,' panted Julian, looking back. 'If the roof falls in, it may destroy many of the old treasures there!'

They hurried into the dark, low tunnel, feeling more excited than they had ever felt in their lives! Timmy led the way, glad to think they were going out into the open air once more! 'What will Mother say?' the twins kept saying to one another. 'Whatever will she say!'

Chapter 17

TRAPPED!

The six children stumbled down the tunnel, still hearing the far-off sound of the drills, and fearing that at any moment the cellars would be discovered by Mr. Henning, who, no doubt, would be anxiously watching from above!

They came to where they thought the burrow must be, that Dick had dug through - but instead, there was nothing but a great mass of earth, some of it seeping into the tunnel! Julian gazed at it by the light of his torch, dismayed.

'The burrow's fallen in!' he said, his voice shaking. 'What are we to do? We've no spades to dig ourselves out!'

'We can use our hands,' said Dick, and began to scabble at the fallen earth, sweeping it into the tunnel. But as he scabbled, more and more earth fell into the widened burrow, and Julian stopped Dick at once. 'No more of that, Dick - you might start an earth-fall, and we'd all be buried alive. Oh gosh - this is awful! We'll have to go back up the passage and try to make the men hear us shouting. BLOW! That means Mr. Henning will know what we're up to.'

'I don't believe the men will be there much longer,' said Dick, looking at his watch. 'They pack up at five, and it's almost that now. My word, we've been ages - Mrs. Philpot will wonder where we all are.'

'The drilling has just stopped,' said Anne. 'I haven't got that awful noise inside my ears any longer.'

'In that case, it's certainly no good going back up the tunnel,' said Julian. 'They'd be gone before we got there. I say, you know - this is serious. I ought to have thought of this - any idiot knows that ground entrances to passages should be strengthened, if they're newly-dug!'

'Well, we can always go back to the cellars and wait for the men to come tomorrow,' said George, sounding more cheerful than she felt.

'How do we know they'll be there tomorrow?' said Dick. 'Henning may have paid them off today, if he's disappointed in his hopes!'

'Don't be such a dismal Jimmy!' said George, sensing that the twins were getting panicky. They certainly were worried - but more because they were certain that their mother would be scared to death if they didn't come home, than for their own safety.

Timmy had been standing patiently beside George, waiting to get out of the hole. At last, tired of waiting, he trotted away - but down the tunnel - not up!

'Timmy! Where are you going?' cried George, and shone her torch on him. He turned his head and looked at her, showing quite clearly by his manner that he was tired of standing about, and intended to find out where the tunnel led!

'Ju, Look at Timmy! He wants us to go down the tunnel!' cried George. 'Why didn't we think of that?'

'I don't know! I'm afraid I thought it would be a sort of blind alley!' said Julian. 'I fear it will, too. Nobody knows where the chapel entrance to the tunnel is, do they, twins?'

'No,' they said, both together. 'It's never been discovered, as far as we know.'

'Anyway, it's worth trying,' said George, her voice sounding muffled as she went down the passage after the impatient Timmy. 'I'm getting suffocated in here!'

The others followed, Snippet dancing along behind, thinking the whole thing was a huge joke. The tunnel, as the children had imagined, went downwards in more or less a straight line. It had fallen in slightly here and there, but by bending their heads and crouching low, they managed to get through. Finally they came to a bad fall of earth from the roof, and had to crawl through on hands and knees. Anne didn't like that part at all!

They came at last into a strange little place, where the tunnel ended abruptly. It was like a stone vault - a little chamber about five feet high and seven feet square. Julian looked up fearfully at its low roof. Was it of stone? If so, they were trapped. They would never be able to lift a heavy stone slab!

No - not all the roof was made of stone. A piece in the middle about three feet square was made of strong stout wood, which rested on ledges cut in the stone.

'It looks like a trap-door,' said Julian, examining it by the light of his torch. 'I wonder if we are just below the floor of the old chapel? Dick, if you and I and Harry all heave at the same time, we might be able to move this trap-door.'

So they all heaved, George, too - but although the door did lift a little at one corner, it simply could not be moved upwards.

'I know why we can't move it,' said Harry, red in the face with heaving. 'There are sacks of grain and fertilizer and all kinds of stuff spread over the floor of the old chapel! They're heavy as lead! We'd never be able to move that trap-door if two or three sacks are on it!'

'Gosh - I didn't think of that,' said Julian, his heart sinking. 'Didn't you know of this entrance into the tunnel, twins?'

'Of course not!' said Harry. 'Nobody did. I can't think why it wasn't known, though. Except, of course, that a store-house like this has its floor always covered with sacks of something, and with the spillings out of those sacks! It may not have been cleaned out or swept for hundreds of years!'

'Well, what are we to do now?' demanded Dick. 'We can't stay here in this stuffy little place!'

'Listen - I can hear something!' said George suddenly. 'Noises overhead.'

They listened intently, and, through the tightly-fitting oak trap-door above them, they heard a loud voice shouting. 'GIVE US A HAND, BILL, WILL YOU?'

'It's Jamie - the men are working overtime this week!' said Harry. 'He's come to get something out of the chapel. Quick, let's all yell and hammer on the trap-door with whatever we've got that'll make a noise!'

At once there was a perfect babel of sound from the little vault - yells, shouts, barks, and the hammering of sword-handles and fists on the wooden slab overhead. Then the children ceased their hammering, and fell silent, listening. They heard Jamie's voice, lifted in wonder.

'Bill! What in the name of goodness was that? A rat-fight, do you suppose?'

'They heard us,' said Julian, excited. 'Come on - once again. And bark the place down, Timmy!'

Timmy was only too ready to oblige, for he was very tired of tunnels and dark, echoing places by now! He barked long and fiercely, frightening Snippet so much that the little poodle actually ran back up the tunnel! What with Tim's barking, and everyone's yelling, and the constant hammering, the noise was even louder than before, and Bill and Jamie listened in amazement.

'Comes from over yonder,' said Bill. 'Summat's going on there. Beats me what it is though. If 'twere night-time, I'd think it were ghosties having a game! Come on - we'll get over yonder.'

The place was so full of sacks that the two men had to clamber over the rows, disturbing the cat and her kittens. She had curled herself round them, scared of the unexpected noise.

'This corner, Bill,' said Jamie, standing on top of two layers of sacks. He put his hand to his mouth and bellowed like a bull.

'ANYONE ABOUT?'

The six below answered frantically at the tops of their voices, Timmy barking too.

'There's a dog barking down there,' said Bill, scratching his head, puzzled, looking down at the sacks as if he thought there might be a dog in one of them.

'A dog! There's folks as well,' said Jamie, astounded. 'Where are they? Can't be under these sacks!'

'Maybe they're in that little old store-place we found one day, in the floor,' suggested Bill. 'Remember? Under an old trap-door, it were, that were covered by a great slab of stone. You remember, man!'

'Oh ay,' said Jamie, and then the clamour began again, for the children were now getting near despair. 'Come on, Bill,' said Jamie, hearing the note of urgency, though he couldn't make out a word from below. 'Heave over these here sacks. We've got to get to the bottom of this!'

They heaved a dozen sacks away, and then at last the trap-door was uncovered. The stone slab that had once hidden it had been taken up some years ago by the two men and now stood against the wall. They had not bothered to replace it, not guessing that the 'little old store-place' as they had thought it, was really an entrance to a secret, long-forgotten passage. It was fortunate indeed for the children that only the old wooden trap-door was between them and the men, for if the stone slab had been there too, no sound of their shouting would have been heard in the old chapel above!

'Now for this here trap-door,' said Bill. He tapped on it with his great boot. 'Who's down here?' he demanded, wondering what the answer would be.

'US!' shrieked the twins, and the others joined in, with Timmy barking frantically again.

'Bless us all - them's the twins' voices I heard!' said Jamie. 'How did they climb into that store-room without moving these here sacks?'

With a great heave the two men pulled up the heavy wooden slab, and looked down in the greatest astonishment at the little crowd below! They couldn't believe their eyes! Timmy was the first out. He leapt upwards and landed beside the men, wagging his great tail and licking them lavishly.

'Oh, thanks Bill, thanks Jamie,' cried the twins as the two men pulled them up. 'Gosh, I'm thankful you were working overtime - and happened to come in here!'

'Your ma's been hollering for you,' said Bill, disapprovingly. 'And didn't you say you was going to help me with them poles?'

'How did you get down there?' demanded Jamie, pulling up the others one by one. Julian was the last, and he handed up poor scared little Snippet, who really felt he had had quite enough adventures for one day!

'Oh - it's too long a story to tell you just now,' said Harry. 'But thanks again most awfully, Bill and Jamie. Can you put that slab back? Don't tell anyone we were down there till we tell you how it happened, see? Now we'll have to rush and tell Mother we're all right!'

And away they all went, longing for tea, tired out, full of thankfulness at their escape from the little stone room under the chapel floor! What would everyone say when they displayed the treasures they had brought back with them?

Chapter 18

A GREAT STORY TO TELL!

The twins tore down to the farm-house, and saw their mother, still looking for them. They flung themselves on her, and she gave them a loving shake.

'Where have you been? You're an hour late for tea, all of you. I've been so worried. Mr. Henning told me some story about you digging up on the hillside!'

'Mother! We're ravenous, so let's have tea and we'll tell you some Great News,' said the twins, both together. 'Mother, you will be astonished. Where's Dad - and Great-Grand-dad too?'

'They're still at the tea-table - they were late too,' said Mrs. Philpot. 'They've been out looking for you all! Great-Grand-dad isn't very pleased. What in the world have you brought with you? Surely those are not swords?'

'Mother, let's have tea first and we'll tell you EVERYTHING!' said the twins. 'Must we wash? Oh blow - all right, come on, everyone, let's wash. And we'll put our treasures down in the darkest corner, so that Dad and Great-Grand-dad won't see them till we're ready to show them!'

Soon they were all sitting down at the tea-table, glad to see a wonderful spread! Great slices of thickly buttered bread, home-made jam, home-made cheese, a fat ginger cake, a fruit cake, a dish of ripe plums, and even a home-cooked ham if anyone wanted something more substantial!

Mr. Philpot and old Great-Grand-dad were still at the table, drinking a last cup of tea. Mrs. Philpot had told them that the children had to wash, but would tell all that had happened when they came to their tea.

'Ho!' said Great-Grand-dad, frowning till his great bushy eyebrows almost covered his nose. 'When I was a boy I durst come in one minute late for my meals! You twins have worried your mother - that's bad!'

'We're awfully sorry, Great-Grand-dad,' said the twins, in unison. 'But just wait till you hear our story. Julian - you tell it!'

And so, between great munches of bread and butter, ham sandwiches, and slices of cake, the story was told, all the children joining in now and again.

Great-Grand-dad already knew that Mr. Henning had been given permission to excavate, and that a cheque for £250 had been given to Mr. Philpot. He had flown into a terrible temper, and only when Mrs. Philpot had sobbed and said that she would give it back, though she could hardly bear to part with it, had Great-Grand-dad given in. Now ready to fly into another rage, he listened to the children's story. He forgot to drink his cooling tea. He forgot to fill his pipe. He even forgot to ask a single question! Never had he heard such a wonderful, glorious tale in his life!

Julian told the story well, and the others filled in any bits he left out. Mrs. Philpot's eyes almost fell out of her head when she heard how Snippet and Nosey had gone into the rabbit-burrow and come out with a broken sword and a ring!

'But - but where did ...' she began, and listened again, to hear how Dick and Julian had enlarged the burrow, crawled right through it, and slid down into the long-lost secret tunnel!

'HA!' said Great-Grand-dad, getting out his great red handkerchief, and dabbing his forehead with it. 'HA! Wish I'd been there. Go on, go on!'

Julian had stopped to drink his tea. He laughed and went on, describing how they had all gone up the tunnel with their torches, the dogs with them. 'It was dark and smelly, and suddenly we heard a terrific noise!' he said.

'It got right inside our heads!' put in Anne.

'What was it, what was it?' said Great-Grand-dad, his eyes almost as big as the saucer in front of him.

'The noise of the men drilling up on the old castle-site,' said Julian, and Great-Grand-dad exploded in wrath. He pointed his pipe at his grandson, the farmer.

'Didn't I tell you I wouldn't have those men on my farm?' he began, and then calmed down as Mrs. Philpot patted his arm, shushing him. 'Go on, Julian,' she said.

And then came the really exciting part, the story of how they came into the actual cellars of the castle - the stone archways - the age-old dust...

'And the echoes!' said Anne. 'When we whispered, a hundred other whispers came back!'

When Julian described their finds - the old armour, still good, but black with age - the rack of swords and knives and daggers - the chest of gold...

'GOLD! I don't believe you!' shouted Great-Grand-dad. 'You're making that up, young man. Don't you pile up your tale too much, now. Stick to the truth.'

The twins promptly took some of the gold coins out of their pockets, still brilliant and shining. They laid them on the table in front of the three amazed grown-ups.

'There you are! They will tell you if we are making up all this or not - these gold coins! They will speak more loudly than words!'

In awe Mr. Philpot picked them up, and passed them one by one to the old man, and to his wife. Great-Grand-dad was dumbfounded and dumbstruck. He simply could not say a single word. He could only grunt and puff as he turned the coins over in his great horny hand.

'Are they really gold?' said Mrs. Philpot, quite overcome at the sudden appearance of the shining coins. 'Trevor - will they belong to us? Does it mean - does it mean that we'll be well enough off to buy a new tractor for you - and...'

'Depends how much of this stuff there is, up in those old cellars,' said Mr. Philpot, trying to keep calm. 'And depends on how much we're allowed to keep, of course. Might belong to the Crown by now.'

'THE CROWN!' roared Great-Grand-dad, standing up suddenly. 'The CROWN! NO, SIR! It's mine! Ours! Found on my land, put there by our ancestors. Yes - and I'll give old Mr. Finniston down in the village a share, so I will. He's been a good friend of mine for years!'

The children thought that was quite a good idea! They then showed the jewellery they had brought, and Mrs. Philpot marvelled at it, tarnished though it was.

But the swords and daggers brought the greatest excitement to old Great-Grand-dad and his grandson, Mr. Philpot! As soon as they heard that the children had actually brought back some of the old weapons, the two men got up and went to get them. Great-Grand-dad picked up the biggest and heaviest of the swords, and swung it dangerously round his head, looking like a reincarnation of some fearsome old warrior, with his great beard and blazing eyes.

'No, no, Grand-dad!' said Mrs. Philpot in fright. 'Oh, you'll knock down the things on the dresser - there, I knew you would! Bang goes my meat-dish!'

And down it went, CRASH! Timmy and Snippet almost jumped out of their skins, and began to bark frantically.

'Sit DOWN, all of you!' cried Mrs. Philpot to the excited dogs and the men. 'Let Julian finish his story! Great-Grand-dad, SIT DOWN!'

'Ha,' said Great-Grand-dad, a broad smile on his face, sitting down in his chair. 'HA! Did me good to swing that sword. Where's that American? I might try it out on him!'

The children roared with delight. It was great to see the old man so delighted. 'Go on with that tale of yours,' he said to Julian. 'You tell it well, boy. Go on! Now, Ma, don't you take my sword away. I'm keeping it here, between my legs, in case I want to use it. HA!'

Julian quickly finished his tale, and told how they had walked back down the passage and found their burrow entrance fallen in - and then gone right down the rest of the tunnel and come at last into the little stone-walled room.

'And we couldn't get out,' said Julian. 'There was a great wooden trap-door over our heads, and on it lay a dozen or so sacks - heavy as lead! We couldn't lift it. So we yelled!'

'So that's where the secret passage led to!' said Mr. Philpot. 'How did you get out?'

'We yelled and hammered, and Bill and Jamie heard us, and pulled off the sacks, and lifted up the old trap-door,' said Julian. 'Gosh, we were glad to see them! We thought we might be lost for ever! Jamie knew about the little stone vault down under the chapel floor - but he thought it was just an old store-room!'

'I've never heard of it before,' said Mrs. Philpot, and old Great-Grand-dad nodded his head in agreement.

'No more have I,' he said. 'For as long as I can remember the floor of that old chapel has been piled with sacks, and what bits I could see of the floor were covered with thick dust. Yes, even when I was a boy, playing hide and seek in the old place, it was full of sacks - and that's every bit of eighty-five years ago now! Well, well - seems like yesterday I was playing in there with a cat and her kittens!

'There's a cat and her kittens there now,' said Anne.

'Ay, little lass - and there'll be a cat and her kittens there when you're an old, old woman!' said Great-Grand-dad. 'There's some things never change, thanks be to the Lord. Well, well - I can sleep easy of nights now - I reckon you and the farm will be all right Trevor, with the money you'll make out of those old finds - and I'll live to see the twins growing up and handling the finest farm in Dorset, so I shall - with everything new-fangled they want, bless their bonny faces! And now I'll just have one more swing with that sword!'

The children fled! Great-Grand-dad looked years younger already - and goodness knows what damage he would do with that great sword! What an afternoon it had been - one they would never forget!

Chapter 19

THE MOST EXCITING ADVENTURE WE'VE EVER HAD!

After all the excitement of the afternoon the children felt lazy. The twins went off to feed the chickens. 'Better late than never!' they said, together.

'Where are Mr. Henning and Mr. Durleston and that awful Junior, Mrs. Philpot?' asked George, getting up to help with the washing of the tea-things.

'Oh, Mr. Henning came in to say he and Mr. Durleston were going to a meal at a hotel, and taking Junior too,' said Mrs. Philpot. 'He seemed very pleased with himself indeed. He said that they had broken through to the cellars of the old castle, and expected great things - and that maybe a second cheque of £250 would be coming soon!'

'You won't take it, though, will you, Mrs. Philpot?' said Julian quickly, overhearing what was being said. 'The things down in that cellar will be worth much more than any money Mr. Henning is likely to offer you. He'd only take them to America and sell them for vast sums and make a huge profit. Why should you let him do that?'

'That nice old man, Mr. Finniston, down in the little antique shop, would know what everything was worth,' said George. 'And he's a descendant of the long-ago Finnistons of Finniston Castle, isn't he - he'll be thrilled to bits, when he hears what's been happening!'

'We'll send word for him to come up tomorrow,' decided Mrs. Philpot. 'After all, Mr. Henning has his adviser - that surly Mr. Durlleston. We'll have Mr. Finniston for ours. Great-Grand-dad would be pleased about that - they're great friends, those two.'

There was however, no need to send for Mr. Finniston, for Great-Grand-dad had himself gone down straight away to tell the great news to his old crony. What a talk they had together!

'Gold coins - jewellery - suits of armour - swords - and goodness knows what else!' said Great-Grand-dad for the twentieth time, and old Mr. Finniston listened gravely, nodding his head. 'That splendid big sword!' went on Grand-dad, remembering. 'Just right for me, William! Look, if ever I've lived before, that old sword once belonged to me! I feel it! That's one thing I won't sell, mind! I'll keep it just for the sake of swinging it round my head, when I lose my temper!'

'Yes, yes - but I hope you'll be sure to stand in the middle of an empty room if you do that,' said Mr. Finniston, a little alarmed at the fierce look in the old man's eye. 'You won't be allowed to keep all the money, I'm afraid - there's such a thing as 'Treasure Trove', you know - some finds go to the Crown, and I fear that will be one of them. But the jewellery's different - and the suits of armour - and the swords! You'll be able to make a mint of money on those!'

'Enough for two new tractors?' said Great-Grand-dad. 'Enough for a new Land-Rover? That one my grandson has, it jolts every bone in my body! Look now, William - we've got to get men digging on that site - uncovering all those cellars. What say we keep on the men that fellow Henning's got? We shan't let him excavate, or whatever it's called, any more. HA! That fellow gets under my skin, and sets me itching all over. Now I can scratch him out! And see here, William, you'll shut up this shop of yours and be my adviser, won't you? I won't have that American talking me down - or that fellow Durlleston!'

'You'd better stop talking for a bit, Grand-dad you're getting too red in the face,' said Mr. Finniston. 'You'll go pop if you excite yourself much more! Go home now, and I'll be up tomorrow morning. I'll arrange about the workmen too. And don't you play about with that old sword too much - you might cut off somebody's head by mistake!'

'So I might, so I might,' said Great-Grand-dad, with a sly look in his eye. 'Now, if that Junior got in the way when I was swinging my sword... it's all right, William, it's all right! Just my joke, you know, just my joke!'

And chuckling deep down in his long beard, Great-Grand-dad strode off, turned up the little lane and walked back to the farm-house feeling very pleased indeed with life!

Mr. Henning, Mr. Durlleston and Junior did not come back that night. Apparently they were all so excited over the excavations they had made in the drilling down through the cellar roof, that they stayed too long at the hotel and decided to spend the night there, much to Mrs. Philpot's relief.

'Most farm-people like to go to bed about nine o'clock,' said Mr. Henning, 'and it's already gone that now. We'll go over tomorrow morning and we'll get them to sign that agreement you've drawn up, Durlleston. They're so short of money they'd sign anything. And mind you cry down what we think we've found, so that they won't expect any more than £250. We're going to make our fortunes over this!'

So, next morning the two men, with an excited Junior, whom Mr. Durlleston found most annoying, arrived at the farm-house at about ten o'clock. They had telephoned to say they would be there then, and would bring the agreement with them, '... and the cheque, Mrs. Philpot, the cheque!' purred Mr. Henning down the phone.

When they arrived there was quite a company there to greet them! There was old Great-Granddad, his grandson Mr. Philpot and his wife, the twins, of course, and old Mr. Finniston, sniffing a fight, his dull eyes bright this morning, for the first time in years! He sat at the back, wondering what was going to happen.

All the Five were there too, Timmy wondering what the excitement was. He kept as close to George as he could, and growled at Snippet every time the excited little poodle came near. Snippet didn't mind! He could always growl back!

A car purred up the drive, and in came Mr. Henning, Mr. Durlleston and Junior, whose face was one big grin.

'Hallo, folks!' said Junior, in his usual jaunty manner. 'How's tricks?'

Nobody answered except Timmy, and he gave a small growl, which made Junior skip out of the way quickly. 'You shut up,' he said to Timmy.

'Did you have your breakfast in bed at the hotel, little boy?' suddenly said George. 'Do you remember the last time you had it in bed here, and Timmy pulled...'

'Aw shucks!' said Junior, sulkily. 'Skip it, sister!' He subsided after that, and sat down by his father. Then began a short, sharp and satisfactory meeting - from Mr. Philpot's point of view!

'Er - Mr. Philpot - it's my very great pleasure to say that I have been advised by Mr. Durlleston to offer you a further cheque for £250,' said Mr. Henning smoothly. 'While we are rather disappointed in what appears to be in the cellars of the castle, we feel it would only be fair to offer you the sum we suggested before. Is that right, Mr. Durlleston?'

'Absolutely,' said Mr. Durlleston in a business-like voice, and glared round through his horn-rimmed glasses. 'I've the agreement here. Mr. Henning is being very generous. Very. The cellars are most disappointing.'

'I'm sorry about that,' said Mr. Philpot. 'I hold a different opinion - and my adviser, Mr. Finniston, upholds me in this. We are going to excavate the site ourselves, Mr. Henning - and then, if any disappointment lies in wait, we shall be the ones to suffer, not you.'

'What's all this?' said Mr. Henning, glaring round. 'Durlleston, what do you say to that? Bit of double-crossing, isn't it?'

'Offer him £500,' said Mr. Durlleston, looking startled at this unexpected set-back.

'You can offer me five thousand if you like, but I tell you, I prefer to do the excavation myself on my own land,' said Mr. Philpot. 'What is more, I will return you the cheque you gave me yesterday - and as I intend to keep on the men you engaged, I will pay them myself for their work. So do not trouble to dismiss them. They will now be working for me.'

'But this is MONSTROUS!' shouted Mr. Henning, losing his temper, and jumping to his feet. He banged on the table, and glared at Mr. and Mrs. Philpot. 'What do you expect to find in those derelict old cellars? We drilled right through yesterday, and there's practically nothing there! I made you a very generous offer. I'll raise it to a thousand pounds!'

'No,' said Mr. Philpot, quietly. But Great-Grand-dad had had enough of Mr. Henning's shouting and raging. He stood up too, and bellowed so loudly that everyone jumped, and Timmy began to bark. Snippet at once fled to the kitchen cupboard and hid there.

'HA! NOW YOU LISTEN TO ME!' bellowed Great-Grand-dad. 'This farm belongs to ME, and my GRANDSON, and it'll go to my GREAT GRANDSON, sitting yonder. A finer farm there never was, and my family's had it for hundreds of years - and sad it's been for me to see it go down hill for lack of money! But now I see money, much money - down in those cellars! HA! All the money we want for tractors and binders and combines and the Lord knows what! We don't want your money. No, SIR! You keep your dollars, you keep them. Offer me five thousand if you like, and see what I'll say!'

Mr. Henning turned swiftly and looked at Mr. Durlleston, who at once nodded. 'Right!' said the American to Great-Grand-dad. 'Five thousand! Done?'

'No!' bawled Great-Grand-dad, enjoying himself more than he had done for years. 'There's gold down in those cellars - jewels - suits of armour - swords, daggers, knives - all of them centuries old... and...'

'Don't hand me stories like that,' said Mr. Henning, sneeringly. 'You old fibber!'

Great-Grand-dad banged his clenched fist down on the table and made everyone almost fall off their chairs. 'TWINS!' he roared. 'Fetch those things you got yesterday - go on, fetch them here. I'll show this American I'm no fibber!'

And then, before the astounded eyes of Mr. Henning and Mr. Durleston, and of Junior, too, the twins laid the gold coins, the jewellery, and the swords and knives on the table. Mr. Durleston stared as if he couldn't believe his eyes.

'Well - what do you say to that?' demanded Great-Grand-dad, banging on the table again.

Mr. Durleston sat back and said one word. 'Junk!'

Then it was old Mr. Finniston's turn to stand up and say a few words! Mr. Durleston, who hadn't noticed the quiet old man sitting at the back, was horrified to see him there. He knew he was learned and knowledgeable, for he himself had tried to pick his brains about the old castle-site.

'Ladies and gentlemen,' said Mr. Finniston, just as if he were addressing a well-conducted meeting, 'I regret to say that, speaking as a well-known antiquarian, I do not consider that Mr. Durleston knows what he is talking about if he calls these articles junk! The things on the table are worth a small fortune to any genuine collector. I could myself sell them in London tomorrow for far more than any sum Mr. Durleston has advised Mr. Henning to offer. Thank you, ladies and gentlemen!'

And he sat down, bowing courteously to the assembled company. Anne felt as if she wanted to clap him!

'Well, I don't think there's any more to say,' said Mr. Philpot, getting up. 'If you'll tell me what hotel you'll be staying at, Mr. Henning, I'll have your things sent there. You will certainly not wish to stay here any longer!'

'Pop, I don't wanna go, I wanna stay here!' howled Junior, most surprisingly. 'I wanna see the cellars exca-exculpated! I wanna dig down! I wanna STAY!'

'Well, we don't want you!' said Harry, fiercely. 'You and your peeping and prying and listening and boasting and tale-bearing. Cissy-boy! Breakfast in bed! Can't clean his shoes! Howls when he can't get his own way! Screams when...'

'That's enough, Harry,' said his mother sternly, looking quite shocked. 'I don't mind Junior staying on if he'll behave himself. It's not his fault that all this has happened.'

'I wanna stay!' wept Junior, and kicked out peevishly under the table. He unfortunately caught Timmy on the nose, and the dog rose in anger, growling and showing his teeth. Junior fled for his life.

'Do you wanna stay now?' shouted George, as he went, and the answer came back at once.

'NO!'

'Well, thanks, Timmy, for helping him to make up his mind,' said George, and patted the big dog. Mr. Henning looked as if he were about to burst. 'If that dog bites my boy, I'll have him put to sleep,' he said. 'I'll sue you, I'll...'

'Please go,' said Mrs. Philpot, suddenly looking tired out. 'I have a lot of baking to do.'

'I shall take my time,' said Mr. Henning, pompously. 'I will not be turned out suddenly, as if I hadn't paid my bills.'

'Seen this sword, Henning?' said old Great-Grand-dad, suddenly, and snatched from the table the big sword that he so much liked. 'Beauty, isn't it? The men of old knew how to deal with their enemies, didn't they? They swung at them like this - and like THIS - and...'

'Here, stop! You're dangerous! That sword nearly cut me!' cried Mr. Henning in a sudden panic.

'WILL you put it down?'

'No. It's mine. I'm not selling this,' said Great-Grand-dad, swinging the sword again. It hit the light-bulb above his head, and the glass fell with a clatter. Mr. Durleston deserted Mr. Henning and fled out of the kitchen at top speed, colliding violently with Bill, who was just coming in.

'Look out - he's mad - that old man's mad!' shouted Mr. Durleston. 'Henning, come along before he cuts off your head!'

Mr. Henning fled too. Great-Grand-dad pursued him to the door, breathing blood and thunder, and the two dogs barked in delight. Everyone began to laugh helplessly.

'Grand-dad - what's got into you?' said Mr. Philpot, as the old fellow swung the sword again, his eyes bright, a broad grin on his wrinkled old face.

'Nothing! I just thought that only this sword would get rid of those fellows. Do you know what I call them? JUNK! Ha - wish I'd thought of that when they were here! JUNK! William Finniston, did you hear that?'

'Now you put that sword down before you damage it,' said Mr. Finniston, who knew how to manage Great-Grand-dad, 'and you and I will go down to the old inn and talk over what we're going to do about all this treasure trove. You just put that sword down first - NO, Grand-dad, I am NOT going to take you into the inn carrying that sword!'

Mrs. Philpot heaved a sigh of relief when the two old fellows went off down the lane, leaving the sword safely behind. She sat down, and, to the children's horror, began to cry!

'Now, now - don't take any notice of me!' she said, when the twins ran to her in dismay. 'I'm crying for joy - to have got rid of them - and to know I've not got to pinch and scrape any more - or to take in visitors. To think that your Dad can buy the farm machinery he wants - and... oh dear, what a baby I am, acting like this!'

'I say, Mrs. Philpot - would you like us to leave too?' asked Anne, suddenly realizing that she and the others were ranked as 'visitors', and must have been an added burden for poor Mrs. Philpot.

'Oh no, my dear, no - you're not really visitors, you're friends!' said Mrs. Philpot, smiling through her tears. 'And what's more I shan't charge your mothers a single penny for having you here - see what good fortune you've brought us!'

'All right - we'll stay. We'd love to,' said Anne. 'We wouldn't miss seeing what else is down in those castle cellars for anything. Would we, George?'

'Gosh no!' said George. 'We want to be in on everything. This is just about the most exciting adventure we've ever had!'

'We always say that!' said Anne. 'But the nice part about this one is - it isn't finished yet! We'll be able to go and watch the workmen and their drills. We'll be able to help in moving all the exciting old things out of their hiding places - we'll hear what prices you get for them - and see the new tractor! Honestly, I really do believe the second part of this adventure will be better than the first! Don't you think so, Timmy?'

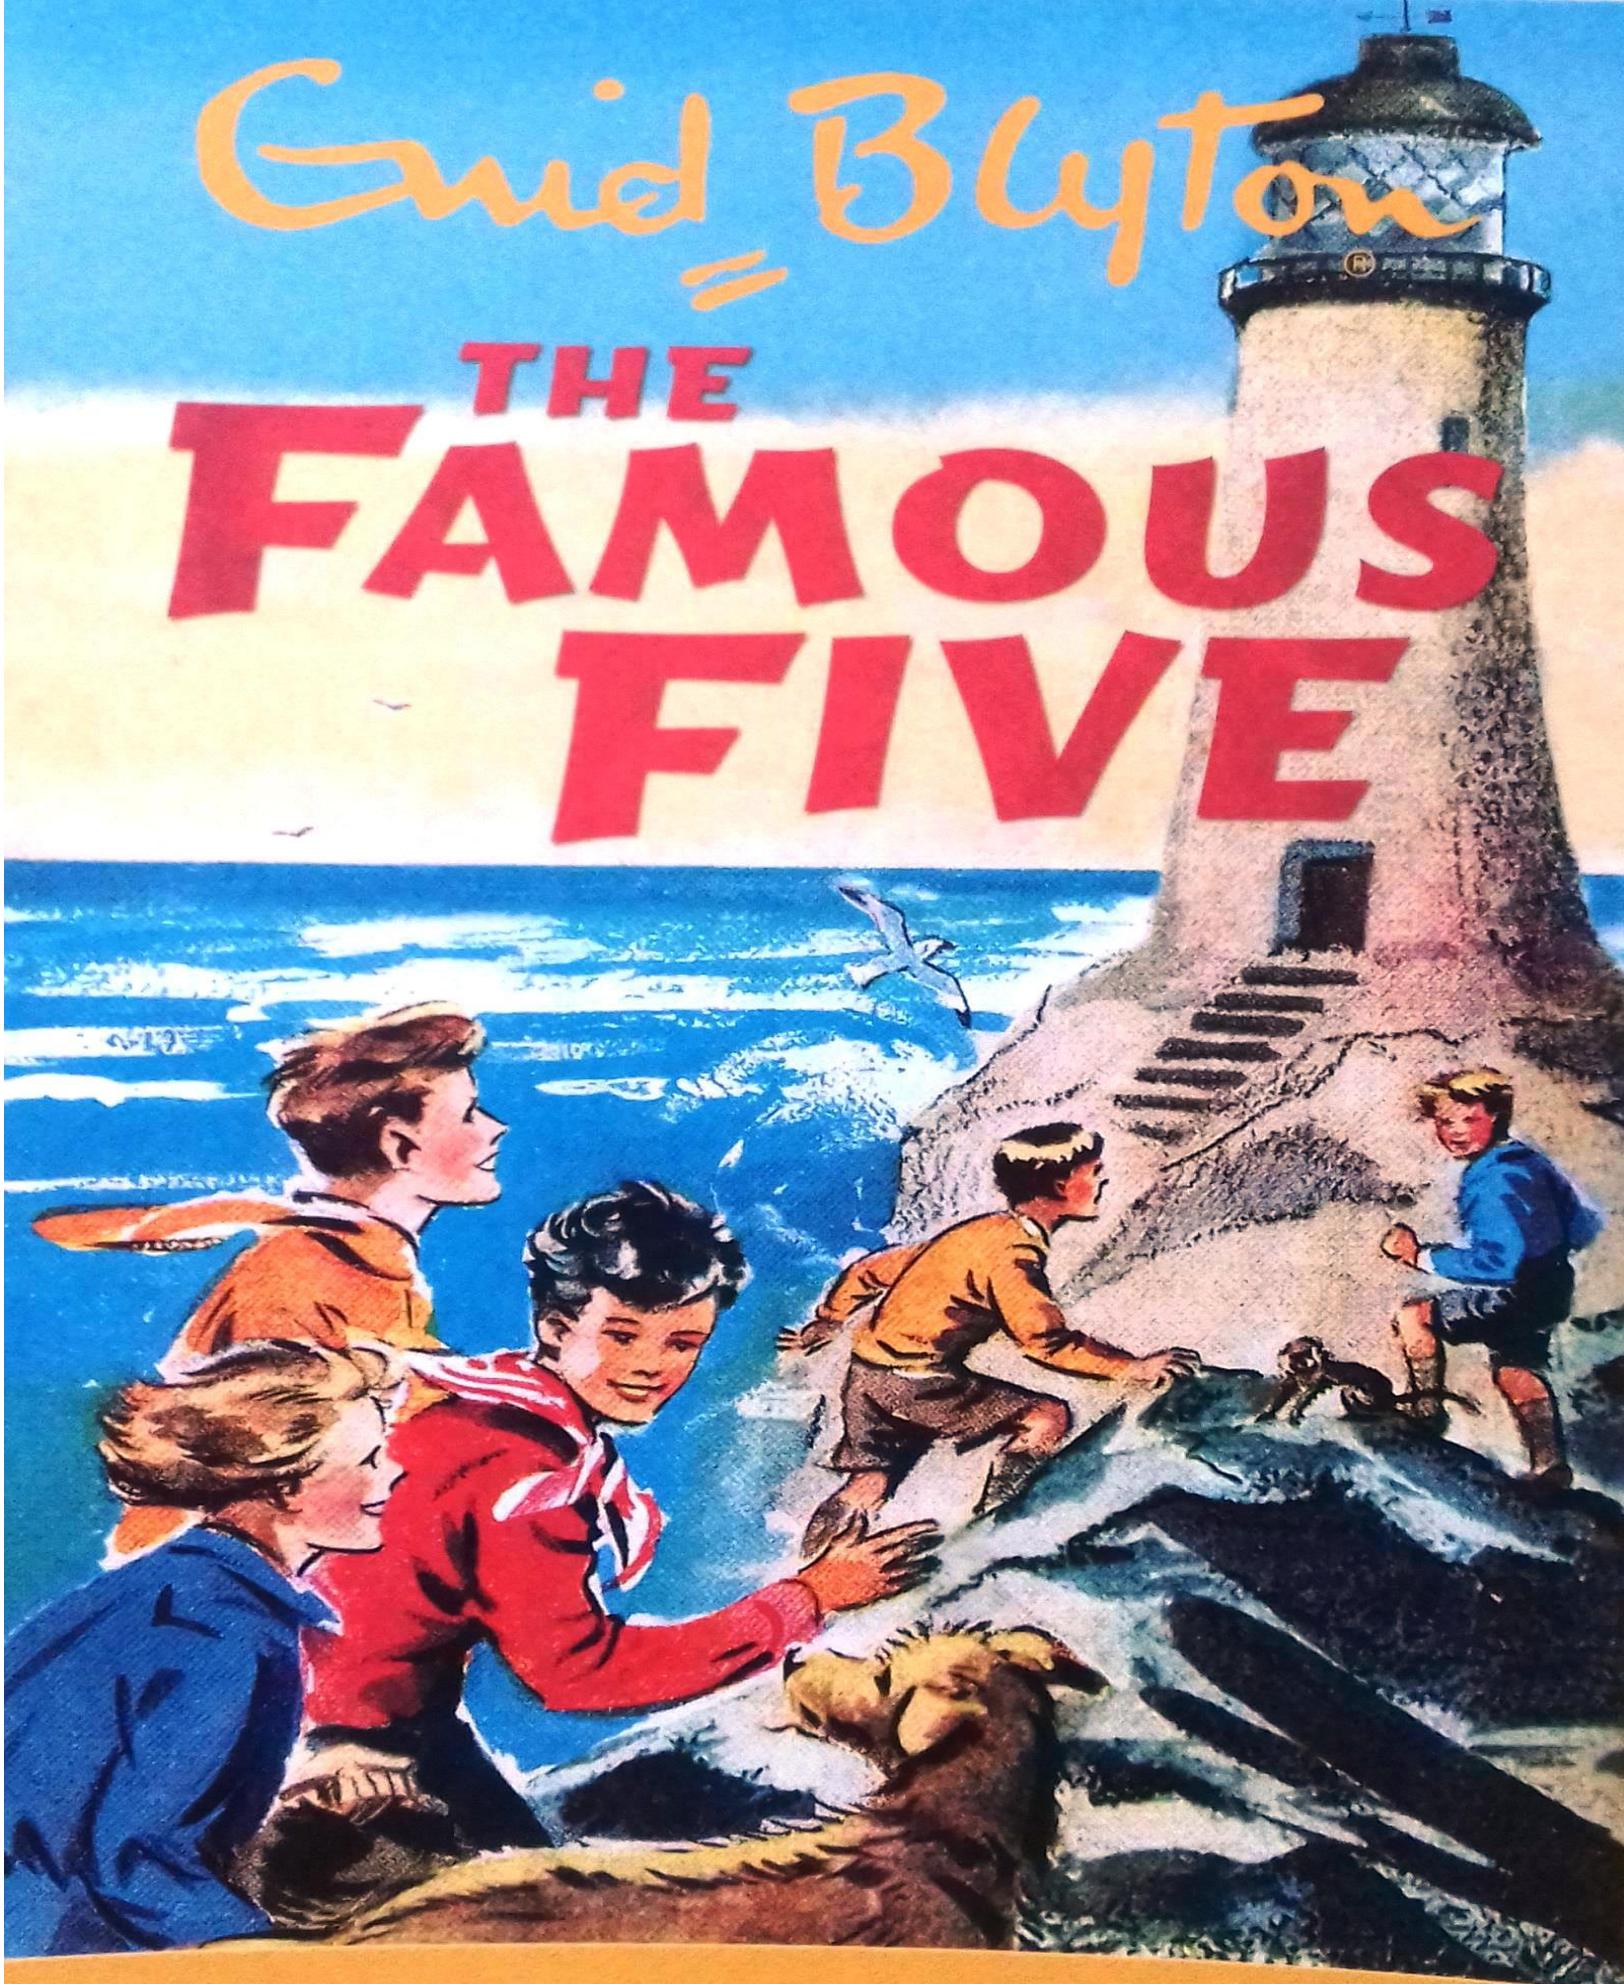

'WOOF!' said Timmy, and wagged his tail so hard that he knocked Snippet right over.

Well, good-bye, Five! Enjoy the rest of your adventures, and have a good time - and do make sure that Grand-dad is careful with that great old sword!

THE END

Enid Blyton

THE
FAMOUS
FIVE

FIVE GO TO DEMON'S ROCKS

ENID BLYTON

FAMOUS FIVE 19

Five Go To Demon's Rocks

Contents

| | | |
|----|---|----|
| 1 | Three Visitors Arrive | 2 |
| 2 | A Little Excitement | 6 |
| 3 | Mischief, Tinker - And Timmy! | 10 |
| 4 | Tinker Has A Wonderful Idea | 14 |
| 5 | Tinker's Light-House | 18 |
| 6 | Making Plans | 22 |
| 7 | Off At Last | 26 |
| 8 | There's The Light-House! | 30 |
| 9 | Inside The Light-House | 34 |
| 10 | Settling In | 37 |
| 11 | Jeremiah Boogle | 41 |
| 12 | Jeremiah's Tale | 45 |
| 13 | A Pleasant Morning - And A Shock! | 49 |
| 14 | The Old, Old Map | 54 |
| 15 | Jacob Is In Trouble | 58 |
| 16 | Down In The Caves | 63 |
| 17 | Mischief Again - And A Surprise! | 68 |
| 18 | Back In The Light-House - And An Exciting Talk! | 72 |
| 19 | A Nasty Shock! | 76 |
| 20 | Down The Shaft And Into The Tunnel | 80 |
| 21 | A Wonderful Idea | 86 |
| 22 | The End Of The Adventure | 91 |

Chapter 1

THREE VISITORS ARRIVE

'Fanny!' shouted Mr. Kirrin, running up the stairs with a letter in his hand. 'FANNY! Where are you?'

'Here, dear, here, helping Joanna with the dusting,' said Mrs. Kirrin, appearing out of a bedroom. 'Don't shout like that. I'm not deaf, you know. What's the matter?'

'I've a letter here from that old friend of mine, Professor Hayling,' said Mr. Kirrin. 'You remember him, don't you?'

'Do you mean the man who came here to stay a few years ago, and kept forgetting to come in for meals?' said Mrs. Kirrin, flicking some dust off her husband's coat.

'Fanny, don't flick at me like that,' said Mr. Kirrin, crossly. 'Anyone would think I was covered in dust. Listen - he's coming to stay today for a week - instead of next week.'

Mrs. Kirrin stared at her husband in horror. 'But he can't do that!' she said. 'George is coming home today - and her three cousins with her, to stay. You know that!'

'Oh - I'd forgotten,' said Mr. Kirrin. 'Well, ring up and tell George to stay where she is - we can't have them while Professor Hayling is here. I shall want to be quite undisturbed - he and I have to confer about some new invention of his. Don't look like that, my dear - this may be very very important.'

'Well, it's important to the Five that their plans shouldn't be spoiled,' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'After all, George only went to stay with Dick, Julian and Anne because you had some urgent papers to write, and you didn't want to be disturbed - and you knew today was the day they were due home. Quentin, you must ring up your Professor friend and say he can't come.'

'Very well, my dear, very well,' said Mr. Kirrin. 'But he won't like it. He won't like it at all!' He went off to his study to use the telephone, and Mrs. Kirrin hurried up the stairs to get ready the rooms for the four cousins.

'Anne can sleep with George as usual,' she said to Joanna. 'And the two boys can sleep in the guest-room.'

'It will be nice to have all the Five back again,' said Joanna, pushing the carpet-sweeper up and down the landing. 'I miss them - and you should see the cakes I made yesterday, ma'am - two whole tins full!'

'You're too good to those children, Joanna,' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'No wonder they're so fond of you. Now, we'll - oh dear - there's Mr. Kirrin calling me again. All right, dear, I'm coming, I'm coming!'

She ran downstairs to the hall, and into the study. Mr. Kirrin was standing there, holding the telephone receiver. 'What shall I do?' he almost shouted. 'Professor Hayling has left and is already on his way here. I can't stop him coming. And he's bringing his son with him, so there are two of them.'

'His son! Well, really!' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'There isn't room for them here, with the four cousins as well, Quentin. You know that.'

'Well, ring up George and tell her not to come back for a week, but to stay with her cousins,' said Mr. Kirrin, crossly. 'There's no reason why they should ALL come here.'

'But, Quentin, you know perfectly well that George's aunt and uncle are shutting up the house today, and going on a cruise somewhere,' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'Oh dear, oh dear! Well, I'll ring up George, and try to stop them all coming!'

So once more the telephone was used, and Mrs. Kirrin tried anxiously to get in touch with George. For a long time nobody answered, and then at last a voice came. 'Hallo - who's there?'

'Mrs. Kirrin here - may I speak to George, please?'

'Oh - I'm sorry - all the Five have already left, on their bicycles,' said the voice. 'And the house is empty except for me. I'm a neighbour come in to lock everything up. I'm so sorry I can't get George for you.'

'Oh - thank you. Never mind!' said Mrs. Kirrin and put back the receiver. She gave a heavy sigh. NOW WHAT, what was to be done? Professor Hayling and his son were on their way to Kirrin Cottage - and so were the Five - and none of them could be stopped. What a household it would be!

'Quentin,' she said, going into the study where her husband was tidying up enormous piles of papers. 'Quentin, listen - George and all the others are on their way here. And HOW I am going to put everyone up. I do - not - know. It looks as if somebody will have to sleep in Timmy's kennel, and I've a good mind to make a bed up for you in the coal-house!'

'I'm busy,' said Mr. Kirrin, hardly listening. 'I've all these papers to get in order before Professor Hayling comes. And by the way, my dear, will you PLEASE tell the children to be quiet while the Professor is here - he's rather short-tempered, and...'

'Quentin, I'm beginning to feel rather short-tempered too,' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'And if...' She stopped very suddenly and gazed through the study window in horror. Then she pointed her finger at it. 'Look! What's that at the window?'

Her husband turned and stared in amazement. 'It looks like a monkey!' he said. 'Where on earth did it come from?'

A voice called down the stairs. It was Joanna. 'Ma'am! There's a car at the door - I think it's the master's visitors - a man and a boy!'

Mrs. Kirrin was still staring in astonishment at the monkey, who was now scratching at the window-pane, chattering in a funny little prattle. He pressed his nose to the glass, just like a child.

'DON'T tell me that your friend owns a monkey - and has brought him to stay too!' groaned poor Mrs. Kirrin. She jumped as a loud bang came from the front door, and went to open it.

Yes - there stood Professor Hayling, the man who had so often forgotten to come in for meals when he had stayed at Kirrin Cottage years before. And by him was a boy of about nine, with a face a little like that of the monkey now on his shoulder!

The professor strode in, calling to the chauffeur behind. 'Bring the luggage in, man. Hallo, Mrs. Kirrin - nice to see you again. Where's your husband? My word, I've some interesting news to tell him. Ah, Quentin, there you are! Got your papers all ready for me?'

'My dear old friend!' said Mr. Kirrin, shaking hands warmly. 'Fine to see you! So glad you could come.'

'This is Tinker, my son,' said Professor Hayling, clapping the boy on the back, and almost knocking him over. 'I always forget what his real name is - we call him Tinker because he's always tinkering with cars - mad on them, you know! Shake hands, Tinker. Where's Mischief?'

Poor Mrs. Kirrin hadn't been able to get in a word. The Professor was now in the hall, still talking. The monkey had leapt off the boy's shoulder, and was on the hall-stand, swinging on a hat-peg.

Really, it's like a circus! thought poor Mrs. Kirrin. And the rooms not prepared yet - and what about lunch? Oh my goodness - and all the cousins coming as well. What is that monkey doing now? Making faces at himself in the hall mirror!

Somehow or other the visitors were pushed into the living-room, and they sat down. Mr. Kirrin was so anxious to discuss some mighty problems with the Professor that he actually fetched a great sheaf of papers and immediately spread them over the table.

'Not in here, dear - in your study please,' said Mrs. Kirrin, firmly. 'Joanna! Will you take the bags up to the guest-room. And make up a bed there on the couch for the little boy? There won't be room anywhere else.'

'What about the monkey!' asked Joanna, eyeing it warily. 'Is he to have a bed too?'

'He sleeps with me,' said Tinker, in an astonishingly loud voice, and leapt suddenly up the stairs, making a most extraordinary purring noise as he went. Mrs. Kirrin stared after him in amazement.

'Is he in pain, or something?' she said.

'No, no - he's just being a car,' said his father. 'I told you he was mad about cars. He can't help pretending to be one now and again.'

'I'm a car, a Jaguar car!' yelled Tinker, from the top of the stairs. 'Can't you hear my engine! R-R-R-R-R-R! Hey, Mischief come and have a ride!'

The little monkey scampered up the stairs and leapt on to the boy's shoulder, chattering in its funny little voice. The Jaguar car then apparently made a tour of all the bedrooms, occasionally giving a very loud honk.

'Does your boy always behave like that?' asked Mr. Kirrin, amazed. 'How do you manage to do any work?'

'Oh, I have a sound-proof workroom in my garden,' said the Professor. 'I hope your workroom is soundproof, too?'

'No, it isn't,' said poor Mr. Kirrin, still hearing the 'car' upstairs. What a boy! How could anyone bear him for more than two minutes? And to think he had come to STAY!

He shut the study door after the Professor - but no door could shut out the sound of the small boy honking upstairs!

Poor Mrs. Kirrin was eyeing all the luggage brought in. Why hadn't the Professor gone to a hotel? What was life going to be like, with the Five here, and the Professor, and a small boy who apparently thought he was some kind of car all the time. To say nothing of a monkey called Mischief! And WHERE were they all going to sleep?

Chapter 2
A LITTLE EXCITEMENT

George and her three cousins were already on their way back to Kirrin. They cycled along the lanes with Timmy, George's dog, loping easily beside them.

'Won't it be fun to be at Kirrin Cottage again!' said Anne. 'It's so lovely to look out of a window and see Kirrin Bay, blue as the sky! I vote we go over to the Island for a picnic!'

'You'll like to have your own kennel again, won't you, Timmy?' said George, and Timmy gave her ankle a quick lick, and barked.

'It's always so peaceful at Kirrin Cottage,' said Dick. 'And your mother's so kind and jolly, George, I hope we shan't upset Uncle Quentin with our talk and fun.'

'I don't think Father has any very important work on hand,' said George. 'Anyway, he'll only have you for a week - it's a pity that Professor friend of his is coming in a week's time, or you could have stayed longer.'

'Well, a week is quite a nice long time,' said Julian. 'Hallo - there's our first glimpse of Kirrin Bay, look - as blue as ever!'

They were all glad to see the little blue bay, and to catch sight of Kirrin Island lying there peacefully in the sun. 'You're lucky, George, to have an island all of your own,' said Anne. 'One that is really and truly yours!'

'Yes, I am lucky!' said George. 'I was never so pleased in all my life as the day Mother gave it to me. It's belonged to our family for years, of course - and now it's mine! We'll go over there tomorrow!'

At last they came to the end of their journey. 'I can see the chimneys of Kirrin Cottage!' said Julian, standing up on the pedals of his bicycle. 'And the kitchen fire is going - I can see smoke. The dinner must be cooking!'

'I can smell it!' said Dick, sniffing. 'I think it's sausages.'

'Ass,' said the other three together, and laughed. They rode up to the back gate, and leapt off their bicycles. They put them into the shed, and George gave a shout!

'Mother! We're HOME! Where are you?'

She had hardly finished yelling when Anne suddenly clutched her arm. 'George - what's that? Look! Peeping out of the window there!'

They all looked - and George shouted in astonishment: 'It's a monkey! A MONKEY! No, Timmy. No - come back! TIMMY!'

But Timmy too had seen the quaint little face peering out of the window, and had shot off to investigate. Was it a small dog? Or a queer sort of cat? Anyway, whatever it was, he was going to chase it away! He barked at the top of his voice as he galloped indoors, and almost knocked over a small boy there. The monkey, terrified, at once leapt on to the picture-rail that ran round the room.

'You leave my monkey alone, you big bully you!' cried a furious voice; and through the open door George saw a small boy give Timmy a sharp smack. She raced indoors, and gave the small boy a smack as sharp as the one he had given Timmy! Then she glared at him angrily.

'What are you doing here? How DARE you hit my dog? It's a good thing he didn't eat you up. And what's that creature doing up there?'

The little monkey was terrified. It sat clinging to the picture-rail, trembling, making a piteous chattering noise. Julian came in just as Joanna and cook arrived from upstairs.

'What's all this?' she said. 'You'll have your father racing out of his study in a minute, George. Stop barking at the little monkey, Timmy, for goodness sake! And stop crying, Tinker, and take your monkey away before Timmy eats him.'

'I'm NOT crying,' said Tinker fiercely, rubbing his eyes. 'Come here, Mischief. I won't let that dog hurt you! I'll - I'll...'

'You take your monkey away, old son,' said Julian gently, thinking that the small boy was very brave to imagine he could fight old Timmy. 'Run along.'

Tinker made a clicking sound and the monkey dropped at once on to his shoulder, and nuzzled there. It put its tiny arms round the boy's neck, and made a little choking noise.

'Oh - poor little mite - it's crying!' said Anne. 'I didn't know monkeys could cry. Timmy, don't frighten it again, please don't. You mustn't bully tiny things.'

'Timmy never bullies anything!' said George at once, frowning at Anne. 'But after all, what do you expect him to do when he comes home and finds a strange boy and a monkey here. Who are you, boy?'

'I shan't tell you,' said Tinker, and marched out of the room, the monkey still whimpering into his neck.

'Joanna - who on earth is he?' asked Dick. 'And what is he doing here?'

'I thought you wouldn't like it,' said Joanna. 'It's that Professor friend of your father's, George - the one who was coming to stay next week. He telephoned this morning to say he was coming this week instead - and bringing his boy as well! He didn't say anything about a monkey, though!'

'Are they staying here?' said George, in horror. 'How can Mother let them - she knew we were all coming today! How mean of her, how...'

'Be quiet, George,' said Julian. 'Let Joanna go on.'

'Well, they arrived before anything could be done to stop them,' said Joanna. 'And now your father is shut up in his study with Professor Hayling - the boy's father - and your mother and I are at our wit's end to know where to put you all. The boy and his father - and I suppose the monkey too - are sharing the guest-room.'

'But that's where Julian and Dick were going to sleep!' said George, losing her temper again. 'I'll go and tell Mother that boy can't stay, I'll...'

'Don't be an ass, George,' said Julian. 'We'll manage somehow. We can't go back home because our house will be all shut up now.'

'You could sleep up in the loft,' said Joanna, sounding rather doubtful. 'But it's very dusty and terribly draughty. I could put a couple of mattresses up there for you.'

'All right,' said Julian. 'We'll make do up in the loft. Thanks, Joanna. Where's Aunt Fanny? Does she mind all this?'

'Well - she's a bit rushed,' said Joanna. 'But you know what your aunt is - always so kind, never thinks of herself. That Professor Hayling! Just walked into the house as if he owned it, bringing luggage and that most peculiar little boy - and a monkey! Though the monkey seems a nice enough little thing. It came and watched me wash up, and bless me if it didn't try to dry the plates for me!'

The kitchen door swung open and George's mother came in. 'Hallo, dears!' she said smiling. 'I thought I heard Timmy barking. Dear Timmy - wait till you see the monkey!'

'He's seen him already,' said George, scowling. 'Mother, how could you take people in when you knew we were coming home today?'

'That's enough, George,' said Julian, who saw how worried his aunt looked. 'Aunt Fanny, we won't be ANY trouble! We'll keep out of the house as much as we can, we'll do the shopping for you, we'll go across to Kirrin Island and keep out of your way, we'll...'

'You're kind, Julian,' said his aunt, and smiled at him. 'Things will be rather difficult - especially as Professor Hayling never can remember to come to meals in time, and you know what your uncle is! He could forget breakfast, dinner and supper for a whole year, and then wonder why he felt hungry!'

That made everyone laugh. Julian slipped his arm round his aunt and gave her a hug. 'We'll sleep in the loft,' he said, 'and enjoy it, too. The girls will help with the housework, and Dick and I will do the odd jobs. You've no idea how fine I look with an apron round my waist, and a broom in my hand!'

Even George smiled at the idea of Julian wearing an apron. Then Timmy went suddenly to the half-open door and barked. He could smell that monkey again. He heard a high chattering noise, and pushed the door open at once. What! Was that monkey calling him rude names?

He saw the little creature sitting on the top of the rail at the foot of the stairs. It saw Timmy, and danced up and down, sounding as if it were laughing. Timmy raced to the rail and leapt up, barking fiercely.

The study door flew open and out marched not one angry Professor, but two! WHAT'S ALL THIS NOISE? CAN'T WE HAVE A MOMENT'S PEACE?

'Oh dear!' said Mrs. Kirrin, foreseeing this kind of thing happening twenty times a day, now that Timmy and the others were here. She shushed the two angry men.

'Now, now - Timmy just isn't used to the monkey yet. Go back, please, and shut the door. I'll see you aren't disturbed again!'

'WOOF-WOOF!' shouted Timmy, using his very loudest bark, and Professor Hayling shot back into the study at top speed!

'Any more rudeness from Timmy and I'll have him sent away!' roared Mr. Kirrin, and he too disappeared.

'WELL!' said George, her face red with anger. 'What does he mean by that, Mother? If Timmy goes, I go too! Oh look at that monkey - he's sitting on top of the grandfather clock now! He ought to be sent away, horrid little mischievous thing - not old Timmy!'

Chapter 3

MISCHIEF, TINKER - AND TIMMY!

Julian and Dick set to work to take a couple of old mattresses up to the loft, and some rugs and a couple of cushions for pillows. It was rather draughty! But what else was to be done? It was still too cold to sleep outside in a tent.

George was very sulky. 'That scowl will grow on your face, George, if you aren't careful,' said Dick. 'Cheer up, for goodness' sake. It's worse for your mother than it is for any of us. She's going to be very busy this week.'

She certainly was! Meals for nine people, five of them very hungry children, were not easy to provide. Joanna did an enormous amount of cooking, the girls helped with the housework, and the boys cycled off to Kirrin village in the mornings to do the shopping.

'Why can't that boy Tinker help?' demanded George, on the second day they were at home. 'What on earth does he think he's doing now? Look at him out in the garden rushing all round, making a frightful noise. Tinker, shut up! You'll disturb your father and mine.'

'You shut up yourself!' called back Tinker, rudely. 'Can't you see I'm a Bentley car, with a very powerful engine? And see how well it stops when I put on the brakes - no jerk at all! And hear the horn - marvellous!'

He gave a remarkably good imitation of a powerful car-horn. At once the study window shot up and two very angry men shouted together: 'TINKER! What do you think you're doing, making that noise? You've been told to be QUIET!'

Tinker began to explain about the Bentley, but as this didn't seem to satisfy either of the angry men, he offered to be a little mini-car. 'You see, it goes like this,' said Tinker, beginning to move off, making a low purring noise, 'and it...'

But the window was slammed shut, so the little mini-car drove itself into the kitchen, and said it was very hungry, could it have a bun?

'I don't feed cars,' said Joanna. 'I have no petrol. Go away.'

The mini-car purred out of the kitchen on its two legs, and went to look for passengers. Mischief the monkey scampered up, and ran up Tinker's body to his shoulder.

'You're my passenger,' said Tinker, and Mischief held on to his hair as he drove all round the garden at top speed, honking every now and again, but very quietly indeed.

'He's a funny child,' said Joanna to Mrs. Kirrin, when she came into the kitchen. 'Not bad really - him and his cars! I've never seen a child so mad on them in my life! One of these days he'll turn into one!'

It began to rain next day and Tinker couldn't go out. He nearly drove everyone mad, rushing about all over the house hooting, and purring like a car engine.

'Now look,' Joanna said to him, when for the twentieth time he drove himself all round her kitchen. 'I don't care if you're a Morris Minor, or an Austin, or a Consul, or even a Rolls - you just keep out of my kitchen! It's a funny thing to think that a fine car like a Rolls can steal a bun out of my tin - it ought to be ashamed of itself!'

'Well, if I can't get petrol, I've got to get something to run on, haven't I?' demanded Tinker. 'Look at Mischief - he's helping himself to apples in the larder, but you don't say anything to him!'

'Oh lands sakes, is that creature in the larder again?' cried poor Joanna, rushing across the kitchen. 'Who left it open, I'd like to know?'

'Timmy did,' said Tinker.

'You little fibber!' said Joanna, as she shooed Mischief out of the larder. 'Timmy would never do a thing like that. He's as honest as the day, not like that little thief of a monkey of yours!'

'Don't you like him?' said Tinker, sorrowfully. 'He likes you.'

Joanna glanced across at the tiny monkey. He sat huddled in a corner, his arms over his face, looking very small and sad. One small brown eye peeped out at Joanna.

'You're a humbug, you are!' said Joanna. 'Looking as if you're the unhappiest monkey in the world, when all the time you're thinking what mischief to do next. Here - come and get this biscuit, you rascal - and don't you dare to go near Timmy this morning. He's very very angry with you.'

'What did Mischief do to Timmy?' asked Tinker, surprised.

'He went to Timmy's dish and stole one of the bones there,' said Joanna. 'Timmy growled like a roll of thunder! I really thought he would bite off the monkey's tail. My word, you should have seen Mischief skedaddle!'

Mischief had now crept up cautiously to Joanna, eyeing the biscuit she held. He had had one or two slaps from her for stealing, and he was rather wary of her quick right hand.

'Here you are - take the biscuit, for goodness' sake,' said Joanna. 'And don't look such a little misery, or I might suddenly find myself giving you another biscuit. Hallo - where's he gone?'

The monkey had snatched the biscuit with one of his tiny paws, and had scampered away to the door. It was shut, so Tinker opened it for him. At once Timmy came in. He had been lying outside the door, sniffing the good smell of soup cooking on the stove.

Mischief leapt to the top of a chair-back and made a strange little whinnying sound - rather apologetic and sad. Timmy stood still and pricked up his ears. He understood animal language very well!

Mischief still held the biscuit. He leapt down to the seat of the chair - and then, to Joanna's enormous surprise, he held out the biscuit to Timmy! He chattered in a very small voice, and Timmy listened gravely. Then the big dog took the biscuit gently, threw it up into the air, chewed it once, and swallowed it!

'Well, did you ever see anything like that before!' said Joanna, marvelling. 'For all the world as if Mischief was apologizing to Timmy for stealing his bone - and offering him his biscuit to make up! Well, whatever will George say when she hears!'

Timmy licked his lips to see if any biscuit crumbs were left, and then put his big head forward, and gave the monkey a sudden lick on the tip of his funny little nose.

'Timmy's saying thank you!' cried Tinker, in delight. 'Now they'll be friends - you see if they won't!'

Joanna was astonished and pleased. Well, well - to think of that monkey being clever enough to present Timmy with a biscuit that he very much wanted to eat himself! He wasn't a bad little thing! She went upstairs to find George and tell her.

But George didn't believe her. 'Timmy would never take a biscuit from that silly little monkey!' she said. 'Never! You made all that up, Joanna, just because you're getting fond of Mischief. You wait till he runs off with your toasting-fork again!'

All the same, George went down with Joanna, curious to see if the two animals were becoming friendly - and she saw a very strange sight indeed!

Mischief was on Timmy's back, and Timmy was solemnly trotting round the kitchen, giving him a ride! The monkey was chattering in delight, and Tinker was shouting in glee.

'Go faster, Tim, go faster! You're a very fine horse! You'd easily win the Derby! Go on gallop!'

'I don't want Timmy to give rides to the monkey,' said George. 'Stop it, Timmy! You look silly.'

The monkey suddenly leaned forward and hugged Timmy round the neck. Then he slid off and looked at George as if to say, 'All right! I won't make your dog look silly!'

Timmy knew that George was cross and he went to lie down on the rug. At once Mischief came sidling across to him, and settled himself between Timmy's big front paws, cuddling there without fear. Timmy bent his big head and licked him very gently.

Tears came suddenly to Joanna's eyes. That Timmy! He was just about the nicest dog in the whole world.

'See that!' she said to George. 'Big-hearted and kind that dog of yours is! Don't you scold him now for being great enough to make friends with a little creature who stole his bone!'

'I'm not going to scold him!' said George, astonished and proud. 'He's a marvel - the best dog in the Kingdom! Aren't you, Timmy darling?'

And she went over to Timmy and stroked his big soft head. He whined lovingly and licked her, looking up as if to say, 'Well, everything's all right now - we're all friends!'

Tinker had been watching from a corner of the kitchen, saying nothing. He was rather afraid of George and her quick temper. He was delighted when he saw her go over and pat Timmy, without even disturbing the monkey. In his joy he began to honk like a lorry, and startled everyone so much that they yelled at him.

'Stop it, Tinker!' 'Be quiet, you little nuisance!' 'Woof!' That was from Timmy.

'You'll have Mr. Kirrin in here if you honk like that,' said Joanna. 'Can't you be something quiet for a change - a bicycle, for instance?'

Tinker thought that was quite a good idea. He ran round the kitchen and out into the hall, making a hissing noise like the sound of a bicycle's wheels on the road. Then he decided to make a noise like a bicycle bell, and produced a very loud ringing noise indeed! It was so like the ringing of a bell that Mrs. Kirrin ran out of the living-room, thinking there was someone at the front door!

Then the study door flew open and out came Mr. Kirrin and Tinker's father. Poor Tinker was caught and his father shook him so hard that two pencils shot out of his pocket and rolled over the floor.

Tinker began to yell - and how he could yell! George came out of the kitchen to see what was happening, and Dick, Julian and Anne raced down the stairs. Joanna rushed out into the hall, too, and almost sent Mr. Kirrin flying.

Then George did a very silly thing. She began to laugh - and when George laughed properly, her laugh was wonderful to hear! But neither Mr. Kirrin nor Professor Hayling thought it wonderful - they merely thought it rude! George was laughing at them - and that wouldn't do at all!

'This is absolutely the last straw!' shouted Mr. Kirrin, his face red with rage. 'First this boy ringing bells all over the place - and George encouraging him by laughing! I won't have it! Don't you know that very very important work is going on here, in Kirrin Cottage - work that may bring great benefits to the world! Fanny, send these children away somewhere. I won't have them in the house, disturbing us when we are doing such important work. Do you hear? SEND THEM AWAY! And that's my LAST word!'

And he and the Professor stalked back to the study and banged the door. WELL! Now what was to be done?

Chapter 4

TINKER HAS A WONDERFUL IDEA

Mrs. Kirrin had appeared during the row, and sighed when she heard her husband shouting. Oh dear dear - these scientists who liked to do wonderful things for the world - and yet often made their own families unhappy! She smiled at George's angry face, and took her arm.

'Come into the living-room, dear, and bring the others with you. We'll have to decide what can be done. Your father really is doing wonderful work, you know - and I must say that Tinker and Mischief and Timmy don't help very much! All right, all right, George - I know it isn't Timmy's fault - but he does have a very loud bark, you know!'

She took the five children and Timmy into the living room. The monkey, scared at the shouting had gone into hiding and was nowhere to be seen. Mrs. Kirrin called to Joanna.

'Joanna - come and help us to discuss what's to be done. This kind of thing can't go on.'

They all sat down, looking rather solemn. Timmy flopped down under the table, and put his nose on his paws. Where was that little monkey who had given him his biscuit?

The discussion began. George spoke first, most indignantly.

'Mother, this is our home. Why do we have to go away just because Father wants this scientist friend to stay with him? I have to do holiday homework, and I don't make a row every time

Father bangs a door when I'm studying. But if I so much as...'

'That will do, George,' said her mother. 'You ought to understand your father better than you seem to. You are both exactly the same - impatient, short-tempered, bangers-of-doors, and yet both so kind too! Now - let's see if we can find a way out.'

'I only wish we could stay at my home,' said Julian, feeling awkward. 'But it's all shut up now that my parents have gone away.'

'Can't we take tents over to Kirrin Island?' said George. 'Yes, Mother, yes - I know what you're going to say - it's only the beginning of April, and it's far too cold and all the rest of it, and...'

'The forecast for the weather is very bad,' said her mother. 'Rain, rain, nothing but rain. You can't possibly go and camp in the pouring rain - and row to and fro getting drenched each day - I'd have you all in bed with bronchitis before three days had gone - and then what should we do!'

'All right, Mother - have you any good suggestions?' said George, still cross. 'Hey - what's that monkey doing?' said Dick, suddenly. 'Stop him!'

'He's only poking the fire,' said Tinker. 'He thinks it's cold in here.'

'Well, what next!' said Joanna, and took the poker firmly from the monkey's little paw. 'Do you want to set the house on fire, you - you little...'

'Monkey!' finished Dick, with a grin. 'I must say that Mischief is always up to mischief! Can't keep your eye off him for a moment!'

'Well, now - if we can't go to Kirrin Island, or back home, or stay here - where can we go?' said Julian, looking serious. 'Hotels are too expensive - and which of our friends would like to have five of us to stay, plus a wicked little monkey and a big dog with an enormous appetite?'

There was a silence. What a problem! Then suddenly Tinker spoke up. 'I know where we could go - and we'd jolly well have some fun, too!' he said.

'Oh - and where is this wonderful place?' asked George disbelievingly.

'Well - I was thinking of my light-house,' said Tinker most surprisingly. And then, as no one said anything, but merely stared at him in astonishment, he nodded at them. 'I said my light-house - don't you know what a light-house is?'

'Don't be silly, please,' said Dick. 'This is not time for jokes.'

'It's not a joke,' said Tinker, indignantly. 'It's perfectly true. You ask my father.'

'But Tinker dear - you can't possibly own a light-house,' said Mrs. Kirrin, smiling.

'Well, I do,' said Tinker, quite fiercely. 'You see, my father had some very special work to do, that couldn't be done on land - so he bought an old empty light-house, and did his work there. I went to stay with him - my, it was grand there, with the wind and the waves crashing about all the time.'

'But - surely he didn't give it to you, did he?' said Julian, disbelievingly.

'Yes, he did. Why shouldn't he, if I wanted it badly?' demanded Tinker. 'He didn't want it any more, and nobody would buy it - and I wanted it terribly, so he gave it to me on my last birthday. And it's mine, I tell you.'

'Well, I'm blessed!' said Julian. 'Here's old George owning an island given to her by her mother - and Tinker owning a light-house given to him by his father! I wish my parents would present me with a volcano, or something really thrilling!'

George's eyes shone as she looked at the surprising Tinker. 'A light-house - of your very own! Where is it?'

'About ten miles along this coast to the west,' said Tinker. 'It's not an awfully big one, you know - but it's smashing! The old lamp is still there, but it's not used now.'

'Why not?' asked Dick.

'Well, because a big new light-house was built farther along the coast, in a better position for warning ships,' explained Tinker. 'That's why this old one was put up for sale. It was fine for my father to work in. Nobody ever disturbed him there - though he did get very angry with the sea-gulls sometimes. He said they mewed like great cats all the time, and made him feel he ought to put out milk for them.'

This made everyone burst into loud laughter, and Tinker sat beaming round proudly. How clever he must be to make these children laugh like that - yes, and even Joanna and Mrs. Kirrin too! He broke into their laughter by banging on the table.

'You do believe me now, don't you?' he said. 'It's quite true that the light-house is mine. You ask my father. Do let's all go and stay in it till our two fathers have finished their work. We could take Timmy and Mischief too - there's plenty of room.'

This proposal was so astonishing that no one answered for a few moments. Then George gave him a friendly dig in the chest.

'I'll come! Fancy living in a light-house! I bet the girls at school won't believe that!'

'Aunt Fanny! May we go?' said Anne, her eyes shining too.

'Well - I don't know,' said her aunt. 'It really is a most extraordinary idea. I shall have to discuss it with your uncle, and with Tinker's father too.'

'My father will say yes, I know he will!' said Tinker. 'We left some stores there - and some blankets - I say, wouldn't it be grand to run a light-house ourselves!'

The idea certainly appealed to all the Five - even Timmy thumped his tail on the floor as if he had understood every word. He probably had - he never missed anything that was going on!

'I've a map that shows where my light-house is,' said Tinker, scrabbling in one of his pockets. 'It's rather crumpled and dirty because I've looked at it so often. Look - here's a map of the coastline - and just there - built on rocks is my light-house. It's marked by a round dot, look!'

Everyone pored over the grubby map. Nobody had the least doubt but that this was the answer to all their problems! Dick stared at the excited Tinker. How lucky he was to own a light-house! Dick had never before met a light-house owner - and to think it should be this funny little Tinker!

'The rocks that the light-house is built on used to wreck many ships,' said Tinker. 'Wreckers used to work along that coast, you know - they would shine a light as if to guide ships along the coast, and make them go on the rocks. Crash! They'd be broken to pieces, and everyone drowned - and the wreckers would wait till the ship was washed up on the shore, and then take everything they could from her.'

'The wicked wretches!' said Dick, horrified.

'There's a Wreckers' Cave there, too, where the wreckers stored the things they stole from the wrecked ships,' said Tinker. 'I haven't been very far into it - I'm too scared to. They do say there's an old wrecker or two there still.'

'Oh nonsense!' said Mrs. Kirrin, laughing. 'That's probably just a tale to keep children away from dangerous caves and rocks. Well, dears - I really don't see any reason why you shouldn't go to Tinker's light-house, if his father agrees.'

'Mother! THANK YOU!' cried George and gave her mother a hug that made her gasp. 'I say - living in an old light-house - it's too good to be true! I shall take my binoculars and keep watch for ships!'

'Well, Julian had better take his record-player as well,' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'If it's stormy weather, it may be a bit duller than you think, mewed up in a lonely light-house!'

'It will be MARVELLOUS!' cried Tinker, and he suddenly became a racing-car, tearing round the room at top speed, making a most extraordinary noise. Timmy barked and Mischief began to chatter loudly.

'Sh!' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'You'll make your father cross, Tinker, and that will be the end of your fine idea. Switch your engine off, please, and sit down quietly! I'll talk to your father as soon as I can!'

Chapter 5

TINKER'S LIGHT-HOUSE

Mrs. Kirrin thought that she might as well go immediately to the study, and see if her husband and Professor Hayling could talk about the children going away to this light-house of Tinker's. Could it really be true? She knocked discreetly at the closed door.

She could hear voices inside the room, but nobody called 'Come in!' She knocked again.

'What is it now!' shouted Mr. Kirrin. 'If it's you, George, go away and keep away. And if it's Tinker, tell him to go to the garage and park himself there. I suppose it's he who has been making all that row this morning!'

Mrs. Kirrin smiled to herself. Well, well - if all scientists were like her husband and Professor Hayling, it was a wonder they were ever calm enough to get any work done!

She went away. Perhaps she could bring up the subject of the light-house at dinner-time. What a relief it would be to have a peaceful house for a few days!

She went into the kitchen to find Joanna. The monkey was there, helping her! He had slipped away from Tinker and gone to see if there were any tit-bits about. Joanna was talking away to him as she rolled out pastry.

'See, I roll it like this - and like that - and I pick off a tiny bit for you!' And she gave Mischief a snippet for himself. He was very pleased, and leapt on Joanna's shoulder. He lifted a piece of her hair and whispered in her ear. Joanna pretended to understand.

'Yes, Mischief, If you're good I'll give you another tit-bit in a minute. Now get off my shoulder, and stop whispering. It tickles!'

'Well, Joanna - I never thought to see you rolling pastry with a monkey on your shoulder!' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'Joanna, what do you think about this light-house idea? I haven't been able to get into the study yet! Mr. Kirrin thought I was Tinker, and told me to go and park myself in the garage!

'And a very good idea too,' said Joanna, rolling her pastry vigorously. 'Isn't that Tinker out in the hall now - sounds like a car of some sort! Well, ma'am, I'd say that if the light-house is habitable, why shouldn't the Five go there, with Tinker and the monkey? They'd enjoy themselves all right, and Timmy would look after them. Sort of thing that they love - rushing off to a light-house! Ugh! Nasty lonely place, with waves crashing round and a wind fit to blow your head off!'

'Yes, but do you think they'd be all right all alone there, Joanna!' said Mrs. Kirrin.

'Well, Julian and Dick are old enough to look after the others - though I must say I wouldn't like the job of being in charge of that Tinker,' said Joanna. 'All I hope is that he doesn't imagine he's an aeroplane all of a sudden, and take off from the top of the light-house!'

Mrs. Kirrin laughed. 'Don't say that to him!' she said. 'His idea of being a car is bad enough. Well, Joanna, I feel very mean sending George and the others away immediately they come here - but with two excitable scientists in the house, I don't see that there's anything else to do. Look out for that monkey - he's found your bag of raisins!'

'Oh you little Mischief!' said Joanna, and made a grab at the monkey. He shot off to the top of a cupboard with the bag of raisins firmly held in one paw. He made a tiny chattering noise, as if he were scolding Joanna.

'You come down with those raisins!' said Joanna, advancing to the cupboard. 'Else I'll tie you to a chair with that long tail of yours. You little monkey!'

Mischief said something in his funny little voice that sounded rather cheeky. Then he put his paw into the paper bag and took out a raisin. But he didn't eat it - he threw it straight at Joanna! It hit her on the cheek, and she stared at Mischief in astonishment.

'What! You'd pelt me with my own raisins! Well, that I will NOT have!' She went to the sink and filled a cup with water, while Mischief pelted both her and Mrs. Kirrin with raisin after raisin! He danced about on the top of the cupboard, screeching loudly in glee!

A bowl on the top of the cupboard fell off as the monkey danced about, and crashed to the ground. The noise scared him, and, with a flying leap, he shot off the cupboard and landed on the top of the half-open door. He pelted the two women from there, making the most extraordinary noises.

The study door was flung open, and out came Mr. Kirrin, followed by the Professor. 'What was that crash? What's happening here? How can we w...'

It was most unfortunate that Joanna should have thrown the cup of water at Mischief at that moment. He sat there on the top of the door - and the water fell all over him, splashed over the top of the door - and down on to Mr. Kirrin's head as he pushed the door open!

Joanna was horrified. She disappeared into the scullery at once, not knowing whether to laugh or to make her apologies.

Mr. Kirrin was astounded to find himself dripping wet. He stared angrily up at Mischief absolutely certain that it was the monkey who had emptied the water over him.

By this time the Five had come out of the living-room, wondering what the noise was. 'It's old Mischief,' said Tinker. 'Throwing water, I should think!'

'Well, actually, I threw the water,' began Joanna apologetically, peeping out of the scullery, 'because...'

'YOU threw it?' said Mr. Kirrin, amazed. 'What is happening in this house? Things have come to a pretty pass if you start flinging water at people, Joanna. You ought to be ashamed of yourself! Are you mad?'

'Listen, Quentin,' said his wife. 'Nobody's mad at present, but pretty soon we all shall be, if this sort of thing goes on! Quentin, are you LISTENING? I've something important to say to you - and to you too, Professor.'

The Professor remembered his manners. He gave a slight bow to Mrs. Kirrin. 'Please go on,' he said politely, and then flinched as a raisin hit him squarely on the head. Mischief had found one on the floor, and had taken a pot-shot at the Professor. Dick looked at the monkey admiringly - he really was a very good shot!

'What's that little fathead of a monkey throwing!' said Mr. Kirrin, fiercely, and at once knew when a raisin hit him smartly on the nose. 'Get rid of him! Put him in the dustbin! Why have I to put up with monkeys that throw things and boys that chug about the house like cars gone mad? I tell you Fanny, I will NOT have it!'

Mrs. Kirrin looked at him very sternly. 'Listen Quentin, I have something to say. LISTEN! Tinker says his father gave him a light-house for his own, and he suggests that he and all the others should leave here and go and stay in the light-house. Quentin, are you listening?'

'A light-house! Are you mad? What, that little monkey of a boy says he owns a light-house?'

And you believed him?' said Mr. Kirrin, amazed.

'Tinker's quite right, as it happens,' said Professor Hayling. 'I bought a light-house to work in when I wanted to get right away from everywhere and concentrate - and when I'd finished, I couldn't sell it - so as Tinker pestered me for it, I gave it to him. But not to live in!'

'A light-house to work in!' said Mr. Kirrin, thinking what a truly marvellous idea this was. 'I'll buy it from you! I'll...'

'No, Quentin, you won't do anything of the sort,' said his wife, firmly. 'Will you PLEASE listen to me, both of you. Professor Hayling, is the light-house fit for these five to stay in - and if so, they want to know if they can go there until you two have finished your work here. They're a nuisance to you - and to be quite honest, you're a nuisance to them!'

'Fanny!' said her husband, astonished and angry.

'Father, listen. We'll all get out of your way as soon as possible, if you'll say we can go to Tinker's light-house,' said George, planting herself firmly in front of her father. 'Say one word - YES - that's all we want.'

'YES!' shouted Mr. Kirrin, suddenly tired of all the argument, and longing to get back to his papers with the Professor. 'YES! Go to the light-house - go to the Tower of London - go and live at the Zoo, if you like! The monkeys will welcome that mischievous little creature, sitting grinning up there on the cupboard! But go SOMEWHERE!'

'Oh thank you, Father!' said George, joyfully. 'We'll go off to the light-house as soon as we can. HURRAY! THREE CH...'

But before she could continue, the study door shut with a bang behind the two exasperated men. George bent down, took Timmy's two front legs, and proceeded to dance all round the living-room with him, shouting HURRAY! THREE CHEERS!' over and over again.

Mrs. Kirrin sat down suddenly in a chair, and began to laugh. Joanna laughed too. 'If we don't laugh, we shall cry!' she said. 'What a hullabaloo! Well, it's a good thing they'll soon be off, ma'am. That loft is much too draughty for the boys, you know. Look at poor Julian - he's got such a stiff neck he can hardly turn it this morning.'

'Who cares?' said Julian. 'We'll soon be off again together, all the Five - and two more to keep us company. It will be quite an adventure!'

'An adventure?' said Tinker, surprised. 'But you can't have adventures in a light-house - it's out on the rocks, all by itself, as lonely as can be! There aren't any adventures to be found there!'

Ah - you wait and see, Tinker! You don't know the Five! If there's any adventure about, they're bound to be right in the middle of it!

Chapter 6

MAKING PLANS

It was very exciting making plans to go to the light-house. Tinker told them all about it, time and time again. 'It's very tall - and there's an iron stairway - a spiral one, going from the bottom up to the top. And at the top is a little room for the lamp that used to flash to warn ships away.'

'It sounds smashing,' said George. 'What about Timmy, though? Can he climb up a spiral stairway?'

'Well, he can live down at the bottom, can't he, if it's too difficult for him to climb up?' said Tinker. 'Mischief can climb it easily - he simply races up!'

'If Timmy has to live at the bottom, I shall live there with him,' said George.

'Why not wait and see the light-house before you arrange the sleeping places?' said Julian, giving her a friendly punch. 'Now first we must find out exactly where it is - and the way to get there. It's a pity Tinker can't turn into a real car - he could run us there in no time!'

Tinker at once imagined himself to be a large van, taking the Five and all their luggage along the road. He raced round the room, making his usual car noise, and hooting so loudly that he made everyone jump. Julian caught him as he raced round the table and sat him down firmly.

'Any more of that and we leave you behind,' he said. 'Now - where's that map of yours - let's have a look at it - and then we'll get Aunt Fanny's big map of the coast, and track down the road to your light-house.'

Soon Tinker and the Five were studying a large-scale map of the coast, Mischief sitting on Dick's shoulder and tickling his neck.

'See - that's the way to go,' said Julian. 'It really wouldn't be far by sea - look, round the coast here, cut across this bay, round the headland - and just there are the rocks on which the old light-house stands. But by road it's a very long way.'

'Better go by car, though,' said Dick. 'We've a good bit of luggage to take - not only our clothes, but crockery and things like that. And food.'

'There are still some stores there,' said Tinker, eagerly. 'Dad left some when we went away from the light-house.'

'They'll probably have gone bad,' said Julian.

'Well - don't take too much,' said Tinker. 'It's a pretty rough way over the rocks to the light-house - there isn't a road that runs right up to it, you know. We shall have to carry everything ourselves, once we get to the place. We can always get fresh food if we want it - the village isn't all that far away - but there are some days when you can't even leave the light-house! You see the waves splash house-high over the rocks when there's a rough wind. We'd have to get across by boat if the tide's in - the rocks are covered then!'

'This sounds too exciting for words!' said Dick, his eyes shining. 'What do you think about it, Anne? You haven't said a word!'

'Well - I do feel just a bit scared!' said Anne. 'It sounds so lonely. I do hope no ships will be wrecked on those awful rocks while we're there!'

'Tinker said there was a fine new light-house farther along the coast,' said Julian. 'Its light will keep every ship away from that wicked stretch of rocks. Look, Anne, you would like to come, wouldn't you? If not, Aunt Fanny wouldn't mind just you staying here - you're a little mouse, you wouldn't bother Uncle Quentin or the Professor at all!'

'I shouldn't DREAM of not coming with you,' said Anne, indignantly. 'Julian - you don't think there are still wreckers about, do you? I should hate that.'

'They belong to years gone by,' said Julian. 'Cheer up, Anne - this is just a little visit we're going to pay to Tinker's seaside house! He is kindly taking in visitors this spring!'

'Well, let's get on with our plans,' said Dick. 'We go there by car - er, what was that you just said, Tinker?'

'I said I'll drive you, if you like,' said Tinker. 'I could dr...'

'You haven't a driving licence, so don't talk nonsense,' said George, crossly.

'I know I haven't - but all the same I can drive!' said Tinker. 'I've driven my father's car round and round our garden, see? And...'

'Oh do shut up,' said Dick. 'You and your pretend cars! Julian, when shall we go to his light-house?'

'Well, why not tomorrow morning?' said Julian. 'I'm sure everyone would be glad if we left as soon as possible! It's hard on Aunt Fanny and Joanna to have so many here. We'll see about a car and someone to drive us, and then we'll pack and make our getaway!

'Hurray,' said George in delight, and pounded on the table, making Mischief leap up to the top of a bookcase in fright. 'Oh, sorry, Mischief - did I scare you? Timmy tell him I'm sorry, I didn't mean it. He probably understands your doggy language.'

Timmy looked up at Mischief, gave two little whines and a comforting wuff. Mischief listened with his head on one side, and then leapt down, landing neatly on Timmy's back.

'Thanks for giving him my message, Tim,' said George, and everyone laughed. Good old Timmy! He wagged his long tail and put his head on George's knee, looking up at her beseechingly.

'All right old thing - I understand your language, whether you talk with your voice or your eyes,' said George, patting him. 'You want a walk, don't you?'

'Woof!' said Timmy joyfully, and tore to the door.

'Let's walk down to the garage and see if they have a car or a van to hire out to us,' said Julian.

'We'll have to have a driver too, because someone has to take back the car. Come on, Timmy-dog!'

They all set off to the garage in the village. The rain held off for a while, and the sun came out, making Kirrin Bay sparkle and shine.

'I wish we could have gone to stay on my island,' said George. 'But it really is too damp to camp out. Anyway, a light-house will be nice for a change!'

The man at the garage listened to Julian's tale of wanting a car to go to the light-house. 'It's the old light-house at Demon's Rocks, not the new one at High Cliffs,' he said. 'We're going to stay there.'

'Stay at a light-house!' said the man. 'This isn't a joke, is it!'

'No. It happens to belong to one of us,' said Julian. 'We have a few things to take there, of course, and we hoped you'd have a car and a driver tomorrow for us. We'd let you know somehow when we are ready to come back from the light-house, and you can send the same car for us then.'

'Right,' said the man. 'And you're staying at Kirrin Cottage now, you say? Oh - your uncle is Mr. Kirrin? Well, I know Master George here, of course - but I wasn't certain who you were. Some queer people order cars, you know!'

George was pleased to be called Master George. It was nice to be thought a boy. She dug her hands deep down in the pockets of her jeans.

'We'd better take a few rugs and cushions,' said Julian. 'And some sweaters and wind-cheaters. I can't imagine it's very warm in the light-house.'

'There's an oil-heater there,' said Tinker. 'I think it was for the light-house lamp when it was in use. We can use that for warmth, if we're cold.'

'What sort of stores did you and your father leave there?' asked Dick. 'We'd better order some foodstuffs at the grocer's - and some ginger-beer or something - and take it all in the car.'

'Well - there's plenty of tinned food, I think,' said Tinker, trying to remember. 'We left it there in case my father wanted to come back at any time and work again in peace and quiet.'

'Hm. It's a pity he didn't fix up with Uncle Quentin to have him there with him,' said Julian. 'Then everyone would have been happy!'

They went to the grocer's and Anne tried her best to order what she thought they would need, outside of tinned food. 'Sugar - butter - eggs - oh dear - help me, George. How much shall I order?'

'Don't forget we can go shopping in Demon's Rocks village,' said Tinker. 'Only it's a bit of a nuisance if there's windy weather - the path over the rocks isn't very safe then. We might have to stay in the light-house for a day or two without leaving it. Even a boat might be too risky.'

'It sounds thrilling!' said George, picturing them all marooned by fierce storms, waiting to be rescued from peril and starvation! 'Get some biscuits, Anne. And bars of chocolate. And lots of ginger-beer. And a big bottle of lemonade. And a...'

'Wait a minute - do you know who's paying for all this?' said Julian. 'I am. So don't ruin me completely!' He took out his wallet. 'Here's a pound,' he said. 'That's all I can spare at present! Dick can buy the next lot of food we want!'

'Well, I've plenty of money too,' said Tinker, taking out a handful from his pocket.

'You would have!' said George. 'I suppose your father just hands out money whenever you ask him. He's so vague he wouldn't know if he paid you three times a day!'

'Well, yours seems pretty vague too,' said Tinker, smartly. 'He poured the coffee over his porridge this morning, instead of the milk. I saw him. And what's more, he ate it without even noticing it was coffee!'

'That's enough,' said Julian. 'We don't tell tales about our parents in public. Tinker, don't you want to take anything for Mischief to eat while we're in the light-house? George has bought biscuits for Timmy, and we're going to lay in a supply of bones, too.'

'I'll buy Mischief's food myself, thank you,' said Tinker, not very pleased at being ticked off by Julian. He gave an order for a packet of raisins, a packet of currants, a pound of apple rings and some oranges. Mischief eyed all these with very great pleasure.

'Paws off!' said George, sharply, as the little monkey slyly slid his paw into the bag of biscuits put ready for Timmy. Mischief jumped on to Tinker's shoulder and hid his face in his tiny paws, as if he were ashamed!

'We'll just buy some more fruit,' said Julian, 'and then I think we'll have enough. We'll have it all sent to the garage, and put in the car ready to take away tomorrow.'

'Tomorrow!' said George, her eyes shining. 'Oh, I hope it comes soon. I can't wait for it!'

Chapter 7

SEVEN OFF AT LAST

It was very exciting that evening to talk about the next day - the car coming to fetch them - the drive round the coast to Demon's Rocks - exploring the light-house - looking out over the endless sea, and watching the great waves coming in to pound on the rocks!

'What I'm looking forward to is our first night there,' said George. 'All alone, high up in that old light-house! Nothing but wind and waves around! Snuggling down in our rugs, and waking up to hear the wind and waves again.'

'And the gulls,' put in Tinker. 'They cry all the time. You can watch them from the light-house top. I wish I had wings like a gull - spread out wide - sitting on the wind as they glide!'

'Sitting on the wind - yes, that's exactly what they do!' said Anne. 'I just wish their cry didn't sound so mournful, though.'

Mrs. Kirrin was half-inclined not to let the children go after all! The weather forecast was bad, and she pictured them sitting half-frozen, and perhaps very scared, in the old deserted light-house. But no sooner did she begin to wonder out loud if she ought to let them go than the children raised their voices in indignant chorus!

'But we've ordered the CAR!'

'And heaps of food! And Joanna has packed up a big tin of all kinds of things. She even baked a special cake for us!

'Mother! How could you think of saying no when you've already said yes!'

'All right, all right, dears!' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'I wouldn't really stop you going. But do send me a card or two, will you? That's if there's anywhere to post one!'

'Oh, there's a tiny post-office in the village,' said Tinker. 'We'll send a card every day. Then you'll know we're all right.'

'Very well - but if a card doesn't come I'll be very worried,' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'So please do keep your word! You won't forget your anoraks will you - and your rubber boots, and...?'

'Mother! I feel as if you're going to mention umbrellas next!' said George. 'But honestly we'd be blown out to sea if we put an umbrella up on Demon's Rocks. Tinker says there's always a gale blowing round the coast there.'

'You can think of us playing Slap Bang with our packs of cards, and having a fine time in the light-house while storms rage round and howl like demons!' said Dick. 'We'll be sitting snug in our rugs, with ginger-beer beside us, and chocolate biscuits all round...'

'Woof,' said Timmy, at once, pricking his ears up at words he knew so well.

'Ha - you think you're going to feed on chocolate biscuits, do you, Tim?' said Dick, ruffling the dog's hairy head. 'And please don't interrupt the conversation. It's not good manners.'

'Woof' said Timmy apologetically, and licked Dick's nose.

'I think you'd all better go to bed early tonight,' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'You've still some packing to do tomorrow - and you say you've ordered the car for half past nine.'

'We'll be down to breakfast at eight o'clock sharp,' said Julian. 'I bet the Professor won't be down till about eleven, and forget all about his bacon and eggs! Tinker, does your father ever have a really hot meal? I mean - it seems to me he either forgets them altogether, or wanders in hours late, and then doesn't know if he's having breakfast, dinner, or supper!'

'Well, I can always eat up everything that's there, if I think he's forgotten to come,' said Tinker, sensibly. 'Mischief helps too. You'd be surprised how fond Mischief is of fat bacon.'

'I'm not a bit surprised at anything Mischief does,' said Julian. 'I'm just wondering how we are going to put up with his tricks when we're all cooped up in the light-house together! We can't send him out into the garden then, to work off some of his high spirits. Aunt Fanny, do you know he took my pencil this morning and scribbled monkey-words all over my wall-paper? It's a good thing I can't read monkey-language for I'm sure he wasn't scribbling anything polite!'

'You're not to say things like that about Mischief,' said Tinker, offended. 'He's very good-mannered for a monkey. You should see some monkeys I know!'

'I'd rather not, thanks,' said Julian.

Tinker was cross. He picked up Mischief and went out of the room. Soon there was the noise of a car out in the hall - one that needed repairing by the sound of it!

'R-r-r-r-RRRRRR-r-r-r-r, OOOOOOPH, Rrrrrrr, PARP!'

Mrs. Kirrin rushed to the door. 'You know you've been told not to be a car out in the hall. Come back before your father hears you, Tinker. My goodness me, this house will be an entirely different place, once it is rid of all the cars that have driven about in it since you came!'

'I was only being a tractor,' said Tinker, surprised. 'I always feel as if I must go and be a car when people are horrid to me or Mischief.'

'Oh, be your age!' said George.

'I shall go up to bed,' said Tinker, offended again.

'Well, that's not a bad idea, seeing that you have to be punctual tomorrow morning,' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'Good night, then, Tinker dear. Good night Mischief.'

Tinker found himself gently propelled to the door. He went up the stairs, grumbling, Mischief on his shoulder. But he soon stopped frowning as he undressed and thought of the next day. Off to the light-house - his light-house! Ha, that would make George and the others sit up. He snuggled down in bed with Mischief nestling beside him, one little paw down the front of Tinker's pyjama jacket.

Next morning George awoke first. She sat up, afraid that the weather forecast might be right, and that it would be pouring with rain. No - it was wrong for once - the sun shone down and she could not hear the sound of the sea - that meant that there was not much wind to blow up big waves that pounded on the shore.

She awoke Anne. 'Light-house day!' she said. 'Buck up - it's half past seven.'

They were all down very punctually to breakfast - except Professor Hayling! As usual he did not appear until breakfast was over, and then he sauntered in at the front door!

'Oh - you are up then,' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'I thought you were still asleep in bed.'

'No - Tinker woke me up at some very early hour,' complained the Professor. 'Or else it was the monkey - I really don't know. They both look alike to me in the early morning.'

Mr. Kirrin was already down, but hadn't come into breakfast. He was in his study as usual.

'George - go and fetch your father,' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'His breakfast will soon be uneatable.'

George went to the study door and knocked. 'Father! Don't you want your breakfast?'

'I've had it!' said a surprised voice. 'Very nice couple of boiled eggs.'

'Father! That was your yesterday's breakfast!' said George, impatiently. 'It's bacon and fried eggs today. You've forgotten as usual. Do come. We're leaving for the light-house soon.'

'Light-house - what light-house?' said Mr. Kirrin, in tones of great astonishment. But he had no answer. George had gone back to the dining-room, not knowing whether to laugh or frown. Really! Father was so forgetful that he would forget where he lived next!

There was great excitement after breakfast. Rugs - coats - night-clothes, the warmest that could be found - tins of cakes and mince-pies packed by Joanna - sandwiches to eat on the way - books - games - as George said, anyone would think they were going away for a month!

'The car's late!' said Dick, impatiently. 'Or else my watch is fast.'

'Here it comes!' said Anne, excited. 'Oh, Aunt Fanny, I wish you were coming too! We're going to have such fun! Where's Mischief - oh, there he is! And Timmy - Timmy, we're going to live in a light-house! You don't even know what that is, do you?'

The car came up to the front gate of Kirrin Cottage, and the driver blew his horn, making Mr. Kirrin almost jump out of his skin. He turned on poor Tinker at once. 'Was that you up to your silly tricks of pretending to be a car, and hooting again? Own up, now!'

'No sir, it wasn't, on my honour it wasn't,' said Tinker, indignantly, hopping out of the way of what looked as if it might be a very powerful slap. 'See - it's that car!'

'I'll just ask the driver what he means by driving up here and hooting fit to scare us all!' said Mr. Kirrin indignantly. 'What's he come here for, anyway?'

'FATHER! It's the CAR that's come to take us to the LIGHT-HOUSE!' said George, not knowing whether to laugh or be cross.

'Ah yes,' said Mr. Kirrin. 'Why didn't you tell me before? Well, good-bye, good-bye! Have a good time, and don't forget to dry yourselves well after a bathe.'

They piled into the car, and the man put their luggage into the big boot. He stared as Timmy and Mischief leapt in. 'Sure you've all got enough room?' he said. 'What a carful!'

Then to the accompaniment of a loud R-r-r-r-RRR from the car's engine, and an equally loud one from the delighted Tinker, the car turned and drove away down the sandy lane.

'We're off,' said George, in a happy voice. 'Off all by ourselves again. It's the thing I like best of all. Do you like it too, Tim?'

'WOOF!' said Timmy, agreeing heartily, and lay down with his head on George's foot. Ah - now for a lovely holiday with George. Timmy didn't mind where he went - even to the end of the world - so long as he was with George!

Chapter 8

THERE'S THE LIGHT-HOUSE!

Once they were out on the main road, Tinker began to talk to the driver, asking him questions about all kinds of cars. The others listened, amused.

'Well, I don't think much of the new cars,' said Tinker. 'All gadgets!'

'Some of the new gadgets are very good,' said the driver, amused with the cocky little boy, and he touched a little lever beside him. At once the window next to Tinker went down smoothly, with a curious low moan. Tinker was extremely startled.

'Oh, don't open that window,' said Anne, as a rough wind swooped in. 'For goodness' sake shut it, Tinker.'

Tinker shut it and began to talk about cars again. Once more the driver touched the lever beside him, and once more Tinker's window slid mournfully down, and a cold draught came in.

'TINKER! Don't mess about with the windows,' ordered Julian.

'I never touched the thing,' said Tinker, eyeing the window with suspicion. It suddenly shut itself, sliding upwards very smoothly. Tinker began to feel uncomfortable. He watched the window closely, afraid that it might play tricks again. The others, knowing perfectly well that the driver could open and shut any of the windows automatically from his own seat, nudged one another, and giggled. 'That shut up poor old Tinker!' murmured Dick.

It had. Not another word about new cars or old came from Tinker during the whole drive! It was a very pleasant one, mostly round the coast, and very little inland. The views were magnificent.

'That dog of yours seems to like the views,' said the driver. 'His head has been out of the window all the time.'

'Well - I always thought it was because he liked the fresh air,' said George. 'Timmy, is it because you enjoy the views?'

'Woof,' said Timmy, and withdrew his head to give George a lick. He also gave the little monkey a lick. Poor Mischief didn't much like the motion of the car. He sat very still indeed, afraid that he might be sick. The car purred along, sounding just like Tinker's usual imitation!

They stopped for an early lunch, and ate their sandwiches hungrily, sitting on a cliff. The driver had brought his own, and once Mischief had discovered that half the man's sandwiches were made of tomato, he sat on his knee in a very friendly manner, sharing his sandwiches in delight.

'We'll be there in another hour or so,' said the man. 'Where are you staying at Demon's Rocks? The garage didn't tell me.'

'At the light-house,' said Julian. 'Do you know it?'

'Yes - but people don't stay there!' said the driver, thinking that Julian was pulling his leg. 'What hotel are you going to - or are you staying with friends?'

'No. We really are going to the light-house,' said Tinker. 'It's mine. My very own.'

'Well - you've certainly got a place with a fine view!' said the driver. 'I was born at Demon's Rocks. My old great-grandad is still in the same cottage where I was born. My word - the stories he used to tell me of that old light-house - and how the wreckers got into it one night and grabbed the keeper there, and doused the light, so that a great ship might go on the rocks.'

'How horrible - and did it get wrecked?' asked Dick.

'Yes. Smashed to bits,' said the driver. 'Ab-sol-utely - smashed - to bits! And then they waited for the tide to wash up the wreckage. You ought to look up my old great-grandad, and get him to tell you his tales. He might even show you the Wreckers' Cave...'

'Oh - we heard about that,' said George. 'Is it really true - can we see it? And is there someone in there still?'

'No - no, all the old wreckers are gone long ago,' said the driver. 'As soon as the new light-house was built, the wreckers' day was done. It's so powerful, you see. Its beams can be seen even in the fiercest storm. The beam from the light-house you're going to wasn't very good - but it saved a good many ships, all the same!'

'What's your grandad's name?' asked George, making up her mind to look him up as soon as she could. 'Where does he live?'

'Ask for Jeremiah Boogle,' said the driver, carefully skirting a herd of cows. 'You'll find him sitting some where on the quay, smoking a long pipe, and scowling at anyone that comes nigh him. But he likes children, so don't you be afraid of his scowl. He'll tell you a few tales, will my old great-grandad! Well, bless us all, if there isn't another herd of cows coming round the corner.'

'Hoot at them,' said Tinker.

'Ever heard the rhyme about the cow that jumped over the moon, boy?' said the driver. 'Well, someone hooted when it came by, see? And that's what it did - jumped over the moon! No good driver hoots at cows. It scares them silly, and they jump like hares. Look - see that cliff round the curve of the coast there? Well, that's the first bit of Demon's Rocks. We'll soon be there now.'

'Why is it called that?' asked George.

'Well, the rocks there are so wicked that it was reckoned they could only have been put there by some kind of savage demon,' said the driver. 'Some are just below the water so that they catch the keel of a boat and rip it. Others stick up sharp as sharks' teeth - and there's a great ledge of rocks where a boat can be pounded to bits by the waves. Ah, they're Demon's Rocks all right!'

'When shall we see the light-house?' asked Tinker. 'We ought to see it soon.'

'Wait till another bit of the coast comes in sight as soon as we get to the top of this hill,' said the driver. 'And just tell that monkey of yours to take his paw out of my coat-pocket. I've no more tomatoes there!'

'Behave yourself, Mischief,' said Tinker, so sternly that the little creature hid its face in its paws and whimpered.

'Little humbug!' said George. 'There's not a tear in his eye! Oh look - is that the light-house?'

'Yes. That's it,' said the driver. 'You get a good view of it now, from this hill. Fine one isn't it, for an old one? Ah, they could build well in those days. That one's made of stone. It's wave-swept so it has to be fairly tall, or the shining of the lamp would have been hidden by the spray falling on the windows.'

'Where did the light-house keeper live?' asked Dick.

'Oh, there's a cosy enough room just under the lamp room,' said the driver. 'My grandad took me up there once. I never saw such a view of a stormy sea in my life!'

'My father lived there all one summer,' boasted Tinker. 'I was with him most of the time. It was grand.'

'Why did your father want to live in a light-house?' asked the driver, curiously. 'Was he hiding, or something?'

'Of course not. He's a scientist, and he said he wanted peace and quiet, with no telephones ringing, and no one coming to see him,' said Tinker.

'And do you mean to say he had peace and quiet with you there?' said the driver teasingly. 'Well, well!'

'It's not so quiet there really,' said Tinker. 'The waves make such a noise, and so does the wind. But my father didn't really notice those. He only notices things like bells ringing, or people talking, or somebody knocking at the door. Things like that drive him mad. He loved the light-house.'

'Well - I hope you enjoy yourselves there,' said the driver. 'It's not my cup of tea - hearing nothing but waves and gulls crying. Better you than me!'

They descended the other side of the hill and the light-house was no longer to be seen. 'Soon be there now,' said Tinker. 'Mischief, will you like to be at the light-house again? My word, how quickly you could go up the spiral staircase and down - do you remember?'

The car swept down almost to the edge of the sea. The light-house was now plainly to be seen, a good way out from the shore. A small boat bobbed at a stone jetty, and Tinker pointed it out with a scream of joy. 'That's the boat we had - the one that took us to and from the light-house when the tide was in! It's called Bob-About, and my word, it does bob about too.'

'Is it yours?' asked George, rather jealously.

'Well, it was sold with the light-house, so I suppose it is,' said Tinker. 'Anyway, it's the one we'll use when we can't wade over the rocks.'

'Well, see you don't get storm-bound in the light-house,' said the driver, bringing the car to a stop. 'The sea between Demon's Rocks and the jetty will be too rough for that little boat, in stormy weather.'

'I can manage boats all right,' said George. 'I've had one since I was small.'

'Yes. You're pretty good with them, that I do know,' said the driver. 'Well - here we are. Are you going to go straight to the light-house - in that boat? Shall I help you to carry your things to it?'

'Well thanks,' said Julian, and between them they carried everything to the little boat. An old man sat nearby, and he touched his cap to them. 'Message came through from Kirrin to say I was to get the old boat out for you,' he said. 'Which of you is Master Hayling?'

'I am,' said Tinker. 'And that's my boat, and that's my light-house! Come on, everyone - let's row to the light-house - come on! I can hardly wait to get there!'

Chapter 9
INSIDE THE LIGHT-HOUSE

The five children jumped down into the boat, which was certainly acting up to its name of Bob-About! Timmy leapt in after George, but Mischief the monkey cried in terror when Tinker took him into the bobbing boat and sat down, holding him firmly.

'It's all right, Mischief,' said Tinker. 'Don't you remember this little boat of mine? You never did like going in a boat, though, did you?'

There were two pairs of oars. Julian took one pair, and George was going to take the other, when Dick quietly took them himself, grinning at George's angry face.

'Sorry - there's a good old swell on the sea, and we've to row through some pretty good waves. I'm just a bit stronger than you, George!'

'I row just as well as you do,' said George. The boat gave a great roll to one side just then, and she just managed to save one of their suitcases from toppling overboard.

'Well saved!' said Julian. 'And only just in time too! My word, what a swell there is just here!'

'Are you going to row right over the rocks?' asked Anne peering down into the water. 'They are covered by the water now - we shan't scrape the bottom of the boat at all.'

'These are the rocks that we can walk over when the tide's out,' said Tinker. 'Lovely pools there are in them, too! I used to wallow in a nice warm one that was so well-heated by the sun that I wished I had a cold tap to turn on when the water felt too hot!'

Anne chuckled. 'I wish it was warm enough to bathe now,' she said. 'My word - look down and see what horrible rocks there are, just beneath the boat!'

'Yes - I bet they ripped up many a poor ship in the old days,' said Julian. 'No wonder they called them Demon's Rocks! It's a bit of a pull over them, isn't it, Dick?'

'Let me have a turn,' said George, grabbing at one of Dick's oars.

'Nothing doing,' said Dick, with a grin. 'You just look after those bags, old thing!'

'Is it a very old light-house?' asked Anne, as they swung over the hidden rocks, and the light-house came nearer and nearer. 'It looks old!'

'Yes, it is,' said Tinker. 'It's an odd little light-house, really - built by a rich man years and years ago. His daughter was drowned in a ship that was wrecked on these rocks - so he built a light-house, partly as a memorial to the girl, and partly to prevent other shipwrecks.'

Anne gazed at it. It was sturdily built and seemed very tall to her. Its base was firmly embedded in the rocks below it. Dick thought that the foundations must go very deep down into the rocks, to hold the light-house firmly in the great gales that must blow in bad weather. A gallery, rather like a verandah, ran round the top, just below the windows through which the light-house lamp once shone. What a view there would be from that gallery, thought Anne.

They came near to the light-house, which had stone steps running from the rocks up to a doorway built some way above the crashing waves.

'Will the door be locked?' asked Dick, suddenly. 'I wouldn't want to row all this way and then find we can't get into the place!'

'Of course the door will be locked,' said Tinker. 'Anyone got the key?'

'Oh, don't be a donkey!' said Julian, resting his oars, and glaring at Tinker. 'Do you mean to say we can't get in, after all this?'

'It's all right!' said Tinker, grinning at Julian's dismayed face. 'I just wanted to pull your leg. Here's the key! It's my light-house, you see, so Dad gave me the key, and I always carry it about with me. It's very precious.'

It was an extremely large key, and George marvelled that Tinker could keep it in his pocket. He flourished it at them, grinning again. 'I'm looking forward to unlocking my light-house with my key!' he said. 'I bet you wish you had a light-house of your own, George.'

'Well, yes, I do,' said George, gazing up at the towering light-house, now so near to them.

'You'd better be a bit careful now,' said Tinker to the boys. 'Wait till a big wave swells up, then ride over it, and make for that rock over there - the one standing out of the water. There's a calm bit beyond it, for some reason, and you can row up to the steps quite safely. Look out for a stone post there, and chuck the rope round it, George. You're in a better position than I am for that.'

It was all done much more easily than the Five hoped. The boat swung into a stretch of fairly calm water, and the two boys rowed hard for the steps. George neatly threw the loop of rope over the post - and there they were, at the foot of the light-house, with only a few rocks to climb over to reach the steps. These rocks were not under water, and one by one the children and Timmy jumped out, and stared up at the light-house. It seemed much bigger now that they were just at the bottom!

'I'll unlock the door,' said Tinker, proudly, and climbed up the steep stone steps. 'Look at the enormous great stones that my light-house is made of. No wonder it has stood so long!'

He thrust the great key into the lock of the stout wooden door, and tried to turn it. He struggled for a minute, and then turned to the others with a scared face. 'I can't open the door!' he said. 'Now what do we do?'

'I'll have a try,' said Julian. 'It's probably stuck.' He took hold of the key, gave it a strong twist - and opened the door! Everyone was most relieved. Julian pushed the others in out of the wind and the spray, and shut the door firmly.

'Well - here we are!' he said. 'Isn't it dark! Good thing I brought a torch!'

He shone the torch round, but all that was to be seen was a steep iron staircase spiralling up the middle of the light-house!

'The staircase goes right up to the top, to the lamp-room,' explained Tinker. 'It passes through a few rooms on the way. I'll show you. Hang on to the railing of the staircase, you may feel giddy going up round and round so steeply.'

Tinker proudly led the way up the steep little staircase, that went round and round and round! They came to a hole through which the stairway passed into a little dark room. 'One of the store-rooms,' said Tinker, and flashed his torch round. 'See - there are tins of food that I told you my father and I left here. Now we go on up to the oil-room - that's not very big.'

'What's the oil-room?' asked Anne.

'Oh it was just where tins of paraffin oil used to be kept - the oil they used for the light at the top of the light-house. The old lamp had to burn oil, you see - there wasn't electricity in those days. Look - here's the oil-room.'

The oil-room had a very low ceiling, no window, and was packed with old tins. It had a nasty smell, and Anne held her nose with her fingers.

'I don't like this room,' she said. 'It has a horrid smell and a horrid feel about it! Let's go on up the staircase.'

The next room had one of the few little windows in the light-house, and as the sun came through it, it was much lighter and more cheerful.

'This was where my father and I slept,' said Tinker. 'My word - look, we forgot to take that old mattress away with us. What a bit of luck! We can use it!'

Up the spiral staircase they went once more, and this time came to a room with a higher 'ceiling' than the others, and a good window, though small. The sun came through this one too, and it looked quite homely! It had a table, and three chairs, and a box. It also had an old desk, and a little paraffin stove for boiling water or frying food.

'There's my old frying-pan!' said Tinker. 'We'll find that jolly useful. And a kettle - and a saucepan. And we left spoons and forks and knives behind, though not enough for all five of us, I'm afraid. And there's crockery too - though not as much as there ought to be. I broke rather a lot. But there are some tin cups and plates - I used just to wipe them clean with a cloth. Water's precious in a light-house you know.'

'Where is the water-tank?' asked George. 'We'll have to have some water.'

'My father arranged a catch-tank on the west side of the light-house,' said Tinker, proudly. 'It catches rainwater, and runs into a pipe that goes through one of the windows and fills a little tank over a sink. I forgot to show you that. There's a tap to turn the water on and off. My father's very clever you know - and a thing like that is as simple as ABC. He didn't want to have to fetch water every day for washing in! Gosh, we did have fun here!'

'Well, it looks as if you'll have some more fun!' said Dick. 'You've plenty of company this time! You must have been jolly lonely before.'

'Oh well - I had Mischief,' said Tinker, and when he heard his name, the little monkey came scampering over to him, and leapt into the boy's arms, cuddling into him lovingly.

'And what's the next room in this marvellous little light-house?' asked Julian.

'There's only one more - and that's the lamp-room. I'll show you that - it used to be the most important room in the place - but now it's lonely - never used - quite forgotten! Come and see!' And up the last spiral of the stairway went Tinker. How very, very proud he was of his light-house!

Chapter 10

SETTLING IN

Once more they all climbed up the spiral stairway. Timmy rather slowly, for he found the winding stairs difficult. Mischief shot up in front of them, almost as if he were the owner of the light-house, and was showing off his home!

The lamp-room was a high room with big windows all round it. It was very bright, for the sun shone steadily into it. The view was magnificent!

Anne gave a shout of wonder! The light-house was so high that the children could see for miles and miles over the heaving dark blue sea. They went all round the lamp-room, looking in every direction.

'I say! There's a door here!' cried Dick. 'Does it open on to that little balcony, or gallery, or whatever it is that runs all round this room?'

'Yes. The gallery goes completely round the lamp-room,' said Tinker. 'My word, you should see it sometimes when the weather's rough, and the gulls go seeking somewhere out of the storm. They perch on that gallery by the dozen! But you can't go out there except in calm weather - you might be blown right off! You've no idea what it's like when there's a storm. Honestly, one night when my father and I were here I thought I felt the light-house rocking!'

'This is about the most exciting place I've ever stayed in,' said Anne, her eyes shining. 'Tinker, I think you are the luckiest boy in the world!'

'Do you really?' said Tinker, pleased. He gave Anne a little pat. 'I hoped you'd like it. Mischief loves it - don't you, Mischief?'

Mischief was up on top of the great lamp. He chattered down to Timmy as if he were telling him all about it. Timmy listened, his ears cocked, his head on one side.

'He looks just as if he understood that monkey-gabble!' said George. 'Tinker - this lamp is never lighted now, is it?'

'No, never,' said Tinker. 'I told you there is a fine new light-house a bit farther down the coast. It has a terrific lamp - run by electricity. We shall see its beam sweeping the sea at night.'

'Why don't people build light-houses and live in them?' wondered George, as she gazed out over the wide blue sea.

'Anyone feeling hungry?' asked Tinker, rubbing his tummy. 'I feel jolly empty.'

'Oh gosh - we haven't taken the things out of my boat!' said Tinker. 'Come on - let's carry them all indoors, and have a meal. What's the time? Past four o'clock! No wonder I feel empty. Come on, Mischief - to work! You can carry some of the things in too.'

They ran down the spiral stairway, through room after room, and came to the great door. 'I suppose it had to be built as thickly and strongly as possible, because of the sea dashing against it in storms,' said Julian, pulling it open. The wind rushed in and almost knocked him over! They pushed their way out, and climbed back over the rocks to where they had left the boat. It was bobbing gently up and down in the little stretch of calm water.

'Hallo, Bob-About!' said Tinker. 'Did you think we were never coming? Got all our goods safely? Good little boat!'

'Ass!' said Dick, grinning. 'Come on, Ju - I'll take half the heavy things, you take the rest. The girls and Tinker can manage the smaller things. Hey, Mischief, what do you think you're doing?' Mischief had picked up a parcel or two, and was bounding off with them. 'It's all right! He's used to helping!' shouted Tinker. 'He often goes shopping with me, and carries bags and things. Let him help, he likes it.'

The monkey certainly was very useful. He scampered to and fro with all kinds of little things, and chattered happily. Timmy stood staring at him, his tail down, wishing he could use his paws as nimbly as Mischief could. George gave him a loving pat.

'It's all right, Timmy, darling. Here - take this basket.'

Timmy took the basket in his mouth by the handle and leapt happily up the steps of the light-house. He might not be able to pick up the little things that Mischief so easily managed - but at least he could carry baskets!

'We'll leave the boat bobbing up and down,' said Tinker. 'It will be quite all right there, tied to the post, unless the sea gets terribly rough - then we'll have to pull it halfway up the steps.'

'Let's have our meal and unpack before we arrange our things,' said Anne. 'I really do feel very hungry now. What sort of a meal shall we have? I feel as if I want something more than a tea-time meal!'

'That's the worst of living in a light-house,' said Tinker, quite seriously. 'You're awfully hungry nearly all the time. I used to have five or six meals a day when I stayed here with my father.'

'Sounds all right to me,' said Dick, with a grin. 'Let's have a "tea-sup" meal, shall we? A mixture of tea and supper! Tea-sup!'

Some of the things were put into the bedroom and some into the living-room. Soon Tinker popped a saucepan of water on the stove to boil. Because of the rainy weather, the little rain-catch tank had provided plenty of water for the small inside tank set over the sink, which was most conveniently put in the living-room. When Tinker turned on the tap, out came clear rain-water!

'Magic!' said Anne, delighted. 'I feel as if I'm in a dream!'

Eggs were put into the saucepan, and were soon boiled. 'Exactly three minutes and a half,' said Anne, ladling out each one with a spoon. 'TWO eggs each! At this rate we shall have to go shopping every day! George, you cut some bread-and-butter. The bread's in that bag - but goodness knows where the butter is. I know we bought some.'

'What about having a few of Joanna's famous mince-pies too?' said Dick, taking the lid off a big square tin. 'Whew! Dozens! And cherry buns as well! And home-made macaroons - Joanna's speciality! I say - what a meal!'

'What shall we have to drink?' said Julian. 'Ginger-beer? Lemonade? Or shall we make some tea?'

Everyone voted for ginger-beer. It was a very pleasant and cheery meal that the Five had in the old light-house, with Mischief and Tinker. The gulls called outside, the wind gave the light-house an occasional buffet, and the sound of the sea was mixed with all the other noises - lovely! Anne hugged her knees as she waited for her ginger-beer. To think they were going to stay here for days and days. All by themselves.

When the meal was over, Anne and George washed up in the little sink. 'Oh don't wash up - just give the things a quick wipe-over!' said Tinker. 'Like this!'

'Oh no!' said Anne. 'That's just like a boy! You'd better leave this side of things to me. I like doing jobs like this, see?'

'Just like a girl!' said Tinker, with a grin.

'No, it isn't,' said George. 'I hate doing them, and I'm a girl - though I wish I wasn't!'

'Never mind - you look like a boy, and you're often as rude as a boy, and you haven't an awful lot of manners,' said Tinker, quite thinking that he was comforting George.

'I've more manners than you,' said George, and stalked off in a huff to look out of the windows. But nobody could be in a huff for long, with that wonderful view - sea for miles and miles, tipped here and there with white breakers. George gave a sigh of pleasure. She forgot that she was annoyed with Tinker, and turned to him with a smile.

'If I could own this view, I'd feel I was the richest person in all the world!' she said. 'You're very lucky, Tinker.'

'Am I?' said Tinker, thinking it over, 'Well, you can have half the view, if you like. I don't want it all.'

Julian laughed, and clapped the boy on the back. 'We'll all share it, while we're here!' he said. 'Come on - let's unpack and arrange everything. Girls, you had better sleep here in this living-room - and we three boys will sleep down in the bedroom. That all right by you, Tinker?'

'Fine - so long as you don't mind Mischief sleeping with us,' said Tinker. 'Anyway I expect Timmy will sleep with the girls.'

'Woof,' said Timmy, agreeing. He was certainly not going to sleep anywhere without George! They all had fun unpacking, and putting the things in the different places. 'Store-room for that,' Julian said, 'and living-room for this and this - and bedroom for these rugs - thought these two had better go to the living-room, because the girls will sleep there.'

'Cards for the living-room,' said Dick, handing them to Anne. 'And books. And papers. Gosh, we mustn't forget to send a card each day to Aunt Fanny. We promised we would.'

'Well, she'll know we arrived safely today because the car-driver will be sure to send a message to her,' said George. 'But tomorrow we'll go down to the village and buy a stock of post-cards - and we'll send one every single day. I know Mother will worry if we don't.'

'All mothers are worriers,' said Dick. 'It's a nuisance - but on the other hand it's one of the nice things about them. Now then - what about a game of cards?'

And there they all are in the light-house, playing cards with shouts and laughter, Timmy and Mischief watching. You do have fun together, Five, don't you?

Chapter 11

JEREMIAH BOOGLE

When it began to get dark, Tinker left the card-table, and fetched an old-fashioned oil-lamp. He shook it.

'It's still got some oil in,' he said. 'Good. I'll light it, then we can see properly.'

'What a pity we can't light the great oil-lamp at the top of the light-house,' said George. 'That must have been the light-house keeper's great moment - lighting up the lamp to warn ships away. I wonder who first thought of a light-house - someone whose folk sailed, and might be wrecked on rocks, I suppose?'

'One of the first great light-houses was built ages ago on an island called Pharos at the mouth of the Nile, not far from the great port of Alexandria,' said Julian.

'What was it built of - stone, like this one?' asked Tinker.

'No. It was built of white marble,' said Julian. 'I thought of it today when we went up the spiral staircase here - because the Pharos light-house had one too - much, much bigger than ours.'

'What was their lamp like?' asked Tinker.

'I don't know if it had a lamp,' said Julian. 'It's said that an enormous fire was built each night on the top of the light-house, whose flames could be seen by ships a hundred miles away!'

'Goodness - it must have been a pretty high light-house, then, this Pharos!' said Dick.

'Well, it was supposed to be 600 feet high!' said Julian.

'Whew! I wonder the wind didn't blow it down!' said Dick. 'Let's go and see it one day - if it's still there.'

'Ass!' said Julian. 'It's gone long since. After all, it was built over twenty-two hundred years ago! An earthquake came along one day and the magnificent light-house was shaken to bits - completely destroyed!'

There was a shocked silence. Everyone looked round at the walls of the light-house they were in. An earth-quake! What a catastrophe that would be for even a little light-house!

'Cheer up, Anne!' said Julian, with a laugh. 'We're not likely to be visited by an earthquake tonight! That old light-house on Pharos Island was one of the Seven Wonders of the Ancient World. No - don't ask me the others - I'm getting too sleepy to remember!'

'I wish we could light the lamp in this light-house,' said Anne. 'It can't like being a blind light-house, after shining brightly for so many years. Could the lamp be lighted, Tinker, or is it broken now?'

'Anne - if you think we're going to scramble round that lamp-room and light the lamp just because you feel sorry about it, you're mistaken,' said Dick, firmly. 'Anyway, it's sure to be out of order after all these years.'

'I don't see why it should be,' objected Tinker. 'The lamp's never been interfered with.'

'Look - are we going to go on with our game, or are we not?' said Julian. 'I may as well remind you that I have won practically every game so far! Unless someone else wins a game soon I shall consider that I'm playing with a set of nitwits!'

That was quite enough to make everyone pick up their cards, and see if they couldn't possibly beat Julian!

'We'll jolly well play till you're well and truly beaten!' said Dick.

But no - nobody could beat Julian that night. Luck went his way all the time. At the end of the fifth game Anne yawned loudly.

'Oh sorry!' she said. 'Don't think I'm bored. That yawn came too suddenly for me to stop it.'

'Well, I feel decidedly yawny too,' said Dick. 'What about a snack of something - and then we'll go to bed. We had such an enormous tea-sup that I feel I can't manage another meal - but a chocolate biscuit or two would be quite welcome.'

'Woof!' said Timmy at once, agreeing heartily, and Mischief said something in his little chattering voice, and tugged at Tinker's sleeve.

'I'll bring you a snack or two,' said Anne, getting up. She soon came back with a tray on which she had put lemonade, large slices of Joanna's new cake, and a chocolate biscuit for everyone, including Timmy and Mischief.

They ate with enjoyment, feeling lazy and comfortable. 'And now to bed!' said Julian. 'Girls, do you want any help with your mattress or rugs or anything?'

'No, thanks,' said Anne. 'Do you boys want to wash, and clean your teeth at the sink here? Because if so, do it now.'

Before a quarter of an hour had gone, everyone was bedded down comfortably. The three boys curled up in rugs in the bedroom below, with Mischief cuddled into Tinker's neck. The two girls and Timmy lay on a mattress, with a blanket over them. Timmy lay beside George, occasionally licking her ear with his big tongue.

'Dear Timmy!' said George, sleepily. 'I love you - but do please keep your tongue to yourself!'

And soon they were all asleep, boys, girls, and animals too. Outside, the sea sighed and splashed and swirled, and the wind cried like the day-time gulls. But all was peace and quiet inside the old light-house. Not even Mischief the monkey stirred in his sleep.

It was fun to wake up in the morning, and hear the gulls screaming round; fun to have breakfast of eggs and bread-and-butter, and apples to crunch afterwards - fun to plan what to do that day.

'I vote we do a bit of shopping and buy some more eggs, and fresh bread, and a bottle or two of creamy milk,' said Anne.

'And we might try and find that car-driver's great-grandad, and ask him a few things about the light-house, and the wreckers that came in the old days,' said Dick.

'Yes - and he might show us the Wreckers' Cave!' said Julian. 'I'd like to see that! Buck up with whatever jobs there are to do, Anne and George - and we'll go over the rocks to the jetty. The tide should be out, so we ought to be able to walk over.'

'Well, we must be back before the tide comes in, then,' said Tinker. 'Because if we leave the boat tied up here by the light-house, we shan't be able to get back once the sea sweeps over the rocks and cuts us off!

'Right,' said Julian. 'Be ready as soon as you can, girls.'

The girls were ready very quickly, and the little party set off over the rocks that at low tide lay between the light-house and the shore. Wicked rocks they were too - with sharp edges and points that would hole a ship at once!

Soon the children were on the little stone jetty. 'What was the name of old great-grandad?' said Dick frowning.

'Jeremiah Boogle,' said Anne. 'And he smokes a long pipe, and scowls at people.'

'Well - he should be easy to find!' said Julian. 'Come along. He's probably somewhere on the quay.'

'There he is!' said George, spotting an old man with a long pipe in his mouth. 'That's Jeremiah, I'm sure!'

Yes, there he was, sitting with his legs stretched out in front of him, an old old man, smoking a very long pipe! He had a fine beard, a yachting cap askew on his head, and such enormous shaggy eyebrows that it was difficult to see his eyes beneath them!

The Five went up to him, with Timmy trotting behind, and Mischief on Tinker's shoulder. The old man spotted Mischief at once.

'Well, well - a monkey!' he said. 'Many's the little monkey I've brought home from my voyages.' He snapped his fingers and made a curious noise in his throat. Mischief stared at him, listening. Then he leapt from Tinker's shoulder on to the old man's, and rubbed his head against the old sailor's hairy ear.

'Mischief!' said Tinker, amazed. 'Look at that, George. He never goes to a stranger!'

'Well, maybe I knew his great grandfather!' said the old sailor, laughing, and scratching Mischief's neck. 'All monkeys like me - and I like them!'

'Er - are you Mr. Jeremiah Boogle!' asked Julian.

'Jeremiah Boogle, that's me,' said the old fellow, and touched his cap. 'How do you know my name?'

'Well, Jackson, the car-driver, told us he was your great-grandson,' said Julian. 'You see we're staying at the old light-house - and Jackson said you could tell us a few things about it - its history, you know. And about the wreckers that lived here before the light-house was built.'

'Oh, I can tell you tales all right!' said Jeremiah, puffing out a cloud of smoke, and making Mischief cough. 'That's more than that silly young great-grandson of mine can! He don't know nothing, nothing at all - except about cars. Well, who wants cars, nasty, smelly noisy things? Pah! That young George Jackson is a ninny!'

'He's not. He's the cleverest mechanic in the place!' said George, at once. 'There's not a thing he doesn't know about cars!'

'CARS! There now, what did I say - nasty, noisy, smelly things!' said Jackson's great-grandad, with a snort.

'Well, look - we don't want to talk about cars,' said Julian. 'You tell us about the old days - the wreckers and all that!'

'Ah - them old days!' said great-grandad. 'Well I knew some wreckers myself, once - there was One-Ear Bill, now...' And then old Jeremiah told a story that the Five could hardly believe!

Chapter 12

JEREMIAH'S TALE

'Now when I was a boy,' began the old man, 'a boy not much older than this here youngster,' and he poked Tinker with his horny forefinger, 'there wasn't no light-house out there - but there was always them wicked rocks! And many's the time in a stormy season when ships have been caught by their teeth, a - glittering there, waiting. You know what they're called, don't you?'

'Yes. Demon's Rocks,' said Tinker.

'Well, up on that high cliff there, lived a wicked old man,' said Jeremiah. 'And he had a son as bad as himself, and a nephew too. The Three Wreckers, they were called, and I'll tell you how they came by their name.'

'Did you know them?' asked Dick.

'That I did! And if I was hidden behind a bush when they came marching by, I'd send a stone skedaddling after them!' said the old man. 'Mean and cruel and wicked they were. And everyone was skeered of them, right down afraid! There was One-Ear, the old man. They say his left ear was chewed off by a monkey, but do I blame that monkey? No, I do not, no more than I'd blame your monkey for chewing off the ear of somebody else I know - but I won't mention no names, he might hear me.'

The old fellow looked over his shoulder as if the man he was thinking of might be about.

'Well - there was One-Ear, the old man - and there was Nosey, the son - and Bart his nephew - and not a pin to choose between them for meanness. There was only one thing they were after - and that was money! And a mighty wicked way they chose to get it.' The old man stopped and spat in disgust on the pavement.

'Pah! I'll tell you how they got rich, oh yes, I'll tell you. And I'll tell you what happened to them in the end too. Be a lesson to you and to everyone! Well now, you see that high cliff away down the coast there - the one with the flag-post and the flag a - waving in the wind?'

'Yes,' said everyone, looking at the waving flag.

'Now ships mustn't hug the coast beyond that point!' said grandad. 'If they do, they'll be forced inland by the current, and thrown on them rocks down there - Demon's Rocks. And that's the end of them. No ship has ever been able to escape the sharp teeth of them wicked rocks, once she's caught in that current. Well now, to stop the ships going near to the cliff in those days, they flew a flag in the day-time - and lighted a lamp up there at night. And both said as plain as could be "BEWARE! KEEP OUT! DANGER!"'

'Of course, all sailors knew the flag and the lamp too, and many a one blessed them, and took their ships out to sea, away from Demon's Rocks. But that didn't suit old One-Ear Bill. He didn't mind a wreck or two! He'd be down on the beach picking up what he could, if a ship came smashing down on the rocks. And would he save a single soul - not he! There was some people said he was the Demon of Demon's Rocks himself!'

'What a wicked old man!' said Anne horrified.

'Aye, you're right missie,' said the old fellow. 'Well, the wrecks didn't come often enough for him and Nosey and Bart. So they put their ugly heads together and thought up as wicked a plan as any man could think of!'

'What was it?' said Tinker, his eyes almost falling out of his head.

'Well, on a stormy night he put out the lamp a-shining brightly on the far cliff, and he and Nosey carried it to that bit of cliff over yonder, see?' and the old man pointed to a jutting-out piece nearby. 'And you know what's just below that cliff, don't you - all round the light-house!'

'Rocks! Sharp, horrible rocks - the Demon's Rocks!' said George, horrified.

'Do you mean to say that One-Ear Bill and the others deliberately shone the lamp there on stormy nights, to guide ships straight on to the rocks?' said Julian.

'Aye, that's what I do mean,' said Jeremiah Boogle. 'And what's more I met old One-Ear Bill meself one dark night when the storms were on - and what was he carrying between himself and Nosey - the lamp! They'd doused the light, of course, but I'd my own little lantern with me, and I saw the lamp plain enough. Aye, that I did! And when they saw me, they set Bart on to me, to push me over the cliff, so that I wouldn't tell on them. But I got away, and I DID tell on 'em! Ho, yes, I told all right. And One-Ear Bill went to prison, and serve him right, the wicked man. But he didn't care - and why should he? He was rich! RICH!'

'But how was he rich?' asked Dick.

'Well, young sir, the ships that came sailing round this coast in those days, came from far-off countries, and many of them carried treasure,' said Jeremiah. 'And One-Ear Bill stole so much gold and silver and pearls and other things from the wrecks that he knew he wouldn't need to do another day's work when he came out of prison. A rich man he would be - he wouldn't even need to wreck a ship again!'

'But why weren't the stolen goods taken from him?' said Julian.

'He'd hidden them!' said the old man. 'Ah he'd hidden them well, too. Not even Nosey his son, nor Bart his nephew knew where he'd put them. They were sure he'd got everything hidden in one of the caves in the cliff - but search as they might, they never found the treasure! They went to prison too, but they came out long afore old One-Ear Bill was due out, - and how they hunted for the gold and silver, and all that One-Ear had hidden away!'

'Did One-Ear Bill get it when he came out of prison?' asked Dick, thinking this was a much more exciting story than he had ever read in a book - and a true one too!

'No. No, he didn't get it,' said Jeremiah, puffing out a cloud of smoke. 'And glad I am to say that. He died in prison, the wicked old man.'

'Well then - what happened to the treasure from the wrecked ships?' asked George. 'Who found it?'

'No one,' said the old man. 'No one at all! It's still there, hidden wherever that old rascal put it. His secret went with him. Bart looked for it, and Nosey too - ho, I've seen 'em in those caves day after day, and with a lamp night after night. But they never found even a pearl necklace. Ho - that was a good joke, that was! They're dead and gone now - but there's relatives of theirs still living in Demon's Rocks, who could do with a bit of that treasure - poor as church mice they are, with two children as skinny as ever you'd see!

'Doesn't anyone even have an idea where the loot from the wrecked ships is?' asked Julian.

'What about the cave we've been hearing about - the Wreckers' Cave?'

'Oh aye - we've a Wreckers' Cave, all right,' said the old man, knocking out his pipe. 'And I reckon about five thousand people have been in it, scouting round, looking into holes and corners hoping to find what Bart and Nosey never did find! Or maybe ten thousand, who knows? I don't mind telling you, I've been there meself - but not a smell of a little gold coin did I ever see! I'll take you there meself some day if you like. But mind - don't you hope to find anything. It's my belief that One-Ear Bill never did hide his treasure there - he just said it was there to fool Nosey and Bart!'

'We'd love to go and see the Cave,' said Dick, and George nodded her head in delight. 'Not to hunt for treasure, of course - it's pretty obvious it's not there now - maybe somebody did find it, and took it away secretly!'

'Maybe,' said Jeremiah. 'All right, young sir - you come and tell me when you're ready. I'm sitting here most days. And if you've a nice bit of baccy you don't have no use for, you think of me, see?'

'We'll go and buy you some straightaway,' said Julian. He couldn't help laughing. 'What tobacco do you smoke?'

'Oh you tell Tom the Tobacconist it's for old Jeremiah Boogle - he'll give you what I like,' said the old man. 'And mind now - don't you go snooping round them old caves by yourselves - you might get lost. It's a proper laby - laby...'

'Labyrinth,' said Julian, smiling. 'Right - we'll be careful.'

The Five went off, Timmy glad to be on the move again. He couldn't understand the old man's story, of course, and he wondered why George hadn't taken him for his usual after-breakfast walk. He gave a little whine, and she patted his big head.

'Sorry, Timmy!' she said. 'That old man told such an interesting story that I quite forgot you were longing for a walk. We'll go for one now.'

'Let's call in at the tobacconist's first, shall we?' said Julian. 'That old chap deserves an extra smoke for his tale. Goodness knows how much was true - but he certainly told it well!'

'Of course it was true!' said George. 'Why ever should he tell lies?'

'Well - he might have to get extra tobacco, you know!' said Julian, smiling. 'I don't blame him!'

It's a jolly good story - but please don't think there's any treasure still hidden somewhere, George. It's no use believing that.'

'Well, I do believe it!' said George, defiantly. 'I think he was telling the truth, tobacco or no tobacco. Don't you, Tinker?'

'Oh yes,' said Tinker. 'You wait till you see the caves round about here! Hoo - there might be any amount of treasure there, and no one would ever know! I did hunt round a bit myself - but those caves are scary, and when I coughed once, my cough came echoing back to me a hundred times and I was so scared I ran for my life - and fell splash into a pool!'

Everyone laughed. 'Let's buck up and do our shopping,' said Dick. 'And then what about going for a good long walk?'

'Well, I don't want to carry eggs and bread and milk for miles,' said George. 'I say a walk first - and then we'll come back, have ice-creams, do our shopping - and go back to the light-house.'

'Right!' said Julian. 'Come on, Timmy. We're off for a WALK - a WALK! Ha, that's the word to set your tail wagging, isn't it? Look at it Mischief. Don't you wish you could wag your tail like that!'

Chapter 13

A PLEASANT MORNING - AND A SHOCK!

'Where shall we go for our walk?' said George, as they wandered through the village. 'Oh look - there's a tiny little shop with Tom the Tobacconist written over the door. Let's get the tobacco while we remember.'

So in went Julian, and rapped on the counter. A very small man appeared like a hob-goblin out of a dark corner.

'I want some tobacco for Jeremiah Boogle, please,' said Julian. 'I think you know the kind he wants.'

'I do that!' said Tom, scrabbling about on a shelf. 'The amount that old Jeremiah has smoked since I've been here would keep a bonfire going for years. There you are, young sir!'

'He tells a fine story,' said Julian, putting down the money for the tobacco.

Tom laughed. 'He's been going on about Bart and Nosey and all them old folk, I suppose,' he said. 'He's a queer one, is old Jeremiah. Never forgets a thing, even if it happened eighty or more years ago! Never forgives, neither. There's two folk in this village that he spits at when he passes by them. Naughty old man, he is.'

'What have they done to earn his spite?' asked Dick, in surprise.

'Well, they be some kin of his old enemy, One-Ear Bill,' said Tom. 'I reckon he told you about him all right, didn't he?'

'Yes, he did,' said Julian. 'But all that business about the wrecking happened years and years ago! Surely Jeremiah doesn't visit his anger on any descendants of the wicked One-Ear Bill!'

'Oh, but he do!' said Tom. 'You see, these two fellows he spits at have the job of showing people round the caves here - especially the Wreckers' Cave - and I reckon old Jeremiah still broods about One-Ear's hidden treasure, and is scared in case these two chaps ever find it. Find it! It's nigh on seventy years since all that happened. Why, that light-house yonder was built over sixty years ago - after that wrecking business went on. No one will come across any treasure now!'

'But surely they might,' said George. 'It depends where it was hidden. If it was in some dry, watertight place, it should still be all right. After all, gold and silver don't decay, do they? Wherever it was hidden, it must still be there!'

'That's what all you visitors say!' said Tom. 'And that's what Ebenezer and Jacob say - they're the two chaps who show people round the caves. But they only say that to make a bit of a thrill for the visitors, you know. Same as old Jeremiah does. Takes them in properly! Well - you believe what you like, youngsters - but you won't find any treasure! I reckon the sea took that years ago! Good-day to you! I'll give Jeremiah the baccy when he calls in.'

'Well,' said Dick, as soon as they were outside the shop, 'this is all very interesting! I think probably old Tom's right. The reason why the treasure was never found is because it was probably hidden where the sea managed to get at it - in some water-hole, or somewhere like that.'

'I still believe it's somewhere safe,' said George. 'So does Tinker.'

'Oh well... I should think probably Timmy believes it as well,' said Dick. 'He has a child-like mind too!'

Dick at once received a hard punch on the back from George. He laughed. 'All right! We'll give you a chance to hunt for the treasure, won't we, Ju? We'll visit the Wreckers' Cave as soon as we can. Let's go up on the cliffs for our walk, and see if we can spot where the first old lamp used to be, that warned ships to swing out to sea, and avoid Demon's Rocks.'

It was a lovely walk along the cliffs. The celandines and tiny dog violets were out, and clumps of pale yellow primroses were everywhere. The breeze blew strongly, and Mischief held tightly to Tinker's right ear, afraid of being blown off his shoulder. Timmy enjoyed himself thoroughly, bounding along, tail flourishing happily, sniffing at everything.

They came to the flag-post set high on the cliff, its great red flag waving vigorously in the breeze. A notice-board was beside it. George read it.

'This flag warns ships off Demon's Rocks by day. By night the great light-house at High Cliffs, farther along the coast, gives warning. In the old days a lamp shone from this spot to give the ships warning, and later a small light-house was built out on Demon's Rocks. It is still in existence, but is no longer in use.'

'Ha - they're wrong there!' said Tinker, pointing to the last sentence. 'We're using it! I'll alter the notice!' and Tinker actually took a pencil to scratch out the last six words!

Julian took it from him. 'Don't be an ass. You can't mess about with public notices. Don't say you're one of the fatheads who like to scribble all over the place!'

Tinker held out his hand for the pencil. 'All right. It was just that I thought it wanted correcting. I'm not the kind of idiot who scribbles on walls or public notices.'

'Right,' said Julian. 'Tinker, can we see Demon's Rocks - the rocks themselves, I mean, with our light-house - from these cliffs.'

'No,' said Tinker. 'The cliff swings away to the left, look, and the Demon's Rocks are away right round the corner, if you see what I mean - so no ship should follow the coastline here, but should keep well out at sea, or it'd be on the rocks. You can quite well see that if the wreckers took the lamp from its warning-place here, and put it much farther back, along the way we've come, the ships would swing too far inland, and find themselves wrecked.'

'I think I should have hated old One-Ear Bill as much as old Jeremiah does,' said George, imagining the beautiful ships being ground to pieces all those years ago - just because of a greedy man who liked the pickings from wrecks!

'Well, we'd better go back,' said Julian, looking at his watch. 'We've some shopping to do, remember! Better buck up too - it looks like rain all of a sudden!'

He was right. It was pouring by the time they reached the village! They crowded into a little shop that said 'Morning Coffee' and ordered a cup each, and buns. The buns were so nice that they bought some to take back to the light-house with them. Then Anne remembered post-cards. 'We must buy some,' she said, 'and send one off today. Better get some now, and write one and post it while we're here.'

Dick slipped out of the coffee-shop and returned with a packet of very gaudily coloured cards. 'Some of them show the light-house,' he said. 'We'll send one of those - and you choose a card to send to your father too, Tinker.'

'It would be a waste,' said Tinker. 'He wouldn't even bother to read it.'

'Well, send one to your mother,' said Anne.

'I haven't one,' said Tinker. 'She's dead. She died when I was born. That's why my father and I always go about together.'

'I'm very, very sorry, Tinker,' said Anne, shocked. The others were sorry too. No wonder Tinker hadn't very good manners, and was all on his own. No mother to teach him anything! Poor Tinker! Anne felt as if she wanted to buy him every bun in the shop!

'Have another bun, Tinker,' she said. 'Or an ice-cream. I'll pay. Mischief can have one too.'

'We're all going to have another bun each, and an ice-cream,' said Julian. 'Timmy and Mischief too. Then we'll do our shopping and go home - home to the light-house. That sounds grand, doesn't it!'

They wrote three cards - one to Mr. and Mrs. Kirrin - one to Joanna - and one to the Professor. 'Now they'll know we are safe and happy!' said Anne, sticking on the stamps.

The rain had stopped, so they went to do their shopping - fresh bread, more butter and eggs, two bottles of milk, some fruit and a few other things. Then off they went down to the little jetty.

'Tide will soon turn,' said Julian, as they jumped down from the jetty to the rocky little beach.

'Come on - we'll just have time to walk over the rocks to the light-house. PLEASE don't drop the eggs, Tinker!'

They made their way over the rocks, jumping over little pools here and there and avoiding the slimy strands of seaweed that in places covered the rocks. The light-house seemed very tall as they came up to it.

'It's tiny compared to the great new one away at High Cliff,' said Tinker. 'You ought to go over that! The revolving lamp at the top is magnificent! Its light is so powerful that ships can see it for miles!'

'Well, this little light-house looks nice enough to me at the moment,' said Dick, climbing up the stone steps to the strong wooden door. 'Hallo! Look - two bottles of milk at the top step! Don't tell me the milkman's been!'

'He used to call when my father and I were here,' said Tinker. 'Only when the tide was out in the morning though, because he hasn't a boat. I suppose he heard we were all staying here, and came to see if we wanted milk - and left two bottles when he found we were out. He probably yelled through the letter-box and when we didn't answer he just left the milk, on chance.'

'Sensible fellow!' said Dick. 'Get out your key, Tinker, and unlock the door.'

'I don't remember locking it behind us when we went out this morning,' said Tinker, feeling frantically in all his pockets. 'I must have left it in the lock on the inside of the door. Let's see now - we locked the door last night, and left the key in the lock. So I must have unlocked it this morning for us all to go out.'

'That's right - but after you unlocked it you ran straight down the steps with George, and the rest of us followed,' said Julian. 'Anne was last. Did you lock the door after you, Anne?'

'No. I never thought of it!' said Anne. 'I just shut the door with a bang and raced after you all! So the key must still be on the other side of the door!'

'Well, if we push the door, it should open!' said Julian, with a grin. 'And the key will be on the inside, waiting for us! Let's go in!'

He pushed hard, for the door shut very tightly - and sure enough, it swung open. Julian put his hand round to the inside lock to feel for the key.

It wasn't there! Julian looked at the others, frowning.

'Someone's been here - and found the door unlocked - taken the key - and probably plenty of other things as well!' he said. 'We'd better go and look. Come on!'

'Wait - there's something on the door-mat,' said Dick, picking up a letter. 'The postman has visited the light-house too - here's a letter forwarded from Kirrin - so at least two people came while we were out! But surely neither of them would take the key - or anything else either!'

'Well - we'll soon see!' said Julian, grimly, and up the first bend of the spiral stairway he went, at top speed!

Chapter 14
THE OLD, OLD MAP

Julian and Dick went into each room of the light-house, racing up the spiral stairway from one to the other. Why, oh why hadn't they watched to see that Tinker locked the door and took the key!

Yes - a few things had been taken! 'My rug!' said George. 'That's gone!'

'And my purse,' said Anne. 'I left it here on the table. That's been taken, too!'

'So has my little travelling clock,' groaned Julian. 'Why did I bring it? I could have used my watch!'

There were a few other things gone, all small. 'Horrible fellow, whoever he is, to creep into the light-house while we were out and take our things!' said Anne, almost crying. 'Who would come here - they would surely be seen from the quay, wouldn't they?'

'Yes - you're right there,' said Julian. 'Though probably the thief slipped in when it was pouring with rain, and the quay was deserted! I think we'll have to tell the police, you know. Let's have our dinner, and then I'll take the boat and slip across to the village. The tide will be in then, and I shan't be able to walk over the rocks. Blow that thief! I was looking forward to a nice quiet read this afternoon!'

After their meal, Julian took the boat and rowed across to the jetty. He went straight to the police-station, where a stolid-looking policeman listened to him, and wrote slowly in a book.

'Have you any idea, sir, who the thief might be?' asked the policeman. 'Or if anyone came to the light-house while you were out?'

'Well, two people seem to have come,' said Julian. 'The milkman, because we were surprised to find milk-bottles on the steps. And the postman. There was a letter for us on the mat inside the door. I don't know of anyone else.'

'Well, as far as I can tell you, both Willy the Milkman, and Postie, are as honest as the day,' said the policeman, scratching his chin with his pencil. 'There may have been a third visitor - one who didn't leave milk or a letter! I'll see if anyone was on the quay this morning, who saw the thief going over the Demon's Rocks. Er - do you suspect anyone, sir?'

'Good gracious, no!' said Julian. 'I don't know anyone here - unless you can count Jeremiah Boogle, or Tom the Tobacconist!'

'No. No, sir, I think we can rule both of them out,' said the policeman, smiling. 'Well, I'll do what I can, and let you know if I hear of anything. Good afternoon, sir - and by the way, as you can't lock that light-house door now, and it's plain there are thieves about, I shouldn't leave the light-house empty, see?'

'Yes. Yes, I'd already thought of that,' said Julian. 'I can jam the door all right with something when we're in the light-house - but I can't do that when we're out.'

'Well - it looks as if we're in for a wet spell,' said the policeman. 'So maybe it won't be much hardship to keep indoors. I hope you're comfortable in the light-house - seems a funny place to stay, really.'

'Oh we're very comfortable, Constable,' said Julian, smiling. 'Why not pay us a call sometime, and see us?'

'Thanks, sir,' said the policeman, and took Julian to the door.

The constable was right in forecasting a wet spell. It poured all that afternoon, and the little company in the light-house whiled away the time playing cards. Julian and Dick had managed to find a heavy piece of wood in the store-room to jam the door from the inside. They all felt much safer when they knew that had been done! Now no one could get in without making a terrific noise!

'I'm stiff,' said George, at last. 'I want to stretch my legs. I've a good mind to run up and down the stairway half a dozen times.'

'Well, go on, then,' said Dick. 'Nobody's stopping you!'

'How far down does the light-house go, Tinker?' asked George. 'We always scoot up the first bit of the spiral stairway and never think about the light-house foundations deep down in the rock. Are they deep down?'

'Oh, they are,' said Tinker, looking up from his book. 'My father told me that when the light-house was built, they drilled right down into the rock for a long way - made a kind of shaft. And he said that under these rocks there are all kinds of queer holes and tunnels - the drill kept shooting downwards when it came to a sudden space.'

'Really?' said Dick interested. 'I hadn't thought of what would have to be done to make a high light-house safe from the gales and storms. It would have to have deep foundations, of course!'

'My father found an old map somewhere,' said Tinker. 'A sort of plan made when the light-house was first built.'

'Like architects draw when they plan how to build a house?' said Anne.

'Yes. Something like that,' said Tinker. 'I can't remember much about it. I know it showed all the rooms in the light-house, connected by the spiral stairway - and it showed the big lamp-room at the top - and at the bottom of the map the foundation shaft was drawn.'

'Can you go down the shaft?' asked Dick. 'Is there a ladder, or anything?'

'I don't know,' said Tinker. 'I've never been down there. I never thought about it!'

'Do you know where the old map is - the one made by the architect who drew up plans for the light-house builder to follow?' said Julian. 'Where did your father put it?'

'Oh, I expect he threw it away,' said Tinker. 'Wait a minute though - it may be in the lamp-room! I remember him taking it up there, because it had a drawing of how the lamp worked.'

'Well, I'd rather like to go and see if I can find it,' said Julian, interested. 'Come up with me, Tinker. Thank goodness you don't keep turning into some sort of car now - you must be growing up!'

So the two of them went up the spiral stairway to the lamp-room at the very top of the tower. Again Julian marvelled at the magnificent views all around. The rain had stopped for a time, and the sea, swept by strong winds, was a swirling tumult of angry waters.

Tinker scabbled about in a little dark space under the lamp. He at last brought up a roll of something white and waved it at Julian. 'Here's the map. I thought it would be in the lamp-room.'

Julian took it down to the others, and they spread it out. It showed the plan of the light-house, and was very clearly and beautifully drawn.

'How is it that architects draw so marvellously?' said George. 'Are they architects because they can do this kind of thing so well - or do they draw beautifully because they are architects?'

'A bit of both, probably,' said Julian, bending over the finely-drawn plan. 'Ah - here are the foundations, look - my word, they do go down a long way into the rock!'

'Great tall buildings like this always have deep, strong foundations,' said Dick. 'Last term at school we studied how...'

'Let's not talk of school,' said Anne. 'It's already looming in the distance! Tinker - can anyone get down into this foundation place?'

'I told you - I don't know,' said Tinker. 'Anyway I should think it would be a horrible place down there - dark and smelly, and narrow, and...'

'Let's go and see,' said George, getting up. 'I'm so bored at the moment that if I don't do something, I'll fall asleep for a hundred years.'

'Ass,' said Dick. 'Still - quite a good idea of yours. We'd have a bit of peace while you were sleeping! Ooooooch - don't jab me like that, George!'

'Come on,' said George. 'Let's trot down and find out what's down the shaft.'

Anne didn't want to go down the shaft, but the others ran down the stairway, Timmy too, and soon came to the bottom, opposite the entrance door of the light-house.

Tinker showed them a large round trap-door in the floor there. 'If we open that, we'll be looking down into the foundation shaft,' he said.

So they pulled up the large round wooden trap-door, and gazed downwards. They could see nothing at all except darkness! 'Where's my torch?' said Julian. 'I'll fetch it!'

Soon his torch was lighting up the round shaft, and they saw an iron ladder going down it on one side. Julian climbed down a few steps and examined the walls of the shaft.

'They're cement!' he called. 'And they must be enormously thick, I should think. I'm going on down.'

So down he went, and down, marvelling at the sturdy cement lining of the enormous shaft. He wondered why it had not been filled in. Perhaps a hollow cement-lined shaft was stronger than a filled-in one? He didn't know.

He came almost to the bottom - but he didn't go down the last steps of the iron ladder. A peculiar noise came from below him! A gurgling, choking noise! What in the world could it be? He shone his torch down to see - and then stared in amazement! There was water at the bottom of the shaft, water that swirled and moved around, making a strange hollow, gurgling noise. Where did it come from?

As he watched it, it disappeared - then it came back again! He shone his torch here and there to find out how the water made its way into the shaft.

'There must be a tunnel or a passage of some sort down there, that the sea can enter!' he thought. 'It's high tide now - so the water is swirling in. I wonder - now I wonder - if it's free of water when the tide is out! And if so where does that tunnel, or whatever it is, lead to? Or is it always under water? I'll go back and tell the others - and have another look at that old map!'

He climbed back, glad to be out of the smelly darkness of the old shaft. The others were at the top, looking down rather anxiously.

'Here he is!' said George. 'See anything interesting, Julian?'

'I did, rather,' said Julian, climbing out of the shaft. 'Got that old map with you? I want to look at something if so.'

'Come upstairs, then,' said Dick. 'We can see better there. What was down there, Ju?'

'Wait till we're up in the living-room,' said Julian. He took the map from Tinker as soon as he arrived there, and sat down to look at it. He ran his finger down the shaft to the bottom, and then jabbed at a round mark drawn there.

'See that? That's a hole at the bottom of the shaft, through which sea-water is coming. It's high tide now, so the water is seeping into the shaft - but it's only about a foot deep. At low tide there wouldn't be a single drop coming in. Wouldn't I love to know where that water-tunnel went to - up to the surface of the rocks? Through them to somewhere a good way off? Or what!'

'An undersea tunnel!' said George, her eyes bright. 'Why don't we explore it sometime when the tide is out?'

'Well - we'd have to be pretty certain we wouldn't suddenly be drowned!' said Julian, rolling up the map. 'Very interesting, isn't it? I suppose the hole was left in case the constant push of water there, when the tide was in, might undermine the foundation. Better to have the shaft half full of water than eaten away by constant tides!'

'Well,' began Anne, and then suddenly stopped in fright. A stentorian voice came up the stairway, and made everyone jump violently.

'ANYONE AT HOME? HEY, ANYONE AT HOME?'

Chapter 15

JACOB IS IN TROUBLE

'Who's that shouting like that?' said Anne, fearfully. 'It can't be the robber, can it?'

'Of course not,' said Julian, and went to the door of the living-room. He yelled down the stairway: 'Who is it? What do you want?'

'It's the police!' shouted back the enormous voice.

'Oh. Come on up, then,' said Julian, relieved. Foot-steps could be heard coming up the iron stairway, accompanied by loud puffs and pants. Then a policeman's helmet appeared, followed by his shoulders and the rest of him. Soon he was standing in the living-room, beaming round at the surprised company, panting with the effort of climbing so many stairs.

'How did you get in?' asked George. 'We jammed the door shut from the inside.'

'Well, I managed to unjam it, miss,' said the policeman, mopping his forehead, and smiling. He was the same policeman that Julian had seen that afternoon. 'Not much protection that, really. You ought to get a new key made.'

'How did you get over here - the tide's in,' said Julian. 'You couldn't have walked over Demon's Rocks.'

'No, sir. I got Jem Hardy's boat,' said the policeman. 'By the way, my name's Sharp, sir - Police Constable Sharp.'

'A very good name for a policeman,' said Julian, with a cheerful grin. 'Well, have you caught the thief who took our key, and the other things?'

'No, sir. But I've a pretty good idea who it is,' said Sharp. 'I couldn't find anyone who'd been sitting on the quay during the time you were away from the light-house, sir - but I did by chance find a lady whose windows look down on the jetty, and she happened to see someone standing about there. She said he went over the rocks to the light-house.'

'Who was it? The milkman, the postman?' asked Dick.

'Oh no, sir, I told your friend they were good fellows,' said the constable, looking quite shocked. 'It was er - well, sir, a man who's a bit of a bad lot.'

'Who's that?' asked Julian, suddenly afraid it might be old Jeremiah. Could he be a bad lot - he had sounded such a good fellow!

'Well, sir, it's no one you know,' said Sharp. 'It's one of a family with rather a bad name, sir - a man called Jacob - Jacob Loomer, sir. He comes of a family that used to do a bit of wrecking, and...'

'Wrecking! Old Jeremiah was telling us of long-ago wreckers!' said Dick. 'One was called Nosey - and another was called Bart - relations of a well-known wrecker called One-Ear - er, One-Ear...'

'Bill,' said Sharp. 'Ah yes - One-Ear Bill. He lived a long time ago, when old Jeremiah was a young man. This here Jacob, the one that was seen going into your light-house today, would be his great-great-great grandson, I reckon - something like that. Living image of old One-Ear Bill according to Jeremiah. There's a bad strain in that family - can't seem to get it out!'

'Well - you say it was Jacob who came into the light house? Why can't we have him arrested then?' said Julian. 'And make him give up the key he took - and the other things?'

'Well, sir, if you'll come along with me and identify your things, maybe I can do something about it,' said the constable. 'But he may have hidden them all by now - though he's that free-handed I wouldn't be surprised if he hasn't given them all away. A bit of a fool, Jacob is, as well as a rogue. Ah - he'd have liked the job of wrecking ships, he would - right up his street.'

'I'll come with you now,' said Julian. 'The others don't need to, do they?'

'Oh no - you'll do, sir,' said the policeman, and he and Julian went down the spiral stairway to the entrance. The others heard the door bang, and looked at one another.

'Well! To think that a great-great-great grandson of that horrid old One-Ear Bill is still living in the same place as the old wrecker himself did!' said Dick. 'And he's a rogue too. History repeating itself?'

'We must go and see the Wreckers' Cave tomorrow, if we can,' said George. 'Jeremiah Boogle said he would show it to us.'

'So long as there isn't an old old wrecker hiding there!' said Anne. 'Older than Jeremiah Boogle - with a beard down to his feet - a sort of Old Man of the Sea - with a horrid gurgling voice, and eyes like a fish!'

'Really, Anne!' said George astonished. 'I'll be scared to go into caves if you say things like that!'

'I wonder how Julian's getting on,' said Tinker. 'Mischief, stop jiggling up and down - you make me feel out of breath!'

Julian was at Jacob's house, and there, sure enough, were the things he had stolen - the rug - the clock - and Anne's purse - empty now!

'And what about the key?' demanded the constable. 'Come on now - you took the key out of the door of the light-house - we know you did. Give it here, Jacob.'

'I didn't take it,' said Jacob, sullenly.

'I'll have to take you in, you know, Jacob,' said the constable. 'You'll be searched at the police-station. Better give up the key now.'

'Search me all you like!' said Jacob. 'You won't find that key on me. I tell you. I didn't take it. What would I want that key for?'

'For the same reason that you usually want keys for,' said the constable. 'For breaking in and stealing. All right, Jacob. If you won't let this young gentleman have his key, I'll have you searched at the police-station. Come along with me.'

But alas, no key was found on the surly Jacob, and the constable shrugged his shoulders and raised his eyebrows at Julian.

'If you take my advice, sir, I'd get a different lock put on your door. Jacob's got your key somewhere. He'll be at the light-house again as soon as he sees you all go out.'

'Bah!' said Jacob, rudely. 'You and your keys. I tell you I didn't take it. There wasn't a key there...'

'Come along with me, Jacob,' said the constable. He turned to Julian. 'Well, that's all, sir. We'll have his house searched. The odds are that he's hidden the key somewhere. He's an artful dodger, this one!'

Julian went back to the light-house, rather worried. It might take a few days in a little place like this to have a new lock put in. In the meantime they would either have to keep themselves prisoners in the light-house - or leave a front door that anyone could open!

The others listened excitedly to his tale, when he went back. They were glad to have the rug, the clock, and the purse again - though Anne was sad that all her money was gone.

'We'll have to get a new lock and key,' said Julian. 'After all, this light-house has only been lent to us, and it's our responsibility to look after it and all it contains. It's a good thing it was only our things that were taken - not Professor Hayling's!'

'It's getting rather late,' said Anne, jumping up. 'We haven't had our tea yet! I'll get it. Anyone feel like buns with butter and jam?'

Everyone did, and soon Anne produced a large plate of delicious looking buns. They talked as they drank their tea, and ate the buns.

'I vote we go and find Jeremiah Boogle tomorrow, and see if he's heard of the robbery, and if he has anything interesting to say about it,' said George.

'And also we really must get him to show us the Wreckers' Cave,' said Julian. 'By the way, what were the names of the two men who have the job of showing the visitors round the caves? I'm pretty sure one was Jacob!'

'You're right - it was - and the other man was called Ebenezer!' said Dick. 'Well - let's hope Jacob is locked up, or out of the way somewhere when we go to see the caves. We shall get some black looks from him, if not!'

'Well, we can give him some back!' said George, putting on a terrific scowl, and making Timmy give a sudden whine. She patted him. 'It's all right, Timmy - that scowl wasn't for you!'

'We'd better go to the caves tomorrow morning when the tide will be more or less out,' said Julian. 'And I'd better see if I can find a locksmith here who can give us a new lock and key quickly!'

'Why not slip out now?' said Dick. 'I'll come with you for a bit of fresh air. Want to come girls?'

'No, I'd like to finish my book,' said Anne, and George said the same. Tinker was playing with Mischief, and he didn't want to come either.

'Well, you and the light-house will be safe with Timmy and Mischief to look after you!' said Julian, and down the stairway he went, with Dick close behind him.

The locksmith promised to come and look at the door in the next day or two. 'Can't leave my shop just now,' he said. 'Nobody to see to it! It'll take me a few days to do the job for you, I'm afraid, sir.'

'Oh blow!' said Julian. 'We've already had a thief in the light-house! We don't like to go out and leave it empty now!'

They rowed back to the light-house, shut and jammed the door as best they could, and went up to the girls. Timmy gave them an uproarious welcome, and Mischief took a flying leap from a chair-back on to Dick's shoulder.

'No lock or key for a few days,' said Dick, sitting down and tickling the delighted little monkey.

'I did want to go and see the caves tomorrow - especially the famous Wreckers' one - but we can't possibly leave the light-house empty.'

'Woof,' said Timmy at once.

'He says, why not leave him behind, and let him guard it,' said George, solemnly, and Timmy at once said 'Woof' again.

They all laughed. Dick patted Timmy, and ruffled the fur behind his ears. 'Dear old Tim - all right, you guard the light-house - you shall have a Very Special Bone for a reward!'

'That's settled then. We leave Timmy here on guard, and we all go off to the caves,' said Julian.

'Well, one of the brothers who show visitors round will be missing tomorrow, I fear - Jacob will not be there!'

'I bet we'll get some scowls from the other brother - what's his name now - Ebenezer?' said Anne. 'We'll have to be careful that we don't get pushed into a deep pool of water!'

'Dear me, yes,' said Julian. 'One never knows! We'll certainly be on our guard!'

Chapter 16

DOWN IN THE CAVES

Next morning George awoke with a jump. Timmy was pushing her gently with his nose. 'What is it, Tim?' said George. Timmy gave a bark, and ran to where the spiral stairway led downwards.

'Go down and tell the boys what it is you want,' said George, sleepily. So down the stairway went Timmy, and into the room where the boys were sleeping. He trotted in and nudged Julian with his nose, but Julian was so fast asleep that he didn't stir.

Timmy pawed at him, and Julian awoke with a jump. He sat up. 'Oh, it's you, Tim - what on earth do you want? Is anything wrong with the girls?'

'Woof,' said Timmy, and ran to the spiral stairway. He disappeared down it, barking.

'Blow! He's heard someone!' said Julian, yawning. 'Well, if it's Ebenezer or Jacob - no, it can't be Jacob, of course - I'll tell him what I think of people who steal!'

He unjammed the door of the light-house and opened it. On the step stood two milk-bottles! 'Well, really, Timmy, fancy waking me because the milkman came!' said Julian, taking in the bottles. 'Good old milkman - I wonder if he had to come by boat - the sea's pretty high this morning - but I suppose he could just about have waded over the rocks!'

At breakfast the Five remembered that they meant to see the caves that morning. They had a very fine meal of fried bacon, bought the day before, and eggs, with buttered toast and marmalade to follow. Anne had made some good hot coffee, and they all enjoyed themselves immensely. Mischief made himself a real nuisance by putting a paw deep in the marmalade jar and then, when smacked, running all over the place leaving sticky marmaladey marks everywhere!

'We'd better all take a wet rag with us as we go about the room,' said Anne, in disgust. 'He's run over the table and desk and everything. BAD Mischief! I do so hate feeling sticky!'

Mischief was sad to feel himself in disgrace, and leapt on to Tinker's shoulder, putting his sticky paws lovingly round the boy's neck. 'That's right!' said Tinker, 'rub all your stickiness off on me, you little monkey!

'We'll wash up in the sink, and you boys can tidy up the rooms,' said Anne. 'Then we'll all go out. It's a lovely day.'

'Looks a bit stormy to me,' said Dick. 'What do you say, Tim?'

Tim agreed. He thumped his tail vigorously on the floor, making Mischief pounce on it in joy. Anne gathered up the crockery and took it to the sink.

In an hour or so they were ready to go out. 'Let's write a card to Aunt Fanny before we leave,' said Anne. 'Then that will be done. We won't say a word about the things that were stolen, though. She might feel upset, and tell us to go back! And then what would Uncle Quentin and Professor Hayling say?'

'I bet they're having a wonderful time, arguing all day long, working out figures, and studying papers!' said Julian. 'And I'm pretty certain that Aunt Fanny will have to call them to a meal at least twenty times before they arrive at the table!'

Anne wrote the post-card and put on a stamp. 'Now I'm ready,' she said, standing up. Timmy ran to the top of the stairs, glad that everyone seemed to be on the move at last. He did so love a walk.

'Darling Timmy,' said George. 'I'm afraid you'll have to be left behind to guard the light-house! You see, we haven't a key - and we can't jam the door from outside. So please, Timmy dear, stay behind - on guard. You know what that means, don't you? ON GUARD!'

Timmy's tail went right down. He gave a small whine. He did so hate being left out of anything - especially a walk. He pawed gently at George as if to say, 'Do please change your mind.'

'On guard, Timmy, now,' said George. 'The light-house is in your charge. Don't let ANYONE in. You'd better lie on the mat just inside the entrance.'

Timmy ran slowly down behind Julian and the others, looking very mournful indeed. 'Now lie there,' said George, and gave him a pat on the head. 'We'll take you out again soon, and then one of us will stay to guard the light-house - but this time we all want to go out. ON GUARD!'

Timmy lay down on the mat, and put his head on his paws, his big brown eyes looking up at George. 'Dear old faithful,' she said ruffling the hair on his head. 'We won't be very long!'

They slammed the door and went down the light-house steps. The tide was still out far enough for them to be able to wade over the rocks to the jetty. 'We must be back before it's well in,' said Julian. 'Or we'll have to stay ashore till it's out again. Our boat is tied to the light-house post, remember!

They went for a stroll along the front and who should be there, sitting on a stone seat, but old Jeremiah Boogle, smoking his long pipe, staring solemnly out to sea.

'Good-morning, Jeremiah,' said Dick, politely. 'I hope we bought the right tobacco for you from Tom.'

'Oh aye,' said Jeremiah, puffing out very strong-smelling smoke. 'Hallo, little monkey - so you've come to my shoulder again, have you? Well, what's the news from Monkey-Land?'

The others laughed as Mischief at once poured out a stream of monkey-chatter into the old man's ear. 'We thought we would go and see the caves today,' said Julian. 'Especially the old Wreckers' Cave.'

'Now don't you let that Ebenezer take you round!' said the old man, at once. 'You won't find Jacob there - oho - I know what's happened to him. And serve him right. Never could keep his fingers to himself, that one! Ebenezer's as bad. He could steal the buttons off your coat, and you'd never know! Now look - what about me showing you the caves? I know them inside out, and I can show you things that that rat of an Ebenezer doesn't even know of.'

'Well - we'd certainly much rather you took us, and not Ebenezer,' said Julian. 'Ebenezer may be feeling rather angry because we told the police about his brother stealing things. We'll give you some more tobacco - I mean baccy - if you'll guide us round.'

'Well, let's go now,' said Jeremiah, getting up very spryly. 'This way!'

And off they all went, Mischief too - the little monkey did Jeremiah the honour of sitting on his shoulder all the way down the village street. The old old man was delighted to see how everyone stared and laughed.

He took them round the foot of some very high cliffs. They came to a rocky beach farther along, and walked over it. 'There's the entrance,' said the old man, pointing to a large hole in the cliff nearby. 'That's the way to the caves. Got a torch?'

'Yes - we brought one each,' said Julian, patting his pocket. 'Do we have to pay to go in?'

'No. People give Ebenezer a tip - five pence or so - if he shows them round - or Jacob, when he's there,' said Jeremiah. 'I'll deal with Ebby, though. Don't you waste your money on that scoundrel!'

The hole in the cliff led to the first cave, which was a big one. Lighted lanterns hung here and there, but gave very little light.

'Mind your step, now,' warned Jeremiah. 'It's real slippery in places. This way - through this old arch.'

It was cold and damp in the cave, and the children had to go carefully, and avoid the puddles left by the sea. Then suddenly Jeremiah turned a corner and went in a completely different direction! Down and down and down they went!

'Hey - we're going towards the sea now surely?' said Julian, in surprise. 'Do the caves go under the sea, then? Not away back into the cliff?'

'That's right,' said Jeremiah. 'This is a real rocky coast - and the way we're taking leads down a tunnel under the rocks, and then into the caves deep underground. See the rocky roof over our heads - well, if you listen, you can hear the sea now, mumbling and grumbling over it - that roof is the bed of the sea!'

That was a very strange thought indeed, and rather alarming! Anne gazed fearfully up at the rocky roof overhead, and shone her torch on it, half-expecting to see a few cracks leaking salt-water from the sea rolling over the rocky roof! But no - there was a little moisture shining on it, and that was all.

'Are we soon coming to the Wreckers' Cave?' asked George. 'Mischief, stop making those noises. There's nothing to be scared of!'

Mischief didn't like this cold, dark strange walk underground, and had begun to make harsh frightened noises, and then suddenly gave a loud scared screech.

'Don't! You made me jump!' said Anne. 'Goodness - listen to the monkey's screech echoing all along the tunnel and back! Sounds like a hundred monkeys chattering at once! Our voices echo too!'

Mischief was most alarmed to hear the enormous amount of screeches and chattering noises that now filled the tunnel. He began to cry almost like a baby, and clung to Tinker as if he would never let him go.

'I expect he thinks this place is absolutely full of screeching monkeys,' said Anne, sorry for the terrified little creature. 'It's only the echo, Mischief.'

'He'll soon get used to it,' said Tinker, hugging the monkey close to him.

'You want to hear the echo just round the next bend of the tunnel!' said Jeremiah, stroking the little monkey, and very foolishly gave an enormous yell just as they got there!

The yell came back ten times as loud, and the tunnel seemed suddenly full of shouts tumbling over one another. Everyone jumped violently, and Mischief leapt high in the air in terror. He sprang to the ground, and scampered away at top speed, wailing in his little monkey-voice. He tore down the tunnel, tail in air, and disappeared round the corner. Tinker was very upset.

'Mischief! Come back!' he yelled. 'You'll get lost!'

And along came the echo at once. 'Get lost, get lost, get lost - lost - lost!'

'Don't you worry about your monkey,' said Jeremiah, comfortingly. 'I've had a score of monkeys in my time - and they always come back!'

'Well, I'll jolly well stay down here till Mischief does come back!' said Tinker in rather a shaky voice.

They came out into a cave. This too was lighted by lanterns, though very poorly. They had all heard the murmur of voices as they came to it, and wondered who was there.

Three other visitors were in the cave, sight-seeing, like the children. A big burly fellow was with them, with jet-black hair, deep-set dark eyes, and a surly mouth - so like Jacob that Julian guessed at once that he was the brother, Ebenezer.

As soon as Ebenezer set eyes on Jeremiah, he roared in fury.

'You get out! This is my job - you get out. I'll show the caves to those youngsters!'

And with that such a battle of words followed that the Five were almost deafened, especially as the echo repeated everything very loudly indeed! The three visitors fled away up the tunnel, fearing a fight. Anne was very frightened, and clung to Julian.

Ebenezer came shouting up to old Jeremiah, his hand raised. 'Haven't I told you more'n a hundred times to keep out of these caves? Haven't I told you I'm the one to show folks around - and Jacob too?'

'Don't take no notice of him!' said Jeremiah, turning his back on the angry man. 'He's nought but a Big Mouth, same as his brother Jacob!'

'Look out!' yelled Julian, as the angry Ebenezer rushed at Jeremiah, his fist raised to strike him.

'LOOK OUT!'

Chapter 17

MISCHIEF AGAIN - AND A SURPRISE!

Jeremiah saw the angry man coming at him, and very neatly side-stepped. Ebenezer couldn't stop, stepped heavily on a strand of very slippery seaweed - and went sprawling into a corner!

'Ho!' said Jeremiah, delighted. 'Very nice, Ebenezer! Get up, and run at me again!'

'He'd better not,' said Julian, in his most grown-up voice. 'I shall report him to the police if he does - and that will make a pair of them in two days. Jacob got into trouble yesterday - and now it will be Ebenezer.'

Ebenezer got up, scowling, and glared at Jeremiah, who grinned back in delight. 'Coming at me again, Ebby?' he said. 'It's grand fun to hit an old man, isn't it?'

But Ebenezer was very much afraid that Julian would do what he had threatened, and report him to the police. He rubbed his shoulder where it had struck a piece of rock, and debated what to do.

'Come along,' said Jeremiah, to the five watching children. 'I'll take you down to the Wreckers' Cave. Ebby can come too, if so be he can behave hisself. But mebbe he'd like to run away home, and get his shoulder looked to!'

That was enough for Ebby! He determined to follow the little company, and made rude remarks all the time. So he tailed them, and shouted at them from a safe distance. How they wished they had Timmy with them! He would have made short work of the rude Ebenezer!

'Don't take any notice of him,' said Julian. 'Lead on Jeremiah. My word, isn't it dark in this tunnel! Good thing we all brought good torches!'

The tunnel came to an end at last and opened out into an extraordinary cave. The roof was unexpectedly high, and the irregular sides were ridged with shelves of rocks. On the shelves were dirty old boxes, a crate or two and some sacks.

'What in the world are those?' asked Dick, shining his torch on them.

'Well young sir, they're just what they look like - ordinary boxes and sacks,' said Jeremiah. 'Put there by Ebenezer and Jacob to fool people! They tell everybody they're what the old wreckers got out of ships they wrecked, years ago! Hoo-hoo-hoo! Anybody that believes those lies deserves to be fooled. They're all from Ebby's back-yard. Seen them lying there meself! Hoo-hoo-hoo!'

His hoo-hooing laugh echoed round the cave, and Ebenezer made an angry growling noise rather like a dog.

'I'm not going to fool these kids,' said Jeremiah. 'You and your sacks and boxes! I know where the old things are, the real old things - oh yes I do!'

'They're no better than the sacks and boxes there, wherever they are!' said Ebby, in a growling voice. 'You're lying, old Jeremiah - you don't know nothing!'

'Take us on farther,' said Dick. 'There must be more caves. I think this is exciting. Is this really where the old wreckers hid the things they salvaged from the wrecks they caused - or just a tale?'

'Oh, this is their cave, that's true enough. Dressed up a bit by Ebby there!' said Jeremiah. 'But I know the caves farther on. Ebby doesn't! He's too skeered to go farther under the sea. Ain't you, Ebby?'

Ebby said something that sounded rude. Julian turned to Jeremiah eagerly. 'Oh do take us farther - if it isn't dangerous!'

'Well, I'm going farther on, anyway,' said Tinker, suddenly. 'Mischief hasn't come back - so he must be lost - and I'm going to find him!'

Julian saw that Tinker was quite determined. 'Right,' he said. 'We'll come with you. Jeremiah, lead the way! But it's not really dangerous, is it? I mean - we don't want to find the sea sweeping through these caves, right up to where we are!'

'Tide's not on the turn yet,' said Jeremiah. 'We're all right for a while. When it comes in, it swirls up this passage here - but it stops at the Wreckers' Cave - that's just too high for it, see? The tunnel runs downwards fast now. It goes right under your light-house, have you seen it down at the bottom of the shaft?'

'Good gracious, yes!' said Julian, remembering. 'I went down it - and the sea was swirling in and out at openings in the bottom of the shaft. Do you mean to say that the sea that rises in the shaft at high tide, comes racing up into these tunnels too?'

'Aye, that it does,' said Jeremiah. 'You can get from here to the light-house under the rocky seabed right to that foundation shaft. But nobody dares! Tide comes in so quickly, you might get caught and drowned!'

Ebby at once shouted something rude again - it sounded as if he was telling Jeremiah to go and 'get drowned too!'

'Do let's go on farther,' said Dick. 'Come on, Jeremiah.'

So Jeremiah led them farther on under the rocky bed of the sea. It was strange and rather frightening to hear the constant noise of the water racing over the roof of the winding tunnel. Their torches lighted up slimy walls, and rocky shelves and hollows.

'You know - this would have been a very good place to hide treasure,' said Julian, glancing up at a dark hollow in the roof of the tunnel. 'Though I don't know how anyone would set about looking for it - there are hundreds of nooks and crannies - and isn't it cold in this tunnel!'

'Well, the sun's rays never penetrate down here,' said Dick. 'My word, the sea sounds pretty loud now!'

'I wish we could find Mischief,' said Anne to George. 'Look at poor Tinker. He's crying. He's pretending not to, but I could see the tears rolling down his cheeks last time I flashed my torch on him.'

They stopped to look at something - a strange jellylike thing, like an enormous sea anemone. Ebby caught them up, and bumped into Dick. He rounded on Ebby at once.

'Keep off! Follow us if you like, but don't come so near. We don't like you!'

Ebby took no notice but kept as close behind everyone as he possibly could, and Dick realized that he was probably feeling very scared! Then, as they rounded another corner of the tunnel, and saw yet another cave, Tinker gave a yell that echoed everywhere.

'MISCHIEF! LOOK! THERE HE IS! MISCHIEF!'

And sure enough, there was the little monkey, crouched under a small shelf of rock, shivering in fright. He wouldn't even go running to Tinker. Tinker had to pick him up and hug him.

'Mischief! Poor Mischief - were you very frightened?' he said. 'You're trembling all over! You shouldn't have run away! You might have been lost for ever!'

Mischief had something clutched in his tiny paw. He chattered to Tinker, and put his little furry arms round his neck. As he did so, he opened one paw - and something fell out and rolled over the rocky floor.

'What have you dropped, Mischief?' said Dick, and shone his torch down on to the floor of the cave. Something was glittering there - something round and yellow! Everyone stared, and a shock of excitement went through Julian, who was nearest. 'A gold coin!' he cried, and picked it up. 'As bright as when it was minted. Mischief, where did you get it from? Look, Dick, look, George - it's gold all right!'

Immediately everyone was full of the greatest excitement, one thought only in their heads.

The treasure! Mischief must have found the treasure! It was an old coin - very old. Where could Mischief have found it?

'Oh let's go farther on and see!' cried Dick.

'Jeremiah, it must be the treasure! Mischief will lead us to it!'

But Mischief would do nothing of the sort. He was NOT going to lose himself again. He was going to sit on Tinker's shoulders, with an arm safely round the boy's neck! He hadn't liked being lost, all by himself in the dark.

Jeremiah would not go any farther, either. He shook his head. 'No - not today, young sirs. Tide will soon be sweeping up these tunnels - faster than we can walk. Better turn back now, in case we're caught. Many's the visitor that's had to run for his life, when the tide came up all of a sudden!'

George's sharp ears caught the sound of swoosh-swoosh! Somewhere the tide had crept in! 'Come on!' she said. 'We'd better do what Jeremiah says. The sea's coming up the tunnel now as well as over it - and soon it will be sweeping up the beach too, and in at the cliff-passages. We'll be caught in the middle, and have to stay here for ages!'

'No need for alarm, missy,' said old Jeremiah. 'There's a bit of time yet. Hallo - where's Ebenezer gone?'

'Blow - he must have heard us talking about Mischief's gold piece,' said George. 'I forgot all about him! Now he knows that Mischief has found a gold coin, he'll feel sure that the treasure may be somewhere down here - and he'll look for it as soon as ever he can! WHY didn't we keep quiet about it?'

'I forgot he was standing near us,' groaned Dick. 'Well I suppose the whole of Demon's Rocks Village will know by now that a monkey has found the treasure - and hordes of sight-seers will swarm down here, hoping to find it. It must have been put in a pretty dry place, surely, for that coin to be so bright and untarnished.'

'Buck up - we'd better go back as quickly as possible,' said Julian. 'Look at old Jeremiah - he's too thrilled for words! He's planning to find the treasure himself at the earliest possible moment!'

'Well, I vote we have a shot at it ourselves tomorrow,' said Dick, excitement welling up in him at the thought. 'Good old Mischief! You're better than any detective!'

Then away up the tunnels they went, making all kinds of plans. WHAT an excitement!

Chapter 18

BACK IN THE LIGHT-HOUSE - AND AN EXCITING TALK!

Old Jeremiah was as excited as the others, but he said very little. He was angry to think that Ebenezer should have been there to see the find. He didn't trust that Ebby - nor that Jacob either! They'd be ferreting after that treasure as sure as nuts were nuts, and monkeys were monkeys! Ha - wouldn't they like to know where it was! He stumped on, up the old tunnels, thinking hard, and at last they came out into the welcome daylight again!

'Here, Jeremiah - buy yourself some more baccy,' said Julian, putting twenty pence into the old man's hand. 'And don't count too much on that treasure! I expect it's just an odd coin that Mischief found in a dry corner somewhere!'

'Thank you, young sir,' said the old man. 'I'm not wanting the treasure myself - I'm just hoping that Ebby and Jacob don't find it. They'll be hunting all the time for it now!'

They were glad to be out in the open again. The sun had gone now, and the wind had whipped up. It was raining hard.

'I say - we'd better buck up, else we shan't be able to walk back to the light-house over the rocks!' said Julian, worried. But fortunately the wind was against the tide and they just had time to wade over to the light-house steps.

'There's our little boat bobbing-about,' said Tinker. 'And hark - I can hear old Timmy barking! He's heard us coming!'

So he had. He had been lying on the door-mat, his ears glued to the crack under the door, listening, listening. Nobody had come near the light-house and not a sound did old Timmy hear but the wind and the sea, and a few gulls gliding by.

'We're back, Timmy!' yelled George, and she pushed at the door. It opened, and Timmy leapt out, almost knocking her over. Mischief sprang on to the dog's back, and chattered at him without stopping.

'He's telling him about the gold coin he found,' said Tinker, with a laugh. 'Oh, I wish you'd been with us, Timmy. It was grand!'

'It feels as if we've been away for ages,' said George. 'But it isn't very late after all - unless my watch is slow! I'm hungry. Let's have something to eat and talk about everything - and what we're going to do!'

So, over biscuits and sandwiches and coffee, they talked and talked. 'We must get down to the caves again as soon as possible!' said George. 'I'm absolutely certain that Jacob and Ebby will be down there, hunting for coins, as soon as the tide's out again.'

'Well, we can't do anything today, that's certain,' said Dick. 'For one thing the tide's in now - and for another thing it's blowing up for a storm. Just hark at the wind!'

Timmy was sitting as close to George as he possibly could. He hadn't liked her going out without him. She sat with her arm round him, eating her biscuits, occasionally giving him half of one. Tinker was doing the same with Mischief!

The children talked and talked. Where could Mischief have found that coin? Was it one on its own, that the sea had swept into the tunnel? Or was it part of a whole lot of coins? Had it come from an ironbound box, whose wooden sides had rotted away? They talked endlessly, their eyes bright, the round gold coin on the table in front of them.

'I suppose it would be treasure-trove if we found it?' said Dick. 'I mean - it would be so old that it would belong to the Crown, and not to anyone in particular.'

'I expect we'd be allowed to keep a few coins ourselves,' said George. 'If only we could go straightaway now and hunt in that tunnel! I feel as if I can't wait!'

'Woof,' said Timmy, agreeing though he really hadn't much idea of what they were talking about!

'I say - LISTEN to the sea crashing over the rocks between us and the jetty!' said Julian, startled at the sudden booming. 'The wind must be working up to a gale!'

'Well, bad weather's been forecast for some time,' said Dick gloomily. 'Blow! It'll be jolly difficult rowing to and fro in that little Bob-About boat. I doubt if we'd be able to walk across the rocks even at low tide, with a big sea running before the wind.'

'Oh don't be so gloomy!' said Anne.

'Well, do you want us to be prisoners here in the light-house?' demanded Dick. 'It wouldn't matter - there's plenty of food,' said Anne.

'No there isn't! Remember there are five of us - and Timmy and Mischief as well,' said Dick.

'Shut up, Dick,' said Julian. 'You're scaring Anne and Tinker. This storm will soon blow over - we'll be able to pop out and do some shopping tomorrow.'

But the storm grew fiercer, and the sky became so dark that Anne lighted the lamps. Rain slashed against the light-house, and the wind made a loud howling noise that made Timmy growl deep down in his throat.

Anne went to look out of the window. She felt frightened when she saw the great waves that came surging over the rocks below. Some of them broke on the rocks, and the spray flew so high that it splattered the window out of which she was looking! She drew back in alarm.

'Do you know what hit the window then? It was spray from a great wave!'

'Whew!' said Julian, and went to the window himself. What a wonderful sight! The sea was grey now, not blue, and it raced along towards the shore, great waves curling over into white manes, spray flying. Out to sea there were angry waves too, topped with white, which turned into spray as the strong wind caught them. Only a few gulls were out, screaming in excitement, allowing the wind to take them along on their great white wings.

'Well, I certainly wouldn't mind being a gull today,' said Dick. 'It must be a wonderful feeling to ride on a storm - no wonder they are screaming in joy!'

'Ee-oo, Ee-oo, EE-OOO, EE-OOOOO!' cried the gulls, sounding like cats mewling in hunger.

'I'm sorry for the strips out in this,' said Julian. 'Goodness - think of the sailing-ships in the olden days, caught on this rocky coast in a wind like this - it's almost a hurricane!'

'And think of that wicked old One-Ear Bill, gloating when he saw a ship sailing nearer and nearer the rocks!' said George. 'And even taking the warning-lamp out of its place on the cliff, and bringing it near here to make sure that any ships out that night would make straight for the rocks - CRASH!'

'Don't,' said Anne. 'I hate to think of things like that.'

'Let's have a game,' said Julian. 'Where are the cards? Move that lamp a bit closer to the table, Dick. It's getting so jolly dark. Now no more talk of wrecks! Think of something cheerful - tea-sup, for instance - the treasure - and...'

'You know, I think it would be quite easy to find the treasure,' said Dick, bringing the lamp close to the table. 'Mischief is a very clever little thing. I'm sure he would remember where he found that coin, and lead us straight to the place.'

'It might have been just an odd coin, dropped by the man who hid the hoard,' said Anne.

'It might - but wherever it was found I think we can safely say that the main hoard wouldn't be very far away,' said Dick.

'Well, if we do go hunting we'll have to go when the tide is well out,' said Julian. 'I don't really fancy scabbling about in those caves and tunnels under the rocky sea-bed, when I know that somehow or other when the tide is coming in the water gets under the sea-bed, as well as on it.'

Dick sat frowning, thinking out something. 'Ju,' he said at last, 'you remember the direction we went in, as soon as we were underground this morning? We went left-ish all the way, didn't we?' 'Yes, we did,' said Tinker, at once. 'I had my little compass with me - look - it clips to my wristwatch - and we went sharp west all the time.'

'Towards the light-house, that would be,' said Julian, and drew a quick plan. 'See - here's the light-house, say - and just here is the entrance into the cliff, where we first went - here's the path we took, curving right back to the sea again, under the rocky beach - here it goes - and that's a cave, see, then more tunnel, and caves - the way always curving sharply to the left...'

'A bit farther on and we'd have been almost under the light-house!' said Dick, in amazement.

'That's right,' said Julian. 'And maybe in the old days, before this light-house was built, and ships were sent crashing on the rocks on which it now stands, there was a tunnel down from those light-house rocks that joined up with the tunnel we were in this morning - so that the wreckers would find it very easy to stow away anything valuable they found in a wrecked ship without being seen!'

'Whew! You mean they waited till the ship smashed up, then waded over the rocks, as we do, took what they could find, and disappeared down a tunnel there to hide it!'

'And came out the other end!' said Anne.

George stared at Julian, and her eyes were bright. 'Maybe the tunnel is still somewhere in these rocks!' she said. 'Somewhere down at the edge of them, because we know the sea gets into the tunnel. Julian, let's look for it tomorrow. I think you're right. There may be a hole in the rocks here somewhere, that drops down into the tunnel we were in.'

Nobody wanted to play a game after that! They felt much too excited. They studied Julian's plan again and again, glad that Tinker's little compass had shown him so clearly that morning that the under-sea passages had led due west to the light-house rocks.

'Do you suppose that everyone has forgotten the old hole?' said Dick. 'Nobody has told us anything about it, not even Jeremiah. Do you think it may have been blocked up?'

Julian frowned, thinking hard.

'Well, yes - it may have been,' he said. 'It is queer that Jeremiah didn't say anything about it. Anyway we'll have a good hunt tomorrow.'

'And if we find it, we'll drop down and hunt for the treasure!' said Tinker, his eyes shining. 'WHAT a shock for Ebenezer and Jacob if we find it first!'

Chapter 19

A NASTY SHOCK!

The storm blew itself out that evening, and next day was much calmer. The sky still looked angry, and rain fell now and again, but it was possible to get out of the light-house door in the morning, and go down the steps on to the rocks.

'Shall we go shopping first - or look for the hole?' said Julian.

'Look for the hole,' said Dick, promptly. 'The wind is still pretty strong, and the storm might blow up again - just look at that angry sky! We wouldn't be able to mess about round the edge of the rocks if the sea gets any rougher.'

They spread out and went cautiously over the great rocks on which the light-house was built. At low tide the rocks stood well up, out of the sea. The light-house was built on the highest part, and seemed to tower over the searchers as they clambered here and there, seeking for any hole that looked as if it might lead down into some tunnel below.

'Here's a hole!' called Anne, suddenly, and they all clambered over to her in excitement, Timmy too. Julian looked down to where Anne was pointing. 'Yes - it does look a likely one,' he said. 'Big enough to take a man, too. I'll climb down and see.'

He slid down the hole, holding on to projecting pieces of rock as he went. The others watched, thrilled. Timmy barked. He didn't like to see Julian disappearing like this!

But before Julian quite disappeared, he shouted again. 'I'm afraid it's no good! It's come to a sudden end! I'm standing on firm rock, and though I've felt all round it with my feet, there's no opening anywhere. It's a blind end!'

What a disappointment! 'Blow!' said Dick, lying down on the rocks and putting his arm down the hole to help Julian to climb up again. 'I had high hopes then! Julian - here's my hand. Do you want any help?'

'Thanks - it is a bit difficult!' said Julian. He climbed up with difficulty, and squeezed out of the hole thankfully. 'I wouldn't like to get wedged in here!' he said. 'Especially with the tide coming in!'

'It's beginning to pour with rain again!' said Anne. 'Shall we go shopping now - or wait a bit?'

'Oh, let's wait,' said George. 'I'm cold and wet now. Let's go into the light-house and make some hot coffee. WHAT a disappointment! Never mind - we can always go down the tunnels we were in yesterday and search around - maybe Mischief will show us where he found the gold coin!'

They all went into the light-house, and once more Julian jammed the door. 'I wish that locksmith would come,' he said. 'If we go down into the caves, we'll have to leave old Timmy behind on guard - and it is such a shame!'

'Woof,' said Timmy, heartily agreeing. They all went upstairs and Anne began to make the coffee. As they were sitting drinking it, Timmy suddenly sprang to his feet with a most blood-curdling growl. Everyone jumped, and Anne spilt her coffee.

'Timmy! What's up?' said George, in alarm. Timmy was standing with his nose towards the closed door of the room, his hackles rising up on his neck. He looked truly fierce!

'What on earth is the matter, Tim?' said Julian, going to the door. 'There can't be anyone on the stairway - the entrance door's jammed!'

Timmy raced out of the door as soon as Julian opened it and tore down the spiral stairway at such a speed that he fell, and rolled to the bottom. George gave a terrified scream. 'Timmy! Have you hurt yourself?'

But Timmy leapt to his feet at once, and ran to the entrance door, growling so ferociously that Anne felt really frightened. Julian ran down and went to the door. It was still well and truly jammed.

'Timmy! Maybe it's just the poor milkman, come with some milk again,' he said, and unjammed the door. He took hold of the handle to open it.

It wouldn't open! Julian pulled and tugged, but it was of no use. The door simply would NOT open!

By this time everyone was down beside him. 'Let me try,' said Dick. 'The door must just have stuck.'

No - he couldn't open it either! Julian looked gravely round at everyone. 'I'm afraid - very much afraid - that SOMEBODY has locked us in!' he said.

There was a horrified silence. Then George cried out in anger. 'Locked us in! How dare they! Who's done this!'

'Well - I think we can guess,' said Julian. 'It was whoever came and stole our key the other day!'

'Ebenezer - no, Jacob!' cried Dick. 'One of the two, anyway. How DARE they? What are we to do? We can't get out. Why have they done this - this - silly - wicked thing?'

'I'm afraid it's because they think we might go looking for the treasure - and find it,' said Julian, his face grave. 'We felt sure that Mischief might remember where he had found that gold coin - and lead us there - and I'm pretty sure they think the same. So this is their way of making sure they have time to find the treasure, before we do!'

'They're wicked, they're wicked!' cried George, taking hold of the handle of the door, and pulling it violently. 'We're prisoners!'

'Don't pull the handle off, old thing,' said Julian. 'That wouldn't help at all. Let's go upstairs and talk about it. We'll have to think of some way out of this unexpected difficulty.'

They went soberly upstairs again, and sat down in the living-room. Yes - they were certainly prisoners!

'What are we going to do?' said Dick. 'We are in a real fix, Julian.'

'Yes. You're right,' said Julian, looking worried. 'We can't get out of the light-house, that's certain. On the other hand - how can we get help? No telephone. Shouting would never be heard. Can't use our boat. No one would ever know we are prisoners - they've seen us going in and out of the light-house, and if we suddenly don't appear any more, they'll simply think we have gone home, and that the light-house is empty again!'

'We shall die of starvation!' said Anne, scared.

'Oh no - I expect we shall think of something,' said Dick, seeing that Anne was really frightened. 'All the same, it's a puzzle. We can't get out - and no one can get in! Whoever locked that door has certainly taken the key away with him.'

They talked and they talked, and finally they felt hungry, so they had a meal - though they felt that they ought to eat sparingly, in case their food ran short too quickly.

'And I feel so hungry,' complained George. 'I keep feeling hungry here.'

'That's what I told you. Living in a light-house somehow makes you feel hungry all the time!' said Tinker.

'We'll try and catch the milkman tomorrow morning,' said Julian, suddenly. 'Let's see, now - we could write a note, and push it under the door, so that he would see it tomorrow when he comes. We could put "HELP - WE ARE LOCKED IN".'

'It would blow away,' said George. 'You know it would.'

'We could pin it down our side - and then it wouldn't,' said Anne. 'Half of it would still stick out under the door.'

'Well, it's worth trying,' said Dick, and immediately wrote out the note on a large sheet of paper. He shot downstairs to pin it to the mat - and shoved half the paper underneath so that it stuck out on the other side of the door.

He ran back upstairs. 'I don't for a moment think that the milkman will come across the rocks in this weather,' he said. 'They'll be almost impassable. Still we'll hope for the best!'

There didn't seem anything else to do. The evening came early, for the sky was very dark again, and the wind once more got up, and howled dismally. Even the gulls decided that it was no longer a good idea to glide to and fro.

They played games that evening, and tried to laugh and make jokes. But secretly everyone was worried. Suppose that the stormy weather went on and on, and nobody guessed they were locked in the light-house, and the milkman didn't bring any milk, and didn't see the note - and they ate all their food and...

'Cheer up, everyone,' said Julian, seeing the dismal looks around the table. 'We've been in worse fixes than this.'

'Well, I don't think we have!' said Anne. 'I just can't see ANY way out of this one!'

There was rather a long silence during which Timmy sighed heavily, as if he too was worrying! Only the monkey seemed cheerful, and went head-over-heels at top speed round the room, sitting up for laughs at the end. But nobody laughed. Nobody even seemed to notice him. Mischief felt very sad, and crept over to Timmy for comfort.

'There is one idea that might be a good one,' said Julian, at last. 'It's been running round in my mind for a while - and I'm not sure whether it's possible or not. Anyway, it's one we might try tomorrow, if help doesn't come.'

'What?' asked everyone, at once, and Timmy lifted his head and whined, as if he too quite understood.

'Well, do you remember that I went down that foundation shaft?' said Julian, 'and saw the water swirling at the bottom? Now - do you suppose it's at all possible that that shaft was bored down through a natural hole - and the light-house builders chose to put the foundation shaft there because there was a ready-made shaft they could use - a fine hole going right down through the rock! And they made the hole into a cement-lined shaft, strong and everlasting, so that the light-house would never be at the mercy of waves and wind - but would stand firm, whatever happened?'

This was a new idea to everyone, and it took a little while to sink in. Then Dick smacked the table-top and made them all jump.

'Julian! You've got it! Yes - that strong cement-lined shaft runs down a natural hole - and that hole must be the one we've been looking for! The one that connects up with the tunnels we were in this morning! No wonder we couldn't find it when we hunted all over the rocks! The shaft-makers used it!'

There was silence again. Everyone was taking this in, even Tinker. Julian looked round the table and smiled. 'Have you all jumped to it?' he said. 'If that is the hole we were looking for - what about one of us going down that iron ladder again to the bottom - and finding out if it does lead into the tunnel we were in today?'

'And walking through it, and up the passage and coming out through the cliff entrance we used this morning!' said George. 'Julian! What an absolutely wonderful idea! We could escape that way! What a shock for Ebby and Jacob! We'll do it somehow - we'll do it!'

Chapter 20

DOWN THE SHAFT AND INTO THE TUNNEL

It was a most exciting idea to think that the iron ladder in the great cement-lined shaft might possibly lead to the tunnel they had been into that morning. Julian had seen water swirling at the bottom, when the tide was in - possibly if they went down it when the tide was going out, there would be no danger of being trapped!

The storm was very fitful now - sometimes it came back again, and then the wind blew so hard that it seemed as if the buffeted light-house must fall! Rain fell in torrents that night, and during the dark early hours of the morning, when the tide was in, great waves pounded over the rocks, sending spray almost over the top of the light-house. Julian awoke and looked out of the bedroom window in awe.

'I hope there's no ship out anywhere near here tonight,' he said, and then gave a sudden exclamation, 'What's that - something swept right across the sky!'

'It's the beam from the new light-house at High Cliffs,' said Dick. 'I saw it last night. It must have a very powerful beam, mustn't it, to show even on a night like this?'

They watched for a little while, and then Julian yawned.

'Let's try to go to sleep,' he said. 'We thought we were going away for a nice little holiday - and BANG - we're in the middle of something again!'

'Well, let's hope that we come out of it all right,' said Dick, settling down in his rugs once more.

'I must say that I feel a bit cut off from civilization at the moment. Night, Julian.'

In the morning the storm was still about, and the wind was terrific. Julian ran down to the entrance door to see if the milkman could possibly have come - and had seen their message for help.

But no - the paper was still half on their side, flapping on the mat. Obviously the milkman hadn't dared to cross the rocks that morning, either on foot or by boat!

Dick had looked out of the window to make sure that their boat was still safely moored to the post - and to his surprise and distress, it was no longer there! Tinker was very upset.

'Where's my little boat gone? Has somebody stolen it?'

'Maybe - or possibly the storm broke the mooring-rope, and the boat was smashed to pieces on the rocks,' said Julian. 'Anyway, it's gone. Poor old Tinker. What a shame!'

Tinker was very sad, and Mischief tried to comfort him, doing all sorts of silly tricks to make him laugh. But Tinker wouldn't laugh. He really was right down in the dumps.

They had rather a sparse breakfast, and were very silent. Anne cleared away and washed up, and then Julian called them all together.

'Well, now we must decide about this descent down the shaft to what we hope will be the tunnel we were in yesterday,' he said. 'I am going down myself.'

'Toss for it!' said Dick, at once. 'There's no reason why I shouldn't go, is there? Or what about us both going, in case the other gets into trouble, and needs help?'

'Not a bad idea,' said Julian. 'Except that there won't be anyone to look after the girls and Tinker.'

'WOOF!' said Timmy, indignantly, standing up at once. Julian laughed and patted him.

'It's all right, Timmy. I just wanted to see if you thought you could guard them well. All right - Dick and I will go down the shaft. The sooner the better. We simply must go while the tide is out. What about now, Dick?'

Solemnly they all went down the spiral stairway to the entrance door, where the trap was that opened on to the great shaft. Julian pulled up the lid and gazed down into blackness. He shone his torch down, but he could not see the bottom. 'Well - here goes!' he said, and lowered himself down into the shaft, his feet seeking the rungs of the iron ladder. 'Keep cheerful, girls. We'll get through the tunnels and passages, and to the entrance in the cliff - and fetch help for you in no time at all!'

'Julian, please take care,' said Anne, in a shaky voice. 'Please, please do take care!'

Down went Julian, his torch now held between his teeth. After him went Dick. The girls shone their own torches down the shaft, but soon the boys were so far down that they could not be seen. Only their voices came up now and again, sounding very hollow and peculiar.

'We're at the bottom!' shouted Julian, at last. 'It's rock, and there's no water at present! We've a clear way to follow! I crawled out of the hole at the bottom, and there's some kind of tunnel there all right. We're off now - crawling out, and into the tunnel. Cheer up, all of you! See you soon!' And then the queer hollow voice stopped, and the girls and Tinker heard nothing more. Timmy began to whine. He couldn't understand these queer goings-on at all!

Julian and Dick were feeling rather pleased with themselves. It hadn't been very difficult to squeeze out of the arches at the bottom of the shaft. Now they were in a dark narrow tunnel, whose roof sometimes came down so low that they had to bend double. It smelt damp and seaweedy, but there seemed to be plenty of air. In fact at times quite a little breeze seemed to flow round them.

'I shall be glad when we come into a tunnel we recognize!' said Julian, at last. 'We surely must be near where we were yesterday. Hallo, what's this? Dick - look, Dick!'

Dick looked to where Julian's torch was shining and gave a shout. 'A gold coin - another one! We must be near where old Mischief ran off to yesterday. Look - there's another - and another. Where on earth did they come from?'

The boys shone their torches all around, and saw at last where the coins had fallen from. Above their head was a dark hole, running up into the rock. As they shone their torches on it, a gold coin slid out and dropped down to join the others.

'This is where Mischief found the coin!' cried Dick. 'Julian there must be a box or something up there, which is rotting away, and letting out the money it contains bit by bit.'

'Whoever would have guessed at such a hiding-place!' said Julian, marvelling as he shone his torch above his head. 'There's absolutely nothing to be seen except that dark hole - no box, nothing. It must have been pushed right into a recess at the side of the hole, by someone who knew a good hiding-place was there.'

'Give me a leg-up so that I can put in my hand and feel,' said Dick. 'Buck up - this is too exciting for words!'

Julian gave him a leg-up, and Dick put his head and shoulders into the hole. He felt to one side - nothing - felt to the other side, and his hand came across something hard and cold - an iron band perhaps? He ran his hand over it and touched something soft and crumbly - old, old wood rotting away, maybe - possibly a wooden chest - only held together by the iron bands. He scrabbled about and Julian gave a sudden shout.

'Hey - you've showered me with money! Whew - I never saw so many gold coins in my life!'

'Julian - I think there's more than one box or chest up there,' said Dick, jumping down, and looking at the big heap of shining coins at his feet. 'There may be a fortune there! Talk about treasure-trove! Look - let's not disturb anything else up that hole. No one knows about it except ourselves. Better gather up these coins though, just in case that awful Ebby takes it into his head to come down this way!'

So they filled their pockets with the coins and then made their way onwards again. To their joy they soon recognized one of the tunnels they had been in the day before. 'Plain sailing now,' said Dick joyfully. 'We'll soon be out, and then we'll get the locksmith to pick the lock of the lighthouse, so that we can get in.'

'Sh!' said Julian, suddenly. 'I think I can hear something.' They listened, but went on again, thinking that Julian was mistaken.

But he wasn't! As they turned a dark corner that led into a cave, someone leapt at them! Julian went down to the ground at once, and Dick followed. He just had time to see that Ebenezer was there with someone else - Jacob perhaps?

As Dick fell, gold coins spilled out of his pocket. Ebenezer gave a cry and bent down to them at once. Julian tried to take his chance and slip by him - but the other man caught him and sent him spinning backwards. 'Where did you find that money? You tell us or you'll be sorry!'

shouted Ebenezer, and the echo came back at once, 'Sorry - sorry - sorry!'

'Run, Dick!' panted Julian. 'It's our only chance!' He gave Ebenezer a terrific shove, which sent him into the other man - yes, it was Jacob - and then he and Dick were off at once, running as fast as they could, back along the way they had come. 'You come here!' yelled Ebenezer, and they heard him pounding after them.

'Hurry!' panted Dick. 'If only we can get to the shaft, we're all right.'

But alas, they took the wrong turning, and soon found themselves in a cave they had never seen before. Ebenezer and Jacob blundered past without seeing them. 'Better stay here a while,' said Julian. 'Let them get a good way off.'

So they stayed still and quiet, and then at last ventured out of their hiding-place and tried to find their way back to the right path.

'You know - if we get lost down here, we're done for!' said Julian. 'And once the tide flows in, we shall be in a pretty poor way! Somehow we've got to get out through the cliff way or back to the shaft. Hang on to me, Dick. We mustn't get separated, whatever happens!'

They stumbled on, not really knowing whether they were going in the right direction or not. They seemed to go through endless tunnels and caves - what a labyrinth there was in that great strata of rocks! Then they heard voices!

'That's Ebby's voice - and Jacob's too,' whispered Julian. 'They're coming this way. Hide here, and keep still!'

So they hid quietly, and listened to Ebby and Jacob. 'Those boys have got to come back here,' said Ebby. 'We'll wait. Don't make a sound!'

'We'll have to make a dash for it, and hope for the best!' whispered Julian. 'Come on! We'll be caught by the tide soon if we're not quick!'

They both made a sudden rush, and passed the surprised Ebby and Jacob at a run. Then down the tunnel beyond them they went as fast as they could, bumping their arms and legs and heads against the rocky walls, but holding their torches steadily in front of them. On they went and on - and behind them, breathing heavily, came Ebby and Jacob.

'I think this must be a bad dream!' panted Dick. 'JULIAN! JULIAN! Look - there's water coming along this tunnel! The tide's coming in!'

'Come on,' said Julian. 'I feel as if the shaft isn't far away now. I seem to know this tunnel - and this cave. Come on, Dick, we haven't a minute to spare! We've GOT to get to the ladder!'

'Look! There's the shaft!' yelled Dick at last. 'Come on - we shall just about be able to squeeze under the arch at the bottom! Hurry Julian - the water's up to our ankles now!'

They reached the shaft and squeezed under the small archway that let the water run through from side to side over the rocky bottom of the shaft. They began to mount the ladder, and then stopped to hear if there were any sounds from Ebby or Jacob.

They heard yells. 'EBBY! COME BACK! Tide's flowing in!' and then they heard Ebby's angry voice.

'I'm coming! They've gone farther down - and they won't like it! They'll be drowned before they get much farther!'

Dick grinned. 'Come on, Ju, - up we go! I can see the light through the trap-door at the top. The girls have left it open, bless them!'

And soon the two boys were clambering out of the trap-door, with Timmy barking madly and licking their necks, the girls and Tinker too excited for words!

'What happened? Didn't you get out of the tunnel to find help for us? Were those men there? What happened?'

'Plenty!' said Julian. 'But unfortunately we didn't get past Ebby and Jacob, who were lying in wait for us. So we're still stuck in this light-house, with nobody to help us. BUT...'

'But what?' asked George, shaking his arm 'Julian, you look excited. What's happened?'

'We found the treasure!' said Julian. 'Come on - we'll tell you all about it!' And he led the way up the spiral stairway, with Tinker and the excited girls close behind.

Soon the boys were telling their story, and George and Anne and Tinker listened and exclaimed and danced about, and were altogether marvellous listeners to a marvellous tale.

'It MUST have been the treasure - in an iron-bound chest - oh, Ju, weren't you excited when the coins poured out?'

'Yes. It was certainly a very fine moment,' said Julian. 'Mischief, stop pulling my hair. My word. It's been an exciting morning! What about a drink of lemonade - and by the way, what's the weather been like? We couldn't see a thing down below!'

'Oh, it's awful again, Julian!' said Anne. 'There's another storm coming - look at those scurrying black clouds.'

'It does look bad,' said Julian, his excitement leaving him, as he saw clearly that another big storm was blowing up. 'We certainly shouldn't be able to get out of here today, even if we could get out of the door!'

'Julian, Tinker found his father's old pocket radio in a cupboard,' said Anne. 'And it still works. We listened to the weather report, and it gave an important warning to all ships at sea or by the coast. It said they must run to safety as soon as they could.'

'Well, I'm blessed if I know what to do for the best,' said Julian, looking out of the window. 'How in the world are we to let people know we're here, marooned in the light-house? We'll simply have to think of something!'

But that was easier said than done! How did one get help when there was no way to get help? How did one escape out of a locked light-house when there was no key?

Chapter 21

A WONDERFUL IDEA

'I'm thirsty,' said Tinker. 'I'll get some lemonade.'

'Well, go slow with it, then,' said Dick. 'You don't know how long we may be locked up here - and we haven't endless food and drink!'

Tinker looked alarmed. 'Might we be locked up here for weeks and weeks?' he said.

'If people thought we had left the light-house and gone back home because of the bad weather, we might easily be here for some time,' said Julian, soberly. 'Nobody would bother about us - they'd think we were safe at home.'

'But Mother would soon feel worried if she didn't hear from us,' said George. 'We said we'd send her a card each day, you know - and if she doesn't have one for a day or two, she would be sure to get worried, and send someone over here.'

'Hurrah for mothers!' said Dick, relieved. 'All the same - I don't fancy a week or so here with hardly anything to eat. We'll have plenty of one thing though - and that's rain water!'

'There must be some way out of this,' said Julian, who had been sitting silent, frowning at his thoughts.

'Can't we get a message out somehow? Are there any flags here, Tinker, that we could wave out of a window?'

'No,' said Tinker. 'I've never seen any. What about a white table-cloth? We've one of those.'

'Yes. That would do,' said Julian. 'Fetch it, Tinker.'

Tinker pulled it off the table and gave it to Julian. Julian went to the window and looked through the glass, which was misted with spray. 'I don't expect anyone will notice a table-cloth being shaken out of this window,' he said. 'But I'll try it. My word - the window's hard to open. It seems to have stuck.'

He opened it at last, and immediately an enormous gust of wind came in, and everything went flying - papers, books, carpets - chairs fell over, and poor Mischief was blown from one side of the light-house room to the other. Timmy barked in fright and tried to catch the flying papers as they went by his nose. The table-cloth disappeared at once!

Julian managed to close the window again after a terrific effort, and once more the room became peaceful. 'Whew!' said Julian. 'I didn't guess there was such a gale outside. I should think that table-cloth is about five miles away by now! The gulls will get a surprise when it comes flapping along in the sky.'

George couldn't help laughing at that, frightened though she was. 'Oh, Julian - it was a jolly good thing you didn't fly off with the table-cloth! My word, what a gale! I wonder the light-house stands it.'

'Well, we do feel a buffet now and again,' said Dick. 'There - did you feel that? It was either a wave bumping into the rocks, or spray forced against us - I distinctly felt the light-house shake a little.'

'Rubbish!' said Julian, seeing Anne's scared face. 'Don't make silly jokes like that.'

'You're quite sure that the light-house can't be blown down?' said Anne, in a small voice.

'Dear Anne, use your common-sense,' said Julian. 'Would it have stood for all these years if it hadn't been strong enough to stand against storms far worse than this?'

'Mischief is feeling frightened too,' said Tinker. 'He's gone and hidden, look.'

'Well, long may he stay there,' said Julian. 'At least, he's not trying to open the biscuit-tin, or delve into the bag of sweets! I should just like to know how many of our sweets he has eaten up to now!'

WHOOOOOOOSH!

That was an extra big gale of wind that buffeted the light-house, and made Timmy stand up and growl. Rain pattered against the window, sounding as if someone was throwing pebbles.

Julian was very worried. It really did look as if the stormy weather was going on and on. It might quite well continue for a few days, and their food certainly would not last long. There were still some tins left, and they had plenty of water, of course - the rain saw to that - but somehow they were all always so hungry!

'Cheer up, Julian,' said George. 'You do look grim.'

'I feel it,' said Julian. 'I cannot for the life of me think of any way to escape from here, or even to get help. We've no way of signalling...'

'Pity the light-house lamp is no longer going,' said Tinker. 'That would have been a fine signal.'

To Tinker's enormous surprise Julian suddenly gave a shout, leapt up, came over to Tinker, and gave him such a clap on the back that the surprised boy almost fell off his chair!

'W-w-what's the matter?' stammered Tinker, rubbing his shoulder.

'Don't you see - perhaps we can set the old lamp going, and make it shine out as it used to do - not to warn ships, of course - but to make people realize that we are prisoners in the light-house!' said Julian, jubilantly. 'Tinker - do you know if it's possible to light the lamp?'

'I think so,' said Tinker. 'My father showed me how it worked, and I think I remember. Oh - and there's a bell that can be struck, too!'

'Better and better!' said Julian. 'Where is the bell?'

'It was dismantled and put away,' said Tinker. 'It used to hang in that sort of verandah place that runs outside, round the lamp-room - there's a big hook for it there.'

'Oh - it hung in that outside gallery, did it?' said Julian. 'Well - that means that one of us would have to go out there in the wind and hang it up - not too good! There must be a ninety-mile-an-hour gale up there. Anyway, let's get the bell and have a look at it.'

The great bell was down in the store-room, covered up. It was made of brass, and once had had a hammer that struck it at intervals, worked by some simple machinery. But the machinery was in pieces - no good at all!

'We'll take the bell upstairs,' said Julian. 'Gosh, it's heavy as lead. Dick, I'll want your help.'

Between them the two boys carried the heavy bell up to the living-room, and Tinker brought up the old hammer that used to strike it. Julian and Dick held up the bell by its loop of iron. 'Hit it with the hammer, Tinker,' said Julian. 'See if it stills sounds loudly.'

Tinker struck it hard with the hammer - and at once a great deep clang filled the room from side to side, making Timmy jump almost out of his skin. He and Mischief left the room at top speed, and fell down the spiral stairway together. All the others jumped too, and stared at one another in awe. The sound of the bell went booming round and round the room, filling their ears so that they had to shake their heads to try and get rid of the sound. Julian at last clasped the rim of the bell with both his hands and the sound died away.

'What a WONDERFUL bell!' he said, in awe. 'Look how old it is, too - see, it says "Cast in 1896"! My word - if only we could get it hung up in its place on the gallery, the sound of it would go right to the village and beyond! I wonder how many ships heard it in the old days, booming out every now and again as the hammer struck it.'

Tinker raised the hammer again, but Dick stopped him. 'No - you saw how scared Timmy and Mischief were. They'll probably jump through a window, glass and all, if we sound the bell again!'

'We'll wait till we think the wind has died down a bit, and then try to hang the bell,' said Julian. 'Now let's look at the lamp. Will it want oil, Tinker?'

'It may do - though I think there's some still in it, left when the light-house was closed down,' said Tinker. 'But there is plenty down in the store-room.'

'Good,' said Julian, feeling decidedly more cheerful. 'Now - if the gale dies down at all, we'll try to hang the bell. We can strike that as soon as it's hung, and not wait till we light the lamp.'

But the gale seemed to get worse, and Julian really did wonder if the old light-house would stand up to it! Should he take everyone down to the store-room? Just in case? 'I will if the gale gets worse,' he thought. 'Though if the light-house should fall, there wouldn't be much chance for us, whatever part of it we're in!'

They went up to the lamp-room in the afternoon and looked at the great old lamp. Tinker explained how it worked. 'It used to go round and round mechanically,' he said, 'and there were screens here - and here - that shut out the light in places as it went round - so that the light seemed to go on and off, if any ship was watching it - it seemed to flash, you see, instead of to shine steadily. Ships noticed it more quickly then.'

The screens were broken in pieces. There was still some oil in the lamp, but Julian added more. The wick seemed perfectly good. Now if only they could light the lamp, and keep it going, someone would be sure to see it, and wonder about it!

Julian felt in his pocket for matches. As the lamp-room was enclosed in glass, it was easy to keep the match alight. He touched the oily wick with it - and hey, presto! the lamp was lighted!

It was a very big lamp, and, close to, the light was quite blinding. Dick crowed with delight.

'We've done it! Old light-house, you're going to shine once more tonight! You're alive again!'

'Now to hang the bell,' said Julian, and he cautiously opened the door leading on to the gallery outside, having waited until the wind died down for a moment. He and Dick lifted the bell up to the hook there and slipped the iron loop over it. It hung there, swinging, and Julian lifted the hammer - but at that moment a great gust took him and he staggered, almost falling over the railing!

Dick caught him just in time, and, with George's help, dragged him into the lamp-room. They were all very white-faced! 'That was a narrow escape,' said George, her hands shaking and her body trembling. 'We'll have to be careful if we go out on the gallery again! Perhaps we had better rely only on the lamp.'

'I vote we all go down and have some hot tea,' said Julian, thankful for his escape. His legs felt shaky as he went down the stairs. He was most surprised! Julian was seldom scared, and it was peculiar to have legs that suddenly gave at the knees!

However, everyone soon recovered when they were drinking hot tea and eating ginger biscuits. 'I wish it was dark so that we could see how bright the light is from the lamp when it shines,' said Dick. 'It will be dark very quickly today.'

It was! So dark that the light streaming from the old lamp at the top of the light-house was brilliant! It cut a shining path through the night, gleaming yellow.

And through the roar of the sea went a great clanging, as Julian, with Dick holding on to him, struck the old bell hanging in the gallery.

'Listen!' said George, her hand on Timmy's collar.

'Listen! BOOM. BOO-OOO-OOM! BOOOOM! Tim, that bell must feel happy tonight - it's found its voice again!'

BOOOOOOOOOM! Has anyone heard that old bell on this stormy night? Has anyone seen the light from the old old lamp?

BOOOOOOOOOM!!!

Chapter 22

THE END OF THE ADVENTURE

Down in the village of Demon's Rocks that night, people drew their curtains, made up their fires, and sat down in their arm-chairs. They were thankful not to be out in the wind and the rain.

Old Jeremiah Boogle was lighting his pipe, sitting by his own roaring fire, when he heard a sound that made him drop the flaring match, and listen in amazement.

BOOOOOOM! BOOOOOOM!

'A bell! A bell I've not heard for nigh on forty years!' said old Jeremiah, standing up, hardly able to believe his ears. 'No - it can't be the light-house bell. That's been gone for many a day!'

BOOOOOOOOM!

Jeremiah went to his window and pulled aside the old curtain. He stared out - and could not believe his eyes! He gave a yell. MILLIE! Come look here! Light-house lamp is shining out! MILLIE! Where's that granddaughter of mine? MILLIE!

'What is it, Grandad, now?' said a plump little woman, bustling in.

'Look, Millie - am I seeing right - ain't that the light-house lamp a-shining there?' said Jeremiah.

'Well - there's a bright light shining out there high above Demon's Rocks,' said Millie. 'But I never in my life saw the light-house lamp shining out before! And what's that booming noise, Grandfather - like a wonderful great bell?'

'That's the old bell in the light-house!' said Jeremiah. 'I couldn't mistake that! Many's the time I heard it booming out to warn ships off them Demon's Rocks in the old days. Millie, it can't be! It don't hang there no more. And the light don't shine no more. What's happening?'

'I dunno, Grandad,' said Millie, scared. 'Ain't no one in the light-house, far as I know!'

Old Jeremiah smacked his hand down on the window-sill, knocking over a plant-pot. 'There are folk there - three boys and two girls, and a monkey too - and a dog as well!'

'Well, there now!' said Millie. 'And what would they be there for? Did they set the lamp a-going and sound that bell? BOOOOOOM - there it goes again - enough to wake all the babies in Demon's Rocks Village!'

Millie was right. It did wake all the babies, and the children - and amazed every man and woman in the place, including Ebenezer and Jacob. They had leapt to their feet when they had heard the bell, and were astounded to see the great light shining out steadily in the night.

They heard people hurrying by their cottage, on their way to Demon's Rocks jetty. They heard Jeremiah's big voice booming out too. 'It's they children up there in the light-house, a-banging that bell, and setting that light a-shining. Something's wrong! It's help they're needing, folks! Something's wrong!'

Ebenezer and Jacob knew quite well what was wrong! The children were locked in the light-house and couldn't get out! They might be ill or hurt - or starving - but they couldn't get out to fetch help. And now the whole village was aroused, and when the morning came, a boat would bob out on the great waves and find out what had happened!

Ebby and Jacob disappeared that night! It wasn't Constable Sharp they feared - it was the people of the village! They slipped away in the dark and the rain, and were gone. But you'll be caught, Ebby, you'll be caught, Jacob! And no one will be sorry for you. No one at all!

When daylight came, there were many people on the jetty, ready to go across to the light-house. The wind was so rough that great waves still rolled over the rocks on which the light-house stood. Soon a boat was launched, and Jeremiah, Constable Sharp and the village doctor went across, the boat careering from side to side like a mad thing, as the waves caught it.

They went up the steps to the light-house and banged at the door - and from the other side came Julian's glad voice. 'You'll have to break down the door. Ebby or Jacob locked us in and took the key. We can't get out, and we're running short of food!'

'Right. Stand back,' shouted Jeremiah. 'Constable and I are going to break in!'

Jeremiah was old but he was still hefty, and Constable Sharp was heftier still. The lock suddenly splintered under their enormous shoves, and the door flew wide open! Jeremiah and the policeman shot inside and bumped into Julian and the rest, sending them flying. Timmy barked in astonishment and Mischief fled up the stairway!

Soon they were all in the living-room, and Julian was pouring out his story. Anne made tea and handed round steaming cups. Jeremiah listened open-mouthed, and the policeman busily took notes. The doctor, glad that no one was ill or hurt, sipped his tea and listened, too.

'We didn't know how to get out when we were locked in,' said Julian, coming to the end of his long story. 'So in the end we lighted the old lamp, and hung up the old bell, and struck it with the hammer. I could hardly stand in the gallery, though, there was such a wind! I struck it for half an hour, and then my brother here went on till he felt too cold. The lamp didn't burn all night - it went out early this morning.'

'But both bell and light did their job well, son,' said Jeremiah, looking twenty years younger, he was so excited. 'Ah, to think that old lamp shone again, and that old bell sounded - I thought I must be dreaming!'

'We'll be after that Ebenezer and Jacob,' said the policeman, shutting his notebook. 'And it seems to me you'd all best go home, young sir. This weather's going on for a bit - and there's nothing to keep you here, is there?'

'Well,' said Julian, 'actually there is something to keep us here. You know the old wreckers' lost treasure you told us about, Jeremiah? Well - we've found it!'

Jeremiah was so astounded that he couldn't say a word! He goggled at Julian, and opened and shut his mouth like a fish. Julian took some golden coins out of his pocket and showed them to the policeman and the doctor, and to Jeremiah.

'There you are!' he said. 'We know where there are thousands of these - they are in iron-bound boxes and chests down in one of the tunnels in the rock. What do you think of that? We can't leave here till we've given the treasure into the hands of the police! It belongs to the Crown, doesn't it?'

'Yes, it does,' said Constable Sharp, gazing at the bright gold coins. 'But you'll get a fine reward, young man - all of you will! Where's this treasure? I'd better get it straight away.'

'Well - you have to go down the foundation shaft of the light-house,' said Julian, gravely, but with a twinkle in his eye, 'and crawl under the archway at the bottom, and then make your way down the tunnel - but be careful the sea doesn't catch you - and then when you come to...'

The policeman stopped scribbling down what Julian was saying, and looked startled. Julian laughed.

'It's all right - Dick and I will fetch it ourselves today, and give it to you, complete with every single gold coin,' he said. 'We don't need to go down the shaft - there's another way in - the way you took us, Jeremiah. We'll go this morning, for a last excitement. And then - home! Perhaps you would kindly telephone to Kirrin Garage for a car to fetch us at twelve o'clock, Constable?'

'Oh good!' said Anne. 'An adventure is always exciting but I've really had enough at the moment! This was such a bad-weather one! Oh, Constable, look out - that monkey has pulled out your whistle!'

So he had - and what is more he blew it - PHEEEEEEEEEEE. Jeremiah almost jumped out of his skin, and Mischief received a slap that almost made him jump out of his skin too!

'Good-bye, Jeremiah,' said Julian. 'It's been fine meeting you - and thanks for coming to rescue us. We'll see you again some day. Come along Constable - we'll go and find the treasure with you now.'

'I don't think I'll come,' said Anne, who really didn't like dark, smelly tunnels and caves. 'I'll do the packing.'

'Timmy and I will help you,' said George, who knew that Anne wouldn't like to be left alone in the light-house.

The boys went off with Jeremiah, the doctor and Constable Sharp, rowing over the rocks to the jetty. The doctor and Jeremiah said good-bye at the jetty, and the three boys and Mischief took Constable Sharp to find the treasure. They had to push their way through quite a crowd of people, who had collected on the quay, anxious to know why the light had shone out from the light-house in the night, and why the bell had sounded.

'Make way, please,' said the policeman, politely. 'Everything is all right. These children were locked in the light-house and couldn't get out. Make way, please. There is no need for any excitement!'

'No - that's all over now - isn't it, Ju?' said Dick. 'Whew - it was just a bit too exciting, at times! I shall be quite glad to be at Kirrin Cottage again, with peace and quiet all around us.'

'You've forgotten that Uncle Quentin and his friend will still be there,' said Julian, with a grin. 'There'll be plenty going on while they're around! I'm afraid they won't be at all pleased to see us back!'

Oh yes they will, Julian - especially when they hear the exciting story you have to tell! You'll have some fun showing round a gold coin or two. Timmy is to have one hung on his collar, as a reward for guarding you so well - how proud he will be!

Well, good-bye to you all! Good-bye, Julian, and Dick, and a good journey home! Good-bye, Anne and George - and Tinker too, and Mischief, you funny little monkey!

And good-bye, dear old Timmy, best of friends. How we wish we had a dog like you! See you all again some day!

THE END

Enid Blyton[®]

THE
FAMOUS
FIVE

FIVE HAVE A MYSTERY TO SOLVE

Special Note from ENID BLYTON

My readers will want to know if Whispering Island is real, set in the great blue harbour in the story - and if the little cottage on the hills is there still - and the golf-course in the story - and Lucas, who tells the children about the island. Yes, the island is real, and lies in the great harbour, still full of whispering trees. The little cottage on the hills is still there, with its magnificent view and its old well - and Lucas can be found on the golf-course, nut-brown and bright-eyed, telling stories of the animals and birds he loves so much. I have taken them all and put them into this book for you - as well as the friends you know so well - The Famous Five.

ENID BLYTON

FAMOUS FIVE 20

Five Have A Mystery To Solve

Contents

| | | |
|----|---|----|
| 1 | Easter Holidays | 2 |
| 2 | A Visitor To Tea | 5 |
| 3 | The Cottage On The Hill - And Wilfrid | 10 |
| 4 | Settling In | 15 |
| 5 | Wilfrid Is Most Annoying - And Anne Is Most Surprising! | 20 |
| 6 | Lucas - And His Tale | 24 |
| 7 | Up On The Golf-Course | 29 |
| 8 | Mostly About Wilfrid | 34 |
| 9 | Off To Whispering Island | 38 |
| 10 | The Five Are In A Fix | 43 |
| 11 | A Strange Discovery | 47 |
| 12 | A Great Surprise - And A Shock For George | 51 |
| 13 | A Meal - A Sleep - And A Disappearance | 55 |
| 14 | Wilfrid Has An Adventure On His Own | 60 |
| 15 | Julian Has An Exciting Plan | 64 |
| 16 | A Queer Journey Underground | 68 |
| 17 | In The Treasure Chamber | 73 |
| 18 | A Most Exciting Time! | 78 |
| 19 | Anne Is A Tiger! | 82 |

Chapter 1

EASTER HOLIDAYS

'The nicest word in the English language is holidays!' said Dick, helping himself to a large spoonful of marmalade. 'Pass the toast, Anne. Mother, do you feel down-hearted to have us all tearing about the place again?'

'Of course not,' said his mother. 'The only thing that really worries me when holidays come, is Food - Food with a capital F. We never seem to have enough in the house when all three of you are back. And by the way - does anyone know what has happened to the sausages that were in the larder?'

'Sausages - sausages - let me think!' said Julian, frowning. Anne gave a sudden giggle. She knew quite well what had happened.

'Well, Mother - you said we could get our own meal last night, as you were out,' said Julian. 'So we poked about and decided on sausages.'

'Yes, but Julian - two whole pounds of sausages!' said his mother. 'I know Georgina came over to spend the evening - but even so...!'

'She brought Timmy,' said Anne. 'He rather likes sausages too, Mother.'

'Well, that's the last time I leave the larder door unlocked, when I go out!' said her mother. 'Fancy cooking those lovely pork sausages for a dog - especially Timmy, with his enormous appetite! Really, Anne! I meant to have them for our lunch today.'

'Well - we rather thought we'd go and spend the day at Kirrin, with George and Timmy,' said Dick. 'That's if you don't want us for anything, Mother.'

'I do want you,' said his mother. 'Mrs. Layman is coming to tea, and she said she wants to see you about something.'

The three groaned, and Dick protested at once. 'Oh Mother - the first day of the holidays - and we have to be in to tea! It's too bad - a glorious spring day like this too!'

'Oh - we'll be in to tea all right,' said Julian, giving Dick a sharp little kick under the table, as he saw his mother's disappointed face. 'Mrs. Layman's a nice old thing - she was always giving us little treats when we were little.'

'And she never forgets our birthdays,' said Anne. 'Do you think we could ask George over too - with Timmy? George will be awfully disappointed if we aren't with her the first day of the hols.'

'Yes, of course you can,' said her mother. 'Go and ring her up now, and arrange it. And don't forget to put our old Tibby-cat into the shed, with a saucer of milk. She's scared stiff of Timmy - he's so enormous. And please, all of you, TRY to look clean at tea-time.'

'I'll see to Dick and Anne,' said Julian, with a grin. 'I must remember to find their overalls!'

'I'm going to phone George now, this very minute,' said Anne, getting up from the table. 'Do you mind, Mother? I've finished - and I'd like to catch George before she takes Tim for a walk, or does some shopping for Aunt Fanny.'

'Uncle Quentin will be glad to be rid of George even for a meal,' said Dick. 'He fell over her lacrosse stick yesterday, and wanted to know why she left her fishing net about! George didn't know what he was talking about!'

'Poor old Georgina,' said his mother. 'It's a pity that both she and her father have exactly the same hot tempers. Her mother must find it difficult to keep the peace! Ah - here's Anne back again. Did you get George on the phone, dear?'

'Yes. She's thrilled,' said Anne. 'She says it's just as well we're not going to spend the day with her, because Uncle Quentin has lost some papers he was working on, and he's turning the house upside down. George said she will probably be mad as a hatter by the time she arrives this afternoon! Uncle Quentin even made Aunt Fanny turn out her knitting bag to see if the papers were there!'

'Dear old Quentin,' said her mother. 'Such a truly brilliant scientist - remembers every book he's ever read - every paper he's ever written - and has the finest brain I know - and yet loses some valuable paper or other almost every week!'

'He loses something else every day of the week too,' said Dick, with a grin. 'His temper! Poor old George - she's always in some sort of trouble!'

'Well, anyway, she's jolly glad to be coming over here!' said Anne. 'She's biking over, with Timmy. She'll be here for lunch. Is that all right, Mother?'

'Of course!' said her mother. 'Now - seeing that you had today's dinner for last night's supper, you'd better do a little shopping for me. What shall we have?'

'SAUSAGES!' said everyone, at once.

'I should have thought you were quite literally fed up with sausages, after last night's feast,' said their mother, laughing. 'All right - sausages. But Timmy can have a bone - a nice meaty bone. I am NOT going to buy any more sausages for him, that's quite certain.'

'And shall we get some nice cakes for tea as Mrs. Layman is coming?' said Anne. 'Or are you going to make some, Mother?'

'I'll make a few buns,' said her mother. 'And you can choose whatever else you like - so long as you don't buy up the shop!'

The three went off shopping, cycling along the lane to the village. It was a truly lovely spring day. The celandines were golden in the ditches, and daisies were scattered everywhere. Dick burst into song as they went, and the cows in the nearby fields lifted their heads in surprise, as Dick's loud voice swept round them.

Anne laughed. It was good to be with her brothers again. She missed them very much when she was at school. And now - they would have almost a whole month together - with their cousin George too. She was suddenly overwhelmed with joy, and lifted up her voice and joined Dick in his singing. Her brothers looked at her with affection and amusement.

'Good old Anne,' said Dick. 'You're such a quiet little mouse, it's nice to hear you singing so loudly.'

'I am NOT a quiet little mouse!' said Anne, surprised and rather hurt. 'Whatever makes you say that? You just wait - you may get a surprise one day!'

'Yes - we may!' said Julian. 'But I doubt it. A mouse can't suddenly turn into a tiger! Anyway, one tiger's enough. George is the tiger of our family - my word, she can put out her claws all right - and roar - and ramp and rave!'

Everyone laughed at the picture of George as a tiger. Dick wobbled as he laughed and his front wheel touched Anne's back wheel. She turned round fiercely.

'LOOK OUT, IDIOT! You nearly had me over! Can't you see where you're going? Be sensible, can't you?'

'Hey, Anne - whatever's the matter?' said Julian, amazed to hear his gentle little sister lashing out so suddenly.

Anne laughed. 'It's all right. I was just being a tiger for a moment - putting out my claws! I thought Dick and you might like to see them!'

'Well, well!' said Dick, riding beside her. 'I've never heard you yell like that before. Surprising - but quite pleasing! What about you showing old George your claws sometime when she gets out of hand?'

'Stop teasing,' said Anne. 'Here's the butcher's. For goodness sake go and get the sausages and be sensible. I'll go and buy the cakes.'

The baker's shop was full of new-made buns and cakes, and smelt deliciously of home-made bread. Anne enjoyed herself choosing a vast selection. 'After all,' she thought, 'there will be eight of us - counting Timmy - and if we're all hungry, cakes soon disappear.'

The boys were very pleased to see all the paper bags.

'Looks like a good tea today,' said Dick. 'I hope the old lady - what's her name now - Layman - who's coming to tea today, has a good appetite. I wonder what she's going to tell us about.'

'Did you buy a nice meaty bone for Timmy?' asked Anne. 'He'll like that for his tea.'

'We bought such a beauty that I'm pretty sure Mother will say it's good enough to make soup from,' said Dick, with a grin. 'So I'll keep it in my saddlebag till he comes. Dear old Tim. He deserves a jolly good bone. Best dog I ever knew!'

'He's been on a lot of adventures with us,' said Anne, bicycling beside the boys, as the road was empty. 'And he seemed to enjoy them all.'

'Yes. So did we!' said Dick. 'Well - who knows? An adventure may be lying in wait for us these hols too! I seem to smell one in the air!'

'You don't!' said Anne. 'You're just making that up. I'd like a bit of peace after a hectic term at school. I worked jolly hard this last term.'

'Well - you were top of your form, and captain of Games - so you deserve to have the kind of holiday you like,' said Julian, proud of his young sister. 'And so you shall! Adventures are OUT! Do you hear that, Dick? We keep absolutely clear of them. So that's that!'

'Is it, Ju?' said Anne, laughing. 'Well - we'll see!'

Chapter 2

A VISITOR TO TEA

George and Timmy were waiting for Julian, Dick and Anne, when they arrived home. Timmy was standing in the road, ears pricked, long tail waving. He went quite mad when he saw their bicycles rounding the corner, and galloped towards them at top speed, barking madly, much to the horror of a baker's boy with a large basket.

The boy disappeared into the nearest garden at top speed, yelling 'Mad dog, mad dog!' Timmy tore past, and forced the three to dismount, for they were afraid of knocking him over.

'Dear Timmy!' said Anne, patting the excited dog. 'Do put your tongue in - I'm sure it will fall out some day!'

Timmy ran to each of them in turn, woofing in delight, licking everyone, and altogether behaving as if he hadn't seen them for a year!

'Now that's enough, old boy,' said Dick, pushing him away, and trying to mount his bicycle once more. 'After all, we did see you yesterday. Where's George?'

George had heard Timmy barking, and had now run out into the road too. The three cycled up to her, and she grinned happily at them.

'Hallo! You've been shopping, I see. Shut up barking, Timmy, you talk too much. Sorry you couldn't come over to Kirrin Cottage - but I'm jolly glad you asked me to come to you - my father still hasn't found the papers he's lost, and honestly our place is like a mad-house - cupboards being turned out - even the kitchen store-cupboard! and I left poor Mother up in the loft, looking there - though why Father should think they might be there, I don't know!'

'Poor old George - I can just see your father tearing his hair, and shouting - and all the time he's probably put the papers into the waste-paper basket by mistake!' said Dick, with a chuckle.

'Gracious - we never thought of that!' said George. 'I'd better phone Mother at once, and tell her to look. Bright idea of yours, Dick.'

'Well, you go and phone, and we'll put our bikes away,' said Julian. 'Take your nose away from that bag of sausages, Timmy. You're in disgrace over sausages, let me tell you. You're suspected of eating too many last night!'

'He did eat rather a lot,' said George. 'I took my eye off him, and he wolfed quite a few. I say, who's this Mrs. Layman who's coming to tea? Have we got to stay in and have tea with her? I hoped we might be going off for a picnic this afternoon.'

'Nothing doing, old thing,' said Dick, 'Mrs. Layman is apparently coming to talk to us about something. So we have to be in - with clean hands, nice manners, and everything. So behave yourself, George!'

George gave him a friendly punch. 'That's unfair,' said Dick. 'You know I can't punch you back. My word, you should have seen Anne this morning, George - yelled at me like a tiger howling, and showed her teeth, and...'

'Don't be an idiot, Dick,' said Anne. 'He called me a mouse, George - he said we'd one tiger - you - and that was enough in the family. So I went for him - put out my claws for a moment, and gave him such a surprise. I rather liked it!'

'Good old Anne!' said George, amused. 'But you're not really cut out to be a tiger, and rage and roar, you know.'

'I could be, if I had to,' said Anne, obstinately. 'One of these days I'll surprise you all. You just wait!'

'All right. We will,' said Julian, putting his arm round his sister. 'Come on, now - we'd better get indoors before Timmy gets some of the cakes out of the bags. Stop licking that bag, Tim - you'll make a hole in it.'

'He can smell the cherry buns inside,' said Anne. 'Shall I give him one?'

'NO!' said Julian. 'Cherry buns are wasted on him, you know that. Don't you remember how he chews the bun part and spits out the cherries?'

'Woof,' said Timmy, exactly as if he agreed. He went to sniff at the bag with his bone inside.

'That's your dinner, Tim,' said Anne. 'Plenty of meat on it, too. Look there's Mother at the window, beckoning. I expect she wants the sausages. NO, Timmy - the sausages are NOT for you. Get down! Good gracious, I never in my life knew such a hungry dog. Anybody would think you starved him, George.'

'Well, they'd think wrong, then,' said George. 'Timmy, come to heel.'

Timmy came, still looking round longingly at the various bags that the others were now taking from their saddle-bags.

They all went indoors, and deposited the goods on the kitchen table. The cook opened the bags and looked inside, keeping a sharp eye on Timmy.

'Better take that dog of yours out of my kitchen,' she said. 'Funny how sausages always disappear when he's around. Get down, now - take your paws off my clean table!'

Timmy trotted out of the kitchen. He thought it was a pity that cooks didn't like him. He liked them very much indeed - they always smelt so deliciously of cooking, and there were always so many titbits around which he longed for, but was seldom offered. Ah well - he'd trot into the kitchen again when Cookie had gone upstairs for something! He might perhaps find a few bits and pieces on the floor then!

'Hallo, Georgina dear!' said her aunt, coming into the kitchen, Timmy following her in delight. 'Timmy, go out of the kitchen. I don't trust you within a mile of sausages. Go on - shoo!'

Timmy 'shooed'. He liked Anne's mother, but knew that when she said 'Shoo!' she meant it. He lay down on a rug in the living-room, with a heavy sigh, wondering how long it would be before he had that lovely meaty bone. He put his head on his paws, and kept his ears pricked for George. He thought it most unfair that George shouldn't be shooed out of the kitchen too.

'Now for goodness sake, keep out of my way while I cook the lunch,' said Cook, to the children milling round her kitchen. 'And shut the door, please. I don't want that great hungry dog sniffing round me all the time, making out he's starving, when he's as fat as butter!'

'He's NOT!' said George, indignantly. 'Timmy has never been fat in his life. He's not that kind of dog. He's never greedy!'

'Well, he must be the first dog ever born that wasn't greedy,' said Cookie. 'Can't trust any of them! There was that pug-dog of Mrs. Lane's - crunched up lumps of sugar whenever it could reach a sugar-bowl - and that fat poodle next door - came and knocked over the cream that the milkman left outside the back door - deliberately knocked it over, mark you - and then licked up every drop. Ha - his mistress tried to make out he didn't like cream - but you should have seen his nose - covered in cream up to his eyes!'

Timmy looked in at the kitchen door, his nose in the air, for all the world as if he were deeply offended at Cookie's remarks. Julian laughed. 'You've wounded his pride, Cookie!' he said.

'I'll wound him somewhere else, too, if he comes sniffing round me when I'm cooking,' said Cookie. That made George give one of her scowls, but the others couldn't help laughing!

The morning went very pleasantly. The five went down to the beach, and walked round the high cliffs, enjoying the stiff breeze that blew in their faces. Timmy raced after every seagull that dared to sit on the smooth sand, annoyed that each one rose up lazily on great wings, as soon as he almost reached it.

They were all hungry for their dinner, and not one single morsel was left when they had finished! Cookie had made a tremendous steamed pudding, with lashings of treacle, which was, as usual, a huge success.

'Wish I had a tongue like Timmy's and could lick up the lovely treacle left on the bottom of the dish,' said George. 'Such a waste!'

'You certainly won't be able to eat any tea, I'm sure of that!' said her aunt. But, of course, she was wrong. When tea time came, they all felt quite ready for it, and were most impatient when Mrs. Layman was late!

The tea looked lovely, laid on a big table, over a white lace cloth. The children sat and looked at it longingly. When would Mrs. Layman arrive?

'I begin to feel I'm not going to like Mrs. Layman,' said George, at last. 'I can't bear looking at those cream cakes when I'm hungry.'

The front door bell rang. Hurrah! Then in came a cheerful, smiling old lady, nodding to everyone, very pleased to see such a nice little party waiting for her.

'This is Mrs. Layman, children,' said Julian's mother. 'Sit down, Mrs. Layman. We're delighted to have you.'

'Well, I've come to ask the children something,' said Mrs. Layman. 'But we'll have tea first, and then I'll say what I've come to say. My, my - what a wonderful tea! I'm glad I feel hungry!'

Everyone else was hungry too, and soon the bread and butter, the sandwiches, the buns, the cakes and everything else disappeared. Timmy sat quietly by George, who slipped him a titbit now and again, when no one was looking. Mrs. Layman chatted away. She was a most interesting person, and the children liked her very much.

'Well now,' she said, when tea was finished, 'I'm sure you must be wanting to know why I asked to come to tea today. I wanted to ask your mother, Julian, if there was any chance of you three - and this other boy here - what's his name - George? would you like to help me out of a difficulty.' Nobody pointed out that George was a girl, not a boy, and that George was short for Georgina. George, as usual, was pleased to be taken for a boy. They all looked at Mrs. Layman, listening to her with interest.

'It's like this,' she said. 'I've a dear little house up on the hills, overlooking the harbour - and I've a grandson staying with me there - Wilfrid. Well, I have to go to look after a cousin of mine, who's ill - and Wilfrid can't bear to be left alone. I just wondered if your mother would allow you children to share the little house with Wilfrid - and well - keep him company. He feels a bit scary being on his own. I've a good woman there, who comes in to cook and clean - but poor Wilfrid's really scared of being in such a lonely place, high up on the hill.'

'You mean that lovely little house with the wonderful view?' said Julian's mother.

'Yes. It's rather primitive in some ways - no water laid on, only just a well to use - and no electricity or gas - just candles, or an oil lamp. Maybe it sounds too old-fashioned for words - but honestly the view makes up for it! Perhaps the children would like to come over and see it, before they decide?' Mrs. Layman looked earnestly round at everyone, and nobody knew quite what to say.

'Well - we'll certainly come and see it,' said Julian's mother. 'And if the children feel like it, well, they can stay there. They do like being on their own, of course.'

'Yes,' said Julian. 'We'll come and see it, Mrs. Layman. Mother's going to be busy with a bazaar soon - she'll be glad to get us out of the way - and, of course, we do like being on our own!'

Mrs. Layman looked extremely pleased. 'Tomorrow, then?' she said. 'About ten o'clock. You'll love the view. Wonderful, wonderful! You can see right over the great harbour, and for miles around. Well - I must be going now. I'll tell Wilfrid you children may be keeping him company. He's such a nice lad - so helpful. You'll love him.'

Julian had his doubts about the nice helpful Wilfrid. He even wondered if Mrs. Layman wanted to get away from Wilfrid, and leave him to himself! No - that was too silly. Anyway, they'd soon see what the place was like, tomorrow.

'It would be fun to be on our own again,' said George, when Mrs. Layman had gone. 'I don't expect this Wilfrid would be any bother. He's probably just a silly kid, scared of being left alone - though apparently there is a woman there! Well - we'll go tomorrow! Maybe the view will make up for dear Wilfrid!'

Chapter 3

THE COTTAGE ON THE HILL - AND WILFRID

Next day the children prepared to go and see the cottage belonging to Mrs. Layman. 'You coming too, Mother?' asked Julian. 'We'd like your advice!'

'Well no, dear,' said his mother. 'I've rather a lot to do - there's a meeting on at the Village Hall, and I promised to go to it.'

'You're full of good works, Mother,' said Julian, giving her a hug. 'All right, we'll go by ourselves. I daresay we shall know at once whether we'd like to stay in the cottage - or not. Also, we MUST know what this Wilfrid is like! It's a quarter to ten, and George is already here, with Timmy. I'll call the others and we'll get our bikes.'

Soon the four were on their bicycles, with Timmy, as usual, running alongside, his long tongue out, his eyes bright and happy. This was Timmy's idea of perfect happiness - to be with the four children all day long!

They went along a road that ran on the top of a hill. They swung round a corner - and there, spread far below them, was a great sea-vista that included a wonderful harbour, filled with big and little ships. The sea was as blue as the Mediterranean, quite breathtaking. Anne jumped off her bicycle at once.

'I must just feast my eyes on all this before I go a yard further!' she said. 'What a panorama! What miles of sea and sky!'

She put her bicycle against a gate and then climbed over and stood by herself, gazing down at the view. Dick joined her.

Then suddenly a voice shouted loudly 'FORE! FORE!' A small white thing came whizzing through the air and landed just by Anne's foot. She jumped in surprise.

'It's a golf-ball,' said Dick. 'No, don't pick it up. Whoever's playing with it, has to come and hit it from exactly where it fell. Good thing you weren't hit, Anne. I didn't realize that this gate led on to a golf-course!'

'We ought to have a walk over it,' said Anne. 'Just look at those gorse bushes over there, absolutely flaming with yellow blossom - and all the tiny flowers springing up everywhere - speedwell and coltsfoot and daisies and celandines - beautiful. And oh - what a view!'

'Yes - and if Mrs. Layman's cottage has a view anything like this, I'd certainly like to stay there!' said Dick. 'Think of getting out of bed in the morning and seeing this enormous view out of the window - the harbour - the sea beyond - the hills all round - the great spread of sky...'

'You ought to be a poet, Dick!' said Anne, in surprise. The golfers came up at that moment, and the children stood aside and watched one of them address the ball, and then strike it easily and strongly. The ball soared through the air, and landed far away on a smooth green fairway.

'Good shot!' said the man's partner, and the two sauntered off together.

'Funny game, really,' said Anne. 'Just hitting a ball all round the course.'

'Wish I had some clubs!' said Dick. 'I'm sure I could hit some smashing shots!'

'Well, if that cottage is anywhere near the golf-course, perhaps you could pay to have a lesson,' said Anne. 'I bet you could hit a ball as far as that man!'

The others were now yelling for them to come back, so they went to fetch their bicycles. Soon they were all riding along the road again. 'We have to look for a small white gate, with 'Hill Cottage' painted on it,' said George. 'On the hillside facing the sea.'

'There it is!' cried Anne. 'We'll pile our bicycles together against the hedge, and go in at the gate.' They left their bicycles in a heap and went through the gate. Not far to their left stood a funny old cottage, its back to them, its front looking down the steep hill that ran towards the great harbour and the sea beyond.

'It's like a cottage out of an old fairy-tale,' said Anne. 'Funny little chimneys - rather crooked walls - a thatched roof, all uneven - and what tiny windows!'

They walked down a little winding path that led to the cottage. They soon came to a well, and leaned over it to see the water deep down. 'So that's the water we'd have to drink!' said Anne, wrinkling up her nose. 'And we'd have to let down the bucket by winding this handle - and down it would go on the rope! Do you suppose the water is pure?'

'Well, seeing that people must have drunk it for years on end - the ones living in that cottage, anyway - I should imagine it's all right!' said Julian. 'Come on - let's find the front door of the cottage - if it has one!'

It had one wooden door, hung rather crooked, with an old brass knocker. It faced down the hill, and was flanked on each side by small windows. Two other small windows were above. Julian looked at them. The bedrooms would be very small, he thought - would there really be room for them all?

He knocked at the door. Nobody came to open it. He knocked again, and then looked for a bell, but there wasn't one.

'See if the door is unlocked,' said Anne. So Julian turned the handle - and at once the door gave under his hand! It opened straight into a room that looked like a kitchen-living-room.

Julian gave a shout. 'Anyone at home?'

There was no answer. 'Well - as this is obviously the cottage we were meant to see, we'd better go in,' said Julian and in they all went.

It was old, very old. The carved wooden furniture was old too. Ancient oil lamps stood on two tables in the room, and in a recess there was an oil stove with a saucepan on top. A narrow, crooked stairway made of wood curved up to the floor above. Julian went up, and found himself in a long, darkish room, its roof thatched with reed and held up by black beams.

'This place must be hundreds of years old!' he called down to the others. 'I don't think it's big enough for us four and the others too - the cook and that boy called Wilfrid.'

Just as he finished calling down the stairs, the front door was flung open and someone came in.

'What are you doing here?' he shouted. 'This is my cottage!'

Julian went quickly down the stairs, and there, facing them all, stood a boy of about ten, a scowl on his brown face.

'Er - are you Wilfrid, by any chance?' asked Dick, politely.

'Yes, I am. And who are you? And where's my aunt? She'll soon chuck you out!' said the boy.

'Is your aunt Mrs. Layman?' asked Julian. 'If so, she asked us to come and see her cottage, and decide if we'd like to keep you company. She said she had to go away and look after a sick friend.'

'Well, I don't want you!' said the boy. 'So clear off. I'm all right here alone. My aunt's a nuisance, always fussing round.'

'I thought there was a cook too,' said Julian. 'Where is she?'

'She only comes in the morning, and I sent her off,' said Wilfrid. 'She left me some food. I want to be alone. I don't want you. So clear off.'

'Don't be a fathead, Wilfrid,' said Julian. 'You can't live all alone here. You're just a kid.'

'I shan't be living all alone. I've plenty of friends,' said Wilfrid, defiantly.

'You CAN'T have plenty of friends here in this lonely place, with only the hills and sky around you,' said Dick.

'Well, I have!' said Wilfrid. 'And here's one - so look out!' And, to the horror of the two girls, he put his hand into his pocket, and brought out a snake!

Anne screamed, and tried to hide behind Julian. Wilfrid saw her fright and came towards her, holding the snake by its middle, so that it swayed to and fro, its bright little eyes gleaming.

'Don't be scared, Anne,' said Julian. 'It's only a harmless grass-snake. Put the creature back into your pocket, Wilfrid, and don't play the fool. If that snake is the only friend you have, you'll be pretty lonely here by yourself!'

'I've plenty of friends, I tell you!' shouted Wilfrid, stuffing the snake back into his pocket. 'I'll hit you if you don't believe me.'

'Oh no, you won't,' said Dick. 'Just show us your other friends. If they're kids like you, it's just too bad!'

'Kids? I don't make friends with kids!' said Wilfrid, scornfully. 'I'll show you I'm speaking the truth. Come out here on the hillside, and see some of my other friends.'

They all trooped out of the little cottage, on to the hillside, amazed at this fierce, strange boy. When they were in the open, they saw that he had eyes as bright blue as the speedwell in the grass, and hair almost as yellow as the celandines.

'Sit down and keep quiet,' he ordered. 'Over there, by that bush. And don't move a finger. I'll soon make you believe in my friends! How dare you come here, doubting my word!'

They all sat down obediently beside the gorse-bush, puzzled and rather amused. The boy sat down too, and drew something out of his pocket. What was it? George tried to see, but it was half-hidden in his right hand.

He put it to his mouth, and began to whistle. It was a soft, weird whistle that grew loud and then died away again. There was no tune, no melody, just a kind of beautiful dirge that pulled at the heart. Sad, thought Anne, such a sad little tune - if you could call it a tune!

Something stirred a little way down the hill - and then, to everyone's astonishment, an animal appeared - a hare! Its great ears stood upright, its big eyes stared straight at the boy with the curious little pipe. Then the hare lolloped right up to Wilfrid - and began to dance! Soon another came, but this one only watched. The first one then seemed to go mad, and leapt about wildly, utterly unafraid.

The tune changed a little - and a rabbit appeared! Then another and another. One came to Wilfrid's feet and sniffed at them, its whiskers quivering. Then it lay down against the boy's foot. A bird flew down - a beautiful magpie! It stood nearby, watching the hare, fascinated. It took no notice of the children at all. They all held their breath, amazed and delighted.

And then Timmy gave a little growl, deep down in his throat. He didn't really mean to, but he just couldn't help it! At once the hares, the rabbits and the magpie fled, the magpie squawking in fright.

Wilfrid faced round at once, his eyes blazing. He lifted his hand to strike Timmy - but George caught his fist at once.

'Let go!' yelled Wilfrid. 'That dog scared my friends! I'll get a stick and whip him. He's the worst dog in the world, he's...'

And then something strange happened. Timmy came gently over to Wilfrid, lay down, and put his head on the angry boy's knee, looking up at him lovingly. The boy, his hand still raised to strike, lowered it, and fondled Timmy's head, making a curious crooning noise.

'Timmy! Come here!' ordered George, amazed and angry. To think that her dog, her very own dog, should go to a boy who had been about to strike him!

Timmy stood up, gave Wilfrid a lick, and went to George.

The boy watched him, and then spoke to them all. 'You can come and stay in my cottage,' he said, 'if you'll bring that dog too. There aren't many dogs like him - he's a wonderful dog. I'd like him for one of my friends.'

Then, without another word, Wilfrid sprang up and ran away down the hill, leaving four most astonished people - and a dog who whined dismally because the boy had gone. Well, well, Timmy - there must indeed be something about that boy, if you stand looking after him as if you had lost one of your very best friends!

Chapter 4

SETTLING IN

The Five stared after Wilfrid in silence. Timmy wagged his tail and whined. He wanted the boy to come back.

'Well, thank you, Timmy, old thing,' said Anne, patting the big dog on the head. 'We certainly wouldn't have had this lovely little cottage, with its incredible view, if you hadn't made friends with Wilfrid. What a funny boy he is!'

'Jolly queer, I think!' said George, still amazed at the way that Timmy had gone to Wilfrid, when the boy had been about to strike him. 'I'm not sure that I like him!'

'Don't be an ass, George,' said Dick, who had been very much impressed by the boy's handling of the hares, the rabbits and the magpie. 'That boy must have a wonderful love for animals. They would never come to him as they did, if they didn't trust him absolutely. Anyone who loves animals as he does must be pretty decent.'

'I bet I could make them come to me if I had that pipe,' said George, making up her mind to borrow it if she could.

Anne went back into the cottage. She was delighted with it. 'It must be very very old,' she thought. 'It stands dreaming here all day long, full of memories of the people who have lived here and loved it. And how they must all have loved this view - miles and miles of heather, great stretches of sea - and the biggest, highest, widest sky I've ever seen. It's a happy place. Even the clouds seem happy - they're scurrying along, so white against the blue!'

She explored the cottage thoroughly. She decided that the room above, under the thatch, should be for the three boys. There were two mattresses - one small, one larger. 'The little one for Wilfrid - the big one for Dick and Julian,' she thought. 'And I and George can sleep down in the living-room, with Tim on guard. I wonder if there are any rugs we could sleep on. Ah - wait a bit - this couch is a pull-out bed - just right for us two girls! Good!'

Anne enjoyed herself thoroughly. This was the kind of problem she liked - fixing up this and that for the others! She found a little larder, facing north. It had a few tins in it, and a jug of milk, slightly sour. It also had two loaves of extremely stale bread, and a tin of rather hard cakes.

'Mrs. Layman doesn't seem to be a very good housekeeper for herself and Wilfrid,' thought Anne, seriously. 'We'll have to go down to the village and put in a stock of decent food. I might get a small ham - the boys would like that. Goodness - this is going to be fun!'

Julian came to the door to see what she was doing. When he saw her happy, serious face, he chuckled. 'Acting 'mother' to us, as usual?' he said. 'Deciding who's going to sleep where, and which of us is to do the shopping, and which the washing-up? Dear old Anne - what should we do without you when we go off on our own?'

'I love it,' said Anne, happily. 'Julian, we need another rug or two, and a pillow, and some food. And...'

'Well, we'll have to go back home and collect a few clothes and other things,' said Julian. 'We can shop on the way back, and get whatever we want. I wonder if that woman that Mrs. Layman spoke about will be coming in to help?'

'Well - Wilfrid said he sent her off,' said Anne. 'And I think perhaps as the cottage is so small, it might be better if we managed it ourselves. I think I could do a bit of cooking on that oil-stove in the corner - and anyway we can pretty well live on cold stuff, you know - ham and salad and potted meat and fruit. It would be easy enough for any of us to pop down to the village on our bikes, to fetch anything we needed.'

'Listen!' said Julian, cocking his head to one side. 'Is that somebody calling us?'

Yes - it was. When Julian went outside, he saw Mrs. Layman at the gate that led on to the hillside where the cottage stood. He went over to her.

'We LOVE the cottage!' he said. 'And if it's all right, we'd like to move in today. We can easily pop home and bring back anything we want. It's a glorious old place, isn't it - and the view must be the finest anywhere!'

'Well, that harbour is the second biggest stretch of water in the whole world,' said Mrs. Layman. 'The only stretch that is any bigger, is Sydney Harbour - so you have something to feast your eyes on, Julian!'

'My word, yes,' said Julian. 'It's amazing - and so very blue! I only wish I could paint - but I can't. At least - not very well!'

'What about Wilfrid?' said Mrs. Layman, anxiously. 'Is he behaving himself? He's - well - he's rather a difficult boy at times. And he can be very rude. He hasn't any brothers to rub off his awkward corners, you see.'

'Oh, don't you worry about Wilfrid!' said Julian, cheerfully. 'He'll have to toe the line, and do as he's told. We all do our bit, when we're away together. He's a wonder with animals, isn't he?'

'Well - yes, I suppose he is!' said Mrs. Layman. 'Though I can't say I like pet snakes, or pet beetles, and owls that come and hoot down the chimney at night to find out if Wilfrid will go out and hoot back to them!'

Julian laughed. 'We shan't mind that,' he said. 'And he's managed to get over what might have been our biggest difficulty - he has made friends with our dog, Timmy. In fact, he informed us that if Timmy stayed, we could all stay - but only if Timmy stayed!'

Mrs. Layman laughed. 'That's so like Wilfrid,' she said. 'He's an odd boy. Don't stand any nonsense from him!'

'We shan't,' said Julian, cheerfully. 'I'm surprised he wants to stay on with us, actually. I should have thought he would rather go home, than be with a lot of strangers.'

'He can't go home,' said Mrs. Layman. 'His sister has measles, and his mother doesn't want Wilfrid to catch it. So you'll have to put up with him, I fear.'

'And he'll have to put up with us!' said Julian. 'Thanks very much for letting us have the cottage, Mrs. Layman. We'll take great care of everything.'

'I know you will,' said the old lady. 'Well, goodbye, Julian. Have a good time. I'll get back to my car now. Give Wilfrid my love. I hope he doesn't fill the cottage with animals of all kinds!'

'We shan't mind if he does!' said Julian, and waited politely until Mrs. Layman had disappeared, and he could hear the noise of a car starting up.

He went back to the cottage and stood outside, looking down at the amazing view. The harbour was full of boats, big and little. A steamer went busily along, making for a great seaside town far away on the other side.

Anne came to join Julian. 'Glorious, isn't it?' she said. 'We're so very high up here that it seems as if we can see half the world at our feet. Is that an island in the middle of the harbour, Ju?'

'Yes - and a well-wooded one too!' said Julian. 'I wonder what it's called - and who lives there. I can't see a single house there, can you?'

Dick called to Anne. 'Anne! George and I are going to fetch our bikes and ride down to the village. Give us your shopping list, will you? Julian, is there anything special you want us to pack for you at home, and bring back, besides your night-things and a change of clothes?'

'Yes - don't go off yet!' called Julian, hurrying into the cottage. 'I've made a list somewhere. I think I'd better go with you. There will be food and other things to bring back - unless Mother would bring everything up by car this afternoon.'

'Yes - that's a good idea,' said Dick. 'We'll go to Kirrin Cottage first and get George's things - and then home to get ours. I'll leave all the shopping with Mother, and all our luggage, so that she can pop up here in the car with it. She'll love the view!'

'I'll stay behind and tidy up the cottage, and find out how the stove works,' said Anne, happily. 'I'll have everything neat and tidy by the time Mother comes this afternoon, Dick. Oh, here's Julian with the list. Why don't you go off on your bike with George and Dick, Julian? I'll be quite happy here, messing about.'

'Yes, I'm going to,' said Julian, putting his list into his pocket. 'Look after yourself, Anne! We'll take Timmy with us, to give him a run.'

Off went the three, Timmy loping behind, very glad of the run. Anne waited till they were out of sight, then went happily back to the cottage. She was almost there when she heard someone calling her. She turned and saw a fresh-faced woman waving.

'I'm Sally!' she called. 'Do you want any help with the cooking and cleaning? Wilfrid told me not to come any more, but if you want me, I will.'

'Oh, I think we can manage, Sally,' said Anne. 'There's so many of us now, we can do all the jobs. Did you sleep here?'

'Oh no, miss!' said Sally, coming up. 'I just came in to help, and then went back home. You tell me if you want me any time, and I'll gladly come. Where's that monkey of a Wilfrid? He spoke to me very rudely this morning, the young varmint. I'll tell his grandmother of him - not that that's much good! He just laughs at her! Don't you stand any nonsense from him!'

'I won't,' said Anne, smiling. 'Where do you live, in case we do want you?'

'Just the other side of the road, in the small wood there,' said Sally. 'You'll see my tiny cottage when you go by the wood on your bikes.'

She disappeared up the hill and across the road there. Anne went back happily to her household tasks. She cleaned out the little larder, and then found a pail and went to the well. She hung the pail on the hook at the end of the rope, and then worked the old handle that let the pail down to the water, swinging on the rope. Splash! It was soon full, and Anne wound it up again. The water looked crystal clear, and was as cold as ice - but all the same Anne wondered if she ought to boil it!

Someone came quietly behind her - and jumped at her with a loud howl! Anne dropped the pail of water, and gave a scream. Then she saw it was Wilfrid, dancing round her, grinning.

'Idiot!' she said. 'Now you just go and get me some more water.'

'Where's that big dog?' demanded Wilfrid, looking all round. 'I can't see him. You can't any of you stay here unless you have that dog. I like him. He's a wonderful dog.'

'He's gone down to the village with the others,' said Anne. 'Now will you please pick up that pail and get more water?'

'No, I won't,' said Wilfrid. 'I'm not your servant! Get it yourself!'

'Very well, I will. But I'll tell George, who owns Timmy, how rude you are - and you may be quite sure that Timmy won't be friends with you,' said Anne, picking up the pail.

'I'll get the water, I'll get the water!' shouted Wilfrid, and snatched the pail. 'Don't you dare to tell George or Timmy tales of me. Don't you dare!'

And off he went to the well and filled the pail. Well! What a time they were all going to have with such a very peculiar boy! Anne didn't like him at all!

Chapter 5

WILFRID IS MOST ANNOYING - AND ANNE IS MOST SURPRISING!

Wilfrid brought back the pail to Anne, and dumped it down. 'Like to see my pet beetles?' he said.

'No thank you,' said Anne. 'I don't like beetles very much.'

'Well, you ought to!' said Wilfrid. 'I've two very beautiful ones. You can hold them if you like. Their tiny feet feel very queer when they walk all over your hand.'

'I don't mind beetles, but I don't WANT them walking over my hand,' said poor Anne, who really was a bit afraid of what she called 'creepy-crawly' things. 'Do get out of my way, Wilfrid. If you had any manners, you'd carry that pail indoors for me.'

'I haven't any manners,' said Wilfrid. 'Everybody tells me that. Anyway, I don't want to carry your pail, if you don't want to see my beetles.'

'Oh go away!' said Anne, exasperated, picking up the pail herself. Wilfrid went to a little thick bush and sat down by it. He put his face almost on the grass, and looked under the bush. Anne felt uncomfortable. Was he going to call his beetles out? She couldn't help putting down her pail, and standing still to watch.

No beetles came out from under the bush - but something else did. A very large, awkward-looking toad came crawling out, and sat there, looking up at Wilfrid with the greatest friendliness. Anne was amazed. How did Wilfrid know the toad was there? And why in the world should it come out to see him? She stood and stared - and shivered, because she really did not like toads. 'I know they have beautiful eyes, and are intelligent, and eat all kinds of harmful insects, but I just can't go near one!' she thought. 'Oh goodness - Wilfrid's tickling its back - and it's scratching where he's tickled it - just like we would!'

'Come and say how do you do to my pet toad,' called Wilfrid. 'I'll carry your pail for you then.'

Anne picked up her pail in a hurry, afraid that Wilfrid might whistle up a few snakes next. What a boy! How she wished the others would come back! Why, Wilfrid might own a boa constrictor - or have a small crocodile somewhere - or... but no, she was being silly! If only the others would come back!

To her horror the toad crawled right on to Wilfrid's hand, and looked up at him out of its really beautiful eyes. That was too much for Anne. She fled into the cottage, spilling half the water as she went.

'I wish I was like George,' she thought. 'She wouldn't really mind that toad. I'm silly. I ought to try and like all creatures. Oh my goodness, look at that enormous spider in the corner of the sink! It's sitting there, looking at me out of its eight eyes! Wilfrid, Wilfrid - PLEASE come and get this spider out of the sink for me!'

Wilfrid sauntered in, fortunately without the toad. He held his hand out to the spider and made a curious clicking, ticking noise. The spider perked up at once, waved two curious little antennae about, and crawled across the sink to Wilfrid's hand. Anne shuddered. She simply couldn't help it! She shut her eyes, and when she opened them, the spider had gone and so had Wilfrid.

'I suppose he's now teaching it to dance, or something!' she thought, trying to make herself smile. 'I can't think how insects and animals and birds like him. I simply can't bear him. If I were a rabbit or bird or beetle, I'd run miles away from him. What's this curious attraction he has for creatures of all kinds?'

Wilfrid had completely disappeared, and Anne thankfully went on with her little jobs. 'I'll tidy up the loft where the boys will sleep,' she thought. 'I'll wash this living-room floor. I'll make a list of the things in the larder. I'll clean that dirty window over there. I'll... good gracious, what's that noise?'

It was the sound of magpies chattering noisily - a harsh but pleasant noise. Anne peered out of the little cottage window. Well, what a sight! There stood Wilfrid in front of the window, a magpie on each outstretched hand - and one on the top of his head! It stood there, chattering loudly, and then turned round and round, getting its feet mixed up in the boy's thick hair.

'Come out here and I'll tell one of my magpies to sit on your head too!' shouted Wilfrid. 'It's such a nice feeling. Or would you like a young rabbit to cuddle? I can call one for you with my little pipe!'

'I don't want a magpie on my head,' said Anne, desperately. 'For goodness sake get a nice little baby rabbit. I'd like that.'

Wilfrid jerked the magpies off his hands and shook his head violently so that the third one flew up, squawking cheerfully. He then sat down and pulled out his queer little whistle-pipe, as Anne called it. She watched, fascinated, as the strange little dirge like tune came to her ears. She found her feet walking to the door. Good gracious - could there be some peculiar kind of magic in that pipe that made her go to Wilfrid, just as the other creatures did?

She stopped at the door, just as a baby rabbit came lolloping round a tall clump of grass. It was the funniest, roundest, dearest little thing, with a tiny bobtail and big ears.

It went straight to Wilfrid and nestled against him. The boy stroked it and murmured to it. Then he called to Anne softly.

'Well - here's the baby rabbit you asked for. Like to come and stroke it?'

Anne went softly over the grass, expecting the rabbit to bolt at once. Wilfrid continued to fondle it, and the little thing looked at him with big, unwinking eyes. Anne bent down to stroke it - but immediately it leapt in fright and fled into the grass.

'Oh dear - why did it do that?' said Anne, disappointed. 'It was quite all right with you! Wilfrid, how do you get all these creatures to come to you?'

'Shan't tell you,' said Wilfrid, getting up. 'Is there anything to eat in the cottage? I'm hungry.'

He pushed Anne aside and went into the cottage. He opened the larder door, and took down a tin. There was a cake inside and he cut off a huge piece. He didn't offer Anne any.

'Couldn't you have cut me a piece too?' said Anne. 'You really are a rude boy!'

'I like being rude,' said Wilfrid, munching his cake. 'Especially to people who come to my cottage when I don't want them.'

'Oh don't be so silly!' said Anne, exasperated. 'It isn't your cottage - it belongs to your grandmother. She told us so. Anyway, you said we could stay if Timmy stayed too.'

'I'll soon make Timmy my dog,' said Wilfrid, taking another bite. 'You'll see! Soon he won't want that girl George any more - and he'll follow at my heels all day and night. You'll see!'

Anne laughed scornfully. Timmy following at this boy's heels? That could never happen! Timmy loved George with all his doggy heart. He would never desert her for Wilfrid no matter how much he whistled on pipes, or put on his special croony voice. Anne was absolutely certain of that!

'If you laugh at me, I'll call up my grass snake and my adder!' said Wilfrid, fiercely. 'Then you'll run for miles!'

'Oh no I won't!' said Anne, hurrying into the cottage. 'Just watch yourself run!'

She picked up the pail of water, went out with it, and threw it all over the astonished Wilfrid! Somebody else was most astonished too - and that was Julian, who had arrived back before the others, anxious not to leave Anne alone in the cottage for too long.

He came just in time to see Anne drenching Wilfrid, and stared in the utmost amazement. Anne behaving like that? Anne looking really fierce - quiet, peaceful Anne! What in the world had happened?

'Anne!' he called. 'What's the matter? What's Wilfrid been doing?'

'Oh - Julian!' said Anne, glad to see him, but horrified that he had come just then. Wilfrid was drenched from head to foot. He stood there, gasping, taken-aback, bewildered. Why, Anne had seemed such a quiet, frightened little thing - scared even of a spider!

'That girl!' said Wilfrid, half-choking, shaking the water off himself. 'That bad, wicked girl! She's like a tiger! She sprang at me, and threw the water all over me! I won't let her stay in my cottage!'

The boy was so angry, so wet, so taken-aback, that Julian had to laugh! He roared in delight, and clapped Anne on the back. 'The mouse has turned into a tiger! Well, you said you might one day, Anne - and you haven't lost much time! Let me see if you've grown claws!'

He took Anne's hands and pretended to examine her nails. Anne was half-laughing, half-crying now, and pulled her hand away. 'Oh Julian! I shouldn't have soaked Wilfrid - but he was SO IRRITATING, I lost my temper, and...'

'All right, all right - it's quite a good thing to do sometimes,' said Julian. 'And I bet young Wilfrid deserved all he got. I only hope the water was icy cold! Have you a change of clothes here, Wilfrid? Go and get into them, then.'

The boy stood there, dripping wet, and made no effort to obey. Julian spoke again. 'You heard what I said, Wilfrid. Jump to it! Go and change!'

The boy looked so wet and miserable that Anne felt suddenly sorry for what she had done. She ran to him and felt his wet shoulders. 'Oh, I'm sorry!' she said. 'I truly am. I don't know why I turned into a tiger so suddenly!'

Wilfrid gave a little half-laugh, half-sob. 'I'm sorry too,' he mumbled. 'You're nice - and your nose is like that baby rabbit's - it's - it's a bit woffly!'

He ran into the cottage and slammed the door. 'Let him be for a while,' said Julian, seeing that Anne made a move to go after him. 'This will do him good. Nothing like having a pail of cold water flung over you to make you see things as they really are! He was really touched when you said you were sorry. He's probably never apologized to anyone in his life!'

'Is my nose like a rabbit's?' said Anne, worried.

'Well, yes - just a bit,' said Julian, giving his sister an affectionate pat. 'But a rabbit's nose is very nice, you know - very nice indeed. I don't think you'll have much trouble with Wilfrid after this little episode. He didn't know that you had the heart of a tiger, as well as a nose like a rabbit's!'

Wilfrid came out of the cottage in about ten minutes, dressed in dry clothes, carrying his wet ones in a bundle. 'I'll hang those out on the bushes for you, to dry in the sun,' said Anne, and took them from him, smiling. He suddenly smiled back.

'Thanks,' he said. 'I don't know how they got so wet! Must have been pouring with rain!'

Julian chuckled and smacked him gently on the back. 'Rain can do an awful lot of good at times!' he said. 'Well, Anne, we've brought you back a whole lot of goods for your larder. Here come the others. We'll carry everything in for you - with Wilfrid's help too!'

Chapter 6

LUCAS - AND HIS TALE

It was fun storing all the shopping away. Anne enjoyed it more than anyone, for she really was a most domesticated little person.

'A real home-maker!' said Dick, appreciatively, when he saw how neat and comfortable she had made the loft, where the three boys were to sleep. 'Just about room for the three of us, plus all the baggage in the corner! And how good the larder looks!'

Anne looked at her well-stored larder, and smiled. Now she could give her little 'family' really nice meals. All those tins! She read the names on them. 'Fruit salad. Tinned pears. Tinned peaches. Sardines. Ham. Tongue.' A new cake in that round tin, big enough to last for at least three days. Biscuits. Chocolate wafers - good old Julian - he knew how much she loved those - and George did, too!

Anne felt very happy, as she arranged all her goods. She no longer felt guilty at drenching poor Wilfrid. Indeed she couldn't help feeling a little thrill when she remembered how she had suddenly turned into a tiger for a minute or two! It was fun to be a tiger for once. 'I might even be one again, if the chance arose,' thought Anne. 'How surprised Wilfrid was - and Julian too. Oh dear - poor Wilfrid. Still, he's much nicer now.'

And indeed he was! He was most polite to both the girls, and, as Dick said, he didn't - throw his weight - about nearly so much. They all settled down very well together in the little cottage.

They had most of their meals out-of-doors, sitting on the warm grass. It was rather a squeeze indoors, for the cottage really was very small. Anne enjoyed herself preparing the meals, with sometimes a little help from George - and the boys carried everything out. Wilfrid did his share, and was pleased when he had a clap on the back from Julian.

It was glorious sitting out in the sun, high up on their hill. They could look down on the harbour, watch the yachts and the busy little boats, and enjoy the wonderful views all round.

George was very curious about the island that lay in the middle of the harbour. 'What's it called?' she asked Wilfrid. But he didn't know. He did know, however, that there was a queer story about it. 'It belonged to a lonely old man,' he said. 'He lived in a big house in the very middle of the wood. The island was given to his family by a king - James the Second, I think. This old man was the very very last one of his family. People kept wanting to buy his island, and he had some kind of watchmen to keep people from landing on it. These watchmen were pretty fierce - they had guns.'

'Gosh - did they shoot people who tried to land, then?' asked Dick.

'Well - they shot just to frighten them off, not to hurt them, I suppose,' said Wilfrid. 'Anyway, a lot of sightseers had an awful fright when they tried to land. BANG-BANG! Shooting all round them! My granny told me that someone she knew, who had a lot of money, wanted to buy part of the island - and he had his hat shot right off when his boat tried to land!'

'Is there anyone there now?' asked Julian. 'I suppose the old fellow is dead? Has he a son or anyone to follow him?'

'I don't think so,' said Wilfrid. 'But I don't know an awful lot about it. I tell you who does, though - one of the groundsmen on the golf-course, called Lucas. He was once one of the watchmen who kept visitors away from the island.'

'It might be rather interesting to talk to him,' said Dick. 'I'd rather like to walk over the golf-course, too. My father plays a good game of golf, and I know something about it.'

'Well, let's go now,' said George. 'Timmy is longing for a good long walk, even though he ran all the way down to the village and back today! Walk, Timmy? Walk?'

'Woof-woof,' said Timmy, and leapt up at once.

Walk? Of course he was ready for a walk! He leapt all round George, pretending to pounce at her feet. Wilfrid tried to catch hold of him, but couldn't. 'I wish you were my dog,' he told Timmy. 'I'd never let you out of my sight.'

Timmy ran up to him then, and gave him a loving lick. It was astonishing how he seemed to like Wilfrid. Nobody could understand it. As George said, 'Timmy is usually so particular about making friends! Still, Wilfrid is nicer than he was!'

The Five, with Wilfrid too, went up the hill, crossed over the road that ran along the top, and climbed over a stile. They found themselves on one of the fairways of the golf-course, not far from a green, in which stood a pole with a bright red flag waving at the top.

Wilfrid knew very little about the game of golf, but the others had watched their parents play many a time. 'Look out - someone's going to pitch his ball on this green,' said Julian, and they stood by the hedge to watch the man play his ball. He struck it beautifully with his club, and the ball rose, and fell right on to the green. It rolled to within about a foot of the hole in which the flag-pole stood.

Timmy ran forward a few steps, as he always did when a ball rolled near him. Then he remembered that this was golf, and he must never, never touch a ball on the fairway or on the green.

The players passed by, and went on with their game. Then they disappeared, to play off another tee.

'Well, let's see if we can find Lucas now,' said Wilfrid, crossing the fairway to where he could get a good look over the course. 'You'll like him. There's not much he doesn't know about the animals and birds here. I think he's a wonderful man!'

Wilfrid stood on the slope of a hill and looked all round. 'There he is!' he said, pointing to where a man was trimming up a ditch. 'See? Down there. He's using his bill-hook to make things tidy.'

They went down the hill towards the ditch at the bottom. 'I bet there's an awful lot of balls in that ditch,' said Wilfrid. 'Hey, Lucas! How are you?'

'Afternoon, young sir,' said the groundsman, turning towards them. His face was as brown as a well-ripened nut, and his arms and shoulders were even browner. He wore no shirt or vest, and his dark, deep-set eyes twinkled as they took in the five children and the dog.

He held out a brown hand to Timmy, who licked it gravely, wagging his tail. Then Timmy smelt Lucas all over and finally lay down with his head on the man's feet.

'Ha!' said Lucas to Timmy, and gave a loud, hearty laugh. 'Think I'm a-going to stand here all afternoon, do you? Well, I aren't. I got work to do, ole dog, so git up! You're a right good-un, you are, a-laying on my foot, so's I can't move a step! Want me to stop and have a rest, don't you?'

'Lucas, we came to ask you something,' said Wilfrid. 'About the island in the harbour. What's its name - and does anyone live there now?'

'We can see it from that little cottage almost at the top of the hill on the other side of the road,' said Dick. 'It looks awfully quiet and lonely.'

'And so it is,' said Lucas, sitting down on the bank of the ditch. Timmy at once sat up beside him, sniffing him with pleasure. He put his arm round the dog, and began to talk, his bright eyes going from one to other of the children. He was so friendly, and so completely natural that the children felt he was an old, old friend. They sat down too, sniffing the smell of the gorse bushes nearby.

'They smell like coconut,' thought Anne. 'Yes - just like coconut!'

'Well, now,' said Lucas, 'that island's always been a mystery-place. It's called Wailing Island by some folks because the wind makes a right queer wailing noise round some of its high cliffs. And others call it Whispering Island because it's full of trees that whisper in the strong winds that always blow across it. But most of us call it Keep-Away Island - and that's the best name of all, for there's never been any welcome there, what with the dark cliffs, the cruel rocks, and the dense woods.'

Lucas paused, and looked at the listening faces around him. He was a born story-teller, and knew it. How often Wilfrid had listened to his tales of the birds and animals he met during his work on the course! Lucas was one of the few people that the boy admired and loved.

'Do go on, Lucas!' said Wilfrid, touching the man's bare, warm arm. 'Tell us about the rich old man who hated everyone, and bought the island years ago.'

'I'm telling the story my own way,' said Lucas, with great dignity. 'You sit patient now, or I'll start my ditching again. Sit like this dog, see - he don't even twitch a muscle, good dog that he is. Well now, about this rich old man. He was so afraid of being robbed that he bought that lonely island. He built himself a great castle right in the middle of the thick woods. Cut down about a hundred trees, to make room for it, so the story goes, and brought every single stick and stone from the mainland. Did you see the old quarry on this here golf-course, as you came along to me?'

'Yes, we did,' said Julian, remembering. 'I felt sorry for anyone who sent a golf-ball there!'

'Well, young sir, out of that quarry came the great stones that the old man used for his castle,' said Lucas. ' 'Tis said that big, Hat-bottomed boats had to be made to ferry the stones across to the island - and to this day the road through this golf-course is the one made by horses dragging the great stones down to the water's-edge.'

'Were you alive then?' said Wilfrid.

'Bless you, boy, no, of course not,' said Lucas, with a great chuckle of a laugh. 'Long afore my time, that was. Well, the stone house - or castle - whatever you like to call it - was built. And the old man brought to it all kinds of treasures - beautiful statues, some of gold, it was said, but that I disbelieve. Ah, many's the queer tale I've heard of what that rich old man took over to Whispering Island - a great bed made of pure gold, and set with precious stones - a necklace of rubies as big as pigeons' eggs - a wonderful sword with a jewelled handle worth a king's fortune - and other things I disremember.'

He paused and looked round. Julian asked him a quick question. 'What happened to all these things?'

'Well now, he fell foul of the king of the land, and one morning what did he see landing on the shores of his island but ships of all kinds,' said Lucas, enjoying the rapt attention of his audience. 'A lot of them were sunk by the wicked rocks but enough men were left to storm the queer stone castle in the wood, and they killed the old man and all his servants.'

'Did they find the treasures the old fellow had collected?' asked Dick.

'Never a one!' said Lucas. 'Never a one. Some say it was all a tale - the old man never did bring any wonders there - and some say they're still there, on Whispering Island. Meself, I think it's all a yarn - but a good yarn at that!'

'Who owns the island now?' asked Dick.

'Well, an old fellow and his wife went to live there - maybe they paid rent to the Crown for it, maybe they bought it - but they didn't care for anything except for the birds and the animals there,' said Lucas, picking up his curved bill-hook again, and hacking lightly at some briars. 'They wouldn't allow nobody there, and it was they who kept the gamekeepers with guns to frighten away sightseers. They wanted peace and quiet for themselves, and for all the wildlife on the island - and a fine idea too. Many a time when I was there with the other keepers - three of us there were - many a time I've had rabbits gambolling over my feet, and snakes gliding by me - and the birds as tame as canaries.'

'I'd love to go there,' said Wilfrid, his eyes shining. 'I'd have a good time with all the wild creatures! Can anyone go there now?'

'No,' said Lucas, getting up. 'Not a soul has lived in the old stone castle since the old man and his wife fell ill and died. The place is empty. The island belongs to a great-nephew of the old couple now, but he never goes there. Just keeps a couple of men on the island to frighten off visitors - pretty fierce they are, so I've been told. Well, there you are, that's the story of Whispering Island - not very pleasant - a bit grim and ugly. It belongs to the birds and the beasts now, and good luck to them!'

'Thank you for telling us the story,' said Anne, and the old countryman smiled down at her, his eyes wrinkling, and his brown hand patting her cheek.

'I'll be off to my hedging and ditching again,' he said, 'and I'll feel the sun warm on my bare back, and hear the birds a-singing to me from the bushes. That's happiness enough for anyone - and pity it is that more folks don't know it!'

Chapter 7

UP ON THE GOLF-COURSE

The children walked round the golf-course together, after talking to old Lucas. 'We must keep out of the way of anyone playing,' said Dick, 'or we might get hit on the head with a ball! Hey, Timmy, what are you doing in the bracken?'

Timmy came out with something in his mouth. He dropped it at George's feet. It was a golf-ball, fairly new. George picked it up. 'What do we do with this?' she said. 'There's no golfer near us. It must be a lost ball.'

'Well, all balls lost on golf-courses should be taken in to the pro,' said Julian. 'By right they belong to him if found on the course.'

'What's a pro?' asked Anne.

'A professional golfer - a man who's very very good at the game, and is in charge of a golf-course,' explained Julian. 'Well I'm blessed - here comes old Tim again with another ball.'

Timmy, we ought to hire you out to golfers who keep losing their balls - you'd save them no end of trouble!

Timmy was pleased to be patted and praised. He set off into the rough again at once, sniping here and there.

'Anyone would think that golf-balls smelt like rabbits or something, the way Timmy sniffs them out!' said Anne, as Timmy ran up with yet another ball. 'My word, golfers must be jolly careless, losing so many balls!'

They went on round the course, which was set with great stretches of gorse, full of brilliant blossom. A baby rabbit fled from the bracken as Timmy nosed there for balls. Timmy chased it, and the frightened little creature dodged this way and that, trying to escape. 'Let it go, Tim, let it go!' yelled George, but Timmy was much too excited to pay any attention.

Wilfrid suddenly bent down as the rabbit raced near him, and gave a curious low whistle. The rabbit swerved, came straight towards him, and leapt into his arms, lying there trembling. Timmy jumped up to it at once, but George dragged him away.

'NO, Timmy. Sorry, but NO, you can't have the little thing. Down! DOWN, I say!'

Timmy gave George a disgusted look, and pattered off into the bracken, nosing for balls again. He was very cross with George. Rabbits were meant to be chased, weren't they? Why did George have to spoil his fun?

George stared at Wilfrid. The rabbit was still nestling in his arms, and he was making a curious noise to it. The tiny thing was trembling from head to tail. Everyone watched it, glad that it was safe. They were all silent, astonished at the way that Wilfrid had rescued the little creature. How had the rabbit known that Wilfrid's arms were ready to save it?

He took it to the bracken, dropped it gently, and watched it race like lightning to the nearest burrow. Then he turned and patted Timmy, who stood silently by, watching.

'Sorry, Tim,' he said. 'It's so little, and you're so big!'

'Woof,' said Tim, exactly as if he understood, and he gave Wilfrid's hand a quick lick. Then he pranced round the boy, barking, as if he wanted a game, and Wilfrid raced off with him at top speed.

The others followed, impressed once again by Wilfrid's uncanny way with animals. He was such a horrid little boy in some ways - so rude, so mannerless, so selfish - then how was it that animals liked him so much? George frowned. She thought it was all wrong that animals should love Wilfrid and go to him - why, even Timmy was all over him! If she wasn't careful he would spend more time with Wilfrid than with her! That would never do!

Timmy found five more balls, and soon Julian's pockets were heavy with them. They made their way to the small club-house in the distance, meaning to give in the balls. It was set in a little dip, and looked friendly and welcoming. They all went in at the door, and Julian walked over to the pro, who was checking some score-cards. He emptied his pockets of balls and grinned. 'A present from our dog!' he said.

'My word - did he find all those?' said the pro, pleased. 'Not bad ones, either. I'll stand you all some lemonade or orangeade - which will you have?'

They all had orangeade, and the pro sent a packet of biscuits to Timmy, who was waiting patiently outside. He was delighted!

'We're staying in that little cottage up on the hillside,' said Dick. 'Do you know it?'

'Course I do!' said the pro. 'My grandmother lived there once upon a time. You've a wonderful view there, haven't you? One of the finest in the world, I reckon! You can see Whispering Island from there, too. Ought to be called 'Mystery Island'! It's said that folks have gone there, and never come back!'

'What happened to them?' asked Anne.

'Oh well - maybe it's all a tale!' said the pro. 'There's supposed to be priceless things there, packed away somewhere - and collectors from all over the world have come here, and tried to get over to that island - not to steal, you understand, but just to see if they could find anything worthwhile and buy it for museums - or maybe for their own collections. It's said there are statues in the wood, white as snow - but that I never did believe!'

'And didn't the collectors ever come back?' asked Julian.

'It's said that a lot of them didn't,' said the pro, 'but that may be all silly tales. But I do know that two men came down here from some museum in London, and hired a boat to go across. They took a white flag with them so that the two keepers wouldn't shoot at them - and after that nobody heard a word about them. They just disappeared!'

'Well - what could have happened to them?' asked Julian.

'Nobody knows,' said the pro. 'Their boat was found miles out to sea, drifting - and empty. So the police reckoned a mist came down, they lost direction, and ended by drifting way out to sea.'

'But did they jump out of their boat, and try to swim back - and get drowned?' asked Dick. 'Or did a passing steamer or yacht save them?'

'They weren't picked up, that's certain,' said the pro. 'Else they'd have arrived safely back at their homes, sometime or other. But they didn't. No - I reckon the poor fellows were drowned. Of course, maybe they were shot by the keepers, when they tried to land, and their boat was set adrift!'

'Didn't the police do anything?' asked Julian, puzzled.

'Oh yes - they went across to the island in the coastguard patrol boat,' said the pro. 'But the keepers swore they'd seen nobody arriving, and that they were the only people on the place. The police landed and searched everywhere, and they found nothing except the great white castle-like house in the woods and hundreds of wild animals, so tame that they'd sit and watch you as you walked by.'

'All very mysterious,' said Julian, getting up. 'Well, thanks for the welcome orangeade, and for your information! We'd already heard a bit from a groundsman of yours - Lucas - a real old countryman, and a born story-teller!'

'Ah, Lucas - yes, he knows that island well,' said the pro. 'He was once one of the keepers, I believe! Well - come and see me again some time - thanks for the balls. It isn't everyone who's honest enough to come and give them in when they find them!'

They all said good-bye and went out. Timmy pranced along in joy. Sitting down outside the clubhouse didn't suit him at all!

'Did you enjoy your biscuits, Tim?' asked George, and he ran up and gave her hand a quick lick. What a question! He always enjoyed biscuits! He ran off into the bracken and began to nose about there again, hunting for balls.

The others went to walk up the hill, talking about the island. 'I wonder what really did happen to those two collector men who were never heard of again,' said Anne. 'Funny that their boat was found adrift and empty.'

'They must have been drowned, of course,' said Dick. 'I wonder if anything is left of the old treasures that were once taken there. No - there wouldn't be - the police would have made a very thorough search!'

'I wish we could go to the island!' said George. 'I don't expect the keepers would shoot at us, would they? They might even let us on, to make a change for them - they must be so bored with only themselves to talk to.'

'That's very wishful thinking, George,' said Julian. 'We are CERTAINLY not going near the island, so put that right out of your head.'

'Well - I knew it was impossible, really,' said George. 'But wouldn't it be a grand adventure if we managed to get on the mysterious Whispering Island and explore it without the keepers knowing!'

'Not such a grand adventure if we were all peppered with shot from the keepers' guns!' said Dick. 'Anyway, we wouldn't find anything of interest - the treasures must have been removed long ago. The only possible things of interest would be the very tame wild creatures there! Wilfrid would go mad with joy - wouldn't you Wilfrid?'

'I'd like it very much,' said the boy, his eyes shining. 'What's more, I might hire a boat myself and row round the island to see if I could spot any animals there.'

'You'll do nothing of the sort!' said Julian, at once. 'So don't try any silly tricks, see?'

'I shan't promise!' said Wilfrid, irritatingly. 'You just never know!'

'Oh yes, I do know! You're just trying to sound big!' said Julian. 'Come along quickly, everyone - it's past our dinner-time, and I'm ravenous! What's for lunch, Anne?'

'We'll open a tin of tongue,' said Anne, 'and there's plenty of bread left, and lettuce, which I left in water. And tomatoes. And heaps of fruit.'

'Sounds good!' said George. 'Dinner, Timmy, dinner!'

And, hearing that welcome word, Timmy shot up the steep hill at top speed, his tail waving joyously.

'Wish I was a dog and could tear up a hill like that!' said Anne, panting. 'Give me a push, Julian! I'll never get to the top!'

Chapter 8
MOSTLY ABOUT WILFRID

Timmy was waiting for the children at the top of the hill, his tail waving, his mouth open as he panted. He picked something up, as the children came, threw it into the air, and caught it.

'Another golf-ball, Timmy?' said Dick, as Timmy threw the ball into the air again with a toss of his big head.

'No - it's too big for that,' said George. 'Drop it, Timmy. What have you found?'

Timmy dropped the ball at George's feet. It was bigger than a golf-ball, and had a hole right through it. 'Oh, it's one of those balls that children throw up and try to catch on a stick,' said George. 'Somebody must have dropped it. All right, Tim, you can have it.'

'He won't swallow it, will he?' said Wilfrid, anxiously. 'It's not awfully big - and I once saw a dog swallow something by mistake, that he threw into the air to catch.'

'Timmy's much too sensible to swallow any ball,' said George. 'You needn't worry about him. Anyway, I can do any worrying necessary. He's my dog.'

'All right, all right, all right!' said Wilfrid. 'Miss High-and-Mighty can look after her own dog. Fine!'

George looked round at him furiously and he made a face at her. Then he whistled to Timmy - yes, he actually dared to whistle to him!

'Nobody whistles for my dog except me,' said George. 'And anyway, he won't come to you.'

But, to her surprise and horror, Timmy did go to Wilfrid, and pranced all round him, expecting a game. George called him sternly, and he looked at her in surprise. He began to trot over to her when Wilfrid whistled again, and obediently Timmy turned as if to go to him.

George caught hold of the dog's collar, and aimed a punch at the whistling boy. It missed him, and he danced round, laughing.

'Stop it now, you two,' said Julian, seeing George's look of fury. 'I said STOP IT! Wilfrid, go on ahead, and keep going. George, don't be an ass. He's only teasing you to make you lose your temper. Don't please him by losing it!'

George said nothing more, but her eyes blazed. Oh dear! thought Anne, now we shan't have any peace! She won't forgive Wilfrid for making Timmy go to him! Blow Wilfrid - he really is a little pest at times.

They were all very hungry for their lunch and very pleased with everything that Anne provided. Dick went into the little cottage to help her, because George insisted on keeping her hand on Timmy's collar all the time, in case Wilfrid should entice him to his side.

'He's making some of his peculiar noises now,' said Dick to Anne. 'Noises that animals can't seem to resist! I don't wonder that George has got Timmy tightly by the collar! I'm not a dog, but I find those little whiny noises Wilfrid is making very curious indeed, and I'd love to go nearer!'

'Well, I hope we're not going to have black looks from George from now on,' said Anne. 'Wilfrid's an awful little idiot at times, and MOST irritating - but he's not bad underneath, if you know what I mean.'

'Well, I don't really,' said Dick, cutting some tomatoes in half. 'I think he's a badly brought-up little pest - and if I were a dog, I'd bite him, not fawn on him! Have I cut up enough tomatoes, Anne?'

'Good gracious, yes!' said Anne. 'However many do you think we're going to eat - forty or fifty? Look, you open this tin for me, Dick. I do so hate opening tins. I nearly always cut myself.'

'Don't you ever open one again, then,' said Dick. 'I'm the official tin-opener from now on! Dear old Anne, whatever should we do without you! You take everything on your shoulders, and we just let you! George ought to help more. She's a girl like you - but she never gets the meals or anything. I'll tick her off one of these days.'

'No, don't,' said Anne, in alarm. 'I like doing things on my own. George would only break things or upset them. She's as ham-handed as a boy when it comes to washing up or setting out crockery though she means well.'

'So boys are ham-handed, are they?' said Dick, pretending to be offended. 'When have I ever broken anything, I'd like to know? I'm as careful as any girl, when I handle crockery!'

Alas for Dick! The glass he was holding suddenly slipped from his hand, fell to the floor, and broke! Anne looked at him and gave a sudden delighted giggle. 'Old Ham-hand!' she said. 'Can't pick up a glass without dropping it! Look, take out this tray for me, and for goodness sake don't drop that!'

They all had a delicious lunch, and ate practically everything. Wilfrid sat a little away from everyone, scattering crumbs around as he ate. Birds of all kinds were soon round him, even hopping on to his hands. A magpie flew down to his left shoulder. Wilfrid greeted it like an old friend. 'Hallo, Maggie Pie! How's the family? I hope Polly Pie has recovered from her cold. And is Peter Pie's bad leg better? And what about old Granpa Pie - does he still chase you young ones?'

The magpie put its glossy head on one side and chattered back to him in bird-language, which Wilfrid appeared to understand. He stroked the bird's gleaming breast, and fondled it lovingly. George deliberately didn't watch. She turned her back on Wilfrid and the magpie, and talked to Timmy. The others couldn't help being amused.

The magpie put Wilfrid's conversation to an end very suddenly. The boy was about to put half a tomato into his mouth when the bird bent down its head and snatched away the tomato with its powerful beak. Then it rose quickly into the air on its big wings, making a noise exactly as if it were laughing!

Everyone roared with laughter except the surprised Wilfrid. 'He's gone to take your tomato to Polly Pie, I should think,' said Anne, and that made everyone laugh again.

'I'll have another tomato now, please,' said Wilfrid.

'Sorry. You're unlucky. They're all gone,' said Dick.

It was lovely sitting up on the hillside, watching the boats in the harbour, and seeing the beautiful, white-sailed yachts bending to and fro in the strong wind that blew there. They could all see Whispering Island quite clearly, and noticed that no boats went anywhere near it. Clearly everyone knew that men might be there, watching for intruders.

'There might be badgers there,' said Wilfrid, suddenly. 'I've never been really close to a badger.'

'I shouldn't think anyone but you would want to be!' said George. 'Smelly things! There's one thing - you can't call one with your whistle-pipe - there aren't any here!'

'Wilfrid - get out your pipe and make the little rabbits come again,' said Anne, suddenly. 'While we're all sitting here quietly, would they come?'

'Yes, I think so,' said Wilfrid, and felt in his pocket. He felt in another pocket, and looked worried. Then he stood up and patted himself all over, looking really distressed. He stared round at the others, anguish on his face.

'It's gone,' he said. 'I must have lost it! It's gone! I'll never have another like it, never.'

'Oh, it must be in one of your pockets,' said Dick, touched by the look on the boy's face. 'Here, let me feel.'

But no - the pipe wasn't there. Wilfrid looked as if he were about to burst into tears. He began to hunt all round, and everyone helped him. No - not quite everyone. George didn't. Dick glanced at her, and frowned. George was pleased that the precious pipe was lost. How she must dislike poor Wilfrid! Well, he was dislikeable at times, no doubt about it - but he was so distressed now that surely nobody could help feeling sorry for him!

George got up and began to clear away the remains of the meal. She carried plates and glasses to the hut, and after a while Anne followed her.

'I'm sorry for poor old Wilfrid, aren't you?' she said.

'No, I'm not,' said George, shortly. 'Serves him right! I hope he never finds his silly pipe. That will teach him not to try and get Timmy away from me!'

'Oh, don't be silly! He only does it for fun!' said Anne, shocked. 'Why do you take things so seriously, George? You know Timmy loves you better than anyone in the world and always will. He's your dog and nobody, nobody else's! Wilfrid's only teasing you when he tries to get Timmy to go to him.'

'Timmy goes, though,' said George, desperately. 'And he shouldn't. He shouldn't.'

'He can't help it, I think,' said Anne. 'Wilfrid has some peculiar attraction for animals - and that little whistle-pipe of his is like a magic call to them.'

'I'm glad it's gone!' said George. 'Glad, glad, glad!'

'Then I think you're silly and unkind,' said Anne, and walked off, knowing that she could do nothing with George in this mood. She worried a little as she went. Did George know where the pipe was? Had she found it - and hidden it - or destroyed it? No - no! George could be difficult and unkind at times, but she wasn't mean. And what a mean thing it would be, to destroy the beautiful little pipe, with its magic trills!

Anne went back to the others, meaning to try and comfort Wilfrid - but he wasn't there. 'Where's he gone?' asked Anne.

'To look for his precious whistle-pipe,' said Dick. 'He's really heartbroken about it, I think. He says he's going to walk back the way we came from the golf-course, and then he's going to walk everywhere there that we walked this morning, and hunt and hunt. He's even going down to the club-house to see if he dropped it there. He'll never find it!'

'Poor old Wilfrid!' said Anne, tender-hearted as ever. 'I wish he'd waited for me. I'd have gone with him. He's awfully upset, isn't he? Won't he be able to call the wild animals to him any more?'

'I've no idea,' said Dick. 'Er - I suppose old George doesn't know anything about it? Perhaps that's a mean thing to say - but George might have found it and kept it just for a joke.'

'No. No, I don't think she'd do that,' said Anne. 'It would be a very poor joke. Well - we'll just have to hope Wilfrid finds it. What are you going to do this afternoon? Sleep, by the look of you!'

'Yes - sleep out in the warm sun here, till three o'clock,' said Julian. 'Then I'm going for a walk - down to the harbour. I might even have a bathe.'

'We'll all go,' said Dick, sleepily. 'Oh how lovely it is to feel lazy - and warm - and well-fed - and sleeeeeeeepy! So long, everyone! I'm asleep!'

Chapter 9

OFF TO WHISPERING ISLAND

The two boys, and Anne and George, slept soundly in the sun until just past three o'clock. Then a large fly buzzed around Anne's head, and awoke her. She sat up and looked at her watch.

'Gracious! It's ten past three!' she said, in surprise. 'Wake up, Julian! Dick, stir yourself! Don't you want to go and bathe?'

Yawning loudly the two boys sat up, and looked all round. George was still asleep. Wilfrid hadn't yet come back.

'Still hunting for his precious pipe, I suppose,' said Anne. 'Get up, you two boys. Dick, you're not to lie down, you'll only go to sleep again. Where are your bathing-things? I'll get them. And does anyone know where our bathing towels are? We'll probably have to dress and undress with them round us!'

'They're up in our room, chucked into a corner,' said Dick, sleepily. 'Gosh, I was sound asleep. I really thought I was in my bed, when I awoke!'

Anne went to fetch the bath-towels and the bathing things. She called back to the boys. 'I've got everything. Buck up, Julian, don't go to sleep again!'

'Right!' said Julian, sitting up and stretching himself. 'Oh this sun - it's GLORIOUS!'

He poked Dick with his toe. 'Get up! We'll leave you behind if you snore again. George, good-bye - we're going!'

George sat up, yawning, and Timmy stood over her and licked her cheek. She patted him. 'All right, Timmy, I'm ready. It's so warm that I'm LONGING for a dip - and you'll love it too, Tim!' Carrying their bathing-things they made their way down the hill, and across a stretch of moorland to the edge of the sea, Timmy running joyously behind them. Beyond lay Whispering Island, a great tree-clad mass, and all around and about little boats plied, and yachts sailed in the wind, enjoying themselves in the great harbour which stretched far beyond the island to a big seaside town on the opposite coast.

The four went behind some rocks, and stripped off their clothes, emerging three minutes later in their scanty bathing things. Anne raced to the edge of the water, and let it lap over her toes. 'Lovely!' she said. 'It's not a bit cold! I shall enjoy my swim!'

'Woof!' said Timmy and plunged into the water. He loved the sea too, and was a fine swimmer! He waited for George to come in and then swam to her. She put her arms round his neck and let him drag her along with him. Dear Timmy! How strong he was, thought George.

They had a wonderful time in the water. Further out the waves were big, and curled over like miniature waterfalls, sweeping the children along with them. They yelled in joy, and choked when the water splashed into their mouths. It was an ideal day for bathing.

When they came out, they lay on the sand in the sun, Timmy beside George, keeping guard as usual. It was really warm. George sat up and looked longingly out to sea, where the wind was whipping up the waves tremendously.

'Wish we had a boat!' she said. 'If we were back home, I could get out my own boat, and we could go out in the cool breeze and get dry.'

Julian pointed lazily to a big notice not far off. It said 'BOATS FOR HIRE. INQUIRE AT HUT.'

'Oh good!' said George. 'I'll go and inquire. I'd love a good row!'

She slipped on her sandals, and went to the hut to which the sign pointed. A boy of about fifteen sat there, staring out to sea. He looked round as George came along.

'Want a boat?' he said.

'Yes, please. How much?' asked George. 'For four of us - and a dog.'

'Fifty pence an hour,' said the boy. 'Or a pound a day. Or three pounds a week. Better to take it by the week if you're staying here. It works out very cheap then.'

George went back to the boys and Anne. 'Shall we take the boat by the week?' she said. 'It'll cost three pounds. We could do lots of rowing about, and it would be fun.'

'Right,' said Dick. 'Anyone got any money?'

'There's some in my pocket, but not enough, I'm afraid,' said Julian. 'I'll go and fix up the boat for us to have tomorrow - we'll take it for a whole week. I can easily bring the money with me in the morning.'

The boat-boy was very obliging. 'You can have the boat today and onwards, if you like, you needn't wait till tomorrow,' he said. 'I know you'll bring me the money all right! So, if you'd like to have it this afternoon, it's up to you. Choose which boat you like. They're all the same. If you want to take it out at night too, and do some fishing, you can - but tie it up safe, won't you?'

'Of course,' said Julian, going to look at the boats. He beckoned to the others, and they all came over.

'Any boat we like, day or night!' said Julian. 'Which do you fancy? Starfish - Splasho - Adventure - Sea-gull - Rock-a-bye? They all look good, sound little boats to me!'

'I'd like 'Adventure', I think,' said George, thinking that that particular little boat looked sturdy, dearie and sound. 'Nice name - and nice little boat!'

So Adventure it was! 'And a jolly good name for any boat of ours!' said Dick, pushing it down to the sea with Julian. 'Whooooosh! There she goes! Steady my beauty - we want to get in! Chuck in all our clothes, George! We can dress when we feel cold.'

Soon they were all in the boat, bobbing about on the waves. Julian took the oars and pulled out to sea. Now they were in the full breeze - and a spanking one it was too! 'I'm certainly not hot any more!' said George, pulling her bathing-towel round her shoulders.

The tide was running out, and pulled the boat strongly out to sea. Whispering Island suddenly seemed very much nearer! 'Better look out!' said George, suddenly. 'We don't know if a keeper's on guard somewhere on the shore of the island. We're getting pretty near.'

But the out-going tide swept the boat on and on towards the island, so that very soon they could see a sandy shore. Dick then took one oar, and Julian the other, and they tried to row against the tide and take the boat back into calmer water.

It was no good. The tide was far too strong. Very soon the boat was quite near the shore of the island and then an enormous wave flung them right up the sand, and left the boat grounded as it went back again. It slid over to one side, and they all promptly fell out!

'Whew!' said Julian. 'What a tide! I'd no idea it ran so strongly, or I'd never have brought the boat out so far.'

'What shall we do!' said Anne, rather scared. She kept looking all round for a keeper with a gun. Suppose they got into real trouble through coming right on to the island?

'I think we'll have to stay on the island till the tide turns, and we can row back on it,' said Julian. 'I can't think why that boat-boy didn't warn us about the tide. I suppose he thought we knew.'

They pulled the boat a little further up on the firm sand, took out their bundle of clothes, and hid them under a bush. They walked up the beach towards a wood, thick with great trees. As they neared them, they heard a strange, mysterious sound.

'Whispering!' said George, stopping. 'The trees are really whispering. Listen! It's just as if they were talking to one another under their breath! No wonder it's called Whispering Island!'

'I don't like it much,' said Anne. 'It almost sounds as if they're saying nasty things about us!'

'Shooey, shooey, shooey, shooey!' said the trees, nodding towards one another as the wind shook them. 'Shooey, shooey!'

'Just the noise of whispering!' said George. 'Well - what do we do now? We'll have to wait an hour or two till the tide turns again!'

'Shall we explore?' said Dick. 'After all, we've got Timmy with us. No one is likely to attack us if they see him!'

'They can shoot him, can't they, if they have guns?' said George. 'If he growled one of his terrifying growls, and ran at them, showing his teeth, they'd be scared to bits, and fire at him.'

'I think you're right,' said Julian, angry with himself for landing them all into what might be serious trouble. 'Keep your hand on Timmy's collar, George.'

'You know what I think?' said Dick suddenly. 'I think we ought to try and find the guards, and tell them the tide swept us on to the island quite by accident - we couldn't stop the boat surging on! We're not grown-ups, come to snoop around, so they're sure to believe us - and we'd be safe from any chasing or shooting then.'

They all looked at Julian. He nodded. 'Yes - good idea. Give ourselves up, and ask for help! After all, we hadn't any real intention of actually landing - the tide simply threw the boat into that sandy cove!'

So they walked up to the back of the cove and into the wood, whose whispering was very loud indeed, once they were actually among the trees. No one was to be seen. The wood was so thick that it was in parts quite difficult to clamber through. After about ten minutes very hard walking and clambering, Julian came to a stop. He had seen something through the trees.

The others pressed behind him. Julian pointed in front, and the others saw what looked like a great grey wall, made of stone.

'The old castle, I imagine!' Julian whispered, and at once the trees themselves seemed to whisper even more loudly! They all made their way to the wall, and walked alongside it. It was a very high wall indeed, and they could hardly see the top! They came to a corner and peeped round. A great courtyard lay there - quite empty.

'Better shout, I think,' said Dick, beginning to feel rather creepy, but before they could do that two enormous men suddenly came down a flight of great stone steps. They looked so fierce, that Timmy couldn't help giving a blood-curdling growl. They stopped short at once, and looked all round, startled.

'The noise came from over there,' said one of the men, pointing to his left - and, to the children's great relief, both swung off in the wrong direction!

'We'd better get back to the cove,' whispered Julian. 'I don't at all like the look of those men - they look proper thugs. Quiet as you can, now. George, don't let Timmy bark.'

They made their way back beside the stone wall, through the whispering trees, and there they were, at the cove.

'We'd better row back as quickly as we can,' said Julian. 'I think something's wrong here. Those men looked like foreigners. They certainly weren't game-keepers. I wish we hadn't come.'

'Ju - where's our boat?' said Dick, in a shocked voice. 'It's gone. This can't be the right cove!'

The others stared round. Certainly there was no boat! They must have come to the wrong cove.

'It looks the same cove to me,' said George. 'Except that the sea has come in a bit more. Do you think it took our boat away - gosh, look at that big wave sweeping right in - and sucking back!'

'My word, yes! Our boat could easily have been dragged out on a wave like that!' said Julian, very worried. 'Look out - here comes another!'

'It is the same cove!' said Anne, looking under a bush at the back. 'Here are our clothes, look! We hid them here!'

'Take them out quickly!' called Julian, as another big wave swept right in. 'What an idiot I am! We should have pulled our boat as far up as we could.'

'I'm cold now,' said Anne. 'I'm going to dress. It will be easier to carry a bathing-suit than a heap of clothes!'

'Good idea!' said Dick, and they all promptly dressed, feeling warmer at once.

'We might as well leave our bathing-things under the bush where we left our clothes,' said George. 'At least we'll know it's the same cove, if we find them there!'

'The thing is - what are we going to do now?' said Julian, worried. 'No boat to get back in - and why on earth did we choose one called Adventure! We might have known something would happen!'

Chapter 10

THE FIVE ARE IN A FIX

Julian went to the mouth of the cove and looked out over the waves, hoping that he might see their boat bobbing somewhere. 'I could swim out to it if so,' he thought, 'and bring it in. No - there's not a sign of a boat! I could kick myself for being so careless!'

Dick came up, looking worried. 'I suppose it's too far to swim back to the mainland, isn't it?' he said. 'I could have a shot - and get another boat and come back for everyone.'

'No. Too far,' said Julian. 'The tide's too strong for any swimmer at the moment. We're certainly in a fix!'

'We can't signal, I suppose?' said Dick.

'What with?' asked Julian. 'You could wave a shirt for an hour and it wouldn't be seen from the mainland!'

'Well - we must think of something!' said Dick, exasperated. 'What about trying to find a boat here? Surely those men must have one to get to and fro.'

'Of course!' said Julian, clapping Dick on the back. 'Where are my brains? They seem to be going soft or something! We could snoop round and about tonight, to see if there's a boat anywhere. They may have two or three. They'd have to get food from the mainland at times.'

The two girls and Timmy came up then, and Timmy whined. 'He doesn't seem to like this island,' said George. 'I think he smells danger!'

'I bet he does!' said Dick, putting his hand on Timmy's firm head. 'I'm jolly glad he's with us. Can you girls think of any good ideas - we can't!'

'We could signal,' said George.

'No good. A signal from here couldn't be seen,' said Dick. 'We've already thought of that.'

'Well - if we lighted a fire here on the beach tonight, when the tide's out, surely that would be seen?' said Anne.

Dick and Julian looked at one another. 'Yes!' said Julian. 'If we lighted it on a hilly bit it would be better still - on that cliff up there, for instance.'

'Wouldn't the guards see it?' asked Dick.

'We'd have to chance that,' said Julian. 'Yes - we could do that. Good idea, Anne. I say - we're going to get jolly hungry, aren't we? Anyone got anything to eat?'

'I've two bars of chocolate - a bit soft now though,' said George, digging into the pocket of her shorts.

'And I've some peppermints,' said Anne. 'What about you boys? You always take barley-sugars about with you, Dick - don't say you haven't any just when we could all do with them!'

'I've a new packet!' said Dick. 'Let's all have one now!' He pulled the packet from his pocket and handed it round. Soon they were all sucking barley-sugars. Timmy was given one too, but his was gone in a flash!

'Wasted on you, Tim, absolutely wasted!' said Anne. 'Crick-crack, swallow - that's all a barley-sugar means to you! Why can't dogs suck a sweet as we do! They never seem to suck anything. No, Timmy, don't go sniffing into Dick's pocket for another!'

Timmy was disappointed. He went snuffling round the cove, and then, scenting a rabbit smell, he followed it with his nose to the ground. The children didn't notice that he had disappeared, but went on talking, trying to solve their very real difficulty.

No boat. No food. No way of getting help except by signalling in some way. Not very funny, thought Dick.

And then, very suddenly, a loud sound broke the silence - CRACK!

Everyone jumped up at once. 'That was a gunshot,' said Dick. 'The keepers! But what were they shooting at?'

'Where's Timmy?' cried George, looking all round. 'Tim, Tim, where are you TIM!'

Everyone's heart went cold. Timmy! No, the shot couldn't have been meant for old Timmy! Surely the keepers wouldn't shoot a dog!

George was nearly mad with dread. She clutched at Dick, tears streaming down her cheeks. 'Dick! It couldn't be Timmy, could it? Oh Timmy, where are you? TIMMY! Come to me!'

'Listen! Listen a minute, George!' said Dick, as shouts came from the distance. 'I thought I heard Tim whine then. Isn't that him coming through the bushes?'

There was the noise of rustling as some creature pressed through the last year's old bracken fronds - and then Timmy's head appeared, his bright eyes looking for them.

'Oh Timmy, darling Timmy, I thought you'd been shot!' cried George, hugging the big dog. 'Did they shoot at you? Are you hurt anywhere?'

'I bet I know why he was shot at,' said Dick. 'Look what he's got in his mouth - half a ham! Drop it, you robber, you!'

Timmy stood there, the ham in his mouth, wagging his tail joyously. He had felt hungry, and was sure the others did too - so he had gone a hunting!

'Where did you get that, you bad dog?' said Julian. Timmy wished he could tell him. He would have said 'Well, I went sniffing after a rabbit - and I came to a shed stored with tins of food - and one was open with this piece of ham inside, waiting for me. And here it is!'

He dropped the ham at George's feet. It smelt extremely good. 'Well, thanks, old fellow,' said Julian. 'We could do with some of that - though we'll have to pay for it when we meet the owner, whoever he is!'

'Julian - he has been shot at!' said George, in a trembling voice. 'Look - his tail's bleeding, and some fur is gone.'

'My word, yes!' said Julian, examining Timmy's tail. 'Good gracious - those fellows mean business. I really think I'd better find them and tell them we're here, in case they take a pot-shot at us too!'

'Well, let's go now - all of us,' said Dick. 'They probably thought Timmy was a wolf or a fox or something, slinking through the trees. Poor old fellow!'

Timmy was not at all disturbed. He was so proud of finding and bringing back the ham that he even wagged his wounded tail!

'It's quite certain that no animals or birds will be tame and friendly on this island now,' said Anne. 'They'll have been scared stiff by the game-keepers potting at this and that.'

'You're right,' said Julian. 'It rather makes me think that the fellows on the island are no longer merely gamekeepers, put in to preserve the wild life, and to frighten sight-seers away - but real, fierce guards of some kind. Like those two horrible men we saw in the courtyard!'

'Well, what are they guarding then?' said George.

'That's what I'd very much like to find out,' said Julian. 'And I think perhaps I'll snoop round a bit and see what I can discover. When it's getting dark, though, not now.'

'I wish we hadn't come,' said Anne. 'I wish we were safe in our cottage with Wilfrid. I wonder if he's found his whistle-pipe. Goodness, it seems ages since we hired that boat!'

'Can't we go quietly through the woods and explore a bit?' asked George. 'Or walk round the shore to see if there's a boat anywhere? I'm getting bored, sitting here, talking.'

'Well - I suppose old Tim would give us warning at once if he heard anyone near,' said Julian, who was also longing to stretch his legs. 'We'll go in single file, like Indians, and make as little noise as we can. Timmy can go ahead. He'll give us instant warning if we come near any of the keepers.'

They all stood up, and Timmy looked at them, wagging his nicked tail. 'I'll look after you,' said his two bright eyes. 'Don't be afraid!'

They made their way carefully and quietly through the whispering trees. 'Sh, sh, sh, shoo, shooey,' said the leaves above their heads, as if warning everyone to go as quietly as possible. And then suddenly Timmy stopped and gave a low, warning growl. They all stood still at once, listening.

They could hear nothing. They were in a dense part of the wood, and it was dark and sunless. What was Timmy growling at? He took a step forward, and growled softly again.

Julian went forward too, as silently as he could. He stopped suddenly and stared. What in the world was that strange figure, gleaming out of the shadows? His heart began to beat loudly. The figure stood there, silently, an arm out-stretched as if pointing at him!

He thought it moved and he took a step backwards in fear. Was it a ghost or something? It was so very very white and shone so queerly. The others, coming up behind, suddenly saw it too and stopped in fright. Timmy growled again, and all the hackles on his neck rose up. What was THIS?

Everyone stood absolutely still, and Anne gave a gulp. She took hold of Dick's arm, and he held it tightly against him. And then George gave a very small laugh. To everyone's horror she went forward, and touched the hand of the gleaming figure.

'How do you do?' she said. 'It is so nice to meet a well-mannered statue!'

Well! A statue! Only a statue! It had looked so real standing there, and yet so ghostly. Everyone heaved a sigh of relief, and Timmy ran forward, and sniffed at the statue's flowing robes.

'Look around you,' said Julian. 'The wood's full of statues just here - and aren't they BEAUTIFUL! I hope they don't suddenly come alive - they really look as if they might!'

Chapter 11

A STRANGE DISCOVERY

The children were astonished to see so many gleaming statues, standing in the darkness of the wood. They wandered round them, and then came to a large shed. They peeped inside.

'Look here!' said Dick, excited. 'Long, deep boxes, strong as iron! And see what's in these two!' They all came to look. In the first, packed in what looked like sawdust, was a beautifully carved statue of a boy. The next box seemed to be entirely full of sawdust, and Anne had to scrape quite a lot away to see if anything was packed there too.

'It's a little stone angel!' she said, scraping sawdust from a quaint little face, a small crown and the tips of small wings. 'Lovely! Why are these statues being packed away like this?'

'Use your brain!' said Dick. 'It's obvious that they're works of art - and are probably very old. They're being packed to send away in some boat or ship - to be transported somewhere where they'll fetch a lot of money - America, probably!'

'Did they come from the old castle, do you think?' asked George. 'It's quite near. I expect this shed belongs to it. But how was it that the police didn't find them in the castle when they searched? They must have gone there, and looked into every corner! And what about the statues in the wood outside - why haven't they been packed away?'

'Too big, probably,' said Julian. 'And too heavy. A small boat wouldn't be strong enough to take great things like that. But those little statues are quite perfect for transporting - they don't weigh as much as the big ones - and they aren't marked by the weather, through standing in rain, sun and snow! Not a mark on them!'

'You're right,' said Anne. 'I noticed that those big ones outside were green here and there, and some had bits knocked off them. I wish we could get inside the castle and see the things there!'

'The man at the golf-club, the one we took those lost balls to - he said something about statues as white as snow, standing in this wood - do you remember?' said Dick.

'Yes. They must have stood there for some time,' said Julian. 'I don't feel they can be very valuable, else they would be put carefully indoors, under cover. But these little beauties - I guess they're worth a lot of money!'

'Who do you suppose packed them in here?' said Anne.

'Maybe those big men we saw,' said Julian. 'Even small statues like these need someone very strong indeed to carry them here to this shed, and pack them like this. Then, of course, they would have to be carried to some boat - or ship - probably to a boat first, and then rowed out to a waiting ship. But I don't think those guards are the men behind all this - someone with great knowledge of old things must be the ringleader. He probably heard the old legend of the island, came to have a look round, and made quite a lot of interesting discoveries!'

'Where?' asked George. 'In the castle?'

'Probably - though carefully hidden away!' said Julian. 'For all we know there may be scores of really valuable old treasures hidden there still. That sword with a jewelled handle, for instance! And the bed made of gold, and...'

'To think they might all be quite near us somewhere on Whispering Island!' said Anne. 'Wouldn't I love to be able to say I'd slept on a bed of pure gold!'

'Well, I think you'd find it jolly hard,' said Dick.

Timmy suddenly gave a small whine, and licked George's hand. 'What is it?' she said. 'What do you want, Timmy?'

'Perhaps he's hungry,' said Anne.

'Thirsty, more likely!' said Julian. 'Look at his tongue hanging out!'

'Oh, poor Tim - you haven't had a drink for hours!' said George. 'Well - where on earth can we get you one? We'll have to look for a puddle, I'm afraid. Come on!'

They left the shed where the beautiful little statues were lying in their sawdust, and went out into the sunshine. Everywhere was dry. Julian felt worried.

'We shall all be thirsty soon!' he said. 'I wonder where we can get some water?'

'Would it be too dangerous to go near the castle and see if there's a tap anywhere?' asked George, ready to face almost anything to get her dog a drink!

'Yes, it would,' said Julian, in a very decided voice. 'We're not going near any of those men with guns. They might have been told to shoot on sight, and that wouldn't be very pleasant. We'd be peppered all over with shot!'

'Look - what's that round thing over there - like a little circular wall?' said Dick, pointing to something behind the shed where the statues lay in their boxes.

They all went over to it - and Anne guessed what it was at once! 'A well! An old well!' she said. 'Look, it has an old wooden beam over the top, with a pulley to wind and unwind a bucket. Is there a bucket - let's hope so! We can let it down to the water and fill it for Timmy then.'

Timmy put his paws on the rim of the wall and sniffed. Water! That was what he wanted more than anything. He began to whine.

'All right, Timmy - we'll send the bucket down,' said George. 'It's still on the hook! Julian, this handle's awfully stiff - can you turn it to let down the bucket?'

Julian tried with all his strength - and quite suddenly the rope loosened, and the bucket gave a sudden jerk and jump. Alas - it jerked right off the hook, and with a weird, echoing jangling sound, fell from the top to the bottom of the well - landing in the water with a terrific splash!

'Blow, blow, blow!' said Julian, and Timmy gave an anguished howl. He peered down at the lost bucket, now on its side in the water at the bottom of the well, gradually filling itself.

'It'll probably sink below the water now,' said Julian, with a groan. 'Is there a ladder down the well? - if so I could shin down and get the bucket.'

But there wasn't, though it looked as if there had been at some time, for here and there were staples in the brick side of the well-wall.

'What can we do?' asked Anne. 'Can we possibly pull up the bucket?'

'No - I'm afraid we can't,' said Dick. 'But wait a minute - I could shin down the rope, couldn't I, and pick the bucket out of the water. And easily get up again, because George and Julian could turn the well-handle, and pull me up that way!'

'Righto. Down you go then,' said Julian. 'The rope's good and strong, not frayed or rotten. We'll wind you and the bucket up all right!'

The boy sat on the side of the well-wall, and reached out for the rope. He swung himself on to it, and swayed there a moment or two, looking down the long, dark hole below him, with the water at the bottom. Then down he went, hand-over-hand, just as he so often did at school in the gym.

He came to the bottom, reached down, took hold of the bucket-handle, and filled the bucket full. The water felt as cold as ice to his hand. 'All right. Pull me up!' he shouted, his voice sounding very hollow and strange as it rose up through the well-walls.

Dick was heavy to pull up. Julian and George turned the handle valiantly, but it was slow work. Gradually Dick came up nearer and nearer to the top. When he was half-way they heard him give an exclamation, and call out something, but they couldn't make out what it was and went on winding the groaning rope, slowly but surely.

They reached down and took the bucket from Dick as soon as his head appeared at the top. Timmy fell on it with excited barks, and began to lap vigorously.

'Didn't you hear me yelling to you to stop when I was halfway up?' demanded Dick, still swinging on the rope. 'Don't let go that handle. Hang on to it for a minute.'

'What's the excitement?' asked Julian, in surprise. 'Why did you yell to us? We couldn't make out what you said.'

Dick swung himself to one side, caught hold of the well-top, and hauled himself up, so that he could sit on the well-wall. 'I shouted because I suddenly saw something jolly peculiar as I came up the well,' he said. 'And I wanted to stop and see what it was!'

'Well - what was it?' asked Julian.

'I don't quite know. It looked awfully like a little door! An iron door,' said Dick. 'I say, don't let Timmy drink all that water - he'll be ill. We'll let the pail down again in a minute and get some more for ourselves.'

'Go on about what you saw,' said George. 'How could there be a door in the side of a well going deep down into the earth?'

'Well, I tell you, there was one,' said Dick. 'Look, Timmy's gone and upset the pail now! Let's send it down on the pulley to be filled again, and I'll go down on the rope again too. But when I come up and you hear me shout 'Stop!' just STOP winding, see?'

'Here's the bucket for the hook,' said Julian. 'I'll be careful not to jerk it off this time. Ready?'

Down went Dick and the bucket again - splash went the bucket and filled with water once more. Then up came Dick again, wound up by Julian and George as before. As soon as they heard him shout 'STOP' they stopped their winding and peered down.

They saw Dick peering hard at the side of the well-wall, and pulling at it with his fingers. Then he shouted again. 'All right. UP WE go!'

They hauled him up to the top, and he clambered off the rope, swung himself on to the well-wall and sat there.

'Yes. It is some kind of opening in the well-wall - it is a door - and it has a bolt this side to undo, but it was too stiff for my fingers. I'd have to go down and jiggle it about with my knife before I could loosen it.'

'A door in a well! But where on earth would it lead to?' said Julian, astonished.

'That's what we're going to find out!' grinned Dick, rather pleased with himself. 'Who would ever think of putting a door in the side of a well? Somebody did - but WHY? Very cunning - and mysterious - and unguessable. I rather think I'll go straight down again and see if I can't open that door - and discover what it leads to!'

'Oh DO, Dick, do!' said George. 'If you don't, I will!'

'Hang on to the rope. Down I go again!' said Dick. And down he went, much to Timmy's surprise. The others looked down anxiously. Could Dick open the well-door? What would he find behind it? Quick, Dick, quick - everybody's waiting for you!

Chapter 12

A GREAT SURPRISE - AND A SHOCK FOR GEORGE

As soon as Dick shouted 'STOP' Julian and George hung on to the rope to stop it going down any further. Dick was swinging just opposite the strange door. He began to feel round it, and to jiggle it. It had no lock, apparently, but there was a bolt on his side. He tried to push back the bolt - and suddenly it came away from the door, and dropped down into the well. It had rusted so much that it could not even hold to the door, once it was handled!

The door felt loose, now the bolt was gone. Dick ran his hands round it, trying to loosen it further, and banged it with his fist. Rust fell off it, and Dick's hands were soon brown with the old old rust.

He saw a little knob at the top of the door and gave it a tug. Ah - the door felt looser now. He ran his knife all round the edges, scraping away all the rust he could find. Then he managed to get his strongest knife-blade in between the door-edge and the well-wall, and used it as a lever to force the door open.

It opened slowly and painfully, with creaks and groans. It was about eighteen inches high and not quite so much wide. Dick pulled it back with difficulty and then peered through the hole.

He could see nothing at all but black darkness - how very disappointing! He fumbled in his pocket to see if he had a torch. Yes - good! He shone it through the little door, his hand trembling with excitement. What would he see?

His torch was small and not very powerful. The light fell first of all on a face with gleaming eyes, and Dick had such a shock that he almost fell down the well. The eyes seemed to glare up at him in a very threatening manner! He switched his torch to the right - and yet another face gleamed up at him. 'A queer face,' thought Dick. 'Yellow as can be! YELLOW! YELLOW! I believe that face is made of gold!'

His hand was trembling even more, he shone his torch here and there through the opening, catching first one yellow face in its light, and then another. The faces had yellow bodies too, and their eyes glinted very queerly.

'I believe - yes, I really do believe - that I've found the hiding-place of the golden statues!' thought Dick. 'And those gleaming eyes must be precious jewels. My word, I did have a shock when I saw them all looking at me! Whatever is this place they're in?'

'DICK! What can you see? Do tell us!' yelled Julian, and poor Dick almost fell off the rope when the shouts echoed round him. 'Pull me up!' he shouted. 'It's too extraordinary for words. Pull me up and I'll tell you!'

And before a minute had passed, he was standing by the others, his eyes gleaming almost as brightly as the eyes of the golden statues, his words tumbling over one another.

'That door leads into the place where all the treasures are hidden. The first thing I saw was a golden statue staring at me - brilliant eyes in a yellow face - a golden face, real gold! There are dozens of them. I don't think they liked me much - they glared so! Thank goodness they didn't say a word - though I half expected them to. My word, what a hiding-place - right down under the earth!'

'There must be another entrance to it,' said Julian, thrilled to hear such extraordinary news. 'The well door must be a secret one. Statues couldn't be pushed through it. My word, what a find, Dick.'

'Let's all go down in turn and look through the door!' said George. 'I can't believe it. I think I must be dreaming it. Quick, let me go down!'

One by one they all went down on the rope and looked through the door. Anne came back rather scared. She had felt very queer when she had seen the silent statues looking at her. 'I know they're not really looking, it's only that their eyes gleam,' she said. 'But I kept expecting one or other to take a step forward and speak to me!'

'Well - the next thing to do is to climb down through the door, and see exactly where the statues are, underground,' said Julian. 'And find out the opening they were brought in by. There must be a door at the other end of the room, through which they were brought. What a hiding-place, though! No wonder the police could find nothing in the way of statues or other treasures.'

'We might find the golden sword there, with the jewelled handle!' said Anne. 'And the golden bed.'

She had hardly finished speaking when there came a loud noise from behind them. Timmy was barking his head off! Whatever was the matter?

'Sh!' said George, fiercely. 'You'll bring the guards here, you idiot! Stop it!'

Timmy stopped barking and whined instead. Then he ran off towards the wood, his tail waving happily. 'Who in the world is he going to meet?' said George, amazed. 'Someone he knows, by the look of his tail!'

The others all followed Timmy, who raced along towards the cove where they had landed - and lost - their boat. And there, in the cove, was another boat! A small one, to be sure, but still, a boat - and by it, fondling Timmy, was Wilfrid! Wilfrid! What an amazing thing!

'WILFRID! How did you get here - did you hire that boat? Did you come all by yourself? Did you...'

Wilfrid grinned round in delight, thrilled at the surprise he was giving everyone. Timmy licked him without stopping, and George didn't even seem to notice!

'Well,' he said, 'you didn't come back, so I guessed something was wrong - and when the boat boy told me you'd taken one of his boats, and it had been reported tossing about, empty on the water near the island, I guessed what had happened - I said, 'Aha! they didn't make the boat fast when they got to the island - and now they're marooned there! You were pretty mean to go without me - but I guessed you'd be pleased to see me, if I borrowed a boat and came over!'

Anne was so pleased that she gave the boy a hug. 'Now we can go back whenever we want to,' she said.

'But we don't want to, at the moment,' said Dick. 'We've made some startling discoveries, Wilfrid - and I'm jolly pleased you'll be able to share in them! Er - what have you got in your pocket? Something keeps poking its head out at me.'

'Oh, that's only a baby hedgehog,' said Wilfrid, taking it out gently. 'It got trodden on - by a horse I think - so I'm just caring for it for a day or two.' He put it back into his pocket. 'But I say - go on - tell me what you've found. Not the lost treasures, surely?'

'Yes!' said Anne. 'We saw them when we went down a well near the castle.'

'Gracious - did somebody throw them into the water there?' said Wilfrid, amazed.

'No,' said Dick, and told him about the curious door in the side of the well-wall. Wilfrid's eyes nearly fell out of his head.

'I am glad I came!' he said. 'I nearly didn't. I thought you wouldn't really want me - and I knew George wouldn't be pleased, because of Timmy. I can't help him coming round me - and anyway he'd feel hurt if I pushed him off.'

Timmy came nosing round him at that moment, with his ball. He wanted Wilfrid to throw it for him. But Wilfrid didn't notice the ball. He just patted the soft head, and went on talking.

'The boat boy wasn't very pleased when he heard that the boat you hired was loose on the sea. He said you'd hired it for a week, and there it was, back the same day, wet and empty! His cousin brought it in. No damage done.'

'I'll make it up to him when I see him,' said Julian. 'I haven't paid him for the hire of it either, but he knows I will, when I get back. I had no idea that the sea would throw up waves here whose backwash would drag out an unmoored boat.'

'You ought to have taken me with you,' said Wilfrid, grinning. Timmy, tired of trying to make him throw his ball, went off to George, who was only too pleased to. She threw it into the air, and Timmy leapt up and caught it.

Then very suddenly he made a horrible noise and rolled over, kicking as if he were in great pain.

'What's the matter, Timmy?' cried George, and rushed to him. Wilfrid ran too. The dog was choking, and his eyes were almost starting out of his head.

'That ball's stuck in his throat!' cried Wilfrid. 'I knew it was dangerous! I told you it was! Cough it up, Timmy, cough it up. Oh, you poor, choking thing! Oh Timmy, Timmy!'

The boy was beside himself with fear that the dog would choke, as he had once seen another dog do, and as for George, she was wild with terror. Poor Timmy's eyes looked terrible as he choked and choked, trying to get the ball out of his throat.

'He'll choke to death,' cried Wilfrid. 'Julian, force his mouth open, and hold it. I must try to get out the ball. Quick!'

Timmy was growing weaker, and it was not too difficult to force his mouth wide open. Wilfrid could see the ball down the dog's throat - the ball with the hole in the middle. He put his small hand into the dog's big mouth, and forced his fore-finger into the hole in the ball. His finger-joint stuck there - Wilfrid gently drew back his hand - and the ball came too, on his finger! There it was, with his finger still stuck in the hole! Timmy began to breathe again, great panting breaths, while George stroked his head and cried for joy that he was all right.

'I shouldn't have given you that ball, I shouldn't!' she said. 'It was too small for a big dog like you - and you will throw them up into the air and catch them. Oh Timmy, Timmy, I'm very very sorry. Timmy, are you all right?'

Wilfrid had gone off but now came back with some water from the pail. He dipped his hand in it and let drops of water drip into the dog's mouth. Timmy swallowed it gratefully. His throat was sore, but the water was cool and soothing. George let Wilfrid do this without a word. She looked rather white and shaken. Why - Timmy might be dead by now if Wilfrid hadn't put his finger into that hole in the ball, and drawn it out!

'Thank you, Wilfrid,' she said, in a low voice. 'You were very clever.'

'Thank goodness the ball had a hole through it,' said Wilfrid, and he put his arms round Timmy's neck. The dog licked him gratefully. Then he turned and licked George too.

'He says he belongs to both of us now,' said George. 'I'll share him with you. You saved his life.'

'Thanks,' said Wilfrid. 'I'd love to have just a bit of him - he's the nicest dog I know!'

Chapter 13

A MEAL - A SLEEP - AND A DISAPPEARANCE

'I feel hungry again,' said George, who always had a very good appetite indeed. 'We've finished all that ham, haven't we? I had to give old Timmy some. What about a barley sugar, Dick?'

'Two more left for each of us - just ten,' said Dick, counting. 'Sorry, Timmy, old thing - none for you this time. Have one, everybody? We'll have five left then!'

'Oh, I quite forgot to tell you,' said Wilfrid, taking a barley sugar. 'I brought some food in my boat! I didn't think you'd taken any, and I guessed you'd soon be jolly hungry!'

'You're a marvel, Wilfrid!' said Julian, wondering why he had ever disliked the boy. 'What have you brought?'

'Come and see,' said Wilfrid, and they all went over to the boat, Timmy walking as close to the boy as he could. Higgledy-piggledy in the boat was a pile of tins, a large loaf of bread, and a pound package of butter, looking rather soft.

'Gracious!' said Anne, in delight. 'How in the world did you carry all these from the cottage to your boat? Look everyone, Wilfrid has even brought some plates and spoons!'

'I put everything into a sack, and carried them over my shoulder,' said Wilfrid, enjoying everyone's delighted surprise. 'I fell over going down the hill to the shore, and all the tins rolled out, and simply shot down the slope!'

Everyone laughed at the thought of the tins rolling at top speed down the hill. Anne slipped her arm through Wilfrid's and gave it a squeeze.

'You did jolly well,' she said, and Wilfrid beamed at her, astonished and pleased at everyone's warm friendliness. Timmy went up to the boat and began sniffing at the bread. Then he turned and barked as if to say 'Is there anything here for me?'

Wilfrid understood at once. 'Oh yes, Timmy!' he said.

'I brought a special tin of dogmeat for you - here you are - a large tin of Waggomeat!'

Timmy recognized the tin at once, and barked joyfully. He pawed Wilfrid as if to say 'Come on, then - open it! I'm hungry!'

'Anyone got a tin-opener?' said George. 'It would be too dreadful if we couldn't open the tins!'

'Gosh - I never even thought about that!' said Wilfrid. 'What an ass I am!'

'It's all right. I've a thing on my pocket-knife that's supposed to open tins,' said Dick, taking out a very large closed knife. 'I've never bothered to use it - so let's hope it will work the trick. Chuck me a tin, Wilfrid.'

Wilfrid threw him the tin of Waggomeat. With everyone watching very anxiously indeed, Dick opened a peculiar-looking tool in his knife, and gashed the point into the top of the tin. It worked!

'First time I've ever used it,' said Dick, running the gadget round the tin-top. 'Three cheers for the man who thought of including it in a knife!'

'Will Timmy be able to swallow yet?' asked George, anxiously. 'His throat must still be hurting him where that wooden ball choked him.'

'Oh, Timmy will be able to judge that for himself,' said Julian. 'If I know anything about him, not even a sore throat will stop him from wolfing half that tin!'

Julian was right. As soon as Wilfrid scraped out a third of the meat with his knife on to a flat stone nearby, Timmy was wolfing it in great gulps!

'Nothing much the matter with your throat now, Tim!' said Anne, patting him. 'Dear old Tim. Don't ever choke again. I simply couldn't bear it!'

'Let's have a meal ourselves now,' said George. 'We'll open more of those tins. We don't need to be stingy about them because we can leave in Wilfrid's boat at any time, and get back to the mainland.'

Soon they had opened a tin of tongue, two tins of fruit, and a large tin of baked beans. They cut the big loaf into six pieces (one for Timmy, of course) and then sat down at the back of the cove to feast.

'Best meal I ever had in my life!' said Dick, enjoying himself. 'Tasty food - fresh air - sea nearby - sun on our heads - and friends sitting all round me!'

'Woof!' said Timmy, at once, and gave Dick a very wet lick.

'He says he couldn't agree more,' said Anne, with a laugh.

'The sun's going down,' said George. 'What are we going to do? Go back to the mainland in Wilfrid's boat - or stay here for the night?'

'Stay here,' said Julian. 'Nobody knows we're here, and I want to snoop round a bit tonight, when those men can't see me. There's a lot of things that puzzle me. For instance, how on earth do they send away the things from here - such as those packed statues we saw? It must mean that a fairly big vessel comes along to collect them, I suppose. And I'd like to know how many men there are on the island - presumably the guards we saw, with guns - and the men who have found that underground cave, where everything was hidden. Then we'll go back, tell the police, and leave things to them!'

'Couldn't Wilfrid take the two girls back to the mainland, then come back with the boat?' said Dick. 'I don't think we ought to let them run any risk.'

Before Julian could reply, George spoke quickly - and crossly. 'We're staying here - though Anne can go back if she wants to. But Timmy and I are staying with you boys, so that's that.'

'All right, all right, no need to shout!' said Dick, pretending to cover his ears. 'What about you, though, Anne? You're the youngest, and...'

'I'm staying,' said Anne. 'I'd be worried stiff all night if I left you on the island. And I certainly don't want to miss any excitement!'

'Right,' said Julian. 'We all stay then. Wilfrid, did you know that Timmy has his nose in the pocket where you keep your hedgehog?'

'Yes. They're just making friends,' said Wilfrid. 'Anyway, the hedgehog's only a baby - his quills won't prick Timmy's nose, they're still too soft. He's a dear little thing. I thought I'd call him Spiky.'

'Wuff,' said Timmy, quite agreeing. He was sitting between George and Wilfrid, very happy indeed, for both fondled him and patted him at the same time.

'I think I'll take a walk round the island,' suddenly announced Wilfrid. 'Timmy, like to come with me?'

Timmy got up at once, but George pulled him down. 'Don't be an ass, Wilfrid,' she said. 'Timmy's been shot at once, by the men here - and I'm not going to risk it again - besides, we don't want them to know we're here.'

'I'd be very careful,' persisted Wilfrid. 'I wouldn't let them spot me. They didn't spot me coming over in the boat.'

Julian sat up very suddenly. 'How do we know they didn't?' he said. 'I never thought of that! They might have a telescope - they might keep watch all the time - they might even have seen us in our boat! After all, they can't risk being spied on!'

'I don't think they could have seen us,' said Dick. 'They would have made a search.'

'I'm jolly sure they didn't see me,' boasted Wilfrid. 'They'd have been waiting for me on the shore, if they had.' He got up and looked all round. 'I think I'll go for my walk now,' he said.

'NO! You are DEFINITELY not to go for a walk, Wilfrid,' said Julian, and lay back in the sun again. It was sinking now, but still very bright. Dick began to think of the night, and how he and Julian would snoop round and find the way into that strange place underground where those golden statues stood silently in the darkness.

Then he fell fast asleep, and only awoke when Anne gave him a friendly punch. He sat up and began a long and leisurely conversation with his sister - and then Anne suddenly looked all round.

'Where's Wilfrid?' she said. They all sat up then, and looked startled. Wilfrid was nowhere to be seen!

'He must have slipped away without a sound!' said Dick, angrily. 'The little idiot. He's been gone quite a long time! He'll get caught, as sure as can be. Good thing Timmy didn't go with him - he might have been caught too - and shot!'

George put her arms round Timmy in fear. 'Timmy would never go with Wilfrid if I wasn't there too,' she said. 'What a little fathead he is! I say - those men will guess there's someone else on the island with Wilfrid, won't they? They might even make him tell all he knew - and where the boat is, and everything!'

'What shall we do?' said Anne. 'We'd better go after him.'

'Timmy will track him for us,' said George, getting up. 'Come on, Tim. Find Wilfrid. Find that silly disobedient boy Wilfrid!'

Timmy understood at once. He put his nose to the ground, found Wilfrid's scent, and began to walk away. 'Not too fast, Timmy,' said George, and he at once slowed down. George looked round at the little place among the bushes where they had been sitting. 'Had we better take a tin or two with us?' she said.

'Yes. Good idea,' said Julian. 'You just never know!'

He and Dick took a couple of tins each, stuffed uncomfortably into their pockets. Blow Wilfrid!

'He must have gone in this direction,' said Dick. 'I never spotted him slinking away, the little nuisance! I'm surprised Timmy didn't make a sound! Track him, Tim, track him!'

'Listen!' said Anne, suddenly, and she stopped. 'Listen!' They all listened - and didn't at all like what they heard. It was Wilfrid's voice, yelling in fright.

'Let me go! Let me go!'

And then a stern, loud and threatening voice came. 'Who are you with? Where are they? You're not alone, we're certain of that!'

'Quick - we must hide!' said Julian, angry and worried. 'Dick, look about for a good place and I will too.'

'No good,' said Dick. 'They'll beat everywhere for us. Better climb trees.'

'Good idea!' said Julian. 'Anne, come with me. I'll give you a shove up. Hurry, everybody! Hurry!'

Chapter 14

WILFRID HAS AN ADVENTURE ON HIS OWN

'What about Timmy? He can't climb,' said George, fearfully. 'He might be shot.'

'Put him under a bush and tell him to sit, sit, sit!' said Julian, urgently. 'He knows perfectly well what that means. Go on, George, quick.'

George took Timmy by the collar and led him to a very thick bush. She pushed him under it. He turned himself round, poked his nose out of the leaves, and looked at her in surprise.

'Sit, Timmy! Sit, and keep quiet!' said George. 'Sit, sit, sit - and keep quiet. Understand?'

'Woof,' said Timmy, very quietly, and withdrew his nose, so that nothing of him could be seen at all. He knew perfectly well what George meant. Clever old Timmy!

Dick was giving Anne a shove up a tree with drooping branches thick with leaves. 'Get as high as you can,' he said, in a low voice. 'And then stay put till you hear me call you. Don't be afraid. Old Timmy's down here to protect you!'

Anne gave him rather a small smile. She was not like George, fearless and always ready to rush into trouble. Anne was all for a peaceful life - but how could she have that if she was one of the Five!

The boys and George were now high up in trees, listening to the shouting going on. Apparently Wilfrid was not going to give away his friends - one up to him!

'How did you get here?' a man was shouting.

'In a boat,' said Wilfrid.

'Who was with you?' shouted another man.

'Nobody. I came alone,' said Wilfrid, perfectly truthfully. 'I wanted to visit the island. I'm an animal-lover and I heard that all the wild creatures here were tame.'

'A likely story that!' sneered a man's voice. 'Huh! Animal-lover!'

'All right then - look what I've got here in my pocket,' said Wilfrid, and apparently showed the man his baby hedgehog. 'He was trodden on by a horse - and I've been looking after him.'

'Very well - you can go back to your boat, and row away,' said the man. 'AT ONCE! mind. And don't look so scared. We shan't hurt you. We've business of our own here, and we don't want strangers round - not even silly little kids with hedgehogs in their pockets!'

Wilfrid took to his heels and fled. He felt lost now. He would never find the others - or the cove where his boat was. WHY had he disobeyed Julian? Had the others heard the men shouting at him? Which way should he go?

He had entirely lost his sense of direction and had no idea whether to go to the left or the right. He began to panic. Where could the others be? He must find them, he must! He ran through the trees, wishing that Timmy was with him. Then he stopped. Surely this was quite the wrong way? He turned and went in a different direction. No, this couldn't be right either, he didn't recognize a thing!

He thought he heard voices in the distance. He stood and listened. Could it be the others? If only George would tell Timmy to find him! But she wouldn't, in case he was shot at. Was that noise voices - or was it just the wind? Perhaps it was the others looking for him. Wilfrid rushed off towards the distant sound. But alas, it died down. It was only the wind!

The trees thinned out into bushes - and then Wilfrid suddenly saw the sea in the distance! Good! If he could get to it, he could walk round the shore till he came to his cove. He would know where he was then. He began to run towards the blue sea.

Through the bushes he went, and came out at last on to what seemed to be a very high cliff. Yes - there was the sea, below and beyond. If only he could scramble down the cliff he could bear to the right and at last come to his cove. He came to the edge of the cliff and looked down - and then he started back in fear. What was that noise - that awful, dreadful noise? It was like a giant wailing and wailing at the top of his voice, the wailing going up and down in the wind. Wilfrid found his knees were shaking. He simply didn't dare to go on. He sat down and tried to get his breath, putting his hands over his ears to keep out the horrible wailing.

And then he suddenly remembered something and heaved a sigh of heartfelt relief. 'Of course - these must be the Wailing Cliffs we were told about!' he thought thankfully. 'We heard about the Whispering Wood - and it does whisper - and the Wailing Cliffs - and they do wail! At least, it's really the wind, of course. But goodness, what a queer, strange sound!'

He sat for a while longer, then, feeling much bolder, he went to the edge of the great cliff, and looked over. He stared down in surprise.

'There's somebody down there - three or four people! Mustn't let them see me - they must belong to the men on the island! What are they doing down there?'

He lay down and peered over. Four men were there - but, as Wilfrid watched, they disappeared. Where had they gone? He craned over the cliff to see. 'There must be caves in the cliff, I suppose,' he said to himself. 'That's where they've gone! Gosh, I wish this wailing would stop. I shall start wailing myself in a minute!'

After some time voices came faintly up to him, as he lay watching, and he saw two men coming out on to the rocks below again. What were they carrying? A long, deep box - why, it looked exactly like one of the boxes in which the others had seen those beautiful little statues, packed in sawdust!

'So that's how they get them away from here - take them down through some passage in the cliffs - to a waiting boat. Where's the boat, thought I can't see one. Not arrived yet, perhaps.'

He watched with intense interest as the men carried out box after box and piled them on a great flat rock that abutted on a stretch of fairly calm water.

'Big boxes - little ones - my word, those men have been busy lately!' thought Wilfrid, wishing and wishing and wishing that the others were with him. 'I wonder what's in them. Not the bed of gold, that's certain. I bet it would be far too big to put into a boat. Have to be pulled to pieces first! Hallo - here comes another box - a small one this time. Good gracious, they'll soon need a steamer to take all these!'

Almost as he said the words, he saw a small steamer in the far distance! 'Well! There's the steamer, just as I said! I bet the boat will appear soon, and be loaded - and then chug off to the waiting steamer!'

But the steamer came no nearer, and no boats appeared. 'Waiting for the tide, I expect,' thought Wilfrid. 'Goodness, what will the others say when I tell them all this! They won't believe me! And I bet they won't scold me for going off by myself!'

He decided to go back and find the others and tell them what he had seen. He set off trying to remember the way. Surely he must be near the place where he had left them? And then quite suddenly, someone leapt out from behind a tree and caught hold of him!

'Let me go, let me go!' shouted Wilfrid, in a panic. And then he gave a cry of relief, as he suddenly saw Timmy running towards him.

'Timmy! Save me!'

But Timmy didn't come running to save him. He stood there, looking up at him, rather puzzled, while poor Wilfrid went on struggling, really frightened!

Then Wilfrid heard a giggle. A GIGGLE? Who in the world could be giggling just then? He forced himself to look round - and saw Dick and Anne, doing their best not to laugh, and George holding her sides. His captor let go of him and began to laugh too. It was Julian!

'I say - this is too bad! You gave me a most awful fright,' said Wilfrid. 'I've already been captured once this afternoon. Whatever do you think you're doing?'

'Where have you been, Wilfrid?' said Julian, rather sternly. 'I forbade you to go for a walk - and you went.'

'I know. I went off by myself - and a man caught me and scared me. Then I ran away and lost myself. I couldn't find any of you,' said poor Wilfrid. 'But my word, I saw something very very interesting on that walk of mine!'

'What?' asked Julian, at once.

'Let's sit down, and I'll tell you,' said Wilfrid. 'I feel quite shaky. You really were beasts to jump on me like that.'

'Never mind, Wilfrid,' said Anne, feeling sorry for the boy, who really did look rather shaken. 'Now go on, tell us everything that happened.'

Wilfrid sat down. He was still trembling a little. Everything seemed to have happened at once. He began to tell the others about the Wailing Cliffs, and all he had seen.

They all listened with intense interest. 'So that's the other way to the underground treasure-chamber - through a passage in the cliffs!' said Julian. 'I never thought of that! My word, that's something to know. I vote we go and explore the cliffs ourselves, when there's nobody about.'

'Well, it had better be in the evening,' said Wilfrid. 'Just in case we were spotted climbing down the cliffs to find the passage - if there is one, and I think there must be! Those men might be on the watch, now they know there's someone on the island. I bet they guess I'm not the only one - even though I told them I came alone.'

'I vote we have something to eat,' said George. 'We can talk over everything then. It's ages since we had a meal. Let's go and open some more tins, and plan what we're going to do tonight. This is getting too exciting for words. Isn't it, Timmy?'

'Woof,' agreed Timmy. Too exciting, he thought. Yes - and dangerous, too. He'd keep close to George that evening, as close as ever he could! If she went into danger, Timmy would be close by her side!

Chapter 15

JULIAN HAS AN EXCITING PLAN

The five children talked and talked, as they opened more tins and had a most peculiar meal of ham spread with fruit salad and beans. They finished up with another barley sugar each. George gave hers to Timmy who disposed of it with a crick-crack-swallow!

'Have we all got torches?' asked Julian. 'I know it will be bright moonlight tonight, but as we shall presumably be getting down - or up - dark caves, we shall want torches.'

Yes - they each had a torch. Wilfrid, for some reason, had two, rather small, but quite efficient.

'What's the plan going to be, Ju?' asked George, and Timmy gave a little whine, as if to say, 'Yes, tell us.' He sat by George, listening earnestly, with Wilfrid on the other side of him. At times he sniffed at the baby hedgehog still in the boy's pocket, and apparently quite happy there. Wilfrid had been busy catching insects for it, much to Timmy's interest.

'I propose that we go to the cliffs - the Wailing Cliffs - as soon as it's twilight, and make our way down,' said Julian. 'There is probably some kind of pathway down, I should think - even if only a rabbit-path. I'll lead the way down, of course. Anne and Wilfrid are to come between me and Dick, with George and Timmy behind.'

'Right!' said everyone.

'We are, of course, to make as little noise as possible,' said Julian. 'And do try not to send stones hurtling down the path or cliff just in case anyone's about! When we get down to the rocks, we'll let Wilfrid go ahead, because he saw where the men went in and out earlier on.'

Wilfrid felt suddenly important. My word - it was like planning an exploration! He suddenly remembered something - the wailing noise.

'I hope the girls won't be scared when they hear the awful wailing noise,' he said. 'It's only the wind screaming in and out of the holes and corners of the great cliffs.'

George made a scornful noise. 'Who's scared of the wind!' she said.

'Timmy might be,' said Julian, smiling. 'We know what makes the wailing. He doesn't! You may have to hold him when it begins, George. He'll be a bit restive.'

'He won't!' said George. 'Timmy's not afraid of anything in the world!'

'Oh yes, he is,' said Dick, at once. 'I know something that scares him dreadfully - makes him put his tail down and flop his ears.'

'You do not!' said George, angrily.

'Well, haven't you seen him when you speak sharply to him?' said Dick, with a chuckle. 'He goes all shaky in the legs!'

Everyone laughed except George. 'He does not,' she said. 'Nothing scares Timmy, not even me. So shut up, Dick.'

'It may be that it would be best for only one or two of us to go right into the depths of the caves,' went on Julian. 'If so, the rest must wait in hiding. Just keep on the look-out for any signal from me. I don't expect we shall see a soul down there tonight, but you never know. If there is a way through the cliffs to that underground chamber where we saw the golden statues, we shall be in real luck. We shall then be absolutely certain how things can be taken in and out.'

'Taken in? But I thought they had been there for ages,' said Dick, 'and were probably only taken out to sell. Smuggled out.'

'Well, I think it may be more than that,' said Julian. 'It might even be a central clearing-ground for a great gang of high-class thieves, who would hide valuable stolen goods there till it was safe to sell them. However, that's only guessing!'

'I think somebody's discovered the underground chamber, full of that rich old man's treasures, and is taking them out bit by bit,' said Dick. 'Anyway, whatever it is, it's awfully exciting. To think we know so much!'

'All because we went down the well to get some water!' said Anne.

'Put on your sweaters,' said Julian. 'It may be freezing cold in the wind that rages round those cliffs!'

'I'm longing to start!' said George. 'It's an adventure, this - do you hear that, Timmy? An adventure!'

'Anything more, Julian?' asked Anne. Julian always sounded so very grown-up when he gave them a plan of campaign. She felt very proud of him.

'That's the lot,' said Julian, 'except that we'll have some sort of a meal before we go this evening. Wilfrid will have to lead the way for us, as he's the only one who knows it - but when we come to the cliff, I'll lead you down. Can't have anyone missing a footstep and rolling headlong, frightening any robber or smuggler!'

'Do you hear that, Timmy?' said George, and Timmy whined, and put a paw on George's knee as if to say, 'It's a pity you haven't sure feet like mine, with rubber pads beneath, so that your footing is always sure!'

George patted his paw. 'Yes - you've fine sure feet, Tim. I wish I could buy some like them!'

The time seemed to go very very slowly after that. Everyone was eager to start, and kept looking at their watches! The sun left a bright glow in the sky, so they would probably start more or less in daylight, which would, however, soon fade into twilight.

They had another meal, but strangely enough, nobody felt very hungry! 'We're too excited!' said Julian, giving Timmy a biscuit. Timmy was the only one who didn't seem at all excited. As for George, she fidgeted and fidgeted until everyone was quite tired of her!

At last they started off. Wilfrid led them at first, as he knew the way. Actually he found that he didn't really know it - it was the loud wind that guided him, just as it had done before. 'Awfully like far-off voices shouting to one another,' he said, and everyone at once agreed.

When they came near to the cliff, the sound gradually changed into the mournful wailing noise that gave the cliffs their name. 'EEEE-ee-OOOOO-oo-EEEEEEEEEAH-OOO!'

'Not very nice,' said Anne, shivering a little. 'It sounds as if someone is crying and sobbing and howling!'

'Good name for this place - Wailing Cliff,' said Dick. 'I say - what a wind up here! I'm glad my hair's my own! It would certainly be blown off if it weren't! Hang on to old Timmy, George - he's more blowable than we are - not so heavy!'

George put her hand on Timmy's collar at once. How DREADFUL if Timmy were to be blown over the cliff! He gave her a grateful lick. He didn't like the wind here very much - it had a truly miserable voice!

They came to the edge of the cliff and looked down cautiously, in case anyone should be on the rocks below. But, except for some big gulls preening their feathers there, there was no sign of life.

'No boats about - no steamer - nothing,' said Dick. 'All clear, Julian!'

Julian had been looking for a good path down the cliff. There didn't seem to be a continuous one. 'We'll have to go so far - then climb down a bit - then walk along that ledgy bit, see - then climb down that slanting rock - the great big one - and get down on to the more level rocks. OK everyone?'

'I'll let Timmy go first,' said George. 'He is so sure-footed and will know the best way. Go on, Timmy - lead us down!'

Timmy understood at once and went in front of Julian. He took the first little path down the cliff, slid down the next bit, walked along the ledge that Julian had pointed out, and then stood and waited for everyone. He gave a little bark as if to say, 'Come along. It's easy! Follow me!'

They all followed, some more carefully than others. George and Wilfrid were least careful, and poor Wilfrid lost his footing and slid quite a long way on his behind. He didn't like it at all, and looked quite scared!

'Watch your feet, now, Wilfrid,' said Julian. 'It's getting a bit dark, so don't try any funny tricks. You tried to jump over that big stone instead of stepping over carefully. I really don't want to send Timmy down to the bottom of the cliff to pick up your pieces!'

At last they were all down the cliff, and on the rocks below. The tide was out, so that waves did not splash up and soak them. Anne suddenly slipped into a pool and made her shoes wet, but that didn't matter. They were only rubber ones.

'Now - exactly where did you see those men, Wilfrid?' asked Julian, stopping on a big flat rock. Wilfrid jumped beside him, and pointed.

'See the cliff over there? See that funny rock shaped rather like a bear? Well, that's where I saw the men. They went by that rock, and disappeared.'

'Right,' said Julian. 'Now, no more talking please - though this wailing sound would drown almost anything. Follow me!'

He went over the rocks towards the big bear-like one that Wilfrid had pointed to. The others followed, a little tide of excitement welling up inside them. Anne caught hold of Wilfrid's hand, and squeezed it. 'Exciting, isn't it?' she said, and Wilfrid nodded eagerly. He knew he would have been scared stiff by himself - but with the others it was an adventure - a really exciting adventure!

They came to the bear-like rock. Near it was a dark place in the cliff - a way in? 'That's where the men came out, Julian,' said Wilfrid, keeping his voice low. 'Do we go in there?'

'We do,' said Julian. 'I'm going in first and I'm going to stand quite still and listen, as soon as I get the sound of the wind and sea out of my ears. If I hear nothing I'll whistle, see? Then you can all come in too.'

'Right!' said everyone, thrilled. They watched as Julian went to the dark slit-like opening. He paused and looked inside. It was so dark that he knew they would all need their torches! He switched on his powerful one and shone it into the passage. He saw a ditch that ran slanting upwards for some way, and on either side, a rocky ledge, not too rough. Water ran down the rocky ditch and bubbled out beside him, to join the sea over the rocks.

'I'm just going into the cliff tunnel a little way, to see if I can hear anything or anyone,' he said. 'Wait here.' He disappeared inside the dark opening and everyone waited in impatient excitement.

A gull suddenly swooped down close to their heads. 'Ee-ooo, ee-ooo, EEE-OOO!' it screeched and made them all jump violently. Wilfrid almost fell off his rock, and clutched at George. Timmy growled, and looked up angrily at the seagull. Silly bird, frightening everyone like that!

There came a low whistle, and Julian appeared again, his torch switched on. 'All clear,' he said. 'I can't hear a sound inside the opening, and I've been some way along. It's not hard going. There's a funny little stream flowing down, and a ledge either side we can walk on. Very convenient! Now, no talking please - and be careful even of your whispers - every sound seems to be magnified in here. Keep hold of Timmy, George, in the steepest places.'

Timmy gave a little whine of surprise when George took him inside the cliff. At once his whine was magnified all round them, and everyone jumped. Timmy didn't like it at all.

George took firm hold of Timmy's collar. 'You're to keep close by me,' she whispered, 'and you're not to make a sound. This is an adventure, Timmy - a big adventure - and you're in it as much as any of us. Come along!'

And there they go, all of them, climbing up the dark passage into the cliff! What will they find - what will they see? No wonder their hearts beat fast and loudly, no wonder Timmy keeps close to George. An adventure? He must be on guard then - anything might happen in an adventure!

Chapter 16

A QUEER JOURNEY UNDERGROUND

It was very dark inside the cliff. The children's torches made bright streaks everywhere, and were very useful indeed for seeing the safest places to tread. As Julian had told the others, there was a curious little stream flowing down the middle of the steep passage, with uneven ledges on each side of it. It had worn this little channel for itself during the many many years it had flowed down inside the cliff!

'It's probably water draining from the surface of the cliffs,' said Julian in a low voice, picking his way carefully. 'Be careful here - the ledges are very slippery!'

'Oooh!' said Wilfrid, treading on a slippery bit, and finding one of his feet in ice-cold water.

The echo took up the noise at once. 'OOOOH-OOOOOOH-OOOOOH!' Poor Wilfrid's little 'Oooh' echoed up and down and all round them! It was very weird indeed and nobody liked it. Anne pressed close to Julian, and he squeezed her arm comfortingly.

'Sorry about my Oooh,' said Wilfrid, in a low voice. 'My oooh, oooh, oooh!' said the echo at once, and George simply couldn't help giving a giggle, which at once repeated itself a score of times!

'You really will have to be quiet now,' came Julian's serious voice, almost in a whisper. 'I have a feeling we're coming to some big opening. There's suddenly a great draught blowing down this steep passage - I can feel it round my head.'

The others felt it too, as they climbed higher up the steep passage, trying to avoid the tiny stream that splashed down its worn channel. It made a nice little noise - very cheerful, Anne thought - and gleamed brightly in the light of their torches.

Julian wondered how in the world anyone could take crates or boxes down such a steep dark passage! 'It's wide enough, I suppose,' he thought. 'But only just - and the bends in it must be very awkward for boxes to get round! I do hope we don't meet anyone round a bend, carrying a crate or two! My word - the draught is quite a wind now. There must be an opening somewhere.'

'Ju - we've not only gone upwards, we've gone a good way forward too,' whispered Anne. 'Wasn't the old castle somewhere in this direction?'

'Yes - I suppose it would be,' answered Julian, stopping to think. 'Gosh - I wonder if this passage comes up in one of its cellars! An old castle like that would have huge cellars - and probably a dungeon or two for prisoners! Let me think - we must have left the cliff behind now - and yes - I think we may be heading for the castle. Why didn't I think of that before!'

'Well, then - the well-wall must run down beside the castle foundations!' said Dick, in much too loud a voice. The echo made everyone jump violently, and Julian stopped climbing and hissed at Dick. 'Whisper, can't you, idiot! You nearly made me jump out of my skin!'

'Skin, skin, skin!' said the echo, in a peculiar whisper that made George want to laugh.

'Sorry!' whispered back Dick.

'I think you may be right about the well-wall running down beside the foundations of the castle,' Julian said, whispering again. 'I never thought of that. The castle wasn't very far from the well. It would probably have enormous cellars spreading underground.'

'The wall in the well that that queer little door was in, was terrifically thick,' said Dick. 'I bet I was looking into one of the castle cellars, when I peeped through it!'

This was all very interesting. Julian thought about it as they went on and on through the endless passage. It ran more or less level now, and was easy to walk through, for it was much wider.

'I think this part of the passage was man-made,' said Julian, stopping and facing the others, his face bright in the light of their torches. He went on in a loud whisper, 'Up through the cliff the passage was a natural one, awfully difficult to climb - but here it's quite different - look at these old bricks here - probably put there to strengthen the tunnel.'

'Yes - a secret way from the castle to the sea!' said Dick, almost forgetting to keep his voice down, in his excitement. 'I say - isn't it thrilling!'

Everyone began to feel even more excited - all except Timmy, who didn't much like dark, secret passages, and couldn't imagine why Julian was taking them for such a gloomy and peculiar walk. He had splashed solemnly through the stream the whole time, finding the stone ledges much too slippery for his paws.

The draught grew stronger and was very cold indeed. 'We're coming near to the opening where the draught comes from,' whispered Julian. 'All quiet, now, please!'

They were as quiet as possible, and Anne began to feel almost sick with excitement. Where were they coming to? Then suddenly Julian gave a low exclamation.

'Here we are! An iron gate!'

They all tried to crowd round Julian to see. The gate was a big strong one, with criss-cross bars of iron. They could easily see between the bars, and they shivered in the draught that swept through the great gate.

Julian shone his torch through the bars, his hand shaking in excitement. The bright ray of light ran all round what looked like a stone room - quite small - with a stout, nail-studded door at the far end. This door was wide open, and it was through this that the steady draught blew.

'This is a cellar - or a dungeon, more likely!' said Julian. 'I wonder if the gate is locked.'

He shook it - and it swung open quite easily, as if it had been well-oiled! Julian stepped into the dungeon flashing his torch all round the dark and dismal little place.

He shivered. 'It's cold as ice, even on this warm day!' he said. 'My word, I wonder how many poor, miserable prisoners have been kept down here in the cold!'

'Look - here's a staple in the wall,' said Dick, standing beside him, examining the half-hoop of iron, deeply embedded in the stone wall. 'I suppose the unhappy prisoner was tied up to this, to make his punishment even worse.'

Anne shivered. 'How could people be so cruel?' she said, her vivid imagination seeing wretched men here, with perhaps only crusts of bread to eat, water to drink, no warmth, no bed, only the stone floor!

'Perhaps some of them escaped out of the gate, and went down the cliff-passage,' she said, hopefully.

'No - it's much more likely that the passage was used to get rid of the prisoners,' said Dick. 'They could be dragged down to the sea and drowned - and nobody would ever know.'

'Don't tell me things like that,' said Anne. 'It makes me feel I shall hear groans and cries. I don't like this place. Let's go.'

'I hate it too,' said George. 'And Timmy's tail is right down. I feel as if this horrid dungeon is full of miserable memories. Julian, do let's go.'

Julian walked over to the nail-studded door, and went through the doorway. He looked out on to a stone paved passage, with stone walls and ceiling. He could see other doors iron-barred, along a dismal stone passage. He came back to the others.

'Yes - these are the castle dungeons,' he said. 'I expect the castle cellars are somewhere near too - where they stored wine and food and other things. Come on - let's explore. I can't hear a sound. I think this place is absolutely empty.'

They all followed Julian down the stone passage, looking in at each miserable dungeon as they passed. Horrible! Dirty, damp, cold, bare - poor, poor prisoners of long ago!

At the end of the passage was another iron-barred door, but that too was wide open. They went through it and came out into an enormous cellar. Old boxes were there, old worm-eaten chests, broken chairs, loose papers that rustled as their feet touched them - the kind of junk that can be found in a thousand cellars! It all smelt rather musty, though, as Julian said, the draught that blew everywhere took away some of the smell.

They came to some stone steps and went up them. At the top was another great door, with an enormous bolt on it. 'Fortunately the bolt is our side,' said Julian, and slid it out of its socket. He was surprised that it went so smoothly - he had expected it to be rusted and stiff. 'It's been oiled recently,' he said, shining his torch on it. 'Well, well - other people have been here not long ago, and used this door. We'd better go quietly in case they are still here!'

Anne's heart began to beat loudly again. She hoped there was no one waiting round a corner to jump out at them! 'Be careful, Julian,' she said. 'Somebody may have heard us! They may be waiting to ambush us. They...'

'All right, Anne - don't worry!' said Julian. 'Old Timmy would give us a warning growl if he heard a single foot-step!'

And good gracious - at that VERY moment Timmy did give a growl - an angry, startled growl that made everyone jump, and then stand still, holding their breath.

Dick looked round at Timmy, who was growling again. His head was down and he was looking at something on the floor. What was it? Dick swung down his torch to see. Then he gave a small laugh. 'It's all right. We don't need to be scared yet. Look what Timmy's growling at!'

They all looked down - and saw a great fat toad, its brilliant eyes staring steadily up at them. As they exclaimed at it, it turned aside, and crawled slowly and clumsily to a little damp spot in the corner of the wall.

'I've never seen such a big toad in my life!' said Anne. 'It must be a hundred years old! Goodness, Timmy, you made me jump when you suddenly growled like that!'

The toad squatted down in its corner, facing them. It seemed to glare at poor Timmy. 'Come away, Tim,' said Dick. 'Toads can ooze out a very nasty-smelling, nasty-tasting stuff. Never bite a toad!'

Julian had now gone through the door at the top of the steps. He gave a loud exclamation - so loud that the others rushed to him in alarm, wondering what was exciting him.

'Look!' said Julian, shining his torch into the dark space beyond. 'See where we've come to! Did you ever see such a store-house of wonders!'

Chapter 17
IN THE TREASURE CHAMBER

Julian's torch shone steadily into the vast room, which seemed to have no end! The others shone their torches too, and Timmy pressed between their legs to see what the excitement was.

What a sight! They were actually in the enormous chamber that the boys had seen through the opening, in the well-wall! What a place it was - absolutely vast, thought Anne, awed at the size, the height and the great silence.

'There are the golden statues!' said Dick, going over to a group of them. 'Wonderful! Queer faces they have, though - not like ours. And look how their slanting eyes gleam when we shine our torches on them. Makes them look as if they're almost alive, and looking at us.'

Anne suddenly gave a cry and rushed over to something. 'The golden bed!' she said. 'I wished I could lie on one - and now I shall!' And with that she climbed on to a vast four-poster bed, with a great canopy, now rotting to pieces.

The bed gave a mournful creak, and the part that Anne was lying on, suddenly subsided. The canopy collapsed and Anne disappeared in a cloud of dust. The bed had, quite literally, fallen to pieces! Poor Anne.

The others helped her up and Timmy looked at the clouds of dust in surprise. What was Anne doing, making such a dust! He sneezed loudly, and then sneezed again. Anne sneezed too. She scrambled quickly out of the collapsed bed and dusted herself down.

'It has a gold, carved head-piece, and gold legs and end-piece,' said Dick, shining his torch on it. 'What a monster of a bed, though - I should think six people could sleep in it at once! What a pity it has been lost here so long - all the hangings fell to pieces as soon as Anne climbed on the bed-part! What a dust!'

There was no doubt about it, there were priceless treasures in this vast, underground cellar. The children could not find the sword with the jewelled handle, nor the necklace of rubies, which Julian thought were probably locked away in one of the chests. But they found many other wonderful things.

'Look in this chest - this beautiful carved chest!' called Anne. 'Gold cups and plates and dishes. Still bright and clean!'

'And look what's in here!' shouted George. 'Wrapped up in stuff that falls to pieces when I touch it!'

They crowded round a great enamelled box. In it was a set of animals carved out of some lovely green stone. They were absolutely perfect, and, when Anne tried to stand them up, each of them stood as proudly as once they did many many years ago when little princes and princesses played with them.

'They're made of green jade,' said Julian. 'Beautiful! Goodness knows how much they're worth! They should be in some museum, not mouldering away in this cellar.'

'Why didn't those collectors take these - and the golden statues - and all the other things?' wondered Anne.

'Well, that's obvious,' said Julian. 'For one thing this is a secret cellar, I should think, and nobody would be able to get into it unless they knew the secret way to it. There's probably a sliding panel, or hidden door that leads to it, somewhere in the castle above. It's very old, and ruined in many parts - and some of the walls have fallen in - so I suppose it was pretty impossible to get to the cellars, even if the secret way was known!'

'Yes - but what about the way we came up,' said Dick. 'From the sea - up the cliff passage!'

'Well - I don't know exactly why that hasn't been used before,' said Julian, 'though I could make a guess! Did you notice that great heap of fallen rocks near the entrance to the cliff passage? I should think that that part of the cliff fell at one time, and hid the passage completely - blocked it up. Then maybe a storm came, and the sea shifted some of the rocks - and lo and behold, there was the secret passage - open again!'

'And somebody found it - somebody perhaps who had heard the old legends about the castle of Whispering Island!' said Anne.

'A collector of old things, do you think?' asked George. 'What about those two men on the island - the ones we saw in the courtyard - do you suppose they know of this entrance?'

'Yes, probably,' said Julian. 'And it's likely they were put on guard, in case anyone else found it, and came to rob the secret chamber. The things here are priceless! Those men are not there to guard the animals on the island, as they were in the old lady's day. She had genuine keepers, like that nice old man Lucas, who told us about this island the other day.'

'You think these men are in somebody's pay then - somebody who knows about this great chamber under the castle, and wants to get the centuries-old treasures?' said Dick.

'Yes,' said Julian. 'And what's more I don't believe that the real owner of the island - the great-nephew of the old lady who owned it, even knows they're here, or that anyone is taking things from his island. For all we know he may live in America or Australia, and not care tuppence about his island!'

'How extraordinary!' said Anne. 'If I owned an island like this, I'd live here and never leave it. And all the animals and birds would be protected as they once were, and...'

'Dear Anne - what a pity it isn't yours!' said Julian, ruffling her hair. 'But now, the thing is - what are we going to do about all this? We'll talk about it when we're back at the cottage. My word, it's getting late! It will be pitch dark outside, unless the moon is up and the sky is clear of clouds!'

'Well, come on then, let's go,' said Dick, making for the great nail-studded door. Then, as Timmy suddenly gave a blood-curdling growl, he stopped in fright. They had shut the door - but now it was opening. Somebody was coming into the great underground chamber! Who could it be?

'Quick - hide!' said Julian, and he pushed the two girls behind a great chest. The others were near the golden bed and they crouched behind it at once, Dick's hand on Timmy's collar. He had managed to stop the dog from growling, but was afraid that Timmy would begin again at any moment!

A man came into the room - one of the two big fellows that the children had seen in the courtyard. He didn't seem to have heard Timmy growling, for he sauntered in, whistling lightly. He shone his torch all round, and then called loudly.

'Emilio! Emilio!'

There was no answer at all. The man yelled again, and then an answer came from beyond the door, and hurrying footsteps could be heard. Then in came the other big rough fellow, and looked round, shining his torch. He lighted an oil lamp on a box, and switched off his torch.

'Always you sleep, Emilio!' growled the first man. 'Always you are late! You know the boat comes tonight to take the next batch of goods - have you the list? We must wrap them up quickly and take them to the shore. That little statue has to go, I know!'

He went over to the statue of a boy, whose eyes gleamed with emeralds. 'Well, boy?' said the man, 'you're going out into the world! How'll you like that after being in the dark so long? Don't glare at me like that, or I'll box your ears!'

Apparently the golden boy went on glaring, for the man gave his head a sharp smack. The other fellow came over and shifted a long, deep box over from the wall to the little golden statue. Then he began to wrap it up carefully, rolling material round and round it from head to foot while the golden boy stood patiently.

'What time is Lanyon coming for it?' asked Emilio. 'Have I time to wrap another?'

'Yes - that one over there,' said the first fellow, pointing. Emilio went whistling over to it, passing the chest behind which the girls were hiding. They crouched right to the floor, afraid of being seen. But Emilio was sharp-eyed, and thought he saw something move as he passed by the chest. He stopped. What was that poking out by the side of the chest - a foot? A FOOT!

Emilio rushed round the chest, his torch switched on again. He gave a loud shout. 'Carlo! There's someone here! Come quickly!'

Carlo, the second man, dropped what he was holding and raced round to Emilio, who had now pulled the girls roughly to their feet.

'What are you doing here? How did you get in?' shouted Emilio.

Julian shot out from his hiding-place at once, followed by Dick and Wilfrid. George was doing all she could to hold back Timmy, who was now deafening everyone with his angry barks. He did his best to get away from George, but she was afraid he might fly at Emilio's throat. The two men were full of amazement to see the five children and Timmy!

'Keep that dog back or I'll shoot him,' said Carlo, producing a gun. 'Who are you? What do you mean by coming into this place?'

'We came by boat - but the boat got washed out to sea,' said Julian. 'We've been camping on the island. We just - er - wandered into this place by mistake.'

'By mistake! Well, I can tell you that you've certainly made the biggest mistake in your life!' said Carlo. 'You'll have to stay here for quite a long time - till our job's done, at any rate!'

'What's your job?' asked Julian, bluntly.

'Wouldn't you like to know?' said Carlo. 'Well - one part of it is to guard the island, and keep off strangers! Now, we've jobs to do tonight and tomorrow, and I'm afraid you're going to have a miserable time! You'll stay down here in this old cellar till we come back again - and what will happen to you after that, I don't know, because I'll have to tell my employer you've been spying down here. I wouldn't be surprised if he doesn't hand you over to the police - or lock you up down here for a month, on bread and water!'

Timmy growled very fiercely indeed, and tugged hard to get away from George and fly at this hateful man. She hung on to him for all she was worth, though how she longed to let him leap at the man and get him on the ground!

'Better go, Carlo, or we'll miss that boat out there,' said Emilio, grumpily. 'We'll deal with these kids when we get back!' He shouldered the box into which he had put the wrapped statue, and started for the door. Carlo followed him, backing all the time to make sure that George did not set Timmy on to him. He shut the great door with a loud bang, and shot the bolt.

'Don't say anything for a minute in case they are listening outside the door,' said Julian. So they all stood in silence, Anne's knees trembling a little. Oh dear - how unlucky to be caught like this!

'Relax!' said Julian, at last. 'You all look so stiff and tense!'

'Well, I should think so!' said Dick. 'I don't particularly want to stay shut up here till those men deign to come back and do a bit more stealing. Suppose they never came back! We'd be here for keeps!'

'No, Dick!' said Anne, and to everyone's surprise, she began to laugh. 'We can easily escape!'

'What - through that locked and bolted door?' said Dick. 'Not a hope!'

'But we can easily escape!' said Anne, and George suddenly brightened up and nodded her head, smiling. 'Oh yes - of course! Don't look so solemn, Dick! Look up there!'

Dick looked up to where Anne was pointing. 'What am I supposed to look at?' he said. 'The old stone wall?'

'No - just there - over the top of that tall chest,' said Anne.

Dick looked - and then a large smile came over his face. 'WHAT an idiot I am! That's the old iron door in the side of the old well-wall, isn't it - the opening I looked through! It looks just like an ordinary ventilation hole from down here - and I don't really believe anyone would ever notice it except us, who know what it is. I see what you're getting at, Anne!'

'Good old Anne!' said George, realizing what Anne had in mind. 'Of course - we've only got to climb up to that hole in the wall, open the door there, and then go up the well - and we're safe!'

'Yes. But it's easier said than done,' said Julian, soberly. 'We've got to get hold of the rope, and climb right up it to the top - not very easy!'

'Suppose the rope's at the top, with the bucket hanging on the hook?' said Anne. 'We'd never reach it then!'

'We'll think of something!' said Julian. 'Anyway, it's our only hope of escape. Now - we'll push that huge, high chest or wardrobe or whatever it is, right over against the wall, under that opening into the well - and then we'll haul a table on top of that - there's a sturdy little one over there. Come on! We'll be through that opening in no time, and up the well. What a shock for dear Emilio and Carlo when they come back, and find that the birds have flown!'

Chapter 18

A MOST EXCITING TIME!

It was quite a job pushing the heavy chest over towards the stone wall of the castle. It took all of them, shoving with all their might, to do it.

'We seem to be making an awful noise with the chest scraping over the floor,' panted Dick. 'I hope we're not heard!'

Timmy wished he could help. He kept jumping up and pressing his paws on the side of the chest, but Dick stopped him. 'You're getting in the way,' he said. 'You go and sit near the door and warn us if you hear those men coming.'

So Timmy ran to the door and sat there, his head cocked to one side, listening, while the others went on shoving the heavy chest along. At last it was in position. Then came the job of hoisting a stout little wooden table on top. Julian climbed up to the top of the chest to take the table from Dick, but just couldn't manage it, it was so heavy and solid. So Wilfrid climbed up beside him, and between the two of them they pulled up the little oblong table, and set it firmly on top of the chest. Julian stood on it - and found he could easily reach the little iron door, that led into the old well.

'Good,' he said, and he gave the door a hard shove. It shook a little, but didn't budge. He gave it another hard push. 'What's up?' said Dick, climbing up beside Julian. 'It must open - the bolt's not there any more - it fell off into the well. I expect it's rusted a little again. We'll both shove it together.'

The girls watched the boys anxiously, dreading every moment to hear the two men returning. Together the boys pushed at the iron door - and it groaned and then gave way, swinging open inside the well-wall! To the boys' delight, there was the rope, hanging near them!

'We've done it!' Dick called down softly to the girls. 'We'll come down and help you up to the table here - then we'll try our luck up the well.'

The girls were soon on the chest top. There wasn't room for everyone on the table, and the boys were debating what to do next.

'You go up the rope, Julian,' said Dick. 'You can climb up to the top and get out and look around and make sure there's no one about. Then Wilfrid can climb up - do you think you can, Wilfrid?'

'Of course,' said the boy. 'Then I can help Julian to wind up the girls!'

'Right!' said Dick. 'I'll stay here with the girls, and help each of them on to the rope, first Anne - and you two can wind the rope up, with her on it. Then George can go - and I'll follow last of all and shut the well-door.'

'And when the men come they won't know how in the world we got out of the treasure chamber!' said Anne, grinning. 'What a shock for them!'

'When you've all gone up safely, I'll climb in myself and shut the door,' said Dick. 'Ready, Ju? I'll shine my torch for you!'

Julian nodded. He squeezed through the old iron door, reached out for the rope, and swung on it for a moment. Then up he went, hand-over-hand, till he reached the top, a little out of breath, but delighted to be out in the open air and the bright moonlight. It seemed almost as light as day!

He called down the well. 'I'm at the top, Dick, and all's well. Moon's out, and all is quiet.'

'You next, Wilfrid,' said Dick. 'Can you get hold of the rope all right, do you think? For pity's sake don't fall into the water. My torch will give you plenty of light.'

'Don't worry about me! It's just like being on the ropes at gym in school,' said Wilfrid, scornfully. He swung his legs into the opening, leapt at the rope, hung on, and began to climb up just like a monkey.

Julian's voice came down the well again, echoing hollowly, sounding rather queer. 'Wilfrid's safely up. Now send Anne - we'll wind up the rope for her, so that she doesn't need to climb, only to hang on.'

Through the opening went Anne, and sat on its ledge. 'Can you swing the rope a bit, Julian?' she called. 'It's rather far for me to jump.'

'Good gracious! For goodness sake be careful!' called Julian, in alarm. 'Tell Dick to help you.'

But the well-wall opening was so small that Dick couldn't even look through it while Anne was sitting there. 'Don't jump till you've got firm hold of the rope, Anne,' he told his sister, anxiously.

'Is Ju swinging it to and fro? Can you see it clearly? It's so dark in the well, and my torch isn't too good now!'

'Yes. I can see it,' said Anne. 'It bumped against my legs then, and I just missed getting it. Here it comes again - I've got it! I'm going to hold on to it tightly and drop off the ledge. Here I go!'

She sounded very much braver than she felt. She let herself drop off the ledge, and there she swung on the thick rope, with the black water far below! 'Wind me up, Ju!' she called, and held on as the two boys at the top exerted all their strength. Dick saw her disappear up the well, and heaved a sigh of relief. Now for George.

He climbed down from the table and chest and looked for George and Timmy, shining his torch everywhere. To his utmost surprise he couldn't see them! He called softly. 'Timmy!'

A small, stifled whine came from somewhere. Dick frowned. 'George - where are you? For goodness sake buck up and come out from where you're hiding. Those men might come back at any time! Don't play the fool.'

A dark curly head poked out from behind a large box near the door, and George spoke in a very fierce voice. 'You know Timmy can't hang on to a rope! He'd fall and be drowned. I think you are all horrid to forget that he can't climb. I'm staying here with him. You go on up the well.'

'Certainly not!' said Dick at once. 'I shall stay here with you. I suppose it's no use asking you to let me stay with Tim, while you climb up?'

'Not the slightest use. He's my dog, and I'm jolly well sticking by him,' said George. 'He'd never desert me, I'm sure of that.'

Dick knew George only too well when she was in one of her determined moods. Nothing, absolutely nothing, would make her change her mind!

'All right, George - I expect I'd feel the same if Timmy was mine,' said Dick. 'I'm staying here with you, though!'

'No,' said George. 'We'll be all right, Tim and I.'

Dick ran to the chest and table that he had used to get up to the opening in the well-wall, and climbed quickly to the top. He swung himself through, sat on the edge of the opening and called up the well.

'Julian? Are you there? Listen - George won't leave Timmy because he can't climb up the rope. So I'm staying with her!'

No sooner had he said these words, than he heard someone unlocking the door of the room they were in! Timmy growled so fiercely that Dick's heart jumped in fear. Suppose Tim leapt at those men - and one of them had a gun!

George heard the noise of the key turning in the door, and quick as lightning she went behind a pile of boxes with Timmy. 'Go for them, Timmy, just as soon as you can!' she said. 'Get them down before they can hurt you.'

'Woof,' said Timmy, understanding every word. He stood beside George, ears cocked, showing his teeth in a snarl. The door opened, and a man came in, carrying a lantern. 'I've brought you a light,' he began - and then Timmy leapt at him!

Crash! Down went the lantern and the light went out. Down went the man too, shouting in fear as the big dog leapt on his chest, his hairy face so close that the man could feel the dog's hot breath. The man's head struck against the edge of a chest, and he was suddenly still and silent.

'Knocked out, I do believe!' said Dick to himself, and very cautiously shone his torch round. Yes - there was the man on the floor, eyes closed, unmoving!

George was at the open door, looking out, Timmy by her side. 'Dick! I'm taking Timmy down the secret way through the cliffs. I'll be perfectly safe with him.'

'I must tell Julian,' said Dick. 'He's still at the top of the well, expecting you and Timmy. You go as quickly as you can - and be careful. Timmy will look after you.'

George disappeared at top speed, her shoes making no sound. She looked anxious but not afraid. 'Good as a boy!' thought Dick, for the hundredth time. 'Every bit as good as a boy. Doesn't turn a hair! Now I'd better get back to that opening in the well, and tell Julian that George and Timmy have gone down the secret way. That man is still knocked out, thank goodness!'

He was soon on top of the chest and table, and peering through the hole. He could see the light from Julian's torch far away at the top, the light flashing on and off as if signalling. Dick called up 'Julian!'

'Oh, so you're still there,' said Julian, sounding very relieved. 'Anything happened?'

'Yes,' said Dick. 'I'll tell you in a minute. Swing the rope a bit, Ju.'

The rope swung near Dick, and he caught it, and was just about to swing himself into the well when he heard a noise. He looked back into the vast room, which was now in darkness, for he had switched off his torch.

Someone came in hurriedly. 'What's happened? Why didn't you...!' Then he stopped as the light from the lantern he carried picked out the figure of the man on the floor. He gave an exclamation and knelt down by him. Dick grinned to himself - what about a nice little shock for this fellow? He reached down to the sturdy little table, gave it a shove that sent it hurtling down to the floor, and then swung himself into the well on the rope. He was just in time to see the table fall with a crash by the man with the lantern, and to hear him shout in fear - and then Julian and Wilfrid hauled him up the well, still grinning to himself. 'Bit of a shock for those men!' he thought. 'George and Timmy disappeared - and the rest of us gone most mysteriously! Pull, Julian, pull! I've a nice little story to tell you!'

And soon he was up on the well-wall, telling the others what had happened. They laughed in delight.

'Good old George! Good old Timmy!'

'George knows the way down the cliff passage all right - and if she didn't, Timmy would take her safely,' said Julian. 'We'll go down on the rocks and meet her, I think. She should be all right because the moon's out now, and everything is as light as day!'

And off they all went through the wood, laughing when they thought how puzzled and mystified those men must be!

Chapter 19

ANNE IS A TIGER!

In the meantime, George was hurrying down the secret way through the cliffs. Timmy ran first in front and then behind, his ears pricked for any possible pursuer or danger. He could hear no one. Good! Both he and George were glad to hear the babbling of the funny little underground stream as it ran swiftly down towards the sea. 'It's a nice friendly sound, Tim,' said George. 'I like it.'

Once or twice they slipped from the wet ledges into the water, and George felt a bit afraid of falling and breaking her torch. 'It wouldn't be much fun if we had to go down this passage in the pitch dark!' she told Timmy, and he gave a little woof of agreement.

'What's that bright light?' said George, suddenly, stopping in the passage. 'Look, Tim - awfully bright. Is it someone coming with a lantern?'

Timmy gave a loud bark and rush in front. He knew that lantern all right! It was the one that somebody sometimes hung in the sky, and that George called the Moon. Didn't she know?

George soon did know, of course, and cried out in delight. 'Oh, it's the moon, of course, dear old moon. I'd forgotten it was a moonlight night tonight. I wonder where the others are, Timmy. You'll have to smell them out!'

Timmy already knew where they were! He had caught their scent on the wind. They weren't very far away! He barked joyously. Soon they would all be together again!

He and George came out of the tunnel in the cliff and found themselves on the rocks. The sea was splashing over them, and the waves gleamed brightly in the bright moonlight.

George saw something moving in the distance. She put her hand on Timmy's collar. 'Careful, Tim,' she said. 'Is that someone coming over there? Stay by me.'

But Timmy disobeyed for once! He leapt away and splashed through pools, over seaweed, over slippery rocks, barking madly. 'Timmy!' called George, not recognising who was coming. 'TIMMY! COME BACK!'

And then she saw who were coming over the rock in the bright moonlight, picking their way through the slippery seaweed. She waved and shouted joyfully.

'Here I am! I've escaped all right!'

What a joyful meeting that was! They all sat down on a convenient rock and talked nineteen to the dozen, telling each other what had happened. And then a big wave suddenly came up and splashed all over them!

'Blow!' said Julian. 'Tide's coming in, I suppose. Come on - let's get back to Whispering Wood.'

Anne gave a most enormous yawn. 'I don't know what the time is,' she said. 'And it's so bright everywhere that I'm not sure if it's day or night. All I know is that I'm suddenly most awfully SLEEPY.'

Julian glanced at his watch. 'It's very late,' he said. 'Long past our bedtime. What shall we do - risk sleeping here on the island - or find Wilfrid's boat and row across to the mainland - and have a nice long, peaceful snooze in that dear little cottage?'

'Oh, don't let's stay on the island!' said Anne. 'I'd never go to sleep! I'd be afraid those men would find us.'

'Don't be silly, Anne,' said George, trying not to yawn. 'They wouldn't have the remotest idea where to look for us! I honestly don't fancy looking for Wilfrid's boat, rowing all the way to the mainland, and then climbing up that steep hill to the cottage!'

'Well - all right,' said Anne. 'But oughtn't somebody to be on guard - oughtn't we each to take turn?'

'Why so fussy, Anne?' asked George. 'Timmy would hear anyone!'

'I suppose he would,' said Anne, giving way. 'We'll stay here then.'

They were all very tired. The boys pulled up armfuls of old dry bracken and spread it in a sheltered patch of grass, where bushes surrounded them, and sheltered them from the wind. It was not far from the cove where Wilfrid's boat lay. They snuggled into the bracken.

'Nice and cosy!' said George, yawning. 'Ohhh! I've never felt so sleepy in my life!' And in three seconds she was sound asleep! Wilfrid dropped off at once too, and Dick and Julian were soon giving little gentle snores.

Anne was still awake. She felt nervous. 'I'd dearly like to know if those men are safely underground!' she thought. 'I can't imagine that they are very pleased at us getting away - they'll know we'll go to the mainland as soon as we can, and tell everyone what we have found! I should have thought they would try to stop us leaving. They must know we have a boat!'

She lay and worried, keeping her ears open for any strange sound. Timmy heard her tossing and turning and crept over to her very quietly, so as not to wake George. He lay down beside Anne, giving her a loving lick as if to say, 'Now, you go to sleep, and I'll keep watch!'

But still Anne didn't fall asleep. Still she kept her ears wide open for any unusual sound - and then, quite suddenly, she heard something. So did Timmy. He sat up, and gave a very small growl.

Anne strained her ears. Yes - it was certainly voices she could hear - low voices, that didn't want to be heard. It was the men coming to find Wilfrid's boat! Once they had that, the children couldn't get away from Whispering Island!

Timmy ran a little way from the bushes, and looked round at Anne as if to say, 'Coming with me?'

Anne got up quietly and went to Timmy. He ran on in front, and she followed. She really must see what was happening, then if it was anything important, she could run back and rouse everyone. Timmy was taking her to the cove where Wilfrid had left his boat, hauled high up on the sand, for fear of big waves.

They were both as quiet as they could be. Timmy growled a little when he heard the voices again, much nearer this time.

The men had come quietly round the island in their own boat, to set Wilfrid's boat adrift. Anne saw them pushing Wilfrid's boat down the sand towards the sea. Once it was adrift, she and the others would be prisoners on the island! She yelled at the top of her voice.

'You stop that! It's OUR boat!' And Timmy began to bark his head off, prancing round the men, and showing his big white teeth. The barking awoke all the others and they leapt up at once.

'That's Timmy!' shouted Julian. 'That's Timmy barking! Come on, quickly - but be careful!'

They ran at top speed to the cove. Timmy was still barking madly - and someone was yelling. It sounded like Anne. ANNE - no, no, it couldn't be quiet little Anne!' thought Julian.

But it was! For when the four arrived at the cove, there was Anne yelling to Timmy to bite the men, and dancing about in a rare old temper!

'How DARE you come and take our boat! I'll tell Timmy to bite you! And he will too! Get them, Tim, get them! How DARE you take our boat! Bite them, Timmy!'

Timmy had already bitten both the men, who were now rowing away in their own boat at top speed. Anne picked up a stone and sent it whizzing after them. It struck their boat and made them jump.

Anne jumped too when she turned and saw Julian, George, Wilfrid and Dick. 'I'm so glad you've come!' she said. 'I think Timmy and I have frightened them off. The beasts!'

'Frightened them off! You've scared them stiff!' said Julian, hugging his sister. 'You even scared me! Good gracious - the mouse has certainly turned into a fearsome tiger! I can almost see smoke coming out of your nostrils.'

'A tiger? Did I really sound like a tiger?' said Anne. 'I'm glad! I hated you all thinking I was a mouse. You'd better be careful now, I might turn into a tiger again!'

The men were now out of sight, and Timmy sent a volley of barks after their vanished boat. What chance had any men against a dog and a tiger? WOOF!

'Julian - why can't we row back to the mainland now?' demanded Anne. 'I'm so hungry and there's nothing to eat here now. And I wasn't really very comfortable in that brackeny bed. I'm longing to sleep in a proper bed. I've a good mind to take that boat of Wilfrid's and row myself back, if you don't want to come.'

Julian couldn't help laughing at this new fierce Anne. He put his arm round her.

'I believe it's dangerous to say no to a tiger,' he said. 'So you shall have your way, Anne. I'm awfully hungry too - and I bet the others are.'

And, in five minutes time, the six of them were out on the sea, Julian taking one oar, and Dick the other, 'Swish-swash - swish-swash' went the oars, and the boat rocked as it sped along.

'I bet if those men spot us out on the sea in a boat, going across to the mainland, they will feel pretty uncomfortable!' said Julian. 'They'll know we'll be going to the police first thing tomorrow. My word - this has been quite an adventure, hasn't it! I shall be glad of a little peace now!'

Well - you'll soon have it, Julian! That little cottage is waiting for you all, with its glorious view over the Harbour and Whispering Island. You'll have quite a bit of excitement tomorrow, of course, when the police take you back to the island in their boat, and you show them the old well, the vast treasure-chamber, the secret passage, and all the rest. You'll be there when all the men are rounded up, you'll watch them chugging off, prisoners, in the police boat, amazed that the Famous Five should have defeated them. What an adventure! And what a relief when all the excitement is over, and you lie peacefully on the hillside, with the little cottage just behind you.

'Now for a real lazy time!' said Anne, when the Five had seen the last of the police. 'Let's all go out on the hill in the sunshine, and have orangeade and biscuits and fruit salad - and Wilfrid shall play his magic pipe and bring his furred and feathered friends to see us.'

'Has he found his pipe then?' said Dick, pleased.

'Yes. He took the well-bucket to get some water to drink - and lo and behold the pipe was in the bottom of the bucket!' said Anne. 'He thinks it must have fallen there the last time he went to fetch water from the well - and nobody noticed it!'

'Oh good!' said George, thankfully. 'Wilfrid, what about playing a tune on your little pipe? I'm so glad it's found. I'd like to hear it again.'

Wilfrid was pleased. 'All right,' he said. 'I'll see if my friends here still remember me!'

He sat down on the hillside a little away from the others and began to blow down the pipe - and out came the strange little tune! At once the birds in the trees around turned their heads. In the bushes the lizards raised themselves, put their quaint heads on one side and listened. Rabbits stopped their play. The big hare bounded up the hill, its great ears taking in every note. A magpie flew down to the boy's foot and sat there.

Wilfrid didn't stir. He just went on playing as the creatures came to listen. Timmy listened too, and went to the boy, pressing against him, licking his ear. Then he went back to George.

We'll leave them all there in the sunshine, quiet and peaceful, watching the little creatures that Wilfrid can always bring around him.

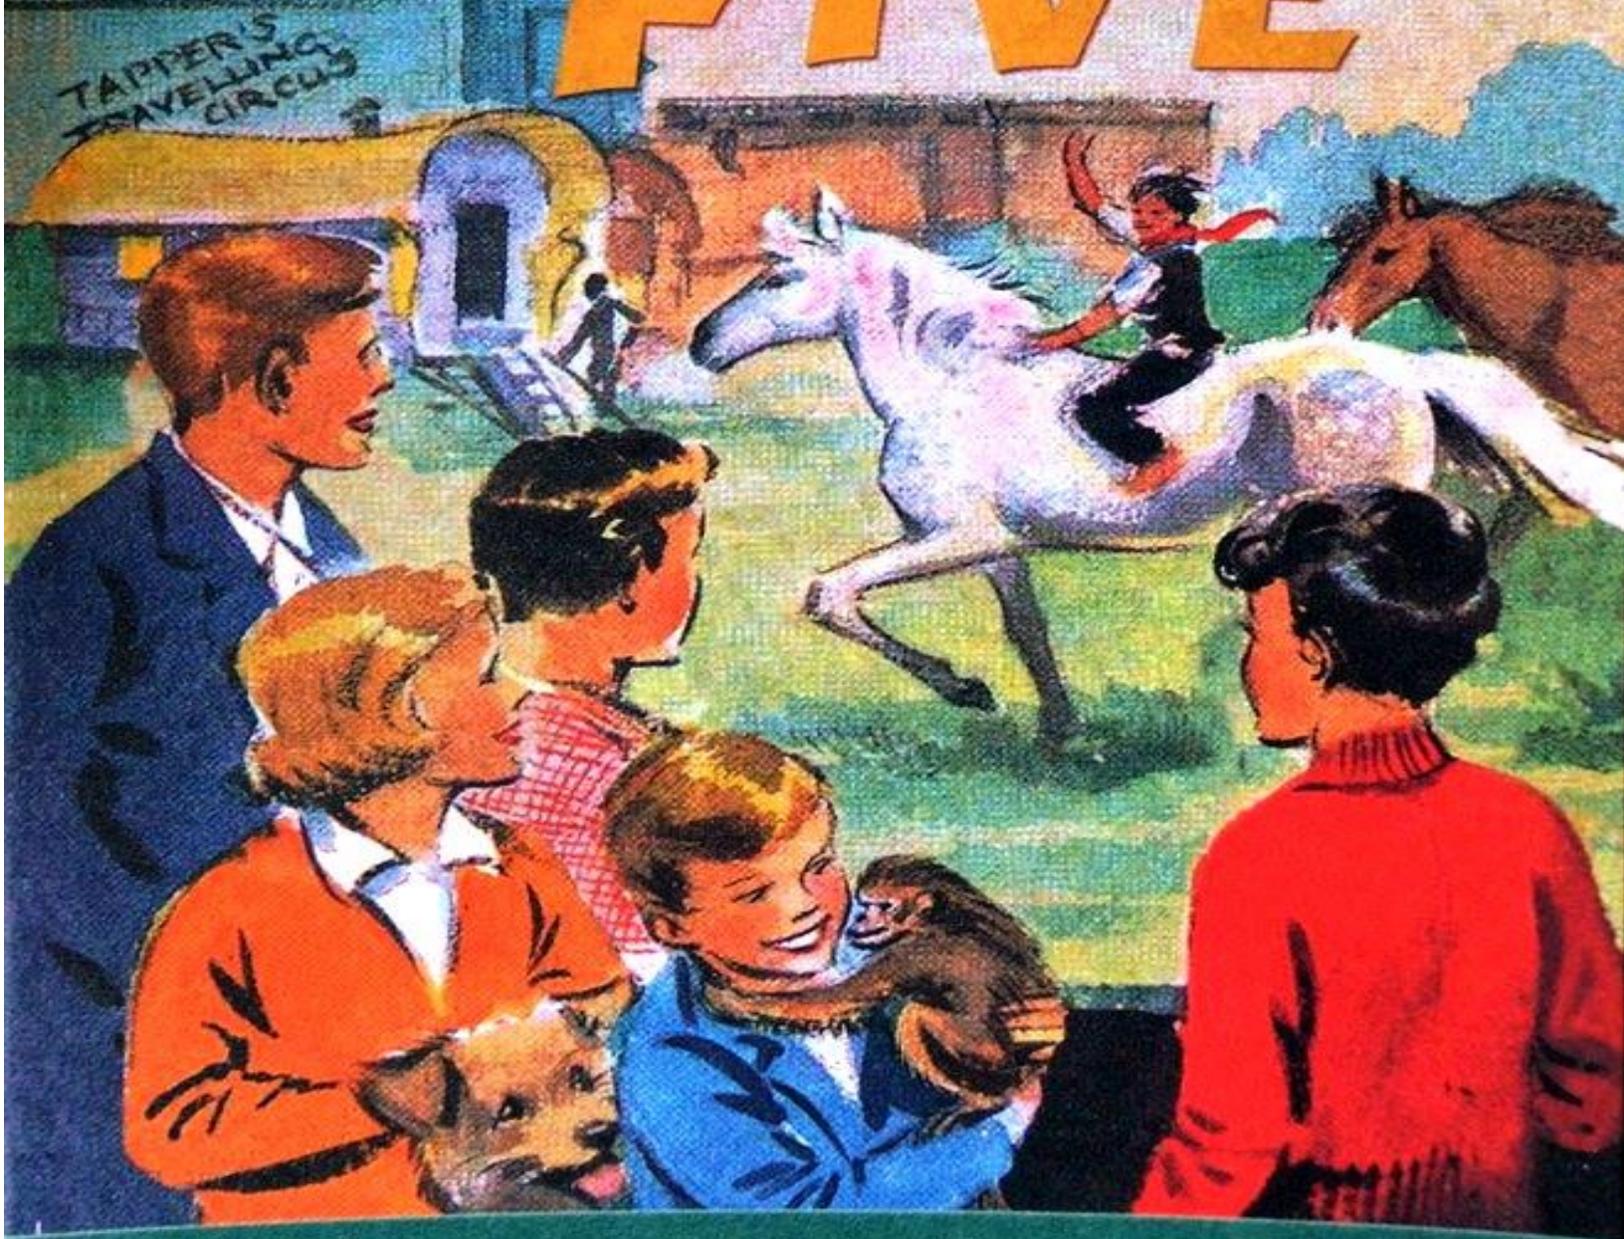

Julian is lying back, looking at the April sky, glad that their adventure ended so well. Dick is looking down at Whispering Island, set in the brilliant blue harbour. Anne is half asleep - quiet little Anne who can turn into a tiger if she has to!

And George, of course, is close to Timmy, her arm round his neck, very happy indeed. Good-bye, Five - it was fun sharing in your grand adventure!

THE END

Enid Blyton[®]

THE
FAMOUS
FIVE

FIVE ARE TOGETHER AGAIN

ENID BLYTON

FAMOUS FIVE 21

Five Are Together Again

Contents

| | | |
|----|---|----|
| 1 | Back For The Holidays | 2 |
| 2 | Plans For The Five | 6 |
| 3 | Big Hollow - And Tinker And Mischief Again! | 11 |
| 4 | Jenny Has A Very Good Idea | 16 |
| 5 | The Travelling Circus | 20 |
| 6 | Getting Ready For Camping Out | 25 |
| 7 | In The Circus Field | 30 |
| 8 | Charlie The Chimp Is A Help! | 34 |
| 9 | A Wonderful Evening | 38 |
| 10 | Round The Campfire | 43 |
| 11 | In The Dark Of The Night | 48 |
| 12 | A Shock For Tinker | 53 |
| 13 | Quite A Lot Of Plans! | 58 |
| 14 | Ladders - And A Lot Of Fun! | 64 |
| 15 | A Happy Day - And A Shock For Julian | 69 |
| 16 | Night On Kirrin Island | 75 |
| 17 | And At Last The Mystery Is Solved! | 81 |

Chapter 1
BACK FOR THE HOLIDAYS

'George, can't you sit still for even a minute!' said Julian. 'It's bad enough to have the train rocking about all over the place, without you falling over my feet all the time, going to look out of first one window and then the other.'

'Well, we're nearly at Kirrin - almost home!' said George. 'I can't help feeling excited. I've missed old Timmy so much this term, and I just can't wait to see him! I love to look out of the window and see how much nearer we are to Kirrin. Do you think Timmy will be on the station to meet us, barking madly?'

'Don't be an ass,' said Dick. 'He's a clever dog, but not clever enough to read railway time-tables.' 'He doesn't need to,' said George. 'He always knows when I'm coming home.'

'I really believe he does,' said Anne, seriously. 'Your mother always says how excited he is on the day you are arriving home from school - can't keep still - keeps going to the front gate and looking down the road.'

'Dear, dear Timmy!' said George, falling over Julian's feet again, as she scrambled once more to the window. 'We're nearly there. Look, there's the signal-box, and the signal is down. HURRAH!'

Her three cousins looked at her in amusement. George was always like this on the way home from school. Her thoughts were full of very little else but her beloved Timmy all the way home. Julian thought how much she looked like a restless boy just then, with her short, curly hair, and her determined expression. George had always longed to be a boy, but as she wasn't, she made up for it by trying to speak and act like one, and would never answer to her full name of Georgina.

'We're coming into Kirrin station!' yelled George, almost falling out of the window. 'I can see our porter. Hey, Peters - we're back again. WE'RE BACK AGAIN!'

The train slid into Kirrin station, and Peters waved and grinned. He had known George since she was a baby. George opened the door and leapt out of the carriage.

'Home again! Back at Kirrin! Oh, I do hope Timmy will be at the station!' she said.

But there was no Timmy there. 'He must have forgotten you were coming,' said Dick, with a grin, and at once got a scowl from George. Peters came up, smiling all over his face, and gave them his usual welcome. Everyone in Kirrin Village knew the Five - which, of course, included Timmy the dog.

Peters soon had the children's luggage out, and wheeled it down the platform on his trolley. 'I'll send it along to Kirrin Cottage as soon as the van comes,' he said. 'Had a good term?'

'Smashing!' said Dick. 'But it seemed very long, as Easter is so late this year. My word - look at the primroses on the railway banks.'

But George had no eyes for anything just then. She was still looking out for Timmy. Where was he? WHY hadn't he come to the station to meet them? He came last time and the time before! She turned a troubled face to Dick.

'Do you think he's ill?' she asked. 'Or has he forgotten me? Or...'

'Oh, don't be an ass, George,' said Dick. 'He is probably in the house somewhere and can't get out. Look out - the trolley nearly ran you over then.'

George skipped out of the way, glaring. WHERE was Timmy? She was sure he was ill - or had had an accident - or was tied up and couldn't get away. Perhaps Joan, the cook, had forgotten to let him loose.

'I'm going to take a taxi home, if I've enough money,' she said, taking out her purse. 'You others can walk. I must see if anything's happened to Timmy - he's never missed meeting our train before.'

'But George, it's such a lovely walk to Kirrin Cottage!' said Anne. 'You know how you love to see your island - dear old Kirrin Island - as we walk to your mother's house - and the bay - and hear the waves crashing on the rocks.'

'I'm taking the station taxi,' said George, obstinately, counting the money in her purse. 'If you'd like to come with me, you can. It's Timmy I want to see, not islands and waves and things! I'm sure he's ill or has had an accident or something!'

'All right, George, do as you please,' said Julian. 'Hope you find dear old Timmy is perfectly well - and has only forgotten the time of the train. See you later.'

The two brothers, and their sister Anne, set off together, looking forward to the walk to Kirrin Cottage. How lovely to see Kirrin Bay again, and George's island!

'Isn't she lucky to have a real island of her very own!' said Anne. 'Fancy it belonging to her family for years and years - and then one day her mother suddenly gives it to George! I bet she worried and worried dear Aunt Fanny until she gave in to old George. I do so hope Timmy is all right; we shan't enjoy our holidays with George's mother if there's anything wrong with Timmy.'

'Oh, George will probably go and live in Timmy's kennel with him,' said Dick, with a chuckle. 'Ha - look! The sea - and Kirrin Bay - AND the little old island as lovely as ever!'

'With its gulls circling round, and mewing like cats,' said Julian. 'And the old ruined castle there, just exactly the same as usual. Not a single stone fallen out of it, as far as I can see.'

'You can't possibly see that at this distance,' said Anne, screwing up her eyes. 'Oh, isn't the first day of the hols heavenly? We seem to have all the time in the world in front of us!'

'Yes. And then, alas, after a few days, the holidays rush by,' said Julian. 'I wonder if George is home by now.'

'Well, her taxi passed us going at a tremendous pace!' said Dick. 'I bet old George was shouting at the driver to go as fast as possible!'

'Look - there's Kirrin Cottage - I can just see the chimneys in the distance,' said Dick. 'Smoke is coming from one of them.'

'Funny - why only one?' said Julian. 'They usually have the kitchen fire going, and a fire in Uncle Quentin's study. He's such a cold mortal when he's working out all his wonderful figures for his inventions.'

'Perhaps he's away,' said Anne, hopefully. She was rather afraid of George's hasty-tempered father. 'I should think Uncle Quentin could do with a holiday at times - he's always buried in rows and rows of figures.'

'Well, let's hope we don't disturb him too much,' said Julian. 'It's hard on Aunt Fanny if he keeps yelling at everyone. We'll try and be out of doors most of the time.'

They were nearly at Kirrin Cottage now. As they came near to the front gate, they saw George come running down the garden-path. To Julian's horror, she was crying bitterly.

'I say - it does look as if something has happened to old Timmy,' he said, scared. 'It's not like George to cry - she never cries! What can have happened?'

In great alarm they began to run, and Anne shouted as she ran, 'George! George, what's the matter? Is something wrong with Timmy? What's happened?'

'We can't stay at home,' wept George. 'We've got to go away somewhere. Something awful's happened!'

'What is it? Tell us, you idiot!' said Dick, in alarm. 'For goodness' sake, what's happened? Is Timmy run over, or something?'

'No - it isn't Timmy,' said George, wiping her eyes with her hand, because, as usual, she had no handkerchief. 'It's Joan - Joan, our dear, darling cook!'

'What's the matter with her?' asked Julian, thinking of all kinds of dreadful things. 'GEORGE, will you please TELL US!'

'Joan's got scarlet fever,' said George, sniffing dolefully. 'So we can't be at Kirrin Cottage.'

'Why not?' demanded Dick. 'Joan will have to go to a fever hospital - and we can all stay at Kirrin Cottage and help your mother. Poor old Joan! But cheer up, George, scarlet fever isn't much of a thing to have nowadays. Come on - let's go in and see if we can comfort your mother. Poor old Aunt Fanny, she will be in a stew - with all of us four cousins at Kirrin Cottage too! Never mind, we can...'

'Stop jabbering, Dick,' said George, exasperated. 'We can't stay at Kirrin Cottage. Mother wouldn't even let me go in at the front door! She shooed me away, and said I was to wait in the garden, the doctor was coming in a minute or two.'

Someone called to them from a window of Kirrin Cottage. 'Are you all there, children? Julian, come here, will you?'

They all went into the garden, and saw their Aunt Fanny, George's mother, leaning out of a bedroom window.

'Listen, dears,' she said. 'Joan has scarlet fever, and is waiting for an ambulance to take her to the hospital, and...'

'Aunt Fanny - don't worry. We'll all turn to and help,' called back Julian, cheerfully.

'Dear Julian - you still don't understand,' said his aunt. 'You see, neither your uncle nor I have had scarlet fever - so we are in quarantine, and mustn't have anyone near us, in case we get it, and give it to them - and that might mean we'd give it to all you four.'

'Would Timmy get it?' asked George, still sniffing dolefully.

'No, of course not. Don't be silly, George,' said her mother. 'Did you ever hear of dogs getting measles or whooping-cough or any of our illnesses? Timmy isn't in quarantine. You can get him out of his kennel as soon as you like.'

George's face lighted up immediately, and she shot round the back of the house, yelling Timmy's name. At once there came a volley of barks!

'Aunt Fanny - what do you want us to do?' asked Julian. 'We can't go to my home, because my people are still in Germany. Should we go to a hotel?'

'No, dear, I'll think of somewhere you can all go,' said his aunt. 'Good gracious, what a row Timmy is making! Poor Joan - she has such a splitting headache.'

'Here's the ambulance,' cried Anne, as a big hospital van drew up outside the gate. Mrs. Kirrin disappeared from the window at once to tell Joan. The ambulance man went up to the front door, his mate behind him carrying a stretcher. The four children watched in surprise. 'He's gone to fetch dear old Joan,' said Julian. And sure enough the stretcher was soon carried out with Joan lying on it, wrapped round in blankets. She waved to the children as the men carried her out.

'Soon be back!' she said, in rather a croaky voice. 'Help Mrs. Kirrin if you can. So sorry about this!'

'Poor Joan,' said Anne, with tears in her eyes. 'Get better quickly, Joan. We shall miss you so!'

The ambulance door closed and the van went off very smoothly and quietly.

'Whatever shall we do?' said Dick, turning to Julian. 'Can't go home - can't stay here! Oh, here's TIMMY! How are you, Tim, old thing? Thank goodness you can't get scarlet fever. Don't knock me over, old boy. Down! Gosh, what a licky dog you are!'

Timmy was the only one in high spirits. The others felt really down in the dumps. Oh dear - what was to be done? Where could they go? What a horrid beginning to a holiday! Down, Timmy, DOWN! What a dog! Anyone would think he had never even heard of scarlet fever! WILL you get down, Timmy!

Chapter 2

PLANS FOR THE FIVE

George was still looking upset. What with her fears that Timmy might be ill or hurt, and now her distress at Joan being carried off in the ambulance, she wasn't much help to anyone.

'Do stop, sniffing, George,' said Anne. 'We've just got to be sensible and think of some way out of this.'

'I'm going to find Mother,' said George. 'I don't care if she's in quarantine or not.'

'Oh no, you're not,' said Julian, taking her firmly by the arm. 'You jolly well know what quarantine means. When you had whooping-cough you weren't allowed to come near any of us, in case we caught it too. You were infectious, and that meant that you didn't have close contact with anybody for at least a few weeks. I think it's only two weeks for scarlet fever, so it won't be too bad.'

George went on sniffing, trying to pull away from Julian's hand. Julian winked at Dick, and said something that made George pull herself together at once.

'Well, REALLY, George!' he said. 'You're acting just like a weepy girl. Poor Georgina! Poor little old Georgina!'

George stopped sniffing immediately and glared at Julian in fury. If there was one thing she really hated it was to be told she was acting like a silly girl! And how awful to be called by her real name, Georgina! She gave Julian a hefty punch, and he grinned at her, warding her off.

'That's better,' he said. 'Cheer up! Just look at Timmy staring at you in amazement. He's hardly ever heard you crying before.'

'I'm NOT crying!' said George. 'I'm - well, I'm upset about Joan. And it's awful to have nowhere to go.'

'I can hear Aunt Fanny telephoning,' said Anne, who had very sharp ears. She fondled Timmy's head, and he licked her hand. He had already given everyone a wonderful welcome, whining with pleasure, and licking lavishly. He had been mad with joy to see George again, and was surprised and sad to find her looking so miserable now. Dear Timmy - he certainly belonged to the Five!

'Let's sit down and wait for Aunt Fanny,' said Julian, settling himself on the grass. 'We look a bit silly standing staring at Kirrin Cottage like this. Aunt Fanny will come to the window in a minute. She is sure to have thought of a good idea for us. TIMMY! I shan't stay sitting down for long if you keep licking my neck like that. I shall send you for a towel in a minute, so that I can wipe it dry!'

The little joke made everyone feel better. They were all sitting on the grass now, and Timmy went lovingly from one to the other. All his family back again - it was too good to be true! He settled down at last, his head on George's knee, George's hand caressing his ears.

'Aunt Fanny's put down the telephone,' said Anne. 'Now she'll come to the window.'

'You've got ears like a dog - just as good as Timmy's,' said Dick. 'I couldn't hear a thing!'

'Here's Mother!' said George, and leapt to her feet as Mrs. Kirrin came to the window and leaned out.

'It's all right, dears,' she called. 'I've been able to arrange something for you. I have been telephoning the scientist that your father has been working with, George - Professor Hayling. He was coming here for a day or two, and when I told him he couldn't because we're in quarantine, he at once said that you must all go there - and that Tinker, his son - you remember him, don't you - would be delighted to have your company!'

'Tinker! Goodness, yes, I shall never forget him - or his monkey either!' said Julian. 'He's the boy who owns that old lighthouse at Demon's Rocks, isn't he? We went to stay there with him, and had a marvellous time.'

'Well - you're not staying at the lighthouse, I'm afraid,' said his aunt, from the window. 'Apparently a storm blew up one night and damaged it, and it's not safe to live in any more.'

Groans from all the Five, of course, Timmy joining in as usual! 'Where are we to go then? To Tinker's home?' asked Dick.

'Yes. You can get a bus from here, at Little Hollow, that will take you almost to Big Hollow, where Professor Hayling lives,' said Aunt Fanny. 'You're to go today. I'm so very sorry about this, dears, but it's just one of those things we have to put up with. I'm sure you'll have a good time with Tinker, and that monkey of his. What was it called now?'

'Mischief,' said everyone together, and Anne smiled in delight to think of being with the naughty little creature, and watching its wicked ways.

'The bus will pass in ten minutes,' said her aunt. 'Julian, if you can't manage to get your things on the bus, ask the gardener over the way to help you. And have a good time, dears, and send me a card or two. I'll let you know how we get on - but I really don't think that either your uncle or I will catch scarlet fever, so don't worry. And I'll send you some money to spend. You'd better run for the bus now.'

'Right, Aunt Fanny, and thank you!' called Julian. 'I'll look after everyone and keep them in order - especially old George. Don't worry at all - and I DO hope you or uncle don't go down with the fever. Good-bye.'

They all went to the front gate where the luggage still stood. 'Anne, go out into the road and stop the bus when it comes,' ordered Julian. 'Then Dick and I will heave our bags aboard. Gosh, I wonder what it will be like with old Tinker at Big Hollow. I've a feeling it might be rather exciting!

'I don't think so,' said George, mournfully. 'I like Tinker all right - he's funny - and that little monkey is a darling - such a naughty little thing too. But oh dear, don't you remember what it was like when Tinker's father came to stay with us? It was awful! He never remembered to come to meals, and was always losing his coat or his hanky or his money, and losing his temper too. I got very tired of him.'

'Well, he'll probably get very tired of us!' said Julian. 'He won't find it very funny to have four kids parked on him, especially if he's in the middle of difficult work - to say nothing of a rather large, licky dog leaping round the house as well.'

'Timmy isn't likely to lick him,' said George, at once, and put on one of her scowls. 'I didn't like Tinker's father at all.'

'Well, don't look like a thunderstorm,' said Julian. 'I don't expect he'll like any of us either. But it's decent of him to give us an invitation to stay at Big Hollow, and we're jolly well going to behave ourselves, see? There's to be no back-chat from you, George - even if he dares to disapprove of Timmy!'

'He'd better not,' said George. 'In fact, I've a good mind not to go. I think I'll live in the summer-house with Timmy, at the bottom of the garden!'

'You will NOT!' said Julian, taking firm hold of her arm. 'You'll play fair, come with us, and behave properly! Listen, there's the bus. Come on, we'll all wave, and hope the driver has a few empty seats.'

Anne had already stopped the bus, and run round to the back of it to ask the conductor if he could help with the bags. He knew the children very well, and leapt down at once.

'You're going back to school pretty quick!' he said. 'I thought the schools had only just broken up.'

'They have,' said Julian, 'but we're off to stay at Big Hollow. The bus goes there, doesn't it?'

'Yes, we go right through the village of Big Hollow,' said the conductor, carrying three bags at once, much to Julian's envy. 'Whereabouts are you staying there?'

'At Professor Hayling's house,' said Julian. 'I think that's called Big Hollow too, like the village.'

'Ah, we pass it,' said the conductor, 'I'll stop the bus just outside and give you a hand with your things again. My word - you'll have to mind your p's and q's there - old Professor Hayling's a bit peculiar, you know. Goes off the handle properly if things don't go his way! Once a horse got into his garden and believe it or not he chased that horse for two miles, shouting at it all the way. And bless me, when he got back home, tired out, there was that horse, chewing up his garden again. The horse was cute - he'd taken a short cut back. Yes - you be careful how you behave at Big Hollow. The old man might get cross and pop you into one of his queer machines and grind you up into little pieces!

The four children laughed. 'Oh, the old Professor is all right,' said Julian. 'A bit forgetful, like most people who work with their brains all the time. My brain goes fairly slowly - but my Uncle Quentin's goes about a hundred miles an hour, and I bet the Professor's does too! We'll be all right!'

Away went the bus, bumping over the road from Kirrin and Little Hollow, and on to Big Hollow. The four children gazed out of the windows as they passed alongside the shore, where the sea shone as blue as cornflowers, and once more saw Kirrin Island out in the big bay.

'Wish we were going there!' sighed George. 'We'll have to take a picnic meal there sometime, and enjoy ourselves. I'd like old Tinker to visit my island. He may have a lighthouse of his own, but having an island is MUCH better!'

'I think I agree with you,' said Julian. 'Tinker's lighthouse is certainly lovely and all on its own, and the view from it is amazing - but there's something about Kirrin Island that I love. Islands are quite different from anything else!'

'Yes. They are,' said Anne. 'I'd like one too. A very little one, so that I could see all round it at one glance. And I'd like one little cave to sleep in - just big enough for me.'

'You'd soon be lonely, Anne,' said Dick, giving his sister a friendly pat. 'You love to have people round you, you like to be friendly!'

'So does Timmy!' said Julian, as Timmy left his place by George's knee and went to sniff at a net-bag held by an old man, who at once fondled the big dog, and fumbled for a biscuit out of a paper bag. 'Timmy doesn't mind how many people there are around, so long as one or two of them has a biscuit or a bone to hand out!'

'Come to heel, Timmy,' said George. 'You're not to go round begging, telling people you are half-starved! I should think you eat more than any other dog in Kirrin. Who eats the cat's dinner whenever he can, I should like to know?'

Timmy gave George a loving lick and settled down beside her, his head on her shoes. He got up politely every time someone entered or left the bus. The conductor was most impressed.

'I wish all dogs were as good on my bus as yours,' he told George. 'You'd better get ready to jump out. Our next stop is supposed to be a little way beyond Big Hollow, but I'll ring my bell, and the driver will stop for a moment, and you can get out.'

'Thanks awfully,' said Julian, gratefully, and when the bus stopped with a jerk a minute later, all the Five were ready to jump out.

The bus went on, and left them standing outside a large wooden gate. The drive from it led steeply downwards, and a large house could just be seen hidden in a hollow by great trees.

'Big Hollow!' said Julian. 'Well - here we are. What a queer place - sort of mysterious and brooding. Now to find old Tinker! I bet he'll be pleased to see us all, especially Timmy! Help me with the bags, Dick!'

Chapter 3

BIG HOLLOW - AND TINKER AND MISCHIEF AGAIN!

The four children and Timmy went through the big, heavy gate, which groaned loudly. Timmy was very startled to hear the mournful creak, and barked sharply.

'Sh!' said George. 'You'll get into trouble with the Professor, Timmy, if you raise your voice like that. I expect we'll have to talk in whispers, so as not to disturb the Professor - so just see if you can whisper too.'

Timmy gave a small whine. He knew he couldn't whisper! He trotted at George's heel as they all went down the steep drive to the house. It was a queer house, built sideways to the drive, and had astonishingly few windows.

'I expect Professor Hayling is afraid of people peering in at his work,' said Anne. 'It's very, very secret, isn't it?'

'I know he uses miles and miles of figures,' said Dick. 'Tinker told me one day that his monkey Mischief once chewed up a page of figures when he was very small - and Professor Hayling chased him for a whole hour, hoping to catch him and find even a few bits of paper still in his mouth, so that he could rescue at least part of his figures. But Mischief fled down a rabbit-hole and didn't come up for two days, so it wasn't any good.'

Everyone smiled at the thought of poor Mischief hiding down a rabbit-hole. 'You couldn't do that, Timmy old thing!' said Julian. 'So just be careful of any paper you eat.'

'He wouldn't be so silly,' said George, at once. 'He knows perfectly well what's eatable and what's not.'

'Ha! Does he!' said Anne. 'Well, I'd just like to know what kind of food he thought my blue slipper was that he chewed up last hols!'

'Don't tell tales of him,' said George. 'He only chewed it because someone shut him in your bedroom and he hadn't anything else to do.'

'Woof,' said Timmy, quite agreeing. He gave Anne's hand a little lick, as if to say, 'Very sorry, Anne - but I was so bored!'

'Dear Timmy! I wouldn't mind if you chewed up all my slippers!' said Anne. 'But it would be nice if you chose the very oldest ones!'

Timmy suddenly stopped and looked into the bushes. He gave a low growl! George put her hand on his collar at once. She was always afraid of snakes in the spring time.

'It might be an adder!' she said. 'The dog next door trod on one last year, so I heard, and his leg swelled up terribly, and he was in great pain. Come away now, Timmy - it's an adder, with poison in its fangs!'

But Timmy went on growling. Then he suddenly stood still and sniffed hard. He gave an excited whimper and pulled away from George, jumping into the bushes - and out came, not a snake, but Mischief, Tinker's bright-eyed little monkey!

He at once leapt on to the dog's broad back, put his little monkey fingers under Timmy's collar, and chattered in delight. Timmy nearly dislocated his neck trying to twist his head round to lick him!

'Mischief!' cried everyone at once, in real delight. 'You've come to welcome us!'

And the little monkey, jabbering away excitedly in monkey-language, leapt first on to George's shoulder, and then on to Julian's. He pulled Julian's hair, twisted his right ear round, and then leapt from him to Dick, and on to Anne's shoulder. He cuddled into her neck, his eyes bright and brown, looking very happy.

'Oh! Isn't he pleased to see us again!' said Anne, delighted. 'Mischief, where's Tinker?'

Mischief jumped off Anne's shoulder and scampered down the drive as if he quite understood all that Anne had said. The children raced after him - and then a stentorian voice suddenly roared at them from one side of the drive.

'What are you doing here? Clear out! This is private ground. I'll fetch the police. Clear OUT!'

The Five stopped still in fright - and then Julian saw who it was - Professor Hayling! He stepped forward at once. 'Good afternoon, sir,' he said. 'I hope we didn't disturb you, but you did tell my aunt we could come here.'

'Your aunt? Who's your aunt? I don't know any aunt!' roared the Professor. 'You're sight-seers, that's what you are! Come to pry into my work, just because there was a piece about it in some silly paper! You're the third lot today. Clear out, I tell you - and take that dog too. How DARE you!'

'But sir - don't you really know us?' said Julian, very startled. 'You came to stay at our house, you know, and...'

'Stuff and nonsense! I haven't been away for years!' shouted the Professor. Mischief, the monkey, was so frightened that he leapt away into the bushes, making a funny little crying noise.

'I hope he fetches Tinker,' said Julian, in a low voice to Dick. 'The Professor has forgotten who we are, and why we've come. Let's retreat a bit.'

But as they went cautiously back up the steep path, followed by the angry Professor, a loud voice hailed them, and Tinker came racing up with Mischief on his shoulder, clinging to his hair. So the little monkey had gone to fetch him. 'Good for him!' thought Julian, pleased.

'Dad! Don't yell at our friends like that!' cried Tinker, dancing about in front of his angry father. 'You asked them here yourself, you know you did!'

'I DID NOT!' said the Professor. 'Who are they?'

'Well, George, that girl, is the daughter of Mr. Kirrin, and the others are his niece and nephews. And that's their dog, Timmy. And you asked them all here because Mr. and Mrs. Kirrin are in quarantine for scarlet fever,' shouted Tinker, still dancing about in front of his father.

'Stop jiggling about like that,' said the Professor, crossly. 'I don't remember asking them. I would have told Jenny the maid, if I had.'

'You did tell her!' shouted Tinker, still jiggling about, with Mischief the monkey jiggling too in delight. 'She's already made up the beds. I helped her. She's angry because you left your breakfast and now it's almost dinner-time. She's cleared it away.'

'Bless us all - so that's why I feel so hungry and cross!' said Professor Hayling, and he began to laugh. He had a tremendous laugh, and the children couldn't help laughing too. What an odd fellow - so brainy, such a fine scientist - with the most enormous amount of knowledge in his head - and yet no memory for such ordinary things as breakfast and visitors and telephone calls.

'It was just a misunderstanding, sir,' said Julian, politely. 'It was very, very kind of you to invite us here when we can't be at home because of the scarlet fever. We'll try not to be a nuisance, and if there's anything we can do to help you, please ask us. We'll make as little noise as possible, and keep out of your way, of course.'

'You hear that, Tinker?' said Professor Hayling, suddenly swinging round on the startled Tinker. 'Why can't you do the same - make a very little noise, and keep out of my way? You know I'm very busy now - on a MOST IMPORTANT project.' He turned to Julian. 'You'll be very welcome if you keep Tinker out of my way. And NOBODY - absolutely NOBODY - is to go up into that tower. Understand?'

They all looked up to where he was pointing, and saw a tall, slender tower rising up amid the trees. It had curious tentacle-like rods sticking out at the top, and these shook slightly in the breeze.

'And don't ask me questions about it,' went on the Professor, looking fiercely at George. 'Your father's the only other man who knows what it's for, and he knows how to keep his mouth shut.'

'None of us would dream of prying, sir,' said Julian. 'It's very, very kind of you to offer to have us here, and do believe me when I say we shan't be any trouble to you at all - but a help if you'll allow us.'

'Ah well, you sound a sensible fellow, I must say,' said the Professor, who had now calmed down, and looked quite peaceable. 'Well, I'll say good-bye for now and go and have my breakfast. I hope it's fried eggs and bacon. I'm very hungry.'

'Dad - Jenny's cleared your breakfast AWAY! I told you that before!' said Tinker in despair. 'It's almost dinner-time, now.'

'Ah good - good!' said the Professor. 'I'll come at once.'

And he led the way indoors, followed by the five children, with Timmy and Mischief, all looking rather worried. Really, nobody ever knew what the Professor was going to do or say next!

Jenny certainly had a good dinner for them all. There was a large and delicious stew with carrots, onions and peas swimming in the gravy, and plenty of potatoes. Everyone tucked in well, and Mischief, who loved the peas, took quite a few from Tinker's plate, his little paw creeping up, and neatly snatching a pea from the gravy.

The girls went out to help bring in the next course, which was a big steamed pudding with plenty of raisins in it. Mischief at once jiggled up and down in delight, for he loved raisins. He leapt on to the table, and received a sharp smack from the Professor, who unfortunately smacked the pudding dish at the same time, making the pudding jump in the air.

'Good gracious, Dad - we nearly lost the pudding!' cried Tinker. 'And it's my favourite. Oh, don't give us such small pieces! Mischief, get off the table. You are NOT to put your paw into the white sauce!'

So Mischief disappeared under the table, where he received quite a lot of raisins from various kindly hands, unseen by the Professor. Timmy felt rather left out. He was under the table too, having been rather scared by the Professor's angry voice, but as he didn't very much like raisins, he wasn't as lucky as Mischief.

'Ha - I enjoyed that!' said the Professor, having cleaned his plate thoroughly. 'Nothing like a good breakfast!'

'It was midday dinner, Dad!' said Tinker. 'You don't have pudding at breakfast.'

'Dear me, of course - that was pudding!' said his father, and laughed his great laugh. 'Now you can all do exactly what you like, so long as you do NOT go into my study, OR my workroom OR that tower. AND DON'T MEDDLE WITH ANYTHING! Mischief, get off the water-jug, you'll upset it. Can't you teach that monkey some table-manners, Tinker?'

And with that he marched out of the room, and disappeared into some mysterious passage that apparently led to his study or workroom. Everyone heaved a sigh of relief.

'We'll clear away and then I'll show you your rooms,' said Tinker. 'I do hope you won't be too dull here.'

Dull, Tinker! You needn't worry! There is far too much excitement waiting for the Five - and you too! Just wait a bit, and see!

Chapter 4

JENNY HAS A VERY GOOD IDEA

Tinker raced out to the kitchen to fetch a tray or two. He made a most peculiar noise as he went, and for a moment Timmy looked extremely startled.

'Goodness - don't say that Tinker still has that awful habit of pretending to be some kind of car!' groaned Julian. 'How on earth does his father put up with it? What's he think he is now? A motor-bicycle, by the sound of it.'

There was a sudden crash and a loud yell. The Five raced down the kitchen passage to find out what had happened, Timmy at the front.

'Accident!' bellowed Tinker, scrambling up from the floor. 'I took the bend too quickly, and my front wheel skidded, and I went bang into a wall! I've bent my mudguard.'

'Tinker - do you mean to say you're still being fatheaded enough to pretend to be cars and bicycles and tractors and lorries,' demanded Julian. 'You nearly drove us all mad, driving about all over the house, when you stayed with us. Have you got to be a machine of some sort?'

'Yes,' said Tinker, rubbing one of his arms. 'It sort of comes over me, and away I go. You should have heard me being a lorry absolutely loaded with new cars for delivery yesterday. Dad really thought it was a great lorry and he rushed out into the drive to send it away. But it was only me. I hooted too - like this!'

And the sound of a loud and deep hooter immediately filled the passage! Julian shoved Tinker into the kitchen and shut the door.

'I should have thought that your father would have been driven completely mad by now!' he said. 'Now you just shut up. Can't you grow up a bit?'

'No,' said Tinker, sullenly. 'I don't want to grow up. I might be like my father and forget to eat my meals, and go out with one sock on and one off. And I'd hate to forget my meals. Just think how awful it would be! I'd always be hungry.'

Julian couldn't help laughing. 'Pick up your tray, and help to clear away!' he said. 'And if you simply can't HELP being a car sometimes, for goodness sake go outside! It sounds frightful in the house. You're much too good at awful noises.'

'Oh, am I really good?' said Tinker, pleased. 'I suppose you wouldn't like to hear me being one of those new planes that go over here sometimes, making a queer, droning noise?'

'No. I WOULD NOT!' said Julian, firmly. 'Now will you PLEASE get that tray, Tinker. And tell Mischief to get off my right foot. He seems to think it's a chair.'

But Mischief clung to Julian's ankle and refused to move. 'All right, all right,' said Julian. 'I shall just have to walk about all day with you riding on my foot.'

'If you stamp as you walk, he soon gets off,' remarked Tinker.

'Why didn't you tell me that just now?' asked Julian, and stamped a few steps round the room. Mischief leapt off his foot at once, and sat on a table, making an angry noise.

'He sits on Dad's foot for ages, even when he walks about,' said Tinker. 'But Dad doesn't even notice him there! He even sat on Dad's head once, and Dad thought he was wearing his hat indoors and tried to take it off. But it was only Mischief there!'

That made everyone laugh. 'Now come on,' said Julian, briskly. 'We really must clear away the dinner things. We three boys will carry out the loaded trays and you girls can wash up. And DON'T let Mischief think he can carry teapots or milk-jugs.'

Jenny was very pleased with their help. She was short and fat, and waddled rather than walked, but managed to get here and there remarkably quickly.

'I'll show your visitors their bedrooms after we've cleared,' she said. 'But, you know, Tinker, those mattresses we sent to be remade haven't come back yet. I've told your father a dozen times to telephone about them, but I'm sure he hasn't remembered.'

'Oh, JENNY!' said Tinker, in dismay. 'That means that the two beds for visitors can't be slept in! What ever are we to do?'

'Well, your Dad will have to ring up for new mattresses to be sent today,' said Jenny. 'Maybe they would send them out by van.'

Tinker immediately became a furniture van and rushed down the passage, into the dining-room and back again, Mischief following him in delight. He made a noise exactly like a slow-moving van, and the children couldn't help laughing.

The Professor shot out of his study, his hands to his ears. 'TINKER! COME HERE!'

'No thanks,' said Tinker, warily. 'Sorry, Father. I was a van bringing the mattresses you forgot to order for the beds for visitors.'

But the Professor didn't seem to hear. He advanced on Tinker, who fled upstairs with Mischief leaping after him. Professor Hayling turned on Jenny.

'Can't you keep the children quiet? What do I pay you for?'

'Cleaning, cooking and washing,' she said, briskly. 'But I'm not a nurse for children, sir. That Tinker of yours could do with half a dozen nurses, and he'd still be a nuisance to you while he was in the house. Why don't you let him take his tent and camp out in the field with his friends? It's hot weather and those new mattresses haven't come, and they'd all love it. I can cook for the children and take them out meals - or they could come and fetch them.'

The Professor looked as if he could give Jenny a big hug. The children waited eagerly to see what he would say. Camping out - that would be fun in this weather - and honestly, living in the same house as the Professor wasn't going to be much fun. Timmy gave a little whine as if to say, 'Fine idea! Let's go at once!'

'Good idea, Jenny. VERY good idea!' said Professor Hayling. 'But that monkey's to camp out too. Then perhaps he won't jump in at my workroom window and fiddle about with my models!' He marched back into his study and slammed the door so hard that the whole house shook. Timmy was startled and gave a yelp. Mischief the monkey leapt up the stairs, howling in fright. Tinker began to dance round in joy, and very firmly Jenny took hold of him and propelled him into her big, clean kitchen.

'Wait, Jenny, I've remembered something. We've only one tent, and that's mine, a small one. I'll have to ask Dad if I can get two big ones!' And before anyone could stop him he was banging at the Professor's door, then flung it open, and shouted out his request.

'WE WANT TWO MORE TENTS, DAD. CAN I BUY THEM?'

'For goodness sake, Tinker, clear out and leave me alone!' shouted his father. 'Buy six tents if you want them, but GET OUT!'

'Ooh, thanks, Dad!' said Tinker, and was just slipping out of the door when his father yelled again.

'But what on earth do you want TENTS for?'

Tinker slammed the door and grinned at the others. 'I'd better buy Dad a new memory. He's only just told us we can camp out, and he knows there's only my very small tent - almost a toy one.'

'I'm glad we shan't be in the house,' said Anne. 'I know what a nuisance it is to George's father to have us around, playing about. We'll be better out of the way.'

'Camping out again!' said George, very pleased. 'Let's catch the bus back home and get our own tents. I've got them all stored away in the garden shed. We can ask Jim the Carrier to fetch them, when we've found them.'

'He's calling here today - I'll give him the message for you, if you like,' said Jenny. 'The sooner you get the tents, the better. It was a kind thought of the master's to ask you all here, but I just knew it wouldn't work! You'll be all right out in the fields at the back of the house - he won't hear a thing, not even if you all yell together! So you get your tents and put them up, and I'll see what I can find in the way of ground-sheets and rugs.'

'Don't bother, Jenny,' said Julian. 'We've got all those things - we've often camped out before.'

'I only hope there aren't any cows in the fields,' said Anne. 'Last time we camped, a cow put its head into my tent opening, and mooed. I woke up with such a jump, and I was too scared to move.'

'I don't think, there are any cows,' said Jenny, laughing. 'Now I am to get on with the washing-up, so will you bring out the dinner things please - but don't let that monkey carry anything breakable, for goodness sake! He tried to balance the teapot on his head last week - and that was the end of the teapot!'

Soon everyone was cleaning away with a will, and the two girls helped Jenny with the washing-up.

'I shall like camping out,' Anne told her. 'I'd be scared of staying here in the house. Professor Hayling is a bit like my Uncle Quentin, you know - forgetful, and quick-tempered and a bit shouty.'

'Oh, you don't want to be scared of him,' said Jenny, handing Anne a dish to dry. 'He's kind, for all his crossness, when he's upset. Why, when my mother was ill, he paid for her to go into a really good nursing-home - and believe it or not, he gave me money to buy her fruit and flowers!'

'Oh goodness - that reminds me - we MUST send our cook, Joan, some flowers,' said George. 'She has scarlet fever, you know. That's why we're here.'

'Well, you go and telephone the florist,' said Jenny. 'I'll finish this job.'

But George was rather afraid that Professor Hayling might rush out to see who was using the telephone!

'I'm sure we can buy flowers in Kirrin Village, and have them sent,' she said. 'We've got to go and get our things ready for the carrier, and I can order the flowers then. We might as well come back on our bicycles - they'd be useful here.'

'Well, you'd better go now,' said Jenny, 'or you won't be back in time for tea, and then there'd be trouble.'

'I'll bring back Anne's bicycle,' said Julian. 'I can easily manage it beside mine, as I ride back.'

'Look George,' said Dick, 'you needn't come. I'll order the flowers and I can bring your bike back too. So you stay with Anne.' Reluctantly George agreed.

Off went Julian and Dick, leaving Tinker and the girls to help Jenny. But Jenny soon sent Tinker off afraid that he would drop things and break them.

'You go and be a nice, quiet, purring Rolls Royce at the bottom of the garden,' she said. 'And when you think you've done thirty miles or so, come back for petrol.'

'Lemonade, you mean!' said Tinker, with a grin. 'All right. I haven't been a Rolls Royce for a long time. Dad won't hear me right at the bottom of the garden!'

Off he went, and Jenny and the girls finished the washing-up. Mischief was a nuisance and went off with the teaspoons. He leapt to the top of a high cupboard, and dropped them there.

Tinker suddenly put his head in at the window. 'Come on out in the field, where we're going to put up our tents,' he called to Anne and George. 'We'll choose a nice sheltered spot. Buck up! You must have finished washing-up by now. I'm tired of being a Rolls Royce!'

'You go with him, Anne,' said George. 'I don't feel like it just now.'

So down the garden went the two children and out through a gate at the bottom into a big field.

'Good gracious!' said Tinker, staring. 'Look at all those caravans coming in at the gate the other end of the field. I'll soon send them off. It's OUR field!' And away he marched to the gate in the distance.

'Come BACK, Tinker,' shouted Anne. 'You'll get into trouble if you interfere. COME BACK!'

But Tinker marched on, his head held high. Ha - he'd soon tell the caravan-folk it was HIS field!

Chapter 5

THE TRAVELLING CIRCUS

Anne watched anxiously as Tinker went on and on over the field. There were now four caravans trundling in, at the far gate, and behind them, in the lane, were vans - enormous vans - all with enormously large words painted on them.

TAPPER'S TRAVELLING CIRCUS

'Hoo! I'll tell Mr. Tapper what I think of him, coming into my field!' said Tinker to himself. Mischief the monkey was on his shoulder, jogging up and down as Tinker marched along, muttering furiously.

Four or five children from the caravans looked at him curiously as he marched along. One small boy rushed up to him, shouting in delight to see the monkey.

'A monkey, look, a monkey!' he cried. 'Much smaller than our chimp. What's he called, boy?'

'Mind your own business,' said Tinker. 'Where's Mr. Tapper?'

'Mr. Tapper? Oh, you mean our Grandad!' said the boy. 'He's over there, look, beside that big van. Better not talk to him now, boy. He's that busy!'

Tinker walked over to the van and addressed the man there. He was rather fierce-looking and had a long, bushy beard, enormous eye-brows that hung down over his eyes, a rather small nose, and only one ear. He looked inquiringly down at Tinker, and put out his hand to Mischief.

'My monkey might bite you,' said Tinker, at once. 'He doesn't like strangers.'

'I'm no stranger to any monkey,' said the man in a deep-down voice. 'There isn't a monkey in the world, or a chimp either that wouldn't come to me if I called it. Nor a gorilla, see?'

'Well, my monkey won't come to you,' said Tinker, angrily. 'But what I've come to say is...'

Before he could finish his sentence, the man made a curious noise in his throat - rather like Mischief did when he was pleased about anything. Mischief looked at the man in surprised delight - and then leapt straight from Tinker's shoulder to his, nuzzling against his neck, making little crooning noises. Tinker was so amazed that he stared without saying a word.

'See?' said the man. 'He's my little friend already. Don't gawp so, little fellow. I've trained the monkey family all my life. You lend me this little chap and I'll teach him to ride a small tricycle in two days!'

'Come here, Mischief!' said Tinker, amazed and angry at the monkey's behaviour. But Mischief cuddled down still farther into the big man's neck. The man hauled him out and handed him to Tinker.

'There you are,' he said. 'Nice little fellow he is. What is it you wanted to say to me?'

'I've come to say that this field belongs to my father, Professor Hayling,' said Tinker. 'And you've no right to bring your caravans here. So please take them all out. I and my friends are planning to camp out here.'

'Well, I've no objection to that,' said the big man, good-temperedly. 'You choose your own corner, young sir. If you don't interfere with us, we shan't interfere with you!'

A boy of about Tinker's age came sidling up, and looked at Tinker and Mischief with interest. 'Is he selling you that monkey, Grandad?' he asked.

'No, I'M NOT!' almost shouted Tinker. 'I came to tell you and your caravans to clear out. This field belongs to my family.'

'Ah, but we've an old licence to come here every ten years, and show our circus,' said the bearded man. 'And believe it or not, there's been a Tapper's circus in this field every ten years since the year 1648. So you just run home and make no silly fuss, young man.'

'You're a fibber!' cried Tinker, losing his temper. 'I'll tell the police! I'll tell my father! I'll...'

'Don't you talk to my old Grandad like that!' shouted the boy, standing beside the old man. 'I'll hit you if you do!'

'I'll say what I like!' shouted Tinker, his temper now quite lost. 'And just you shut up!'

The very next moment Tinker found himself flat on his back on the grass. The boy had shot out his fist and hit Tinker hard in the chest! He struggled to his feet, red in the face, quite furious.

The old man fended him away. 'Don't you be silly now, boy,' he said. 'This youngster is a Tapper, like me, and he'll never give in. You go home and be sensible. We ain't going to take notice of a hot-headed little kid like you. Our circus is coming in this here field, just like it has for years and years!'

He turned and walked to the nearest caravan. It was drawn by horses, and he clicked to them. They strained forward and the caravan followed. Others behind began to move too. The circus boy put his tongue out at Tinker. 'Sucks to you!' he said. 'Nobody gets the better of my Grandad - or of me either! Still - it was plucky of you to go for him. I enjoyed it.'

'Shut up!' said Tinker, alarmed to find himself very near to tears. 'You just wait till my Dad tells the police! You'll all go out much quicker than you came in - and one of these days I'll knock you down!'

He turned and ran back to the gate. He wondered what to do. He had so often heard his father say that the field behind their house belonged to him, and that he had let this or that farmer have the grazing rights for his horses or cattle. How DARE the Travelling Circus come into his father's field?

'I'll tell Dad,' he said to Anne, who was waiting at the gate. 'He ought to turn them out! It's our field and I love it, especially just now when it's so green and beautiful, and the hedges are just going to be covered in white may. I'll tell Dad that boy knocked me down - shot out his fist just like that - and down I went. I'd like to do the same to him!'

He went into the house, followed by a puzzled Anne. He looked into the sitting-room and saw George there.

'Tinker! That boy knocked you down!' said Anne, in a horrified voice. 'Why did he do that?'

'Oh - just because I told his Grandad to take his caravans away,' said Tinker, feeling rather grand. 'He didn't hurt me at all - just punched me on the chest. Still - I said what I had gone to say.'

'But will they take the caravans away out of the field?' asked Anne.

'I told them I'd tell the police,' said Tinker. 'So I bet they'll skedaddle. They haven't any right to be there. It's our field!'

'Are you going to the police?' asked George, disbelievingly. 'I really don't see why you have to make such a fuss about it all, Tinker. They might make it difficult for us to go camping there.'

'But I tell you it's my field - Dad's always said so!' said Tinker. 'He said it wasn't any use to him, so I could consider it my own. And I do. AND we're going to camp in it, whatever anyone says! It's a travelling circus that's coming there, so the old man said.'

'Oh TINKER! How marvellous to have a circus at the bottom of the garden!' said George, her eyes shining, and Anne nodded too. Tinker glared at them.

'JUST like girls to say a thing like that!' he said. 'Would you want people trespassing all over a field that belonged to you, with horses neighing and tigers and lions roaring, and bears grunting, and chimpanzees stealing things - and nasty little circus boys being rude all the time, ready to knock you down.'

'Oh Tinker! You do make it sound so exciting!' said George. 'Will there really be lions and tigers? Suppose one escaped - what a thrill!'

'Well - I shouldn't like that,' said Anne, at once. 'I don't particularly want a lion peering in at my window, or a bear clomping round my bedroom!'

'Neither do I,' said Tinker, in a most decided voice. 'That's why I'm going to tell Dad about it. He's got the old documents that set out our rights to that field. He showed me them one day. I'll ask him about them, and if he'll let me see them, I'll take them straight to the police and let them turn out that rude old man and his horrible circus.'

'How do you know it's horrible?' asked George. 'It might be awfully good. I'm sure they'd let us camp in the corner nearest the garden, and we'd get an awfully good view of what's going on all the time. Look - there's your father strolling down the path, smoking a pipe. He never does that if he's busy. It would be a good time to go and ask him about the document. He might even show it to us.'

'All right,' said Tinker, rather sulkily. 'But you'll see I'm right. Come on.'

However, Tinker proved to be quite, quite wrong! His father went to fetch the old, yellowed piece of parchment at once. 'Ha! Here it is!' he said. 'It's pretty valuable too, because it's so old. It dates back quite a few centuries.'

He undid the rather dirty piece of ribbon round it and unrolled it. Neither the girls nor Tinker could read the old-fashioned lettering.

'What does it all say?' asked Anne, with great interest.

'It says that the field known as 'Cromwell's Corner' is to be held by the Hayling Family for always,' said Professor Hayling. 'It was given to them by Cromwell because our family allowed them to camp in that field when they sorely needed a rest after battle. It's been ours ever since.'

'So NOBODY else is allowed to camp in it, or use it for grazing or anything, unless we say so!' said Tinker, triumphantly.

'Quite right,' said his father. 'But wait a minute - I seem to remember an odd clause that said something about a travelling show - a show that had rights to camp in the field since about 1066. Not even Cromwell could alter that - it was in the original deeds, long before Cromwell battled in that district. Now let's see - that piece would come about the end, I expect.'

The two girls and Tinker waited while the Professor pored over the old and beautiful lettering. He jabbed his finger on to three lines towards the end.

'Yes. There it is. I'll quote it. Listen! 'And let it be known that Ye Travelling Show so-named 'Tapper's Travelling Show', which has always had camping rights, shall still have the right to claim these once every ten years so long as the show travels the country ways - Given under my hand...' and so on and so on. Well - I don't expect that Tapper's Travelling Show is going now, all these years and years after the document was drawn up and signed in the year 1648. See - here's the date - if you can read the old figures!'

The children stared at the date, and then glanced up at Tinker. He looked angry and very red in the face. 'You might have told me all that before, Dad,' he said.

'Why?' asked his father, astonished. 'What possible interest can it have for you children?'

'Only that there's a circus called Tapper's Travelling Circus in that field this very minute,' said Anne. 'And the old man with it is called Tapper - and he said it was his right to be there, and...'

'He was rude to me and I want you to turn out this circus this very day!' said Tinker. 'We want to camp there.'

'I'm sure Mr. Tapper would have no objection to you camping there,' said his father. 'Aren't you being rather silly, Tinker? You weren't rude to any of the circus folk, were you?'

Tinker went very red, turned his back and stalked out of the room, Mischief clinging to his neck. He rubbed his chest where the circus boy had punched him. 'Just you wait!' he said in a whisper. 'I'll punch you one day!'

'Anne, if you and the others want to camp in the field, I'll go and speak to Mr. Tapper,' said the Professor, puzzled by Tinker's behaviour.

'Oh no - it's all right,' said Anne, hastily. 'He has already said that it didn't matter if we camped there. Oh - there are the boys back again. I'll just go and see if they have brought back all our bicycles safely. Thank you for showing us that marvellous old document, Professor!'

And away she went looking rather hot and bothered!

Chapter 6

GETTING READY FOR CAMPING OUT

Dick and Julian were most interested to hear about Tinker and the Travelling Circus - and the old, old document.

'You made a bit of a fool of yourself,' said Julian, looking at Tinker. 'Still, there's no harm done, apparently. I vote we go and see where we can put up our tents. Personally, I shall be thrilled to see a bit of circus life so close to me! I wonder how they'll manage to put on a show. I suppose they've everything with them, and can put up a circus ring and a marquee and anything else necessary.'

'There are a lot of big vans,' said Anne. 'I went down to have a look about half an hour ago. The field is almost full now, except for one corner near our hedge that I suppose they have left for our tents.'

'I saw the posters about the circus as we cycled back,' said Dick. 'Dead-Shot Dick - Chimpanzee that plays Cricket - the Boneless Man - Madelon and her Beautiful Horses - Monty and Winks the clowns - the Dancing Donkey - Mr. Wooh, the Wonder Wizard - gosh, it sounded quite a circus. I'm glad we can camp in the same field - we shall really see behind the scenes, then.'

'Don't forget there was Charlie the Chimp, and the Bonzo Band,' said Julian. 'What fun if the chimp got loose and peeped in at the kitchen window!'

'It wouldn't be at all funny,' said Anne. 'Jenny would run for miles! So would Tinker's monkey!'

'What about putting up our own tents after tea?' said Dick. 'The carrier said he'd have them here by tea-time. It's hotter than ever today. I don't feel I can do much at the moment. I just want to laze.'

'Woof,' said Timmy, who was lying down with his head on his paws, panting.

'You feel the same, old chap, don't you?' said Julian, poking him with his toe. 'You're tired out with your long run to Kirrin and back again, aren't you?'

'The roads were so dusty!' said Dick. 'He kept sneezing whenever a car passed us, because the dust got up his nose. Poor old Tim. You really are tired out with that long, long run!'

'Woof!' said Tim, suddenly sitting up straight and pawing vigorously at George. Everyone laughed.

'He says he's not at all tired, he wants a walk,' chuckled Dick.

'Well, if he's not tired, I am,' said Julian. 'It really was a job sorting out all our things at Kirrin - and cycling there and back. No, Timmy - I am NOT going to take you for a walk!'

Timmy whined, and at once Mischief the monkey leapt down from Tinker's shoulder and went to cuddle against the big dog, making small comforting noises. He even put his thin little arms round Timmy's neck!

'You're just being a little bit sippy, Mischief,' said Tinker, but Mischief didn't care. His big friend was sad about something, or he wouldn't have whined. Timmy put out a big red tongue and licked the little creature delicately on his nose. Then he suddenly pricked up his ears, and sat straight up. He had heard a noise from somewhere. So had all the others.

'It's music of some kind,' said Anne. 'Oh - I believe I know what it is!'

'What?' said the others.

'It must be Tapper's Travelling Circus Band practising for opening night,' said Anne.

'Well, that's tomorrow,' yawned George. 'Yes - it does sound like a band. Maybe we shall see the bandsmen after tea, when we put up our tents. I'd like to see the Boneless Man, wouldn't you?'

'NO!' said Anne. 'He'd be all limp and wriggly and horrid - like a worm or a jellyfish! I shan't go and see him. But I'd love to see the horses and the Dancing Donkey. Does he dance to the band, do you think?'

'We'll find out when we go,' said Dick, 'as it opens tomorrow. If Mr. Tapper isn't annoyed about Tinker trying to turn them out, he might let us wander round.'

'I don't think I want to come,' said Tinker. 'Mr. Tapper was rude - and that boy knocked me flat.'

'Well, I expect I'd do the same if I thought you were being rude to my Grandad,' said Julian, lazily. 'Now - it's settled, is it, that we go down with our things to the field after tea, and see if we can put up our tents in some sheltered corner?'

'Yes,' said everyone. Dick idly tickled Mischief's nose with a thin blade of grass. The monkey sneezed at once, and then again. He rubbed his little paw across his nose and stared disapprovingly at Dick. Then he sneezed once more.

'Borrow a hanky, old thing,' said Julian. And, to everyone's intense amusement, Mischief leapt across to Dick and neatly pulled his handkerchief out of his pocket! Then he pretended to blow his nose.

Everyone roared with laughter, and Mischief was delighted. 'You'll be stolen to act in a circus one day, if you behave like that!' said Dick, snatching back his hanky. 'The Pick-pocket Monkey!'

'He'd be very good in a circus,' said Julian.

'I'd never let him join a circus!' said Tinker at once. 'He might have a dreadful life.'

'No. I don't think he would,' said Julian. 'Circus-folk love their animals and are proud of them. And after all, if they treated them unkindly, the animals wouldn't be happy or healthy, and couldn't enjoy their acts. Most circus people treat their animals like one of the family.'

'What! Even a chimpanzee!' said Anne, in horror.

'They're nice creatures - and very clever,' said Julian. 'Mischief, do not remove my handkerchief, please. It was funny the first time, but not a second time. Look at him now, trying to undo Timmy's collar.'

'Come and sit quietly by me, Mischief,' ordered Tinker, and the little creature obediently went to him and cuddled on to his knee, making a soft, crooning noise.

'You're a humbug,' said Tinker, fondling him. 'You be careful I don't give you away to the circus, and get an elephant in exchange!'

'Idiot!' said Dick, and everyone laughed at the thought of Tinker and an elephant. What in the world would he do with it?

A voice called from the house. 'Tinker! The carrier's come with all the camping things. He's put them in the hall, just where your father will fall over them. You'd better come and see to them now.'

'In a few minutes, Jenny!' called back Tinker. 'We're busy.'

'You're a real fibber, Tinker,' said Dick. 'We are not busy. You could easily go to find out where the things are, and see if they're all there. There are quite a lot.'

'We'll go in twenty minutes or so,' said Anne, yawning. 'I bet Tinker's father is asleep this hot afternoon. He won't stir out of his study.'

But she was wrong. Professor Hayling was wide awake, and when he had finished his work, he wanted a drink of very cold water. He threw open his study door, strode out towards the kitchen - and fell over a pile of all kinds of camping gear, bringing them down with a tremendous noise.

Jenny rushed out of the kitchen with loud screams of fright, and the Professor bellowed in anger as he took a ground-sheet off his head, and a tent-pole off his back. 'WHAT ARE THESE THINGS? I WILL NOT HAVE THEM IN THE HALL! JENNY! JENNY! Take them down to the bonfire and burn the lot!'

'Our camping things!' cried George, listening in horror. 'Quick! We must get them! Oh, I do hope Tinker's father hasn't hurt himself. Blow, blow, blow!'

While Julian and Dick deftly removed everything that had fallen on to the angry Professor and took them down the garden, Anne and George comforted him, and made such a fuss of him that he began to feel decidedly less angry. He sat down in a chair and wiped his forehead. 'I hope you've taken all those things down to the bottom of the garden?' he asked, after a while.

'Yes,' said Tinker, truthfully. 'Er - they're all by the bonfire, but it's not lighted yet.'

'I'll light it myself tomorrow,' said his father, and Tinker heaved a sigh of relief. His father would forget, of course - and anyhow, everything was going to be taken into the camping field after tea.

'Have a cup of nice hot tea, sir,' said Jenny, appearing with a tray of tea-things. 'Sit you down and drink this. It's newly made. Best thing to have after a fall and a shock.'

She turned and whispered crossly to Tinker. 'Didn't I call to you and tell you the Professor would trip over those things, the poor man? Now you just get your own tea, while I take him into the dining-room and comfort him with a nice hot scone, and a cup of tea!'

'I'll get our tea,' said Anne. 'Then we'll set up the tents down in the field, and enjoy ourselves. And Tinker, don't you get into any more trouble with the circus folk.'

'I'll see he doesn't,' said George, firmly. 'Come on - let's go down to the field while Anne gets the tea. I could do with a bun or two!'

Between them, Dick and Julian had lugged all the things down the garden - two tents, ground-sheets, blankets, tent-pegs and all the rest. Timmy ran with them in excitement, wondering what all the fuss was about. Mischief, of course, leapt to the top of whatever was being carried, and chattered excitedly all the way down the garden.

He got into trouble when he ran off with a tent-peg, but Timmy managed to catch him and make him drop it. Then, very solemnly, Timmy carried the tent-peg to Julian.

'Good dog!' said Julian. 'Just keep an eye on that wicked little monkey, Tim, will you? There are all sorts of things he might run off with!'

So Timmy kept an eye on Mischief, nosing him away whenever he thought the monkey was going to pick up something he shouldn't. Finally Mischief became tired of Timmy's nose and leapt on his back, where, clinging to the dog's collar, he rode just as if he were on horseback. 'Only it's dogback, not horseback,' said Anne, with a laugh.

'They would make quite a good pair for the circus,' said Dick. 'I bet Mischief could hold on to reins, if Timmy had any!'

'Well, he's not going to have any,' said George. 'The next thing would be a whip! Whew! What a lot of things we've got - is that the lot?'

It was, thank goodness. A bell rang out from the house at that moment, and everyone heaved a sigh of relief.

'Tea at last!' said Dick. 'I could drink a whole potful. Come on - we've finished piling up all the things. We'll get busy after tea with them, I can't do a thing more. Don't you agree, Timmy?'

'WOOF!' said Timmy, heartily, and galloped up the garden path at top speed, with Mischief scampering after him.

'Talk about a circus!' said Dick. 'We've a ready-made one here! All right, Anne - we're coming! We're coming!'

Chapter 7
IN THE CIRCUS FIELD

Nobody wanted to spend a long time over tea. They all longed to go down to the field and set up their little camp.

'We shall have a wonderful look-in at what goes on in a circus camp,' said Dick. 'We shall be living so near the circus folk! I do hope Mischief won't get too friendly with the people there. They might take him away with them when they leave.'

'Indeed they won't!' said Tinker, fiercely. 'What a thing to say! As if Mischief would go with them, anyhow! I don't expect he'll mix with the circus crowd at all.'

'You wait and see!' grinned Dick. 'Now buck up with your tea - I'm longing to go and set our camp in the field, and see what's going on there.'

It wasn't long before they were ready. They were soon down by the fence, and gazed over it in amazement. Great vans were in the field, all with Mr. Tapper's name on and all painted in gay colours. There were caravans too, much smaller than the great vans, and these had windows, each with neat lace curtains. The circus folk lived in the caravans, of course, and George found herself wishing that she herself could go about in one, instead of living in a house that couldn't move anywhere!

'Look at the horses!' cried Dick, as a bunch of them appeared with tossing heads and beautiful long thick tails. The boy who had knocked Tinker down was with them, whistling. They were all coming from a big horse-van, and were delighted to be in a field with lush green grass.

'Is that field gate properly shut?' yelled an enormous voice, and the boy yelled back, 'Yes, Granddad. I shut it. There's nowhere the horses can get out. My word - don't they like this grass!'

Then he saw Julian and the others all looking over the fence, and waved to them. 'See our horses? Aren't they a grand lot?'

And, just to show off a little, he leapt on to the back of the nearest one, and went all round the edge of the field with it. George watched him enviously. If only she could have a horse like that!

'Well, let's take our camp things into the field,' said Tinker. 'The nearer we are to the circus the better. We ought to have some fun.'

He climbed over the fence and Dick followed. 'I'll hand everything over,' said Julian. 'George can help me - she's as good as a boy any day!'

George grinned. She loved to hear anyone say that! It was quite a job getting some of the things over the fence. The tents, neatly wrapped though they were, were heavy, awkward things to handle, but at last everything was safely over, lying on the grass.

Then Julian, Anne and George climbed over the fence too, and stood in the field, looking round for a good corner to set up their things.

'What about near those bushes over there?' said Julian. 'There's that big tree behind as well to protect us from the wind - and we aren't too near the circus folk - they might not like us right on top of them - and yet we're near enough to see what's going on.'

'Oh, it's going to be FUN!' said Anne, her eyes shining.

'I think I'd better go and find the old Grandad - Mr. Tapper,' said Julian. 'Just to tell him we're here, in case he thinks we're intruders and have no right to be here.'

'You haven't got to ask his permission for us to be in MY field!' said Tinker, at once.

'Now don't keep flying off the handle like that, Tinker,' said Julian. 'This is merely a question of good manners - something you don't seem to know much about! How do we know that the circus folk won't resent us camping so near them? Much better to show ourselves friendly from the start.'

'All right, all right,' said Tinker, sulkily. 'But it is my field, after all! You'll be telling me to be friends with that nasty little circus-boy next!'

'Well, you'd better be - else he might knock you flat again!' said George. 'Anyway, be sensible, Tinker - it's not often people have a circus just at the bottom of their garden, and can pop over the fence, and mix with the circus folk.'

Julian walked over to the nearest caravan. It was empty, and no one answered his knock.

'What you want, mister?' called a high little voice, and a small girl with tangled, untidy hair came running up.

'Where's Mr. Tapper?' asked Julian, smiling at the untidy, bright-eyed little thing.

'He's with one of the horses,' said the small girl. 'Who are you?'

'We're your neighbours,' said Julian. 'Will you take us to Mr. Tapper?'

'Old Grandad's this way,' said the child, and slipped a dirty little hand into Julian's. 'I'll show you. I like you, mister.'

She led the children to the middle of the camp. A mournful howl came from somewhere behind them and George stopped suddenly. 'That's Timmy! He must have found out that we've got out of the garden. I'll go back for him.'

'Better not,' said Julian. 'There might be ructions if he met the chimpanzee. A big chimp would make mincemeat of him!'

'It wouldn't!' said George, but all the same she didn't go back to fetch Timmy. Julian hoped that the dog wouldn't jump over the fence, and come to find them.

'There's old Grandad Tapper on them steps,' said the little girl, smiling up at Julian, whose hand she still held. 'I like you, mister. Your hand smells nice.'

'Well, that's because I wash it with soap and water four or five times a day,' said Julian. 'Yours would smell nice too, if you did the same.'

The little girl sniffed at Julian's hand. Then she shouted loudly to the old fellow sitting on the steps of a nearby caravan. 'Grandad! Here's folks to see you!'

Grandad was looking at a beautiful chestnut-brown horse, tethered close to him. He had one of the horse's hooves in his hand. The children stood and gazed at him - black beard, frowning eyebrows - and, oh dear! thought Anne, only one ear, poor man. What could have happened to the missing one?

'GRANDAD!' called the girl again. FOLKS TO SEE YOU!'

Mr. Tapper looked round, his eyes very bright under his black eye-brows. He set the horse's hoof down, and gave the lovely creature a pat. 'You don't need to limp any more, my beauty,' he said.

'I've taken out the stone that was in your hoof. You can dance again!'

The horse lifted up its magnificent head and neighed as if it were saying thank you. Tinker almost jumped out of his skin, and Mischief slipped from his shoulder and cuddled under his arm in terror.

'Now, now, little monkey, don't you know a horse's voice when you hear one?' said Grandad, and Mischief poked his head out from under Tinker's arm to listen.

'Does that horse really dance?' said Anne, longing to stroke its long, smooth nose.

'Dance! It's one of the finest horse-dancers in the world!' said Grandad, and began to whistle a gay little tune. The horse pricked up its ears, gazed at Grandad, and then began to dance! The children watched in astonishment.

There it went, round and round, nodding its head to the tune, its feet tapping the grass in perfect time to Grandad's whistling.

'Oh, the lovely thing!' said George. 'Do all your horses dance as well as this one?'

'Yes. Some a good deal better,' said Grandad. 'This one has a fair ear for music, but not as good an ear as some. You wait till you see them dressed up with feathery plumes nodding on their heads. Horses - there's nothing in the world as beautiful as a good horse.'

'Mr. Tapper - we come from the house over the fence there,' said Julian, feeling that it was time to explain their visit. 'As you probably know, Tinker's father owns this field, and...'

'Yes, yes - but we have an old right to come every so often,' said the old man, raising his voice. 'Now don't you start arg...'

'I haven't come to argue with you,' said Julian, politely. 'I've only just come to say that we - that is my friends here and I - would like to come and camp in this field, but we shouldn't annoy you in any way, and...'

'Oh well - if that's what you want, you're more than welcome!' said the old man. 'More than welcome! I thought maybe you'd think you could turn us out - like that youngster there would like to do!' And he nodded at Tinker.

Tinker went red and said nothing. The old man laughed. 'Ha! My grandson didn't think much of that idea, did he, youngster? He hit out, and down you went on your back. He's got a temper, he has, young Jeremy. But another time maybe he'll find himself on his back, eh?'

'Yes. He will,' said Tinker, at once.

'Right. Well, you'll be even with one another then, and you can shake hands like gentlemen,' said the old man, his eyes twinkling. 'Now - what about you bringing your gear right into the field, and setting up your tents? I'll get old Charlie the Chimp to help you. He's as strong as ten men!'

'The chimpanzee! Is he tame enough to help us to put up our tents?' said Anne, disbelievingly.

'Old Charlie is cleverer than all of you put together, and as tame as you are!' said Grandad. 'And he could beat you three boys at cricket any day! You bring your bat along one morning, and watch him. I'll call him to help you. CHARLIE! CHARLIE! Where are you? Snoozing I suppose!'

But no Charlie came. 'You go and fetch him,' said the old man, pointing to a corner of the field where stood a big, strong cage, with a tarpaulin roof to keep out the rain. 'He'll do anything you want him to do, so long as you give him a word of praise now and again!'

'Let's get him, Ju,' said Dick, eagerly. 'My word - fancy having a chimpanzee to help us!' And off they all went to the great cage. CHARLIE! CHARLIE! Wake up, you're wanted! CHARLIE!

Chapter 8

CHARLIE THE CHIMP IS A HELP!

Tinker came to the big cage first. He peered inside. Charlie the Chimp was there all right, sitting at the back of his cage, his brown eyes looking at the children with curiosity. He got up and went over to where Tinker was peering in, and pressed his nose against the strong wire, almost against Tinker's. Then he blew hard, and Tinker backed away, surprised and cross.

'He blew at me!' he said to the others, who were laughing at Tinker's disgust. The chimp made a funny noise that Mischief the monkey immediately tried to imitate. The chimpanzee stared at Mischief, then he grew very excited. He rattled his cage, jumped up and down, and made some very queer noises indeed.

A boy came running up at once. It was the boy who had knocked Tinker down. 'Hey - what are you doing to the chimp?' he called. 'Oh - aren't you the boy who shouted at my Grandad - the one I knocked down?'

'Yes. And don't you dare try that on again, or you'll be sorry!' said Tinker, in a fierce voice.

'Shut up, Tinker,' said Julian. He turned to the boy. 'Your name's Jeremy, isn't it?' he said. 'Well, we've just been talking to your Grandad over there, and he said we could get the chimpanzee to help us with our camping gear. It's all right for him to come out of his cage, isn't it?'

'Oh yes - I take him out two or three times a day,' said Jeremy. 'He gets bored in his cage. He'd love to help put up your tents - he's always helping us circus folk with things like that. He's as strong as a lion.'

'Is he - er - is he safe?' asked Dick, eyeing the big animal doubtfully.

'Safe? What do you mean - safe?' asked Jeremy, surprised. 'He's as safe as I am! Charlie, come on out! Go on, you can undo your cage perfectly well, you know you can!'

The chimpanzee made a funny little chuckling noise, put his hand through the wire, reached the bolt, pulled it, took his hand back - and pushed open the cage door.

'See? Easy, isn't it?' said Jeremy, grinning. 'Charlie boy, come along. Your help's wanted!'

Charlie lumbered out of his cage, and went with the children to where they had left their tents and ground-sheets and the rest. He walked with his fists on the ground in a most inelegant manner, making a funny little groaning noise all the time. Mischief was rather afraid of him, and kept well to the back - but the chimpanzee suddenly turned round, caught hold of Mischief, and sat him up on his shoulder! Mischief held on, not knowing whether to be scared or jubilant!

'I wish I had my camera here,' said Anne to George. 'Just look at them - Mischief is as pleased as can be!'

They arrived at the pile of camping gear. 'Carry this, Charlie, and follow us,' ordered Jeremy. The chimp grabbed at this, that and the other, and, with his great arms full, followed the children to where they thought they could camp, with the great hedge to shelter them from the wind.

'Drop those things, Charlie,' said Jeremy, 'and go back for the rest. Buck up. Don't stand there staring! You've got work to do!'

But Charlie still crouched there, staring straight at Mischief. 'Oh! He wants Mischief the monkey to go with him!' cried George. 'Go on, Mischief, have a ride again!'

Mischief leapt up on to the chimpanzee's shoulders. Charlie put up a great paw to steady him and then lumbered off to fetch the rest of the things. One of the ground-sheets came undone, and slithered over his head like a tent, so that he couldn't see where he was going. In a rage he leapt on it and began to jump up and down, up and down, growling most terrifyingly. The children felt rather scared.

'Charlie, don't be an ass!' said Jeremy, and pulled it away from him, rolling it up swiftly. The chimpanzee could manage it then, and his good temper immediately came back again.

Everything was soon piled up in one place, and Julian and Dick began to put up the tents. Charlie watched them with the greatest interest, and helped most intelligently when he saw that he could.

'He's a good sort, isn't he?' said Jeremy, proud that his friend the chimpanzee could show off like this. 'Did you see him put that tent-pole in exactly the right place? And you ought to see him fetch the pails of water for the horses each day. He carries a full pail in each hand!'

'He ought to get wages,' said Tinker.

'He does!' said Jeremy. 'He gets eight bananas a day and as many oranges as he likes. And he LOVES sweets!'

'Oh! I think I've got some!' said Tinker and delved into one of his pockets. He brought up a peculiar mixture of things, among which was a screwed-up sweet bag. Inside was a mess of half-melted boiled sweets.

'You can't give him those!' said Anne. 'They're old and sticky and messy!'

But Charlie thought differently. He took the paper bag straight out of Tinker's hand, sniffed it - and then put the whole thing into his mouth at once!

'He'll choke!' said Julian.

'Not Charlie!' said Jeremy. 'Let him be. He'll go straight back to his cage, get in, shoot the bolt and sit there sucking sweets till they're gone. He'll be as happy as can be.'

'Well - he certainly deserved a reward,' said George. 'He did all the heavy work! Come on, let's finish putting everything straight. I say - won't it be fun sleeping out in tents tonight! We'd better have supper first.'

'You can come and join us, if you like,' said Jeremy. 'We don't have posh food like you, of course - but it's good food, all the same. Old Grandma cooks it in her pot. She's two hundred years old.'

The children laughed in disbelief. 'Two hundred! Nobody lives as long as that!' said George.

'Well, that's what she tells everyone,' said Jeremy. 'And she looks it, too! But her eyes are as sharp as needles still! Shall I tell her you'll be here to supper?'

'Well - would there be enough for so many extra?' said Julian. 'We meant to bring our own meal. Should we bring that and share everything with you? We've more than enough. Our cook Jenny said she would have it all ready for us to bring down tonight - a meat-pie - cold sausages - and apples and bananas.'

'Sh! Don't say bananas in front of Charlie,' said Jeremy. 'He'll worry you for them all the time. All right - you bring your food and we'll share with you round our camp-fire. I'll tell old Grandma. We're having a sing-song tonight, and Fred the Fiddler's playing his fiddle. Ah, that fiddle! Its tunes get into your feet and away you go!'

This all sounded very exciting. Julian thought they ought to go back home before anyone began to be worried about their complete disappearance, and pack up the food for supper that night.

'We'll be back as soon as we can,' said he. 'And thanks awfully for all your help. Come on, Mischief. Say good-bye to Charlie for the moment, and don't look so gloomy. We're coming back here tonight!'

They all went back over the fence, feeling a little tired now, but full of their plans for the evening. 'It's almost like belonging to the circus, going back to sit round a camp-fire and eat supper from that old black stewpot on the fire,' said Tinker. 'I bet the supper will taste delicious. I say - I hope Dad won't mind us popping off to the circus camp.'

'I don't expect he'll even notice that we've gone,' said George. 'My father never notices things like that. Sometimes he doesn't even notice when people are there, in front of his nose!'

'Well, that must be useful at times if they're people he doesn't like,' said Tinker. 'Now - let's see what Jenny's got that we can take back with us.'

Jenny listened wide-eyed to all they had to say. 'Well, well, well!' she said. 'Camping out with the circus-folk! Whatever next? I'd like to know what your parents would think of that, Master Julian!'

'We'll ask them, next time we see them,' said Julian, with a grin. 'What do you have for our supper? We're taking it down to our camp.'

'I thought maybe you'd do that,' said Jenny. 'It's all cold. A meat pie - cold sausages - a cucumber and lettuce hearts and tomatoes, rolls - and apples and bananas. Will that be enough?'

'Gosh, yes,' said Tinker, thrilled. 'What about something to drink?'

'You can take lemonade or orangeade with you, whichever you please,' said Jenny. 'But listen now - don't go bursting into your father's workroom. He's worked hard all day, and he's tired.'

'And cross, I expect,' said Tinker. 'People are always cross when they're tired. Except you, dear, dear Jenny.'

'Ha! You want something else out of my cupboard, calling me your dear, dear Jenny,' she said with a twinkle.

'Could we have some sugar-lumps?' asked Tinker. 'Oh, Jenny, there are the loveliest horses you ever saw down in the circus field. I want to give them a sugar lump each.'

'And yourself a few as well!' said Jenny. 'All right. I'll pack up everything for you, and give you a few enamel plates and mugs and knives. What about Timmy? Doesn't he want a meal too?'

'Wuff!' said Timmy, glad that someone had remembered him. Jenny patted his big head. 'It's all ready in the larder for you,' she said. 'George, you go and get it. He must be hungry.'

George fetched a plate of meat and biscuits from the larder and Timmy fell on it with happy little barks. Yes - he was very, VERY hungry!

At last all the food was ready-packed to take down the garden to the field. What a lot there seemed! Well, they would certainly have plenty to spare for their circus friends. They said good night to Jenny, and set off down the garden again. They thought they had better not disturb Professor Hayling.

'He might be cross and forbid us to go and feed with the circus-folk,' said Tinker. 'Mischief, come off that basket, and don't pretend you weren't fishing in it for a banana. And please put on your best table-manners tonight, or Charlie the Chimp will be ashamed of you!'

It was fun going back down the garden and over the fence into the field again. The sun was sinking fast and soon the shadows would fall. How lovely to sit round a fire and eat supper with the kindly circus-folk - and perhaps to sing old songs with them - and hear Fred the Fiddler fiddle his old, old tunes! What fun to creep into a tent, and sleep with the cries of owls around, and stars shining in at the tent opening!

There they go, over the fence, handing the food one to another. Take your paw out of that basket, Mischief! That's right, Timmy, nibble his ear if he's as mischievous as his name! You're all going to have some fun tonight!

Chapter 9

A WONDERFUL EVENING

As soon as Jeremy saw the visitors climbing over the fence, he ran to help them. He was very excited at the thought of having guests. He took them over to old Grandad first, to be welcomed. 'Now I expect your friends will like to see round a bit,' said Grandad. 'Charlie the Chimp can go with you. We've a rehearsal on tonight, so the ring has been set up. You can watch some of the show.'

This was grand news. The children saw that curved pieces of painted wood had been set together to make a great ring in the field, and as they went across the grass, the Musical Horses began to troop into the ring, the leading one ridden by Madelon, a lovely girl, dressed in shimmering gold. 'How beautiful they are!' thought Anne, as she watched. 'Look at their great feathery plumes, nodding on their magnificent heads.'

The Bonzo Band struck up just then, and the horses at once trotted in perfect time to the music. The band looked a little peculiar as the bandsmen had not put on their smart uniforms. They were saving those for the opening night!

The horses trotted prettily out of the ring after two or three rounds, the beautiful Madelon on the leading horse. Then in came Fred the Fiddler and played his violin for a few minutes. First the music was slow and solemn, then Fred began to play quickly, and the children found themselves jiggling about, up and down and round about. 'I can't keep still!' panted Anne. 'The tune's got into my feet.'

Charlie the Chimp came up just then, walking on hind legs, and looking unexpectedly tall. He usually walked on all fours. He began to jig about too, looking very funny. He ran right into the ring and put his arms round Fred the Fiddler's legs. 'He loves Fred,' said Jeremy. 'Now he's going to rehearse his cricket act. I must go and bowl to him.'

And off went Jeremy into the ring. The chimpanzee rushed over to him and hugged him. A bat was thrown into the ring, and Charlie picked it up, and made a few swipes into the air with it, making delighted noises all the time.

Then a cricket ball was thrown to Jeremy, who caught it deftly. A small girl appeared from somewhere and set up three stumps for a wicket. 'Can't find the bails, Jeremy!' she called. 'Have you got them in your pocket?'

'No,' said Jeremy. 'Never mind, I'll knock the stumps right over!'

But that wasn't so easy with Charlie the Chimp at the wicket! He took a terrific swipe at the ball, and it went right over Jeremy's head, too high to catch.

The chimp lost his balance and sat down on the wicket, knocking the stumps out of the ground.

'OUT!' yelled Jeremy, but the chimp wasn't having that. He carefully put up the stumps again, and then set himself in front once more, wagging the bat.

It was the funniest cricket that the children had ever seen! The chimpanzee was very, very clever with the bat, and sent poor Jeremy running all over the place. Then finally he chased the boy all round the ring with the bat making curious chortling noises. The children didn't know if he was amused or angry! Finally he threw the bat at Jeremy and walked off, scratching himself under one arm.

The children roared with laughter at him. 'He's as good as any clown!' said Dick. 'Jeremy, does he do this cricket act every night when the circus is open?'

'Oh yes - and sometimes he hits the ball into the audience,' said Jeremy. 'There's great excitement then. Sometimes, for a treat, we let one of the boys in the audience come down and bowl to Charlie. One bowled him right out once, and Charlie was so cross that he chased him all round the ring three times - just as he chased me just now. The boy didn't like it much!'

Charlie came up to Jeremy, and put his great arms round him, trying to swing him off the ground.

'Stop that, Charlie,' said Jeremy, wriggling free. 'Look out - here comes the Dancing Donkey! Better get out of the ring - goodness knows what antics he'll be up to!'

In came the Dancing Donkey. He was dark grey, and tossed his head as he came galloping in. He stood and looked round at everyone. Then he sat down, lifted up a leg and scratched his nose. The children stared in astonishment. They had never in their lives seen a donkey do that before! Then, when the band suddenly began to play, the donkey stood up and listened, flapping his ears first one way and then another, and nodding his head in time to the music.

The band changed its tune to a march. The donkey listened again, and then began to march round the ring in perfect time - clip-clop-clip-clop-clip-clop. Then it apparently felt tired, and sat down heavily on its back legs. The children couldn't help laughing. The donkey got up, and somehow its back legs became entangled with its front ones, and it fell down, looking most ridiculous.

'Has it hurt itself?' asked Anne, anxiously. 'Oh dear - it will break one of its legs if it goes on like this. Look, it can't untangle them, Jeremy.'

The donkey gave a mournful bray, tried to get up, and flopped down again. The band changed its tune, and the donkey leapt up at once, and began to do a kind of tap-dance - clickety-click, clickety-click, clickety-click - it was marvellous!

'I shouldn't have thought that a donkey could possibly have been taught to tap-dance,' said George.

Soon the donkey seemed to feel tired again. It stopped dancing, but the band still went on playing. The donkey ran towards it and stamped its foot.

A weird voice suddenly came from it. 'Too fast! TOO FAST!' But the band took no notice and went on playing. The donkey bent down, wriggled hard - and its head fell off on to the grass in the ring! Anne gave a shriek of fright.

'Don't be an ass, Anne,' said Dick. 'You didn't think the donkey was a real one, did you?'

'Isn't it?' said Anne, relieved. 'It looks just like that donkey that used to give rides to children on Kirrin beach.'

The donkey now split in half, and a small man climbed out of each half, taking their legs carefully out of the donkey's legs. The donkey-skin fell to the ground, and lay there, flat and collapsed.

'Wish I had a donkey-skin like that,' said Tinker. 'I've got a friend at school who could be the back legs and I'd be the front legs. The things we'd do!'

'Well, I must say you'd make a first-class donkey, the way you behave sometimes,' said George. 'Look, this must be Dead-Shot Dick coming on.'

But before Dead-Shot Dick could do any of his shooting tricks, the two donkey-men had run to the band and begun a loud argument with them.

'Why play so fast? You know we can't do our tricks at top speed. Are you trying to mess up our turn?'

The band leader shouted something back. It must have been rude, because one of the donkey-men shook his fist and began to run towards the band.

A loud voice crashed in on the argument, and made everyone jump. It was Mr. Tapper, old Grandad, giving his orders in an enormous voice.

'ENOUGH! You, Pat, and you, Jim, get out of the ring. I give the orders, not you. ENOUGH, I SAY!'

The two donkey-men glared at him, but did not dare to say a word more. They stalked out of the ring, taking the donkey-skin with them.

Dead-Shot Dick looked very ordinary, dressed in a rather untidy flannel suit. 'He's not going to go all through his act,' said Jeremy. 'You'll see him another night, when the show's on for the public - he shoots at all kinds of things - even a sixpenny bit dangling on a long string from the roof - and never misses! He's got a smashing rig-out too - sequins sewn all over his trousers and jersey - and his little horse is a wonder - goes round and round the ring and never turns a hair when Dead-Shot Dick fires his gun! Look - there he is, peeping in to see if Dick's coming back to him.'

A small white horse was looking anxiously at the ring, its eyes fixed on Dead-Shot Dick. It pawed the ground as if to say, 'Buck up! I'm waiting for you! Am I to come on or not?'

'All right, Dick - you can go off now,' shouted Grandad. 'I hear your horse has hurt a foot - give him a good rest tonight. We'll want him on tomorrow.'

'Right, sir!' said Dead-Shot Dick. He saluted smartly, and ran off to his little horse.

'What's next, Jeremy?' asked George, who was enjoying everything very much.

'Don't know. Let's see - there's the acrobats - but the trapeze-swings aren't put up yet, so they won't come on tonight. And there's the Boneless Man - look, there he is. Good old Boney! I like him. He's free with his money, he is, not like some of the other folk!'

The Boneless Man looked very peculiar. He was remarkably thin, and remarkably tall. He walked in, looking quite extraordinary. 'He can't be boneless!' said Dick. 'He couldn't walk if he was!'

But the Boneless Man soon began to seem absolutely boneless. His legs gave way at the knees, and his ankles turned over so that he sank down to the ground, unable to walk. He could bend his arms all kinds of different ways, and turned his head almost completely round on his neck. He did a few peculiar things with his apparently boneless body, and finally wriggled along the ground exactly like a snake!

'He'll be dressed in a sort of snake-skin when he does his act properly,' said Jeremy. 'Queer, isn't he?'

'How on earth does he do it?' wondered Julian, amazed. 'He bends his arms and legs all the wrong ways! Mine would break if I did that!'

'Oh, it's easy for him!' said Jeremy. 'It's just that he's completely double-jointed - he can bend his arms both ways, and his legs both ways, and make them seem so loose that it looks as if he really is boneless. He's a nice chap. You'd like him.'

Anne felt a bit doubtful. What queer people made up a circus! It was a world of its own. She jumped suddenly as there came the sound of a trumpet blowing loudly.

'That's for supper,' said Jeremy gleefully. 'Come on - let's go to old Grandma and her pot! Buck up, all of you!'

Chapter 10
ROUND THE CAMPFIRE

Jeremy led the way out of the circus-ring. It had been well-lighted, and the night seemed very dark outside the ring. They went over the field to where a large fire was burning, cleverly set about with stones. An enormous cooking-pot was hung over it, and a very, very nice smell came to their noses as they went near.

Old Grandma was there, of course, and she began stirring the pot when she saw them. 'You've been a long time in the ring,' she grumbled to Grandad. 'Anything gone wrong?'

'No,' said Grandad, and sniffed the air. 'I'm hungry. That smells good. Jeremy, help your Grandma.'

'Yes, Grandad,' said Jeremy, and took a pile of plates to the old lady, who at once began ladling out pieces of meat and potatoes and vegetables from the steaming pot. Old Grandad turned to Julian.

'Well - did you like our little rehearsal?' he asked.

'Oh yes!' said Julian. 'I'm only sorry you didn't rehearse all the turns. I badly wanted to see the acrobats and the clowns. Are they here? I can't see them.'

'Oh yes - there's one clown over there - look - with Madelon, who had the horses,' said Grandad. The children looked - and were very disappointed. 'Is he a clown?' said Dick, disbelievingly. 'He doesn't look a bit funny. He looks miserable.'

'That's Monty all right,' said Grandad. 'He always looks like that out of the ring. He'll make you double up with laughter when the circus is on, he's a born clown - but a lot of clowns are like Monty when they're not performing - not much to say for themselves, and looking miserable. Winks is a bit livelier - that's him, pulling Madelon's hair. He'll get a smacked face in a minute, he's a real tease. There - I knew he'd get a clip on the ear!'

Winks went howling over to the children, boo-hooing most realistically. 'She smacked me!' he said. 'And she's got such p-p-p-pretty hair!'

The children couldn't help laughing. Mischief ran to the clown, jumped up on his shoulder and chattered comforting monkey-words into his ear. Charlie the Chimp let himself out of his cage, and came to put his great paw into Winks's hand. They both thought that Winks really was hurt.

'That's enough, Winks,' said Grandad. 'You'll have the horses comforting you next! You do that in the ring tomorrow when we open, and you'll bring the house down. Sit down, and have your supper.'

'Mr. Tapper,' said Julian. 'There's one member of your circus we didn't see at the rehearsal - and that's Mr. Wooh, the Wonder Magician. Why wasn't he there?'

'Oh, he never rehearses,' said Mr. Tapper. 'He keeps himself to himself, does Mr. Wooh. He may come and join us for supper, and he may not. As we're opening the circus tomorrow night, maybe he'll turn up tonight. I'm a bit scared of him, to tell you the truth.'

'But he's not a real wizard, is he?' asked Tinker.

'Well, when I talk to Mr. Wooh I feel as if he is,' said Mr. Tapper. 'There isn't a thing he doesn't know about figures, there isn't a thing he can't do with them. Ask him to multiply any number by any other number, running into dozens of figures, and he'll tell you in a second. He shouldn't be in a circus. He should be an inventor of some sort - an inventor whose invention needs pages and pages of figures. He'd be happy then.'

'He sounds a bit like my father,' said Tinker. 'He's an inventor, you know, and sometimes when I creep into his study I see papers FULL of millions of tiny figures and plans and diagrams with tiny figures all over them too.'

'Very interesting,' said Grandad. 'Your father and Mr. Wooh ought to meet. They would probably talk figures all day long! My word - what's that you're handing round, young lady?'

'Some of the food we brought,' said Anne. 'Have a sausage or two, Mr. Tapper - and a roll - and a tomato.'

'Well, thanks,' said Mr. Tapper, pleased. 'Very kind of you. Nice to have met you all. You might be able to teach Jeremy a few manners!'

'Grandad - here's Mr. Wooh!' said Jeremy, suddenly, and got up. Everyone turned round. So this was Mr. Wooh the Wonder Magician. Well, he certainly looked the part.

He stood there, with a half-smile on his face, tall, commanding and handsome. His hair was thick, and black as soot, his eyes gleamed in the fire-light, half hidden by great eye-brows, and he wore a thin, pointed beard. He had a curiously deep voice, and spoke like a foreigner.

'So we have visitors this night?' he said, and showed a row of gleaming white teeth in a quick smile. 'May I join you?'

'Oh do, Mr. Wooh,' said Anne, delighted to have the chance of talking to a Wonder Magician.

'We've brought plenty of food. Do you like cold sausage - and tomato - and a roll?'

'Most delicious!' said the magician, and sat down cross-legged to join the group.

'We were disappointed not to see you at the rehearsal,' said Dick. 'I'd have liked to hear you doing all kinds of wizard sums in your head, as quick as lightning!'

'My father can do that too,' said Tinker proudly. 'He's a wizard at figures as well. He's an inventor.'

'Ha! An inventor? And what does he invent?' asked Mr. Wooh, eating his roll.

That was enough to set Tinker describing at once how wonderful his father was. 'He can invent anything he's asked for,' said the boy, proudly. 'He invented a wonderful thing for keeping aeroplanes dead straight in the right direction - better than any idea before. He invented the skowheel, if you know what that is - and the electric trossymon, if you've ever heard of that. I don't suppose you have, though. They're too...'

'Wait, boy!' said Mr. Wooh, sounding most interested. 'These things I have heard of, yes. I do not know them, but I have certainly heard of them. Your father must be a very, very clever man, with a most unusual brain.'

Tinker swelled with pride. 'Something got into the papers about his inventions a little while ago,' he said, 'and reporters came down to see Dad, and his name was in the papers - but Dad was awfully cross about it. You see, he's in the middle of the biggest idea he's ever thought of and it messed up his work to have people coming to interview him - some of them even peered through the window, and went to see his wonderful tower, with its...'

'Tower? He has a tower?' said Mr. Wooh, full of surprise. Before Tinker could answer, he received a hard poke from Julian's finger. He turned crossly, to see Julian frowning fiercely at him. So was George. He went suddenly red in the face. Of course - he had been told never to talk about his father's work. It was secret work, very secret.

He pretended to choke over a piece of meat, hoping that Julian would take the chance of changing the subject - and Julian did, of course!

'Mr. Wooh, could you do a bit of magic reckoning with figures?' he asked. 'I've heard that you can give the answers to any sum as quick as lightning.'

'That is true,' said Mr. Wooh. 'There is nothing that I cannot do with figures. Ask me anything you like, and I will give you the answer at once!'

'Well, Mr. Wooh, answer this then,' cried Tinker. 'Multiply sixty-three thousand, three hundred and forty-two by eighty thousand, nine hundred and fifty-three! Ha - you can't do that in a hurry!' 'The answer is, in figures, 5127724926,' said Mr. Wooh at once, with a slight bow. 'That is an easy question, my boy.'

'Crumbs!' said Tinker, astounded. He turned to Julian. 'Is that right, Ju?'

Julian worked out the sum on paper. 'Yes. Absolutely correct. Whew!' he said. 'You said that as quick as lightning!'

'Let me give him a sum to do!' cried George. 'What do you get if you multiply 602491 by 352, Mr. Magician?'

'I get the figures 2-1-2-0-7-6-8-3-2,' said Mr. Wooh, immediately. And once more Julian worked out the sum on paper. He raised his head and grinned. 'Yes - correct. How do you do it so quickly?'

'Magic - just a little elementary magic!' answered Mr. Wooh. 'Try it sometime yourself. I am sure that this boy's father would be as quick as I am!' He looked at Tinker. 'I should much like to meet your clever father, my boy,' he said in his deep, foreign-sounding voice. 'We would have much, so much to talk about. I have heard about his wonderful tower. A monument to his genius! Ah, you see, even we foreigners know of your father's great work. Surely he is afraid of having his secrets stolen?'

'Oh, I don't think so,' said Tinker. 'The tower is a pretty good hiding-place, and...' He stopped suddenly, and went red again as he received an even harder kick from Julian. How could he be such an ass as to give away the fact that his father's secret plans and models were hidden in the tower?

Julian thought it was time to take Tinker firmly away from Mr. Wooh and give him a good lecture on keeping his mouth shut. He looked at his watch, and pretended to be horrified at the time. 'Good gracious - do you know what the time is? Jenny will be ringing up the police if we don't get back straight away. Come on, Tinker, and you others, we must go. Thanks most awfully, Grandad, for letting us share your supper.'

'But we haven't yet finished!' said Grandad. 'You haven't had enough to eat.'

'We really couldn't eat any more,' said Dick, following Julian's determined lead. 'See you tomorrow, Grandad. Good night, Grandma. Thanks very much indeed.'

'We've still got bananas and apples to eat,' said Tinker, feeling obstinate.

'Oh, we brought those for Charlie the Chimp,' said Dick, not quite truthfully. He could have boxed Tinker's ears! Silly little fathead, couldn't he realize that Julian wanted to get him away from this cunning Mr. Wooh? Wait till he got Tinker by himself!

Tinker found himself hustled on all sides, and felt a bit scared. Julian sounded rather fierce, he thought. Old Grandad was most astonished at the sudden departure of his guests - but Charlie the Chimp didn't mind! The guests had left behind a most generous supply of fruit!

Over the fence they all went, with Julian hustling Tinker in front of him. Once over the fence and out of Mr Wooh's hearing, Julian and George rounded on the boy angrily.

'Are you mad, Tinker?' demanded Julian. 'Didn't you guess that that foreign fellow was trying to pump you about your father's hush-hush job?'

'He wasn't,' said Tinker, almost in tears. 'You're just exaggerating!'

'Well, I hope I never try to give away my father's secret work!' said George, in a tone of such disgust that Tinker could have howled.

'I wasn't trying to!' he said. 'Mr. Wooh's all right. Why should you think he isn't?'

'I don't like him and I don't trust him,' said Julian, sounding suddenly very grown up. 'But there you sat lapping up everything he said, ready to pour out all he wanted to know. I'm ashamed of you. You'd get a jolly good thrashing if your father had heard you. I only hope you haven't already said too much. You know how angry your father was when a report of his latest ideas got into the papers, and swarms of people came prying round the house...'

Tinker could stand it no longer. He gave a forlorn howl that made Mischief jump, and fled up the garden to the house, the little monkey running swiftly behind him. He wanted to comfort Tinker. What was the matter? Poor little Mischief felt bewildered, and tried his best to catch up the sobbing Tinker. He caught him up at last, leapt to the boy's shoulder and put his little furry arms round Tinker's neck, making a queer comforting noise.

'Oh, Mischief,' said Tinker. 'I'm glad you're still my friend. The others won't be now, I know. Aren't I an idiot, Mischief? But I was only being proud of my father, I was, really!'

Mischief clung to Tinker, puzzled and upset. Tinker stopped outside the tall tower. There was a light at the top. His father must still be working there. A faint humming noise came to his ears. He wondered if it was those queer, spindly tentacles right at the very top of the tower, that made the noise. Suddenly the light at the top of the tower went out.

'Dad must have finished his work for tonight,' thought Tinker. 'He'll be coming to the house. I'd better go. He might wonder why I'm all upset. Gosh, I never heard Julian be so angry before. He sounded as if he absolutely despised me!'

He crept up the path that led to the house, and in at the garden door. Better not go and see Jenny. She might worm everything out of him, and be as disgusted with him as Julian was. She would wonder why he wasn't camping out with them. He'd go upstairs and sleep in his own bed tonight! 'Come on, Mischief,' he said, in a mournful voice. 'We'll go to bed, and you can cuddle down with me. You'd never be mean to me, would you? You'd always be my friend.'

Mischief jabbered away, and the funny little monkey voice comforted Tinker all the time he undressed. He flung himself into bed, and Mischief lay at the bottom, on his feet. 'I shall never be able to get to sleep tonight,' said Tinker, still miserable. 'Never!'

But he fell asleep at once - which was a great pity, really. He might have shared in quite a bit of excitement, if he hadn't slept so soundly! Poor Tinker!

Chapter 11

IN THE DARK OF THE NIGHT

Julian and the others made no attempt to follow Tinker. 'Let him go, the little ass!' said Julian. 'Come into one of the tents and have a low pow-wow before we get undressed and go to sleep.'

'I'm sorry poor old Tinker isn't going to camp out with us, our first night in the field,' said Anne. 'I don't think he meant to give anything away.'

'That's no excuse, Anne,' said George. 'He can be an awful little fathead at times, and he's got to learn not to be. Let's go to our tent. I feel quite tired. Come along, Timmy!'

She yawned and Dick yawned too. Then Julian found himself yawning. 'Awfully catching, this yawning business!' he said. 'Well, it's turned out to be a lovely night as regards weather - warm and dry - and there's a nice little half-moon to look at. Good night, girls, sleep tight! And don't scream if a spider wakes you, because I warn you, I am NOT going to get up to deal with a harmless spider!'

'You wait till one runs all over your face!' said Anne, 'and starts making a web from your nose to your chin and catches flies in it!'

'Don't, Anne,' said George. 'I'm not a bit scared of spiders, but that's a horrible idea of yours! Timmy, please watch out for spiders, and give me warning of them!'

Everyone laughed. 'Well, good night, girls,' said Dick. 'Pity about young Tinker. Still, he's got to learn a few things, and keeping his mouth shut is one of them.'

They were all quite tired, and it wasn't long before everyone's torch was out, and peace and quiet descended on the little camp. Much farther up the field the circus was also peaceful and quiet, though there were still lights here and there in the tents. Someone belonging to the circus band was strumming a banjo, but not loudly, and the sound was pleasant to hear - strum-a-strum - strum-a-strum - strummmmm...

A few clouds blew up and slid across the moon. One by one the lights went out in the circus tents. The wind blew softly through the trees, and an owl hooted.

Anne was still awake. She lay listening to the wind, and to the owl's 'Too-who-who-whit', and then she too fell asleep. Nobody heard someone stirring in the circus camp. Nobody saw a shadowy figure creep out when the moon was safely behind a cloud. It was late, very late, and the two camps were lost in dreams.

Timmy was fast asleep too - but in his sleep he heard a faint sound, and at once he was awake. He didn't move, except for his ears, which switched themselves up to listen. He gave a little growl, but not enough to wake George. So long as the person who was moving about in the circus camp did not come near to George's tent, or the boys' tent, Timmy did not mean to bark. He heard a tiny grunt, and recognized it at once. Charlie the Chimp! Well, that was all right! Timmy fell asleep again.

Tinker, too, was fast asleep in his bed up at the house, Mischief at his feet. He had thought he would be too miserable to sleep, but found himself half-dreaming in no time. He didn't hear a small noise outside, a very small noise indeed - a little scrape, as if someone's foot had caught against a stone. Then there came other very small noises - and a whisper of a voice - and more noises again.

Nobody heard anything at all until Jenny woke up thirsty, and stretched out her hand to get a glass of water from her bed-table. She didn't switch her light on, and was about to lie down again when her quick ears caught a little sound.

She sat up. 'That can't be the children,' she thought. 'They're camping down in the field. Oh my goodness me, I hope it's not a burglar - or someone trying to steal the Professor's secrets. He's got papers all over the place. Thank goodness he keeps most of them in that tower of his!'

She listened and then lay down again. But soon she heard another little noise, and sat up, scared. 'It sounds as if it comes from the tower,' she thought, and got out of bed. No - there was no light in the tower - no light anywhere, that she could see. The moon was behind a cloud. She'd just wait till it slid out and lighted up the courtyard below, and the tower. There! That was another little noise. Could it be the wind? No, it couldn't. And now, what was that? It sounded just like someone whispering down there in the courtyard. Jenny felt really frightened, and began to shake. She must go and wake the Professor! Suppose it was someone after his precious papers? Or his wonderful new invention!

The moon swung out from behind the cloud and Jenny peered cautiously out of the window again. She gave a loud scream, and staggered back into her room, still screaming. 'There's a man! Help! Help! He's climbing up the wall of the tower! Professor! PROFESSOR HAYLING! Come quickly! Thieves, robbers, help, help! Get the police!'

There came a long slithering sound, and before Jenny dared to look out again, the moon had gone behind another cloud, and she could not see a thing in the sudden darkness. There was a deep silence after the slithering noise, and Jenny couldn't bear it. She rushed out of her bedroom, yelling at the top of her voice. 'THIEVES! ROBBERS! SIR, COME QUICKLY!'

The Professor woke with a jump, threw off his bedclothes and rushed out into the passage, almost colliding with Jenny. He clutched at her, thinking she was the thief, and she screamed again, sure that one of the intruders had got hold of her. They struggled together, and then the Professor realized that he wasn't holding a thief, he was holding poor, plump Jenny!

'JENNY! What on earth are you doing, waking up the whole household!' said the Professor, switching on the passage light. 'Have you had a bad dream - a nightmare?'

'No, sir, no sir,' panted Jenny, out of breath with her struggle. 'Sir, there's robbers about. I saw one climbing up the tower wall - and there must have been others below. I heard them whispering, sir. Oh, I'm that scared! What shall we do? Can you telephone for the police, sir?'

'Well,' said the Professor, doubtfully. 'Are you quite sure, Jenny, that you didn't have a nightmare? I mean - if there really are robbers, I'll certainly telephone - but it's rather a long way for the police to come out here, and...'

'Oh, sir - then won't you just take a torch and look round the place?' begged Jenny. 'You know there's your precious papers in that tower, sir. And isn't there that new invention of yours? Oh yes, I know I'm not supposed to know anything about it, sir, but I do dust your rooms thoroughly, you know, and I see quite a lot, though I keep my mouth shut, and...'

'Yes, yes, Jenny, I know,' said poor Professor Hayling, trying to stop Jenny's stream of talk. 'But honestly, everything seems quiet now. I've looked out into the courtyard. There's no one there. And you know as well as I do that nobody can get into my tower. It has three different keys - one to unlock the bottom door - one for the middle door, half-way up - and one for the top door. Jenny, be sensible. Nobody could have used my three keys. Look, there they are on my dressing-table.'

Jenny began to calm down, but she still wasn't satisfied. 'I did hear whispering, and I did see someone half-way up the wall of the tower, sir. Please do come down with me, sir, and let's look around. I daren't go on my own. But I shan't sleep again tonight till I know nobody's forced the tower door, or taken a ladder to go up the tower.'

'All right, Jenny,' said the Professor, with a sigh. 'Put on your dressing-gown, and I'll put mine on too - we'll try the doors, and we'll look for a ladder - though, mind you, it would have to be an absolutely colossal one to reach the top of that tower. Nobody could possibly bring one that size and length into our small courtyard! All right, all right - we'll go.'

And so, a few minutes later, Jenny and the Professor were down in the courtyard. There was no sign of any ladder at all - no sign of anyone climbing up the wall - and the downstairs tower door was safely locked! 'You unlock the door, sir, and go up to the top room and see if that door's locked too,' begged Jenny.

'I think you're being rather silly now, Jenny,' said the Professor impatiently. 'Here, take the keys yourself. This one's locked, of course - and if the middle door is still locked, you'll know nobody could have got into my top room. Hurry, Jenny.'

So Jenny, still trembling, slid a key into the bottom lock, opened the door, and began to climb the spiral stair that led upwards. Half-way was another door, also safely locked. She unlocked this too. She began to feel rather silly. Nobody could have gone through locked doors. And there now - the top one was well and truly locked also! She gave a sigh of relief and ran down the spiral stairway, locking the middle door, and then the bottom one. She gave the keys to the Professor, who by now was feeling rather chilly!

'All locked, sir,' said Jenny. 'But I'm still sure someone was about. I could have sworn I saw someone up that tower-wall, and heard somebody else whispering below.'

'I expect you were so scared that you imagined things, Jenny,' said the Professor, yawning. 'I think you'll agree with me that the wall is far too steep for anyone to climb - and I'm pretty certain I'd have heard it if a ladder had been dragged about the courtyard!'

'Well, I'm sure I'm very sorry, sir,' said poor Jenny. 'It's a good thing we didn't wake Tinker - though I'm surprised Mischief didn't hear something and come running down the stairs.'

'But Mischief is surely with Tinker, camping out in the field!' said the Professor in surprise.

'No - Tinker and Mischief are back, sir. I found them asleep in bed - but not the others!' said Jenny. 'Maybe Tinker has quarrelled with them. Funny that Mischief didn't come running out to see what was up - he must have heard us!'

'Mischief is clever - but not clever enough to open Tinker's bedroom door,' said the Professor, yawning again. 'Good night, Jenny. Don't worry. You'll feel all right in the morning, and that will be that!'

The Professor went sleepily to his room. He looked out of the window down into the courtyard and then across at the tower, and smiled. Dear Jenny! She did rather let her imagination run away with her! As if anyone in the world could get up into that tower room without a ladder! And now could a long, long ladder be brought into that small courtyard without either being seen or heard? The Professor yawned once more and climbed into bed.

But someone had been in the tower room! Someone very clever, someone very light-fingered! What a shock for poor Professor Hayling next morning, when he crossed the courtyard, unlocked the bottom door of the tower - walked up the spiral stairway - unlocked the middle door, and went on up the stairway again - and finally unlocked the top door and opened it wide.

He stood and stared in horror. The place was upside down! All his papers were scattered everywhere. He crouched down at once to see if any were missing. Yes - quite a lot! But they seemed to have been taken quite haphazardly - a few pages from this note-book - a few pages from that - some letters he had written and left on his desk to post - and good gracious, the ink was spilt all over the place - and the little clock was gone from the mantelpiece. So Jenny was right - a thief had been about last night. A thief that could apparently get through three locked doors - or else could climb up a long, long ladder that he had put outside without being seen - and taken away again!

'I'll have to ring the police,' he thought. 'But I must say it's a mystery! I wonder if Tinker heard anything in the night? No, he couldn't have, or he would have run to fetch me. It's a mystery - a real puzzle of a MYSTERY!'

Chapter 12

A SHOCK FOR TINKER

Tinker was horrified when Jenny told him the next morning what had happened. 'Your father's in a rare old state,' she said. 'He came down early this morning, because he wanted to finish some work up in the tower - and as soon as he unlocked the top door into the tower room, he saw the whole room upside down and some of his precious papers gone, and...'

'JENNY! How awful!' said Tinker. 'Dad kept his most precious papers there - with all the figures for that new electric thing of his. It's a wonderful thing, too marvellous for words, Jenny, it's for...'

'Now don't you give away any of your father's plans, not even to me,' said Jenny. 'You've been told that before. Maybe you've been talking too much already, and somebody's ears took it all in!' Tinker suddenly felt quite sick. Was it because of something he had been silly enough to say in public? In the bus, perhaps? Or in the circus-field? What would the others say - especially Julian - when they heard that someone had come in the night and stolen precious papers, containing figures and diagrams for some of his father's inventions? Julian would be sure to say that it was his fault for not keeping his mouth shut! Oh dear - would this be in the papers - and would hordes of people come visiting the place again, staring and whispering and exclaiming in awe at his father's curious tower, with its waving tentacles?

He dressed quickly and ran downstairs. Jenny had told him that she was sure she had heard whispering down in the courtyard the night before, and had seen someone climbing up the tower. 'Your father says nobody could have brought a long ladder into that courtyard,' she said. 'Not without us seeing it, anyway, or hearing some kind of noise when it was dragged in. But it might have been a sliding ladder, mightn't it? That would be a smallish thing, with ropes to pull out the sliding part.'

'Yes. Like the window-cleaner uses,' said Tinker. 'I say - could it have been the window-cleaner, do you think?'

'No. He's a real decent fellow,' said Jenny. 'I've known him for twenty years. So put that out of your head. But the ladder could certainly have been the sort that window-cleaners use. We'll go out into the courtyard as soon as I've finished washing-up, and see if we can find the marks where the ladder was dragged over the courtyard. Though I must say I didn't hear any dragging noises. I heard whispering - and a kind of slithery noise - but that's all.'

'The slithery noise might have been made by the ladder when it was dragged along!' said Tinker. 'I say - look at old Mischief. He's listening as if he understood every word. Mischief, why didn't you wake me up last night when all this was going on? You usually wake if anything unusual happens, or you hear a strange noise.'

Mischief leapt into Tinker's arms and cuddled there. He didn't like it when Tinker was upset about anything; he knew by the boy's voice that he was worried. He made small comforting noises, and rubbed his monkey nose against the boy's chin.

'You'd better go to your father,' said Jenny. 'You might be able to comfort him a little. He's very upset indeed. He's up in the tower room, trying to sort out his papers. My word, they were left in a state - scattered all over the room!'

Tinker stood up to go, and was astonished to find that he was shaky at the knees. Would his father ask him if he had been talking about the work he was doing? Oh dear - he had even boasted about it just the day before, and talked about his father's sko-wheel, and the wonderful new machine, the electric trosymon! Tinker's knees became shakier than ever.

But fortunately his father was far too upset about his muddled room and missing papers to worry about anything Tinker had said or done. He was up in the tower room, trying to discover which of his papers were missing.

'Ah, Tinker,' he said, when the boy came into the tower room. 'Just give me a hand, will you? The thief who came last night must have knocked the whole bunch of papers off the table, down on the floor - and fortunately he seems not to have seen some that went under the table. So I doubt very much if the papers he did take away with him will be of any use. He'd need to be quite a scientist to understand them, without having the ones he left behind.'

'Will he come back for the others, then?' asked Tinker.

'Probably,' said his father. 'But I shall hide them somewhere. Can you think of a good hiding-place, Tinker?'

'Dad - don't you hide them,' begged Tinker. 'Not unless you tell me where they are! You know how you forget things! You might forget where you'd put this bunch of papers, and then you wouldn't be able to go on with your inventions. Have you copies of the stolen sheets of figures and diagrams?'

'No. But they're all in my head as well as on paper,' said his father. 'It will take me a bit of time to work them all out again, but it can be done. It's a nuisance - especially as I'm working to a date. Now run along, Tinker, please. I've work to do.'

Tinker went down the spiral staircase of the tower. He'd have to make sure that his father did hide away those papers very carefully indeed - in some really good place. 'Oh dear - I hope he won't do what he did with the last lot of papers he wanted to hide,' he thought. 'He stuffed them up the chimney - and they nearly went up in flames because Jenny thought she'd light the fire the next night, it was unexpectedly so cold. Good thing they fell down when she laid the fire, and she rescued them before they got burnt! Why are brainy people like Dad so silly about ordinary things? I say he'll either forget where he puts them - or go and hide them in some easy place where anyone could find them!'

He went to talk to Jenny. 'Jenny - Dad says that the thief only took some of his papers - and that he can't make much use of the ones he took, unless he has the whole lot. And Dad says he thinks that when the thief finds this out, he'll try to steal the rest of the papers.'

'Well, let him try!' said Jenny. 'I could hide them in a place where no thief would find them - if your Dad would let me have them. I shan't tell you where!'

'I'm afraid he might hide them up a chimney again, or some silly place like that,' said Tinker, looking so worried that Jenny felt really worried too! 'They've got to be hidden somewhere NOBODY would think of looking. And if Dad finds a place like that he'll promptly forget all about it, and never be able to find them again! But a thief might find them - he'd know ALL the places to look in.'

'Let's go up to the tower room, and clear up the mess that the spilt ink made, and see if your father has taken his precious papers, and hidden them somewhere there,' said Jenny. 'It would be just like him to hide them in the very room that the thief went to last night! Up the ladder, in at the window - left wide open, I've no doubt - snatched up every paper he could see, the rogue, and then raced down the ladder again!

'Come on up to the tower, then,' said Tinker. 'I only hope Dad isn't there!'

'He's just crossing the courtyard, look,' said Jenny, leaning out of the window. 'See, there he is - carrying something under his arm.'

'His morning newspapers,' said Tinker. 'It looks as if he's going to have a jolly good read, doesn't it? Oh dear, I do hope all this won't be printed in the newspapers - it would bring hordes of people down here again. Do you remember how awful it was last time, Jenny - people even walked over the flower-beds!'

'Hoo - some people like to poke their noses into everything!' said Jenny. 'I don't mind telling you that I emptied my dirty washing-water out of the window on to a few of them - quite by mistake, of course - how was I to know they were out there, staring up and down?'

Tinker gave a shout of laughter. 'I wish I'd seen that!' he said. 'Oh Jenny - if people come poking their noses into Dad's business again, DO let's empty water on their silly heads! Come on, Jenny - let's go up to the tower room now Dad's out of the way. Quick!'

They were soon out in the courtyard, and as they crossed it, Jenny stopped and looked hard at the ground.

'What are you looking for?' asked Tinker.

'Just to see if there are any marks that might have been made by someone dragging a ladder across,' said Jenny. 'I heard a funny slithering sound, you know - but it didn't sound like a ladder being dragged across.'

The two of them looked all over the courtyard, but could see no marks there that could possibly have been made by a ladder.

'Funny,' said Jenny. 'It worries me, that slithery sound.' She looked up at the tall, steep wall of the tower. It was made of flint-stones of all shapes and sizes, the kind found in the country-side round about Kirrin and Big Hollow.

'Well, I suppose a cat might climb up,' said Jenny, doubtfully. 'But not a man. He'd slip sooner or later. It would be far too dangerous. I doubt if even a cat would get far.'

'And yet you say you thought you saw someone up the tower-wall!' said Tinker. 'Go on, Jenny - it must have been the shadow of a passing cloud that you saw! Look up this wall - now can you imagine ANYONE climbing up it at night, when it was dark?'

Jenny stared up. 'No - you're right. Only a madman would even try. Well, my eyes must have played me up, then, when I looked out last night - but I really did think I saw a dark shadow climbing up the tower-wall. Still, it's easy to be mistaken at night. And I don't believe there was a ladder, either! There would be marks on the paving-stones of the courtyard if there had been a ladder. Oh well - let's hurry on up to the tower room before your Dad decides to go back to it again!'

They went up the spiral stairway. All the doors were unlocked, so it was plain that the Professor was going to come back again after he had read his papers.

'All the same - he shouldn't leave the doors unlocked, even for a minute!' said Jenny. 'Well, here we are - just look at the ink-splashes everywhere - and that dear little clock that kept such good time is gone. Now what would the thief want with a clock, I'd like to know?'

'It would be small and neat enough to pop into his pocket,' said Tinker. 'If he was dishonest enough to steal Dad's papers, he would certainly not say no to a nice little clock like that! He's probably taken other things too!'

They went right into the room, and Jenny at once gave a loud exclamation. LOOK! Aren't those some of the papers your father was working on - on the table there? All covered with tiny figures?'

Tinker looked closely at them. 'Yes - they're his very latest papers. He showed me them the other day. I remember this diagram. Jenny - how COULD he leave them on the table with the door unlocked this morning - when only last night the thief was here! How could he? He said he was going to hide them away so carefully, because, if the thief found them, he could use them with the other papers that were stolen - but as long as the thief only had half of them, they wouldn't be much use - and now he's forgotten all about hiding them, after all!'

'Look now, Tinker - let's hide them away ourselves,' said Jenny, 'and not tell him where they are. These thieves will have another try for them, no doubt about that. Let's think of some place where they'd be absolutely safe.'

'I know!' said Tinker. 'We could hide them on Kirrin Island! Somewhere in the old ruined castle! NOBODY would guess they were there.'

'Now that's a fine idea!' said Jenny. 'I'd be glad to think they were out of the house.' She gathered up the papers quickly. 'Here you are. You'd better tell Julian and the others, and go across to the island with them as soon as you can. My, what a relief to think they'll be well away from here. I'll be able to sleep soundly in my bed at nights then!

Tinker stuffed the precious papers under his coat, and he and Jenny ran at top speed down the spiral stairway. They saw the Professor not far off, and he turned and hailed them. 'Tinker! Jenny! I know what you're going to ask me! You want to know where I've hidden those papers of mine. Come here and I'll whisper!'

Not knowing quite what to say, the two went rather guiltily over to Tinker's father. He whispered loudly, 'I've wrapped them up, and put them under the coal at the back of the coal-cellar - right at the very back!'

'And a fine mess you've made of your trousers, sir,' said Jenny, disgusted. 'And good gracious - you must have sat down in the coal yourself! You look a right mess. Come along and let me brush you down. Not indoors though, or the place will be thick with coal-dust!'

'Don't you think it was a good hiding-place, Jenny?' asked the Professor. 'Ha - you thought I'd forget to hide them, didn't you?'

He went off, looking very pleased with himself. Jenny chuckled in delight. 'Dear old Professor! He's hidden all his newspapers there, but not a single one of his own precious papers. And now whatever shall we tell him when he wants the morning papers? Tinker, you cycle out to the paper-shop and get another lot. Land-snakes - what it is to have a brainy man in the house? Whatever will he do next!'

Chapter 13

QUITE A LOT OF PLANS!

After Tinker had fetched a new supply of morning papers, he decided to go down to the camp in the field and tell the others all that had happened that morning. He still felt angry about being ticked off by Julian the night before - but he simply couldn't wait to tell the others about the robbery - and about the grand idea he, Tinker, had of hiding the rest of his father's papers on Kirrin Island.

So off he went, with Mischief happily on his shoulder, holding tightly to his hair. The others were all there in the field. They had just come back from a shopping expedition, and Tinker's eyes gleamed when he saw the various tinned meats and tinned fruits, fresh rolls, tomatoes and apples and bananas that had been brought back from the shops at Big Hollow.

Julian was glad to see that Tinker looked bright and cheerful. He was afraid that the boy might have sulked, and that would have spoilt things for the others.

'Hi!' said Tinker. 'I've got news!' And he proceeded to tell the others all about the happenings of the night before, ending up with his father solemnly going off to hide his morning newspapers under the coal at the back of the coal-cellar, under the impression that he was hiding the rest of his precious papers.

'But why on earth didn't you tell him he had left his valuable papers behind and hidden his newspapers?' asked George.

'Because if he knew that, he'd go and hide the precious papers somewhere, and forget where he'd put them - and they might be lost for ever!' said Tinker.

'Well, what are you going to do with them?' asked Dick.

'I've had rather a brain-wave,' said Tinker, as modestly as he could. 'Er - I thought that we'd hide them away ourselves, where nobody could possibly find them.'

'And where is this wonderful hiding-place?' asked Dick.

'On Kirrin Island!' said Tinker, triumphantly. 'Who'd think of looking there? And as we shall all know the hiding-place, we can't possibly forget it. The papers will be absolutely safe. Dad can get on with the rest of his ideas without worrying about anything.'

'Have you told him all this?' asked Julian.

'Well, no,' said Tinker. 'Jenny thought we'd better just keep it to ourselves. She's pretty certain the thieves will try their hand at breaking in to get the rest of the papers, though.'

'Ha! Well, I vote we scribble some papers ourselves,' said Dick. 'Complete with wonderful diagrams, and all kinds of peculiar figurings and numberings. I feel I could do that very well! And we'd leave them up in the tower room for the thieves to take - they'd think they were the ones they'd missed!'

Everyone chuckled. 'Ass!' said Julian. 'Still - it's not a bad idea to leave something behind for the thieves that isn't worth a moment's look - and hide the genuine figures where they'd never dream of finding them - on Kirrin Island!'

'When shall we go?' asked George. 'It's ages since I've visited my island - and will you believe it, last time I rowed over, trippers had been there and left their beastly mess everywhere! Paper bags, broken glass, lettuce leaves, orange peel, ugh!'

'Why DO people do that?' asked Anne. 'They'd hate to have to sit in the midst of other people's mess - so why in the world can't they clear up their own?'

'Oh, they're probably just like that in their own homes,' said Dick. 'All mess and litter - and yet it takes so little time to clear up a picnic mess, and leave the place decent for the next comers.'

'What did you do with all the mess left on Kirrin Island?' asked Julian.

'I buried it deep in the sand at the back of one of the beaches,' said George. 'Where the tide can't turn it all up again. And with every dig of my spade I said 'Blow you, you awful trippers without manners, blow you - and next time you go anywhere, may you find someone else's litter to make you feel sick. Blow you!' '

George looked and sounded so very fierce that everyone burst out laughing. Timmy sat there with his tongue lolling out, looking as if he were laughing too, and Mischief made a funny little noise rather like a giggle.

'Good old George. She always says straight out what she thinks!' said Julian.

They sat and talked over their plans for some time. 'Dick and Julian had better make the fake plans and figures,' said George. 'They'd be better at that kind of thing than anyone else. And Tinker can plant them somewhere in his father's tower room for the thief to take if he goes there again - and I bet he will. He found it easy enough last night!'

'And George could take Tinker's father's papers with the correct figures and plans over to Kirrin Island,' said Anne.

'Not till night-time, though,' said Dick. 'If anyone were on the watch, and saw George rowing over there, they might guess she was taking something important to hide. They might be watching her father too. By the way - where are these papers? You did not leave them behind at home, did you, Tinker?'

'I didn't dare to,' said Tinker. 'I felt as if there might be eyes peeping at me, watching and hoping I'd go out and leave the papers behind. I've got them under my jersey, just here!' And he patted the top of his stomach.

'Oh - so that's why you look as if you've had too much breakfast!' said George. 'Well - what shall our plans be?'

'We'd better make out the false papers straight away, with figures and diagrams,' said Julian. 'Just in case the thieves come sooner than we think. Tinker, we'd better go into your house to do those. If we go to George's, her father might spot us, and wonder what on earth we were doing. We'd probably be sent off, anyway, because of the scarlet-fever business.'

'Well, what about my father?' said Tinker. 'He might spot us too. Anyway, he's not keen on my having anyone there this week, because he's so busy with his new invention. It's awfully good, and...'

'Tinker - don't start spilling beans again!' said Julian, warningly. 'I say it would be best to go to your house.'

'What about me going indoors and bringing out Dad's big drawing-board, and some of his paper, and his mapping pens and ink, and doing the diagrams and things out here in the tent?' said Tinker. 'Honestly, I never know when Dad is going to come into my room. He'd wonder what on earth we were doing if he found us all there! We can have a good look at the papers I've got under my coat, and do a whole lot in the same style - not the same figures, naturally - and we could do some fancy diagrams too.'

'All right,' said Julian, giving way, as he saw that Tinker was genuinely afraid that his father might see them making the false papers. 'Go and get the drawing-board and come back with it, and anything else we'll need. You go with him, George.'

'Right,' said George, and she and Tinker went up Tinker's garden to the house. Tinker scouted round to see if his father was anywhere about, but couldn't see him. He found a large drawing-board, some big sheets of paper used by his father for working out his figures, and a book of odd, but easy-to-copy diagrams. He also brought mapping pens, Indian ink and blotting paper, and even remembered drawing-pins to pin the sheets of paper to the board. George carried half the things, and kept a sharp look-out for Tinker's father.

'It's all right. He's asleep somewhere - can't you hear that noise?' asked Tinker; and sure enough George could - a gentle snoring from some room not far off!

They went back down the garden and over the fence, handing everything to the others before they climbed over. 'Good!' said Julian. 'Now we can produce some beautiful charts of figures that mean absolutely nothing at all - and diagrams that will look perfect and not mean a thing either!'

'Better come into the tent,' said George. 'If anyone wanders down from the circus camp, they might ask us what we're doing.'

So they all went into the boys' big tent, which was the bigger one, Timmy too, and Mischief, who was delighted to be with the big dog. Julian soon set to work, though he found the space rather cramped. They were all watching him in admiration as he set out rows of beautiful, meaningless figures when Timmy suddenly gave a deep growl, and all his hackles rose up on his neck.

Julian turned the drawing-board over at once, and sat on it. The canvas doorway of the tent was pulled aside and in poked the grinning face of Charlie the Chimp!

'Oh, it's you, Charlie!' said Julian. 'Well, well, well, and how are you today?'

The chimpanzee grinned even more widely, and held out his hand. Julian shook it solemnly, and the chimpanzee went carefully all round the tent, shaking hands with everyone.

'Sit down, Charlie,' said Dick. 'I suppose you've let yourself out of your cage as usual, and come to see what we've got for our dinner. Well, you'll be glad to hear we've got enough for you as well as ourselves.'

Charlie squashed himself between Timmy and Tinker, and with much interest watched Julian at work with his pen and ink. 'I bet that chimp could draw, if you gave him a piece of paper and a pencil,' said Anne.

So, to keep him quiet, he was given a pencil, and a notebook. He at once began to scribble in it very earnestly.

'Goodness - he's doing a whole lot of funny figures,' said Anne. 'He's trying to copy you, Ju!'

'If he's not careful, I'll hand the whole job over to him!' said Julian, with a chuckle. 'George, let's talk about your plans for tonight. I think if you are going over to Kirrin Island to hide those papers you've planned to hide, you must take Timmy with you.'

'Oh, I will!' said George. 'Not that there will be a single soul on the island, but I'd like old Tim just for company. I'll take the papers straight to the island, land, and hide them.'

'Where?' asked Julian.

'Oh, I'll decide that when I'm there,' said George. 'Somewhere cunning! I know my own little island from top to bottom. And there those papers will stay until all danger is past. We'll let Professor Hayling think he has hidden them somewhere himself, and forgotten where! It will be fun to row across to my island, at night, with Timmy.'

'The thieves can make do with my figures and diagrams if they come to the tower room again,' said Julian. 'Don't they look professional?'

They certainly did! Everyone looked at the neat figures and carefully drawn diagrams with admiration.

Timmy suddenly sat up and gave a deep growl again. Charlie the Chimp patted him as if to say, 'What's wrong, old boy?' but Timmy took no notice and went on growling. He suddenly shot out of the tent, and there was a shout from someone outside. 'Get off! Get down! GET DOWN!'

George swung back the tent opening. Mr. Wooh was there, looking extremely frightened, as Timmy growled menacingly round his ankles. Charlie the chimp ran up to him on all fours, and, angry because Timmy was snarling at his friend, showed his teeth suddenly at the big dog. George was terrified. 'Don't let them fight!' she cried, afraid that Timmy would get decidedly the worst of it. Charlie was jumping up and down in a most alarming way.

'Charlee!' said Mr. Wooh in his deep voice. 'Charlee!'

And Charlie stopped jumping up and down and making horrible noises, and leapt straight on to Mr. Wooh's back, putting his arms round his neck.

Mr. Wooh bowed courteously to them all. 'I trust I have not disturbed you, my friends,' he said, in his foreign-sounding voice. 'I now take a little walk with my friend Charlee. You come again to see our show, I hope. Yes? No?'

'Probably,' said Dick, noticing that the magician had taken a quick and interested look at Julian's figures and diagrams. Julian covered them up immediately, as if he didn't want the magician to see them. He had seen something in the man's eyes that puzzled him. Could Mr. Wooh possibly have had anything to do with the theft of the papers the night before? After all, he was a wizard at figures himself - he might be able to read the Professor's figures and diagrams and understand them perfectly. Well - he wouldn't gather much from the ones Julian was now doing - they were more or less nonsense made up by Julian himself to deceive anyone interested in the real ones.

'I interrupt you? Pardon me!' said Mr. Wooh, and bowed himself politely away from the group in the tent. Charlie the Chimp followed him, hoping that Mischief would too, so that they could have a game. But Mischief didn't want to. He didn't like Mr. Wooh.

'Well, I didn't realize that anyone from the circus would walk down the field so quietly, and be able to hear what we were saying inside the tent,' said Julian, worried. 'I didn't like the look in his eyes. Dick - you don't suppose he heard anything we were saying, do you?'

'Would it matter?' said Dick.

'It might,' said Julian. 'Do you think he heard what George said about going over to Kirrin Island with the other papers - the valuable ones that the thieves didn't see in the tower room last night? I wouldn't let George go if I thought he had heard. In fact, I think she'd better not go. She might run into danger.'

'Don't be silly, Ju,' said George. 'I am going. And Timmy will be with me.'

'You heard what I said, George. You are not to go!' said Julian. 'I'll take the papers and hide them on the island. I'll get them when it's dark, fairly late. I'll cycle over to Kirrin and untie the boat you keep there, and row over to the island.'

'All right, Julian,' said George, astonishingly meekly. 'Shall we have a meal now? We've only to open the tins, and empty the tomatoes and lettuces out of the basket there. And the drinks are in that cool corner over there.'

'Right,' said Julian, glad that George had given way to him so easily. He would go across in George's boat and find a good hiding-place. If danger was about, he could deal with it better than George could. After all, she was only a girl!

Yes, Julian, she is - but, as you've often said, she's just as brave as a boy. Don't be too sure about tonight!

Chapter 14

LADDERS - AND A LOT OF FUN!

The children stared after Mr. Wooh and the chimpanzee. They saw Charlie pick up two empty buckets, one in each strong paw, and race off to the right with them.

'Where's he going?' said Anne, astonished at the rate he was running along.

'I bet he's going to get some water from the stream in those pails, and take them to whoever washes down the horses,' said George. She was right! Charlie soon came back again, walking this time, holding a heavy pail of water in each hand!

'Well, I must say that chimpanzee is jolly useful!' said Dick. 'Look - there's Madelon who trains those beautiful horses that paraded round the ring last night - she's wearing old trousers this morning, she looks quite different. There - Charlie has set the pails of water down beside her. I bet that as soon as she wants any more water, he'll be off again to the stream!'

'I rather like old Charlie,' said Anne. 'I didn't at first - but now I do. I wish he didn't belong to Mr. Wooh.'

Julian stood up, looking down at the paper on which he had so carefully written lines of small figures and drawn many peculiar diagrams. 'I somehow feel this isn't much good now,' he said. 'I think Mr. Wooh must have guessed it was all a make-up as soon as he saw it. He gave himself away a bit, though - I saw him looking at the paper in a rather startled way, as if he'd seen something very like it very recently indeed!'

'So he had, the wretch, if he'd sent someone up to get my Dad's papers out of the tower room!' said Tinker. 'I say - what about having a look round the circus, to see if we can spot a ladder anywhere - one tall enough to reach the tower room!'

'Good idea!' said Dick. 'Come on - we'll go now. Chuck that drawing-board and diagram paper over our fence, Ju. I hardly think it's worth your while to finish it.'

The Five, with Tinker and Mischief, wandered down the field to where the circus was encamped. Dick spotted a ladder, lying in the grass, and nudged Julian.

'Julian! See that? Would it reach the tower?' Julian walked over to it. It certainly was very, very long - but would it be long enough? No - he didn't think it would. Still - he might as well find out who owned it. At that moment up came the Boneless Man, walking perfectly. He grinned at the children - and then suddenly put all his double-joints to work, bent his knees into peculiar positions, twisted his head round so that he was looking over his own back, and then bent his double-jointed arms the wrong way, so that he looked very peculiar indeed!

'Don't! I don't like it!' said Anne. 'You look so queer and strange! Why are you called the Boneless Wonder? You aren't boneless - you just make yourself look as if you were, with all those queer double-joints of yours!'

The Boneless Man seemed suddenly to lose all his bones, and crumpled up on the grass in a funny heap. The children couldn't help laughing. He didn't look as if he had any bones at all then!

'Er - can you climb ladders if you're double-jointed?' asked Julian, suddenly.

'Of course!' said the Boneless Man. 'Run up them backwards, forwards, sideways - any way you like.'

'Is that your ladder, then?' asked Dick, nodding his head towards the ladder in the grass.

'Well - I use it, but so does everyone else!' said the Boneless Man, turning his head the wrong way round, so that it seemed as if it was put on back to front. It was odd to speak to someone whose head did that - one minute they were talking to his face, the next to the back of his head!

'I wish you wouldn't do that,' said Anne. 'It makes me feel giddy.'

'Do you use that ladder to put the flag on the top of the circus tent?' asked Dick. 'It doesn't look long enough for that.'

'It isn't,' said the Boneless Man, turning his head the right way round, much to Anne's relief. 'There's a much longer one over there - it takes three men to carry it, it's so heavy - but the centre circus pole is very tall, as you see. One man couldn't possibly carry the long ladder.'

The children looked at one another. That ruled out the very long ladder too, then. If it needed three men to carry it, Jenny would certainly have heard a lot more noise last night!

'Are there any more ladders in the circus camp?'

'No - just the two. Why? Thinking of buying one?' said the Boneless Man. 'I must go. The Boss is beckoning to me.' Off he went, walking in a most peculiar fashion, using his double joints for all he was worth!

'What about the acrobats?' said Julian. 'They must be used to climbing and clambering everywhere. I wonder if any of them could have climbed the wall?'

'I don't think so,' said Tinker. 'I had a good look at it this morning - and although there is a kind of creeper climbing up the wall, it stops half-way - and above that there's just the stone wall. Even an acrobat would have to have some help up the tower wall!'

'Could the clowns have found a way?' said George. 'No - I suppose they're not as good even as the acrobats at climbing. I don't believe the thief could have been anyone from the circus after all. Look - what's that on the ground over there - outside that tent?'

They all went over to see. It looked like a pile of dark-grey fur. George touched it with her toe.

'Oh - I know what it is - the donkey-skin!'

'Golly - so it is!' cried Tinker in delight, and picked it up - or tried to. It was much too heavy for him to hold up all of it.

In a trice Dick and George were inside that donkey-skin! Dick had the head, and found that he could see quite well where he was going, for the donkey-neck had neat eye-holes in it - the head itself was stuffed with paper. George was the back legs, and kicked up her feet and made the donkey look extremely lively. The others roared with laughter.

Someone shouted loudly. 'Hey - you leave that donkey-skin alone!'

It was Jeremy. He came running up, looking furious. He had a stick in his hand, and hit out at the donkey's hind parts, giving poor George a good old whack, and making her yell.

'Hey! Stop that, it hurt!'

Tinker looked furiously at Jeremy. 'How dare you do that?' he shouted. 'Dick and George are in the donkey-skin. Put down that stick!'

But Jeremy gave the donkey's hind legs another whack and George yelled again. Tinker gave a shout too, and flung himself on Jeremy, trying to get the stick out of his hand. The boy struggled, holding on to the stick, but Tinker gave him a straight blow on the chest, and down he went!

'Ha! I said I'd knock you down sometime, and I have!' yelled Tinker. 'Get up and fight. I'll teach you to hit a girl!'

'Now stop it, Tinker,' said Julian. 'How could he have known George was inside? Come out of the skin, you two idiots, before old Grandad comes up. He looks as if he's on his way now!'

Jeremy was up now, and danced round Tinker with doubled fists. Before either boy could exchange a blow, Grandad's great voice came to them.

'NOW THEN! STOP IT!'

Jeremy swung his fist at Tinker, who dodged, and then in his turn hit out at Jeremy, who ran back - straight into old Grandad, who at once clutched him.

By this time George and Dick were out of the donkey-skin, looking rather ashamed of themselves. Old Grandad grinned at them, still holding on to the furious Jeremy. 'Fight's off,' said Grandad to Tinker and Jeremy. 'If you want to go on, either of you, you can fight me, not each other.'

However, neither of the boys wanted to take on old Grandad. He might be old, but he could still give some mighty slaps, as Jeremy very well knew. They stood staring at one another, looking rather sheepish.

'Go on - shake hands and be friends,' said Grandad. 'Quick, now, or I'll do a little fighting myself!'

Tinker held out his hand just as Jeremy held out his. They shook, grinning at one another. 'That's right!' said old Grandad. 'No harm done. No bones broken. You're quits now, so no more knocking each other about.'

'Right, Grandad,' said Jeremy, giving him a friendly punch. The old man turned to Dick and George. 'And if you want to borrow that donkey-skin, you're welcome,' said old Grandad. 'But it's manners to ask the owner's permission first.'

'Yes, sir. Sorry, sir,' said Dick, grinning. He wondered what Professor Hayling and Jenny would say if he and George did borrow it, and galloped into Hollow House at top speed. But no - he decided reluctantly that Jenny might be scared stiff and give notice, and that would never do. She wouldn't at all like being chased by an apparently mad donkey, nor would Professor Hayling.

Grandad went off, and Julian spoke to Jeremy, who wasn't quite sure whether to go or to stay.

'We saw old Charlie carrying pails of water for the horses,' he said. 'My word, isn't he strong!'

Jeremy grinned, glad to be friends again, and to be able to stay with the Five and Tinker. They wandered all round the field together, looking at the magnificent horses and at Dead-Shot Dick doing a little practising at shooting and then watched one small acrobat practising amazing jumps and somersaults.

Mischief the monkey came with them. He was absolutely at home with everyone in the circus now, man, woman or animal. He leapt on to the horses' backs, and they didn't mind! He pretended to help Charlie the Chimp to carry one of the pails of water - he ran off with Dead-Shot Dick's cap. He went into the chimp's cage and cuddled up in the straw with him, scrabbling about as if the cage belonged to him. He even went into Grandad's tent and came out with a small bottle of lemonade! He couldn't get the top off, and took it to Charlie, who was watching near by! Charlie promptly forced it off with his strong front paws - and then, to Mischief's disgust, tipped up the bottle, and drank the lot!

Mischief was very angry indeed. He ran to Charlie's cage, which was open, and sent the straw flying everywhere. Charlie sat outside his cage, and enjoyed the fun, grinning happily.

'Come out, Mischief!' called Tinker. 'You're making a nuisance of yourself!'

'Let him be,' said one of the acrobats, who was standing near by. 'Old Charlie enjoys a bit of temper - when it's someone else's! Look at him sitting grinning there.'

They watched for a few seconds more, to make sure that Mischief wasn't annoying the big chimpanzee, and then turned to watch Monty and Winks, the clowns, having an argument, which ended in Monty throwing water over Winks, and Winks emptying a basket of rubbish over Monty. What a pair!

When they turned to see if Mischief was still annoying Charlie, they saw that the little monkey had left the cage, and was tearing down the field to the fence. He leapt up, and over, and disappeared.

'He must think it's dinner-time,' said Tinker, looking at his watch. 'And golly, so it is. Buck up everyone, Jenny will be in a fine old fury if we're really late - it's hot dinner today.'

Away they all went in a hurry. Hot dinner! Over the fence, then, and up the garden at top speed. They mustn't keep a hot dinner waiting - or Jenny either!

Chapter 15

A HAPPY DAY - AND A SHOCK FOR JULIAN

Tinker and the Five were two minutes late for their dinner. Jenny was just taking it in, looking a little grim, as she had not been able to find the children anywhere. 'Ah - here you are at last!' she said. 'I looked down the garden but you were nowhere to be seen. It's a good thing you came in when you did - five minutes more, and I'd have taken the dinner back again.'

'Dear Jenny, you know you wouldn't,' said Tinker, giving her a sudden squeeze that made her squeal. 'Oh, how good it smells! Mmmmm-Mmmmm!'

'You and your Mmmms!' said Jenny, pushing Tinker away. 'And I've told you before, that I don't mind a gentle hug, but those squeezes of yours take all my breath away. No, Tinker, keep away from me - another squeeze like that and I'll feel like a lemon!'

Everyone laughed at that. Jenny did say the most amusing things. Anne felt sorry that she hadn't offered to stay and help her with the dinner. Oh dear - the time went so tremendously quickly, once they were all out together.

The talk at dinner-time was very lively. So was Mischief the monkey! He took bits from everyone's plate and handed some of them down to Timmy, who was lying under the table as usual. Timmy appreciated these titbits very much!

'Well! I didn't see a single ladder in the circus camp that was tall enough to reach up to the tower room,' said George.

'No. If there was one, it was jolly well hidden,' said Dick. 'Pass the mustard, someone!'

'In front of you, ass,' said Julian. 'I must say I'm beginning to wonder if Mr. Wooh had anything to do with the stealing of your father's papers, Tinker. I can't somehow see him climbing high ladders - he's so - so...'

'Polite and proper,' said Anne. 'Actually, I can't think of anyone in the circus who would either want the papers, or is nasty enough to steal them. They're all so nice.'

'I still think Mr. Wooh is the most likely one,' said Julian. 'He's interested in complicated figures and clever inventions. But all the same, I'm beginning to think I'm wrong. He could NOT have got up to the tower room, as there is no ladder long enough - and I really doubt if he'd dare to take a ladder into the courtyard, and risk putting it up to the tower. He might so easily be caught.'

'Right. We'll rule him out,' said Tinker. 'But if nobody went up the spiral stairway, because all the doors were locked, and nobody used a ladder, I don't see how those papers disappeared.'

'Wind took them out of the window, perhaps?' suggested Anne. 'Would that be possible?'

'No. For two reasons,' said Julian. 'One is that the window wasn't wide enough open for the wind to blow in with enough strength to blow papers out. And secondly, we'd have been sure to have found some of them down in the courtyard if they'd been blown out. But we didn't find a single one there.'

'Well - if nobody got through the three locked doors, and nobody got through the window, how did those papers get stolen?' demanded George. 'It would have been a miracle for those papers to have hopped away by themselves - and I don't believe in that kind of miracle!'

There was a long silence. What a mystery it was! 'I suppose Tinker's father couldn't possibly have gone walking in his sleep, and taken them, could he?' asked Anne.

'Well - I don't know if a sleep-walker can unlock doors with the right keys, and steal his own papers, leaving some on the floor, and then walk carefully down the spiral stairway still fast asleep, locking all the doors behind him, and then go to his own bedroom, get into bed, and then wake up in the morning without remembering a single moment of the whole thing!' said Julian.

'No. It can't be possible,' said Dick. 'Have you ever known your father to walk in his sleep, Tinker?'

Tinker considered. 'No, I can't say I have,' he said. 'He's a very light sleeper, usually. No. I don't believe Dad did all that in his sleep. It was somebody else.'

'It must have been some sort of miracle man, then,' said George. 'No ordinary person could do it. And whoever planned it wanted those papers very, very badly, or he would never have risked getting them against so many odds.'

'And if he wanted them SO VERY badly, he'll certainly make an effort to get the ones he left behind under the table,' said Julian. 'Good thing we've got those! He will probably try to get up into the tower the same way as he did before - but goodness knows what it was!'

'Well - those papers will be safely out of his way, tonight!' said George. 'On my island!'

'Yes,' said Julian. 'I'll find a most unlikely hiding-place - somewhere about the ruined castle, I think. By the way - I hope you haven't still got them under your jersey, Tinker. No - you don't look fat any more. What have you done with them?'

'George said I'd better give them to her to keep, in case they slipped out of my jersey,' said Tinker. 'You took them, didn't you, George?'

'Yes,' said George. 'Don't let's talk about it any more.'

'Why not? The thief's not here. He can't be listening to us!' said Tinker. 'I believe you're cross, George, because Julian won't let you take the papers yourself!'

'Oh, do shut up, Tinker,' said George. 'I shall be jolly cross with you in a minute, if you let Mischief upset your glass of lemonade again, all over my bread. Take him off the table! His manners are getting worse!'

'They aren't - but your temper is!' said Tinker and promptly received a kick under the table from Julian. He was about to kick back but thought better of it. Julian could kick very much harder than he could! He decided to take Mischief off the table in case George smacked him. He put the little monkey under the table where Timmy was sitting quietly. Mischief immediately cuddled up to him, putting his little furry arms round the big dog's neck. Timmy sniffed him all over, and then gave him two or three licks. He was very fond of the naughty little monkey.

'What shall we do this afternoon?' asked Dick, when they had all helped Jenny to clear away and wash-up. 'What about a bathe in the sea? Is it warm enough?'

'Not really. But that doesn't matter, we always feel jolly warm when we come out of the water and run about and then rub ourselves down,' said Anne. 'Jenny - do you feel like a bathe?'

'Good gracious, no!' said Jenny, shivering at the thought. 'I'm a cold mortal, I am. The thought of going into that cold sea makes me shudder. If you want your towels, they are all in the airing cupboard. And don't you be late for tea, if you want any, because I've a lot of ironing to do afterwards.'

'Right, Jenny,' said Tinker, about to give her one of his 'squeezes' but thinking better of it when he saw her warning look. 'Julian, may I come with you to Kirrin Island tonight? I'd like a bit of fun.'

'You may not,' said Julian. 'Anyway, there won't be any fun.'

'There might be if Mr. Wooh did hear George say she was taking those papers over,' said Tinker. 'He'd be waiting on the island - and you might be glad to have me with you!'

'I should not be glad to have you with me,' said Julian. 'You'd just be in the way. It would be much easier to look after myself than to see what you were up to all the time. I am going by myself. Please don't scowl at me like that, George.'

He got up from the table and went to look out of the window. 'Wind's died down a bit,' he said. 'I think I'll have a bathe in an hour's time. If any of you others want to come, we'll go down together.'

They all went down to the beach after a while and bathed, except Mischief, who put one small paw into the water, gave a howl and scampered back up the beach as fast as ever he could, afraid that Tinker might catch him and make him go in! Timmy went in, of course. He swam marvellously, and even gave Tinker a ride on his back, diving down when the boy felt heavy, so that Tinker suddenly found himself sprawling in the water! 'You wretch, Timmy!' yelled the boy, 'the water's gone up my nose. Wait till I catch you! I'll put you under!'

But he couldn't possibly catch old Timmy, who really enjoyed the joke. The big dog gave a joyful bark, and swam after George. How he loved being with them all!

The rest of the day went quickly. Jenny had a fine tea for them, with slices of ham, and salad, and fruit to end with, and said afterwards that she had time to play a game of Scrabble with them if they liked. Mischief sat on the table to watch.

'I don't mind you watching,' said Anne. 'But you are NOT to scrabble, Mischief. You sent all my little ivory discs on the floor last time we played, and I lost the game.'

Timmy watched gravely, sitting on a chair beside George. He simply could NOT understand what made the children play games like this when they could go for a nice long walk with him. They took pity on him when the game was over and went out for a two-mile walk along by the sea. How Timmy loved that!

'I shall cycle to Kirrin Village as soon as it's dark,' announced Julian. 'I suppose your boat is tied up in the usual place, George? I'm sorry I can't take you with me, but there might be a bit of danger, as we said. However I won't run into any if I can help it. I shan't feel comfortable until those secret papers are safely out of the way! You can give them to me just before I go, George.'

Anne suddenly yawned. 'Don't start too late or I shall fall asleep!' she said. 'It's getting dark already. All that swimming has made me feel tired!'

Dick yawned too. 'I'm jolly sleepy as well,' he said. 'I shall bed down in our tent as soon as you've gone, Ju. I'll see you off safely first, papers and all! You'd better go to your tent, too, girls - you look tired.'

'Right!' said Anne. 'You coming, George?'

'We'll all go,' said George. 'Come on, Tinker. Bet you I get over the fence and down to our tents first! Good night, Jenny. We're off!'

She and Anne and Tinker, with Timmy running behind, went off down the darkening garden. Dick and Julian helped Jenny to tidy up, and to draw all the curtains. 'Well, good night, Jenny,' said Dick. 'All you have to do is to lock the door behind us and go safely up to bed. We'll go down to our tents now. Sleep well!'

'Oh, I always do,' said Jenny. 'Look after yourselves now and don't get into any mischief! Hide those papers well, where nobody can find them!'

Julian and Dick went off down the garden, having heard Jenny carefully locking the door behind them.

Tinker and the girls were already over the fence, Mischief on Tinker's shoulder. Anne spoke anxiously to George. 'I do hope Julian will be all right going over to Kirrin Island,' she said. 'I wish he'd take Dick with him.'

'If he took anyone it should be me!' burst out George. 'It's my island!'

'Oh, don't be silly, George. The papers would be much safer with Julian,' said Anne. 'It would be an awful business for you, cycling by yourself to Kirrin, getting your boat into the water, and rowing over in the dark!'

'It would not!' said George. 'If Julian can do it, then so could I. You go into our tent, Anne, and get ready for bed. I'll come in a minute, after I've taken Timmy for a run.'

She waited till Anne had disappeared through the tent opening. Then she went quietly off by herself in the dark, Timmy trotting beside her, rather surprised.

Soon there came the sound of voices, as Julian and Dick reached the fence and leapt over it. They went to their tent, and found Tinker there, yawning and getting ready for bed.

Soon the three boys were all rolled up in their rugs, Mischief cuddled up to Tinker. After some time Julian sat up and looked at his watch, and then peeped out of the tent opening. 'Quite dark!' he said. 'But the moon's coming up, I see. I think I'll get the papers from George now, and set off on my bicycle to Kirrin. I can easily get it out of the shed.'

'You know where George keeps her boat,' said Dick. 'You won't have any difficulty in finding it. Got your torch, Ju?'

'Yes - and a new battery,' said Julian. 'Look!'

He switched on his torch. It gave a good, powerful beam. 'Shan't miss the island if I put this on!' he said. 'Now - I'll get those papers. Hey, George - I'm coming to your tent for the papers!'

He went over to the girls' tent. Anne was there, only half awake. She blinked as Julian's torch shone into her eyes.

'George!' said Julian. 'Give me those papers now, please - hallo - I say, Anne - where is George?' Anne looked all round the tent. George's rugs were there, piled in an untidy heap; but there was no George - and no Timmy either!

'Oh, Ju! Do you know what George has done - she's slipped out with the precious papers - and taken Timmy too! She must have gone to fetch her bike, and ridden off to Kirrin to get her boat - and row over to Kirrin Island! Julian, whatever will happen if she rows over and finds somebody waiting to grab those papers from her!' Poor Anne was very near to tears.

'I could shake her!' said Julian, very angry indeed. 'Going off alone like that in the dark - cycling to Kirrin - rowing over to the island - and back! She must be mad! Suppose Mr. Wooh and his friends are waiting there for her! The - silly - little - idiot!'

'Oh, Julian, quick! You and Dick get your cycles and try to catch her,' begged Anne. 'Oh please do! Anything might happen to her! Dear, silly old George! Thank goodness Timmy's gone with her.'

'Well, that's a blessing, anyway,' said Julian, still angry. 'He'll look after her as much as he can. My word, I could shake George till her teeth rattled! I thought she was rather quiet tonight. Thinking out this plan, I suppose!'

He went up to the house with Dick and Tinker to tell Jenny about George, and then he and Dick at once went to get their bicycles. This was serious. George had no right to be out alone at night like this - and go rowing over to Kirrin Island - ESPECIALLY if there was any chance of someone lying in wait for her!

Jenny was very worried indeed. She watched the two boys cycling off in the dark. Tinker begged her to let him go too, but she wouldn't. 'You and Mischief would just be nuisances,' she said. 'Oh my word, won't I shake that rascal of a George when she gets back. What a girl! Well, well - thank goodness Timmy's with her. That dog's as good as half a dozen policemen!'

Chapter 16

NIGHT ON KIRRIN ISLAND

It was certainly very dark when the half-moon went behind the clouds. George was glad that her bicycle lamp shone so brightly. The shadows in the hedges were deep and mysterious - 'as if they hid people ready to jump out at us,' she said to Timmy. 'But you'd go for them at once, wouldn't you, Timmy!'

Timmy was too much out of breath to bark an answer. George was going pretty fast, and he didn't mean to let her get out of sight. He was sure she shouldn't be out by herself on a dark night like this. He couldn't imagine why she had suddenly taken it into her head to go for a long night-ride! He raced along, panting.

They met cars with dazzling head-lamps, and George had to keep pulling to the side. She was terribly afraid that Timmy might be hit by one of the cars. 'Oh dear - I'd never, never forgive myself if anything happened to Timmy,' she thought. 'I half wish I hadn't set out now. But I'm NOT going to let Julian hide anything on my island. That's my job, not his. Timmy darling, PLEASE keep on my left side. You'll be safe then.'

So Timmy kept on her left, still mystified by this sudden journey out into the night. They came at last to Kirrin Village, where windows were still lighted here and there. Through the village and on to Kirrin Bay - ah, there was the bay! The half-moon slid out from behind a cloud and George saw the dark sea, shining here and there as the moonlight caught the crests of the waves.

'There's my island, look Timmy,' said George, feeling a swelling of pride as she looked over the dark heaving sea to a darker stretch, which she knew was Kirrin Island. 'My very own island. Waiting for me tonight!'

'Woof,' said Timmy, rather quietly, because he really hadn't any breath to waste. Now what was George going to do? Why had she come out on this lonely ride without the others? Timmy was puzzled.

They came to the stretch of beach where boats were kept. George rode down a ramp to the beach, jumped off her bicycle, and put it by a bathing-hut in the deep shadows. No one would see it there. Then she went to stare over the sea at her island.

She had only looked for a moment or two when she clutched Timmy's collar, and gave an exclamation.

'TIMMY! There's a light on my island! Look, to the right there. Can you see it? Timmy, there's somebody camping there. How DARE they? It's my island and I don't allow anyone on it unless they have my permission.'

Timmy looked - and yes, he could see the light too. Was it made by a camp-fire - or a lantern? He couldn't tell. All he knew was that he didn't want George to go over there now. Suppose there were gypsies camping there, who would resent George coming to turn them off? Or a crowd of ill-mannered young boys who hadn't bothered to find out if they were allowed there? They might make things very unpleasant for George. He pawed at her, trying to make her understand that he wanted her to go back home with him.

'No, Timmy. I'm not going back till I've found out who's there!' she said. 'It would be cowardly to turn back now. And if it's somebody waiting for me to turn up with the papers, they can think again. Look - I'm hiding them here under the tarpaulin in this boat. It would be idiotic to try and hide them on the island if there's someone there who might rob me of anything I've got - it might be one of the thieves who climbed in to the tower room, and left some of the papers behind. If he's waiting for me, he won't get any papers!'

George stuffed the parcel of papers under the tarpaulin as she spoke. 'It's Fisherman Connell's boat, called Gypsy,' she said, reading the name on the boat by the light of her torch. 'He won't mind me hiding something in it!'

She covered up the papers with the tarpaulin, and then looked over to the island again. Yes - that light was still there. Anger welled up in George again, and she went to look for her own boat, which should be somewhere near where they were.

'Here it is,' she said to Timmy, who leapt in at once. She ordered him out for she had to pull the boat down to the water. Fortunately it was a small, light boat and as the tide was almost fully in, she didn't have very far to drag it. Timmy took hold of the rope with his teeth and helped too. At last it was on the water, bobbing gently about in the dim light of the half-moon. Timmy leapt in, and soon George was in too, though with very wet feet!

She took the oars and began to pull away from the shore. 'Tide's almost on the turn,' she told Timmy. 'It won't be too hard a row. Now we can find those campers and tell them what we think of them. You're to bark your very loudest and scare them, Timmy - in fact, you can chase them to their boat, if you like.'

Timmy answered with a small bark. He knew quite well that George didn't want him to make much noise. He thought it very queer that she was going over to her island tonight, all by herself. Why hadn't she taken the others? He was sure that Julian would be very cross!

'Now don't bark or whine, Timmy,' she said, in a whisper. 'We're almost at my landing-place - but I'm going under those trees there, not landing here. I want to hide my boat.'

She guided the boat towards some trees whose branches overhung a tiny creek that ran a little way inland. She leapt out, and flung the mooring rope round the trunk of the nearest tree, and made it fast.

'There, little boat,' she said. 'You'll be safe there. No one will see you. Come on, Tim - we'll tackle those campers now.'

She turned to go, and then stopped. 'I wonder where their boat is,' she said. 'Let's have a look round, Timmy. It must be here somewhere.'

She soon found the boat lying on the sands, its rope thrown round a near-by rock. The tide was almost up to it. She grinned to herself. 'Timmy!' she whispered. 'I'm going to untie this boat and set it loose on the tide. It will soon be far away. Ha - what will those awful campers say?'

And, to Timmy's amazement, she undid the rope from the rock, rolled it up, and threw the coil inside the boat. Then she gave the boat a push - but it was still embedded in the wet sand.

'Never mind,' she said. 'Another ten minutes and the tide will be right under it - and then it will turn and take the boat with it!'

She began to make her way up the beach, Timmy close to her side. 'Now let's go after those campers, who-ever they are,' she said. 'Where's their light gone? I can't see it now.'

But in a minute or two she saw it again. 'It's not from a camp-fire - it's from a lantern of some sort,' she whispered to Timmy. 'We'll have to be careful now. Let's see if we can creep up behind them.'

The two of them made their way silently towards the middle of the little island. Here there was an old ruined castle - and there, in the courtyard of the castle, sitting in the midst of thick, overgrown weeds, were two men. George had her hand on Timmy's collar, and tugged it gently. He knew that meant, 'No barking, no growling, Tim,' and he stood perfectly still, the hackles on his neck rising fast.

The two men were playing cards by the light of a fairly powerful lantern, which they had set on a ruined stone wall. Timmy couldn't help giving a surprised growl when he saw one of them, but George hushed him at once.

Mr. Wooh, the magician from the circus, was there, dealing out the cards! The other man she didn't know. He was well-dressed, and seemed bored. He flung down his cards as Timmy and George watched from a dark corner of the old castle, and spoke to his companion in an irritated voice.

'Well, whoever it is you said was bringing the rest of those papers here to the island doesn't seem to be turning up. The papers you've given me are good - very good - but of no use without the others. This scientist fellow you've stolen them from is a genius. If we get the complete set of papers, they will be worth a tremendous sum of money, which I can get for you - but without the other papers, there will be no money for you - the first set would be useless!'

'I tell you, someone will be here with them. I heard them say so,' said Mr. Wooh, in his stately voice.

'Who stole them - you?' asked the other man, shuffling the cards quickly.

'No. I did not steal them,' said Mr. Wooh. 'Me, I keep my hands clean - I do not steal.'

The second man laughed. 'No. You let other people do your dirty work for you, don't you! Mr. Wooh, the World's Most Wonderful Magician, does not soil his hands! He merely uses the hands of others - and charges enormous prices for the goods they steal. You're a cunning one, Mr. Wooh. I wouldn't like you for an enemy! How did you manage to get the papers?'

'By using my eyes and my ears and my cunning,' answered Mr. Wooh. 'They are better than most people's. So many people are stupid, my good friend.'

'I'm not your good friend,' said the other man. 'I've got to do business with you, Mr. Wooh, but I wouldn't like to have you for a friend. I'd rather have that chimpanzee of yours! I don't even like playing cards with you! WHY doesn't this fellow come?'

George put her mouth to one of Timmy's ears. 'Timmy, I'm going to tell them to clear off my island,' she whispered furiously to the listening dog. 'Fancy fellows like that daring to set foot here - rascals and rogues! Don't come with me - wait till I call you, then if you have to rescue me, come at once!'

Leaving a most unwilling Timmy standing beside part of the old castle wall, she suddenly appeared before the two astonished men by the light of their lantern.

They leapt to their feet at once. 'It's the girl who's come - I shouldn't have thought that the boys would have let her,' said Mr. Wooh, astonished. 'I am...'

'WHAT ARE YOU DOING ON MY ISLAND?' demanded George, angrily. 'It belongs to me. I saw your light and came over with my dog. Be careful of him - he's big and strong and fierce. Clear off at once, or I'll report you to the police!'

'Easy, easy, now!' said Mr. Wooh, standing very straight and looking immensely tall. 'So the boys sent you to hide the papers instead of daring to come themselves. How cowardly of them! Where are the papers? Give them to me.'

'I've hidden them,' said George. 'They're not very far away. You didn't think I'd be silly enough to come along to you with them in my hands when I saw your light and knew that people were here, did you? No - I've hidden them somewhere on the shore - where you won't find them. Now you just clear off, both of you!'

'A very brave and determined young lady!' said Mr. Wooh, bowing solemnly to George.

'Do you mean to tell me that's a girl!' said the other man, amazed. 'Well! She's a plucky kid, I must say! Look here, kid, if you've got those papers, hand them over, and I'll give you a whole lot of money which you can give to Professor Hayling with my best wishes.'

'Come and get them,' said George, turning as if to go. The two men looked at one another, eyebrows raised. Mr. Wooh nodded, and then winked. If George had seen his face she would have known what that wink meant. It meant, 'Let's humour this silly kid, follow her - see the hiding-place, snatch the papers and clear off in our boat without paying a penny! But LOOK OUT for the dog!'

George led the way, Timmy walking between her and the two men. He was growling all the time, deep down in his throat, as if to say, 'Just you lay a finger on George and I'll bite it off!' The men took care not to go too near him! They shone the lantern on him all the time, making sure that he was not going to leap at them.

George led them to the shore, to the place where they had left their boat. Mr. Wooh gave a cry. 'Where's our boat? It was tied to that rock!'

'Is this it over this ridge?' called George, climbing up a steep bank that overhung the water, which was now quite deep with the surging tide.

The men went to look - and then George gave them the surprise of their lives! She ran at Mr. Wooh and gave him such a push that he fell right over the high bank into the sea below, landing with a yell and a terrific splash. George shouted a command to Timmy, who was now very excited, and the big dog did the same to the other man, leaping at him and pushing him over. He too shot over the ridge and fell into the sea with a splash. Timmy stood on the little cliff and barked madly, as excited as George.

'You'll have to swim to the shore of the mainland if you want to escape!' yelled George. 'The tide has taken away your boat - I set it loose! You'd better not get back on my island yet - Timmy's on the watch for you - and he'll fly at either of you if you try to set a foot on it again!'

Both men could swim, though not very well, and both were exceedingly angry and very frightened. They were sure they could never swim to the mainland - but how to get on the island to safety, they didn't know. That great, fierce dog was there, barking as if he wanted to bite them into small bits. Their boat had been set loose, there was no way to escape. They swam round in circles, not knowing what to do!

'I'm going back to the mainland now!' yelled George, climbing into her boat. 'I'll send the police to rescue you in the morning. You can get on my island now - but you're in for a VERY cold night! Goodbye!'

And off went George in her boat, with Timmy standing at the back, watching to make sure those men didn't swim after them. He gave George an admiring lick. She wasn't afraid of ANYTHING! He'd rather belong to her than to anyone else in the world.

WOOF, WOOF, W-O-O-F!

Chapter 17

AND AT LAST THE MYSTERY IS SOLVED!

George couldn't help singing loudly as she rowed back to the shore in her boat. Timmy joined in with a bark now and again. He was glad that George was so happy. He stood in the prow of the boat, wishing it was not night-time, so that he could see clearly where he was going. The moon clouded over, and the sea looked endless in the dark. Very few lights showed on the mainland at that time of night - just one or two from houses where people were still up.

Wait, though - what was that bright light suddenly shining out from the mainland? Was it someone trying to pick out their boat? Timmy barked at the light, and George, who, of course, was rowing with her back to the shore, shipped her oars for a moment and looked round.

'It's someone on the quay,' she said. 'Maybe a late fisherman. Good! He'll be able to help me drag my boat up out of the way of the tide!'

But it wasn't a fisherman. It was Julian and Dick. They had arrived about five minutes ago, and had looked at once for George's boat, and hadn't found it.

'Blow! We're too late to stop her, then. She's gone over to the island!' said Julian and began to examine all the other tied-up boats to see if he could find one that he could borrow, belonging to a friend. Somehow they must get over to Kirrin Island, and rescue George. He felt sure she would be in danger of some kind.

Then suddenly the two boys heard the sounds of oars splashing not far out to sea. Well, if that was a fisherman coming home, maybe Julian could ask him to lend him his boat to go to Kirrin Island in. He could tell him that he was afraid his cousin might be in need of help.

Timmy, in George's boat, suddenly recognised the two boys when the moon swam out from a cloud, and gave a delighted volley of barks. George, wondering if it was Julian and Dick, rowed as quickly as she could. She came into shore, jumped out and began to drag in her boat. The boys were beside her at once, and the boat was soon in its usual place, carefully made safe in case the tide was a high one.

'George!' said Julian, so overjoyed to see his cousin safe and sound that he couldn't help giving her a bear-hug. 'You wicked girl! You went to the island - just what I said you weren't to do. You might have found the thieves on the island, and then you would have been in trouble!'

'I did find them - but it's they who are in trouble, not me!' said George. 'I saw a light over there, took my boat and went over to the island - and there they were - Mr. Wooh the Magician and another man - ON MY ISLAND! Did you ever hear such cheek? They asked me for the papers at once!'

'Oh, George - did you give them to the men?' asked Dick.

'Of course not! I'd already hidden them where those men couldn't possibly find them. I wasn't idiotic enough to take them over to hide on the island when I saw somebody was there - probably waiting for me - and for the papers!' said George.

'But, George - if you knew somebody was there, why on earth did you risk going over to Kirrin Island then?' asked Julian, puzzled. 'It was a very dangerous thing to do.'

'I wanted to turn off whoever it was, of course,' said George. 'As if I'd allow just anyone on my island! It's mine, my very own, and I only allow people on it that I like. You know that.'

'I just NEVER know what you'll do next, George,' said Julian, patting Timmy on the head. 'How did you dare to go and tackle those men? Oh, I know Timmy was with you, but even so... and why in the world didn't the men row after you, and ram your boat?'

'Well, you see, they couldn't,' said George. 'I found their boat, untied it, and set it adrift on the tide. It's probably half a mile away by now!'

The boys were so astonished that they couldn't even laugh at first. But then, when they thought of the two men marooned on Kirrin Island, their boat gone goodness knows where, they laughed till tears came into their eyes!

'George, I don't know how you can think of doing such things!' said Julian. 'Weren't the men furious?'

'I don't know,' said George. 'I didn't tell them about their boat. I pretended that I'd take them to where I'd hidden the papers - and then when we got on to a nice high ridge overlooking the sea, they looked over it to see if their boat was all right, and I gave Mr. Wooh a jolly good push, and Timmy leapt at the man with him - and in they went - SPLASH! SPLASH!'

Julian really had to sit down and have another bout of laughing till the stitch in his side grew so bad that he was forced to get up and walk about. George suddenly saw the funny side of it all too, and she began to laugh as heartily as Julian. Dick joined in as well, and Timmy barked madly, enjoying the fun.

'Oh dear!' said Julian, feeling weak with laughter, 'And then I suppose you said a polite farewell and left them to their fate?'

'Well, actually I yelled out to tell them I'd send the police to rescue them in the morning,' said George. 'I'm afraid they'll both spend a very uncomfortable night - they were soaking wet, you see!'

'George - I'm beginning to think it was a good thing you went with the papers to the island, and not me, after all,' said Julian. 'I should never have thought of doing all the things you did - pushing the men into the sea - really, how could you and Timmy dare to do such things? And setting their boat loose! What on earth will the police say when we tell them?'

'I don't think we'd better tell them, had we?' said George. 'I mean - they might think I'd gone too far. Anyway, why not let the two men kick their heels on the island all night, and we'll decide what to do about the police in the morning. It's funny - I suddenly feel awfully tired.'

'I bet you do!' said Dick. 'Come on, let's get our bikes. Oh, and those precious papers - where are they?'

'Under the tarpaulin in Fisherman Connell's boat,' said George, and suddenly gave the most enormous yawn. 'I hid them there.'

'I'll get them,' said Julian. 'Then off we go back to Big Hollow House. The others will be getting awfully worried by now!'

He found the papers in the fishing-boat and then the three of them rode off quickly along the road from Kirrin to Big Hollow, Timmy running behind them, Julian kept laughing to himself. George should have been a boy not a girl - the things she did! Fancy tackling those two fellows like that - pushing them into the water, and setting their boat adrift. Julian was sure he would never have thought of doing such daring things himself!

At last they were back at the tents, and the others crowded round them to hear what had happened. Anne looked very white. Jenny was with her, comforting her - she had just made up her mind to telephone the police, and was most relieved to see George again.

'We'll tell you all the details in the morning,' said Julian. 'But all I'll say now is that the papers are safe all right, here in my pocket - the thieves were probably Mr. Wooh and another man. They were on the island tonight, waiting for George. They had overheard what she said in the tent! However, George and Timmy pushed them both into the water and set their boat adrift, so things are settling down nicely! They will have to spend the night on the island, cold and wet through!'

'George did all that!' said Jenny, amazed. 'Well! I never knew she was so dangerous! Good gracious! I feel right down scared of her! Settle down to sleep in your tent, dear - you look tired out!'

George was glad to flop down on her rugs. Now that the excitement was all over, she felt too sleepy for words! She fell asleep at once - but Julian and Dick didn't. They lay awake for some time, chuckling over George's deeds of daring. What a cousin to have!

When they were up at the house at breakfast next morning, Jeremy came up the garden and put his head in at the dining-room window. 'I say!' he said.

'Mr. Wooh's not in his tent this morning! He's disappeared! And poor old Charlie the Chimp is too miserable for words.'

'Ah - we can tell you exactly where Mr. Wooh is,' said Julian. 'But - wait a bit, Tinker, where are you going? You haven't finished your...'

But Tinker had gone off with Jeremy at top speed! He was very fond of Charlie. Oh dear, would the chimpanzee weep for his master and refuse to take his food? Tinker called Mischief and they both ran down to the fence with Jeremy and climbed over it. Tinker went straight to Charlie's cage. The chimpanzee sat with his head in his hands, rocking himself to and fro, making sad, crying noises.

'Let's get into the cage with him,' said Tinker. 'He'll like to be comforted. He must be missing Mr. Wooh very, very much.'

They crawled into the cage and sat down in the straw, each putting an arm round the sad chimpanzee. Old Grandad was very surprised to see them both there.

'Don't know what's happened to Mr. Wooh,' he said. 'Didn't come home last night! Here, Jeremy, you come on out. I can't spare you to cry over Charlie all morning. He'll soon perk up. You can stay with him, Tinker, if you like.'

Jeremy crawled out of the cage and went off crossly. Tinker sat with his arm round Charlie, wishing he didn't look so terribly sad. As he sat there, he heard a funny little noise going on all the time. Tick - tick - tick - ticka - ticka - tick - tick - tick - tick - ticka - ticka - tick. 'Sounds like a watch or something,' said Tinker, and scrabbled about in the straw. Perhaps Mr. Wooh's big gold watch had fallen into Charlie's cage?

His hand felt something small and round and smooth at the bottom of the cage. He rifled away the thick straw, and drew out the object underneath it. He stared and stared at it in the utmost surprise. Charlie saw him looking at it, snatched it away and hid it in the straw again. He made a few growly noises as if he were angry.

'Charlie, where did you get that little clock?' said Tinker. 'Oh, CHARLIE! Well, as you're so sad this morning, I'll give it to you for your very own. Just to cheer you up. But oh, Charlie, I am surprised at you!'

He slid out of the cage and went back over the fence and into his own garden. Up the path he ran and burst into the dining-room, where the others were still finishing their breakfast.

'What's up?' said Dick.

'Listen! I know who the thief was who climbed in at the tower window... I KNOW WHO HE WAS!' cried Tinker, almost shouting in his excitement.

'WHO?' said everyone, in amazement.

'It was CHARLIE the CHIMP!' said Tinker. 'Why didn't we think of him before? He can climb anything! It would be quite easy for him to swing himself up that rough-stoned tower wall, hanging on to the bits of creeper here and there - and to the uneven stones - and climb through the window into the tower room, collect all the papers he could hold - and climb down again - slither down again, probably...'

'THAT must have been the slithering sound I heard!' said Jenny. 'I told you I heard a queer slithering noise!'

'And the whispering you heard must have been Mr. Wooh trying to make him go up the tower wall and into the window!' said Julian. 'Gosh - I bet poor old Charlie's been taught to get into all sorts of windows and take whatever he sees. Mr. Wooh must have known Tinker's father worked out all his ideas up in the tower.'

'Wooh could easily teach him to take papers,' said Julian. 'But there were, of course, too many for old Charlie in the tower room. He wouldn't be able to carry them all in his front paws, for he needed all his paws to climb down that steep wall - so he must have crammed as many as he could into his mouth - and dropped the rest under the table! CHARLIE the CHIMP - well! Who would have thought he could be the thief!'

'Wait a bit - how on earth do you know it was Charlie?' said Dick. 'Nobody saw him. It was at night.'

'Well, I do know it was Charlie,' said Tinker. 'You remember that dear little clock on the tower room mantelpiece? Well, it disappeared on the night when those papers were stolen - and I found it hidden in the straw in Charlie's cage this morning! He snatched it away from me, and almost cried - so I let him keep it! It was ticking loudly just like it always did. It was the loud ticking that told me it was there in the cage!

'Who wound it up at nights, to keep it going?' said Julian, at once, most astonished.

'Charlie, I suppose,' said Tinker. 'He's very clever with his paws! The clock was quite safe, hidden in his cage. Nobody would be likely to get into the chimp's cage and sit there with him - but I did this morning, and that's how I found it. I heard it ticking, you see. I bet old Charlie was clever enough to pop his precious clock into his mouth when he saw any of the men coming to clean out his cage!'

'Well, I'm blessed!' said Jenny. 'How was it that Mr. Wooh never saw him bringing it along with the papers that night, when he stole them?'

'Well, as Tinker told you - my guess is that old Charlie must have put the little clock in his mouth then, along with the papers,' said Dick. 'He needed all his four paws, climbing - or rather slithering down that wall - and he's got a jolly big mouth! You should see what a lot of food he can stuff into it!'

'Yes. And Mr. Wooh would take the papers, of course - Charlie would just take them from his mouth and hand them to him - but he'd be artful enough to keep his precious new toy hidden in his mouth! Poor old Charlie! Can't you see him listening to the clock, and cuddling it - like a child with a new toy!' said George.

'He sounded exactly as if he were crying this morning,' said Tinker. 'I couldn't bear it. Poor old Charlie! He couldn't understand why Mr. Wooh didn't go and see him today. He was so miserable!'

'I think we'll have to get the police along now,' said Julian. 'Not only to catch Mr. Wooh and his friend, left so conveniently marooned by George on her island - but also because Mr. Wooh should be charged with stealing your father's irreplaceable charts and diagrams, Tinker. Goodness knows what else he has taught poor old Charlie to steal. I bet he's sent the chimp into a lot of houses, and up many walls, and into many windows.'

'Yes. There's probably been a trail of robberies wherever the circus went,' said Jenny. 'And many innocent people must have been suspected.'

'What a shame!' said Anne. 'But oh dear - if Mr. Wooh goes to prison, whatever will become of poor old Charlie the Chimp?'

'I bet Jeremy will take him,' said Tinker. 'He loves him, and old Charlie adores Jeremy! He'll be all right with Jeremy and old Grandad!'

'Well, Tinker, I think you'd better go and tell your father all this,' said Jenny. 'I know he's busy - he always is - but this is a thing he ought to deal with and nobody else. If you'd like to fetch him, George could tell him the whole story - and then I rather guess he'll ring up the police - and Mr. Wooh will find himself in a whole lot of trouble.'

So there goes Tinker, with Mischief on his shoulder, to find his father, down the hall - up the stairs - along the landing - into his father's bedroom... r-r-r-r-r-r-r-r-r-r! Tinker, you sound like a motor-scooter going up a steep hill! PARP - PARP! Don't hoot like that, you'll make your father so angry that he won't listen to a word you say!

But the Professor did listen - and soon Jenny heard him telephoning the police. They're coming straight away, and that means that Mr. Wooh the Magician is in for a most unpleasant time, and his magic won't help him at all! He'll have to give back the papers that he made Charlie steal - and plenty of other things, too! There he is, marooned on the island, quite unable to escape, waiting fearfully with his companion, for the police!

'Another adventure over!' said George, with a regretful sigh. 'And a jolly exciting one too! I'm glad you solved the mystery, Tinker - it was clever of you to find the little tower room clock. I bet Mr. Wooh wouldn't have let Charlie keep it, if he'd known he'd taken it from the tower room! Poor old Charlie the Chimp!'

'I'm just wondering if Dad would let me keep Charlie here, while Mr. Wooh is in prison,' began Tinker, and stopped as Jenny gave a horrified shriek.

'Tinker! If you so much as mention that idea to your father, I'll walk straight out of this house and NEVER COME BACK!' said Jenny. 'That chimp would be in my kitchen all day long - oh yes, he would - and things would be disappearing out of my larder, and my cupboards, and my drawers, and he'd dance up and down and scream at me if I so much as said a word, and...'

'All right, dear, dear Jenny, I won't ask for Charlie, honest I won't,' said Tinker. 'I do love you a bit more than I'd love a chimp - but think what a companion he would be for Mischief!'

'I'm not thinking anything of the sort!' said Jenny. 'And what about you taking a bit of notice of that monkey of yours - bless us all if he hasn't helped himself to half that jar of jam - just look at his sticky face! Oh, what a week this has been, what with chimps and monkeys and children and robberies, and George disappearing, and all!'

'Dear old Jenny,' said George, laughing as she went off into the kitchen. 'What an exciting time we've had! I really did enjoy every minute of it!'

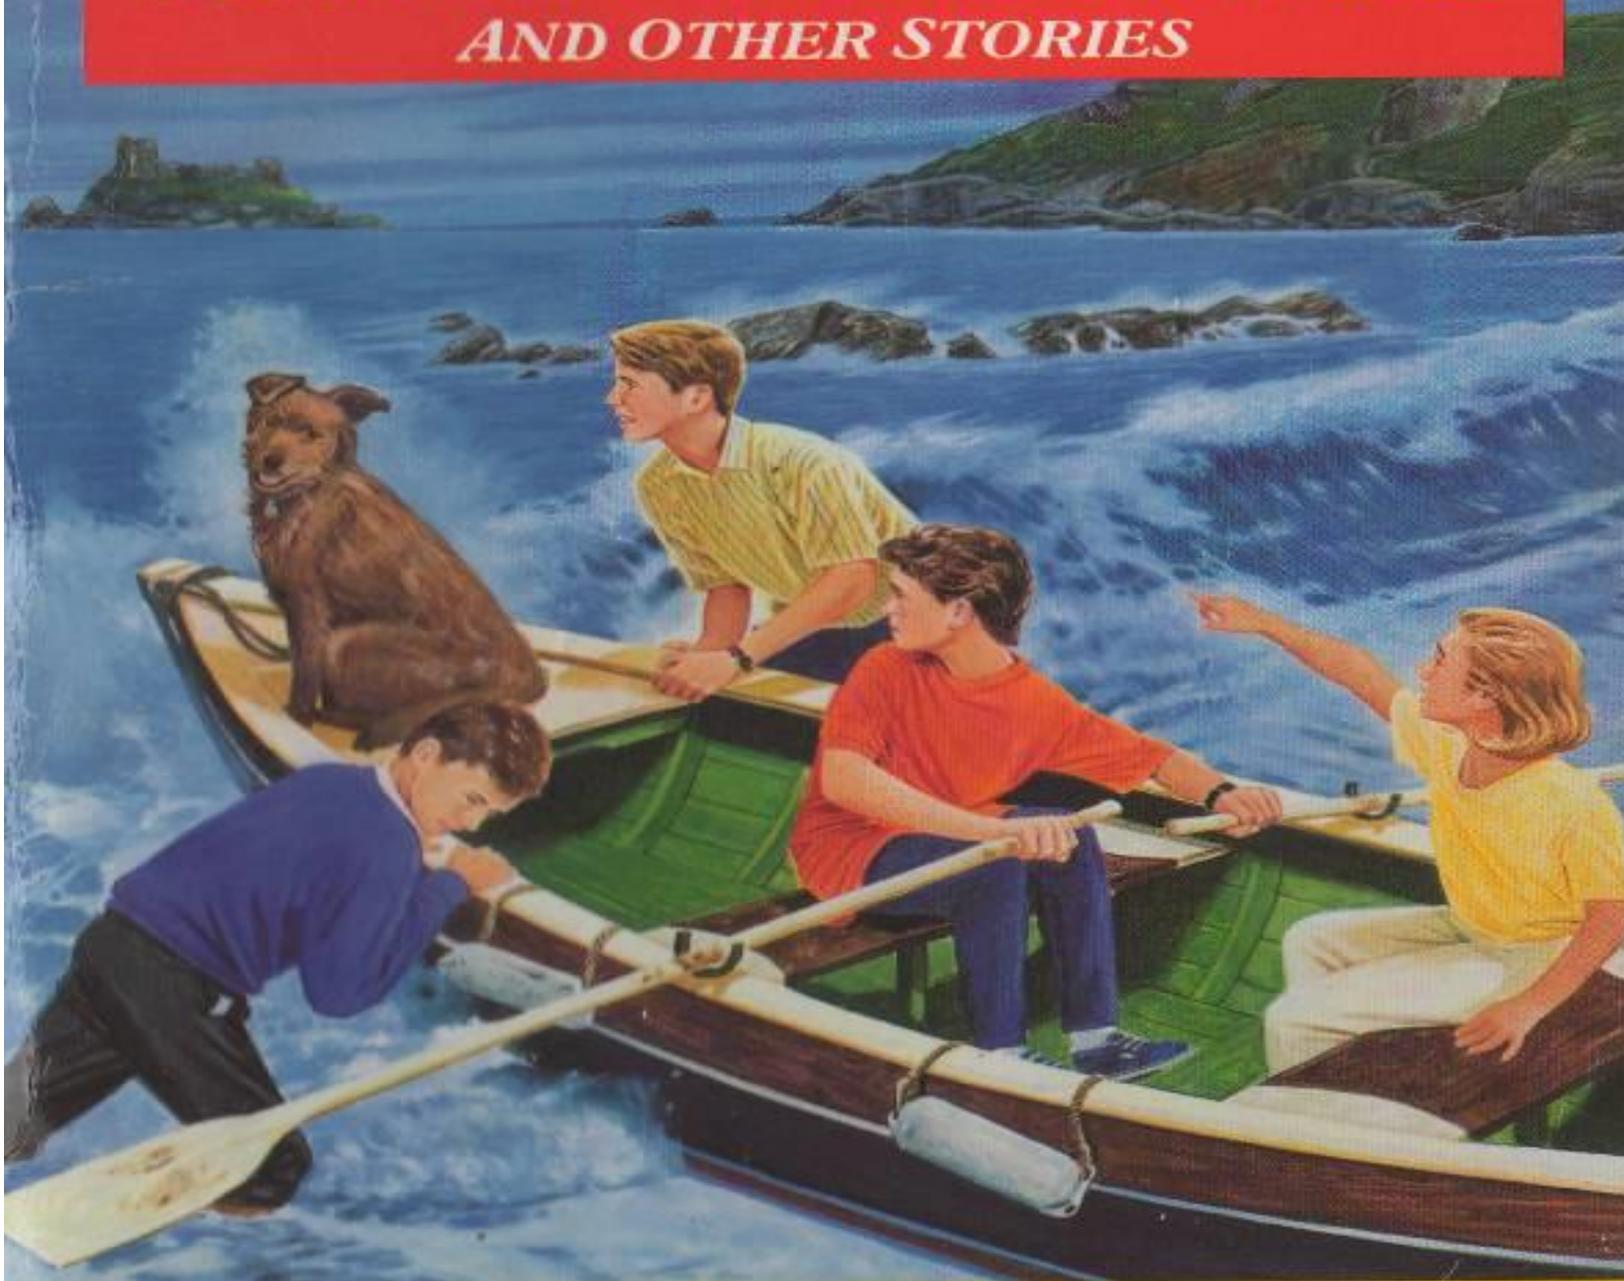

So did we, George. Hurry up and fall into another adventure. We are longing to hear what you and the others will be up to next. How we wish we could join you! Good-bye for now - and take care of yourselves, Five. Good luck!

THE END

Enid Blyton

THE FAMOUS FIVE

FIVE HAVE A PUZZLING TIME AND OTHER STORIES

THE FAMOUS FIVE

ARE BACK!

Enjoy a never-before-published collection of stories about the Famous Five, written by Enid Blyton at the peak of her powers.

Join Julian, George, Dick, Anne, and Timmy the dog, in eight new helpings of adventure and fun as the Five set out to foil kidnappers, discover the mystery behind voices in an empty house, and find out who or what is shining a light on Kirrin Island.

These exciting stories, undiscovered for over forty years, are a must for all fans!

Contents

| | | |
|---|---------------------------------------|----|
| 1 | A Lazy Afternoon (1954) | 2 |
| 2 | George's Hair is Too Long (1955) | 6 |
| 3 | Five And A Half-Term Adventure (1956) | 13 |
| 4 | Well Done, Famous Five (1956) | 21 |
| 5 | When Timmy Chased the Cat! (1957) | 25 |
| 6 | Five Have a Puzzling Time (1960) | 33 |
| 7 | Good Old Timmy! (1961) | 53 |
| 8 | Happy Christmas, Five! (1962) | 58 |

A Lazy Afternoon

'Gosh, it's hot!' said Julian, fanning himself with a paper. 'What are we all going to do this afternoon?'

'Nothing!' said Dick at once. 'I feel as if I'm rapidly melting. It's even too hot to go swimming.'

'Let's have a lazy afternoon for once,' said George. 'If anyone suggests a walk or a bike-ride in this heat, I shall scream.'

'Woof,' said Timmy at once.

'He's suggesting a walk, George,' said Anne, with a laugh. 'Scream!'

'Too hot even for that,' said George. 'Let's find a cool, shady place, take our books, and either read or snooze till tea-time. I should enjoy a lazy afternoon for once.'

'Woof,' said Timmy mournfully, not agreeing at all.

'Come on, then,' said Julian. 'We'll go to that little copse we know, under those leafy trees - near that tiny stream that ripples along and makes a nice cool noise!'

'Well - I think I can just about walk there,' said Dick, and they all set off, strolling along, unable to keep up with the lively, energetic Timmy.

'It makes me hot even to look at Timmy,' complained Dick. 'Hot to hear him too, panting like a steam-engine. Put your tongue in, Timmy, I can't bear to look at it.'

Timmy ran ahead, glad that they were off for what appeared to be a walk. He was very disappointed when the others flopped down in a little copse under some big leafy trees near a small brook. He stood looking at them in disgust.

'Sorry, Tim. No walkie-walk,' said George. 'Come and sit down with us. For goodness' sake, don't go rabbiting in this weather.'

'It would be a waste of your time, Timmy,' said Dick. 'All sensible bunnies are having an afternoon snooze, down at the bottom of their holes, waiting for the cool evening to come.'

'Woof,' said Timmy in scorn, watching the four arrange themselves comfortably under a canopy made by young saplings and bushes. Branches from big trees nearby overhung them, and by the time the four had wriggled themselves well into the little thicket, not a single sunbeam could reach them. In fact, it was difficult to see them, so well-hidden were they in the green shade.

'This is better,' said George. 'I think it's about the coolest spot we shall find anywhere. Doesn't that little stream sound nice, too, gurgling away over the stones. I think I'm going to sleep - and if you dare to flop yourself down on my middle, Timmy, I shall send you home!'

Timmy stood and looked at the well-hidden four. His tail drooped. What was the point of coming to a wood, to lie down and do nothing? Well - he was going rabbiting! He swung round, pushed his way out of the thicket, and disappeared. George raised her head to look after him.

'He's gone rabbiting after all,' she said. 'Well, I hope he remembers where we are and comes back at tea-time. Now for a lazy - peaceful - quiet afternoon!'

'Don't talk so much,' said Dick, and got a sideways kick from George's foot. 'Gosh, I feel sleepy!' In a few minutes' time not one of the four was awake. Books lay unopened on the ground. A small beetle ran over Anne's bare leg, and she didn't even feel it. A robin hopped on to a branch just above Dick's face, but his eyes were closed and he didn't see it.

It certainly was a hot afternoon. Nobody was about at all. Not a sound was to be heard except for the running water nearby, and a yellowhammer somewhere who persisted in saying that he wanted 'a little bit of bread and no cheese.' The four were as sound asleep as if they were in bed. And then, far away on a road that bordered the wood, a motorbike came by. It had a sidecar, and it made quite a noise. But the four sleepers heard nothing. They did not know that the motorbike had slowed down and turned into the wood, taking one of the grassy woodland walks that wound here and there, quiet and cool.

The motorbike came slowly down one of the paths, not making very much noise now, because it was going slowly. It came near to the little copse where the children lay hidden in the cool shade of the bushes.

The engine of the motorbike gave a sudden little cough as it came along, and Julian awoke with a start. What was that noise? He listened, but he could hear nothing more because the motorbike, with its sidecar, had now stopped. Julian shut his eyes again.

But he opened them immediately because he heard voices - low voices. People must be somewhere near. Where were they? Julian hoped they would not disturb the four in their cool hiding-place. He made a little peephole in the bush he was lying under, and spied through it.

He saw the motorbike and sidecar on the grassy path some way off. He saw two men, one just getting out of the sidecar. Julian didn't like the look of them at all.

'What villainous-looking fellows!' he thought. 'Whatever are they doing here in the middle of a summer's afternoon?'

At first the men talked in low voices, and then an argument started. One raised his voice. 'I tell you, we were followed! It's the only thing to do, to come here and dump the stuff!'

A small bag was dragged out of the sidecar. The second man seemed to be grumbling, not at all willing to do what the other wanted.

'I tell you, I know it won't be found if we put it there,' said the first man. 'What's biting you? We can't afford to be stopped with the stuff on us - and I know we were being followed. It was only because we crossed against those traffic-lights that we got away.'

Julian awoke the others, and whispered to them. Something peculiar was happening! Soon all the four were peeping through leafy peepholes at what was going on. They saw what looked like a small mail-bag on the ground by the motorbike.

'What are they going to do with it?' whispered George. 'Oughtn't we to burst out on them?'

'I would if we had Timmy with us,' whispered back Julian. 'But he's gone rabbiting and may be miles away.'

'And these ruffians would be more than a match for us,' said Dick. 'Blow! We daren't even show ourselves. We can only watch.'

'I hope we see where they hide the stuff, whatever it is,' said Anne, trying to spy through the leaves. 'There they go with the bag.'

'I can see them,' said Dick, almost forgetting to whisper in his excitement. 'They're climbing a tree!'

'Yes - one's already up, and the other is passing the bag to him,' whispered Julian. 'It must have a hollow trunk, I think. Gosh, I wish Timmy was here!'

'Now the second fellow's trying to climb up, too,' said George. 'The first one wants help, I suppose. The bag must be stuck.'

Both men were now up the tree, trying to stuff the bag down some kind of hollow there. At last there was a thud as if the bag had dropped down.

'If only Timmy was here!' said Julian again. 'It's maddening to lie here and do nothing - but we'd be no match for those two desperate fellows!'

Then a sudden noise came to their ears - the scampering of feet. Then came a familiar sound. 'Woof!'

'Timmy!' yelled Julian and George together, and Julian leapt up and pushed his way out of his hiding-place at once. 'Tell Tim to guard that tree, George, quick!'

'Here, Timmy - on guard!' shouted George, and the astonished Timmy ran to the tree where the two men were staring down in sudden horror.

Timmy gave a most blood-curdling growl, and one man, who had been about to jump down, shrank back. 'Call that dog off!' he yelled. 'What do you think you're doing?'

'You tell us what you're doing,' said Julian. 'What's in the bag you pushed down that tree-hollow?'

'What bag? What are you talking about? You must be mad!' said the man. 'Call that dog off, or I'll report you to the police.'

'Right! We'll report you at the same time!' said Julian. 'You'll jolly well stay up that tree till we bring the police back here - and I warn you, if you trying jumping down and running away, you'll be sorry. You've no idea what sharp teeth that dog has!'

The two men were so angry that they could hardly speak. Timmy barked loudly, and kept leaping up to try to reach them. Julian turned to Dick. 'Take Anne and George to the highway and stop a car. Go to the nearest police-station and tell the police there to send men here at once. Buck up.'

But before Dick could go off with the two girls, there came the sound of another motorbike - and then a second - bumping along the woodland path. Julian fell silent. Were more ruffians coming? Timmy would be a great help, if so. Julian and the others got behind trees and watched to see who was on the coming motorbikes.

'The police!' yelled Dick, suddenly seeing the familiar uniform. 'They must have been the ones chasing those fellows. Somebody must have given them the tip that they had turned off into the wood! Hey! We can help you!'

The two traffic-policemen stopped in surprise. They saw the motorbike and sidecar. 'Have you kids seen anything of two men with a bag?' shouted one of them.

'Yes. The bag's stuffed down a tree over there, and our dog's guarding the men - they're up in the tree!' shouted back Julian, going towards the police. 'You've just come in time to collect them!'

'My word - pretty hot stuff!' said the policeman with a grin, as he saw the two scared men up the tree, with Timmy still leaping up hopefully at them. 'The bag's up there, too, is it?'

'Down in the hollow of the tree,' said Julian.

'Well, thanks very much for doing our job for us,' said the second policeman. He blew a police-whistle at top blast. 'We've got some pals on the roadway,' he said. 'We said we'd whistle if we found anything. They'll soon be along.' He looked at the two men in the tree. 'Well, Jim and Stan? You thought you'd fooled us, didn't you? Are you coming quietly - or do we ask the dog to help us round you up?'

Jim and Stan took one look at the eager Timmy. 'We'll come quietly,' they said, and, when three more men came racing down the woodland path, there was no trouble at all. Jim and Stan went off with the policemen, Timmy gave one last fierce bark, and all Five watched the men, the motorbikes, and the sidecar disappear with many bumps up the path back to the highway.

'Well!' said George. 'Talk about a nice cool, lazy afternoon! I'm hotter than ever now!'

'Woof,' said Timmy, his tongue hanging out almost to the ground. He looked very hot, too.

'Well, you shouldn't go rabbiting,' said George. 'No wonder you're hot!'

'It's a jolly good thing he did go rabbiting!' said Dick. 'If he'd been with us, he'd have barked, and those fellows would have known we were here - and would have gone further on to hide their goods. We'd never have seen what they were doing, or have been able to catch them.'

'Yes. That's true,' said George, and patted Timmy. 'All right, Timmy - you were right to go rabbiting and to come back when you did!'

'Tea-time, everybody!' said Dick, looking at his watch. 'Well, well - what a very nice, peaceful, lazy afternoon! I really have enjoyed it!'

2

George's Hair is Too Long

'Let's go to Windy Cove,' said Julian one fine summer's day in August. 'It's so hot on Kirrin Beach - Windy Cove will be nice and cool. There's always a breeze blowing there.'

'Right,' said Dick. 'What do you say, George?'

'Well, I wanted to go and have my hair cut,' said George. 'Honestly, it will be as long as Anne's if I don't have it cut soon.'

'Well, I wish you would have it cut,' said Dick. 'You keep on complaining about it - as if it mattered whether it was short or long.'

'You forget that it matters to George very much,' said Julian with a grin. 'People might mistake her for a girl if it grows half an inch longer! Well, for goodness' sake, George, get it cut this afternoon. We pass the hairdresser's on the way to Windy Cove. We'll all go into the ice-cream shop and have ices, and wait for you there.'

They set off at two o'clock. The road to the village was hot and dusty, and Timmy ran along with his long pink tongue hanging half-way down his front legs!

'Poor old Tim - you shall have an ice-cream, too,' said Dick, patting him.

They came to the village, and George went to the hairdresser's shop while the others went on with Timmy to the dairy, which sold good creamy ices. They heard George calling them and turned.

'The shop's shut! It's early-closing day,' she shouted. 'Blow! I forgot. Now I can't have my hair cut.'

'Well, never mind - come and have an ice-cream,' shouted back Julian. But George was in an obstinate mood.

'No. I want my hair cut, even if I have to cut it myself! Anybody got a pair of scissors?'

'Of course not. Who carries scissors about? Don't be an idiot!' said Dick. 'For goodness' sake come on with us and stop worrying about your hair.'

'I shall go and borrow some scissors in the ironmonger's,' shouted George. 'They're shut, too, but I know old Mr. Pails will let me in at the side-door. You go on with Timmy and have ice-creams. I don't want one. I'll catch you up when I'm ready.'

'What a fathead George is,' said Dick, going on with the others. 'Once she's made up her mind to do something, nothing will stop her, not even if it doesn't really matter.'

They went to the dairy. George went round to the side-door of the ironmonger's shop. Mr. Pails answered her knock.

'Well, Miss George, what do you want?' he said. 'My shop's shut, as you very well know, and I'm just going to catch the bus over to my son's, as I always do on early-closing day.'

'I won't keep you more than a minute,' said George. 'I want to borrow a pair of nice sharp scissors, Mr. Pails. Only just for a minute or two. The bus doesn't go for ten minutes; you've got plenty of time.'

'Well, well, you always were a one for getting your own way!' said the old man. 'Come along in - I'll show you the drawer where the scissors are kept. But don't you be long now - I must catch that bus!'

George went down the passage that led to the shop and the old fellow took her to a drawer at the back. He was just opening it when a small van drew up outside the shop. It stopped and two men got out. George looked up casually - and jumped! One of the men was peering through the letter-box on the shop-door. What an extraordinary thing to do!

George distinctly saw the man's eyes looking through the letter-box into the dark shop. She pulled at Mr. Pail's arm and whispered.

'Do you see that man peering through the letter-box? What does he want? He couldn't have seen us because we're in such a dark corner.'

At that very moment the door was forced open and two men came hurriedly into the shop. At first they didn't see Mr. Pails and George, and made for the little black safe set at the back of the counter. Mr. Pails gave an indignant shout.

'Hey, you! What do you mean, forcing your way in here? I'll. . .'

But one of the men leapt over to him and put his hand over the old fellow's mouth. The other man ran to George and swung her into a little cupboard nearby, paying no attention to her yells. Mr. Pails was shoved in, too, and the door was forced shut on them and locked.

George shouted at the top of her voice, and so did Mr. Pails. But the shop was set apart from the others in the street, and there was no one to hear them on that hot, stifling afternoon.

George heard the sound of panting as the men removed the heavy little safe. Then the shop-door shut, and there was the sound of the van being started up - and driven away!

'If only I'd had Timmy with me,' thought George fiercely, as she pushed hard against the door.

'Why did I say he could go and have an ice-cream with the others?'

Mr. Pails was almost fainting with shock and fright, and was no help at all. George gave up struggling with the door after a time, and began to wish there were not so many pans and brushes stored in the cupboard, leaving so little room for her and the old ironmonger!

She wondered what the others were doing. Would they come back and look for her? If they did, she could yell again.

But the others had now finished their ice-creams and were on the way to Windy Cove. George had said she didn't want an ice-cream, but would catch them up. Very well, they would walk on and she could overtake them.

So off they went along the road that led to Windy Cove, Timmy lagging behind a little on the look-out for his beloved George. Why didn't she come? He suddenly decided to go back and look for her. He felt anxious, though he didn't know why. He turned tail and trotted off back to the village.

'There goes Tim,' said Anne with a laugh. 'He can't bear to be without George for more than half an hour! Goodbye, Tim! Tell George to hurry up!'

They went on their way without Timmy, walking in a line across a narrow lane. Suddenly a van turned a corner behind them and came racing up at top speed. Dick only just dragged Anne out of its way in time. The van swerved and went on, hooting wildly at the next corner.

'What does the driver think he's doing?' said Dick angrily. 'Tearing down narrow, winding lanes like that! What's his hurry?'

The van turned the corner - and almost immediately after there came an explosive noise and the scream of brakes. Then a silence.

'Whew! That sounded like a burst tyre,' said Julian, beginning to run. 'I hope they haven't had an accident.'

The three turned the corner. They saw the van slewed round in the lane, almost in the ditch. The tyre on the left-hand back wheel was flat and had split badly. It certainly was a very burst tyre indeed! Two men were looking at it angrily.

'Here, you!' said one of the men, turning to Dick. 'Run to the nearest garage, will you, and ask a man to come and help us?'

'Certainly not!' said Dick. 'You nearly knocked over my sister just now. One of you can go and get help yourselves. You'd no business to drive along a country lane like that.'

But neither of the men made a move to go back for help. Instead, they scowled at the burst tyre and at each other. The three stood there, looking with interest at the angry men.

'You clear off,' said one of the men at last. 'Unless you want to help us with the wheel. Do you know how to change a wheel?'

'Yes,' said Julian, sitting down on the hedge bank. 'Don't you? It's funny if you don't know. As your job is driving a van, I should have thought it would be one of the first things you'd learn!'

'You shut up,' said the first man, 'and clear off.'

'Why?' said Dick, sitting down beside Julian. 'You seem very anxious to get rid of us, don't you? Or do you feel nervous that experts like us should watch you making a mess of such a simple thing as changing a wheel?'

Anne didn't like all this. 'I think I'll go back and meet George,' she said, and walked round the van. She took a quick look inside - and saw a little black safe there! A safe! She took a quick glance back at the two men. They certainly were a nasty-looking couple. She went over to Julian and sat down beside him. She took a twig and began to write idly in the thick dust at their feet, nudging him as she did so.

Julian looked down into the dust at once. 'A safe is in the van,' Anne had written in the dust, and, as soon as she knew that the boys had seen what she had written, she rubbed her foot over the hurried writing.

The three stared at the two men, who were now trying to change the wheel. It was plain that they had never changed one before! Julian caught hold of Anne when she got up to go back and meet George.

'No. Stay,' he said. 'George may have changed her mind and gone home. You stay with us, Anne.'

So Anne stayed, hoping against hope that George would soon appear with Timmy. Why was she so long? She must have gone home, after all! What was Julian going to do? Wait for another car to come along, and then stop it and pass on his suspicions to the driver? Because the whole thing was very suspicious! Anne was certain that both safe and van were stolen. Where was George? She had had plenty of time to borrow scissors, cut her hair and catch them up!

Poor George had stood in the cupboard till she was so cramped that she could hardly move an arm or leg. Mr. Pails seemed to have fainted, but she couldn't do anything about it. And then she heard a most familiar and welcome sound!

Feet pattered down the passage that led to the back of the shop, and then came a whine. Timmy!

'Timmy! Tim, I'm here, in this cupboard!' called George. 'Timmy!'

Timmy came and scraped at the cupboard, and then began to bark so furiously that a passer-by stopped in surprise. He pushed at the door, which had been left unlocked by the two thieves, and looked inside. He saw Timmy at once. The dog ran to him and then back to the cupboard, still barking.

'Anyone here?' called the passerby.

'Yes, yes - we're locked in this cupboard!' cried George. 'Let us out, please.'

It took only two seconds for the man to run across the floor and unlock the cupboard. George staggered out, and Timmy flung himself on her, licking her from head to foot. Mr. Pails was then dragged out, but he was so shocked and upset that it was difficult to get anything out of him.

'Police!' he kept saying. 'Police!'

'I'll send someone for the police - and a doctor, too,' said the man. 'You sit down in that chair, Mr. Pails. I'll look after you.'

George slipped out of the shop. She felt rather faint after her long stay in the cramped cupboard. She must hurry after the others, tell them what had happened, and get them to come back to the shop. It was no use going to Windy Cove that afternoon!

So she and Timmy hurried down the dusty lane that led from the village to Windy Cove. How far had the others got? Perhaps they were at the cove now!

But they were not. They were still sitting at the side of the lane, watching two perspiring, harassed, fumbling men trying to put on a second wheel after having spent ages getting the first one off! There were not enough tools to do the job properly, as Julian could very well see. He wished George would come. Timmy would be such a help!

And then, round the corner came George at last, with Timmy at her heels. Rather a pale George, evidently bursting with news. She raced up to them.

'Ju! Dick! What do you think happened to me? Mr. Pails and I were locked in a cupboard in his shop by two thieves who . . .'

She suddenly caught sight of the two men tinkering with the van, and stopped, astounded. She pointed at them and shouted.

'Why - those are the two men! And that's the van they came in - have they got a safe in it?'

'Yes,' said Julian, standing up very suddenly. 'They have! Are you sure you recognize these men, George?'

'Oh yes! I'll never forget them all my life long!' cried George. 'Timmy -- watch them! Watch them, Timmy!'

Timmy sprang over to the two men, growling so fiercely and showing all his fine teeth in such a snarl that the two men shrank back, terrified. One raised a hand as if to strike Timmy with the tool he held.

'If you hit him, he'll have you down on the ground at once,' warned George grimly, and the man dropped his hand. 'Now - what do we do, Julian? These men ought to be handed over to the police.'

'Listen - here comes a car,' said Dick. 'We can stop it and send a message back to the village.'

A big car came round the corner from the direction of Windy Cove. Julian waved to it to stop. Two men were in it.

'What's up?' they called.

Julian explained as shortly as he could. One of the men jumped down immediately. 'You want the police at once,' he said. 'Let's put that wheel on, and take the two men back to Kirrin Village in it. I can drive it, and the boy with the dog can come, too - we'll put him in the van with the two men! You others can get into my car, and we'll follow the van back to Kirrin and get the police!'

This all sounded very sane and sensible. The wheel was put on in a jiffy, the two men bundled into the back of the van with a snarling Timmy, and George (pleased because she had been mistaken for a boy!) sat in the front of the van with the man from the other car. They drove off, followed by the big car, in which were a pleased and smiling Julian, Dick and Anne!

It was very exciting when they all got to Kirrin Village! The police were amazed and delighted to have the two robbers safely delivered to them, with the safe and the stolen van as well! Mr. Pails was very, very grateful. Timmy was half sorry he hadn't been allowed even a small bite, but extremely happy to have been able to rescue his beloved George!

'Well - what a thrill!' said George's mother, when they arrived home at last and told their astonishing tale. 'So you didn't get to Windy Cove, after all. Still - you can all go tomorrow!'

'I can't,' said George at once.

'Why?' asked everyone, surprised.

'Because - I simply - must - get - my - hair-cut!' said George. 'And I'll jolly well see I'm not locked in a cupboard next time!'

Five and a Half-Term Adventure!

The Five were at Kirrin Cottage for a short half-term holiday. For once, both the boys' school and the girls' school had chosen the same weekend!

'It hardly ever happens that we can spend half-term together,' said Anne, fondling Timmy. 'And what luck to have such lovely weather at the beginning of November!'

'Four days off!' said George. 'What shall we do?'

'Bathe!' said Julian and Dick together.

'What!' said their aunt, horrified, 'Bathe in November! You must be mad! I can't allow that, Julian, really I can't.'

'All right,' said Julian, grinning at his aunt. 'Don't worry. We haven't got our swim-suits here.'

'Let's walk over to Windy Hill,' said Dick.

'It's a grand walk, by the sea most of the way. And there may be blackberries and nuts still to find. I'd like a good walk.'

'Woof,' said Timmy at once, and put his big paw up on Dick's knee. He was always hoping to hear that magic word 'Walk!'

'Yes, let's do that,' said Anne. 'Aunt Fanny, shall we take a picnic lunch - or it is too much bother to prepare?'

'Not if you help me,' said her aunt, getting up. 'Come along - we'll see what we can find. But remember that it gets dark very quickly in the afternoon now, so don't leave it too late when you turn back.'

The Five set off half an hour later, with sandwiches and slices of fruit cake in a knapsack carried by Julian. Dick had a basket for any nuts or blackberries. His aunt had promised a black-berry-and-apple pie if they did find any berries for picking.

Timmy was very happy. He trotted along with the others, sniffing here and there, and barking at a curled-up hedgehog in a hole in a bank.

'Now, leave it alone,' said George. 'You really should have learnt by now that hedgehogs are not meant to be carried in your mouth, Timmy! Don't wake it up - it's gone to sleep for the winter!'

'It's a heavenly day for the beginning of November,' said Anne. 'The trees still have their leaves - all colours: red, yellow, brown, pink - and the beeches are the colour of gold.'

'Blackberries!' said Dick, catching sight of a bush whose sprays were still covered with the black fruit. 'I say - taste them - they're as sweet as sugar!'

As soon as the blackberries were to be seen on bushes here and there, the Five slowed up considerably! The blackberries that were still left were big and full of sweetness.

'They melt in my mouth!' said George. 'Try one, Timmy!' But Timmy spat the blackberry out in disgust.

'Manners, Timmy, manners!' said Dick at once, and Timmy wagged his big tail and pranced round joyfully.

It was a good walk but a slow one. They found a hazelnut copse and filled the basket with nuts that had fallen to the ground. Two red squirrels sat up in a nearby tree and chattered at them crossly. This was their nut copse!

'You can spare us a few!' called Anne. 'I expect you've got hundreds hidden away safely for the winter.'

They had their lunch on the top of Windy Hill. It was not a windy day, but, all the same, there was a good breeze on the top, and Julian decided to sit behind a big gorse bush for shelter. 'We'll be in the sun and out of the wind then,' he said. 'Spread out the lunch, Anne!'

'I feel terribly hungry!' said George. 'I can't believe it's only just one o'clock, Julian.'

'Well, that's what my watch says,' said Julian, taking a sandwich. 'Ha - ham and lettuce together - just what I like. Get away, Tim - I can't eat with you trying to nibble my sandwich too.'

It was a magnificent view from the top of the hill. The four children munched their sandwiches and gazed down into the valley below. A town lay there, comfortably sprawled in the shelter of the hills. Smoke rose lazily from the chimneys.

'Look - there's a train running along the railway-line down there,' said George, waving her sandwich in its direction. 'It looks just like a toy one.'

'It's going to Beckton,' said Julian. 'See - there's the station - it's stopping there. It really does look like a toy train!'

'Now it's off again - on its way to Kirrin, I suppose,' said Dick. 'Any more sandwiches? What, none? Shame! I'll have a slice of cake, then - hand over, Anne.'

They talked lazily, enjoying being together again. Timmy wandered from one to the other, getting a titbit here and a scrap of ham there.

'I think I can see another nut copse over yonder - the other side of the hill,' said George. 'I vote we go and see what nuts we can find - and then I suppose we ought to be thinking of going back home. The sun is getting awfully low, Ju.'

'Yes, it is, considering it's only about two o'clock,' said Julian, looking at the red November sun hardly showing above the horizon. 'Come on, then - let's get a few more nuts, and then go back home. I love that long path winding over the cliffs beside the sea.'

They all went off to the little copse, and to their delight, found a fine crop of hazelnuts there. Timmy nosed about in the grass and brought mouthfuls of the nuts to George.

'Thanks, Timmy,' said George. 'Very clever of you - but I wish you could tell the bad ones from the good ones!'

'I say,' said Dick, after a while, 'the sun's gone, and it's getting dark. Julian, are you sure your watch is right?'

Julian looked at his watch. 'It says just about two o'clock still,' he said in surprise. 'Gosh - I must have forgotten to wind it up or something. It's definitely stopped now - and it must have been very slow before!'

'Ass,' said Dick. 'No wonder George thought it was long past lunch-time when you said it was one o'clock. We'll never get home before dark now - and we haven't any torches with us.'

'That cliff-path isn't too good to walk along in the dark, either,' said Anne. 'It goes so near the edge at times.'

'We'd better start back immediately,' said Julian. 'Awfully sorry about this - I never dreamed that my watch was wrong.'

'I tell you what would be a better idea,' said George. 'Why don't we just take the path down into Beckton and catch the train to Kirrin? We'll be so late if we walk back, and Mother will be ringing up the police about us!'

'Good idea of yours, George,' said Julian. 'Come on - let's take the path while we can still see. It leads straight down to the town.'

So away went the Five as fast as they could. It was dark when they reached the town, but that didn't matter, because the street lamps were alight. They made their way to the station, half-running down the main street.

'Look - there's Robin Hood on at the cinema here,' said Anne. 'Look at the posters!'

'And what's that on at the hall over there?' said George. Timmy, come here - oh, he's shot across the road. Come here, Timmy!'

But Timmy was running up the steps of the Town Hall. Julian gave a sudden laugh. 'Look - there's a big Dog Show on there - and old Timmy must have thought he ought to go in for it!'

'He smelt the dogs there,' said George, rather cross. 'Come on - let's get him, or we'll lose the next train.'

The hall was plastered with posters of dogs of all kinds. Julian stopped to read them while George went in after Timmy.

'Some jolly valuable dogs here,' he said. 'Some beauties, too - look at the picture of this white poodle. Ah - here comes Tim again, looking very sorry for himself. I bet he knows he wouldn't win a single prize - except for brains!'

'It was the doggy smell that made him go to see what was on,' said George. 'He was awfully cross because they wouldn't let him in.'

'Hurry up - I think I can hear a train coming!' said Dick, and they all raced down the road to the station, which was quite near. The train puffed in as they went to the booking-office for their tickets. The guard was blowing his whistle and waving his flag as they rushed on to the platform. Dick pulled open the door of the very last compartment and they all bundled in, panting.

'Gosh - that was a near squeak,' said Dick, half-falling on to a seat. 'Look out, Tim - you nearly had me over.'

The four children got back their breath and looked round the carriage. It was not empty, as they had expected. Two other people were there, sitting at the opposite end, facing each other - a man and a woman. They looked at the Five, annoyed.

'Oh,' said Anne, seeing the woman carrying a shawled bundle in her arms, 'I hope we haven't woken your baby. We only just caught the train.'

The woman rocked the little thing in her arms, and crooned to it, covering its head with a shawl - a rather dirty one, Anne noticed.

'Is she all right?' asked the man. 'Cover her up more - it's cold in here.'

'There, there now,' crooned the woman, pulling the shawl tighter. The children lost interest and began to talk. Timmy sat still by George, very bored. Then he suddenly sniffed round, and went over to the woman. He leapt up on to the seat beside her and pawed at the shawl! The woman shrieked and the man shouted at Timmy.

'Stop that! Get down! Here, you kids, look after that great dog of yours. It'll frighten the baby into fits!'

'Come here, Timmy,' said George at once, surprised that he should be interested in a baby. Timmy whined and went to George, looking back at the woman. A tiny whimpering noise came from the shawl, and the woman frowned. 'You've waked her,' she said, and began to talk to the man in a loud, harsh voice.

Timmy was very disobedient! Before George could stop him, he was up on the seat again, pawing at the woman and whining. The man leapt up furiously.

'Don't hit my dog, don't hit him, he'll snap at you!' shouted George - and mercifully, just at that moment the train drew in at a station.

'Let's get out and go into another carriage,' said Anne, and opened the door. The four of them, followed by a most unwilling Timmy, were soon getting into a compartment near the engine. George looked crossly at Timmy.

'Whatever came over you, Tim?' she said. 'You are never interested in babies! Now sit down and don't move!'

Timmy was surprised at George's cross voice, and he crept under the seat and stayed there. The train came to a little station, where there was a small platform, and stopped to let a few people get out.

'It's Seagreen Halt,' said Dick, looking out. 'And there go the man and woman and baby - I must say I wouldn't like them for a Mum and Dad!'

'It's quite dark now,' said George, looking through the window. 'It's a jolly good thing we just caught the train. Mother will be getting worried.'

It was nice to be in the cosy sitting-room at Kirrin Cottage again, eating an enormous tea and telling George's mother about their walk. She was very pleased with the nuts and blackberries. They told her about the man and woman and baby, too, and how funny Timmy had been, pawing at the shawl.

'He was funny before that,' said Anne, remembering. 'Aunt Fanny, there was a dog-show on at Beckton, and Timmy must have read the posters, and thought he could go in for it - because he suddenly dashed across the road and into the Town Hall where the show was being held!'

'Really?' said her aunt, laughing. 'Well, perhaps he went to see if he could find the beautiful little white Pekinese that was stolen there today! Mrs. Harris rang up and told me about it - there was such a to-do. The little dog, which was worth five thousand pounds, was cuddled down in its basket one minute - and the next it was gone! Nobody was seen to take it, and though they hunted in every corner of the hall, there was no sign of the dog.'

'Gracious!' said Anne. 'What a mystery! How could anyone possibly take a dog like that away without being seen?'

'Easy,' said Dick. 'Wrap it in a coat, or pop it into a shopping basket and cover it up. Then walk through the crowd and out of the hall!'

'Or wrap it in a shawl and pretend it was a baby - like the little one in that dirty shawl in the train,' said Anne. 'I mean - we thought that was a baby, of course - but it could easily have been a dog - or a cat - or even a monkey. We couldn't see its face!'

There was a sudden silence. Everyone was staring at Anne and thinking hard. Julian banged his hand on the table and made everyone jump.

'There's something in what Anne has just said,' he said. 'Something worth thinking about! Did anyone see even a glimpse of the baby's face - or hair? Did you, Anne - you were nearest?'

'No,' said Anne, quite startled. 'No, I didn't. I did try to see, because I like babies - but the shawl was pulled right over the face and head.'

'And I say - don't you remember how interested Timmy was in it?' said George, excited. 'He's never interested in babies - but he kept on jumping up and pawing at the shawl.'

'And do you remember how the baby whimpered?' said Dick. 'It was much more like a little dog whining than a baby, now I come to think of it. No wonder Timmy was excited! He knew it was a dog by the smell!'

'Whew! I say - this is jolly exciting,' said Julian, getting up. 'I vote we go to Seagreen Halt and snoop round the tiny village there.!'

'No,' said Aunt Fanny firmly. 'I will not have that, Julian. It's as dark as pitch outside, and I don't want you snooping round for dog-thieves on your half-term holiday.'

'Oh, I say!' said Julian, bitterly disappointed.

'Ring up the police,' said his aunt. 'Tell them what you have just told me - they'll be able to find out the truth very quickly. They will be sure to know who has a baby and who hasn't - they can go round snooping quite safely!'

'All right,' said Julian, sad to have a promising adventure snatched away so quickly. He went to the phone, frowning. Aunt Fanny might have let him and Dick slip out to Seagreen in the dark - it would have been such fun.

The police were most interested and asked a lot of questions. Julian told them all he knew, and everyone listened intently. Then Julian put down the receiver and turned to the others, looking quite cheerful again.

'They were jolly interested,' he said. 'And they're off to Seagreen Village straightaway in the police car. They're going to let us know what they find. Aunt Fanny - we cannot go to bed tonight till we know what happens!'

'No, we can't!' cried all the others, and Timmy joined in with a bark, leaping round excitedly.

'Very well,' said Aunt Fanny, smiling. 'What a collection of children you are - you can't even go for a walk without something happening! Now - get out the cards and let's have a game.'

They played cards, with their ears listening for the ringing of the telephone bell. But it didn't ring. Supper time came and still it hadn't rung.

'It's no go, I suppose,' said Dick gloomily. 'We probably made a mistake.'

Timmy suddenly began to bark, and then ran to the door, pawing at it.

'Someone's coming,' said George. 'Listen - it's a car!' They all listened, and heard the car stop at the gate - then footsteps came up the path and the front-door bell rang. George was out in a trice, and opened it.

'Oh - it's the police!' she called. 'Come in, do come in.'

A burly policeman came in, followed by another. The second one carried a bundle in a shawl! Timmy leapt up to it at once, whining!

'Oh! It wasn't a baby, then!' cried Anne, and the policeman smiled and shook his head. He pulled the shawl away - and there, fast asleep, was a tiny white Pekinese, its little snub nose tucked into the shawl!

'Oh - the darling!' said Anne. 'Wake up, you funny little thing!'

'It's been doped,' said the policeman. 'I suppose they were afraid of it whining in the night and giving its hiding-place away!'

'Tell us what happened,' begged Dick. 'Get down, Timmy. George, he's getting too excited - he wants the Peke to play with him!'

'Acting on your information we went to Seagreen,' said the policeman. 'We asked the porter what people got out of the train this evening, and if anyone carried a baby - and he said four people got out - and two of them were a man and woman, and the woman carried a baby in a shawl. He told us who they were - so away we went to the cottage ...'

'Woof,' said Timmy interrupting, trying to get at the tiny dog again, but nobody took any notice of him.

'We looked through the back window of the cottage,' went on the policeman, 'and spotted what we wanted at once! The woman was giving the dog a drink of milk in a saucer - and she must have put some drug into it, because the little thing dropped down and fell asleep at once while we were watching.'

'So in we went, and that was that,' said the second policeman, smiling round. 'The couple were so scared that they blurted out everything - how someone had paid them to steal the dog, and how they had taken their own baby's shawl, wrapped round a cushion - and had stolen the dog quite easily when the judging of the Alsatians was going on. They wrapped the tiny dog in the shawl, just as you thought, and caught the next train home!'

'I wish I'd gone to Seagreen Village with you,' said Julian. 'Do you know who told the couple to steal the little dog?'

'Yes - we're off to interview him now! He'll be most surprised to see us,' said the burly policeman. 'We've informed the owner that we've got her prize dog all right - but she feels so upset about it she can't collect it till the morning - so we wondered if you'd like to keep it for the night? Your Timmy can guard it, can't he?'

'Oh yes,' said George in delight. 'Oh, Mother - I'll take it to my room when I go to bed, and Timmy can guard the tiny thing as much as he likes. He'll love it!'

'Well - if your mother doesn't mind you having two dogs in your room, that's fine!' said the policeman, and signalled to the second one to give George the dog in the shawl. She took it gently, and Timmy leapt up again.

'No, Tim - be careful,' said George. 'Look what a tiny thing it is. You're to guard it tonight.'

Timmy looked at the little sleeping Pekinese, and then, very gently, he licked it with the tip of his pink tongue. This was the tiny dog he had smelt in the train, covered up in the shawl. Oh yes - Timmy had guessed at once!

'I don't know what your name is,' said Dick, stroking the small silky head. 'But I think I'll call you Half-term Adventure, though I don't know what that is in Pekinese!'

The two policemen laughed. 'Well, good night, Madam, good night, children,' said the burly one. 'Mrs. Fulton, the dog's owner, will call tomorrow morning for her Peke. He won a thousand-pound prize today - so I dare say you'll get some of that for a reward! Good night!'

The Five didn't want a reward, of course - but Timmy had one for guarding the little Peke all night. It's on his neck - the finest studded collar he has ever had in his life! Good old Timmy!

4

Well Done, Famous Five

'Nice to be together again,' said Julian. 'All Five of us!'

George nodded. 'Yes, Timmy's thrilled too. Aren't you, Tim?'

Timmy the dog barked, and laid his big head on George's knee, and she patted him. All the Five were on the top of Kirrin Hill, looking at the wide spread of country stretched out below them.

Anne was handing out the picnic food, and Dick passed it round. Timmy raised his head at once, and sniffed. Would there be anything for him?

'Of course, Timmy dear,' said Anne. 'A bone - and two big dog-biscuits.'

'As well as a good part of our own sandwiches and buns, I expect,' said Dick. 'No, Tim - that pile's mine - and I am not going to exchange my biscuits for yours!'

'What a wonderful view we've got from here,' said Julian, beginning to munch his sandwich. 'We can see for miles and miles all round us.'

'Well - not much is happening,' said Anne, 'except that those sheep are ambling about that field, and those cows are doing what they always do - eat, eat, eat all day long - though if I had to eat nothing but grass, I'd soon stop!'

'Can't see a soul about,' said Dick, lazily. 'I suppose it's everyone's dinner-time. Now, why can't something exciting happen, just to give us a bit of interest while we're eating! We've had so many adventures that I'm beginning to feel quite cheated if one doesn't turn up as soon as we're together again!'

'Oh, for goodness sake, don't wish for an adventure today!' said Anne. 'I like a bit of peace. I don't want to choke with excitement when I'm eating these delicious sandwiches! What has Aunt Fan put into them?'

'A bit of everything in the larder, I should think,' said George. 'Get away, Tim - don't breathe all over me like that!'

'What's that moving right away over there - along the side of that hill?' asked Dick, suddenly. 'Is it cows?'

Everyone looked. 'Too far away to see,' said George. 'Can't be cows, though - they don't move like cows - cows walk so slowly.'

'Well, they must be horses then,' said Julian.

'But who would have so many horses out for exercise round here?' said George. 'All the horses are farm horses - they'd be working in the fields, not trotting in a row across a hillside.'

'It must be a riding school, ass,' said Dick.

'If we had our field-glasses, we'd see a lot of nicely-behaved little girls from some nearby school cantering along on their nicely-behaved horses!'

'I did bring my field-glasses -- didn't you notice?' said George, rummaging about behind her. 'I put them down here somewhere - ah, here they are. Want them, Dick?'

Dick took them and put them to his eyes. 'Yes - it's a line of horses - about six - jolly fine ones too. But it's not girls who are riding them - it's boys - stable boys, I think.'

'Oh, of course - I forgot,' said George. 'They are fine racing-horses from Lord Daniron's stable - they have to be exercised each day. Can you see a very big horse in the line, Dick? A magnificent creature - he's called Thunder-Along, and he's the most valuable horse in the country - so they say!'

Dick was now examining the horses with much interest, holding the field-glasses to his eyes. 'My word, they're lovely horses - and yes, I think I can see the one you mean, George. A great horse with a wonderful head - he's the first one of all.'

'Let me see,' said George, but Dick held on to the glasses.

'No. Half a mo. I say - something's happening! Whatever is it? Something seemed to rush straight across in front of Thunder-Along - was it a fox or a dog? My word, he's rearing up in fright, he's in quite a panic. He ... He's off!' suddenly shouted Dick. 'He's thrown his groom - yes, he's on the ground, hurt, I think - and he's bolting! Oh my word - he'll kill himself.'

A silence fell on the Five. Even Timmy was quiet, staring in the same direction as the others. George made as if to snatch her field-glasses away from Dick, but he dodged, glueing them to his eyes.

'Don't lose sight of the horse, Dick, keep the glasses on him,' said Julian, urgently. 'He's the finest horse this country has. Watch him - watch where he goes! We may be the only people who can see the way he takes.'

'All right, all right,' said Dick, impatiently. 'Don't jog my arm, Anne. Yes - there he goes - my word, he's scared! He's still bolting at top speed - I hope to goodness he doesn't run into a tree - no, he just missed that one. Oh, now he's come to a gate - a high gate.'

The others had now lost sight of the horse and were hanging on to every word of Dick's. Timmy was so excited that he began to bark, sensing the general excitement. George shushed him, fearing to lose something that Dick said.

'He's over the gate - what a jump, oh what a jump! Now he's galloping down the road - I can't see him - yes, there he is again - he's come to the stream - he's over it, cleared it beautifully - away he goes, up Rilling Hill - now he's going more slowly - he must be absolutely puffed. He's gone into a field of corn - my word, the farmer won't like that! And now - good gracious - he must be lying down in the corn! I can't see him anymore!'

George snatched the glasses from him - no, she couldn't see him either. She switched them to the hillside where the horses had been exercising. What a commotion! The grooms were talking excitedly, pointing here and there, evidently at a loss to know where Thunder-Along had gone!

'I'm afraid this is the end of our picnic,' said Julian. 'As long as Thunder-Along is in the field of corn, resting, he's safe - but if he goes off again, anything may happen! We've got to report our news at once - and Dick, you'd better bike as fast as you can to that cornfield. Maybe the horse will still be there.'

Dick ran to where he had left his bicycle, and leapt on it. The others went to theirs, too, and soon they were riding off to Kirrin to report their news to the police, who would at once get in touch with the stables.

Dick planned out his way as he went. What would be the best way to get quickly to Rilling Hill? He soon made up his mind, and cycled along at top speed. It seemed a very long way - but at last he was cycling up the hill to where he hoped to find the field of corn. He was so out of breath that he had to get off his bicycle and walk. He came to the field-gate and looked in cautiously at the corn. He could see no horse at all - and no wonder, for he would be lying down!

'I'll have to tread in carefully,' thought Dick. 'I can see the way he trod - where the corn is flattened.' So in he went - only to hear a furious voice yelling at him from the gate behind him.

'Come out of that corn! Come out at once!' It was the farmer, red with anger. Dick didn't like to yell back, in case he frightened the horse. So he pointed urgently into the field and went carefully on.

'You wait!' yelled the farmer. 'I'll get my stick to you!'

Suddenly Dick saw the horse. It lay in the corn, ears pricked, eyes rolling. Dick stopped.

'Well, old beauty?' he said. 'Well, you magnificent thing! Thunder-Along! Do you know your name? Poor boy, how frightened you were! Come now, come! You're safe - come along with me!'

To his surprise and delight the great horse stood up and flicked his ears to and fro, watching Dick carefully. Then he whinnied a little, and stepped towards him.

The boy took hold of the reins gently, and dared to rub the velvety nose. Then he led the horse carefully out of the corn. The farmer stood staring in amazement at the magnificent creature.

'Why - why, isn't that Lord Daniron's horse, Thunder-Along?' he said, almost in a whisper. 'Did he bolt?'

Dick nodded his head. 'Keep my bike for me, will you?' he said. 'I must take the horse while he's quiet. I expect as soon as the owners know where he is, they'll send a horsebox. I'll lead him up and down the lane for a little, till they come.'

It wasn't long before a great horsebox drove slowly up the lane, and Thunder-Along's own groom came to pet him and lead him quietly into it. He ran his eyes over the horse carefully. 'No damage done!' he said. 'Thank goodness you had glasses with you, boy, and saw where he went. My word, you did well to get him!'

As soon as the horse-box had gone down the hill, Dick jumped on his bicycle and rode away. He soon met the others, cycling towards him, anxious to know what had happened. Timmy was running beside them.

'The horse was all right. I got him, and there's not a scratch on him!' said Dick. 'My word - what a bit of luck we had this morning, looking through your glasses, George! What do you say, Timmy?'

'Woof!' said Timmy, agreeing as usual, 'Woof!'

'He says it's the kind of thing that would happen to the Famous Five!' said George. And, of course, she was quite right!

5

When Timmy Chased the Cat!

'What are you going to do today?' said Aunt Fanny to the Five. They all looked up from their books - except Timmy, who looked up from the bone he was gnawing.

'We ought to go for a walk, I suppose,' said Julian. 'But the wind is so bitter today. I always think January is a pretty dreary month, unless there's snow - or we can go skating.'

'But there's no snow, and no ice - only this horrible, freezing wind,' said Anne. 'I'd just as soon stay in and read my Christmas books!'

'Oh no - we must go out,' said George at once. 'What about Timmy? He's got to have his usual walk.'

Timmy's ears pricked up at once when he heard that word. Walk! Ha - just what he was wanting! He got up at once and ran to George, whining. She patted him.

'All right, all right, Tim - we'll leave Anne here with her books, and we'll go out for a nice long walk.'

'Would you like to go to the cinema in Beckton?' asked her mother. 'There's a good film on today, about circus-life. I'll pay for you all, if you'd like to go this afternoon.'

'Mother - I believe you're trying to get rid of us!' said George.

'Well - in a way I am,' said her mother, with a laugh. 'Your father has two friends coming to see him this afternoon - and I really think it would be easier if you were out of the house.'

'Oh, I see,' said George. 'Two more of his scientist friends, I suppose. Well, I'd just as soon be out in that case. It's awful not even to be able to sneeze in case I get into trouble for making a noise.'

'Don't exaggerate so, George,' said her mother. 'Well, Julian - would you like to go to the cinema?'

'Of course - and it's jolly decent of you to pay for us,' said Julian. 'I tell you what - we'll walk to Beckton, so that we'll give our legs a stretch - and get the train back.'

'Yes. That's a good idea,' said Dick. 'I feel as if I want a good run. Just listen to Tim thumping his tail on the ground. He thoroughly agrees!'

So that afternoon, the Five set off to walk to Beckton. The wind was in their faces, and it was very cold indeed; but they were soon warm with walking, and even Anne began to enjoy striding out against the wind.

Timmy loved it, of course. He was full of high spirits, and pranced and capered and bounded about joyfully. He wagged his long tail nineteen to the dozen, chased dead leaves, as if they were rats, and made everyone laugh at him.

'Dear old Tim,' said Anne. 'It must be lovely to be a dog, and have four legs to leap about on, instead of just two!'

Halfway to Beckton they came to a big, rather lonely-looking house called Tarleys Mount. The gates opened on to a short drive that ran to the front steps of the house. On the top of one of the stone gateposts sat a big black cat. It looked disdainfully down at Timmy.

At first Timmy didn't see it, and then he suddenly caught sight of it and stopped. A cat! And a big one, too. But alas, quite out of reach!

Timmy pranced in front of the gatepost and barked loudly. The cat yawned widely, and then began to wash one of her paws, as if to say - 'A dog! Nasty smelly creature! Not worth taking notice of!'

But Timmy could leap very high, and the cat was suddenly startled to see his head appearing near the top of the gatepost as he jumped. She hissed and spat.

'Stop it, Timmy,' said George. 'You know you are not allowed to chase cats. Come here!'

The cat spat again. That was too much for Timmy, and he jumped so high that the cat was really alarmed. She leapt right off the gatepost, and shot into the bushes at the side of the drive.

Timmy was after her in a trice, yelping madly. George yelled, but he took no notice at all.

'Blow him,' said Julian. 'He'll be ages chasing that cat and hunting for it. He ought to know by now that he isn't a match for any cat living!'

'I'll go in and see if I can get him,' said George. 'Hope I don't meet any angry gardener!'

'We'll come with you,' said Dick. 'Come on. I can hear Tim down the drive. He must be near the house.'

They went in at the gate and down the little drive. Yes - Timmy was by the front door, barking under a tree there.

'I bet the cat's sitting on a branch making faces at him,' said Julian. 'Call him, George.'

'Timmy, Timmy! Come here at once!' shouted George. But he wouldn't. Then just as they got up to him and George was bending down to take hold of his collar, the cat leapt down the tree and raced round the house to the back. Timmy was after her at once, yelping madly.

'Oh blow! said George, vexed. 'We'll have the people of the house out after us - they must wonder what's going on!'

They ran round the house after Timmy, and came to the back entrance. There was a little yard there, with a clothes-line and two or three dustbins and a coke-bunker. The cat was now sitting on top of the bunker, daring Timmy to leap up and get her.

'Now then, you dog -- you leave that cat alone!' said an angry voice as the four children turned into the yard. They saw a neat little woman standing there, in a thick coat with a scarf round her head. She held a small basket in her hand, with a little bottle of milk in it and a jar.

'I say -- I'm so sorry about our dog,' said George, and pounced on Timmy. She got hold of his collar this time and spoke to him sharply. 'I'm ashamed of you! Bad dog! Very bad dog.'

Timmy's tail drooped, and he gave George's hand a very small lick. The little woman watched him, frowning.

'He gave me a real fright, that dog of yours,' she said. 'Tearing into the yard like a mad thing - first old Sooty the cat - then the dog!'

'I hope his barking didn't disturb the people in the house,' said Julian.

'What's that you say?' said the woman, cupping her hand behind her ear. 'Tin a hit deaf.'

'I said, I hope his barking didn't disturb the people in the house!' repeated Julian in a louder voice.

'Oh, they're away,' said the little woman, taking off the top of the milk bottle. 'Miss Ella went on Monday, and her old aunt went yesterday. I just came to feed the old cat. Here, Sooty - come and lap your milk, and I'll put your fish down, too. Hold that dog, Miss, please.'

She emptied some cooked fish out of the jar, and poured milk into an enamel saucer by the back door-step. The cat sat on the coke-bunker and looked down longingly, but wouldn't come near it.

'We'll take the dog and go,' said Dick.

'What did you say?' said the woman. 'Oh yes - you go, then old Sooty will come along down. He must be hungry.'

The four children went round the house again, George holding Timmy's collar.

'Funny - I can hear somebody talking!' said Anne, suddenly, as they went along the drive. 'Can you, Dick?'

'Yes,' said Dick, puzzled. 'But there's nobody about.'

They all stopped to listen.

'It sounds rather like a loud conversation,' said Julian. 'Is it coming from the house?'

'No - you heard what the woman said. The people are away,' said George. 'It must be somebody talking very loudly in the road.'

But the talking couldn't be heard when they reached the gates. 'Oh well - it was probably gardeners somewhere in the trees off the drive,' said Dick. 'Come on - we shall be late for the film, if we don't hurry up.'

They were just in time for it and settled down to watch the circus story on the screen. It was very good, and they all enjoyed it thoroughly. They collected Timmy from the kindly Commissionaire, and he barked in welcome. They felt very hungry, and the little teashop opposite looked most inviting, with its fine display of cakes in the window.

'Come on - I'll stand tea for everyone - providing old George doesn't eat more than six cakes!' said Julian, rattling the money in his pocket. 'Timmy, I'll buy you one too.'

They had a wonderful tea, and finished up with an ice-cream each. Timmy was treated to a cake and a biscuit, and licked George's ice-cream saucer clean.

'Well - I don't know if we can manage to walk to the station now!' said Dick. 'I feel pretty full. What's the matter, George?'

'I was just feeling Timmy's collar - and he's lost his Tail Wagger badge,' said George. 'It's got his name and address on it. Blow! I only bought him a new one last week.'

'If we want to catch the train back, we'd better get a move on,' said Julian, looking at his watch.

'No, I'm going to walk home,' said George. 'I've got a torch. I may find Timmy's badge.'

'Oh, for pity's sake!' groaned Dick. 'Don't say we've got to walk back hunting for the badge all the way home. No, George - that's too much.'

'I can go alone, with Timmy,' said George. 'I didn't mean you others to come.'

'Well - we can't let you walk a mile or two home in the dark by yourself, old thing,' said Julian. 'I tell you what - I'll go with you, George, and Dick can take Anne back by train.'

'No, thanks,' said Anne. 'I'll come too. I believe I know where Tim dropped his badge. In the drive of that big house! Do you remember when the cat sat up in a tree and Timmy leapt up at her? Well, he caught his collar on a bough - and I bet that's when he lost his Tail Wagger badge.'

'Yes - I expect you're right,' said George. 'Timmy's being a bit of a nuisance today - aren't you, Tim? I hope to goodness that cat won't be anywhere about in the garden.'

'Tie a bit of string to Tim's collar,' said Dick, producing a piece. 'And hang on to him, George! Well - are we ready?'

They all set off in the starry night. They hardly needed their torches once they had got used to the dark, because the stars were so very bright. They came at last to Tarleys Mount, and stopped at the gates. 'Here we are,' said Dick, flashing his torch. '

We know where Timmy went this morning, and if we hunt about we're pretty certain to find the badge.'

'Now, you keep by me, Tim,' said George, holding tightly to the string lead.

They all went down the drive - and in the middle of it they stopped in surprise.

'I can hear those voices again - well, different ones this time but voices,' said Anne, astonished.

'Who can be out here, talking and talking in the night?'

'Beats me!' said Dick. 'Come on - let's go to that tree by the front door. I bet the badge will be there!'

They went to the big door, still hearing the voices somewhere away in the distance. Anne suddenly gave a cry, and bent down. 'Yes - here is the badge, just where I thought it might be. Isn't that lucky?'

'Oh good!' said George, and fixed it on Timmy's collar.

'There's somebody singing now,' said Dick, standing still and listening. 'Gosh, it's odd.'

'Perhaps it's a radio somewhere,' said Anne. 'It sounds rather like one.'

'But there's no other house near here,' said Julian. 'Not near enough for us to hear the radio, anyhow.'

The singing voice stopped - and band music came on the air. 'There!' said Anne. 'That's the radio all right! There can't be any band playing in the open air this cold night.'

'You're right,' said Julian, puzzled. 'Do you suppose that the sounds can be coming from this house - Tarleys Mount?'

'But we know there's no one there,' said Dick. 'That woman who fed the cat this morning told us the house was empty. That's why she had to come and feed the cat. And if someone had left the radio on in the house, she'd have heard it and switched it off.'

'No, she wouldn't,' said George.

'Why not?' asked Dick, surprised.

'Well, because she was deaf!' said George. 'She kept putting her hand behind her ear, don't you remember. I think the radio is on in the house.'

'You don't suppose somebody's got in, and is having a good old time there - eating what's left in the larder, sleeping in the beds, and listening to the radio, do you?' said Anne. 'Tramps - or gypsies perhaps.'

'It's a bit puzzling, I must say,' said Julian. 'I can't imagine anyone going away and leaving the radio full on - and it must be, if we can hear it out here. Perhaps we ought to look round a bit. The noise seems to come from over there - the other side of the house, not where the yard is. Let's go round there.'

There was a sudden hiss from a nearby bush, and Timmy pricked up his ears. That cat again!

'Hang on to Tim - there's the cat,' said Julian, as a black streak fled across the beam of his torch.

'Come on, now - let's go round the other side of the house.'

As soon as they turned the corner, they came to a terrace, with steps leading down to a garden only faintly to be seen in the starlight. The band music was suddenly louder there. There was now no doubt at all that it was radio music.

'Well - it's certainly coming from the house,' said Julian. 'But from which room? As far as I can see, the whole place is in darkness!'

So it was! Not a chink of light showed anywhere. Julian shone his torch on to each window. They were all tightly shut, as if the house were indeed empty and deserted.

'There's a tree that reaches up to that balcony,' said Dick. 'I'll shin up and get on to it, and see if I can spot anything in the house. If the curtains aren't drawn there, I can shine my torch in.'

Up the tree he went, the others shining their torches to show him which branches to climb. At last he was on the balcony, his own torch now shining brightly. There were glass doors there, and the curtains of the room behind were not drawn across the panes. Dick shone his torch through the glass.

The radio's in this room, I'm sure!' he cried. 'I can hear it plainly. It's on full, too - the noise is coming through a ventilator, above the glass doors! Oh - I say!'

'What? What is it?' cried everyone, hearing a sudden queer note in Dick's excited voice.

'There's someone in this room!' called back Dick. 'Someone lying on the floor, but I can't see clearly enough. Whoever it is isn't moving at all. I'll tap and see if they hear me.'

The others heard the sound of tapping, and then Dick's voice again. 'Yes - the person moved when I tapped. Who on earth can it be? He must be hurt, I think but the doors are locked, so I can't get in. I'm coming down again, so shine your torches, will you?'

Dick climbed quickly down the tree, and the others crowded round him excitedly. 'We'll have to get into the house somehow,' said Dick. 'I'm sure it's someone who's hurt - or may be ill.'

'But how did they get in?' said Julian in wonder. 'And how can we get in, for that matter?'

'We'll try all the doors to begin with,' said Dick. 'Here's a garden door. No, that's locked. Come on round to the kitchen door. I suppose that will be locked, too.'

But it wasn't! It opened easily enough, and the Five trooped into the house, Timmy quite excited.

The noise of the radio suddenly seemed much louder as they went in.

'Come on upstairs,' said Dick. 'We'll find that balcony room. It was all in darkness, which made it seem queerer than ever!'

They ran up the wide stairs. The sound of the radio was very loud there. They listened intently.

'It's in that room over there!' shouted Dick, and ran to a half-open door. He shone his torch round, and then let the beam rest on something lying on the floor. What could it be?

Julian reached out his hand to the light switch by the door. Click! The light flooded the room and everyone blinked. The radio went on and on all the time, the dance band playing away gaily.

On the floor near the radio lay a woman. She looked old and had silvery grey hair. She was dressed in outdoor things, and her hat lay on the floor.

The children looked at her in horror - what could have happened? At last, to their relief, they saw her eyes open, and she looked up at them. Then she tried to speak.

'Water!' she croaked.

George darted out and found a bathroom with glasses. She filled one with water and brought it back. Julian eased the old woman up into a sitting position, and George helped her to drink the water. She managed to give them a faint smile.

'So silly of me,' she said, in a faraway kind of voice. 'I was just going downstairs to leave the house by the back door, when I slipped here on the polished floor. And, and - '

She stopped for a moment, and Anne patted her hand. 'You fell and hurt yourself?' she said. 'Where?'

'I'm afraid it's my hip,' said the old lady. 'I couldn't get up off the floor. I just couldn't. So I wasn't even able to telephone for help. And there was no one in the house - my niece had gone - '

'And your daily woman is deaf, so she wouldn't hear you call!' said Julian, remembering.

'Yes, yes,' said the old lady. 'I just managed to get my arm up to the radio and switched it on. You see, I thought someone might hear it - perhaps a policeman coming round the house at night. . . .'

'How long have you been lying like this?' asked Anne anxiously.

'Since yesterday afternoon,' said the old lady.

'I just couldn't move, you see. I was glad I had my outdoor things on - I'd have frozen stiff last night, it was so cold! I was so thirsty, too. Not hungry. Just very, very thirsty. You dear, kind children - oh, I am so glad to see you!'

Julian switched off the radio. 'Where's the telephone?' he said. 'I'll phone for a doctor - and an ambulance - and you'll soon be well-cared for! Don't you worry!'

The Five stayed with her until the doctor came and, later on, the ambulance. Then Julian turned out all the lights that had been switched on, and they went into the hall. Julian slammed the front door after them.

'Come on, Timmy - keep by my side,' ordered George. 'No more cat-chasing for you!'

'Woof-woof-wuff-wuff-Woof,' said Timmy in a most reproachful voice.

'What's he saying, George?' asked Anne.

George chuckled. 'He says, "Don't talk to me like that, George - if it hadn't been for me chasing that cat today, you'd never have had this little adventure".'

'Well, I must say Timmy's right, as usual,' said Dick. 'And if chasing a cat leads to saving somebody's life, I'm all for it. Good old Tim!'

Five Have A Puzzling Time

It was dark and very quiet in Kirrin Cottage - almost midnight. The Five were all in bed - yes, Timmy, the dog, too, for he was lying on George's feet, his usual place at night. He was not having a very comfortable time, because George, whose real name was Georgina, was so restless.

She tossed and turned and groaned - and at last awoke Anne, who was in the bed next to her.

'What's the matter, George, old thing?' said Anne, sleepily. 'Is your tooth aching again?'

'Yes, the brute!' said George, sitting up with her hand to her cheek. 'Get off my feet, Timmy, I'll just have to get up and walk about!'

'Poor old George,' said Anne. 'Good thing you're going to the dentist tomorrow!'

'Don't remind me of that!' said George, walking up and down the bedroom. 'Go to sleep, Anne - I didn't mean to disturb you.'

The big clock in the hall downstairs struck twelve, very slowly and solemnly. Anne listened, then her eyes shut and she fell asleep again. George went to the window and looked out over Kirrin Bay, holding a hand to her painful cheek. Timmy jumped off the bed and stood beside her, paws on the window-sill. He knew that George was in pain, and he was troubled. He rested his head against her hand and gave it a tiny lick.

'Dear Timmy,' said George. 'I hope you'll never have toothache! You'd go mad! Look at Kirrin Bay - isn't it lovely? And you can just see Kirrin island - my island, Timmy - looming up in the darkness!'

Suddenly George stiffened and frowned. She stared across the bay, and then turned and called urgently to Anne.

'Anne! Quick, wake up! Anne! Come and see! There's a light shining out on Kirrin island, a light, I tell you! Somebody's there - on my island! Anne, come and see!'

Anne sat up sleepily. 'What's the matter, George? What did you say?'

'I said there's a light on Kirrin island! Somebody must be there - without permission too! I shall get my boat and row out at once!' George was very angry indeed, and Timmy gave a little growl. He would most certainly deal with whoever it was on the island!

'Oh, George - don't be an ass!' said Anne. 'As if you could get your boat and row across the bay in the middle of the night! You must be mistaken!' She jumped out of bed and went to the window. 'Where's this light?'

'It's gone - it went out just as you jumped out of bed,' said George. 'Who can be there, Anne? I'll wake the boys and tell them. We'll get my boat.'

She went quickly down to the room where Dick and Julian lay asleep and shook them roughly.

'Wake up! Oh, do wake up! Something's going on over in Kirrin island. I saw a light there. Wake up, Julian.'

George's excited voice not only woke up the boys, but her father as well. He sat up in bed in the next room, thinking there must be burglars in the house!

'Robbers, my dear!' he hissed in his wife's ear, making her start up in fright. 'Where's my big stick?'

'Quentin, it's only the children!' said his wife, sleepily. 'I expect George's toothache is worse. I'll go and see.'

Everybody met in the boys' room. 'What on earth is all this about?' demanded George's father.

'There's a light on Kirrin island,' said George, quite fiercely. 'On my island! I'm going to see who it is - and so is Timmy. If no one will come with me I shall go alone.'

'Indeed you won't go,' said her father, raising his voice angrily. 'Get back to bed! Rowing to Kirrin island in the middle of the night! You must be mad. There can't be anyone there. You've had a bad dream, or something.'

'Father, there's a light there - I saw it!' said George, in a voice as loud as her father's. He went at once to the window and looked out.

'Rubbish!' he said. 'Not a glimmer of any sort to be seen! You dreamt it!'

'I did not!' said George, angrily. 'Somebody is there, I tell you. Trespassing!'

'Well, let them trespass!' said her father. 'You and the boys can go over tomorrow.'

'I can't,' almost wailed George. 'I've got to go to the dentist, and have this beastly, horrible, frightful tooth out. I must go tonight!'

'Shut up, George,' said Julian. 'Be sensible. Whoever is there will still be there tomorrow. I'll go over with Dick. Anyway, there's no light there now - you probably made a mistake. Go to bed, for goodness sake.'

George flung out of the boys' room, and went to her own, furious. Timmy went with her, licking her now and again. Why couldn't he and George go off together, this very minute? Timmy was quite ready to!

'Now my tooth's aching worse than ever!' said poor George, angry and miserable, dumping herself violently on her bed. Her mother came over to her with a glass of water and two small pills.

'Take these, George,' she said. 'Your tooth will soon stop aching. Do be sensible, dear.'

'That's one thing old George can't be!' said Anne. 'Cheer up, George - that tooth will be gone tomorrow - and there won't be anyone on your Island, you'll see - and everything will be right again.'

George grunted, and lay down with her aching cheek on her hand. She meant to slip out of bed, and go down to her boat as soon as ever the house was quiet again. But the little pills quickly did their work, and in five minutes her tooth had stopped aching, and she was fast asleep.

In the morning when she awoke, she remembered at once what she had seen the night before - a light on her island! And then she remembered the dentist - oh dear, two perfectly horrible thoughts - someone trespassing on her precious island - and a tooth to come out! She sat up in bed.

'Anne! My tooth has stopped aching. I shan't go to the dentist. I shall go to Kirrin island with Timmy and the boys.'

But her father thought differently, and after a really furious battle between the hot-tempered George and her equally hot-tempered father, George was packed off with her mother in the car, for her visit to the dentist! Timmy went with her, quite alarmed at all the goings-on!

'Poor old George,' said Anne, as the car went off down the road. 'She does get so heat-up about things.'

'Well, anyone gets upset with toothache,' said Julian. He stared out over Kirrin Bay, which was as blue as cornflowers that morning. 'I wonder if old George did see a light on the island last night? You didn't see one, did you, Anne, when you awoke?'

'No. It was all dark there,' said Anne. 'Honestly, I think George must have dreamt it! Anyway she can take out her boat this afternoon, and we'll go with her, and have a good look round - that should satisfy her!'

'She may not feel like doing anything except having a bit of a rest,' said Dick. 'She's had toothache for days now, and it does get you down. I tell you what - we, three will get the boat and go over to the island this morning - then, when we find nothing and nobody there - except the rabbits and the jackdaws - we can tell George, and she won't worry anymore!'

'Right!' said Julian. 'Let's go now, straight away! Uncle Quentin will be glad to be rid of us - he's working hard this morning on one of his newest problems.'

George's father was glad to hear that the three were going off for the morning. 'Now I shall have the house to myself,' he said, thankfully. 'Except for Joan the cook, of course. I hope she doesn't take it into her head to clean out the boiler this morning - I MUST have peace and quiet.'

'You ought to invent a boiler that cleans itself out with hardly a whisper!' said Anne, smiling at her uncle. 'Anyway, we'll be out of your way. We're just going!'

They went to the beach, to get George's boat. There it was, ready waiting! Julian looked across to where Kirrin island lay peacefully in the sun. He was quite certain there was nobody there! George must have dreamt the light she had seen shining in the night.

'We'll row right round the island and see if there is a boat tied up anywhere, or beached,' said Dick, taking the oars. 'If there isn't, we'll know there's no one there. It's too far for anyone to swim to. Well - here we go!'

And away they went in the warm spring sunshine, the little waves lapping cheerfully round the boat. Anne leaned back and let her hand dabble in the water - what fun to go over to the island and see all the rabbits - there would be young ones there too, now.

'Here we are, almost at the island,' said Julian. 'In and out of the rocks we go! My word, I'm sorry for anyone who tries to come here in the middle of the night, unable to see what rocks to avoid! Not a sign of a boat anywhere - George must have dreamt it all!'

Dick rowed the boat carefully between the rocks that guarded the island. 'We'll land at our usual little cove,' he said. 'I bet no one else would know how to get there if they didn't already know the way!'

A low wall of sharp rocks came into sight and Dick rounded it neatly. Now they could see the cove where they meant to land - a little natural harbour, with a calm inlet of water running up to a smooth stretch of sand.

'The water's like glass here,' said Anne. 'I can see the bottom of the cove.' She leapt out and helped the boys to pull in the boat.

'Look at the rabbits!' said Dick, as they walked up the smooth sandy beach. 'Tame as ever!'

A small baby rabbit came lolloping up to Anne. 'You dear little thing!' she said, trying to pick it up. 'You're just like a toy bunny!' But the tiny creature lolloped away again.

'Good thing, Timmy's not here,' said Julian. 'He always looks so miserable when he sees the rabbits, because he knows he mustn't chase them!'

They came to the old ruined castle that had been built long ago on the island. The ancient, broken-down entrance led into a great yard, overgrown with weeds. Now the jackdaws came down from the tower and chacked loudly round them in a most friendly manner. Some of them flew down to the children's feet, and walked about as tame as hens in a poultry yard.

'Well - it doesn't look as if anyone is here,' said Julian, staring round and about.

'And there was no boat anywhere,' said Anne. 'So how could anyone have come here? Let's see if there are any signs of a fire having been lighted. The flames would be seen at night, if so.'

They began to hunt all around. They went in and out of the old castle, examining the floors - but there was no sign of anyone having made a fire.

'If George saw a light, then there must be a lamp or lantern somewhere,' said Dick. 'Anne, did she see the light high up on the island - as if it came from the tower?'

'She didn't say,' said Anne. 'But I should think it must have been high up. We'll go up the old broken-down tower steps as far as we can, shall we? We might see something there - perhaps a lantern. It's possible, I suppose, that someone might have been signalling for some reason!'

But, no matter how they searched, the three could find nothing to explain the light that George had said she saw.

'Let's go and lie down on the grass, and watch the rabbits,' said Anne. 'Hallo - why did the jackdaws all fly up then - and why are they chacking so? What frightened them?'

'Funny!' said Julian, staring at the big black birds, circling round and round above them, calling 'chack-chack-chack' so excitedly. 'We didn't scare them, I'm sure. I suppose there can't be someone else here?'

'Well - we'll walk round the island and examine the rocks sticking up here and there,' said Dick, puzzled about the jackdaws, too. 'Someone might be hiding behind one of them.'

'I'm going to take off my sandals,' said Anne. 'I love running on the smooth sand in bare feet. I shall have a paddle, too - the water's quite warm today!'

The boys wandered off round the island. Anne sat down and undid her sandals. She set them by a big stone, so that she could easily find them again, and ran down to the sea. Little waves were splashing over the smooth golden sand, and Anne ran into them, curling up her toes in pleasure.

'It is really almost warm enough to bathe,' she thought. 'What a lovely little island this is - and how lucky George is to own it. I wish I had an island belonging to my family, that I could call my own. If I had, I suppose I'd worry, too, like George, if I thought anyone was trespassing here - scaring the rabbits - and even perhaps snaring them!'

Soon Julian and Dick came back together, having gone all round the island, and looked into every cranny. They called to Anne.

'Hallo, paddler! Is the water nice and warm? We ought to have brought our bathing suits.'

'We haven't seen a sign of a single soul,' said Dick. 'Better go home again. George may be back by now - wanting to tell us about her tooth, and what she has been through. Poor George!'

'I'll put on my sandals,' said Anne, drying her feet by scrabbling them in the warm sand. She ran to the big stone by which she had put them. She stopped - and stared in surprise.

'What has happened to one of my sandals? Dick - Ju - have you taken one? Where have you put it?'

'Sandals? No - we didn't even know where you'd put them,' said Julian. 'There's one of them there, look - the other must be somewhere near.'

But it wasn't. No matter how they all looked, only one of Anne's sandals could be found!

'Well! How silly!' said Anne, amazed. 'I know I put them both together, just here. I know I did! Anyway, there's no one to take one of my sandals - and even if there were, why take one, and not both?'

'Perhaps a rabbit took one?' suggested Dick, with a grin. 'Or a jackdaw - they're jolly mischievous birds, you know!'

'A jackdaw surely couldn't pick up a sandal!' said Anne. 'It would be too heavy. And I simply can't imagine a rabbit running off with one!'

'Well - it's not there,' said Dick, thinking to himself that Anne must have been mistaken about putting them both by the big stone. He hunted round, but could not see the other one anywhere - strange! However - there certainly was no one on the island - and, if there had been, someone would certainly not have been so silly as to risk being discovered by stealing one little sandal, in full view of Anne!

'We'll have to leave your sandal, wherever it is, Anne,' said Julian, at last. 'We ought to get back. Well - the only thing we can tell George is that we saw no one at all here - but that one sandal mysteriously disappeared!'

'Blow!' said Anne, not bothering to put on her one sandal. 'Now I'll have to spend some of my precious pocket-money to buy a pair of new sandals. Blow, blow, blow!'

'Come on,' said Dick, going down towards their boat. 'George will have a blue fit if we don't turn up soon. She'll think that the owner of the mysterious light has caught us and made us prisoners! Buck up, Anne.'

They were soon all in the boat again, and the boys took it in turn to row back. Through the crowd of rocks they went, threading their way carefully and at last came to their own beach. George was there, waiting for them, Timmy beside her!

'You went without me!' she scolded. 'You really are beasts! What did you find?'

'Nothing and no one. The island is absolutely empty except for its usual inhabitants - rabbits and jackdaws!' said Julian, dragging the boat up the sand. 'Your strange light in the night must have been a dream, George, old thing!'

'It was NOT!' said George, and her voice was so angry that Timmy began to bark. 'You don't know where to look! Now if Timmy had been with you, he'd have smelt out anyone there - he'd have found the lamp or lantern -- he'd have . . .'

'All right, all right - but we didn't have Timmy!' said Dick.

'How's the tooth, George?' said Anne, seeing that George's cheek was still swollen. 'Did you have it out? Did it hurt?'

But George didn't want to waste time in talking about her tooth.

'It's out,' she said, shortly. 'Blow the tooth! If I hadn't had to go to the dentist, I could have gone with you - and I bet Timmy and I would have found something. I just BET we would!'

'All right - go there, then - and take Tim with you,' said Dick, exasperated.

'That's just what I will do!' said George with a scowl. 'We'll soon find out who's hiding there. I shall go this very afternoon - with Timmy. You can come, too, if you like, of course - but I can't see that you will be much use!'

'Oh, we'll come all right!' said Dick. 'Even if it's only to say, "Sucks to you" when you can't find more than we did!'

George had quite made up her mind to go off in her boat after she had had her dinner.

'Though my mouth is so sore I'm sure I shan't be able to eat anything!' she said. However, she ate as much as any of the others! Timmy sat very close to her, sad that she was cross and upset.

It was not a very happy meal. Uncle Quentin was quiet and moody, for his work had not gone well that morning. Aunt Fanny looked worried. George sulked. Timmy kept giving heavy sighs. Even Joan the cook added a few cross words as she cleared away the dinner.

'I should like to know who's been at the grapes and the oranges,' she said. 'Someone came downstairs in the night and helped themselves. And Miss George - what did you do with the bag of dog biscuits that came from the grocer's yesterday? I couldn't find any for Tim's dinner.'

'Oh don't bother so, Joan!' said George. 'You know where I always put them - in the outhouse, with the chicken-food.'

'Well, you didn't this time, Miss,' said Joanna, huffily.

'You can't have looked,' said George. 'Oh dear - why do all these things have to happen when I've a bad tooth?'

'Well - you certainly shouldn't have a bad tooth now,' remarked Julian. 'I thought the dentist...'

'All right, all right - yes, he did pull it out, but it still feels as if it's there,' said George, crossly.

'You'd better have a lie-down this afternoon, George,' said her mother. 'A little sleep will. . .'

'Put you right!' chorused Julian, Dick and Anne, who had heard this saying of their aunt's a hundred times.

She laughed. 'Well - what with toothache all night, and little sleep, it's no wonder poor old George is cross.'

'I am not cross!' roared George, furiously, and that made everyone laugh, of course. Julian gave her a clap on the back.

'Cheer up, old thing. We'll all go and hunt over the island again this afternoon - and I'll expect you'll find a couple of pirates, two or three robbers, a ship-wrecked sailor, a . . .'

George gave a sudden grin. 'Shut up, you ass. Don't take any notice of me for a bit. I'll be all right soon.'

And she was. She took herself in hand, helped Joan with the washing-up, and then went to look for the biscuits for Timmy. Sure enough, they were missing, as Joan had said.

'Blow! I'm sure I put them in the outhouse here,' said George, looking all around. 'I suppose I couldn't have. What have I done with them? Poor old Tim - you'll have to make do with scraps, I'm afraid, till the butcher boy comes with your meat this afternoon. And by the way, Joan, I did not come down last night and take grapes and oranges. My tooth was much too bad. And I'd like to know something now. Who's been at my big box of chocolates?'

She had opened a large box, and was staring inside. 'There's more than half gone!' she said. 'Timmy - have you been at them? Were you so hungry, poor fellow?'

'Well, I must say that if he took them he was clever to put back the lid!' said Joan. 'Maybe you ate an orange or two as well, Timmy-dog?'

'Woof,' said Timmy, in disgust, and turned his back on Joan. As if he would steal chocolates or oranges!

George went off to find her mother. 'Mother - I feel better now. The swelling in my mouth is going down at top speed. I'll be all right to take the boat out with the others, really I will.'

'Well - your father does want peace and quiet this afternoon,' said her mother. 'Go along, then - and don't get over-tired - you had quite a bad time this morning.'

Within ten minutes all the Five were in the boat once more. George looked quite herself again, and Julian grinned at her.

'Well? All set to find what we couldn't find? I must admit that with Timmy to help us, we're much more likely to be successful!'

They soon came to the island. George circled it deftly in the boat, being anxious herself to see that no one had hidden a boat anywhere. She pointed to where a great mass of brown seaweed had piled up on the west shore.

'See what the wind did when we had that terrific gale on Tuesday - brought in masses of seaweed again! Now we'll have an awful smell when it dries out! Hallo - what's wrong with the jackdaws, all of a sudden? They're never scared of us! Why are they flying up in such a hurry? There is someone on the island!'

'That's what we thought this morning,' said Dick, with a grin. 'But there wasn't! Plenty of rabbits, though -- hundreds. Thank goodness there's one place left where they can live in peace!'

George swung the boat round and ran it deftly into the little cove. Out they all leapt, and pulled in the boat. Timmy jumped out first and tore up the beach at full speed, barking.

'That'll scare the life out of anyone hiding!' said George, pleased. 'Go on, Tim - bark. Hunt around! Sniff everywhere!'

The rabbits scattered at once when they heard Timmy. 'Don't you dare to touch them!' George called to him, knowing how much he longed to catch one. 'Heel, now, Timmy, heel! I want you to come round every corner of the island with me.'

Timmy ran to heel, his long tail swinging happily. He loved Kirrin Island. George set off, meaning to examine every well-loved corner, every possible hiding-place. They came to a group of bushes and Timmy began to sniff about at once.

'He can smell something there!' said George, excited. 'What is it, Tim?'

But apparently he found nothing of interest, and soon joined them again. Then Anne's sharp eyes caught sight of something bright under a bush and she bent down to see what it was. She looked round at the others, astonished.

'Look - orange peel! Someone must have been here then! We would never leave orange peel about! And I say, what's this!'

They all clustered round and looked where Anne was pointing. George bent down and picked up something very small.

'See - a pip - a pip from a grape. Does that ring a bell, anyone?'

'Yes!' said Dick. 'Joanna said we'd been at the oranges and grapes - do you suppose that. . .'

'No! Who's going to steal a bit of fruit and take it over to the island to eat!' said Julian. 'That's too far-fetched, honestly! Let's be sensible!'

'What's Timmy doing?' said Anne, suddenly. 'Hey, Tim - don't scrape all the sand off the island!' Timmy was feverishly scraping at the sand nearby with his front paws. He gave an excited little bark, that sounded pleased. What in the world had he found? The others ran to him at once.

Timmy had made a hole - and in it something showed - it seemed like a bulky bag of some kind. Timmy took hold of it with his teeth, and pulled. It split at once - and to everyone's enormous astonishment, out came a mass of dog biscuits!

How they stared! Dog biscuits! Surely, surely they couldn't be the biscuits that George had bought for Timmy the day before, and put in the outhouse?

'They are!' said George. 'Look - exactly the same kind. I say - isn't this peculiar! Who in the world would want to steal dog biscuits and bring them here - and oranges and grapes - and for goodness sake, why?'

Nobody could think of an answer. Timmy began to crunch up the biscuits, looking very pleased indeed with himself. He didn't know who had buried them on Kirrin Island, but he thought it was a very good idea!

'Well, that settles it,' said Julian. 'You were perfectly right, George - someone is here - and you did see a light on the island in the middle of the night. But how did they get here without a boat?'

'We'll soon find out!' said George grimly. 'We know he's a thief, anyhow! Tim - go to it! Find him, find him, whoever he is! Smell him out, Tim, smell him out!'

And off went Tim at once, nose to the ground, following the scent of the thief - now where would he lead them? And whoever would he find? It really was too exciting for words.

Timmy went off at such a speed that the four couldn't keep up with him. He raced off round the castle, nose to ground, barking loudly.

'He'll certainly warn anyone in hiding that he's on their track,' panted Dick. 'Where in the world can they be? We've hunted everywhere!'

Over the sand and on to the rocks went Timmy, right up to where the seaweed was piled in great masses by the wind and the waves. He stopped and began to sniff anxiously.

'He's lost the trail!' said George, disappointed. 'It's the smell of the seaweed that has put him off.'

'Or else whoever was here came in a boat at high tide, which would bring it to the shore - and has sailed off again now the tide had gone out,' said Julian, frowning. 'There wouldn't be any trail to smell, then. Honestly, there doesn't seem to be anyone hiding - and now that even Tim is stumped, I feel we're too late to find whoever it was.'

'Timmy - sniff round again,' said George. 'Go on - you may pick up some other trail.'

Timmy obediently sniffed here and there, and occasionally gave a curious growl of anger. Why? George was puzzled.

'Why does he sound so fierce?' she said. 'Really angry! What is it, Timmy, old thing?'

'Perhaps he doesn't like the smell of whoever has been here,' said Anne. 'Let's sit down for a bit and watch the rabbits and the jackdaws. Ju, did you bring any biscuits? I brought some barley sugars, and Dick's brought some chocolate in his pocket - I hope it won't be melted!'

George wanted to go on hunting, but the others felt that it was no use. If Timmy had found the scent, and couldn't follow it, no one else would be able to! Anyway, probably the trespasser was far away by now, safely in his boat!

Anne chose a sunny corner by an old ruined wall, and they sat down. At first the rabbits kept away from the children and Timmy - but soon they came out again, as tame as ever. The jackdaws came down too, running almost up to the children, hoping for a titbit.

Suddenly one jackdaw ran at a baby rabbit and gave it a hard peck in the back of the neck. The tiny thing fell over dazed, and all the jackdaws came round it in excitement.

'Oh, they'll all peck it now!' cried Anne, jumping up. 'Shoo, you birds!'

The birds flew off, chacking loudly, and the little rabbit began to crawl away, still dazed. It tried to run when the children went after it to pick it up, and disappeared under a bush.

'We'll have to get it out to make sure it's not really hurt,' said Anne, anxiously. So the boys crawled under the bush, trying to find where the tiny creature had hidden itself. As it was a gorse bush it was very prickly, and Dick groaned.

'I'm being torn to pieces by these thorns. The rabbit's gone, Anne. I think it's found a rabbit-hole and gone down it. I expect it's mother's down there. She'll lick it better.'

They went back to where they had left their biscuits and bars of chocolate. Anne stopped suddenly and stared down in amazement.

'Look! Half the biscuits have gone - and two of the chocolate bars! Surely the jackdaws couldn't have taken them so quickly!'

'There's a broken biscuit over here, look - it must have been dropped by whoever stole them!' said Dick, amazed. 'I say - what sauce to come right up to where we were sitting, and take the things just when our backs were turned. I didn't hear a thing!'

'Nor did Tim - or he would have barked,' said George, really puzzled. 'Whoever it was must have come up as quietly as a mouse!'

'Let Timmy sniff round - he'll pick up the thing's trail,' said Julian. 'It will be so fresh!' Timmy was already sniffing, looking very puzzled indeed. The trail didn't seem much use to him! He ran a little way, nose to ground, following it - and then stopped, as if the trail had come to an end!

'Look, Timmy - trails don't finish all of a sudden!' said George, exasperated. 'People don't take off in mid-air!'

'There's a tree nearby,' said Anne. 'Do you think whoever it was could have climbed up into it?'

'Anne, dear - there is nobody up the tree,' said George, in a patient, what-an-ass-you-are sort of voice. 'I've looked.'

'Well, let's hunt round a bit again,' said Julian, more puzzled than ever. 'I know - we'll leave some biscuits and the bag of barley sugars here, and go behind that big gorse bush and hide - and maybe the thief, whoever he is, will come along and take those. He seems to have a sweet tooth!' 'Good idea,' said Dick. 'Come on, everyone - you too, Timmy - and not a sound from anyone, mind!'

They went behind the gorse bush and waited. Dick peeped out once or twice, but the bag of barley sugars remained untouched. Then suddenly Timmy gave a low growl, leapt out from behind the gorse bush and ran at something! Everyone followed in excitement. Who was it?

There was nobody there! But up on one of the branches of the nearby tree sat the thief, a barley sugar clutched in his hand, chattering angrily.

'Good gracious! It's a monkey - a little monkey!' cried George, in the greatest astonishment. 'It was he who took the other things! Wherever did he come from?'

The monkey leapt to the top of a broken wall, chattered again at them, and disappeared. Timmy raced to the wall, but the monkey was nowhere to be seen.

'Well - what do you think of that?' said Dick. 'A monkey! Where has he come from? Somebody must have brought him here - but why? And is that somebody still here - or has he gone?'

'I bet it was that monkey who came and stole my sandal this morning!' said Anne, suddenly.

'Of course!' said Julian. 'My word, this is a puzzle! What do we do next?'

'Well, there's one thing we do know - and that is that a monkey wouldn't light a fire or a lamp at night on the island,' said Dick. 'That must have been done by a human being - and he must still be on the island if his monkey is here. He surely wouldn't go away and leave the little thing to starve.'

'Oh, no - it's such a dear little creature,' said Anne. 'It had a most comical little face - did you notice? Thank goodness it left us most of the barley sugars. Let's have some, before anything else happens!'

They sat sucking the barley sugars, really puzzled. 'Buried dog-biscuits!' said Julian. 'A monkey that steals food - and sandals! By the way, let's go and have a look at where we left those dog-biscuits - maybe they've gone as well!'

They went off to see - but no, there were the scattered biscuits. Timmy helped himself to a few again, and a loud crunching filled the air. The jackdaws hopped near, hoping to pick up a few crumbs. Timmy ran at them, and then stopped and put his nose down to the ground. He had picked up the same scent as before!

'Follow the trail again, Tim,' said Julian. 'You may do better this time. Go on!'

But before Timmy could even put his head down again to follow it, something peculiar happened. A strange noise came from the west side of the island - the miserable howling of a dog!

'That's a dog!' cried Dick, amazed. 'On the island, too - whatever next! Where is he?'

'Oh, quick - he sounds as if he's in trouble!' cried George. 'What's happening? Quick, Julian, quick, Timmy! Oh, poor thing, there he goes, howling again. We must find him, we must!'

The Five set off in the direction of the howls, Timmy racing ahead anxiously. He knew far better than the others that a dog was in sore trouble - a howling of that kind meant not only pain, but terror. But how did a dog come to be on the island - and a monkey, too! Timmy was as puzzled as the children.

Julian was now in front of the other three, and was heading for the seaweed-spread shore on the west of the island. George suddenly gave a cry, and pointed.

'There's the monkey again! He's seen us - he's racing away!'

'Maybe he'll lead us to wherever the dog is,' shouted Julian. The monkey scampered in front, just ahead of Timmy. They all came to the shore, and stopped when they came to the piled-up heaps of brown, slippery seaweed, covering the rocks in great masses.

'The dog's stopped howling,' said George, looking all round. 'I'm sure he must be somewhere near here. Hello - what's the monkey doing? Good gracious - he's running out over the seaweed. He'll slip into a pool and drown!'

They watched the tiny brown monkey. He was making his way over the seaweed-covered rocks now, avoiding the pools of water here and there. Further and further out he went. George started to go, too, but Julian pulled her back.

'No. That seaweed is slippery - it's too dangerous to go out on those rocks - we know the sea is very deep in between. Look at that little monkey - where on earth does he think he's going?'

The monkey came to a rock that was absolutely covered with thick masses of seaweed flung there by the surging, wind-blown tide. He had no sooner arrived there than a most extraordinary thing happened!

A small mass of seaweed moved - and out of it came something that made the Five stare in utter disbelief.

'It can't be!' muttered Dick. 'No - it can't be!'

It was the brown and white head of a big dog! The Five stared, unable to move. Never had they expected to see such a thing! The head suddenly opened a great mouth and howled dismally! In a trice, Timmy was over the sea-weedy rocks, barking for all he was worth as if to say, 'Hold on, friend, I'm coming!'

And then another surprising thing happened! A second head poked up from under a covering of seaweed, and a voice shouted loudly, 'Tell your dog to keep off! Mine will fight him! And clear off, all of you!'

The Five were so full of amazement that they stood like dumb creatures, unable to say a word. Then George, afraid that the hidden dog might attack Timmy, yelled to him.

'Tim! Come back! Tim, do you hear me? Heel, Tim, heel!'

Timmy turned, and came back very sulkily, his tail down. Why had George called him back at such an exciting moment? He had only wanted to help the other dog!

The second head was still poking out of its queer sea-weedy hiding place - the head of a small boy! Julian really could not believe his eyes. So that was the hiding-place - under the seaweed - and the dog was there, too - and probably the monkey had hidden there as well! What was all this going on?

'Hey, you there in the seaweed - come on out!' yelled Julian. 'We shan't hurt you. If you want help, we'll give it to you. Come on out, and tell us what you're doing!'

'All right. But if you try to catch me, I'll set my dog on you!' yelled back a defiant voice. 'He's a cross-bred Alsatian and he could eat up your dog in a jiffy!'

'We shan't do anything to hurt you or your dog,' yelled back Dick. 'We heard him howling, poor thing. He's terrified of being under the seaweed. Come on out!'

And then the seaweed pile was heaved up and down, and out came a scraggy, wet boy of about eleven. He pulled the seaweed off the dog, who was quite weighted down by it. The great animal shook itself, and gave one more miserable howl.

'You look out for your dog!' yelled the boy. 'Mine's fierce. There'll be a terrible fight if yours goes for mine.'

But Timmy had no idea of fighting such a wet, miserable and hungry dog! He waited until the boy and the Alsatian came scrambling towards the Five, over the rocks, and then he leapt lightly over the seaweed, and ran to the great Alsatian, his long tail wagging in welcome. He whined a little to him, and then licked his face, as if to say, 'Cheer up, old fellow! I'm your friend!'

The Alsatian gave a little growl - and then an apologetic bark. He wagged his wet tail, and then, side by side with Timmy, ran up the shore to the waiting children.

The boy came scrambling along, next, the little monkey now chattering on his shoulder, holding on to the boy's hair to save himself from falling. The Five were almost too astonished to say a word, but the two dogs made up for their silence by racing along the beach, barking madly.

The boy looked half-scared, half-sulky, and stared at them defiantly. George spoke to him first.

'What are you doing on my island?'

'Nothing,' said the boy. 'I just came here -with my dog and monkey - for - well - for a little holiday.'

'How did you come here?' asked Julian. 'We didn't see any boat.'

'I didn't come in a boat,' said the boy.

'Well, what did you come in, then?' asked Dick, astonished.

'I shan't tell you,' said the boy. 'If I did you'd take it away from me - and, and . . .'

And then, to the dismay of the Five he began to cry bitterly, tears pouring down his cheeks. The little monkey put his arms round the boy's neck and loved him, and the dog leapt up, licking him wherever he could, whining in sympathy.

'Oh, don't cry like that!' said Anne, horrified. She took the boy's hand and led him along the beach. 'It's all right. We're your friends. We like your monkey and your dog. Tell us what's the matter. We'll help you!'

Soon they were all sitting down, the monkey still on the boy's shoulder, the dog close beside him. Even Timmy sat as close to the boy as he could, upset because of his tears.

'Have a barley sugar?' said Dick. 'Take two. That's right. Now, tell us what's been happening? Why did you come here - and how?'

'There's not much to tell,' said the boy. 'My name's Bobby Loman. I live with my Granpop in Kirrin Village. My mother and father are dead, and I'm on my own - except for Chippy the monkey here, and Chummy, my Alsatian. I've run away. That's all.'

'No,' said Anne gently. 'That isn't all. Tell us everything, Bobby.'

'Oh, well - it's not much,' said Bobby. 'Granpop hates Chippy, my monkey, because he steals things. And Chummy costs a lot to keep - and - and - you see, he bit someone last week - and Granpop said he was to be put to sleep. Old Chummy, killed. Why he's my best friend! There's nobody he loves better than me, you don't know how kind and good he is, he sleeps on my bed at night, he licks me when things are bad, he - he . . .'

Bobby began to cry again, and the Alsatian nestled close to him and licked his cheek.

'See what I mean?' said Bobby. 'He loves me! He's the only person who does - and I won't have him put to sleep. Well - would you have this nice dog of yours killed?'

'No! Never, never, never!' said George, and put her arms round a surprised Timmy. 'You're quite right to run away, Bobby. I'm glad you came to my island. Very glad. You and Chippy and Chummy can live here as long as you like. We'll bring you food each day, we'll. . .'

'Steady on, George, old thing,' said Julian. 'Don't make promises we can't keep. Let's go back to Kirrin Cottage and tell your mother about this - she'll know what's best to do. Bobby can stay with us, perhaps, till things are settled.'

'Oh - what fun to have another dog and a monkey, as well as Timmy,' said Anne. 'Bobby - how did you come to the island, if you didn't have a boat?'

'Oh - that was easy,' said Bobby. 'I've got one of those floating beds you blow up and Chippy and I sailed on it, with a spade for an oar - and Chummy swam alongside. It's buried in the sand, so that nobody would see it. But I hadn't any food, so . . .'

'So you crept into our out-house last night and took a bag of dog-biscuits for Chummy, and some fruit for Chippy,' said Julian. 'What about yourself?'

'Oh - I've been eating the dog biscuits,' said Bobby. 'I took some chocolates too, and ate those. I'm sorry about the stealing. I was sort of - sort of - desperate, you know. I'll pay back for everything I took.'

'Come on - let's get back home,' said Julian, seeing that Bobby was tired out, cold, wet, and probably very hungry. Come along now - we'll get our boat!'

The Five went back to where they had left George's boat, and took Bobby, Chippy, the monkey and Chummy the Alsatian with them. Timmy was very kind to them all, and wagged his tail hard the whole time, to show how friendly he was.

'I'm a bit scared of seeing your Mum and Dad,' said Bobby, in the boat. 'You're sure they won't send me off to a Home - or to prison, or something like that? Chummy here would fret like anything if I went away from him.'

'I don't think you need worry,' said Julian, who was rowing. 'And I wouldn't be surprised if your Granpop was very pleased to hear you are safe.'

Bobby looked doubtful, but said no more. He cuddled up to Timmy and Chummy, who both took turns at licking him. Chippy the monkey was very frisky, and leapt from one person to another, making a funny little chattering noise. He took Dick's handkerchief out of his pocket and pretended to blow his nose on it.

'Hey - you're not to take things from people, I've told you that before!' said Bobby. 'Ooooh - that reminds me - he brought this shoe to me this morning - does it belong to any of you?'

And out of his pocket he took - one red sandal! Anne gave a delighted yell.

'Oh! It's mine. I missed it this morning. Oh good - now I shan't have to buy a new pair! Chippy - you really are a monkey!'

'There's no doubt about that!' said Dick grinning, and Chippy made his chattering noise as if he understood every word!

George's mother was most astonished to see a monkey, a dog and another boy added to the Five when they arrived at Kirrin Cottage.

'Who are all these?' she said. 'I don't mind the dog, George, but I will not have a monkey running loose in the house.'

'He can sleep in the shed, Mother,' said George. 'Please don't say he can't. Mother, this is Bobby - he ran away from his grandfather who wanted to put his lovely dog to sleep.'

'Bobby? Bobby Loman do you mean?' said Mrs. Kirrin at once. 'Why, he was in the papers today - and a picture of the dog and the monkey too! Bobby, your grandfather is very unhappy and worried. You were a silly little boy to run away just because of an upset. I'm sure your grandfather would never have had your dog destroyed. He only said that in the heat of the moment - when he was very cross!'

Bobby looked rather scared at Mrs. Kirrin's forthright words. George put her arm around his shoulder.

'Mother!' she said, 'I'm sure I should run away if you threatened to do anything to Timmy - so I do understand why Bobby ran away to my island. Well - sailed away!'

'Oh - so that's who it was on your island last night!' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'Well, well, well! You Five do seem to run into adventure, don't you? How did he get there? And what was the light you saw?'

'I floated there on my air bed,' said Bobby. 'Oh goodness - I've forgotten it! It's still on the island. The light George saw was my torch, I expect. I was looking for somewhere safe to sleep. I never imagined anyone would see the light of a torch in the dark of midnight!'

'Oh, you don't know George!' said Dick. 'If anyone happened to strike even a match on her beloved island, she'd be sure to be looking out of the window at that very moment, and see the flare. Then we'd all have to go rushing off to find out what it was.'

'Shut up,' said George, crossly. 'It's a good thing I did look out of the window last night - if I hadn't, goodness knows what would have happened to Bobby and the monkey and Chummy - they might have starved to death.'

'Well, we still had plenty of dog-biscuits left,' said Bobby. 'They weren't bad - but awfully hard. I got Chummy to bite them in half for me.'

'How very disgusting!' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'Now let's think what is best to do. Is your grandfather on the telephone, Bobby? He is? Good. What's his number? I'll ring him up at once, and then you can go home. I hope you'll tell him you're sorry for being such a silly boy!'

'Er, Mother - I've asked Bobby to stay the night,' said George. 'Mother, the monkey's so sweet. You'll love him. And Chummy is marvelous. You should have seen him with Timmy - they were like old friends at once.'

'Very well. Bobby can stay the night,' said George's mother, and Bobby beamed all over his face. 'If I had a tail I'd wag it hard,' he said, and that made everyone laugh.

Things were soon settled. Mrs. Kirrin rang up the police to tell them Bobby was safe. Then she rang up his grandfather and told him the news too. The old man was so relieved that he could hardly thank Mrs. Kirrin enough.

'I wouldn't have had his dog put to sleep,' he said. 'I just said that to make Bobby more careful with Chummy. Now that the dog's growing so big and strong, he must be properly trained, and must never bite anyone - Bobby's too easy with him. I'll send the dog to a trainer, and when he comes back he'll be quite all right, and Bobby can have him again.'

Bobby didn't think much of this idea when Mrs. Kirrin told him.

'I just won't let Chummy go to a cruel trainer!' he said, looking round at the others for sympathy. But even George rounded on him at once.

'There! You care more for your own feelings than for Chummy's well-being! Don't you want a dog who's safe even with a small child? Don't you want a dog who'll obey you at once, and be a credit to you - like Timmy is to me?'

'All right, all right. Don't bite my head off. Sounds as if you ought to go to a trainer too!' said Bobby. 'Going round snapping at people!'

'Mother! I don't want Bobby to stay the night after all!' said George, fiercely.

'Oh look at that monkey - he's taken a banana from the dish, and he's peeling it just like a human being!' cried Anne, changing the subject very neatly indeed. 'Aunt Fanny, do look - isn't he sweet?'

In the end Bobby was allowed to stay the night, and slept downstairs in the kitchen on a couch, with Chippy cuddled beside him, and Chummy on his feet. Upstairs George was in bed with Timmy on her feet, talking about the excitements of the day with Anne.

'How's your tooth?' asked Anne, suddenly remembering the night before, when George had had such bad toothache, and had wandered about the bedroom, and seen a light on Kirrin Island.

'Tooth? What tooth?' said George, surprised. She had quite forgotten all about it in the excitement of the afternoon. 'Oh, the one I had out. Goodness - doesn't it seem ages since this morning!'

She put her tongue into the space where the tooth had been. 'I believe a new one is growing already,' she said. 'I wish I had teeth like Timmy - snowy white - strong - fierce. I'd like to be able to show all my teeth like Timmy, when I feel really angry!'

Anne laughed. 'Well - you almost manage it now,' she said. 'I say - what's the matter with Timmy? He's pretty restless tonight. Look - he's gone to the door. He wants to go out.'

'All he wants is to go and have a talk to Chummy,' said George. 'All right, Tim. You can go down to the kitchen and sleep with Chummy if you like. I suppose you think he might be lonely. My word - I guess he was scared when he had to hide under that wet, smelly seaweed!'

Timmy pattered down the stairs as soon as the bedroom door was opened. He scraped at the kitchen door and Bobby got up to open it. He was surprised and pleased to see Timmy, who licked him lavishly, and then went to lie beside the pleased Alsatian. It wasn't often that Timmy had a doggy visitor and he meant to make the most of it!

George took one more look out of the window before she got into bed - and gave a sudden exclamation.

'Anne - I do believe there's a light on Kirrin island again. Anne - come and look!'

'Don't be an idiot,' said Anne, sleepily. 'You don't think we're going to start this adventure all over again, do you? It's finished, George, not just beginning. Come back to bed.'

George jumped into bed. 'It was a light,' she said, after a moment or two. 'But only a shooting star! What a pity! I'd have liked another adventure - wouldn't you, Anne?'

But Anne was fast asleep, dreaming of monkeys, red sandals, seaweed, big dogs and orange peel. Well - I'm not really surprised at that - are you?

7

Good Old Timmy!

'Aren't you ready to come down to the beach and bathe, Anne?' yelled George, standing at the bottom of the stairs. 'We're all waiting for you. Do hurry up!'

The study door flew open and Mr. Kirrin, George's father, appeared. 'Georgina! Will you stop shouting all day long? How can I work? For pity's sake, clear out of the house.'

'We're just going, Daddy - and as we're taking a picnic lunch we shan't be disturbing you for some time. I know you're on a big job - it's bad luck it's holiday time and we're here!'

Uncle Quentin grunted and disappeared into his study. Aunt Fanny appeared with two big bags of sandwiches. 'Oh dear - was that your Uncle Quentin shouting again?' she said. 'Never mind! He doesn't mean to be bad-tempered - but he really is on a big job at the moment, and he's trying to get some figures for the scientist he's working with, a Professor Humes, who is staying in Kirrin - at the Rollins Hotel. Now - here are your sandwiches - and biscuits and apples - and you can take some bottles of ginger-beer out of the larder.'

Just then Anne raced down the stairs, and the Five, all in swim-suits went off to the beach to bathe and laze and play games on the sands. Only three people were there - two men and a lonely looking boy. Julian found a cool cave and put the food on a shelf of rock.

'What about a swim straight away?' he said. 'Hallo - Timmy's off to rub noses with that dog we saw yesterday - the big ugly brute we didn't much like. He belongs to those two men. They're not much to look at either! I wouldn't like to meet them on a dark night!'

'Well, Timmy seems to like their dog all right,' said George, staring at the two dogs sniffing at one another, then tearing along the sands together, barking happily.

'Look,' said Dick, 'there's that kid coming along the beach again, the one we saw yesterday. Shall we ask him to come bathing with us - he seems to be all on his own. Look out, kid - don't get knocked over by our dog!'

Timmy had come racing up joyfully, chasing the other dog, and the boy went sprawling as they galloped round him. Timmy turned in surprise and saw the boy rolling over and over on the sand. He gave an apologetic bark, and ran to the small boy, licking and sniffing at him.

The boy was terrified of Timmy. He began to scream in terror, and Julian ran to him. 'He's only making friends, he's only saying he's sorry he knocked you over, he won't hurt you! Come on, get up - we were just going to ask you to come and bathe with us.'

'Oh,' said the boy, and stood up, shaking the sand off himself. He looked to be about nine or ten, and small for his age. 'Well - thanks. I'd like to bathe with you. I'm Oliver Humes, and I'm staying at the Rollins Hotel.'

'Then your father must be a friend of our uncle,' said Dick. 'He's called Kirrin - Quentin Kirrin - and he's a scientist. So is your father, isn't he?'

'Yes. A very fine one too,' said Oliver proudly. 'But he's worried this morning.'

'Why? What's up?' said George.

'Well - he's working on something important,' said Oliver, 'and this morning he had a horrible letter. It said that unless Dad agreed to give the writer information he wanted about what Dad was working on, he'd - he'd kidnap me!'

'Oh rubbish!' said Julian. 'Don't you worry about that! We'll tell our dog Timmy to look after you. Just look at him playing with that ugly great mongrel. Timmy's a mongrel too - but we think he's beautiful!'

'I think he's too big,' said Oliver, fearfully, as Timmy came running up, panting. The other dog went back to the two men, who had just whistled for him.

'Come on - let's swim,' said Dick.

'I can't swim,' said Oliver. 'I wish you'd teach me.'

'Right. We will when we've had our bathe,' said Anne. 'We'll go into the water now. Come on!' And soon the Five, Timmy too, were splashing in the sea, yelling and diving in and out, having a glorious time, while Oliver paddled near the shore. Then suddenly Julian gave a shout, and pointed to the beach.

'Look! What's happening there? Hey!' All the Five looked, and saw something very surprising! The two men who owned the big brown dog were dragging Oliver out of the water, one with his hand over the boy's mouth.

'They're kidnapping him! Remember that threatening letter he told us of, that his father had this morning? Come on, quick - see if we can stop them. Timmy! Come on, now!'

They swam to the shore and slipped hurriedly into their sandals. 'They've taken the kid up the cliffs - they're at the top, look!' panted Julian. 'After them, Timmy!'

But not even Timmy could get up the cliffs in time to rescue the screaming boy. Julian was at the top first, with Timmy - just in time to see a car driving off. The big dog was galloping after it.

'Why didn't they take the dog in the car, too?' wondered Dick.

'Perhaps he's a car-sick dog?' said Anne. 'Anyway, I bet he knows where the men are going, and has been ordered to follow. If the car doesn't go too fast he can easily keep up.'

'I've got the number, anyway,' said Dick.

'Listen - I think Anne's right when she says the dog must know where the men are going,' said Julian. 'And it can't be far away if the dog has to run the whole distance.'

Timmy was not listening. He was sniffing the ground here and there. Then he suddenly began to trot along the cliff-road, nose to ground. George gave a sudden exclamation.

'I know! He's sniffing the other dog's tracks - he knows his smell, and he's following it!'

'You're right! Look - let's see if he'll follow the trail properly,' said Julian. 'He might lead us to Oliver! Tell him, George. He always understands every word you say.'

'Timmy! Listen!' said George, and pointed to some paw-marks made in the sandy road by the big mongrel dog. 'Follow, Timmy, follow. Understand?'

Timmy lifted his big head and looked hard at George, his ears cocked, his head on one side. Yes - he understood. Then, with nose to ground he trotted swiftly away down the cliff-road, sniffing the tracks of the other dog. How did he do it? What a nose he had, old Timmy!

'Come on,' said Dick. 'Timmy will lead us to wherever those fellows are taking Oliver.'

Very steadily, Timmy followed the scent down the cliff-road, turned off to the left, trotted down a lane, swung to the right, then to the left. He waited at the traffic lights, and when they changed to green, he crossed the road, and then trotted right through the town, nose to trail! The children padded behind in their swim-suits, Anne getting very puffed!

At the other end of the town Timmy turned to the left and padded down a lane, nose still on the scent! The four followed closely. 'I shall have to have a rest soon,' panted Anne.

'I say, that's the car that took the boy away!' exclaimed Dick, suddenly, as they passed a garage, outside which stood a black car, taking in petrol. 'The men are in it. But I can't see Oliver - and that great dog isn't anywhere about, either.'

'Well, they must have hidden Oliver somewhere not far off, and then they came back here for petrol,' said Julian. 'Go on, Tim, old fellow - you're on the right trail. I expect they've left that dog in charge of the boy. I bet if anyone went near, he'd tear them to pieces!'

'And I don't want old Timmy in a dog-fight,' said George.

'Yes. Not so good,' said Julian, and came to a stop. Timmy, however, went on, and wouldn't come back, even though George called him.

'Obstinate old thing!' said George crossly. 'Once he's following a trail nothing on earth will stop him. Well - I'm going after him in case he gets in to trouble!'

'Look - Timmy's gone through that gateway,' said Anne, 'into a field. There's a shed at the bottom of it. Could Oliver be there, with the dog inside, guarding him?'

Timmy stopped suddenly and began to growl. George ran to catch hold of his collar. But Timmy wrenched himself away and raced to the shed, scraping at the wooden door. Immediately a volley of fierce barks came from the shed. The Five halted.

A voice came from the shed. 'Help! Help, I'm locked in here!'

'There - Timmy followed the trail correctly!' said George. 'Quick, Ju - we mustn't let him break in that door - the other dog will fly at him, and at us, too! Whatever can we do?'

It was obvious that the other dog had been left on guard, and would fling himself on anyone or anything that tried to prevent him from doing his duty.

'Timmy! Stop throwing yourself against that door!' yelled George. 'You'll break it down, and then goodness knows what will happen!'

As both dogs, barking fiercely, again flung themselves on it from opposite sides, the door cracked in two places - and the bottom half shook and shivered!

'Anne, George, quick, come with me!' said Julian. 'We may be attacked by that dog once he gets out! Run! We could perhaps climb that tree, look. Buck up, for goodness sake!'

Terrified, the two girls raced for the tree, and the boys shoved them up, clambering on to a branch themselves.

Crash! The door fell to the ground, broken in half. At once the great mongrel leapt out. But it took absolutely no notice of Timmy. It ran, instead to the tree and stood below, growling fiercely. Timmy stood staring in surprise. Why was this dog growling at the children? It was all a mistake, Timmy decided, and he must put it right.

He ran to the tree, and whined as if to say: 'It's all right. Do come down and play with us!' Then he went to the other dog, and whined to him too.

The mongrel gave a loud bark, and jumped up. He ran off a little, stopped and turned round as if saying to Timmy: 'All right - you want a game? Then so do I! You're the dog I played with this morning, aren't you? Well, come on, let's have a game!'

And, to the children's enormous astonishment the two dogs gambolled amiably together!

'I feel a bit silly up here,' said Dick, climbing down. 'Come on - the war's over. Those dogs look as if they're friends for life. Let's go and get that kid.'

With the frightened boy safely in their midst, they began to walk cautiously out of the field. The two dogs took absolutely no notice! The big mongrel had got Timmy down on the ground, and was pretending to worry him. Timmy was having the time of his life!

'Look - there's a bus going to Kirrin!' said Julian, delighted. 'Stop it! We'll get in and take Oliver back to safety while we've a chance. Timmy will just have to walk. He'll make that dog forget all about guarding Oliver!'

It was not very long before they were safely back in Kirrin. Oliver looked very white, but when Julian told him solemnly that it was really a Very Big Adventure, he cheered up and began to boast! 'I was kidnapped! Coo - what will the boys at school say? But I was jolly scared though. Can we go and find my father?'

Professor Humes was very thankful to see his son again, for already he had notified the police that he had disappeared. Dick gave the police the number of the men's car. 'You'll soon track that all right!' he said. 'But not so well as old Tim here - he used his nose, and a jolly good nose it is too!'

'Woof!' said Timmy, and let his tongue hang out of his mouth.

'He says he's hot and thirsty,' said George. 'Let's buy him an ice-cream.!'

'We'll all have the biggest ice-creams there are in the village-shop,' said the Professor, patting Timmy. 'I could do with one myself.'

'I could do with four,' said Oliver, 'so I hope you're feeling generous, Dad! Dad, you should have seen Timmy following the trail! He's a wonder dog!'

'Well, we've always known that,' said George. 'Come on, Timmy - Ice-creams!'

8

Happy Christmas, Five!

Christmas Eve at Kirrin Cottage - and the Five were all there together! They were up in the boys' bedroom, packing Christmas presents in bright paper. Timmy was very excited, and nosed about the room, his long tail wagging in delight.

'Don't keep slapping my legs with your tail, Tim,' said Anne. 'Look out, George, he's getting tangled up with your ball of string!'

'Don't look round, Anne, I'm packing up your present,' said Dick. 'My word - there'll be a lot to give out this Christmas, with all of us here - and everyone giving everyone else something!'

'I've a B-O-N-E for Timmy,' said Anne, 'but it's downstairs in the larder. I was afraid he'd sniff it out up here.'

'Woof,' said Timmy, slapping his tail against Anne's legs again.

'He knows perfectly well that B-O-N-E spells Bone,' said Julian. 'Now you've made him sniff all about my parcels! Timmy - go downstairs, please!'

'Oh no - he does so love Christmas time, and helping us to pack up parcels,' said George. 'Sit, Timmy. Sit, I say. That's the third time you've knocked down my pile of presents.'

Downstairs, her father and mother were packing up parcels, too. They seemed to have as many as the four cousins upstairs! Mrs. Kirrin looked at the pile of packages on the table.

'Far too many to go on the tree!' she said. 'We'd better put all our parcels and the children's too into a sack, Quentin. We can stand the sack at the bottom of the tree, and you can be Father Christmas and hand them out tomorrow morning.'

'I am not going to be Father Christmas,' said Mr. Kirrin. 'All this nonsense at Christmas time! Bits of paper everywhere - parcels to undo - Timmy barking his head off. Hark at him now! I shall go mad! He's to go to his kennel.'

'No, no, Quentin - don't upset George on Christmas Eve,' said Mrs. Kirrin. 'Look - you go and sit down quietly in your study and read the paper. I'll finish the parcels. But you must be good and hand them out to the children tomorrow morning - yes, and hand Timmy's to him too.'

Supper-time came all too soon that night. When the bell rang to tell the Five that the meal was ready, they groaned.

'Have to finish afterwards,' said Dick, looking round at the mess of parcels, paper, string, ribbon and labels. 'Supper, Timmy, supper!'

Timmy shot downstairs at top speed, bumping heavily into Mr. Kirrin, who was just coming out of his study. Timmy gave him a quick lick of apology, and ran into the dining-room, putting his front feet on the table to see what was there.

'Down, Timmy - what manners!' said Julian. 'Hallo, Uncle Quentin - done up all your parcels yet?'

His uncle grunted. Aunt Fanny laughed. 'He's going to be Father Christmas tomorrow morning and hand out all the presents,' she said. 'Don't scowl like that, Quentin dear - you look just like George when I tell her to fetch something!'

'I do not scowl,' said George, scowling immediately, of course. Everyone roared at her, and she had to smile.

'Christmas Day tomorrow,' said Anne happily. 'Aunt Fanny, it's lovely of you to have us all here for Christmas. Goodness, we'll never finish opening our parcels tomorrow morning! I've at least one for everybody, and so has everyone else.'

'A nice little bit of arithmetic,' said Julian. 'That means we've about forty or more presents to undo - counting in those for Joan, the cook, and Timmy.'

'What a waste of time!' That remark came from Uncle Quentin, of course!

'It's a good thing you're not as horrid as you pretend to be, Father,' said George, and grinned at him. 'You always look so fierce - and yet I bet you've been round the shops buying all kinds of things. Hasn't he, Mother? I bet he's bought Timmy something, too.'

'Stop saying "I bet",' said her father. 'And don't put ideas in Timmy's head. Why on earth should I go shopping for him?'

'Woof!' said Timmy, from under the table, delighted to hear his name. He wagged his tail violently and Mr. Quentin leapt to his feet with a yell.

'Take that dog out! Slapping me with his tail like that! Why can't he have a short tail? I'll. . .'

'Sit down, Quentin,' said his wife. 'Timmy, come out. Sit over there. Now - let's change the subject!'

The four cousins looked at one another and grinned. It was lovely to be at Kirrin Cottage again, with dear kind Aunt Fanny, and quick-tempered Uncle Quentin. He was now beaming round at them, offering them a second helping.

'No thanks,' said Dick. 'I'm saving up for the pudding. I spotted it in the larder - scrumptious!'

After supper they finished their parcels, and brought them all down to the sitting-room. The tree was there, looking very jolly, though the candles on it were not yet lighted. It was hung with tinsel and little sparkling ornaments, and had at the top the fairy doll that had been on every Christmas tree since George was little.

The parcels were put into a big sack, and this was set at the foot of the tree, ready for the morning. Timmy immediately went to sniff at it, from top to bottom.

'He can smell his Christmas bone,' said Anne. 'Timmy, come away. I won't have you guessing my present!'

After supper they played games, and Timmy joined in. He was so excited that he began to bark, and Uncle Quentin stormed out of his study at once, and appeared in the sitting-room.

'George! I've told you before I won't have Timmy barking in the house. Yes, I know it's Christmas Eve, but I can't stand that barking. Why must he have such a loud one? It's enough to deafen me. I'll turn him out. He can go to his kennel!'

'Oh no, Father - not on Christmas Eve!' said George, horrified. 'Timmy, go and lie down - and be quiet!'

'He's to go out to his kennel,' said her father. 'That's my last word. Out, Timmy, out!'

So out poor Timmy had to go, his tail well down. He felt puzzled. The children had been shouting, hadn't they? It was their way of barking. Well, why couldn't he shout in his own way, which was barking?

George was cross, and Anne was almost in tears. Poor Timmy - to be sent out to his kennel on Christmas Eve! She went to comfort George, and was surprised to see that she wasn't looking upset.

'Don't worry, Anne - I'll fetch him in when we go to bed and he can sleep in our room as usual,' she said.

'You can't do that!' said Anne. 'Uncle Quentin would be furious if he discovered him there.'

'He won't,' said George. 'It's no good, Anne. I'm going to have Timmy with me tonight, though I know I shouldn't. I couldn't bear not to. I'll own up to Father tomorrow.'

So, when the household was safely in bed, George crept downstairs to fetch Timmy from his kennel. He whined softly in joy and wagged his big tail.

'Be quiet now,' whispered George, and took him upstairs - quite forgetting to lock the kitchen door! Timmy settled down on the rug beside her bed, very happy, and soon Anne and George were fast asleep in their beds, while the two boys slept soundly in their room nearby.

All four were awakened by a terrific bout of barking from Timmy! He stood at the bedroom door, scraping at it, trying to open it, barking at the top of his voice! George leapt out of bed in alarm.

'What is it, Timmy? What is it? Stop barking - Father will hear you and know you're in the house and not in your kennel. Oh do shut up, Timmy!'

But by this time everyone was wide awake, and soon the whole household was out on the landing, alarmed. George's father was very angry when he saw that Timmy was in the house after all. 'Why isn't he in his kennel? What's the matter with him? How dare you disobey me, George?'

'Take him out to his kennel at once, George,' said her mother, very cross too. 'He's over-excited tonight - it was all that fun and games you had. Take him out at once.'

'But, Mother - he doesn't usually bark. Perhaps there was a burglar in the house,' said poor George.

'Nonsense!' said her father, angrily. 'No burglar would come on Christmas Eve. Take the dog out to his kennel - and don't let me hear another sound tonight!'

'Go on, George, now,' said her mother. 'Do as you are told and don't spoil Christmas.'

Timmy was very sad to be put into his kennel again. He whined dismally, and George almost made up her mind to stay outside with him. But his kennel was not big enough to take both of them, so she gave him a hug and went indoors with Anne, scowling in the darkness. This time she remembered to lock the door behind her! Soon everyone was in bed again, and sound asleep.

Anne awoke a little while later and sat up in bed. She had heard something - some noise downstairs. She sat and listened. Was there someone in the living-room? Then she heard a click. 'Like a door being shut,' she thought, and wondered if she should wake George. No - surely Timmy would bark loudly if he heard anything suspicious - he was only just outside, in his kennel. Perhaps he had heard something when he had barked before.

'Well, anyway, I'm not going downstairs by myself in the dark,' thought Anne. 'And I really dare not wake Uncle or Aunt. I must leave Timmy to deal with whatever it is. He can always bark or howl if someone is about!'

Timmy had heard something, and he was sitting in his kennel, ears pricked, a little growl grumbling in his throat. He really didn't dare to bark this time. He had heard something before, when he had barked in George's bedroom, and awakened the whole household - and yet there had been nobody downstairs then that he could see or smell!

But somebody was in the house - someone who had crept in at the kitchen door, when George had left it unlocked! That Somebody had hidden in the coal-cellar, door fast shut, when Timmy had barked and alarmed the household! Now the Somebody was about again, switching on a small torch, making the little noises that had awakened Anne.

It was Tom, the bad boy of the village! He had been out to a rowdy party, and had passed Kirrin Cottage on his way home. He had tiptoed to the front door, and gone to the garden door and tried both handles - no, they were fast locked! Then he had slipped round to the kitchen door, and to his surprise and delight had found it opening when he turned the handle.

He had crept inside and was just looking round when Timmy had begun to bark upstairs - and quick as a rabbit Tom had slipped into the coal-cellar, and shivered there while the household came out on to the landing, angry with Timmy, who was then put into his kennel.

When all was quiet, and the dog safely in his kennel, the boy looked quietly round to see what lie could take. He thought he heard a noise, and stopped in alarm. No, it was only the coals dropping in the grate. He felt scared, and swung his torch round and about to see what he could easily take away with him.

He saw the sack lying by the Christmas Tree - how it bulged with the parcels inside it! Tom grinned in delight. 'Must be full of fine presents!' he thought. 'All nicely bundled up in a sack, too - couldn't be easier for me to carry!' He lifted it, put it over his shoulder, and tiptoed out of the kitchen door, shutting it with a little click - the click that Anne had heard from upstairs!

Timmy knew there was someone about, of course - but now he didn't dare to bark. He had been put into his kennel as a punishment for barking - if he barked again and woke Mr. Kirrin, goodness knows what would happen to him! So he kept quite silent, and slipped out of his kennel, and down the garden path after the boy with the sack.

He followed him all the way to the village, unseen and unheard. How he longed to growl, how he longed to fly at this nasty little robber-boy and nip him sharply in the leg! He saw the boy go through a gate and walk to a shed nearby. He went in, and came out again - but this time without the sack! Then he let himself into the house nearby, shut the door, and disappeared.

Timmy sat down to think. After a minute he went to the shed and slipped through the half-broken wooden door. He smelt the sack at once. That bulging sack belonged to George! Very well - it must at once be taken back to Kirrin Cottage before the boy took out all the presents in it. Timmy sniffed at the parcels inside. His own parcel was there - the one with the bone that Anne had wrapped up for him. Timmy growled. So that boy had dared to carry away his bone! Timmy decided to take the whole sack back to Kirrin Cottage.

But alas - it was far too heavy for him to drag out of the shed! What was he to do? He worked his head into the open sack-neck again and pulled out a parcel - then another and another! Good - he would take them one by one to his kennel and hide them there for Christmas morning!

And that is exactly what dear, patient old Timmy did! He took all those parcels one by one to his kennel, trotting back and forth so many times that he began to feel he was walking in a dream! It was lucky that Kirrin Cottage was not far from the boy's home, or he would have been trotting to and fro all night!

At last the sack was empty, and the last parcel safely tucked into the back of his big kennel. There was hardly room for old Timmy to sit in it! Tired out but very happy, he put down his head on his paws, and fell sound asleep.

He was awakened next morning by a great hubbub in Kirrin Cottage! 'Aunt Fanny! Uncle Quentin! The sack of presents is gone - and the kitchen door's wide open! Someone's stolen all our presents in the night.'

'That's why Timmy barked! He knew there was something going on! Oh, our beautiful presents! What a mean trick!'

'But why didn't old Tim catch the thief when he slipped out of the kitchen door with the sack? Poor old Tim - he must have been too scared to do anything, after being scolded for barking before, and made to go to his kennel!'

'Christmas is spoilt!' said Anne, with tears in her eyes. 'No presents at all - no surprises - no fun!'

'Woof!' said Timmy, coming out of his kennel, as the four children came up the path. 'Woof!'

'Who took our lovely presents, Timmy - and where do you suppose they are now?' said George, sorrowfully. 'Didn't you dare to bark, old thing?'

'Woof,' said Timmy, in an apologetic voice, and went into his kennel. He backed out with something in his mouth - a parcel! He went in and fetched another - and another - and another! He laid them all down in front of the astounded children, wagging his tail.

'Timmy! Where did you get them? Where's the sack? Did you chase the thief, and take the parcels one by one out of the sack - and bring them home?' asked George, in wonder.

'Woof,' said Timmy, agreeing, and wagged his tail vigorously. He pawed at one of the parcels, and Anne gave a delighted laugh.

'That's my present to you!' she said. 'You knew it was for you, Tim - you smelt the bone inside. Darling, darling Tim, how clever you are! You stored all our presents safely in your kennel, so that we should have them on Christmas morning after all! I'll undo your parcel and you shall have my present first of all!'

'Woof, Woof, Woof!' barked Timmy, in delight, and not even Uncle Quentin frowned at the tremendous noise.

'Good old Timmy! Open your parcel and then go indoors and gnaw your bone, while you watch the others open theirs.'

Happy Christmas to all the Five - and especially to you, Timmy-dog, especially to you!

THE END